

OXFORD

SMITH, HOGAN, AND ORMEROD'S
CRIMINAL LAW

David Ormerod & Karl Laird

Fifteenth Edition

Smith, Hogan, and Ormerod's Criminal Law is accompanied by several free online resources to further your understanding and aid your study.

Visit www.oup.com/uk/sho/ to find the following features:

- Detailed post-publication legal updates
- Web links to selected further reading materials
- A key to all the cases
- The full bibliography

, 137
1 9NN

BPP UNIVERSITY

m

179

WITHDRAWN

BPP University

100002

About the authors

David Ormerod QC is currently a Law Commissioner for England and Wales. He is seconded from University College London, where he is Professor of Criminal Justice. David is the author of numerous journal articles and books and is: Editor of the Criminal Law Review; Editor-in-Chief of Blackstone's Criminal Practice; and Consultant Editor of Halsbury's Laws of England on Criminal Law (2016) and Criminal Evidence and Procedure (2015). He lectures regularly to the profession and for the Judicial College on a range of topics.

He is a Door Tenant in the chambers of Max Hill QC, 18 Red Lion Chambers, and is a Bencher of Middle Temple, Honorary Bencher of the Inn of Court of Northern Ireland, and an honorary life member of the Criminal Bar Association.

Other titles from David Ormerod:

Fraud: Criminal Law and Procedure (2008) with Clare Montgomery QC;

Smith's Law of Theft (9th edn, 2007) with David Williams QC;

Smith, Hogan, and Ormerod's Text, Cases, and Materials on Criminal Law (12th edn, 2017) with Karl Laird; and Smith, Hogan, and Ormerod's Essentials of Criminal Law (2nd edn, 2017) with John Child.

Karl Laird is currently a fixed-term Fellow and Tutor in Law at St Hilda's College, Oxford. In addition to teaching at the University of Oxford, Karl has also taught at the Universities of Bristol and Cambridge, and at the LSE. He is the author of numerous publications and serves as a case commentator for the Criminal Law Review and Lloyd's Law Reports: Financial Crime.

Other titles from Karl Laird:

Smith, Hogan, and Ormerod's Text, Cases, and Materials on Criminal Law (12th edn, 2017) with David Ormerod.

Smith, Hogan, and Ormerod's CRIMINAL LAW

Fifteenth edition

David Ormerod QC

*Law Commissioner for England and Wales,
Professor of Criminal Justice, University College London,
Barrister, Benchers of Middle Temple, Door Tenant at 18 Red Lion Chambers*

Karl Laird

Fixed-term Fellow and Tutor in Law, St Hilda's College, Oxford

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD

UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford, OX2 6DP,
United Kingdom

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide. Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

© Oxford University Press 2018

The moral rights of the authors have been asserted

Twelfth edition 2008

Thirteenth edition 2011

Fourteenth edition 2015

Impression: 1

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, by licence or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this work in any other form and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

Public sector information reproduced under Open Government Licence v3.0
(<http://www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/doc/open-government-licence/open-government-licence.htm>)

Published in the United States of America by Oxford University Press
198 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016, United States of America

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

Data available

Library of Congress Control Number: 2017964393

ISBN 978-0-19-880709-4

Printed in Great Britain by Bell & Bain Ltd., Glasgow

Links to third party websites are provided by Oxford in good faith and for information only. Oxford disclaims any responsibility for the materials contained in any third party website referenced in this work.

For Olivia and Scarlet

David Ormerod

For Jim, Joyce, Jessica and Archie

Karl Laird

New to this edition

Key developments in the 15th edition include:

- Jogee on secondary liability;
- Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd on dishonesty;
- Taylor on causation and strict liability;
- W on causation and euthanasia;
- Brandford and Joseph on duress;
- Ray, Riddell and Oraki on self-defence; R (DPP) v Stratford Magistrates' Court on using force in the prevention of crime;
- Loake v CPS on insanity;
- Golds, Kay, Joyce, Lindo, Squelch and Blackman on diminished responsibility;
- Rejmanski, McGrory and B on loss of control;
- Sellu, Rose, Rudling and Bawa-Garba on gross negligence manslaughter;
- Shepherd v CPS on child abduction.
- Chapter 6 on parties to crime has been extensively rewritten to take account of the Supreme Court's seminal judgment in Jogee and includes detailed analysis of both the judgment and the developments that have taken place since it was handed down.
- Significant amendments have been made to a number of chapters to reflect the changes to the test for dishonesty made by the Supreme Court in Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd.

Preface

Halfway through its fifth decade, it is a source of immense pride that Smith and Hogan's Criminal Law continues to be relied upon by judges, practitioners and students alike to provide an authoritative and accessible account of the criminal law. It was gratifying to see the 14th edition of the book be cited with such frequency by the courts in England and Wales, including by the Supreme Court in its seminal judgment in Jogee. In this edition, we have once again sought to produce a doctrinal analysis of the criminal law that will appeal to a broad readership. We hope that this edition is as well received as its predecessors.

A number of developments of note take place in this edition. To reflect David Ormerod's stewardship of the book for almost two decades, the title has been changed to Smith, Hogan, and Ormerod's Criminal Law. Readers will also note that the chapter on complicity has been rewritten to incorporate the judgment in Jogee. We hope that this new chapter is received with the same authority as the one that it replaces. A significant proportion of the theft chapter has also been rewritten to reflect the Supreme Court's judgment in Ivey v Genting Casinos. The book has a broad readership and is relied upon by judges and practitioners, in addition to students. To reflect this fact, we have made a number of changes in this edition to ensure that the book retains its student focus and remains an accessible resource for those who are studying criminal law. We have replaced Chapters 1 to 3 with a single chapter that introduces students to the criminal law. We have also moved some chapters that are less relevant to the book's student readership onto OUP's online resources. They are available free of charge online. Doing so enabled us to include even more extensive analysis of those core areas of the criminal law that are not only of greatest relevance to students, but also to the book's judicial and practitioner readers. Those chapters that have been moved online have been updated and subjected to the same detailed analysis as all of the others.

The manuscript for this edition was delivered to OUP in November 2017, but we have been able to incorporate a number of important developments that have taken place since then.

David Ormerod
Karl Laird

Acknowledgements

We would like to thank the friends and colleagues from both academia and practice who gave us their views on a number of sections of this edition. In particular we would like to thank David Perry QC, Paul Jarvis and Professor Rebecca Williams for their invaluable insights. We would also like to thank Rory Kelly for his excellent research assistance and Damian Warburton for checking all the citations and painstakingly reading and commenting upon almost the entire book.

At OUP we were fortunate to work once again with Tom Young and John Carroll, for whose hard work in preparing this edition we are most grateful. This was John's last publication at OUP and we wish him all the best for the future. Anne Flegel finalised the production of the book and we are grateful for her efforts in getting it across the finish line. Copy-editing was once again expertly performed by Joy Ruskin-Tompkins, whose patience we frequently tested, but whose tolerance knows no bounds. Finally, we are also grateful to Caroline Quinnell for her care in dealing with the proofs.

Contents

Table of statutes	xv
Table of cases	xxix
Abbreviations	lxvii

Part I General Principles

1	An introduction to the criminal law	3
1.1	A universal definition of 'a crime'?	3
1.2	A universal purpose in criminal law?	4
1.3	Universal characteristics of a crime?	5
1.4	The sources of the criminal law	15
1.5	EU	18
1.6	International law	19
1.7	The ECHR and Human Rights Act 1998	19
2	The elements of a crime: actus reus	26
2.1	Introduction	26
2.2	Analysis of an actus reus	35
2.3	A 'state of affairs' as an actus reus	42
2.4	Omissions	45
2.5	Causation	63
3	The elements of a crime: mens rea	86
3.1	Introduction	86
3.2	Forms of mens rea	89
3.3	Further principles of mens rea	120
4	Crimes of negligence	133
4.1	Negligence as failure to comply with an objective standard	133
4.2	Negligence as the basis of liability	138
4.3	Degrees of negligence	139
4.4	Should negligence be a ground of liability?	140
5	Crimes of strict liability	143
5.1	The nature of strict liability	143
5.2	The presumption of mens rea	150
5.3	Recognizing offences of strict liability	154
5.4	Arguments for and against strict liability	168
5.5	Negligence/lack of due diligence as a preferred approach	170

6	Parties to crime	175
6.1	Introduction	175
6.2	Bases of liability	177
6.3	The principal offender	179
6.4	The liability of secondary parties who assist or encourage crime	184
6.5	The rise and fall of 'parasitic accessory' or 'joint enterprise' liability	212
6.6	Secondary participation must be in 'an offence'	218
6.7	The relationship between the liability of the principal and secondary party	219
6.8	Withdrawal by a secondary party	225
6.9	Victims as parties to crime	229
6.10	Instigation for the purpose of entrapment	231
6.11	Reform of secondary liability	232
7	Assistance after the offence	235
7.1	Impeding the apprehension or prosecution of offenders	235
7.2	Compounding an offence	241
7.3	Refusal to aid a constable	243
7.4	Reform	244
8	Corporate and vicarious liability	245
8.1	Liability of corporations	245
8.2	Vicarious liability	266
9	Mental conditions, intoxication and mistake	277
9.1	Introduction	277
9.2	Insanity	280
9.3	Automatism	307
9.4	Intoxication	311
9.5	Combined, consecutive and concurrent causes of loss of capacity	329
9.6	Mistake	332
10	General defences	341
10.1	Infancy	341
10.2	Duress	344
10.3	Necessity	367
10.4	Marital coercion	379
10.5	Superior orders	379
10.6	Public and private defence	380
10.7	Impossibility	409
11	Inchoate crime	410
11.1	Introduction	410
11.2	Attempt	412

11.3 Conspiracy	435
11.4 Encouragement and assistance under the Serious Crime Act 2007	474
11.5 Inchoate crime and impossibility	494

Part II Particular Crimes

12	Murder	503
12.1	Definition	503
12.2	The sentence for murder	515
12.3	Proposals for reform of murder	516
13	Voluntary Manslaughter	520
13.1	Loss of self-control	521
13.2	Diminished responsibility	548
14	Involuntary manslaughter	568
14.1	Manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act	569
14.2	Gross negligence manslaughter	583
14.3	Reckless manslaughter	596
14.4	Reform	597
14.5	The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007	599
15	Further homicide and related offences	615
15.1	Offences ancillary to murder	615
15.2	Complicity in suicide and suicide pacts	619
15.3	Infanticide	631
15.4	The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Acts 2004 and 2012	634
15.5	Child destruction and abortion	641
16	Non-fatal offences against the person	657
16.1	Assault and battery	657
16.2	Defences to assault and battery	665
16.3	Assault occasioning actual bodily harm	686
16.4	Wounding and grievous bodily harm: OAPA 1861, s 20	688
16.5	Section 18 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861	694
16.6	Reform	697
16.7	Racially or religiously aggravated assaults	698
16.8	Aggravated assaults	702
16.9	Ill-treatment or neglect	712
16.10	Administering poison	713
16.11	False imprisonment	717
16.12	Kidnapping	724

16.13	Other abduction offences	730
16.14	Harassment	733
16.15	Offensive weapons	747
17	Sexual offences	756
17.1	Introduction	756
17.2	Recurring fundamental concepts in the 2003 Act	757
17.3	Non-consensual offences	786
17.4	Offences against children under 13 (ss 5–8)	798
17.5	Sexual offences against children aged 13 to 15	804
17.6	Offences of abuse of trust	813
17.7	Family offences	813
17.8	Offences involving mental disorder	815
17.9	Other sexual offences	817
17.10	Overarching problems with the 2003 Act	822
18	Theft	826
18.1	Interpreting the Theft Acts	826
18.2	The offence of theft	827
18.3	Actus reus	828
18.4	Mens rea	870
18.5	Corporations and their officers	893
18.6	Liability of spouses and civil partners for Theft Act offences	893
18.7	Reform	894
19	Robbery	895
19.1	Robbery under the Theft Act 1968	895
20	Offences of temporary deprivation	903
20.1	Removal of articles from places open to the public	903
20.2	Taking conveyances	906
20.3	Aggravated vehicle-taking	915
21	Making off without payment	919
21.1	Making off under the Theft Act 1978	919
22	The Fraud Act 2006	926
22.1	Background	926
22.2	The general fraud offence	928
22.3	Section 2: fraud by false representation	936
22.4	Section 3: fraud by failing to disclose information	955
22.5	Section 4: fraud by abuse of position	959
22.6	Section 11: obtaining services dishonestly	966

22.7	Section 6: possession of articles for fraud	969
22.8	Section 7: making or supplying articles for use in frauds	976
23	Other offences involving fraud	980
23.1	False accounting	980
23.2	Corporations and their officers	990
23.3	False statements by company directors	991
23.4	Suppression of documents	992
23.5	Cheating the public revenue	993
24	Blackmail and related offences	996
24.1	Blackmail	996
24.2	Unlawful harassment of debtors	1006
24.3	Other offences based on threats	1006
25	Burglary and related offences	1007
25.1	Burglary	1007
25.2	Burglary in respect of a dwelling	1019
25.3	Aggravated burglary	1022
25.4	Trespass with intent to commit a sexual offence	1025
25.5	Going equipped	1026
25.6	Other trespass offences	1030
26	Handling and related offences	1031
26.1	Handling stolen goods	1031
26.2	Dishonestly retaining a wrongful credit	1053
26.3	Advertising for the return of stolen goods	1055
26.4	Money laundering	1056
27	Offences of damage to property	1069
27.1	Destroying or damaging property of another	1069
27.2	Destroying or damaging property with intent to endanger life	1089
27.3	Arson	1094
27.4	Racially or religiously aggravated criminal damage	1095
27.5	Threats to destroy or damage property	1095
27.6	Possession offences	1098
27.7	Kindred offences	1099
28	Computer misuse offences	1101
28.1	Introduction	1101
28.2	Unauthorized access to computer material	1104
28.3	Unauthorized access with intent to commit or facilitate further offences	1108
28.4	Unauthorized acts with intent to impair or recklessness as to impairment of a computer	1109

28.5	Impairing a computer such as to cause serious damage	1112
28.6	Making, supplying or obtaining articles for use in offences under s 1 or s 3: s 3ZA	1114
29	Forgery	1116
30	Obscene communication and publication offences	1117
31	Offences against public order	1118
32	Selected road traffic offences	1119
Bibliography		1120
Index		1121

Table of statutes

ENGLAND AND WALES

Abortion Act 1967 ... 368, 509, 642, 643, 644, 647, 648–55
s 1 ... 648, 651, 653, 654
s 1(1)(a) ... 651
s 1(3) ... 649
s 1(3A) ... 649
s 1(4) ... 649, 653
s 2 ... 652
s 4 ... 654
s 4(2) ... 654
s 5(1) ... 643
s 5(2) ... 651, 653
Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 ... 476
s 8 ... 176, 177, 235, 475
Administration of Justice Act 1920 ... 235
Administration of Justice Act 1970
s 40 ... 1006
Adoption Act 2002 ... 731
Adoption and Children Act 2002
s 139(1) ... 731
Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Act 1992 ... 916
Animal Welfare Act 2006
ss 4–8 ... 1080
s 4 ... 1081
s 4(1) ... 133
s 4(2) ... 155
s 4(4) ... 1086
Animals Act 1971
s 9 ... 1085
s 9(3)(b) ... 1085
Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act
2014 ... 14
s 113 ... 825
s 121 ... 722
s 176 ... 828
s 177 ... 379
s 177(3) ... 379
Sch 5 ... 825
Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act
2001 ... 20, 698
s 39(5)(b) ... 1095
s 39(6)(b) ... 1095
s 50 ... 411
s 80(2) ... 102
s 113 ... 717
s 114 ... 717
Armed Forces Act 2006
s 15(2) ... 137
s 42 ... 504
Aviation Security Act 1982
ss 2–3 ... 1094
s 6 ... 504
Bills of Exchange Act 1882
s 27(1) ... 846
Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953

s 36 ... 656
Bribery Act 2010
s 1 ... 264
s 6 ... 264
s 7 ... 171, 248, 264, 265
s 7(2) ... 171, 248, 264
s 7(3) ... 264
s 7(5) ... 265
s 9 ... 248
s 10(1) ... 265
s 11(3) ... 265
s 12 ... 265
s 14 ... 990
s 15 ... 265
s 15(3) ... 265
British Nationality Act 1948
s 3 ... 504
British Transport Commission Act 1949
s 55 ... 1030
Carriage by Air Act 1961 ... 605
Child Abduction Act 1984 ... 442, 653, 730
s 1 ... 730, 731
s 2 ... 731, 733
s 2(1)(b) ... 732
s 2(3)(b) ... 731
s 3 ... 732
Children Act 1989 ... 730, 731
Pt II ... 731
Pt IV ... 612
Pt V ... 612
s 3 ... 731
s 8(1) ... 731
s 31 ... 640
Children Act 2004
s 58 ... 684, 685, 722
Children and Young Persons Act 1933 ... 51, 430
s 1 ... 112, 635
s 1(1) ... 46, 575
s 1(2)(a) ... 46
s 50 ... 341, 441
Children and Young Persons Act 1963
s 16 ... 341
Civil Aviation Act 1982
s 39 ... 1030
s 92 ... 504
Civil Aviation (Amendment) Act 1996
s 1(2) ... 504
Civil Partnerships Act 2004 ... 814, 893
Common Informers Act 1951 ... 243
Communications Act 2003 ... 1117
s 125 ... 852, 968
s 126(2) ... 978
s 127 ... 939
Companies Act 1985
s 444 ... 46
Companies Act 2006 ... 17, 871
Pt 3 ... 991

- s 1 ... 245
- s 1173(1) ... 991
- Sch 3 ... 46
- Computer Misuse Act 1990 ... 1070, 1101, 1102, 1103
- s 1 ... 1104, 1106, 1108, 1114, 1115
- s 2 ... 1108, 1109
- s 2(3) ... 1108
- s 2(4) ... 1109
- s 3 ... 433, 480, 1109–12, 1114, 1115
- s 3(2) ... 1111, 1112
- s 3(2)(d) ... 1109
- s 3(6) ... 1110
- s 3A ... 1115
- s 3A(1) ... 1114
- s 3A(2) ... 1114
- s 3A(3) ... 1114
- s 3A(4) ... 1114
- s 3ZA ... 1112, 1113, 1114–15
- s 8 ... 432
- s 10(5) ... 1070
- s 17 ... 1106
- s 17(5) ... 1107
- s 17(7) ... 1111
- s 17(8) ... 1111
- s 17(10) ... 1107
- Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875
- s 3 ... 450
- s 7 ... 1004
- Constables Protection Act 1750 ... 722
- Contempt of Court Act 1981 ... 148
- Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 ... 860
- Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 ... 974
- s 297(1) ... 852
- s 297A ... 852
- Coroners and Justice Act 2009 ... 234, 503, 520, 557, 563, 567, 627, 632, 757
- s 44 ... 478
- s 52 ... 520, 548, 549–67
- s 52(2) ... 566
- ss 54–56 ... 520, 524, 534
- s 54 ... 387, 400, 523, 529, 546
- s 54(1) ... 534
- s 54(1)(c) ... 529, 533, 536, 541, 543–8
- s 54(2) ... 526
- s 54(3) ... 536, 541, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547
- s 54(4) ... 525
- s 54(5) ... 533, 534, 543
- s 54(6) ... 524, 525, 529, 534
- s 54(8) ... 222, 524
- s 55 ... 523, 528, 530–43
- s 55(3) ... 531, 532, 542, 543
- s 55(4) ... 531, 535–42
- s 55(5) ... 531, 542–3
- s 55(6) ... 531, 532, 535, 538, 539
- s 55(6)(a) ... 525, 531
- s 55(6)(b) ... 531
- s 55(6)(c) ... 539, 540, 541, 542
- s 56 ... 523
- s 59 ... 620, 621
- s 61 ... 621
- s 72 ... 460
- Sch 12 ... 621
- Sch 22 ... 524, 550
- Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 ... 175, 246, 255–6, 261, 517, 599–614
- s 1 ... 602, 609
- s 1(1) ... 607
- s 1(2) ... 604
- s 1(3) ... 607
- s 1(4)(c) ... 256, 607
- s 1(5) ... 604
- s 1(6) ... 612
- s 2 ... 605, 607, 609
- s 2(1) ... 607
- s 2(1)(a) ... 610, 611, 612
- s 2(1)(b) ... 607, 610, 611, 612
- s 2(1)(c) ... 610
- s 2(1)(d) ... 606, 607, 610, 611, 612
- s 2(2) ... 606
- s 2(2)(b) ... 606
- s 2(4) ... 605
- s 2(4)(b) ... 608
- s 2(5) ... 607
- s 2(6) ... 607
- s 2(7) ... 605, 606
- ss 3–7 ... 604, 605, 607, 609
- s 3 ... 607
- s 3(1) ... 609
- s 3(2) ... 610
- s 4 ... 610–1
- s 4(3) ... 611
- s 4(4) ... 611
- s 5 ... 611
- s 5(1) ... 611
- s 5(2) ... 611
- s 5(3) ... 611
- s 5(4) ... 611
- s 6 ... 611–12
- s 6(4) ... 612
- s 6(5) ... 612
- s 6(7) ... 612
- s 7 ... 612
- s 8 ... 263, 603, 608
- s 8(3) ... 264, 609
- s 8(5) ... 263, 608
- s 9 ... 258
- s 9(1) ... 613
- s 9(2) ... 613
- s 9(4) ... 613
- s 9(5) ... 614
- s 10 ... 258, 614
- s 10(4) ... 614
- s 11 ... 604
- s 11(2) ... 604
- s 12(1) ... 610
- s 12(2) ... 611
- s 13 ... 611
- s 14(2) ... 604, 612
- s 14(3) ... 612
- s 15 ... 612
- s 16 ... 604
- s 17(1) ... 612
- s 18(1) ... 248, 603
- s 19(1) ... 603
- s 19(2) ... 603
- s 20 ... 603
- s 21 ... 604
- s 23 ... 606
- s 25 ... 246, 603, 604
- s 27(4) ... 603
- s 27(5) ... 603

- s 28 ... 613
- s 28(3) ... 613
- s 28(4) ... 613
- Sch 1 ... 604, 612
- County Courts Act 1984
 - s 14(1)(b) ... 702
- Crime (Sentences) Act 1997
 - s 30 ... 516
- Crime and Courts Act 2013
 - s 43 ... 387, 388, 390, 391, 533
- Crime and Disorder Act 1998 ... 101, 698
 - s 28(1) ... 699
 - s 28(1)(a) ... 699, 700–1
 - s 28(1)(b) ... 699, 701–2
 - s 28(3) ... 701
 - s 29 ... 699
 - s 30 ... 1095
 - s 32 ... 744
 - s 32(1)(a) ... 744
 - s 32(1)(b) ... 744
 - s 34 ... 343
 - s 36 ... 509
- Criminal Appeal Act 1968 ... 14
 - s 2 ... 425
 - s 12 ... 305
- Criminal Appeal Act 1995 ... 425
- Criminal Attempts Act 1981 ... 29, 48, 98, 412, 415, 420–2, 423–4, 426, 427, 429, 431, 432, 435, 445, 446, 615, 619, 733, 818, 892, 893, 908, 1035
 - s 1 ... 337, 414, 429, 475
 - s 1(1) ... 412, 413, 416, 417, 421, 423, 426, 430, 433, 442, 498
 - s 1(1A) ... 433
 - s 1(1B) ... 433
 - s 1(2) ... 453, 495
 - s 1(3) ... 416, 417, 495, 499
 - s 1(3)(b) ... 416, 499
 - s 1(4) ... 432
 - s 1(4)(b) ... 218, 432, 450
 - s 1(4)(c) ... 236, 239, 241
 - s 1A ... 433
 - s 2 ... 441
 - s 2(3) ... 441
 - s 3(1) ... 432
 - s 4(3) ... 425, 426, 428
 - s 5 ... 437, 496
 - s 5(1)(b) ... 428
 - s 6(4) ... 430
- Criminal Damage Act 1971 ... 51, 102, 106, 368, 380, 404, 716, 849, 850, 1069, 1070, 1071, 1076, 1099, 1100, 1110, 1111
 - s 1 ... 101, 105, 108, 419, 1096, 1098
 - s 1(1) ... 54, 107, 324, 419, 1069, 1074, 1075, 1076, 1077, 1079, 1088, 1091, 1093, 1095
 - s 1(2) ... 418, 419, 716, 1075, 1085, 1089, 1090, 1091, 1092, 1093, 1094, 1095
 - s 1(2)(b) ... 1090
 - s 1(3) ... 54, 107, 1077, 1094, 1095
 - s 2 ... 1006, 1095–6, 1098
 - s 2(a) ... 1096, 1097, 1098
 - s 2(b) ... 1096, 1097, 1098
 - s 3 ... 1098
 - s 4 ... 1069, 1089, 1094
 - s 4(2) ... 1096, 1098
 - s 5 ... 382, 398, 1079, 1087, 1089
 - s 5(1) ... 1084, 1096
- s 5(2) ... 324, 325, 913, 1082, 1084, 1086, 1093
- s 5(2)(a) ... 1080, 1096
- s 5(2)(b) ... 347, 685, 1081, 1082, 1084, 1085, 1086, 1087, 1089
- ss 5(2)(b)(i), (ii) ... 1083
- s 5(3) ... 1080, 1086
- s 5(4) ... 1086
- s 5(5) ... 1086
- s 10 ... 1074
- s 10(1) ... 1073
- s 10(5) ... 1072, 1111
- Criminal Evidence Act 1898 ... 14
- Criminal Finances Act 2017
 - Pt 3 ... 248
 - s 45 ... 171, 265
 - s 46 ... 171, 265
- Criminal Justice Act 1925
 - s 33 ... 246
- Criminal Justice Act 1967
 - s 8 ... 131, 316, 323, 513, 578, 696, 1029
- Criminal Justice Act 1987 ... 435, 436, 444
 - s 12 ... 436
- Criminal Justice Act 1988 ... 1056, 1117
 - s 37(1) ... 907
 - s 39 ... 657, 659, 660, 661, 1006
 - s 40 ... 907
 - s 40(1) ... 431
 - s 40(3)(a) ... 659
 - s 93C(2) ... 119
 - s 139 ... 752, 754, 755
 - s 139(1) ... 1023
 - s 139(4) ... 755
 - s 139A ... 755
 - s 139AA ... 755
 - s 139AA(1) ... 755
 - s 141A ... 172
 - s 141A(4) ... 172
 - s 160 ... 757
- Criminal Justice Act 1991 ... 1007, 1017, 1019
 - s 26 ... 828
- Criminal Justice Act 1993 ... 929, 930, 1034
 - Pt 1 ... 433, 843
 - s 2 ... 998
 - s 5(2) ... 433
 - s 5(3) ... 469
- Criminal Justice Act 2003 ... 284, 929
 - ss 98–112 ... 1053
 - s 98(a) ... 1053
 - s 101 ... 1053
 - s 115 ... 1035
 - s 145 ... 702
 - s 146 ... 702
 - s 269 ... 511, 516
 - s 285(1) ... 916
 - s 320 ... 822
 - Sch 21 ... 511, 516, 518, 897
- Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015
 - s 20 ... 46, 713
 - s 21 ... 46, 264, 713
 - s 26 ... 47
 - s 28 ... 755
 - s 33 ... 1002
 - s 36 ... 811
 - s 52 ... 828
- Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000
 - Pt 1 ... 612

- Criminal Justice and Immigration Act (CJIA)
 2008 ... 685, 757, 824
 s 63 ... 1117
 s 69 ... 817
 s 72 ... 798
 s 73 ... 811
 s 76 ... 17, 27, 326, 380, 381, 382, 385, 386, 387,
 389, 392, 394, 397, 400, 401, 403, 404, 406, 532, 1084
 s 76(3) ... 382
 ss 76(4)–(8) ... 384
 s 76(4) ... 382, 383, 391
 s 76(5) ... 325, 326, 383, 391
 s 76(5A) ... 390, 394
 s 76(6) ... 384
 s 76(6)(A) ... 384, 399
 s 76(7) ... 384–5, 387, 397
 s 76(8) ... 385
 s 76(8A)(d) ... 391
 s 76(8B) ... 391
 s 76(8D) ... 391
 s 76(8E) ... 391
 s 76(8F) ... 390
 s 76(9) ... 381
 s 76(10)(b) ... 399
 Sch 15 ... 811, 813, 814
- Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010
 s 52 ... 342
 ss 168–171 ... 306
 s 168 ... 548
- Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 ... 737
 s 42A ... 745
 s 42A(4) ... 745
 s 42A(7) ... 745
 s 43 ... 1006
 s 46 ... 1072
 s 66 ... 1025
- Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 ... 787
 s 69 ... 1085
 s 142 ... 789
 s 142(3) ... 782
- Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 ... 460
- Criminal Law Act 1967 ... 34, 399, 432, 615, 694, 818
 s 1 ... 724
 s 3 ... 19, 367, 380, 395, 396, 397–8, 399, 403, 405, 686, 722, 861, 1087
 s 4 ... 235–6, 237, 238, 240, 242
 s 4(1) ... 432
 s 4(3) ... 240
 s 4(4) ... 236
 s 5 ... 241, 242, 243
 s 5(1) ... 241, 243, 432
 s 5(2) ... 852
 s 5(3) ... 241
 s 5(5) ... 241
 s 6(3) ... 237, 692
 s 6(3A) ... 898
 Sch 2 ... 655
- Criminal Law Act 1977 ... 177, 435, 436, 454, 472, 574, 615
 Pt I ... 437
 s 1 ... 450, 452, 462, 475, 837
 s 1(1) ... 436, 437, 447, 451, 453, 456, 460, 495, 496
 s 1(1)(a) ... 469
 s 1(1)(b) ... 445, 446, 447
 s 1(2) ... 437, 447, 456, 457, 459
 s 1A ... 460, 837, 842
 s 1A(8) ... 460
 s 2 ... 442
 s 2(1) ... 441
 s 2(2) ... 440
 s 2(2)(a) ... 440
 s 4(1) ... 450
 s 4(2) ... 450
 s 5(2) ... 436
 s 5(3) ... 436, 473
 s 5(6) ... 450
 s 5(7) ... 486
 s 5(8) ... 460
 s 5(9) ... 460
 s 5(11) ... 450
 s 6(1) ... 1006
 s 8 ... 1030
 s 12(1)(a) ... 1025
 Sch 12 ... 617
- Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885
 s 5 ... 229, 230
- Criminal Law (Amendment) Acts (Northern Ireland) 1885–1923
 s 4 ... 153
- Criminal Lunatics Act 1880 ... 282, 283
 s 2 ... 283
- Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964
 s 4 ... 282
 s 4A ... 282, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 524
 s 4A(1) ... 285
 s 4(5) ... 284, 285
 s 4(6) ... 284
 s 5 ... 288
 s 6 ... 566
- Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 ... 282, 285, 288, 290, 308
 s 1 ... 305
 s 2 ... 285
- Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995
 s 51B ... 548
- Cultural Property (Armed Conflicts) Act 2017
 s 16 ... 1032
 s 17(1) ... 1032
- Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 ... 366
 s 167(1) ... 109
 s 170 ... 337
 s 170(1)(b) ... 498
- Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 ... 3
 s 1(2)(d) ... 167
- Dangerous Drugs Act 1965 ... 165, 166
- Data Protection Act 1984 ... 1107
 s 5 ... 109
- Data Protection Act 1998 ... 109, 1102, 1107
 s 47 ... 46
 s 55 ... 1103
 s 55(2) ... 1103
- Deer Act 1991 ... 850
- Defective Premises Act 1972 ... 605
- Dockyards Protection Act 1772 ... 1099
- Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 ...
 51, 138, 196, 282, 285, 290, 634–41, 660, 734
 s 5 ... 430, 517, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641

- s 5(1) ... 637
- s 5(1)(d)(ii) ... 640
- s 5(4)(b) ... 639
- s 5(5) ... 639
- s 5(6) ... 637, 638, 639
- s 5(8) ... 635
- s 6 ... 635
- s 6(3A) ... 660
- s 6A ... 635
- s 11 ... 660
- s 22 ... 284, 285
- s 24 ... 288
- Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2012 ... 51, 138, 196, 634–41
- Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims (Amendment) Act 2012 ... 430
- Drug Trafficking Act 1994 (DTA 1994) ... 444, 1056
- Drugs Trafficking Offences Act 1986
 - s 34(1) ... 977
- Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964
 - s 1(1) ... 162
- Education Act 1944
 - s 39(1) ... 43
- Education Act 1996
 - s 444 ... 372
 - s 548 ... 685
 - s 548(5) ... 685
 - s 550AA ... 685
 - s 550ZA ... 685
 - s 550AB ... 685
- Education and Inspections Act 2006
 - s 93 ... 685
- Emergency Workers (Obstruction) Act 2006
 - s 1(3) ... 712
 - s 1(4) ... 712
- Energy Act 2013
 - Pt 3 ... 603
- Enterprise Act 2002 ... 16, 19, 470
- Environmental Protection Act 1990
 - s 60 ... 870
- Evidence Act 1851 ... 14
- Explosive Substances Act 1883 ... 454, 1100
 - s 2 ... 1094, 1099
 - s 3 ... 1099
 - s 4(1) ... 406
 - s 7(1) ... 1099
- Explosives Act 1875 ... 406
 - s 3(1) ... 1022, 1023
- Family Law Reform Act 1969
 - s 9(1) ... 341
- Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003 ... 175, 680
 - s 3A ... 681
 - s 5B ... 244
- Finance Act 1972
 - s 38(1) ... 993
- Finance Act 2000
 - s 144 ... 995
- Finance (No 2) Act 1940 ... 252
- Financial Services Act 2012 ... 957
 - Pt 7 ... 992
 - s 89 ... 109, 939, 992
- Financial Services and Markets Act 2000
 - Pt 2 ... 1053
- s 397 ... 939
- s 397(1)(c) ... 109
- Firearms Act 1968 ... 128, 747
 - s 1 ... 111
 - s 4(4) ... 111
 - s 5(1)(b) ... 850
 - s 18 ... 1022
 - s 18(1) ... 1023
 - s 19 ... 166
 - s 57 ... 1022
 - s 58(2) ... 166
- Fireworks Act 2003
 - s 1(1) ... 1023
- Food and Drugs Act 1955 ... 274
- Food Safety Act 1990 ... 274
 - ss 7–20 ... 171
 - s 14 ... 257
 - s 21(1) ... 172
 - s 21(5) ... 172
- Forced Marriage (Civil Protection) Act 2007 ... 722
- Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981 ... 433, 983, 1116
 - s 1 ... 1116
 - s 2 ... 1116
 - s 3 ... 1116
 - s 4 ... 1116
 - s 5(1) ... 1116
 - s 5(3) ... 1116
 - s 6 ... 1116
- Fraud Act 2006 ... 433, 437, 462, 471, 477, 826, 835, 846, 853, 871, 919, 922, 926–79, 992, 1054, 1108
 - ss 1–4 ... 967
 - s 1 ... 463, 829, 845, 928, 932, 934, 937, 946, 955, 969, 970, 974, 983, 1034
 - s 1(2) ... 940
 - s 1(2)(a) ... 831, 928, 936, 941
 - s 1(2)(b) ... 928
 - s 1(2)(c) ... 928
 - ss 2–4 ... 928, 929, 933, 970
 - s 2 ... 28, 33, 829, 830, 831, 859, 919, 923, 924, 925, 928, 929, 930, 931, 933, 934, 935, 936–55, 956, 957, 960, 963, 967, 968, 971, 980, 984, 991
 - s 2(2)(a) ... 951
 - s 2(3) ... 949
 - s 2(4) ... 946
 - s 2(5) ... 941, 942
 - s 3 ... 471, 928, 943, 944, 945, 947, 950, 955–9, 960, 980
 - s 4 ... 832, 929, 930, 944, 959–66, 980
 - s 4(2) ... 965
 - s 5 ... 933, 935, 967
 - s 5(3) ... 948, 967
 - s 6 ... 964, 968, 969–75, 977, 979, 1026, 1028, 1029
 - s 7 ... 451, 471, 963, 976–9, 1026, 1029
 - s 7(1) ... 977
 - s 7(1)(a) ... 976, 977, 978, 979
 - s 7(1)(b) ... 976, 977, 978, 979
 - s 8 ... 970, 977
 - s 9 ... 867, 974
 - s 11 ... 940, 966–9, 974
 - s 12 ... 256, 956, 990
 - Sch 1 ... 929, 1029, 1034, 1053
 - Sch 2 ... 929, 930
- Freedom of Information Act 2000
 - s 70(2) ... 1103

- Gambling Act 2005
 - s 42 ... 880
- Game Act 1831
 - s 23 ... 849
 - s 24 ... 849
 - s 30 ... 1011
- Game Laws (Amendment) Act 1960 ... 849–50
- Gaming Act 1968
 - s 16 ... 892
- Gender Recognition Act 2004 ... 757
- Guard Dogs Act 1975
 - s 1 ... 1085
 - s 5 ... 1085
- Health and Safety at Work Act 1974 ... 603
 - s 3 ... 262
 - s 3(1) ... 266
 - s 37 ... 257
- Homicide Act 1957 ... 515, 537, 553, 569
 - s 1 ... 514
 - s 1(1) ... 514
 - s 1(2) ... 514
 - s 2 ... 24, 503, 548, 549, 551, 552, 558, 559, 560, 563, 564
 - s 2(1) ... 562
 - s 2(1)(a) ... 555
 - s 2(1A) ... 551, 556, 561, 563
 - s 2(1B) ... 560, 561, 563
 - s 2(2) ... 548
 - s 2(4) ... 222, 452
 - s 3 ... 521, 523, 527, 528, 544
 - s 4 ... 629, 631
 - s 4(1) ... 629
 - s 4(2) ... 630
 - s 4(3) ... 629
 - s 5 ... 515
- Housing Act 1936
 - s 11(1) ... 1015
 - s 11(4) ... 1015
 - s 12 ... 1015
- Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 ... 643, 651
 - s 2(3) ... 646
 - s 3(1) ... 274
 - s 3(1)(b) ... 274
 - s 3(1A)(a) ... 274
 - s 37 ... 648
 - s 41(2)(a) ... 274
- Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008 ... 643, 651
 - s 37 ... 505
- Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998) ... 19–25, 27, 148, 163, 164, 315, 335, 392–4, 548, 742
 - s 2 ... 20
 - s 3 ... 20
 - s 4 ... 20
 - Sch 1 ... 22
- Human Tissue Act 2004 ... 868
- Identity Cards Act 2006 ... 172
 - s 21(1) ... 172
 - s 21(5) ... 172
- Identity Documents Act 2010 ... 172
- Immigration Act 1971
 - s 25 ... 425
- Immigration Act 2014
 - Sch 9(2) ... 606
- Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 ... 643, 644, 645
 - s 1 ... 505, 641
- Infanticide Act 1922 ... 631
- Infanticide Act 1938
 - s 1 ... 632
 - s 1(1) ... 631, 632
 - s 1(2) ... 632
- Insolvency Act 1986 ... 17
 - s 235 ... 46
- International Criminal Court Act 2001 (ICC Act) ... 19
 - s 66(3)(a) ... 99
- Interpretation Act 1889 ... 258
 - s 2 ... 259
 - s 19 ... 259
- Interpretation Act 1978 ... 258, 259, 431
 - s 5 ... 258, 259
 - Sch 1 ... 258, 259
 - Sch 2 ... 259
- Judicature Act 1873
 - s 47 ... 14
- Judicature Act 1925
 - s 31(1)(a) ... 14
- Larceny Act 1827
 - s 39 ... 34
- Larceny Act 1861
 - s 102 ... 243
- Larceny Act 1916 ... 830, 874, 875, 899, 1013
 - s 28 ... 1027
 - ss 29–31 ... 999
 - s 32 ... 33, 941
 - s 33(1) ... 1039
- Law Reform (Year and a Day Rule) Act 1996 ... 508
- Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 ... 755
 - s 142(2) ... 755
 - s 148 ... 384
- Licensing Acts ... 270
- Licensing Act 1872
 - s 12 ... 43
 - s 13 ... 145, 270
 - s 16(1) ... 158
 - s 16(2) ... 158
- Licensing Act 1921
 - s 4 ... 275
- Licensing Act 2003
 - s 143(4) ... 705
 - s 180 ... 711
 - s 180(1) ... 710
- Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000 ... 604
- Limited Partnerships Act 1907 ... 604
- London Hackney Carriage Act 1831
 - s 41 ... 1071
- Lord Ellenborough's Act 1803 ... 514, 515, 645
- Magistrates' Courts Act 1980
 - s 17 ... 618
 - s 22 ... 431
 - s 22A ... 828
 - s 24 ... 787
 - s 33 ... 1108

- s 44 ... 177
 - s 101 ... 24
 - Sch 1 ... 618
 - Sch 2 ... 431
- Malicious Communications Act 1988
 - s 1 ... 1006
- Malicious Damage Act 1861 ... 105, 1069, 1076, 1099
 - s 3 ... 1075
 - s 35 ... 1100
 - s 36 ... 1100
 - s 58 ... 1100
 - s 59 ... 1075
 - s 72 ... 1100
- Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013
 - s 11 ... 893
 - Sch 3 ... 813, 893
- Matrimonial Causes Act 1973
 - s 11 ... 440
- Medicines Act 1968
 - s 58(2) ... 143
 - s 58(2)(b) ... 575
 - s 67 ... 575
- Mental Capacity Act 2005 ... 368, 369, 623, 624, 651, 669, 680, 729
 - s 1 ... 669
 - s 2 ... 713
 - s 3 ... 713
 - s 4 ... 511
 - s 4(5) ... 511
 - ss 24–26 ... 58
 - s 24 ... 623
 - s 24(1) ... 623
 - s 25 ... 79
 - s 25(5) ... 623
 - s 25(6) ... 623
 - s 26 ... 60
 - s 44 ... 112, 712, 713
 - s 62 ... 621
 - Code ... 621
 - Sch A1 ... 368
- Mental Health Act 1983 ... 281, 619
 - s 37 ... 288, 289
 - s 48 ... 281
 - s 127(1) ... 46
- Mental Health Act 2007 ... 281, 297, 816
 - s 4 ... 720
 - s 5 ... 720
 - s 50 ... 368
 - Sch 1 ... 288
- Merchandise Marks Act 1887
 - s 2(2) ... 272
- Merchant Shipping Act 1995 ... 856
 - s 1 ... 504
 - ss 281–282 ... 504
- Metropolitan Police Act 1839
 - s 44 ... 269, 270
- Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 ... 163, 164, 165, 171, 366, 452, 652, 653, 971
 - s 4(1)(b) ... 978
 - s 4(2)(b) ... 451, 452
 - s 4(3)(a) ... 978
 - s 4(3)(b) ... 176
 - s 5(4) ... 254
 - s 9A ... 977
- s 18(3) ... 109
 - s 19 ... 480
 - s 28 ... 163
- Mobile Telephones (Re-programming) Act 2002 ... 852
 - s 2(3)(b) ... 895, 978
- Modern Slavery Act 2015 ... 817
 - s 1 ... 658
 - s 45 ... 347, 348
 - s 45(4)(b) ... 347
 - Sch 4 ... 348
- Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965 ... 515
- National Health Service (Family Planning) Amendment Act 1972 ... 681
- National Lottery Act 1993
 - s 13(1)(c) ... 273
- Obscene Publications Act 1959 ... 1117
- Obscene Publications Act 1964 ... 472
- Occupier's Liability Act 1957 ... 605
- Occupier's Liability Act 1984 ... 605, 1085
- Offences Against the Person Act 1837 ... 645
- Offences Against the Person Act 1861 (OAPA 1861) ... 347, 413, 615, 639, 647, 657, 703, 711, 762
 - s 4 ... 615, 617
 - s 8 ... 185, 186, 187
 - s 9 ... 504
 - s 14 ... 703
 - s 16 ... 504, 617, 1006
 - s 18 ... 49, 50, 121, 319, 322, 323, 364, 483, 654, 673, 694–7, 795, 1018, 1019
 - s 20 ... 50, 105, 107, 316, 322, 323, 406, 413, 673, 677, 688–94, 695, 696, 697, 699, 715
 - s 23 ... 102, 507, 571, 576, 582, 713–16, 818, 1018, 1019, 1091
 - s 24 ... 219, 713, 714, 715, 716–17, 818
 - s 25 ... 716
 - s 30 ... 120
 - s 31 ... 601
 - s 34 ... 571
 - s 36 ... 3, 703, 708
 - s 37 ... 703
 - s 38 ... 703, 708, 818
 - s 42 ... 657
 - s 43 ... 657
 - s 44 ... 12
 - s 45 ... 12
 - s 47 ... 50, 120, 121, 657, 660, 665, 684, 686, 687, 688, 693–4, 696, 697, 699
 - s 56 ... 442
 - s 58 ... 230, 505, 641, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648
 - s 59 ... 647, 648
 - s 60 ... 655
 - s 64 ... 753
- Offender Management Act 2007 ... 155, 612
- Offensive Weapons Act 1996 ... 755
- Official Secrets Act 1911 ... 1030
 - s 1(1) ... 1030
 - s 3 ... 1030
- Official Secrets Act 1989 ... 148
- Opticians Act 1989 ... 592
- Outer Space Act 1986
 - s 12(3) ... 256

- Partnership Act 1890 ... 261
 s 10 ... 260
- Perjury Act 1911
 s 1(1) ... 35
 s 4(1) ... 656
 s 5 ... 993
- Poaching Prevention Act 1862 ... 850
- Police Act 1964
 s 51 ... 703
- Police Act 1996
 s 89 ... 112, 703, 704, 707, 711
 s 89(2) ... 402, 403, 704, 707, 711
- Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) ... 970
 s 2 ... 706
 s 17(5) ... 370
 s 24 ... 723
 s 24(1) ... 427
 s 24A ... 279, 396, 723
 s 24A(1)(a) ... 396
 s 24A(1)(b) ... 396
 s 24A(2)(b) ... 396
 s 24A(3) ... 279, 396
 s 74 ... 219, 237, 915, 1036
 s 74(3) ... 509
 s 80(2A)(b) ... 1096
 Code of Practice A ... 707
 Code of Practice C ... 47, 707
- Police and Justice Act 2006 ... 1072, 1102, 1111, 1112
 s 35 ... 1104
 s 36 ... 1109
 s 37 ... 1114
 Sch 14 ... 1072
- Policing and Crime Act 2009 ... 757
 s 14 ... 150, 756
 s 16 ... 756
 s 19 ... 756
- Policing and Crime Act 2017
 Pt 6 ... 747
 s 125 ... 1022
 s 175 ... 743
 s 175(1)(b) ... 747
- Postal Services Act 2000
 s 85(1) ... 1100
- Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 (PCC(S)A 2000)
 s 111 ... 1007
 s 111(5) ... 1020
 s 165(1) ... 787
 Sch 9 ... 787
- Prevention of Crime Act 1953 ... 240, 747–55, 1023, 1024, 1027
 s 1 ... 747
 s 1(4) ... 748, 753, 1022
- Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005
 s 1(2) ... 719
- Prison Act 1952
 s 8 ... 705
 s 8A ... 705
 s 40C(1) ... 155
- Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA 2002) ... 88, 117, 199, 411, 444, 971, 1056, 1057–67
 Pt 5 ... 1059
 Pt 7 ... 1057, 1067
 ss 327–329 ... 1057, 1060, 1066–7
 s 327 ... 415, 416, 993, 995, 1057, 1058, 1061, 1062–3, 1066
 s 327(1)(c) ... 1067
 s 327(3) ... 1062
 s 328 ... 1057, 1062, 1063–5, 1066
 s 328(1) ... 1064, 1065
 s 329 ... 1034, 1057, 1065–6, 1067
 s 329(1) ... 1065
 s 329(1)(b) ... 1065
 s 329(1)(c) ... 1065
 s 329(2)(c) ... 1066
 s 329(3) ... 1066
 ss 330–333 ... 141
 s 330 ... 46, 119, 1058
 s 331 ... 119
 s 337 ... 119
 s 338 ... 1066
 s 340 ... 995, 1057, 1058, 1059, 1061, 1062, 1066
 s 340(3) ... 1057, 1058
 s 340(4) ... 1058
 s 340(6) ... 995, 1057, 1058
 s 340(7) ... 1057
 s 340(8) ... 1057
 s 340(9) ... 1057
 s 340(10) ... 1066
 s 340(11) ... 1057
 Sch 9 ... 1056
- Prosecution of Offences Act 1985
 s 1(7) ... 894
 s 6(2) ... 6
 s 10(1) ... 437
 s 23 ... 6
 s 24 ... 6
- Protection From Eviction Act 1977 ... 48
 ss 1(3)–(3A) ... 745
- Protection From Harassment Act 1997 ... 137, 661, 734, 818
 s 1 ... 735, 740
 s 1(1) ... 737
 s 1(1)(b) ... 136
 s 1(1A) ... 738, 740
 s 1(1A)(c) ... 738
 s 1(2) ... 136, 304, 739, 740
 s 1(3) ... 735
 s 1(3)(a) ... 90, 740, 741
 s 1(3)(b) ... 741
 s 1(3)(c) ... 740, 742
 s 1A ... 735
 s 2 ... 739, 742, 743, 745
 s 2(1) ... 304
 s 2A(1) ... 745
 s 2A(2) ... 745
 s 2A(3) ... 745
 s 2A(4) ... 745
 s 3 ... 743
 s 4 ... 738, 743–4, 745, 746
 s 4(1) ... 744
 s 4(2) ... 744
 s 4A ... 746
 s 4A(1)(b)(i) ... 744, 745, 746
 s 4A(1)(b)(ii) ... 745, 746
 s 4A(3) ... 746, 747
 s 4A(5)(a) ... 746
 s 7 ... 735
 s 7(2) ... 734, 742
 s 7(3A) ... 737

- s 7(4) ... 736
- s 7(5) ... 738
- s 12 ... 740
- Protection of Badgers Act 1992 ... 1073
 - s 3 ... 109
- Protection of Children Act 1978 ... 1117
 - s 1 ... 144, 481, 757, 804
- Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 ... 718
 - s 54 ... 1071
 - s 111 ... 745
 - s 112 ... 745
- Protection of Wrecks Act 1973 ... 856
- Public Health Act 1875
 - s 4 ... 1015
- Public Order Act 1936
 - s 5 ... 753
- Public Order Act 1986 ... 128, 742, 748, 1020, 1118
 - s 1 ... 1118
 - s 2 ... 1118
 - s 3 ... 1118
 - s 4 ... 710, 1118
 - s 4A ... 1118
 - s 5 ... 820, 1118
 - s 6(5) ... 315
 - s 8 ... 744, 745, 1020, 1021
 - s 38 ... 717, 1006
- Railway Regulation Act 1840
 - s 16 ... 1030
- Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act (RIPA) 2000 ... 1107
 - s 1(6) ... 973
 - s 48 ... 1025
- Regulation of the Railways Act 1868
 - s 23 ... 1030
- Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008 ... 147
- Revenue Act 1869
 - s 27 ... 273
- Rivers (Prevention of Pollution) Act 1951
 - s 2(1)(a) ... 165
- Road Safety Act 2006 ... 517, 1119
 - s 20(1) ... 140
- Road Traffic Act 1930
 - s 11 ... 574
 - s 28 ... 903
- Road Traffic Act 1956
 - s 9(1) ... 43
- Road Traffic Act 1960
 - s 217 ... 910
- Road Traffic Act 1972
 - s 6(1) ... 190
- Road Traffic Act 1988 ... 219
 - s 1 ... 1119
 - s 2 ... 1119
 - s 2A ... 140
 - s 2A(1) ... 594
 - s 2A(3) ... 135
 - s 2B ... 140
 - s 3 ... 138, 1119
 - s 3ZB ... 66, 146, 917
 - s 4(2) ... 42
 - s 4(3) ... 43
 - s 5 ... 190
 - s 5(1) ... 218
 - s 5(1)(a) ... 31
- s 5(2) ... 25
- s 6 ... 46
- s 7 ... 711
- s 7(6) ... 31
- s 22A(1) ... 575
- s 35 ... 705
- s 170(4) ... 46, 325
- s 192 ... 753
- Road Traffic Act 1991 ... 140
 - s 2 ... 574
- Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988
 - s 34(5) ... 178
 - s 64(5) ... 268
 - s 91 ... 574, 575
- Roads Act 1920 ... 224
- Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Act 2006
 - s 18(1) ... 990
- Sale of Goods Act 1979
 - s 5 ... 841
- School Standards and Framework Act 1998 ... 685
- Serious Crime Act (SCA) 2007 ... 175, 219, 234, 410, 432, 450, 461, 474–94, 495, 499, 621, 818, 1104
 - Pt 1 ... 14
 - Pt 2 ... 188, 232, 411, 432, 433, 474, 475, 480, 481, 485, 493, 615, 620, 652
 - ss 44–46 ... 179, 183, 185, 189, 199, 218, 223, 225, 227, 228, 231, 233, 450, 453, 485, 486, 492, 493, 495
 - s 44 ... 188, 219, 232, 432, 475, 476, 477, 478–87, 488, 489, 490, 493, 494
 - s 44(2) ... 482, 486
 - s 45 ... 179, 188, 198, 232, 411, 475, 477, 478, 482, 486, 487–9, 492, 493
 - s 45(b)(i) ... 488
 - s 45(b)(ii) ... 488
 - s 46 ... 188, 208, 209, 233, 475, 478, 482, 486, 489–93
 - s 46(1)(b)(i) ... 490
 - s 46(b)(i) ... 491
 - s 46(b)(ii) ... 491
 - s 46(3) ... 490
 - s 47 ... 479, 486
 - s 47(2)–(4) ... 478
 - s 47(2) ... 478
 - s 47(3) ... 478
 - s 47(3)(a) ... 488
 - s 47(3)(b) ... 488
 - s 47(4) ... 478, 491, 492
 - s 47(5) ... 478, 482, 488, 491, 492
 - s 47(5)(a) ... 482
 - s 47(5)(a)(iii) ... 482, 488, 492
 - s 47(5)(b) ... 488
 - s 47(5)(b)(i) ... 483
 - s 47(6) ... 482
 - s 47(7) ... 478
 - s 47(7)(a) ... 482
 - s 47(7)(b) ... 482
 - s 47(8) ... 478, 486
 - s 47(8)(c) ... 486
 - s 48(2) ... 492
 - s 49 ... 478
 - s 49(1) ... 476, 478, 483, 487, 488, 492
 - s 49(2) ... 478, 481
 - s 49(4) ... 489, 493
 - s 49(7) ... 488, 491

- s 50 ... 27, 231, 232, 454, 483, 484, 492
- s 51 ... 441, 488, 492
- s 51A ... 478
- s 52(1) ... 493
- s 53 ... 494
- s 54(2) ... 493
- s 54(2)(b) ... 493
- s 55 ... 493
- s 55(1) ... 478, 487
- s 55(5) ... 489
- s 56 ... 485
- s 56(2) ... 485
- s 57(4) ... 493
- s 57(9) ... 493
- s 58(1) ... 478, 487
- s 58(2) ... 478, 487
- s 58(5) ... 490
- s 59 ... 475
- s 61 ... 1103
- s 61(3)(a)(i) ... 1109
- s 65 ... 479, 481, 490
- s 65(1) ... 480, 487, 490
- s 65(2)(a) ... 481
- s 65(2)(b) ... 479, 481
- s 65(3) ... 244, 479, 487, 490
- s 66 ... 479, 487, 490, 493
- s 67 ... 479, 487, 490, 806
- ss 70–75 ... 175
- s 72 ... 46
- Sch 3 ... 475, 486, 489, 492, 493
- Sch 4 ... 493, 494
- Sch 6 (Part 2) ... 486
- Serious Crime Act 2015 ... 88
 - ss 41–44 ... 1103
 - s 41 ... 1112
 - s 41(2) ... 1113
 - s 42 ... 1115
 - s 66 ... 112
 - s 67 ... 797, 803, 812
 - s 68 ... 817
 - ss 70–75 ... 680
 - s 72 ... 680
 - s 79 ... 155
 - s 84 ... 649
- Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCPA) ... 22, 235, 396, 920
 - s 102 ... 1066
 - s 125 ... 735
 - s 126 ... 745
 - s 145 ... 738
 - Sch 7 ... 241
 - Sch 17 ... 919
- Sexual Offences Act 1956 ... 152, 677, 756, 758, 760, 772, 774, 785, 787, 806, 816
 - s 1 ... 786
 - s 1(1) ... 787
 - s 1(2) ... 787
 - s 2 ... 773, 998
 - s 3 ... 769, 778, 783, 786
 - s 4 ... 818
 - s 7 ... 137
 - s 11 ... 230
 - s 13 ... 424
 - s 14 ... 151
 - s 14(2) ... 151
 - s 14(3) ... 151
 - s 14(4) ... 151
 - s 44 ... 789
- Sexual Offences Act 1967 ... 10
- Sexual Offences Act 1985 ... 756
- Sexual Offences Act 1993 ... 230, 788
 - s 1 ... 788
- Sexual Offences Act 2003 ... 88, 137, 141, 152, 230, 333, 334, 477, 658, 669, 756, 758, 787, 998, 1017
 - Pt 1 ... 759, 1025, 1026
 - Pt 2 ... 822
 - ss 1–4 ... 791, 798, 816, 824
 - s 1 ... 795
 - s 1(1) ... 790
 - s 1(2) ... 792
 - s 1(4) ... 787
 - s 2 ... 789, 794–5, 796, 797, 802
 - s 2(1) ... 768
 - s 3 ... 320, 482, 488, 658, 796–7, 802, 806, 816
 - s 3(1)(a) ... 320, 796
 - s 4 ... 778, 784, 786, 797–8
 - s 4(1) ... 779
 - s 4(4) ... 797, 803
 - ss 5–7 ... 804, 806
 - ss 5–8 ... 798–804, 824
 - s 5 ... 144, 150, 166, 234, 798, 799, 800, 801–2
 - s 6 ... 798, 800, 802
 - s 7 ... 419, 785, 786, 798, 801, 802
 - s 8 ... 411, 798, 803–4, 805, 806
 - ss 9–10 ... 800
 - ss 9–13 ... 809, 810
 - ss 9–15 ... 442
 - s 9 ... 138, 229, 799, 800, 801, 805, 806, 813, 823
 - ss 10–19 ... 824
 - s 10 ... 806–7
 - s 10(2) ... 806
 - s 11 ... 807–8
 - s 12 ... 320, 426, 808–9, 813
 - s 12(1)(b) ... 809
 - s 13 ... 799, 800, 805, 806, 807
 - s 14 ... 426, 796, 808, 809–10
 - s 14(3)(b) ... 810
 - s 14(3)(d) ... 810
 - s 15 ... 796, 806, 811–12
 - s 15A ... 411, 812
 - s 16 ... 813
 - s 17 ... 813
 - s 18 ... 813
 - s 21 ... 813
 - s 22 ... 813
 - s 25 ... 813, 823, 824
 - s 26 ... 813, 824
 - s 27 ... 814, 823
 - s 28 ... 814
 - s 29 ... 814
 - ss 30–33 ... 815
 - ss 30–41 ... 824
 - ss 30–44 ... 672, 774
 - s 30 ... 669, 763, 815, 816
 - s 30(2) ... 763, 816
 - s 30(2)(a) ... 763
 - s 30(2)(b) ... 816
 - ss 34–37 ... 773, 815
 - ss 38–41 ... 815
 - s 45 ... 481
 - s 47 ... 817
 - s 48 ... 817

- s 49 ... 817
 - s 50 ... 817
 - s 51A ... 756
 - ss 52–55 ... 230
 - s 52 ... 817
 - s 53 ... 817
 - s 53A ... 150
 - s 61 ... 717, 764, 774, 817, 818
 - s 62 ... 424, 818, 823
 - s 63 ... 427, 819, 1007, 1025, 1026
 - s 64 ... 814, 815
 - s 65 ... 814, 815
 - s 66 ... 819
 - s 67 ... 819, 823
 - s 67(1) ... 287, 820
 - s 67(1)(b) ... 819
 - s 67(3) ... 820
 - s 67(4) ... 820
 - s 68 ... 820, 823
 - s 69 ... 821
 - s 70 ... 822
 - s 71 ... 822
 - s 72 ... 798, 824, 1026
 - s 73 ... 95, 802, 804, 806
 - s 74 ... 674, 758, 759–64, 765, 767, 768, 769, 772, 773, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 814, 815
 - s 75 ... 417, 758, 759, 764, 769–75, 795, 796, 797
 - s 75(1)(b) ... 770
 - s 75(1)(c) ... 770
 - s 75(2) ... 770, 772
 - s 75(2)(a) ... 760, 772
 - s 75(2)(b) ... 773
 - s 75(2)(c) ... 773
 - s 75(2)(d) ... 773, 774
 - s 75(2)(f) ... 764, 775, 818
 - s 76 ... 417, 674, 758, 759, 767, 768, 769, 775–82, 795, 796, 797
 - s 76(2) ... 775
 - s 76(2)(a) ... 778, 779, 780
 - s 76(2)(b) ... 782
 - s 77 ... 417, 769, 775, 780
 - s 78 ... 782–5, 807, 808
 - s 78(a) ... 783, 784
 - s 78(b) ... 783, 784
 - s 79 ... 191, 668, 789, 795
 - s 79(2) ... 788
 - s 79(3) ... 785, 788, 789
 - s 79(4) ... 807, 808
 - s 79(5) ... 807
 - s 79(8) ... 785–6
 - s 79(9) ... 789, 821
 - s 79(10) ... 821
 - Sch 7 ... 1007
- Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 ... 787, 790
 - s 1(2) ... 317
- Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000 ... 813
- Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996 ... 338
- Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009
 - s 3(2)(d) ... 786
- Smuggling Acts ... 748
- Social Security Administration Act 1992
 - s 111A ... 945, 982
 - s 111A(1B) ... 46, 156, 982
 - s 112 ... 135
- Social Security Fraud Act 2001
 - s 16 ... 982
- Statutory Instruments Act 1946
 - s 3 ... 129
 - s 3(2) ... 338
- Street Offences Act 1959
 - s 1 ... 756
- Suicide Act 1961 ... 4, 259, 619–29, 630
 - s 2 ... 619, 621, 622, 626, 627
 - s 2(1) ... 478, 620, 623, 627
 - s 2(1A) ... 620
 - s 2(2) ... 630
 - s 2(4) ... 623, 624
 - s 2A ... 621
 - s 2B ... 621
- Suppression of Terrorism Act 1978
 - s 4 ... 504
- Tattooing of Minors Act 1969 ... 669
- Taxation (International and Other Provisions) Act 2010 ... 995
 - Sch 10(2) ... 995
- Taxes Management Act 1970 ... 979, 993
 - s 106A ... 995
- Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act 1878
 - s 2 ... 504
- Terrorism Act 2000 (TA 2000) ... 88
 - s 11 ... 24
 - ss 15–18 ... 141
 - s 17 ... 119
 - s 18(1) ... 117–18, 990
 - s 18(2) ... 118
 - s 19 ... 46
 - s 38B ... 46, 237, 238
 - s 38B(1)(B) ... 235
 - s 38B(2) ... 235
 - s 44 ... 718
 - s 57 ... 411, 970
 - s 59 ... 411
 - s 121 ... 1020
- Terrorism Act 2006 ... 88
- Theatres Act 1843
 - s 15 ... 273
- Theatres Act 1968 ... 273
- Theft Act 1968 ... 433, 463, 826, 840, 867, 875, 895–902, 903, 926, 927, 944, 990, 1007, 1023, 1042, 1065, 1069
 - s 1 ... 130, 887, 986, 1018, 1026, 1034
 - s 1(1) ... 827, 850, 887, 890
 - s 1(2) ... 871
 - s 2 ... 851, 870, 872, 873, 876, 880, 884, 885, 931, 932, 986, 1051
 - s 2(1)(a) ... 858, 873, 874
 - s 2(1)(b) ... 685, 874, 1080
 - s 2(1)(c) ... 856, 873, 874
 - s 2(2) ... 874
 - s 3 ... 828, 839
 - s 3(1) ... 829, 842, 874
 - s 3(2) ... 842–3, 877, 1045, 1045, 1048, 1055
 - s 4 ... 843, 933
 - s 4(1) ... 844, 847, 852, 933, 1033
 - s 4(2) ... 847, 1032
 - s 4(2)(a) ... 1033
 - s 4(2)(b) ... 848, 1032
 - s 4(2)(c) ... 848, 1032

- s 4(3) ... 849
- s 4(4) ... 849
- s 5 ... 826, 854, 858, 867, 869, 1074, 1075
- s 5(1) ... 853, 854, 858, 859, 861, 864, 865
- s 5(2) ... 858
- s 5(3) ... 859, 860–3
- s 5(4) ... 842, 860, 863, 864–5, 866, 1054, 1075
- s 6 ... 886–7, 891, 896, 907
- s 6(1) ... 886, 888, 890, 891
- s 6(2) ... 887, 889, 890
- s 7 ... 828
- s 8 ... 895, 899, 1006, 1045
- s 9 ... 819, 1007, 1026
- s 9(1) ... 1019
- s 9(1)(a) ... 1008, 1010, 1018, 1019, 1023, 1025, 1026
- s 9(1)(b) ... 1008, 1018, 1019, 1023, 1025
- s 9(2) ... 1019
- s 9(3) ... 1007, 1016
- s 9(3)(a) ... 1021
- s 9(4) ... 1007
- s 10 ... 1022, 1023
- s 10(1)(b) ... 748, 1028
- s 11 ... 210, 847, 888, 903–4, 905
- s 11(2) ... 905
- s 12 ... 210, 851, 896, 903, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 913, 915, 917, 918, 1026
- s 12(1) ... 185, 908, 909, 915, 916, 1026
- s 12(4A) ... 908
- s 12(5) ... 915
- s 12(6) ... 685, 913
- s 12(7) ... 910, 912
- s 12A ... 166, 916, 917, 918
- s 12A(1) ... 917
- s 12A(2) ... 917
- s 12A(2)(b) ... 917
- s 12A(3) ... 917
- s 12A(8) ... 917
- s 13 ... 850, 851, 1106
- s 15 ... 829, 830, 835–6, 926, 937, 1026
- s 15(4) ... 954
- s 15A ... 864, 926
- s 16 ... 926
- s 17 ... 933, 980, 981, 982, 983, 985, 986
- s 17(1)(a) ... 48, 981–5, 983, 985, 989
- s 17(1)(b) ... 983, 986, 989
- s 17(2) ... 984, 986
- s 18 ... 257, 990
- s 18(2) ... 990
- s 19 ... 991, 992
- s 20 ... 846, 992
- s 20(2) ... 926, 992
- s 20(3) ... 992
- s 21 ... 101, 900, 996, 997, 1000, 1001, 1004, 1034
- s 21(1) ... 618, 1004, 1005
- s 21(2) ... 998, 1000, 1003, 1006
- s 22 ... 1031, 1032, 1033, 1034, 1039, 1040, 1042, 1045, 1048, 1050, 1054, 1067
- s 22(1) ... 914
- s 23 ... 243, 1055
- s 24 ... 1051
- s 24(1) ... 1034
- s 24(2) ... 1038, 1039, 1054
- s 24(2)(a) ... 1033, 1039
- s 24(3) ... 833, 1036, 1037, 1038, 1055
- s 24(4) ... 243, 1033, 1055
- s 24(5) ... 1034
- s 24A ... 1033, 1034, 1053, 1054, 1055
- s 24A(1) ... 1054
- s 24A(1)(c) ... 1054, 1055
- s 24A(2A) ... 1054
- s 24A(5) ... 1055
- s 24A(8) ... 1034, 1054
- s 25 ... 43, 969, 970, 1026, 1027
- s 25(1) ... 975, 1026
- s 25(2) ... 1026
- s 25(3) ... 1029
- s 25(5) ... 1026
- s 27(3) ... 1052
- s 30 ... 893
- s 30(2) ... 893
- s 30(4) ... 893
- s 32(1) ... 993
- s 34 ... 922, 998
- s 34(2)(a) ... 933, 987, 988, 1004, 1005
- s 34(2)(b) ... 1032, 1033
- Sch 2 ... 852
- Theft Act 1978 ... 826, 853
 - s 1 ... 922, 926, 966, 967, 969
 - s 2 ... 451, 920
 - s 2(1) ... 48
 - s 2(1)(a) ... 926
 - s 2(1)(b) ... 923, 926
 - s 2(1)(c) ... 926
 - s 3 ... 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924
 - s 3(1) ... 940
 - s 3(2) ... 924
 - s 3(4) ... 919, 920
 - s 4 ... 919
 - s 5(2) ... 922
- Theft (Amendment) Act 1996 ... 826
- Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977
 - s 3 ... 1037
- Trade Descriptions Act 1968 ... 272
 - s 14(1)(a) ... 56
 - s 14(1)(b) ... 56
 - s 20 ... 257
 - s 24 ... 171
- Trade Marks Act 1994 ... 933, 1044
- Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992
 - s 1 ... 604
 - s 122 ... 604
 - s 242 ... 450
- Transport Act 1982 ... 259
- Treasure Act 1996 ... 856
- Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 ... 304
 - s 2 ... 286
 - s 2(1) ... 386
- Unsolicited Goods and Services Act 1971
 - s 2(2) ... 1006
- Vagrancy Act 1824
 - s 4 ... 1030
- Value Added Taxes Act ... 979, 993
- Vehicles (Crime) Act 2001
 - s 37(1) ... 908
- Vessels Protection Act 1967
 - s 1 ... 903
- Video Recordings Act 1984
 - s 1(4) ... 978

Video Recordings Act 2010 ... 978
 Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006 ... 747, 757
 s 42 ... 754, 755
 s 55 ... 756
 s 62 ... 852, 895

War Crimes Act 1991 ... 504

Water Resources Act 1991 ... 269

Wild Mammals (Protection) Act 1996
 s 2 ... 1080

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 ... 849, 1073
 s 1 ... 849
 s 1(1)(a) ... 165
 s 9 ... 849
 Sch 5 ... 849

Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949
 s 1(1) ... 480

Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act
 1999 ... 816

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Aliens Order 1920 ... 43
 Asbestos Regulations 1969 ... 165
 Conditional Access (Unauthorised Decoders) Regs
 2000, SI 2000/1175 ... 852
 Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading
 Regulations 2008, SI 2008/1277 ... 254
 Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (Commencement
 No 4, Transitional and Saving Provisions) Order
 2010, SI 2010/816 ... 524, 550
 Criminal Attempts and Conspiracy (Northern Ireland) Order 1983
 Art 9(1) ... 453
 Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Offensive Weapons)
 Order 1988, SI 1988/2019 ... 748
 Criminal Procedure Rules 2005
 r 7.2 ... 1095
 Criminal Procedure Rules 2013
 r 14(2) ... 618
 Criminal Procedure Rules 2015 ... 1095
 r 10.2 ... 935, 1040
 Financial Services Act 2012, SI 2016/1680 ... 992
 Fraud Act 2006 (Commencement) Order 2006, SI
 2006/3200 ... 929
 Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Parental Orders) Regulations 2010, SI 2010/985 ... 814
 Human Medicines Regulations 2012 (SI 2012/1916)
 reg 214 ... 143
 reg 255 ... 143
 Money Laundering, Terrorist Financing and Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer)
 Regulations 2017, SI 2017/692 ... 1056
 Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use)
 Regulations 1955 ... 198, 273–4
 Pedal Cycles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1983
 reg 6 ... 574
 reg 7 ... 574
 Penalties for Disorderly Behaviour (Amount of Penalty) Order 2002, SI 2002/1837 ... 828, 1069 Pollution Prevention and Control (England and Wales) Regulations 2000 (SI 2000/1973)
 reg 32(1)(g) ... 253
 Regulatory Reform (Game) Order 2007, SI
 2007/2007

 Art 2(h) ... 849
 Serious Crime Act 2015, SI 2015/820 ... 1113
 Sight Test (Examination and Prescription) (No 2)
 Regulations 1989 ... 592
 Uranium Enrichment Technology (Prohibition on Disclosure) Regulations 2004
 (SI 2004/1818) ... 102
 Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 (England and Wales) (Amendment) Regulations 2016/127
 reg 2(2) ... 849
 Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949, SI 1989/123 ... 480
 Zebra, Pelican and Puffin Pedestrian Crossings
 Regulations and General Directions 1997,
 SI 1997/2400
 reg 25 ... 42

EUROPE

Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union
 Art 49(3) ... 148
 Directive 2000/31/EC, E-Commerce ... 621
 Directive 2013/40/EU Attacks against information systems ... 1113, 1115
 European Convention on Human Rights
 (ECHR) ... 6, 19–25, 43, 293, 484, 622, 799, 825
 Art 2 ... 12, 21, 22, 23, 58, 59, 60, 61, 335, 362,
 383, 392, 393, 394, 397, 405, 504, 505, 506,
 508, 610, 622, 628, 643, 650, 655
 Art 3 ... 11, 23, 58, 60, 61, 148, 164, 367, 383, 394,
 516, 622, 658, 680, 684
 Art 4 ... 23, 658
 Art 5 ... 23, 306, 394, 516, 658, 668, 718, 720, 931
 Art 5(1) ... 281, 368
 Art 5(1)(e) ... 297
 Art 5(4) ... 368
 Art 6 ... 23, 144, 149, 152, 178, 281, 284,
 635, 802
 Art 6(1) ... 802
 Art 6(2) ... 23–5, 27, 148, 149, 167, 315, 346, 548,
 630, 742, 791, 802, 1029, 1052
 Art 7 ... 10, 21, 22, 148, 149, 338, 339, 424, 461,
 470, 471, 473, 489, 513, 594, 595, 596, 827, 881,
 931, 966, 995
 Art 8 ... 23, 60, 61, 144, 148, 152, 353, 366, 367,
 441, 512, 623, 626, 628, 658, 669, 681, 683, 718,
 733, 763, 799, 815
 Art 8(1) ... 623
 Art 8(2) ... 622, 623, 626, 799, 815
 Art 9 ... 23, 622, 683, 684, 700, 755
 Art 10 ... 23, 148, 149, 473, 740, 742, 1000, 1088, 1118
 Art 10(2) ... 740, 1088
 Art 11 ... 23, 195, 1118
 Art 14 ... 23, 441, 681
 Protocol 1 (Art 1) ... 833
 Protocol 7 (Art 4) ... 509
 Council of Europe Convention on Cybercrime,
 CETS No 185 (2001) ... 1105
 Art 6(1)(a) ... 1114

AUSTRALIA

Crimes (Industrial Manslaughter) Amendment Act 2003 (ACT)
 s 51 ... 263
 Criminal Code (ACT)

s 51 ... 263
 Criminal Code Act (NT)
 s 155 ... 61

CANADA

Criminal Code 1985
 s 150.1 ... 805
 Charter of Rights and Freedoms ... 363

FRANCE

Code Pénale
 Art 223-6 (ex art 63) ... 61

HONG KONG

Building Ordinance ... 147

NEW ZEALAND

Crimes Act 1908 ... 602
 Crimes Act 1961 ... 602
 Misuse of Drugs Act 1975
 s 6(2A)(c) ... 458
 Securities Act 1988 ... 252

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Hawaii: Rev Sta Ann, s 663-1.6 ... 61
 Massachusetts: Gen Laws Ann Ch 268,
 s 40 ... 61
 Minnesota: Stat Ann, ss 604.01(a), 609.02 ... 61
 Model Penal Code (ALI) ... 4, 349, 377, 423, 522,
 895, 1013
 Rhode Island: Gen Laws RI, ss 11-37-3.1, 3.3;
 11-56-1 ... 61
 Wisconsin: Wis Stat Ann, s 940.34 ... 61

CONVENTIONS AND INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

Geneva Conventions 1949 ... 560
 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court ... 19
 United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities ... 285
 United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice
 (Beijing Rules)
 Art 4(1) ... 342

Table of cases

ENGLAND AND WALES

- A [1992] 3 Med LR 303 ... 508
 A [2001] Cr App R 418 ... 732
 A [2001] Fam 147, [2001] Crim LR 400 ... 58
 A [2005] All ER 38 (D) ... 680
 A (2005) 69 J Crim L 394 ... 573
 A [2006] EWCA Crim 2103 ... 804
 A [2014] EWCA Crim 299 ... 713, 763, 764, 816
 A (A Child), re [2015] EWHC 443 (Fam) ... 507
 A (A Juvenile) v R [1978] Crim LR 689 ... 1072
 A (B) [2012] EWCA Crim 1529, [2013] Crim LR 169 ... 1096
 A (Children: Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation), re [2000] 4 All ER 961, [2001] 2 WLR 480, [2001] Crim LR 400, [2001] Fam 147, CA ... 59, 60, 94, 375–6, 377, 378, 379, 403, 505
 A v DPP [2003] All ER (D) 393 (Jun) ... 1018
 A v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2004] UKHL 56 ... 20
 A (RJ) [2012] EWCA Crim 434, [2013] Crim LR 240 ... 347, 353
 A Hospital v W [2007] EWHC 425 (Fam) ... 59
 A Ltd [2016] EWCA Crim 1469 ... 248, 440
 Ab [2014] EWCA Crim 1642 ... 371
 AB [1941] 1 KB 454 ... 1035
 AB v South West Water Services Ltd [1993] QB 507 ... 14
 AB and CD [2017] EWCA Crim 129 ... 119
 Abbess [2004] EWCA Crim 1813 ... 775
 Abbott [1955] 2 QB 497 ... 196
 Abbott [1977] AC 755, [1976] 3 All ER 140 ... 362
 Abbott v R [1976] 3 All ER 152 ... 348
 ABCD [2010] EWCA Crim 1622 ... 213
 Abdul-Hussain [1999] Crim LR 570 ... 352, 355, 361, 378
 Abdullahi [2006] EWCA Crim 2060 ... 808
 Ablewhite [2007] EWCA Crim 832 ... 997
 Abramovitch (1914) 11 Cr App R 45, CCA ... 1029, 1052
 Abu Hamza [2006] EWCA Crim 2918, [2007] Crim LR 320 ... 615, 617
 Ackroyds Air Travel Ltd v DPP [1950] 1 All ER 933 ... 205
 Acott [1997] 1 WLR 306, [1997] 2 Cr App R 94 ... 524, 536
 Adamczewski v District Court in Jelenia Gora Poland [2014] EWHC 2958 (Admin) ... 845
 Adams [1957] Crim LR 365 ... 510
 Adams [1994] RTR 220, [1993] Crim LR 525 ... 951
 Adams [1995] 1 WLR 52, PC ... 962
 Adams v Camfoni [1929] 1 KB 95 ... 273
 Adams v R [1998] 1 WLR 52, PC ... 462
 Adebela [2014] EWCA Crim 2779 ... 508
 Adesanya (1974) The Times, 16 July ... 681
 Adinga [2003] EWCA Crim 3201 ... 1050
 Adomako [1995] 1 AC 171, [1994] Crim LR 757, HL ... 140, 583, 584–5, 588, 589, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596
 Ady (1835) 7 C & P 140 ... 926
 Afolabi [2009] EWCA Crim 2879 ... 118
 Afolabi [2017] EWHC 2960 ... 658
 Agera [2017] EWCA Crim 740 ... 218
 Agip (Africa) v Jackson [1990] Ch 265 ... 116
 Ahlers [1915] 1 KB 616 ... 95
 Ahluwalia [1992] 4 All ER 889, [1993] Crim LR 63 ... 528
 Ahmad (1986) 84 Cr App R 64, [1986] Crim LR 739 ... 48, 54
 Ahmed [2010] EWCA Crim 1949, [2011] Crim LR 158 ... 647, 648
 Ahmed [2016] EWCA Crim 104 ... 939
 Ahmed v CPS (2017) 4 May, unreported, QBD (Admin) ... 705
 Ahmed v Shafique [2009] EWHC 618, QB ... 721
 Ahmed Din (1962) 46 Cr App R 269 ... 548
 Aikens [2003] EWCA Crim 1573 ... 347, 357
 Airedale National Health Service Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821, [1993] Crim LR 877, HL ... 59, 60, 376, 510, 511
 Airtours v Shipley (1994) 58 JP 835 ... 254
 Aitken [1992] 1 WLR 1006 (C-MAC) ... 680
 AJ [2006] EWCA Crim 2956 ... 785
 AJA v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2013] EWCA Civ 1342 ... 769
 Akhurst v DPP [2009] EWHC 806 (Admin) ... 1030
 Akpom [2013] EWCA Crim 2662 ... 963
 Akthar [2006] EWCA Crim 469 ... 148
 Akhtar [2011] EWCA Crim 146 ... 1064
 Akhtar [2015] EWCA Crim 176 ... 748, 1099
 Albert v Lavin [1982] AC 546, [1981] 1 All ER 628, DC ... 336, 402, 668
 Alderson v Booth [1969] 2 QB 216, [1969] 2 All ER 271 ... 719
 Aldridge [2006] EWCA Crim 1970 ... 357
 Alexander [2008] EWCA Crim 2834 ... 1020
 Ali [1989] Crim LR 736 ... 353
 Ali (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 692, [1995] Crim LR 303 ... 344, 355
 Ali [2006] All ER (D) 207 (May) ... 945, 959
 Ali [2006] EWCA Crim 2906 ... 696
 Ali [2008] EWCA Crim 716 ... 358, 359, 360
 Ali [2009] EWCA Crim 1131 ... 842
 Ali [2011] EWCA Crim 1260, [2012] Crim LR 378 ... 443
 Ali [2012] EWCA Crim 934 ... 750
 Ali [2014] EWCA Crim 2169 ... 213
 Ali [2015] EWCA Crim 1279 ... 675, 761
 Ali [2016] EWCA Crim 375 ... 898
 Ali and Jordan [2001] 1 All ER 1014, CA ... 548
 Allamby [1974] 3 All ER 126, CA ... 750
 Allan [1965] 1 QB 130 ... 194
 Allchorn v Hopkins (1905) 69 JP 355 ... 270, 273
 Allen [1985] AC 1029, [1985] 2 All ER 641, [1985] Crim LR 739 ... 924
 Allen [1988] Crim LR 698 ... 314
 Allen [2005] EWCA Crim 1344 ... 91
 Allen v Whitehead [1930] 1 KB 211 ... 269, 270
 Allen (Henry) (1839) 9 C & P 31 ... 789
 Allied Domecq Leisure Ltd v Paul Graham Cooper [1999] Crim LR 230 ... 274

- Allsop (1976) 64 Cr App R 29, [1976] Crim LR 738, CA ... 464, 467
- Alphacell Ltd v Woodward [1972] AC 824 ... 151, 165, 266
- Alt [1972] Crim LR 552, CA ... 1048, 1049
- Altham [2006] EWCA Crim 07 ... 367
- Amand v Home Secretary and Minister of Defence of the Royal Netherlands Government [1943] AC 147 ... 14
- Ambler [1979] RTR 217, CA ... 913
- AMH v HXW [2010] EWHC 2457 (QB) ... 1000
- Amir [2010] EWCA Crim 2361 ... 1066
- Ananthanarayanan (1994) 98 Cr App R 1 ... 786
- Anderson (1868) LR 1 CCR 161 ... 504
- Anderson [1978] Crim LR 223 ... 1052
- Anderson [1986] AC 27, [1985] Crim LR 651, HL ... 179, 438, 453, 454, 455, 485, 496
- Anderson (1992) 13 Cr App R (S) 564 ... 995
- Anderson and Morris [1966] 2 QB 110 ... 186
- Anderton v Ryan [1985] AC 560 ... 497, 498, 500
- Andrew N [2004] EWCA Crim 1236, CA ... 344
- Andrews v DPP [1937] AC 576, [1937] 2 All ER 552 ... 568, 574, 575, 584, 595
- Andrews and Craig [1962] 3 All ER 961 ... 240
- Angela C [2006] EWCA Crim 1781 ... 805
- Ankerson [2015] EWCA Crim 432 ... 1097
- Anns v Merton Borough Council [1978] AC 728, HL ... 609
- Anon (1634) Kel 53 ... 182
- Anon (1701) 12 Mod Rep 560 ... 246
- Ansell v Swift [1987] Crim LR 194, Lewes CC ... 402
- Antar [2004] EWCA Crim 2708 ... 354
- Anthony [1965] 2 QB 189 ... 220
- Antoine [2001] 1 AC 340, HL, [2000] Crim LR 621 ... 286, 287, 288, 549
- Antonelli and Barberi (1905) 70 JP 4 ... 616
- Anwar [2013] EWCA Crim 1865 ... 1060
- Anwar [2016] EWCA Crim 551 ... 176, 201, 203, 204, 216
- Anwoir [2008] EWCA Crim 1354 ... 1059
- Appleyard (1985) 81 Cr App R 319, [1985] Crim LR 723, CA ... 1075, 1077
- Archbold [2007] EWCA Crim 2125 ... 303, 752
- Archer [2011] EWCA Crim 2252, [2012] Crim LR 292 ... 727
- Ardalan [1972] 2 All ER 257, [1972] Crim LR 370, CA ... 438
- Ardley (1871) LR 1 CCR 301 ... 950
- Armson [2005] EWCA Crim 2528 ... 1027
- Armstrong v Strain [1952] 1 KB 232, [1952] 1 All ER 139 ... 254
- Arnaot [2008] EWCA Crim 121 ... 366
- Arnold [1997] 4 All ER 1, [1997] Crim LR 833 ... 846, 862
- Arobieke [1988] Crim LR 314 ... 572
- Arthur (1981) 12 BMLR 1 ... 58
- Asare [2008] EWCA Crim 2516 ... 997
- Asbury [1986] Crim LR 258, CA ... 383
- Ashcroft [2003] EWAC Crim 2365 ... 836
- Ashford and Smith [1988] Crim LR 682, CA ... 1082
- Ashiq [2015] EWCA Crim 1617 ... 1003
- Ashley and others v Chief Constable of Sussex Police [2008] UKHL 25; [2006] EWCA Civ 1085; [2005] EWHC 415, QB ... 393
- Ashman (1858) 1 F & F 88 ... 691
- Ashton [1992] Crim LR 667, CA ... 453
- Asif [2008] EWCA Crim 3348 ... 935
- Asmelash [2013] EWCA Crim 157, [2013] Crim LR 599 ... 534, 545, 546
- Asmeron [2013] EWCA Crim 435, [2013] 2 Cr App R 19 ... 1086
- Assange v Sweden [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin) ... 672, 766, 768, 777
- Assets Recovery Agency (Jamaica), re [2015] UKPC 1 ... 1058, 1061
- Assistant Recorder of Kingston-upon-Hull, ex p Morgan [1969] 2 QB 58, DC ... 184
- Associated Ocel Ltd [1996] 4 All ER 846, HL ... 266
- Aston [1998] Crim LR 498 ... 845
- Atakpu [1994] QB 69, [1993] 4 All ER 215, (1994) 98 Cr App R 254, CA ... 836, 837, 841, 842, 900, 1023, 1034, 1045
- Atkins v DPP [2000] 1 WLR 1427 ... 977
- Atkinson (1869) 11 Cox CC 330 ... 193
- Atkinson [2003] EWCA Crim 3031, [2004] Crim LR 226 ... 884, 985, 986
- Atkinson v Sir Alfred McAlpine & Son Ltd (1974) 16 KIR 220, [1974] Crim LR 668, DC ... 165
- A-G v Able [1984] 1 All ER 277, QBD ... 189, 259, 621
- A-G v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 418 (Admin) ... 148
- A-G v Butterworth [1963] 1 QB 696, [1962] 3 All ER 326, CA ... 101
- A-G v O'Driscoll [2004] Crim LR 219 ... 284
- A-G for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1, PC ... 463, 862, 961
- A-G for Jersey v Holley [2005] UKPC 23, [2005] 2 AC 580 ... 543, 544, 545, 547
- A-G for Northern Ireland v Gallagher [1963] AC 349 ... 312, 327, 331
- A-G for State of South Australia v Brown [1960] AC 432, [1960] 1 All ER 734, PC ... 302
- A-G of Ceylon v Perera [1953] AC 200, PC ... 520
- A-G of Hong Kong v Chan Nai-Keung [1987] 1 WLR 1339, [1988] Crim LR 125, PC ... 847
- A-G of Hong Kong v Yip Kai-foon [1988] AC 642, [1988] 1 All ER 153 ... 1052
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1974) [1974] QB 744, [1974] 2 All ER 899, CA ... 1036, 1037
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] 2 All ER 684 ... 186, 187, 189, 190, 191, 219
- A-G's References (Nos 1 & 2 of 1979) [1980] QB 180, [1979] Crim LR 585, CA ... 420, 892, 1018
- A-G's Reference (No 4 of 1979) [1981] 1 All ER 1193, [1981] 1 WLR 667, [1981] Crim LR 51, CA ... 1033, 1039
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1980) [1981] 1 All ER 366, [1981] 1 WLR 34, CA ... 981
- A-G's Reference (No 4 of 1980) [1981] 2 All ER 617, [1981] 1 WLR 705, CA, [1981] Crim LR 493 ... 126, 127
- A-G's Reference (No 6 of 1980) [1981] QB 715, [1981] 2 All ER 1057 ... 573, 676, 677, 679
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1982) [1983] QB 751, [1983] Crim LR 534 ... 465
- A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1982) [1984] QB 624 ... 866

- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1983) [1985] QB 182, [1984] 3 All ER 369, CA ... 839, 863
- A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1983) [1984] QB 456, [1984] 1 All ER 988, [1984] Crim LR 289, CA ... 406
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1991) [1993] QB 94 ... 1106
- A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1992) [1992] QB 91 ... 309
- A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1992) (1993) 98 Cr App R 383, [1994] Crim LR 348, CA ... 413, 415, 418, 419, 1093
- A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1998] 1 Cr App R 91, [1997] Crim LR 829, [1996] 1 Cr App R 351, [1996] Crim LR 268 ... 121, 124, 506, 507, 509, 515, 569, 572, 641, 657, 715
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1995) (B and F) [1996] 2 Cr App R 320, [1996] Crim LR 575 ... 111, 128
- A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1998) [1999] 3 All ER 40, [1993] Crim LR 986 ... 305
- A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999) [2000] QB 796, [2000] Crim LR 475 ... 134, 252, 253, 255, 263, 594, 601
- A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2000) [2001] Crim LR 578 ... 37
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] Crim LR 844, [2002] EWCA Crim 1768, [2003] 1 Cr App R 131 ... 935, 983, 986, 988, 1006
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2002) [2002] EWCA Crim 2392 ... 100
- A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2002) [2004] UKHL 43, [2005] Crim LR 200 ... 20, 24, 37, 315
- A-G's Reference (Nos 4 and 7 of 2002) [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 345 ... 895
- A-G's Reference (No 2 of 2003) [2004] EWCA Crim 785 ... 274
- A-G's Reference (No 3 of 2003) [2004] EWCA Crim 868, [2004] Cr App R 23, [2005] QB 73 ... 47, 102, 105, 112, 465
- A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2004) [2004] EWCA Crim 1025, [2004] 1 WLR 2111 ... 630
- A-G's Reference (No 3 of 2004) [2005] EWCA Crim 1882 ... 41
- A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2004) [2005] EWCA Crim 889 ... 700
- A-G's Reference (No 74 of 2007) [2007] EWCA Crim 2550 ... 801
- A-G's Reference (No 91 of 2007) unreported ... 811
- A-G's Reference (No 71 of 2012) [2012] EWCA Crim 3071 ... 717
- A-G's Reference (No 69 of 2013) [2014] EWCA Crim 188 ... 516
- Attwater [2010] EWCA Crim 2399 ... 396
- Atwal v Massey (1972) 56 Cr App R 6, DC ... 115, 1050
- Atwell and O'Donnell (1801) 2 East PC 768 ... 1046
- Augunas [2013] EWCA Crim 2046 ... 953, 954
- Austin (1973) 58 Cr App R 163, CA ... 689
- Austin [2011] EWCA Crim 345 ... 460
- Austin v Dowling (1870) LR 5 CP 534 ... 721
- Austin v MPC [2009] UKHL 12 ... 668, 708, 718, 719, 723
- Aves (1950) 34 Cr App R 159 ... 1052
- Aveya [2009] EWCA Crim 2640 ... 786
- Ayala [2003] EWCA 2047 ... 458
- Ayres [1984] AC 447, [1984] Crim LR 353, HL ... 436, 451, 464, 466
- Aziz [1993] Crim LR 708 ... 921
- Aziz [2009] EWCA Crim 2337 ... 997
- B [1999] Crim LR 594 ... 48
- B [2004] EWCA Crim 319 ... 786
- B [2005] 1 Cr App R 140, [2005] Crim LR 388 ... 917
- B [2006] EWCA Crim 2692 ... 148
- B [2006] EWCA Crim 2945 ... 674, 762, 782
- B [2008] EWCA Crim 1997, [2009] Crim LR 608 ... 284
- B [2012] EWCA Crim 770, [2013] Crim LR 90 ... 286, 287, 819, 820, 821
- B [2012] EWCA Crim 1799 ... 285
- B [2013] EWCA Crim 3, [2014] Crim LR 312 ... 137, 189, 386, 659, 786, 791, 792
- B [2013] EWCA Crim 823 ... 672
- B v DPP [2008] EWHC 1655 (Admin) ... 153, 332, 333, 334, 702
- B (A Minor) [1981] 1 WLR 1421 ... 58
- B (A Minor) v DPP [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] 1 All ER 833, [2000] Crim LR 403, HL (see also DPP v B) 139, 141, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 158, 174, 273
- B (Adult: Refusal of Medical Treatment) [2002] 2 All ER 449, DC ... 512, 623
- B (Consent to Treatment) [2002] 2 All ER 449 ... 628
- B (JJ) [2012] EWCA Crim 1440 ... 898
- B (Piara) [2010] EWCA Crim 315 ... 806
- B (Wardship: Adoption), re [1991] 2 FLR 426 ... 651
- B and S v Leathley [1979] Crim LR 314 (Carlisle CC) ... 1014
- Babbs [2007] EWCA Crim 2737, [2007] All ER (D) 383 (Oct) ... 699, 1095
- Backshall [1999] 1 Cr App R 35 ... 371
- Baden [1993] 1 WLR 509 ... 116
- Badza [2009] EWCA Crim 1363 ... 213
- Bagshaw [1988] Crim LR 321 ... 887, 888
- Bahadour [2005] EWCA Crim 396 ... 792
- Bailey (1800) Russ & Ry 1 ... 128
- Bailey (1961) 66 Cr App R 31n ... 305
- Bailey [1983] 1 WLR 760, [1983] 2 All ER 503, [1983] Crim LR 533 ... 315, 323, 324
- Bailey [2004] EWCA Crim 2530 ... 878
- Bailey [2005] EWCA Crim 3487 ... 939
- Bailey [2013] EWCA Crim 378 ... 380, 398
- Baillie [1995] Crim LR 739 ... 526, 529
- Bainbridge [1960] 1 QB 129, CCA ... 208, 210, 211
- Bainbridge (1991) No 504/24/90 (1991) 93 Cr App R 32, [1991] Crim LR 535, CA ... 616
- Bainbridge v Pickering (1779) 2 Wm Bl 1325 ... 923
- Baker [1994] Crim LR 444 ... 228
- Baker [1997] Crim LR 497 ... 1074
- Baker [2000] Crim LR 700, CA ... 895
- Baker [2011] EWCA Crim 928 ... 1105
- Baker v Wilkins [1997] Crim LR 497 ... 347
- Baker and Ward [1999] 2 Cr App R 355 ... 359
- Bala [2016] EWCA Crim 560 ... 440
- Baldessare (1930) 22 Cr App R 70 ... 192, 193
- Balfour Beatty Rail Infrastructure Ltd [2006] EWCA Crim 1586 ... 247, 262
- Balint v Municipal Court in Prague, Czech Republic [2011] EWHC 498 (Admin) ... 890, 891
- Ball (1966) 50 Cr App R 266 ... 170
- Ball [1989] Crim LR 730, (1989) 90 Cr App R 378, [1989] Crim LR 579 ... 569, 576, 577, 704, 709

- Balogun [1999] 98/6762/X2 ... 401
- Banfield [2013] EWCA Crim 1394, [2014] Crim LR 147 ... 196, 634
- Bank of America v Arnell [1999] Lloyd's Rep 399 ... 864
- Banks (1873) 12 Cox CC 393 ... 479, 616
- Bannister [2009] EWCA Crim 1571 ... 135, 594
- Banton [2009] EWCA Crim 240 ... 754
- Bard [2014] EWCA Crim 463 ... 1100
- Barker [2003] 2 Cr App R (S) 22 ... 585
- Barker v Levinson [1951] 1 KB 342, [1950] 2 All ER 825 ... 267
- Barnard (1837) 7 C & P 784 ... 943
- Barnard (1979) 70 Cr App R 28, [1980] Crim LR 235, CA ... 445
- Barnes [1991] Crim LR 132 ... 1035
- Barnes [2005] EWCA Crim 3246, [2005] Crim LR 381 ... 666, 677, 678, 679
- Barnes [2008] EWCA Crim 2726 ... 65, 68
- Barnsdale-Quean [2014] EWCA Crim 1418 ... 529
- Barnet London Borough Council v Eastern Electricity Board [1973] 2 All ER 319, DC ... 1073
- Barnfeather v Islington LBC [2003] 1 WLR 2318, [2003] EWHC 418 (Admin) ... 148, 149, 166
- Baron v DPP (2000) 13 June, unreported ... 738, 742
- Barr [1978] Crim LR 244 ... 904, 905
- Barrass [2011] EWCA Crim 2629 ... 586
- Barratt and Sheehan [1996] Crim LR 495 ... 443
- Barrett and Barrett (1980) 72 Cr App R 212, CA ... 130
- Barronet and Allain (1852) Dears CC 51 ... 128
- Bashedost [2009] EWCA Crim 2883 ... 797
- Bassett [2008] EWCA Crim 1174 ... 820, 821
- Bassey (1931) 22 Cr App R 160, CCA ... 465
- Bastable v Little [1907] 1 KB 59 ... 710
- Batchelor [2013] EWCA Crim 2638 ... 27, 346, 357
- Bateman (1925) 19 Cr App R 8 ... 584, 593, 594, 595
- Bateman v Evans [1964] Crim LR 601 ... 205
- Bates v Bulman (1979) 68 Cr App R 21 ... 1024
- Bawa-Garba [2016] EWCA Crim 1841 ... 593, 595, 596
- Baxter [1971] 2 All ER 359, CA ... 826
- Baxter v Gov of HM Prison Brixton [2002] EWHC 300 (Admin) ... 981, 983
- Bayer v DPP [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin); [2004] Crim LR 663 ... 398, 403
- Bayer Crop Science Ltd [2009] WL 4872821 ... 741
- Bayley and Easterbrook [1980] Crim LR 503 ... 421, 892
- Beach and Owens [1957] Crim LR 687 ... 445
- Beaney [2010] EWCA Crim 2251 ... 428
- Beard [1920] AC 479, HL ... 312, 313, 315, 321, 330, 331
- Beard, Gallagher and Bratty v A-G Northern Ireland [1961] 3 All ER at 533 ... 321
- Beatty v Gillbanks (1882) 9 QBD 308, TBCL 339 ... 190
- Beaumont v Ferrer [2016] EWCA Civ 768 ... 921
- Becerra (1975) 62 Cr App R 212, CA ... 226, 228
- Becker, No 199905228/Y5, 15 June 2000, CA ... 594
- Beckett (1836) 1 Mood & R 526 ... 689
- Beckford v R [1988] AC 130, [1987] 3 All ER 425, PC ... 334, 335, 336, 383, 392, 394, 400, 401
- Belfon [1976] 3 All ER 46, [1976] 1 WLR 741, 744, [1976] Crim LR 449 ... 122, 694
- Belhaj and Boudchar v DPP [2017] EWHC 3056 (Admin) ... 14
- Bellenie [1980] Crim LR 43 ... 1049
- Bellman [1989] AC 836 ... 930
- Belmont Finance Corpn v Williams Furniture Ltd [1979] Ch 250 ... 253
- Belton [2010] EWCA Crim 2857 ... 47
- Bembridge (1793) 22 State Tr 1 ... 993
- Benge (1846) 2 Car & Kir 230 ... 65, 67
- Bennett [1995] Crim LR 877 ... 313
- Bennett v Bale [1986] Crim LR 404, DC ... 709
- Bentham [1973] QB 357, [1972] 3 All ER 271, CA ... 1099
- Bentham [2005] UKHL 18 ... 1022
- Bentley (1850) 4 Cox CC 406 ... 704
- Bergmann and Ferguson (1948) unreported ... 644, 645
- Bernhard [1938] 2 KB 264 ... 1000, 1002
- Berriman (1854) 6 Cox CC 388 ... 655
- Berry (1986) 83 Cr App R 7, [1986] Crim LR 394 ... 101
- Berry [1996] 2 Cr App R 226, [1996] Crim LR 574 ... 731
- Bett [1999] Crim LR 218 ... 31
- Betts v Stevens [1910] 1 KB 1 ... 706, 709
- Bevans (1987) 87 Cr App R 64, [1988] Crim LR 236, CA ... 1004
- Bewley [2012] EWCA Crim 1457 ... 1022
- Bhachu (1976) 65 Cr App R 261, CA ... 847
- Bharj [2005] EWCA Crim 499 ... 536
- Bhatti [2015] EWCA Crim 1305 ... 439
- Bianco [2001] EWCA Crim 2156 ... 345, 346
- Bina [2014] EWCA Crim 1444, [2015] Crim LR 287 ... 460
- Bingham [1991] Crim LR 433 ... 294, 308, 779, 780
- Bingley (1821) Russ & Ry 446 ... 183
- Birch v Wigan Corpn [1953] 1 QB 136, [1952] 2 All ER 893 ... 1015
- Bird [1985] 2 All ER 513 ... 399
- Bird [2004] EWCA Crim 964 ... 752
- Bird v Jones (1845) 7 QB 742 ... 705, 720
- Birmingham [2002] EWCA Crim 2608 ... 691
- Birmingham and Gloucester Railway Co (1842) 3 QB 223 ... 246, 248, 249, 255, 601
- Birtles [1969] 1 WLR 1047 ... 231
- Blackburn (2005) 14 Jan CCC ... 630
- Blackburn v Bowering [1994] 3 All ER 380, CA ... 38, 702, 704, 708
- Blacklock [2006] EWCA Crim 1740 ... 774
- Blackman [2017] EWCA Crim 190 (CMAC) ... 508, 552, 560, 566
- Blackwood and others [2002] EWCA Crim 3102 ... 195
- Blake (1844) 6 QB 126 ... 994
- Blake [2004] EWCA Crim 1238 ... 352
- Blake v DPP [1993] Crim LR 586, DC ... 398, 1081
- Blakely and Sutton v DPP [1991] Crim LR 763, DC ... 190, 206
- Blamires Transport Services Ltd [1964] 1 QB 278 ... 450
- Bland [1988] Crim LR 41 ... 194
- Bland [1993] AC 789, HL ... 623
- Blaue [1975] 3 All ER 446, (1975) 61 Cr App R 271, CA ... 63, 69, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 582

- Blayney v Knight (1975) 60 Cr App R 269, DC ... 41, 908, 913
- Blench v DPP [2004] All ER (D) 86 (Nov) ... 707
- Bliss v Lilley (1862) 32 LJM 3 ... 1023
- Bloomfield [2007] EWCA Crim 1873 ... 345
- Bloxham (1943) 29 Cr App R 37 ... 1039, 1040, 1043, 1047, 1048, 1067
- BM [2018] EWCA Crim 560 ... 666, 680, 681, 683
- Boal [1992] 3 All ER 177 ... 990
- Board of Trade v Owen [1957] AC 602, HL ... 465, 617
- Bogacki [1973] QB 832, [1973] 2 All ER 864,
CA ... 908
- Boggeln v Williams [1978] 2 All ER 1061, [1978]
Crim LR 242, DC ... 851, 877
- Bolam v Friern Hospital Management Committee
[1957] 1 WLR 582 ... 76
- Boldizar v Knight [1980] Crim LR 653, DC ... 185, 914
- Bolitho v City and Hackney HA [1998] AC
232 ... 76
- Bolloom [2003] EWCA Crim 2846 ... 513
- Bolloom [2004] 2 Cr App R 50 ... 691
- Bolton (1991) 94 Cr App R 74 ... 437
- Bolton v Crawley [1972] Crim LR 222 ... 321
- Bolton Justices, ex p Khan [1999] Crim LR 912 ... 31
- Bonner [1970] 2 All ER 97n, [1970] 1 WLR
838 ... 838, 853, 1075
- Bonnick (1978) 66 Cr App R 266, [1978] Crim LR
246 ... 382
- Booth [1999] Crim LR 144 ... 1095
- Booth [2006] EWHC 192 (Admin) ... 103
- Borkan [2004] EWCA Crim 1642 ... 284
- Boshears (1961) The Times, 8 Feb ... 308
- Bosson [1999] Crim LR 596 ... 1045
- Boswell [1973] Crim LR 307 ... 80, 692
- Bouch [1982] 3 All ER 918, CA ... 1023
- Boucher (1831) 4 C & P 561 ... 618
- Boucher v DPP (1996) 160 JP 650 ... 270
- Boulton (1871) 12 Cox CC 87 ... 459
- Bounekhla [2006] EWCA Crim 1217 ... 786
- Bourne [1939] 1 KB 687 ... 368, 370, 644, 653
- Bourne (1952) 36 Cr App R 125 ... 182, 222, 223, 224, 279, 361
- Bournemouth Community and Trust [1998] 3 All
ER 289, HL ... 368, 720
- Bow (1977) 64 Cr App R 54, [1977] Crim LR 176 ... 909, 912
- Bow Street Magistrates, ex p Government of the USA [2000] 2 AC 216, [2000] 1 Cr App R 61, HL ... 1107
- Bow Street Magistrates, ex p Hill (1999) 29 Nov, unreported, DC ... 980
- Bowden [1993] Crim LR 379 ... 313
- Bowden [2002] EWCA Crim 1279 ... 395,
722, 841
- Bowell [2003] EWCA Crim 3896 ... 56, 719
- Bowen [1996] 2 Cr App R 157, [1996] Crim LR 577 ... 353
- Bowie and McVicar, Manchester CC, 19 Feb
2003 ... 989
- Bowker v Premier Drug Co Ltd [1928] 1 KB
217 ... 186, 207
- Bowles and Bowles [2004] EWCA Crim
1608 ... 429
- Bowman v Fels [2005] EWCA Civ 328 ... 1057, 1063, 1066
- Bown [2003] EWCA Crim 1989, [2004] 1 Cr App
R 13 ... 752
- Boyce (1824) Mood CC 29 ... 695
- Boyd [2013] EWCA Crim 2384 ... 821
- Boyea (1992) 156 JP 505, [1992] Crim LR
574 ... 677, 683
- Boyesen [1982] AC 768, [1982] 2 All ER 161, [1982]
Crim LR 596 ... 164, 972
- Boyle (1986) 84 Cr App R 270 ... 426
- BPAS v Secretary of State for Health [2011] EWHC
235 (Admin) ... 649
- Bradbury [1996] Crim LR 808 ... 156
- Bradford [2006] EWCA 2495 ... 815
- Bradish (2004) 148 SJ 474, CA ... 1023
- Bradley (1979) 70 Cr App R 200, [1980] Crim LR
173, CA ... 1053
- Bradley v Moss [1974] Crim LR 430, DC ... 752
- Bradshaw (1878) Cox CC 83 ... 679
- Bradshaw (1985) 82 Cr App R 79, [1985] Crim LR 733 ... 548
- Bradshaw v Ewart-James [1983] 1 All ER 12 ... 267, 272
- Brady [2006] EWCA Crim 2413, [2007] Crim LR
564 ... 41, 103, 105, 690, 693
- Brain (1834) 6 C & P 329 ... 505
- Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794, [2017] Crim
LR 554 ... 27, 345, 346, 347, 349, 357
- Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland [1963] AC
386 ... 27, 36, 39, 293, 295, 296, 302, 303, 321
- Bravery v Bravery [1954] 3 All ER 59 ... 681
- Breaks and Huggan [1998] Crim LR 349 ...
860
- Breakwell [2009] EWCA Crim 2298 ... 997
- Bree [2007] EWCA Crim 804 ... 758, 762, 765, 766, 774, 775
- Brennan [2014] EWCA Crim 2387, [2015] Crim LR
290 ... 305, 550, 552, 564, 565, 566
- Brewis [2004] EWCA Crim 1919 ... 1091
- Brewster (1979) 69 Cr App R 375, CA ... 1021
- Bridgewater case, unreported ... 436
- Briggs [2004] 1 Cr App R 34 ... 835
- Briggs [2004] EWCA Crim 3662, [2004] Crim LR
455 ... 840, 844, 897
- Brightling [1991] Crim LR 364, CA ... 704
- Brindley [1971] 2 QB 300 ... 239, 240
- Brink's-Mat Ltd v Noye [1991] 1 Bank LR 68 ... 1068
- Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew [1998]
Ch 1 ... 961
- Bristol Magistrates' Court, ex p E [1998] 3 All ER
798, [1999] Crim LR 161, DC ... 431
- Bristow [2013] EWCA Crim 1540, [2014] Crim LR 457 ... 179, 213, 569, 578
- British Steel plc [1995] 1 WLR 1356, [1995] Crim
LR 654 ... 248, 266
- Broad [1997] Crim LR 666 ... 459
- Broadhurst v R [1964] AC 441, PC ... 283
- Brook and Wyner [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 48, [2001]
Crim LR 320 ... 156
- Brocklebank [2013] EWCA Crim 1813 ... 806
- Bronson [2004] EWCA Crim 903 ... 352
- Brook [1993] Crim LR 455 ... 1041, 1049
- Brooker v DPP (2005) 169 JP 368 ... 754
- Brooks v Mason [1902] 2 KB 743, DC ... 157

- Brooks and Brooks (1982) 76 Cr App R 66, [1983] Crim LR 188, CA ... 921, 924
- Broome v DPP [1974] AC 587, HL ... 708
- Broome v Perkins [1987] Crim LR 271, DC ... 40
- Brown (1776) 1 Leach 148 ... 535
- Brown (1841) Car & M 314 ... 47, 193, 243, 244, 409
- Brown (1870) LR 1 CCR 244 ... 655
- Brown [1970] 1 QB 105, [1969] 3 All ER 198, CA ... 1044
- Brown [1972] 2 All ER 1328 ... 528
- Brown [1977] Crim LR 291, CA ... 718
- Brown (1984) 79 Cr App R 115 ... 935
- Brown [1985] Crim LR 212, CA ... 230, 1009
- Brown [1985] Crim LR 398, CA ... 726
- Brown [1992] 2 WLR 441, CA ... 652
- Brown [1994] AC 212, [1993] 2 All ER 75, [1993] Crim LR 583, HL ... 9, 10, 441, 573, 658, 666, 673, 676, 678, 680, 682, 683, 692, 715, 716, 786
- Brown [1998] Crim LR 484 ... 691
- Brown [2003] EWCA Crim 2637 ... 348
- Brown [2004] EWCA Crim 744, [2004] Crim LR 665 ... 497
- Brown [2005] EWCA Crim 359 ... 691, 695
- Brown [2005] UKPC 18 ... 589
- Brown [2013] UKSC 43 ... 151, 153, 154, 801
- Brown [2014] All ER (D) 176 (Oct) ... 696
- Brown [2016] UKPC 6 ... 563
- Brown [2017] EWCA Crim 1870 ... 201
- Brown v CPS [2007] EWHC 3274 (Admin) ... 356
- Browning (1998) unreported ... 458
- Bruce (1847) Cox CC 262 ... 572, 573, 1046
- Brutus v Cozens [1973] AC 854, [1972] 2 All ER 1297, HL ... 128, 827, 876, 1014
- Bruzas [1972] Crim LR 367, Crown Court ... 433
- Bryan (1857) Dears & B 265 ... 950
- Bryan [2015] EWCA Crim 433 ... 428
- Bryan v Mott (1975) 62 Cr App R 71 ... 749, 751, 752
- Bryce [2004] EWCA Crim 1231 ... 188, 206, 488
- Bryson [1985] Crim LR 669 ... 694
- Buck (2002) ... 310
- Buckingham (1976) 63 Cr App R 159, CA ... 1099
- Buckley [2008] EWHC 136 (Admin) ... 737
- Buckmaster (1887) 20 QBD 182 ... 946
- Buckoke v Greater London Council [1971] 1 Ch 655, [1971] 2 All ER 254, CA ... 370, 1085
- Budd [1962] Crim LR 49 ... 167
- Buidimir [2010] EWCA Crim 1486 ... 19
- Bull and Schmidt (1845) 1 Cox CC 281 ... 183
- Bullard v R [1957] AC 635, [1961] 3 All ER 470n ... 524
- Bullen [2006] EWCA Crim 1801 ... 819
- Bunch [2013] EWCA Crim 2489 ... 553, 563, 564
- Bundy [1977] 2 All ER 382, [1977] 1 WLR 914, CA ... 1017, 1028
- Burgess [1991] WLR 1206 ... 295, 296
- Burgess [1991] 2 QB 92, [1991] Crim LR 548 ... 308
- Burgess [2008] EWCA Crim 516 ... 75, 582, 587, 714
- Burke [1987] AC 417, [1987] Crim LR 480 ... 125
- Burke [2000] Crim LR 413 ... 845
- Burke and Howe [1986] QB 626, CA; [1987] AC 417, HL ... 221, 222
- Burles [1970] 2 QB 191 ... 282
- Burns (1973) 58 Cr App R 364, [1975] Crim LR 155 ... 331
- Burns [2010] EWCA Crim 1023 ... 405, 685
- Burns v Bidder [1967] 2 QB 227 ... 42
- Burns v Nowell (1880) 5 QBD 444 ... 44, 45, 128
- Burrell v CPS/DPP [2005] EWHC 786 (Admin) ... 706
- Burrell v Harmer [1967] Crim LR 169 ... 669
- Burroughes (2000) 29 Nov, unreported, CA ... 1042
- Burstow [1998] AC 147, [1997] 4 All ER 225 ... 580, 692, 734
- Buswell [1972] 1 WLR 64 ... 44, 754
- Butcher [2009] EWCA Crim 1458 ... 804
- Butler [1988] Crim LR 695 ... 748, 751
- Butt (1884) 15 Cox CC 564 ... 182
- Butt [2005] EWCA Crim 1163 ... 957
- Button (1848) 11 QB 929 ... 463
- Button [1900] 2 QB 597, CCR ... 428
- Buxton [2010] EWCA Crim 2923 ... 1100
- Byrne [1960] 2 QB 396 ... 551, 552, 556, 558, 563, 564
- Byrne [2003] EWCA Crim 3253, [2004] Crim LR 582 ... 750, 751, 1024
- Byrne v Kinematograph Renters Society Ltd [1958] 2 All ER 579 ... 1012
- C [2001] Crim LR 845 ... 137
- C [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 533 ... 795
- C [2005] EWCA Crim 2817 ... 788
- C [2005] EWCA Crim 3533 ... 756, 930
- C [2006] EWCA Crim 1024 ... 1026
- C [2007] EWCA Crim 378 ... 772
- C [2007] EWCA Crim 1068 ... 690
- C [2007] EWCA Crim 1862 ... 308, 310
- C [2009] EWCA Crim 52 ... 756
- C [2009] UKHL 42 ... 669, 816
- C [2011] EWCA Crim 2153, [2012] Crim LR 723 ... 801
- C [2012] EWCA Crim 2034, [2013] Crim LR 358 ... 760
- C v DPP [1996] AC 1, HL ... 342
- C v CPS [2008] EWHC 148 (Admin) ... 737, 746
- C v DPP [2002] Crim LR 202 ... 751
- C v DPP [2003] All ER (D) 37 (Nov) ... 707
- C v S [1988] QB 135, [1987] 1 All ER 1230, CA ... 505, 642
- C (A Minor) v Eisenhower [1984] QB 331, 78 Cr App R 48, DC ... 689
- Cabbage (1815) Russ & Ry 292 ... 886
- Cadman (1825) Carrington's Supp 237 ... 714
- Cahill [1993] Crim LR 141 ... 887
- Cairns [1999] 2 Cr App R 137, CA ... 351, 352, 1080
- Cakmak [2002] 2 Cr App R 10, CA, [2002] Crim LR 581 ... 1097
- Caldwell v MPC [1982] AC 341, [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1981] Crim LR 392 ... 102, 105–7, 108, 109, 111, 112, 113, 123, 133, 137, 141, 206, 319, 321, 322, 323, 419, 420, 458, 584, 664, 665, 687, 689, 690, 1077, 1091, 1092
- Calhaem [1985] QB 808, CA ... 189
- Callow v Tillstone (1900) 83 LT 411, DC ... 207
- Cambridgeshire CC v Assoc Lead Mills Ltd [2006] EWHC 1627 (Admin) ... 155, 274
- Campbell (1984) 80 Cr App R 47, CA ... 1116
- Campbell (1986) 84 Cr App R 255 ... 556, 566

- Campbell (1991) 93 Cr App R 350, [1991] Crim LR 268, CA ... 427, 428
- Campbell [1997] Crim LR 495, Crown Court ... 433, 549
- Campbell [2009] EWCA Crim 50 ... 225, 228
- Campbell v Tormey [1969] 1 All ER 961, [1969] 1 WLR 189 ... 719
- Camplin (1846) 1 Cox CC 220 ... 757
- Camplin [1978] AC 705, [1978] 2 All ER 168 ... 353, 543, 544
- Canns [2005] EWCA Crim 2264 ... 385, 793
- Cant v Parsons (1834) 6 C & P 504 ... 719
- Caresena [1996] Crim LR 667 ... 840, 844
- Carey [2006] EWCA Crim 17, [2006] Crim LR 842 ... 66, 576, 579
- Carey [2013] EWCA Crim 482 ... 691
- Carlgarth, The [1927] P 93 ... 1011
- Carmichael & Sons (Worcester) Ltd v Cottle [1971] RTR 11 ... 175
- Carpenter (1911) 22 Cox CC 618 ... 464
- Carpenter (1979) 76 Cr App R 320n, cited [1983] 1 All ER 1004 ... 692
- Carr [2016] EWCA Crim 2259 ... 993
- Carr-Briant [1943] KB 607 ... 27, 303
- Carter [2005] All ER (D) 372 (Apr) ... 400
- Carter v Mace [1949] 2 All ER 714, DC ... 207
- Carter v Richardson [1974] RTR 314 ... 206
- Cartledge v Allen [1973] Crim LR 530, DC ... 692
- Carty v Croydon London Borough Council [2005] EWCA Civ 19 ... 610
- Cash [1985] QB 801, [1985] Crim LR 311 ... 1046
- Cassell v The Queen [2016] UKPC 19 ... 466
- Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome [1972] AC 1027, [1972] 1 All ER 801, HL ... 14
- Castle [2004] EWCA Crim 2758, [2004] All ER (D) 289 (Oct) ... 106, 1092
- Cato [1976] 1 All ER 260, [1976] 1 WLR 110 ... 64, 67, 571, 715, 716
- Catt [2013] EWCA Crim 1187 ... 647
- Cattell v Ireson (1858) EB & E 91 ... 14
- Caurti v DPP [2002] Crim LR 131 ... 737, 744
- Caven [2011] EWCA Crim 3239 ... 696
- Cavendish [1961] 2 All ER 856, CCA ... 1041
- Ceesay [2013] 1 Cr App R (S) 529 (101), CA ... 1000
- Chahal v DPP [2010] EWHC 439 (Admin) ... 753, 755
- Chal [2007] EWCA Crim 2647 ... 284
- Chamberlain v Lindon [1998] 1 WLR 1252, [1998] 2 All ER 538, DC ... 1081, 1083
- Chambers [2008] EWCA Crim 2467 ... 17
- Chambers [2009] EWCA Crim 2742 ... 455
- Chambers v DPP [2012] EWHC 2157 (Admin) ... 1006
- Chambers and Edwards v DPP [1995] Crim LR 896 ... 742
- Champ (1981) 73 Cr App R 367, [1982] Crim LR 108 ... 28
- Chan-Fook [1994] 2 All ER 552, [1994] Crim LR 432 ... 580, 688, 734
- Chan Kau v R [1955] AC 206 ... 27
- Chan Man-sin v A-G of Hong Kong [1988] 1 All ER 1, PC ... 838, 844, 887, 961
- Chan Wai Lam v R [1981] Crim LR 497 ... 889
- Chan Wing-Siu v R (1985) 80 Cr App R 117 ... 200, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218
- Chandler v DPP [1964] AC 763, HL ... 101, 827
- Charge Card Services Ltd [1988] 3 All ER 702, [1988] 3 WLR 764, CA (Civ Div) ... 923
- Chargot Ltd [2008] UKHL 73 ... 24, 25, 247, 603
- Charles [1977] AC 177 ... 926
- Charles [2009] EWCA Crim 1570, [2010] Crim LR 303 ... 147, 173
- Charles [2013] EWCA Crim 1205 ... 529, 530
- Charlson [1955] 1 All ER 859 ... 40, 295
- Charnley [2010] All ER (D) 127 (Jun) ... 804
- Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1981] Ch 105, [1979] 3 All ER 1025 ... 864, 865
- Chaytor [2010] UKSC 52 ... 983
- Chelsea Yacht and Boat Club v Pope [2001] 2 All ER 409 ... 848
- Cheshire [1991] 1 WLR 844, [1991] 3 All ER 670, [1991] Crim LR 709 ... 63, 76, 77, 78
- Cheshire West and Chester Council v P [2014] UKSC 19 ... 720
- Chevannes [2009] EWCA Crim 2725 ... 1008, 1023
- Chevron [2005] All ER (D) 91 (Feb) ... 807
- Chief Constable of Devon and Cornwall, ex p CEGB [1982] QB 458, [1981] 3 All ER 826 ... 706, 723
- Chief Constable of Hampshire v Mace (1986) 84 Cr App R 40, [1986] Crim LR 752 ... 218
- Chinegwundo [2014] EWCA Crim 2649, [2015] EWCA Crim 109 ... 282, 288, 304
- Chitate [2014] EWCA Crim 1744 ... 876
- Chodorek v Poland [2017] ACD 244(82), QBD; [2017] EWHC 995 (Admin) ... 845, 926, 940, 948
- Choi [1999] EWCA Crim 1279, [1999] 8 Archbold News 3 ... 473, 820
- Cholewinski v Poland [2013] EWHC 3648 (Admin) ... 992
- Chrastny [1991] 1 WLR 1381, CA ... 439, 441
- Christian & others v The Queen (The Pitcairn Islands), [2006] UKPC 47 ... 7, 128, 338, 339
- Christie [2004] EWCA Crim 1338 ... 538
- Chuong [2013] EWCA Crim 1716 ... 383
- Church [1966] 1 QB 59 ... 126, 127, 573, 577, 578, 579
- Churchill v Walton [1967] 2 AC 224 ... 459
- Cicarelli [2011] EWCA Crim 2665 ... 771, 772
- Cichon v DPP [1994] Crim LR 918, DC ... 167, 372
- Ciorba [2009] EWCA Crim 1800 ... 971
- Clancy [2012] EWCA Crim 8 ... 755
- Clarence (1888) 22 QBD 23 ... 673, 692, 721
- Clark [2001] Crim LR 752, [2001] EWCA Crim 884 ... 846
- Clark [2003] EWCA Crim 991 ... 47
- Clark [2012] EWCA Crim 1220 ... 439
- Clark v Cutland [2003] EWCA Civ 810, [2003] 4 All ER 733 ... 864
- Clarke [1956] Crim LR 369 ... 857
- Clarke [1972] 1 All ER 219 ... 298
- Clarke (1990) 91 Cr App R 69 ... 66
- Clarke v CPS [2007] EWHC 2228 (Admin) ... 835
- Clarkson [1971] 1 WLR 1402, C-MAC ... 189, 194
- Clarkson and Carroll [1971] 3 All ER 344 ... 321, 797
- Clear [1968] 1 All ER 74 ... 999
- Cleary v Booth [1893] 1 QB 465 ... 685
- Clegg [1995] 1 All ER 334, [1995] Crim LR 418, HL ... 379, 399, 401, 407, 408, 533
- Cleps [2009] EWCA Crim 894 ... 942

- Clerk to Croydon Justices, ex p Chief Constable of Kent [1989] Crim LR 910, DC ... 259
- Clifford [2007] EWCA Crim 2442 ... 917
- Clifford and O'Sullivan, re [1921] 2 AC 570 ... 14
- Clift [2012] EWCA Crim 2750, [2013] Crim LR 506 ... 509
- Clinton [2012] EWCA Crim 2 ... 521, 523, 524, 526, 527, 530, 536, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 545, 559
- Close [1977] Crim LR 107, CA ... 873
- Clothier [2004] EWCA Crim 2629 ... 585
- Clotworthy [1981] RTR 477, CA ... 913
- Clouden [1987] Crim LR 56, CA ... 899
- Clowes (No 2) [1994] 2 All ER 316 ... 858, 860
- Cobb [2005] EWCA Crim 1549 ... 884
- Cobb v Williams [1973] Crim LR 243 ... 274
- Cobbett v Grey (1849) 4 Exch 729 ... 719
- Cockburn [1968] 1 All ER 466, CA ... 874, 1085
- Cocker [1989] Crim LR 740 ... 528, 554
- Codère (1916) 12 Cr App R 21 ... 299
- Codsi [2009] EWCA Crim 1618 ... 896
- Coelho (1914) 30 TLR 535 ... 302
- Coffin v Smith (1980) 71 Cr App R 221 ... 706
- Cogan and Leak [1976] QB 217, [1975] Crim LR 584 ... 183, 223, 224, 279, 321, 652, 788
- Cole (1993) Crim LR 300 ... 313
- Cole [1994] Crim LR 582 ... 344, 355
- Coleman (1920) 84 JP 112 ... 689
- Coleman [1986] Crim LR 56, CA ... 1043
- Coleman [2013] EWCA Crim 544, [2013] Crim LR 694 ... 1020
- Coles-Day [2015] EWCA Crim 2444 ... 1103
- Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923 ... 39, 40, 293, 294, 296, 308, 309, 310, 311, 313, 330
- Collins (1864) 9 Cox CC 497 ... 497
- Collins [1973] QB 100, [1972] 2 All ER 1105 ... 1008, 1010, 1017, 1021
- Collins [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin) ... 326, 391
- Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374, DC ... 658, 667, 668
- Collins and Fox v Chief Constable of Merseyside [1988] Crim LR 247 ... 851, 852
- Collis-Smith [1971] Crim LR 716, CA ... 920, 938
- Collister and Warhurst (1955) 39 Cr App R 100, CCA ... 997
- Colmer (1864) 9 Cox CC 506 ... 655
- Colohan [2001] EWCA Crim 1251, [2001] Crim LR 845 ... 739, 740
- Comer v Bloomfield (1970) 55 Cr App R 305 ... 429
- Commissioners of Police v Cartman [1896] 1 QB 655 ... 270
- Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis v DSD [2018] UKSC 11 ... 21
- Condon (1995) 83 A Crim R 335 ... 879
- Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534 ... 187, 195, 678
- Congdon [1990] NLJR 1221 ... 230
- Connor v Surrey CC [2010] EWCA Civ 286 ... 610
- Conroy [2017] EWCA Crim 81 ... 559
- Constanza [1997] Crim LR 576 ... 661, 662
- Conway [1989] QB 290, [1989] Crim LR 74, CA ... 347, 350, 365, 370, 406
- Cook [2007] EWCA Crim 7 ... 1013
- Cook [2017] EWCA Crim 353 ... 463
- Cook v Atchison [1968] Crim LR 266 ... 308
- Cooke [1971] Crim LR 44 ... 1027
- Cooke [1986] AC 909, [1987] Crim LR 114, HL ... 436, 464, 466, 983
- Coomber [2005] EWCA Crim 1113 ... 818
- Cooper [2004] EWCA Crim 1382 ... 106, 1092
- Cooper [2008] EWCA Crim 1155 ... 763
- Cooper [2009] UKHL 42 ... 729, 774
- Cooper v Simmons (1862) 7 H & N 707 ... 129
- Cooper (G) and Cooper (Y) [1991] Crim LR 524, CA ... 1095
- Cooper and Compton [1947] 2 All ER 701, CA ... 439, 445
- Cooper and Schaub [1994] Crim LR 531 ... 788
- Coppen v Moore (No 2) [1898] 2 QB 306 ... 269, 272, 273, 274
- Copus v DPP [1989] Crim LR 577 ... 748
- Corbett [1996] Crim LR 594 ... 81
- Corbett v Corbett [1971] P83 ... 680
- Corbyn v Saunders [1978] Crim LR 169, DC ... 852
- Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500 ... 33, 875, 942
- Corocan v Anderton (1980) 71 Cr App R 104, [1980] Crim LR 385, DC ... 897, 899
- Corporation of London v Eurostar [2004] EWHC 187 (Admin) ... 180
- Corran [2005] EWCA Crim 192 ... 794, 798
- Cort [2003] EWCA Crim 2149, [2003] 3 WLR 1300, [2004] Crim LR 64 ... 725, 726, 727, 728
- Cory Bros Ltd [1927] 1 KB 810 ... 601
- Cosford [2013] EWCA Crim 466 ... 47
- Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings Ltd [2011] EWCA Crim 1337, The Times, 20 July 2011 ... 602
- Cotterill v Penn [1936] 1 KB 53 ... 157
- Cottrell [2007] EWCA Crim 2016 ... 805
- Coughlan (1976) 63 Cr App R 33, [1976] Crim LR 628 ... 27
- Court (1960) 44 Cr App R 242, CCA ... 1041
- Court [1989] AC 28 ... 782, 784, 785
- Courtie [1984] AC 463, [1984] 1 All ER 740, HL ... 31, 236, 458, 797, 822, 916, 1019
- Cousins [1982] 2 All ER 115, CA ... 618
- Coutts [2006] 1 WLR 2154 ... 696
- Cowan [2007] EWCA Crim 3402 ... 942
- Coward v Baddeley (1859) 4 H & N 478 ... 667
- Cox (1992) 12 BMLR 38 ... 67
- Cox [2014] EWCA Crim 804 ... 525
- Cox v Ministry of Justice [2016] UKSC 10 ... 267
- Cox v Riley (1986) 83 Cr App R 54, DC ... 1070, 1071, 1110
- Cox and Hodges [1983] Crim LR 167 ... 468
- Coxhead (1845) 1 Car & Kir 623 ... 655
- CP (A Child) v First-tier Tribunal (Criminal Injuries Compensation) [2014] EWCA Civ 1554 ... 504, 506, 507, 617, 715
- CPS v Brown [2007] EWHC 3274 (Admin) ... 366
- Crabtree v Hole (1879) 43 JP 799 ... 270
- Craig [2007] EWCA Crim 2913 ... 1059
- Craig and Bentley (1952) The Times, 10–13 Dec ... 226
- Craik v CC of Northumbria Police [2010] EWHC 935 (Admin) ... 178
- Cramp (1880) 5 QBD 307, CCR ... 646, 714
- Crawford v Houghton [1973] QB 1, DC ... 274
- Creed [2005] EWCA Crim 215 ... 284, 1012
- Creighton (1909) 14 CCC 349 ... 302
- Cresswell v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 ... 398, 850, 1074, 1075, 1081, 1082, 1084, 1086

- Crocker [2012] EWCA Crim 1762 ... 439
- Croft [1944] 1 KB 295 ... 226
- Cronin-Simpson [2000] 1 Cr App R (S) 54 ... 713
- Crosskey [2012] EWCA Crim 1645 ... 1105
- Crow [2001] EWCA Crim 2968 ... 585
- Croydon LBC v Pinch a Pound (UK) Ltd [2010] EWCA Crim 3238 ... 172
- Croydon LBC v Shanahan [2010] EWCA Crim 98 ... 945
- Crumphorne v Gilmore [1970] Crim LR 28 ... 43
- Crutchley (1831) 5 C & P 133 ... 348, 360
- Cugullere [1961] 1 WLR 858 ... 44, 749, 754
- Cullen No 968/C74 of 1974, unreported ... 862
- Cullen [1993] Crim LR 936 ... 322
- Cullen [2007] 2 Cr App R (S) 394 ... 897
- Cullum (1873) LR 2 CCR 28 ... 862
- Cumberbatch v CPS [2009] EWHC 3353 (Admin) ... 707
- Cumming [2007] 2 Cr App R (S) 20 ... 622
- Cummings v Granger [1977] QB 397, [1977] 1 All ER 104, CA ... 1085
- Cummings-John [1997] Crim LR 660 ... 982, 987
- Cundy v Le Cocq (1884) 13 QBD 207 ... 145, 270
- Cunningham [1957] 2 QB 396, [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] Crim LR 326, (1957) 41 Cr App Rep 155 ... 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 108, 109, 133, 140, 206, 322, 324, 325, 420, 467, 664, 665, 687, 689, 690, 716, 724, 1010, 1091
- Cunningham [1982] AC 566, [1981] 2 All ER 863 ... 514, 515
- Cunningham [1992] 1 AC 699, [1992] Crim LR 288 ... 105
- Curley (1909) 2 Cr App R 96 ... 80
- Curr [1968] 2 QB 944, CA ... 127
- Curtis [2010] EWCA Crim 123 ... 736, 738, 743, 744
- Custance [2007] EWCA Crim 520 ... 1004
- D [1984] AC 778, [1984] 1 All ER 574 ... 722, 725, 727, 728, 729
- D [2008] EWCA Crim 2360, [2009] Crim LR 280 ... 112
- D [2012] EWCA Crim 2181 ... 943, 957
- D v DPP [2010] EWHC 3400 (Admin) ... 706
- D Stanton & Sons Ltd v Webber [1973] RTR 87, [1972] Crim LR 544 ... 205
- D (A Child) (Abduction: Rights of Custody) [2006] UKHL 51 ... 733
- D (Infant) v Parsons [1960] 1 WLR 797 ... 185
- DA [2012] EWCA Crim 1825 ... 814
- Da Silva [2006] EWCA Crim 1654, [2007] Crim LR 77 ... 118, 335, 1063
- Dad [2017] EWCA Crim 321 ... 440
- Dadson (1850) 2 Den 35 ... 34–5, 404, 645, 671
- Dady [2013] EWHC 475 (QB) ... 437, 462, 470
- Dagnall [2003] EWCA Crim 2441 ... 772
- Daiichi UK Ltd and others v Huntingdon Animal Cruelty and others [2003] EWHC 2337 (QB) ... 738
- Dakou [2002] EWCA Crim 3156 ... 690
- Dalas [1966] Crim LR 692 ... 170
- Dalby [1982] 1 All ER 916, [1982] 1 WLR 425, CA ... 52, 577, 715
- Dale (1852) 6 Cox CC 14 ... 714
- Daley (1979) 69 Cr App R 39, [1979] Crim LR 182 ... 80
- Daley [2010] EWCA Crim 2193 ... 957
- Dalloway (1847) 2 Cox CC 273 ... 66
- Dang [2014] EWCA Crim 348 ... 451
- Daniel v Morrison (1980) 70 Cr App R 142, DC ... 707
- Danquah [2004] EWCA Crim 1248 ... 194
- Dare v CPS [2012] EWHC 2074 (Admin), [2013] Crim LR 413 ... 1064
- Darroux [2018] EWCA Crim 1009 ... 840
- Data Protection Registrar v Amnesty International [1995] Crim LR 633 ... 109
- Davenport [1954] 1 All ER 602 ... 844
- Davey v Towle [1973] RTR 328, DC ... 39, 409
- David Moor (1999) Newcastle Crown Court ... 510
- David T [2005] EWCA Crim 2668 ... 773
- Davidge v Bunnett [1984] Crim LR 297, DC ... 862
- Davies [1975] QB 691, [1975] 1 All ER 890 ... 536
- Davies [1991] Crim LR 469 ... 321, 322
- Davies [2004] EWCA Crim 1914 ... 525
- Davies [2005] EWCA Crim 3690 ... 785
- Davies v Flackett [1974] RTR 8 ... 940
- Davies v Harvey (1874) LR 9 QB 433 ... 272
- Davies, Turner & Co v Brodie [1954] 1 WLR 1364, DC ... 207
- Davies-Jones [2013] EWCA Crim 2809 ... 525
- Davis (1823) Russ & Ry 499 ... 1008
- Davis (1833) 6 C & P 177 ... 1041
- Davis (1881) 14 Cox CC 563 ... 330
- Davis [1977] Crim LR 542, CA ... 220
- Davis (1988) 88 Cr App R 347, CA ... 865
- Davis [1998] Crim LR 564 ... 754, 755
- Davis v Alexander (1970) 54 Cr App R 398 ... 749
- Davison v Birmingham Industrial Co-operative Society (1920) 90 LJBK 206 ... 748
- Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322, [2013] Crim LR 770 ... 401, 524, 525, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 536, 537, 538, 542, 543, 548
- Dawes v DPP [1995] 1 Cr App R 65 ... 917
- Dawson (1985) 81 Cr App R 150 ... 578, 580
- Dawson and James (1976) 64 Cr App R 170, CA ... 897, 898
- Day (1841) 9 C & P 722 ... 760
- Day (1844) 8 JP 186 ... 1088
- Day (1845) 1 Cox CC 207 ... 668, 689
- Day [2015] EWCA Crim 1646 ... 391
- Dayle [1973] 3 All ER 1151 ... 750
- De Boise [2014] EWCA Crim 1121 ... 308, 310
- De Costa Small v Kirkpatrick (1978) 68 Cr App R 186, [1979] Crim LR 41 ... 723
- Deakin [1972] 3 All ER 803, CA ... 1040, 1042
- Deal [2006] EWCA Crim 684 ... 785
- Dean [2002] EWCA Crim 2410 ... 585
- Dear [1996] Crim LR 595 ... 78, 81, 582
- Debnath [2006] 2 Cr App R (S) 25 ... 742
- Deegan [1998] 2 Cr App R 121, [1998] Crim LR 562 ... 754, 755
- Defazio v DPP [2007] All ER (D) 262 (Jul) ... 1035
- Defiant Cycle Co Ltd v Newell [1953] 2 All ER 38 ... 129
- Delamare [2003] All ER (D) 127 (Feb) ... 1109
- Deller (1952) 36 Cr App R 184 ... 33, 34, 942, 951
- Denham v Scott (1983) 77 Cr App R 210, [1983] Crim LR 558, DC ... 243, 1055
- Dennis v Pight (1986) 11 FLR 458 ... 192

- Densu [1998] 1 Cr App R 400, [1998] Crim LR 345 ... 752, 754
- Denton [1981] 1 WLR 1446, CA ... 1075, 1080
- Denton (1987) 85 Cr App R 246 ... 365
- Department for Work and Pensions v Costello [2006] EWHC 1156 (Admin) ... 871
- Derham (1843) 1 Cox CC 56 ... 655
- Dervish [1968] Crim LR 37 ... 308
- Deutsche Genossenschaftsbank v Burnhope [1996] 1 Lloyd's Rep 113 ... 1007
- Deutsche Morgan Grenfell v IRC [2006] UKHL 49, [2007] AC 558 ... 863
- Devine [1999] 2 Cr App R (S) 409 ... 585
- Devalond [2008] EWCA Crim 527 ... 779, 780, 797
- Dewar v DPP [2010] EWHC 1050 (Admin) ... 384
- Deyemi [2007] EWCA Crim 2060, [2008] Crim LR 327 ... 144, 152, 153, 155, 752
- Dhaliwal [2006] EWCA Crim 1139, [2006] Crim LR 923 ... 82, 580, 582, 688
- Dhindsa [2005] EWAC Crim 1198 ... 748, 749
- Dhingra (1991) unreported ... 646
- Dhir v Saddler [2017] EWHC 3155 (QB) ... 618
- Dial Contracts v Vickers [1971] RTR 386 ... 205
- Diamond (1920) 84 JP 211 ... 616
- Dias [2002] 2 Cr App R 9, [2002] Crim LR 490 ... 74, 714
- Dibble v Ingleton [1972] 1 QB 480 ... 711
- Dica [2004] EWCA Crim 1103, [2004] Crim LR 944 ... 668, 673, 675, 676, 679, 682, 683, 693, 715, 778
- Dickinson v Del Solar [1930] 1 KB 376 ... 1035
- Dietschmann [2003] 1 AC 1209, HL ... 553, 561, 562, 564
- Diggin (1980) 72 Cr App R 204, [1980] Crim LR 565, [1981] RTR 83, CA ... 322, 908, 914
- Dimes (1912) 7 Cr App R 43 ... 757
- Dip Kaur v Chief Constable for Hampshire [1981] 2 All ER 430, DC ... 836
- Director of the Assets Recovery Agency v Olupitan [2008] EWCA Civ 104 ... 1059
- Disalvo [2004] All ER (D) 316 (Jul) ... 660
- Distill [2017] EWHC 2244 (Admin) ... 1021
- Dix (1981) 74 Cr App R 306 ... 563, 564
- Dixon [1961] 3 All ER 460n, [1961] 1 WLR 337 ... 567
- Do-buy 295 Ltd v Nat West Bank [2010] EWHC 2862, QB ... 948
- Dobson v General Accident Fire and Life Insurance Corpn plc [1990] 1 QB 274, [1989] 3 All ER 927, CA ... 826, 1018
- Dobson v North Tyneside Health Authority [1996] 4 All ER 474, CA ... 830, 868
- Dodge [1972] 1 QB 416, CA ... 980
- Dodman [1998] 2 Cr App R 338 ... 88
- Doherty (1887) 16 Cox CC 306 ... 513
- Dolan (1855) Dears CC 436 ... 1036, 1049
- Donaghy and Marshall [1981] Crim LR 644 ... 898
- Donald (1986) 83 Cr App R 49, [1986] Crim LR 535 ... 237
- Doncaster [2008] EWCA Crim 5, [2008] Crim LR 709 ... 982, 995
- Donnelly v Jackman [1970] 1 All ER 987, [1970] 1 WLR 562 ... 667
- Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562 ... 715
- Donovan [1934] 2 KB 498, CCA ... 676, 677, 678, 681, 682
- Donovan [2009] EWCA Crim 1258 ... 618
- Dooley [2005] EWCA Crim 3093 ... 987, 1005
- Dosanjh [2013] EWCA Crim 2366 ... 16, 459, 994
- Dougal [2005] Swansea Cr Ct ... 765
- Doughty (1986) 83 Cr App R 319 ... 530, 535, 537
- Doukas [1978] 1 All ER 1061, [1978] 1 WLR 372, [1978] Crim LR 177, CA ... 946, 962, 1027
- Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281, [2012] 1 WLR 2576, [2012] Crim LR 612 ... 306, 312, 325, 331, 545, 553, 554, 555, 562, 563, 564
- Downer (2000) 17 Oct, CA ... 998
- Downer [2009] EWCA Crim 1361 ... 1023
- Downes (1983) 77 Cr App R 260, [1983] Crim LR 819 ... 887
- Doyle [2010] EWCA Crim 119 ... 675, 760
- DPP v Alderton [2004] RTR 367 ... 914
- DPP v Armstrong-Braun [1999] Crim LR 416, DC ... 384
- DPP v B [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403 (see also R v K) 110, 149, 332, 333, 334, 709, 791, 806, 958, 1055
- DPP v Baker [2004] EWHC 2782 (Admin) ... 742
- DPP v Bayer [2004] 1 Cr App R 38, [2004] Crim LR 663 ... 1084
- DPP v Beard [1920] AC 479 ... 121, 312, 330
- DPP v Bell (Derek) [1992] Crim LR 176, DC ... 354, 356, 366
- DPP v Bhagwan [1970] 3 All ER 97, HL ... 445
- DPP v Bignell [1998] 1 Cr App R 1, [1998] Crim LR 53, DC ... 1107
- DPP v Butterworth [1995] 1 AC 381, [1994] 3 All ER 289, HL ... 31
- DPP v Carey [1970] AC 1072 ... 711
- DPP v Christof [2015] EWHC 4096 (Admin) ... 748
- DPP v Collins [2006] UKHL 40, [2006] 1 WLR 2223, [2007] Crim LR 98 ... 148, 939
- DPP v D [2005] EWHC 967 (Admin) ... 708
- DPP v Doot [1973] AC 807, [1973] 1 All ER 940, HL ... 438, 461
- DPP v Dziurzynski (2002) 166 JP 545 ... 738
- DPP v Fisher [1991] Crim LR 787 ... 156
- DPP v Glendinning [2005] EWHC 2333 Admin ... 710
- DPP v Green [2004] All ER (D) 70 (May) ... 701
- DPP v H [1997] 1 WLR 1406 ... 304
- DPP v Hammerton [2009] EWHC 921 (Admin) ... 908
- DPP v Hardy [2008] All ER (D) 315 (Oct) ... 737
- DPP v Harris [1995] 1 Cr App R 170, [1995] Crim LR 73, DC ... 371, 372
- DPP v Hawkins [1988] 3 All ER 673, [1988] Crim LR 741 ... 708
- DPP v Howard [2008] EWHC 608 (Admin) ... 701, 702
- DPP v Hughes [2010] EWHC 515 (Admin) ... 917
- DPP v Hynde [1998] Crim LR 72, DC ... 748
- DPP v J [2002] EWHC 291 (Admin) ... 889, 896
- DPP v Jones [1990] RTR 34, DC ... 365
- DPP v K [1990] 1 All ER 331, [1990] Crim LR 321, DC ... 663, 664, 687
- DPP v K & B [1997] 1 Cr App R 36, [1977] Crim LR 121, DC ... 223
- DPP v K and C [1997] 1 Cr App R 36 ... 788
- DPP v Kent and Sussex Contractors Ltd [1944] KB 146, [1944] 1 All ER 119 ... 249
- DPP v Lavender [1994] Crim LR 297 ... 887

- DPP v Lennon [2006] EWHC 1201 (Admin) ... 1102, 1111
- DPP v Little [1992] 1 All ER 299, [1991] Crim LR 900, DC ... 659, 660, 661
- DPP v M [2004] EWHC 1453, [2005] Crim LR 392 ... 700, 701
- DPP v MacFarlane [2002] EWHC Admin 485, [2002] All ER (D) 78 (Mar) ... 701
- DPP v Majewski [1977] AC 443, [1976] Crim LR 374, HL ... 37, 88, 131, 314, 315–16, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 328, 329, 573, 796
- DPP v Maxwell [1978] 1 WLR 1350, [1978] 3 All ER 1140 ... 188
- DPP v Morgan [1976] AC 182, [1975] 2 All ER 347 ... 139, 321, 332, 333, 334, 335, 351
- DPP v Mosely (1999) The Times, 23 June ... 742
- DPP v Mullally [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin) ... 372
- DPP v Newbury [1977] AC 500, [1977] Crim LR 359, HL ... 131, 571
- DPP v Nock [1978] AC 979, [1978] Crim LR 483 ... 445, 446, 495, 497
- DPP v Pal [2000] Crim LR 756 ... 700
- DPP v Parker [2006] EWHC 1270 ... 915
- DPP v Patterson [2017] EWHC 2820 ... 881, 931, 986
- DPP v Ramsdale (2001) The Independent, 19 Mar ... 742
- DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370, [1973] 3 All ER 131, HL ... 919, 920, 944, 945
- DPP v Rogers [1992] Crim LR 51, DC ... 271
- DPP v Rogers [1998] Crim LR 202, DC ... 352
- DPP v Shannon [1975] AC 717, HL ... 219, 220, 460
- DPP v Smith [1961] AC 290 ... 131, 513, 514, 587
- DPP v Smith [2006] EWHC 94 (Admin) ... 680, 687
- DPP v Smith [2017] EWHC 3193 (Admin) ... 315
- DPP v Spriggs [1994] RTR 1, [1993] Crim LR 622 ... 908
- DPP v Tomkinson [2001] RTR 38 ... 365
- DPP v Unsworth [2010] EWHC 3037 (Admin) ... 1081, 1084
- DPP v W [2006] EWHC 92 (Admin) ... 690
- DPP v Williams (DC, 27 July 1998) ... 737
- DPP v Withers [1975] AC 842, [1974] 3 All ER 984 ... 435, 465, 472
- DPP (Jamaica) v Bailey [1995] 1 Cr App R 257, [1995] Crim LR 313 ... 382
- DPP, ex p Jones [2000] Crim LR 858 ... 593
- DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] AC 653 ... 26, 345
- DPP for Northern Ireland v Maxwell [1978] 3 All ER 1140, HL ... 177, 208, 209, 210, 489, 490
- DPP of Mauritius v Bholah [2011] UKPC 44 ... 1060
- Drake v DPP [1994] RTR 411, DC ... 1071
- Drameh [1983] Crim LR 322 ... 921
- Drayton [2005] EWCA Crim 2013 ... 1095
- Drew [2000] 1 Cr App R 91, [1999] Crim LR 581, CA ... 455
- DS [2012] EWCA Crim 1470 ... 997
- Du Cross v Lambourne [1907] KB 40 ... 192
- Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2003] AC 366 ... 267
- Dubar [1995] 1 All ER 781 ... 860
- Duck v Peacock [1949] 1 All ER 318 ... 43
- Dudley [1989] Crim LR 57, CA ... 1090, 1092
- Dudley and Stephens (1884) 14 QBD 273 ... 71, 372, 373, 374, 375
- Duffin and Marshall (1818) Russ & Ry 365 ... 695
- Duffy [1949] 1 All ER 932n ... 521, 526, 528
- Duffy [1967] 1 QB 63, [1966] 1 All ER 62, CCA ... 399
- Duffy v Cleveland [2006] EWHC 3169 (Admin) ... 383
- Duffy v DPP [2007] EWHC 3169 (Admin) ... 399
- Dugdale v R (1853) 1 E & B 435 ... 44
- Duggan [2014] EWHC 3343 (Admin) ... 335
- Duguid (1906) 21 Cox CC 200 ... 442
- Dume (1986) The Times, 16 Oct, CA ... 664
- Dunbar [1958] 1 QB 1, [1957] 2 All ER 737 ... 548
- Dunbar v Plant [1997] 3 WLR 1261 ... 622, 629
- Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218 ... 707
- Dunning and Graham, Dec 1985, unreported, Preston CC ... 211
- Dunnington [1984] QB 472, [1984] Crim LR 98, CA ... 218, 432
- Durante [1972] 3 All ER 962, [1972] 1 WLR 1612 ... 1017
- Durkin [1973] QB 786, [1973] 2 All ER 872, CA ... 905
- Dyer [2011] EWCA Crim 900 ... 425, 897
- Dyke and Munro [2002] Crim LR 153, [2002] 1 Cr App R 404 ... 859
- Dykes v DPP [2008] EWHC 2775 (Admin) ... 700
- Dyson [1908] 2 KB 454 ... 33, 65, 510, 942
- Dytham [1979] QB 722 ... 47
- Dziruni [2008] EWCA Crim 667 ... 935
- E v DPP [2005] EWHC 147 (Admin), (2005) WL 62315 ... 800
- Eagleton (1855) Dears CC 376 ... 426
- Ealing London Borough Council, ex p Zainuddin [1994] 2 PLR 1 ... 1014
- Easom [1971] 2 QB 315, CA ... 421, 892
- Eden [1971] Crim LR 416, CA ... 987
- Eden DC v Baird [1998] CODS 209 ... 167, 361
- Edgington [2013] EWCA Crim 2185 ... 567
- Edmonds [1963] 2 QB 142 ... 750
- Edwards (1843) 1 Cox CC 32 ... 902
- Edwards [1973] AC 648 ... 531
- Edwards [1978] Crim LR 49, CA ... 926
- Edwards [1991] Crim LR 45, CA ... 443, 453, 454
- Edwards v Ddin [1976] 3 All ER 705, [1976] 1 WLR 942, DC ... 919
- Edwards v DPP [1995] Crim LR 896 ... 742
- Edwards v R [1973] AC 648, PC ... 531
- Edwards v Toombs [1983] Crim LR 43, DC ... 981
- Edwards and Roberts (1978) 67 Cr App R 228, [1978] Crim LR 564 ... 753
- Edwards and Stacey (1877) 13 Cox CC 384, (1877) 36 LT 30 ... 857, 869
- Egan [1998] 1 Cr App R 121, [1997] Crim LR 225 ... 286
- Ehi-Palmer [2016] EWCA Crim 1844 ... 283
- Eifinger [2001] EWCA Crim 1855 ... 564
- Ekatette [2008] EWCA Crim 3137 ... 774
- El Faisal [2004] EWCA Crim 343 ... 615, 616, 617
- El-Kurd [2001] Crim LR 234, CA ... 444, 1056
- Elbakkay [1995] Crim LR 163 ... 782
- Eletu [2018] EWCA Crim 599 ... 1024
- Eley v Lytle (1885) 50 JP 308, DC ... 1070

- Elitestone Ltd v Morris [1997] 2 All ER 513; [1997] 1 WLR 687, HL ... 848
 Ellames [1974] 3 All ER 130 ... 750, 975, 1027, 1029
 Elliott [1978] Crim LR 204 ... 455
 Elliott v C (A Minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103, [1983] Crim LR 616 ... 108, 137
 Ellis [2008] EWCA Crim 886 ... 194
 Ellis [2010] EWCA Crim 163 ... 753
 Ellis v DPP [2001] All ER (D) 190 (May) ... 1106, 1107
 Ellis, Street and Smith (1986) 84 Cr App R 235, [1987] Crim LR 44, CA ... 31, 122
 Elwes v Brigg Gas Co (1886) 33 Ch D 562 ... 857
 Emery (1992) 14 Cr App R (S) 394 ... 353
 Emma W [2006] EWCA Crim 2723 ... 112
 Emmanuel [1998] Crim LR 347 ... 755
 Emmett (1999) The Times, 15 Oct ... 682, 683
 Empress Cars see Environment Agency (formerly National Rivers Authority) v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd
 English see Powell and Daniels, English
 Enoch (1850) 5 C & P 539 ... 505
 Environment Agency v Biffa Waste Ltd [2006] EWHC 1102 (Admin) ... 266, 269
 Environment Agency (formerly National Rivers Authority) v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 AC 22, [1998] 1 All ER 481, HL ... 63, 68, 72, 73, 165, 178, 269
 Erskine [2009] EWCA Crim 1425, [2010] Crim LR 48 ... 18, 289
 Esop (1836) 7 C & P 456 ... 128, 338
 Essenden Engineering Co Ltd v Maile [1982] RTR 260, [1982] Crim LR 510 ... 249
 Evan v Dell [1937] 1 All ER 349 ... 116
 Evans [2009] EWCA Crim 650, [2009] Crim LR 661 ... 51, 52, 55, 75, 586, 587, 588, 607
 Evans [2009] EWCA Crim 2243 ... 538
 Evans [2012] EWCA Crim 2559 ... 766
 Evans v Hughes [1972] 3 All ER 412, DC ... 752
 Evans v Lane (1984) Co/137/84, CA ... 923
 Evans v Wright [1964] Crim LR 466 ... 752
 Evans and others [2014] 1 WLR 2817 ... 436, 437, 463, 464, 468, 471
 Ewing v DPP [2010] EWCA Civ 70 ... 6
 Ezeemo and others [2012] EWCA Crim 2064, [2013] Env LR 15 ... 153, 158, 160, 166

 F [2002] EWCA Crim 2936 ... 789
 F [2007] EWCA Crim 2550 ... 170
 F [2008] EWCA Crim 994 ... 756, 768, 769
 F [2008] EWCA Crim 1868 ... 1059
 F v West Berkshire Health Authority [1989] 2 All ER 545, HL ... 369, 379, 667, 685
 F (in utero) [1988] Fam 122, CA (Civ Div) ... 615
 FA and others [2003] 2 Cr App R (S) 503 ... 895
 Fagan v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1969] 1 QB 439, DC ... 50, 125, 658, 662, 663
 Fairweather [2011] EWCA Crim 1783 ... 818
 Fancy [1980] Crim LR 171, CC ... 1072, 1098
 Faraj [2007] EWCA Crim 1033 ... 405, 722
 Farr [1982] Crim LR 745, CA ... 175
 Farrar [2006] EWCA Crim 3261 ... 786
 Farrell (1787) 1 Leach 332 ... 897
 Faulkner v Talbot [1981] 3 All ER 468 ... 658
 Fazal [2009] EWCA Crim 1697 ... 1062
 Feely [1973] QB 530, [1973] Crim LR 193 ... 875, 876, 877, 879

 Fehmi v DPP (1993) 96 Cr App R 235, DC ... 754
 Felstead [1914] AC 534, HL ... 286
 Fennell [1971] 1 QB 428, [1970] 3 All ER 215, [1970] Crim LR 581 ... 402, 704, 709
 Fennell [2000] 2 Cr App R 318, (2000) 164 JP 386, [2000] Crim LR 677, CA ... 431
 Fenton (1830) 1 Lew CC 179 ... 570
 Fenton (1975) 61 Cr App R 261, CA ... 561
 Ferguson v Weaving [1951] KB 814 ... 184, 186, 187, 205, 275
 Fernandes [1996] 1 Cr App R 175 ... 891
 Fernandez [1970] Crim LR 277 ... 164, 209
 Fernandez [1997] 1 Cr App R 123 ... 1052
 Ferris [2004] EWHC 1221 (Admin) ... 282, 287
 Ferriter [2012] EWCA Crim 2211 ... 428
 FHR European Ventures LLP v Cedar Capital Partners LLC [2014] UKSC 45 ... 862
 Fiak [2005] EWCA Crim 2381 ... 1071
 Field [1972] Crim LR 435 ... 752
 Filice (1999) Carswellont 1262 ... 771
 Finegan v Heywood 2000 JC 444, (2000) The Times, 10 May ... 38, 330
 Finlay [2003] EWCA Crim 3868 ... 74, 75, 714
 First Sport Ltd v Barclays Bank plc [1993] 3 All ER 789, CA (Civ Div) ... 922, 947
 Firth (1990) 91 Cr App R 217, [1990] Crim LR 326, CA ... 48, 944
 Fisher (1837) 8 C & P 182 ... 537
 Fisher (1865) LR 1 CCR 7, DC ... 1070
 Fisher [1987] Crim LR 334, CA ... 383
 Fisher [2004] EWCA Crim 1190, [2004] Crim LR 938 ... 345
 Fitzgerald [1992] Crim LR 660 ... 177
 Fitzgerald [2006] EWCA Crim 1655 ... 67, 581
 Flack [2013] EWCA Crim 115, [2013] Crim LR 521 ... 1020
 Flack v Baldry [1988] 1 All ER 412, [1988] 1 WLR 214 ... 850
 Flack v Hunt (1979) 70 Cr App R 51 ... 690
 Platt [1996] Crim LR 576 ... 353, 355
 Flattery (1877) 2 QBD 410, CCCR ... 776
 Fleming [1989] Crim LR 71 ... 749
 Fletcher (1841) Russell 417 ... 510
 Fletcher [1962] Crim LR 551 ... 227
 Flintshire County Council v Reynolds [2006] EWHC 195 (Admin) ... 135, 954
 Flitter [2001] Crim LR 328 ... 1095
 Flower Freight Co Ltd v Hammond [1963] 1 QB 275, [1962] 3 All ER 950 ... 748
 Floyd v DPP [2000] Crim LR 411, DC ... 826, 860
 Flynn (1985) 82 Cr App R 319, [1986] Crim LR 239 ... 749
 Foo [1976] Crim LR 456 ... 170
 Forbes [2001] UKHL 40 ... 336
 Forbes and Webb (1865) 10 Cox CC 362 ... 703, 708
 Foreman [1991] Crim LR 702 ... 1052
 Forman [1988] Crim LR 677 ... 196, 634
 Formhals [2013] EWCA Crim 2624 ... 942
 Formosa (1990) 92 Cr App R 11, [1990] Crim LR 868, CA ... 748
 Forrest and others [2014] EWCA Crim 308 ... 958
 Forrester [1992] Crim LR 793, CA ... 896
 Forsyth [1997] 2 Cr App R 299, [1997] Crim LR 581, CA ... 115, 118, 1033, 1039, 1050
 Foster (1852) 6 Cox CC 25 ... 1071
 Foster [2004] EWHC 2955 (Admin), [2005] Crim LR 639 ... 732, 733

- Foster [2007] EWCA Crim 2869 ... 696
 Foster [2007] UKPC 20 ... 514
 Foster [2009] EWCA Crim 2214 ... 691, 696
 Foster [2011] EWCA Crim 1192 ... 861
 Foster v CPS [2013] EWHC 3885 (Admin) ... 109, 1073
 Foster v DPP [2005] 1 WLR 1400 ... 732
 Fotheringham (1988) 88 Cr App R 206, [1988] Crim LR 846 ... 321, 783
 Fowler (1987) 86 Cr App R 219, [1987] Crim LR 769, CA ... 1053
 Foye [2013] EWCA Crim 475, [2013] Crim LR 839 ... 39, 303, 308, 633
 Francis [1982] Crim LR 363, CA ... 914, 1023
 Frankland and Moore v R [1987] AC 576, [1988] Crim LR 117, PC ... 131, 514
 Franklin (1883) 15 Cox CC 163 ... 570, 571
 Freedman (1930) 22 Cr App R 133, CCA ... 1041
 Freestone [1913] TPD 758 ... 648
 French (1955) 39 Cr App R 192 ... 619
 Fretwell (1862) Le & Ca 161 ... 198
 Fritschy [1985] Crim LR 745 ... 831, 834, 836, 837
 Frost and Hale (1964) 48 Cr App R 284, CCA ... 1041
 Fuller [1998] Crim LR 61 ... 220
 Fulton [2006] EWCA Crim 960 ... 1026
 Fury [2006] EWCA Crim 1258 ... 188
 Fuschillo [1940] 2 All ER 489 ... 1051
 Fussell [1997] Crim LR 812, CA ... 468
- G [2003] UKHL 50, [2004] 1 AC 1034, [2004] Crim LR 369 ... 87, 102, 103, 105, 107–9, 110, 111, 112, 133, 137, 140, 152, 153, 158, 332, 458, 467, 584, 1010, 1077, 1078, 1092
 G [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818 ... 87, 144, 149, 150, 152, 799, 800, 801, 804, 825, 934
 G [2010] 1 AC 43 ... 970
 Gabriel [2006] EWCA Crim 229 ... 1060
 GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472 ... 353, 354
 Gale [2008] EWCA Crim 1344 ... 964
 Gallagher [1963] AC 349 ... 321
 Gallant [2008] EWCA Crim 111 ... 226
 Gallasso [1993] Crim LR 459 ... 836
 Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v Attorney-General of Hong Kong [1985] AC 1, [1984] Crim LR 479, PC ... 147, 154, 161, 166, 173
 Gannon (1988) 87 Cr App R 254, CA ... 322, 324, 913
 Gantz [2004] EWCA Crim 2862 ... 715
 Gardiner [1994] Crim LR 455 ... 110
 Gardner v Ackroyd [1952] 2 QB 743 ... 276
 Garforth [1954] Crim LR 936 ... 67
 Garrett v Arthur Churchill (Glass) Ltd [1970] 1 QB 92 ... 199
 Garrett v Hooper [1973] Crim LR 61 ... 274
 Garvey [2004] EWCA Crim 2672 ... 774
 Garwood [1987] 1 All ER 1032 ... 218, 999
 Gaunt [2003] EWCA Crim 3925 ... 193
 Gaviria [2010] EWCA Crim 1693 ... 811, 812
 Gayford v Chouler [1898] 1 QB 316, DC ... 1070
 Geary [200] EWCA Crim 1925 ... 1061, 1064
 Geddes [1996] Crim LR 894 ... 427, 428
 Gelberg v Miller [1961] 1 WLR 153 ... 709
 Gelder (1994) The Times, 25 May ... 691
 George (1868) 11 Cox CC 41 ... 655
 George [1956] Crim LR 52 ... 784
 Georgiades (1989) 89 Cr App R 206, [1989] Crim LR 574 ... 406
- GG plc [2008] UKHL 17 ... 16, 435, 436, 470, 471
 GH [2015] UKSC 24, [2015] Crim LR 637 ... 1061, 1063, 1064, 1068
 Ghanbary [2006] EWCA Crim 2374 ... 281
 Ghosh [1982] QB 1053 ... 468, 851, 875, 876–9, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 930, 931, 959, 986, 987
 Ghulam [2009] EWCA Crim 2285, [2010] Crim LR 796 ... 284
 Gianetto [1997] 1 Cr App R 1, [1996] Crim LR 722, CA ... 177, 189
 Giannakopoulos [2005] EWCA Crim 247, [2005] All ER 54 (Feb) ... 468
 Giaquento [2001] EWCA Crim 2696 ... 345
 Gibbins and Proctor (1918) 13 Cr App R 134, CCA ... 49, 50, 429
 Gibbons v Pepper (1695) 2 Salk 637 ... 663, 664
 Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619, [1990] Crim LR 738, CA ... 435
 Gibson v Wales [1983] 1 All ER 869, [1983] Crim LR 113, DC ... 748, 749
 Gibson and Gibson (1984) 80 Cr App R 24 ... 196, 635
 Gilbert [2012] EWCA Crim 2392 ... 934, 951
 Giles [1976] Crim LR 253 ... 751, 755, 1024
 Giles [2003] All ER (D) 68 (Feb) ... 754
 Gilks [1972] 3 All ER 280, [1972] 1 WLR 1341, CA ... 865, 876, 877, 878
 Gill [1963] 2 All ER 688, [1963] 1 WLR 841, CCA ... 27, 345, 360
 Gill (1993) 97 Cr App R 215 ... 978
 Gillan v MPC [2006] UKHL 12 ... 718
 Gillard (1988) 87 Cr App R 189 ... 713, 714
 Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority [1986] AC 112, [1986] Crim LR 113, HL ... 95, 197, 369, 669
 Gillies [2011] EWCA Crim 2140 ... 1064
 Gillow (1825) 1 Mood CC 85 ... 695
 Gilmartin (1983) 76 Cr App R 238 ... 947
 Gilmour [2000] 2 Cr App R 407 ... 364
 Gingell [2000] 1 Cr App R 88 ... 1047
 Giomaga [2012] EWCA Crim 2679 ... 971
 Gipson [1956] Crim LR 281 ... 749
 Girdler [2009] EWCA Crim 2666 ... 71
 Girma [2009] EWCA Crim 912 ... 235, 237
 Gittins [1984] QB 698, CA ... 561
 Gladstone Williams [1987] 3 All ER 411, 78 Cr App R 276, [1984] Crim LR 163 ... 325, 326, 327, 334, 335, 351, 383, 384, 392, 397, 401, 403, 405, 571, 709, 712
 Glead (1916) 12 Cr App R 32, CCA ... 1041, 1043
 Gleeson [2003] EWCA Crim 3557, [2004] 1 Cr App R 29, [2004] Crim LR 579 ... 495
 Glidewell (1999) 163 JP 557 ... 753
 Gnango [2011] UKSC 59 ... 180, 181, 184, 191, 213, 214, 230, 442, 484, 800
 Gnosil (1824) 1 C & P 304 ... 899
 Goatley [2002] EWHC 1209 (Admin) ... 461
 Gohill v DPP [2007] EWHC 239 (Admin) ... 883, 987
 Golding [2004] EWCA Crim 858 ... 313
 Golding [2014] EWCA Crim 889, [2014] Crim LR 686 ... 670, 691
 Goldman [2001] EWCA Crim 1684, [2001] Crim LR 822, CA ... 477, 480
 Golds [2016] UKSC 61, [2017] Crim LR 316 ... 305, 550, 552, 556, 557, 558, 561, 565
 Goldsmith [2009] EWCA Crim 1840 ... 929, 930

- Goldstein and Rimmington see Rimmington and Goldstein
- Golechha [1989] 3 All ER 908, [1990] Crim LR 865, CA ... 987, 1005
- Gomez [1993] AC 442, [1993] 1 All ER 1, [1993] Crim LR 304 ... 28, 829, 830, 831, 832, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 840, 841, 859, 865, 866, 867, 881, 900, 932, 1018, 1026, 1045
- Goode [2014] EWCA Crim 90 ... 383
- Goodfellow (1986) 83 Cr App R 23 ... 576, 577
- Goodfellow v Johnson [1966] 1 QB 83, [1965] Crim LR 304 ... 274, 275
- Gordon-Butt [2004] EWCA Crim 961 ... 212
- Gore [2007] EWCA Crim 2789, [2008] Crim LR 388 ... 631, 632, 633
- Gorringe v Calderdale Metropolitan Borough Council [2004] UKHL 15 ... 610
- Gosden v Elphick and Bennett (1849) 4 Exch 445 ... 721
- Gosney [1971] 3 All ER 220 ... 167, 169
- Goss [2005] Crim LR 61 ... 166
- Gott v Measures [1948] 1 KB 234, [1947] 2 All ER 609 ... 872, 1086
- Gotts [1992] 2 AC 412, [1992] 2 WLR 284 ... 361, 364
- Gould [1968] 2 QB 65 ... 139, 151, 334
- Government of the United Arab Emirates v Allen [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin) ... 945, 946, 947, 949
- Government of the United Arab Emirates v Amir [2012] EWHC 1711 (Admin) ... 945, 946
- Governor of Brixton Prison, ex p Levin [1997] QB 65, DC ... 842, 974
- Governor of Pentonville Prison, ex p Osman 90 Cr App R 281, DC; [1997] AC 741, [1997] 3 All ER 289, HL ... 466, 842, 844
- Gowans [2003] EWCA Crim 3935 ... 64, 76, 77, 78
- Gower [2007] EWCA Crim 1655 ... 691
- Grade v DPP [1942] 2 All ER 118 ... 273
- Graham [1982] 1 All ER 801, [1982] 1 WLR 294, [1982] Crim LR 365 ... 336, 347, 350, 351, 352, 357, 362
- Graham [1997] 1 Cr App R 302 ... 846, 988
- Grainge [1974] 1 All ER 928, [1974] Crim LR 180, CA ... 238, 1050
- Grainger v Hill (1838) 4 Bing NC 212 ... 719
- Grant (1960) Crim LR 424 ... 566
- Grant (Heather) [2001] EWCA Crim 261, [2002] QB 1030, [2002] Crim LR 403 ... 286
- Grant [2001] EWCA Crim 2611 ... 524
- Grant [2008] EWCA Crim 1870 ... 289
- Grant [2014] EWCA Crim 143 ... 123, 124, 695
- Grant [2015] EWCA Crim 1815 ... 507
- Grant v Borg [1982] 2 All ER 257, [1982] 1 WLR 638, HL ... 44, 127, 338
- Grant v CPS [2000] QBD unreported 10 Mar ... 898
- Grant-Murray [2017] EWCA Crim 1228 ... 218
- Gray and others [1995] 2 Cr App R 100, sub nom Liggins [1995] Crim LR 45 ... 459
- Gray v Barr [1971] 2 QB 554 ... 41, 580
- Great North of England Railway Co (1846) 9 QB 315 ... 248
- Great Western Trains Co (1999) 3 June CCC ... 255
- Greater Glasgow Health Board v Doogan [2014] UKSC 68 ... 654
- Greater London Metropolitan Police Comr v Streeter (1980) 71 Cr App R 113, DC ... 1036
- Greaves (1987) The Times, 11 July ... 1046
- Greaves [1999] 1 Cr App R (S) 319 ... 788
- Greaves [2010] EWCA Crim 709 ... 1057
- Green [2002] EWCA Crim 1501 ... 778
- Green [2009] EWCA Crim 2609 ... 696
- Green v Burnett [1955] 1 QB 78 ... 274, 275
- Green v Cross (1910) 103 LT 279 ... 56
- Green v Moore [1982] QB 1044 ... 710
- Greenfield [1973] 1 WLR 1151, [1973] 3 All ER 1050 ... 444
- Greenhalgh [2001] EWCA Crim 1367 ... 728
- Gregory [1972] 2 All ER 861 ... 853, 1051
- Gregory (1981) 74 Cr App R 154, [1982] Crim LR 229, CA ... 900
- Gregory [2009] EWCA Crim 1374 ... 695
- Gregory [2011] EWCA Crim 1712 ... 144, 146, 167, 366, 372
- Gregson [2006] EWCA Crim 3364 ... 527
- Greig [2010] EWCA Crim 1183 ... 938
- Gresham [2003] EWCA Crim 2070 ... 839, 864, 865
- Grewal [2010] EWCA Crim 2448 ... 317, 321, 790, 793
- Griffin [1993] Crim LR 515, CA ... 425
- Griffith [2004] UKPC 58 (Barbados) ... 514
- Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589, (1965) 49 Cr App R 279, CCA ... 439, 933
- Griffiths (1974) 60 Cr App R 14, CA ... 115, 238, 1050
- Griffiths v Freeman [1970] 1 All ER 1117 ... 1040, 1062
- Griffiths v Studebakers Ltd [1924] 1 KB 102 ... 249, 275
- Grinham v Willey (1859) 4 H & N 496 ... 721
- Groark [1999] Crim LR 669 ... 313
- Gross (1913) 23 Cox CC 455 ... 123, 537
- Gross v Switzerland [2013] 3 FCR 608 ... 626
- Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299 ... 31, 320, 321, 803, 804, 822
- Grundy [1977] Crim LR 543 ... 227, 228, 691
- Grundy (1989) 89 Cr App R 333 ... 191
- Grundy (Teddington) Ltd v Fulton [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep 16, CA ... 892
- Gullefer [1990] 3 All ER 882, 91 Cr App R 356n ... 426, 427
- Gurphal Singh [1999] Crim LR 582 ... 588, 589
- Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178 ... 523, 524, 525, 527, 529, 531
- Guy (1990) 93 Cr App R 108, CA ... 895
- H [2002] 1 Cr App R 59 ... 684
- H [2003] UKHL 1, [2003] 1 WLR 411, HL ... 284
- H [2005] EWCA Crim 732, [2005] Crim LR 734 ... 658, 668, 783, 784, 785
- H [2006] EWCA Crim 853 ... 759
- H [2007] EWCA Crim 2622 ... 819, 823, 1026
- H [2010] EWCA Crim 312 ... 344
- H [2010] EWCA Crim 1931 ... 700
- H and others, re [1996] AC 563 ... 640
- H v CPS [2010] All ER (D) 56 (Apr) ... 668
- H v DPP [1997] 1 WLR 1406 ... 167
- H L Bolton (Engineering) Co Ltd v T J Graham & Sons Ltd [1957] 1 QB 159 ... 250
- Haboub [2007] EWCA Crim 3327 ... 935, 942
- Hack [1978] Crim LR 379 ... 1035

- Hacker [1995] 1 Cr App R 332, HL ... 1053
- Hadjou [1989] Crim LR 390 ... 997
- Haggard v Mason [1976] 1 WLR 187 ... 978
- Hague v Deputy Governor of Parkhurst Prison [1991] 3 All ER 733, HL ... 722
- Haider (1985) unreported ... 1041
- Hale (1978) 68 Cr App R 415, [1979] Crim LR 596, CA ... 900, 901, 1045
- Hales [2005] EWCA Crim 1118 ... 88, 90, 91, 131
- Hall (1849) 1 Den 381 ... 886
- Hall [1972] 2 All ER 1009, CA ... 860, 861
- Hall [1985] Crim LR 377, (1985) 81 Cr App R 260, CA ... 115, 118, 1040, 1055
- Hall [2008] EWCA Crim 2086 ... 873, 896
- Hall [2013] EWCA Crim 2499 ... 491
- Halliday (1889) 61 LT 701 ... 80, 692
- Hamand (1985) 82 Cr App R 65 ... 27
- Hamilton (1845) 1 Cox CC 244 ... 464
- Hamilton [2007] EWCA Crim 2062, [2008] Crim LR 225 ... 473
- Hamilton [2008] EWCA Crim 2518 ... 942
- Hammersley (1958) 42 Cr App R 207, CCA, discussed [1958] Crim LR 422 ... 443, 445
- Hammond [1982] Crim LR 611 ... 921, 922
- Hammond [2013] EWCA Crim 2709 ... 346, 347
- Hampshire CC v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin) ... 167, 372
- Hancock [1986] AC 455 ... 514
- Hancock (1989) 90 Cr App R 422, [1990] Crim LR 125 ... 856
- Hancock and Shankland [1986] AC 455, [1986] Crim LR 400 ... 91, 93, 97
- Handford [2016] EWCA Crim 1838 ... 851
- Handley (1874) 13 Cox CC 79 ... 505
- Hanif [2012] EWCA Crim 1968 ... 458
- Hanrahan [2004] All ER (D) 144 (Nov) ... 753
- Hanson (1849) 2 Car & Kir 912 ... 664
- Hapgood and Wyatt (1870) LR 1 CCR 221, CCR ... 219
- Haque [2011] EWCA Crim 1871 ... 743
- Hardie [1984] 3 All ER 848, [1985] 1 WLR 64, CA ... 37, 323, 1092
- Harding v Price [1948] 1 KB 695, DC ... 165
- Hardman v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [1986] Crim LR 330 ... 1072
- Hardy [2013] EWCA Crim 2125 ... 819
- Hargreaves [1985] Crim LR 243, CA ... 1029
- Harley (1830) 4 C & P 369 ... 714
- Harling [1938] 1 All ER 307 ... 757
- Harman's Case (1620) 2 Roll Rep 154 ... 899, 901
- Harmer [2001] EWCA Crim 2930, [2002] Crim LR 401 ... 359
- Harmer [2005] EWCA Crim 1, [2005] Crim LR 482 ... 432
- Harnett v Bond [1925] AC 669 ... 721
- Harrington (1866) 10 Cox CC 370 ... 537
- Harriott v DPP [2005] EWHC 965 (Admin) ... 753
- Harris [1964] Crim LR 54 ... 192
- Harris (1975) 62 Cr App R 28, CA ... 946
- Harris (1986) 84 Cr App R 75 ... 1051
- Harris (1998) The Times, 4 Mar ... 900
- Harris [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923 ... 293, 313, 321, 1091
- Harris v Harrison [1963] Crim LR 497, DC ... 873
- Harrison [1970] Crim LR 415, CA ... 1029
- Harrison [2001] EWCA Crim 1314 ... 1003
- Harrison [2011] EWCA Crim 3139 ... 585
- Harrison v Thornton (1966) 68 Cr App R 28, [1966] Crim LR 388, DC ... 749, 751
- Harrow Justices, ex p Osaseri [1986] QB 589, DC ... 686
- Harrow London Borough Council v Shah [1999] 3 All ER 302, [2000] Crim LR 692, DC ... 8, 160, 161, 273
- Harry [1974] Crim LR 32 ... 999
- Hart v Anglian Water Services Ltd [2003] EWCA Crim 224 ... 153
- Hart and Bullen [1999] 2 Cr App R (S) 233 ... 1004
- Harvey [1999] Crim LR 70, CA ... 453
- Harvey [2009] EWCA Crim 469 ... 384, 402, 531
- Harvey, Ulyett and Plummer (1981) 72 Cr App R 139, CA ... 1002, 1003
- Hasan [2005] UKHL 22 ... 336, 345, 346, 347, 350, 351, 352, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 369, 379
- Hatter see Dawes
- Hatton [2005] EWCA Crim 2951, [2006] 1 Cr App R 247, [2006] Crim LR 353, CA ... 325, 326, 383, 534
- Hatton v Traffic Management [2006] EWCA Crim 1156 ... 266
- Haughian (1985) 80 Cr App R 334 ... 790
- Haughton v Smith [1975] AC 476, [1973] 3 All ER 1109 ... 26, 421, 497, 498, 1034, 1036, 1042
- Haw v Secretary of State [2006] EWCA 532 ... 22
- Hawkesley [1959] Crim LR 211 (QS) ... 444
- Hawkins v Smith [1978] Crim LR 578 ... 950
- Hayes (1976) 64 Cr App R 82 ... 860, 861
- Hayes [2011] EWCA Crim 2680 ... 381
- Hayes [2015] EWCA Crim 1944 ... 882, 883, 884
- Hayes v Willoughby [2013] UKSC 17 ... 88, 741
- Haynes v Swain [1975] RTR 40, [1974] Crim LR 483, DC ... 135
- Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire (2000) 164 JP 396, [2000] 3 All ER 890, [2000] Crim LR 758, DC ... 122, 660, 663
- Hayter [2005] UKHL 6, [2005] Crim LR 720 ... 237
- Hayward (1908) 21 Cox CC 692 ... 69, 84
- Hayward v Norwich Union Insurance Ltd [2000] Lloyd's Rep IR 382 ... 901
- Hazelton (1874) LR 2 CCR 134 ... 947
- Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2008] QB 43, [2007] Crim LR 654 ... 33, 37, 122, 312, 315, 317, 318, 319–21, 322, 573, 665, 790, 793, 795, 796, 798, 807, 1090, 1092
- Heath (1810) Russ & Ry 184 ... 44
- Heath [2000] Crim LR 109 ... 359, 360
- Hedley v Webb [1901] 2 Ch 126 ... 1015
- Hegarty [1994] Crim LR 353 ... 353
- Henderson [2006] EWCA Crim 198 ... 820
- Henderson [2016] EWCA Crim 965, [2017] Crim LR 233 ... 1023
- Henderson v Battley (1984) CA unreported ... 1071
- Hendy-Fregard [2007] EWCA Crim 1236, CA ... 725, 726, 727, 728
- Henley [2000] Crim LR 582 ... 743, 744
- Henman [1987] Crim LR 333, CA ... 729
- Hennah (1877) 13 Cox CC 547 ... 714
- Hennessy [1989] 1 WLR 287, CA ... 294, 296, 308
- Henningan [1971] 3 All ER 133, (1971) 55 Cr App R 262 ... 65, 67
- Hensler (1870) 11 Cox CC 570 ... 926

- Hepworth [1955] 2 QB 600 ... 1052
- Herd v Weardale Steel, Coal and Coke Co Ltd [1915] AC 67 ... 719, 721, 722
- Herring v Boyle (1834) 1 Cr M & R 377 ... 720
- Herrmann v Metropolitan Leather Co Ltd [1942] Ch 248, [1942] 1 All ER 294 ... 748
- Hewitt v DPP [2002] EWHC 2801 (Admin) ... 704
- Hewlett (1858) 1 F & F 91 ... 694
- Hewlett [2016] EWCA Crim 673 ... 700
- Heys and Murtagh [2011] EWCA Crim 2112 ... 731
- Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 2 KB 142, [1948] 1 All ER 860, DC ... 855, 857, 870
- Hichens [2011] EWCA Crim 1626, [2011] Crim LR 873 ... 381
- Hicks [2007] EWCA Crim 1500 ... 691
- Hill (1986) 83 Cr App Rep 386, HL ... 717
- Hill [1997] 2 Cr App R (S) 243, [1997] Crim LR 459 ... 145
- Hill [2006] EWCA Crim 2575 ... 785, 795
- Hill [2008] EWCA Crim 76 ... 541
- Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 QB 277 ... 37, 41, 167, 309
- Hill and Hall (1988) 89 Cr App R 74, CA ... 1082, 1083, 1088
- Hillen and Pettigrew v ICI (Alkali) Ltd [1936] AC 65 ... 1011
- Hillman (1863) 9 Cox CC 386, CCR ... 648
- Hills [2001] Crim LR 318 ... 736, 737
- Hills v Ellis [1983] QB 680, [1983] 1 All ER 667 ... 712
- Hilton [1997] 2 Cr App R 445, [1997] Crim LR 761 ... 839, 845
- Hilton [2009] EWHC 2867 (Admin) ... 754, 755
- Hinchcliffe v Sheldon [1955] 3 All ER 406, [1955] 1 WLR 1207 ... 709
- Hinks [2001] 2 AC 241, [2000] 4 All ER 833, [2001] 1 Cr App R 18 ... 827, 829, 832, 833, 834, 836, 838, 840, 878, 881, 900, 932, 960, 1012, 1026, 1075
- Hinton-Smith [2005] EWCA Crim 2575 ... 797, 804
- HM, re [2010] EWHC 870 (Fam) ... 730
- Hoar and Hoar [1992] Crim LR 606 ... 851
- Hobbs v Winchester Corpn [1910] 2 KB 471, CA ... 145
- Hobson [1998] 1 Cr App R 31 ... 553
- Hobson v Gledhill [1978] 1 All ER 945, [1978] 1 WLR 215, DC ... 1085
- Hobson v Impett (1957) 41 Cr App R 138, CCA ... 1043
- Hodgson [1954] Crim LR 379 ... 749
- Hodgson [2008] EWCA Crim 895 ... 696
- Hodson [2009] EWCA Crim 1590, [2010] Crim LR 249 ... 696
- Hoffman v Thomas [1974] 2 All ER 233, DC ... 705
- Hogan v DPP [2007] 1 WLR 2944 ... 1065, 1066
- Hogdan [1962] Crim LR 563 ... 911
- Holland (1841) 2 Mood & R 351 ... 80
- Hollinshead [1985] 1 All ER 850, [1985] Crim LR 301, CA; [1985] AC 975, HL ... 218, 451, 469, 471, 976, 979
- Holloway [1993] 4 All ER 935, discussed [1994] Crim LR 292 ... 584
- Holmes, re [2004] EWHC 2020 (Admin) ... 865, 940
- Holmes [2005] Crim LR 229 ... 1108
- Holmes v DPP [1946] AC 588, HL ... 520
- Holt v Attorney-General [2014] UKPC 4 ... 119
- Hood [2003] EWCA Crim 2772, [2004] 1 Cr App R (S) 73 ... 51, 586
- Hoof (1980) 72 Cr App R 126, CA ... 169, 1095
- Hopkins and Kendrick [1997] 2 Cr App R 524, [1997] Crim LR 359 ... 833, 960
- Hopkinson [2013] EWCA Crim 795, [2014] Crim LR 310 ... 641
- Hopley (1860) 2 F & F 202 ... 683
- Hopwood (1913) 8 Cr App R 143, CCA ... 619
- Horncastle [2006] EWCA Crim 1736 ... 1009
- Horne [1994] Crim LR 584 ... 353
- Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex p K [1996] 2 Cr App R 574, [1997] Crim LR 129 ... 290, 303
- Horsman [1998] Crim LR 128 ... 845
- Horton v Mead [1913] 1 KB 154 ... 616
- Horwood [2012] EWCA Crim 253 ... 688
- Hotchin v Hindmarsh [1891] 2 QB 181 ... 274, 275
- Hough v Chief Constable of Staffordshire [2001] EWCA Civ 39 ... 721
- Houghton v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester (1986) 84 Cr App R 319 ... 748
- Houston [2011] EWCA Crim 3030 ... 1006
- Howard [1965] 3 All ER 684, [1966] 1 WLR 13 ... 757
- Howard [1993] Crim LR 213, CA ... 1023
- Howard [1966] 1 WLR 13 ... 774, 798
- Howe [1987] AC 417, [1987] Crim LR 480, HL ... 71, 345, 350, 351, 352, 362, 363, 364, 372, 408
- Howe [2014] EWCA Crim 114 ... 625
- Howell (1981) 73b Cr App R 31 ... 723
- Howell [2007] EWCA Crim 1863 ... 806
- Howells [1977] QB 614, [1977] Crim LR 354 ... 166
- Howker v Robinson [1972] 2 All ER 791 ... 270, 271, 272
- Howlett v Holding (2006) The Times, 8 Feb, QBD ... 741
- Huckerby [2004] EWCA Crim 3251 ... 298
- Huckerby v Elliott [1970] 1 All ER 189 ... 257
- Hudson [1956] 2 QB 252, [1956] 1 All ER 814 ... 993, 994
- Hudson [1965] 1 All ER 721 ... 352
- Hudson [1966] 1 QB 448 ... 137
- Hudson v CPS [2017] EWHC 841 (Admin), [2017] Crim LR 703 ... 1020, 1021
- Hudson v MacRae (1863) 4 B & S 585, DC ... 157
- Hudson v Taylor [1971] 2 QB 202 ... 361
- Hudson and Taylor [1971] 2 All ER 244 ... 356, 357
- Huggins (1730) 2 Stra 883 ... 268
- Hughes (1841) 9 C & P 752 ... 789
- Hughes (1860) Bell CC 242 ... 219
- Hughes [2013] UKSC 56, [2014] Crim LR 234 ... 64, 66, 74, 146, 917, 1119
- Hughes v Hall [1960] 1 WLR 733 ... 42
- Hui Chi-ming [1992] 1 AC 34, (1992) 94 Cr App R 236, PC ... 213, 219
- Hulbert (1979) 69 Cr App R 243, CA ... 1035
- Hulme v DPP [2006] EWHC 1347, DC ... 815
- Humphreys [1977] Crim LR 225, CA ... 750
- Humphreys and Turner [1965] 3 All ER 689, Liverpool CC ... 220
- Hunt (1825) 1 Mood CC 93 ... 694
- Hunt (1977) 66 Cr App R 105, CA ... 1082, 1084
- Hunt [1987] AC 352 ... 24, 27
- Hunt (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 87, [1994] Crim LR 747, [1994] STC 819 ... 994, 995

- Hunt v Duckering [1993] Crim LR 678, DC ... 28
- Hunter [1972] Crim LR 369 ... 656
- Hunter [2015] All ER (D) 196 (Jan) ... 321, 732
- Hunter v Canary Wharf [1997] 2 All ER 426 ... 734
- Huntingdon Life Sciences v Curtin (1997) The Times, 11 Dec [1998] Env LR D9 ... 741
- Huntingdon Life Sciences v Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty [2003] EWHC 1967 (QB) ... 260
- Hurst [1995] 1 Cr App R 82 ... 353, 355
- Hursthouse [2011] EWCA Crim 3064 ... 942
- Huskinson [1988] Crim LR 620, DC ... 499, 862
- Hussain [1969] 2 QB 567, [1969] Crim LR 433 ... 122
- Hussain [2002] EWCA Crim 6, [2002] Crim LR 407 ... 444, 458, 1056
- Hussain [2008] EWCA Crim 1117 ... 350, 357
- Hussain [2012] EWCA Crim 188 ... 597
- Hussein [1978] Crim LR 219, CA ... 448
- Hussein v Chong Fook Kam [1970] AC 942 ... 115, 1063
- Hussey (1924) 18 Cr App R 160, CCA ... 405
- Hussey (1977) 67 Cr App R 131n, [1978] Crim LR 219 ... 420, 421, 892
- Hutchins [1988] Crim LR 379 ... 321, 723
- Hutchins [2011] EWCA Crim 1056 ... 257
- Hutchinson v Newbury Magistrates' Court (2000) The Independent, 20 Nov ... 1088
- Hyam v DPP [1975] AC 55, [1974] Crim LR 365 ... 70, 90, 96, 97, 131, 514, 517, 596
- Hyde (1991) 92 Cr App R 131 ... 213
- Hysa [2007] EWCA Crim 2056 ... 766
- IA [2005] EWCA Crim 2077, [2006] Crim LR 79 ... 288
- Ibrahim [2014] EWCA Crim 121 ... 383, 386
- Ibrams (1981) 74 Cr App R 154 ... 529
- Ibrar [2017] EWCA Crim 1841 ... 186, 201
- ICR Haulage Ltd [1944] KB 551, CCA ... 249, 438, 601
- Idress [2011] EWHC 624 (Admin) ... 934
- IK [2007] EWCA Crim 491, [2007] 1 WLR 2262, [2007] Crim LR 645 ... 995, 1058, 1059, 1061
- Ikpong [1972] Crim LR 432, CA ... 1040
- Ikrum [2008] EWCA Crim 586, [2008] Crim LR 912 ... 635
- IM v LM [2014] EWCA Civ 37 ... 815
- Inglis [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243 ... 58, 86, 94, 100, 511, 627, 629
- Ingram [1975] Crim LR 457, CA ... 870
- Innes v Wylie (1844) 1 Car & Kir 257 ... 663
- Instant [1893] 1 QB 450 ... 52
- Invicta Plastics Ltd v Clare [1976] RTR 251, [1976] Crim LR 131, DC ... 480
- IP [2004] EWCA Crim 2646 ... 820
- Iqbal [2011] EWCA Crim 273 ... 667
- Iqbal v DPP (2004) All ER (D) 314 (Oct) ... 1034
- Iqbal v Prison Officers Association [2009] EWCA Civ 1312 ... 719, 722
- Ireland [1998] AC 147, [1997] 4 All ER 225 ... 49, 50, 658, 661, 662, 673, 688, 691, 692, 734
- Iremonger v Wynne [1957] Crim LR 624 ... 192
- Isitt [1978] Crim LR 159, CA ... 40
- Ismail [1977] Crim LR 557, CA ... 238, 1050
- Ismail [2005] EWCA Crim 397 ... 789
- Isted v CPS (1997) 162 JP 513, DC ... 1081
- Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd (t/a Crockfords) [2017] UKSC 67 ... 468–9, 851, 870, 871, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879–84, 924, 930, 931, 932, 959, 986, 987, 995, 1003, 1051
- Izod (1904) 20 Cox CC 690 ... 507
- J [2000] 1 FCR 307, CA (Civ) ... 680
- J [2004] UKHL 42 ... 805
- JF Alford Transport Ltd [1997] 2 Cr App R 326, [1997] Crim LR 745 ... 193, 197, 249, 603
- J Lyons and Sons v Wilkins [1899] 1 Ch 255 ... 1004
- Jackson (1673) 1 Hale PC 464 ... 226
- Jackson [1985] Crim LR 442, CA ... 449
- Jackson [1985] RTR 257 ... 383, 396
- Jackson [2006] EWCA Crim 2380 ... 153, 170
- Jackson-Mason [2014] EWCA Crim 1993 ... 959
- Jaggard v Dickinson [1981] QB 527, [1980] 3 All ER 716 ... 324, 913, 1080
- Jakeman (1982) 76 Cr App R 223, [1983] Crim LR 104 ... 125
- Jama [2004] EWCA Crim 960 ... 525
- James (1837) 8 C & P 131 ... 380, 1080
- James [1997] Crim LR 598 ... 900
- James [2002] EWCA Crim 1119 ... 460
- James v CPS [2009] EWHC 2925 (Admin) ... 736
- James and Ashford (1985) 82 Cr App R 226 ... 480
- James and Karimi [2006] EWCA Crim 14, [2006] 1 Cr App R 29 (440) ... 544
- James & Son Ltd v Smee [1955] 1 QB 78, DC ... 156, 267
- Janaway [2014] EWCA Crim 1073 ... 284
- Janjua [1999] 1 Cr App R 91 ... 513, 691
- Jarman [1946] KB 74 ... 41
- Jarvis, Langdon and Stear (1837) 2 Nood & R 40 ... 694
- JB v DPP [2012] EWHC 72 (Admin) ... 173, 174
- Jeff and Bassett (1966) 51 Cr App R 28, CA ... 950
- Jenkins [1983] 1 All ER 1000, [1983] Crim LR 386, CA ... 1018, 1019
- Jenkins [2012] EWCA Crim 2909 ... 65
- Jennings [1990] Crim LR 588 ... 571, 572
- Jepson v Chief Constable of Mercia Police [2003] EWHC 3318, QB ... 650, 651
- Jewell [2014] EWCA Crim 414 ... 525, 527, 529
- JF [2015] EWCA Crim 351 ... 569, 571, 576, 578, 598
- JF Alford Transport Ltd [1997] 2 Cr App R 326, [1997] Crim LR 745 ... 193, 197, 249, 603
- JG [2006] EWCA Crim 1812 ... 310
- Jheeta [2007] EWCA Crim 1699 ... 672, 758, 778, 779, 780
- Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [2013] EWCA Crim 1344 ... 90, 176, 177, 180, 181, 183, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 191, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 205, 206, 207, 209, 210, 214–18, 224, 226, 229, 234, 422, 477, 482, 485
- John Henshall (Quarries) Ltd v Harvey [1965] 2 QB 233 ... 250, 275
- Johnson [1980] 1 WLR 740 ... 531
- Johnson [2016] EWCA Crim 1613 ... 204, 218
- Johnson [2007] EWCA Crim 1978, [2008] Crim LR 132 ... 291, 300
- Johnson [2017] EWCA Crim 189, [2017] Crim LR 483 ... 153, 155
- Johnson v DPP [1994] Crim LR 673, DC ... 1082
- Johnson v DPP [2008] EWHC 509 (Admin) ... 700, 702

- Johnson v Phillips [1976] 1 WLR 65, [1975] 3 All ER 682, [1975] Crim LR 580, DC ... 368, 705
- Johnson v Youden [1950] 1 KB 544 ... 205, 206
- Johnson and Jones (1841) Car & M 218 ... 226
- Johnston [2003] All ER (D) 266 (Jun) ... 774
- Johnstone [2003] 1 WLR 1736, [2004] Crim LR 244 ... 24
- Johnstone [2007] EWCA Crim 3133 ... 581
- Jolie [2004] EWCA Crim 1543 ... 753, 754, 1023
- Jones (1832) 4 B & Ad 345 ... 435
- Jones (1849) 3 Cox CC 441 ... 689
- Jones [1949] 1 KB 194 ... 240
- Jones [1987] Crim LR 123, CA ... 680
- Jones (1990) 91 Cr App R 351 ... 427
- Jones [1995] 1 Cr App R 262, [1995] Crim LR 416 ... 128
- Jones [2003] EWCA Crim 894 ... 1082, 1083, 1084, 1088
- Jones [2004] EWCA Crim 1981, [2005] Crim LR 122 ... 367, 371, 396, 398, 427
- Jones [2005] QB 259 ... 1081
- Jones [2006] UKHL 16 ... 19, 1087
- Jones [2007] EWCA Crim 1118, [2007] Crim LR 979 ... 481, 616, 823
- Jones et al [2006] UKHL 16 ... 16
- Jones v Bedford and Mid-Bedfordshire Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 523 (Admin) ... 699, 701, 739
- Jones v Sherwood [1942] 1 KB 127, DC ... 659
- Jones (and Ayliffe) [2006] UKHL 16, [2007] AC 136 ... 1089
- Jones and Mirrless (1977) 65 Cr App R 250, CA ... 194
- Jones and Smith [1976] 3 All ER 54, CA ... 1011, 1012, 1013
- Jones and Warburton [2002] EWCA Crim 735 ... 454
- Jones (Stephen) (1999) The Times, 20 May, CA ... 1089
- Jordan (1956) 40 Cr App R 152 ... 64, 76, 77, 78, 83
- Jordan [2006] EWCA Crim 3311 ... 809
- Joseph [2017] EWCA Crim 36, [2017] Crim LR 817 ... 347-8
- Joyce v DPP [1946] AC 347 ... 31
- JTB [2009] UKHL 20 ... 18, 800
- Jura [1954] 1 QB 503, [1954] 1 All ER 696, CA ... 750
- K (1983) 78 Cr App R 82, [1983] Crim LR 736, CA ... 356, 360
- K [1997] 1 WLR 1406 ... 303-4
- K [2000] 1 All ER 833 ... 152
- K [2001] UKHL 41, HL (see also R v K) 155, 158, 791
- K [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] Crim LR 993 ... 110, 151, 152, 273, 332, 334, 709, 806, 824, 958
- K [2004] EWCA Crim 2685, [2005] Crim LR 298 ... 468
- K [2006] EWCA Crim 2183 ... 153
- K [2008] EWCA Crim 1923 ... 790, 795
- K [2009] EWCA Crim 1931 ... 425, 428
- K [2009] EWCA Crim 2117 ... 805
- K A Smith [1983] Crim LR 739, CC ... 433, 632
- K Ltd v National Westminster Bank Plc [2006] EWCA Civ 1039 ... 118, 199, 1063
- Kai-Whitewind [2005] EWCA Crim 1092, [2006] Crim LR 348 ... 631, 633
- Kaitamaki [1985] AC 147 ... 788
- Kamki [2013] EWCA Crim 2335 ... 765, 766
- Kanwar [1982] 2 All ER 528, 75 Cr App R 87 ... 1042, 1043, 1044
- Kapitene [2010] EWCA Crim 2061 ... 942
- Karpavicius [2002] UKPC 59 ... 458
- Katsonis v CPS [2011] EWHC 1860 (Admin) ... 665
- Kavanagh v Hiscock [1974] QB 600 ... 708
- Kay v Butterworth (1945) 173 LT 191 ... 38, 41, 309
- Kay and Joyce [2017] EWCA Crim 647 ... 553, 561, 562, 564
- Kayani [2011] EWCA Crim 2871, [2012] Crim LR 232 ... 725, 729, 730
- Kazi [2010] EWCA Crim 2026 ... 971
- Keane [2010] EWCA Crim 2514, [2011] Crim LR 393 ... 382, 389, 390, 402, 531
- Kearns [2002] EWCA Crim 748, [2003] 1 Cr App R 7, [2002] Crim LR 653 ... 149
- Keate (1697) Comb 406 ... 569
- Keatley [1980] Crim LR 505 ... 984
- Keen [2008] EWCA Crim 1000 ... 75, 581
- Kelleher [2003] EWCA Crim 2486 ... 1086, 1088
- Kellett v DPP [2001] EWHC Admin 107 ... 739
- Kelly (1820) Russ & Ry 421 ... 191
- Kelly [1992] Crim LR 181, CA ... 427
- Kelly [1993] 97 Cr App R 245, [1993] Crim LR 763 ... 1024
- Kelly [1998] 3 All ER 741 ... 854, 868
- Kelly v DPP [2003] Crim LR 43, DC ... 736
- Kelly v Kelly [1997] SLT 896 ... 655
- Kelt [1977] 3 All ER 1099, [1977] Crim LR 556 ... 1028
- Kemp [1957] 1 QB 399 ... 293, 294, 295
- Kemp (1986) The Times, 3 May ... 308, 567
- Kendall v DPP [2008] EWHC 1848 (Admin) ... 702
- Kenlin v Gardiner [1967] 2 QB 510 ... 402, 667, 707
- Kennedy (1993) 15 Cr App R (S) 141 ... 576
- Kennedy (No 1) [1999] 1 Cr App R 54, [1998] Crim LR 739 [1999] Crim LR 65 ... 577, 618, 714
- Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38, [2008] 1 AC 269, [2008] Crim LR 222 ... 73, 74, 75, 82, 178, 180, 181, 182, 183, 188, 190, 570, 571, 577, 581, 582, 587, 609, 622, 714, 715, 934
- Kenning [2008] EWCA Crim 1534 ... 185, 218, 451, 452
- Kensington International Ltd v Republic of Congo (formerly People's Republic of Congo) [2008] 1 WLR 1144 ... 930, 1062
- Kent and Sussex Contractors [1944] KB 146 ... 252
- Keogh [2007] EWCA Crim 528 ... 148
- Kerr v DPP [1995] Crim LR 394 ... 705
- Kewell [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 38 ... 1002
- Khan (1990) 91 Cr App R 29, [1990] Crim LR 519, CA ... 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 457, 499
- Khan [1998] Crim LR 830 ... 588, 714
- Khan [2001] EWCA Crim 923 ... 901
- Khan [2009] EWCA Crim 1569 ... 558, 565
- Khan [2012] EWCA Crim 2032 ... 1105
- Khan [2018] EWCA Crim 78 ... 355, 357
- Khan and others [2009] EWCA Crim 2, [2009] Crim LR 348 ... 637, 638, 639, 640
- Kimber [1983] 3 All ER 316, [1983] Crim LR 630 ... 351, 383
- Kimel [2016] EWCA Crim 1456 ... 63
- Kimsey [1996] Crim LR 35 ... 67, 194
- King (1817) Russ & Ry 332 ... 191
- King [1938] 2 All ER 662, CCA ... 1036, 1042

- King [1964] 1 QB 285 ... 334
King [1979] Crim LR 122 ... 946
King [2012] EWCA Crim 805 ... 455
King v DPP 20 June 2000, DC ... 739
King v Hodges [1974] Crim LR 424 ... 707
King v Lees (1948) 65 TLR 21, DC ... 1071
Kingston [1994] 3 WLR 519, [1994] 3 All ER 353, HL ... 88
Kingston [1995] 2 AC 355, [1994] Crim LR 846 ... 147, 313, 314
Kirk [2008] EWCA Crim 434 ... 760
Kirk and Russell [2002] EWCA Crim 1580 ... 806
Kirkham v Chief Constable of the Greater Manchester Police [1990] 2 QB 283, CA ... 685
Kirkland v Robinson [1987] Crim LR 643, DC ... 165
Kite and OLL Ltd, Winchester CC, 8 Dec 1994, The Independent, 9 Dec 1994 ... 600
Klass [1998] 1 Cr App R 453, CA ... 1023
Kleijn [2001] All ER (D) 143 (May) ... 358
Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1999] 2 AC 349 ... 863, 864
Klineberg and Marsden [1999] Crim LR 419 ... 859
Knights (1860) 2 F & F 46 ... 507
Knight's Appeal, re (1968) FLR 81 ... 694
Knightsbridge Crown Court, ex p Foot [1999] RTR 21 ... 480
Knowles [2013] EWCA Crim 646 ... 964
Knowles v Department for Business Enterprise and Regulatory Reform [2009] EWHC 3899 (Admin) ... 257
Knox v Anderton (1982) 76 Cr App R 156, [1983] Crim LR 114, DC ... 753
Knüller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1973] AC 435, [1975] Crim LR 704 ... 10, 445, 472, 473
Koch v Germany [2013] 1 FCR 595 ... 626
Kohn (1979) 69 Cr App R 395, CA ... 842, 846
Kohn [1997] 2 Cr App R 445, [1997] Crim LR 761 ... 844
Komaroni and Rogerson (1953) 103 L Jo 97 ... 429
Konzani [2005] EWCA Crim 706 ... 668, 670, 671, 672, 683, 762
Kooken (1981) 74 Cr App R 30 ... 566
Kopsch (1925) 19 Cr App R 50, CCA ... 302
Korniak (1983) 76 Cr App R 145, CA ... 1035
Kosar v Bank of Scotland [2011] EWHC 1050 (Admin) ... 738
Kousar [2009] EWCA Crim 139 ... 194, 1044
Krause (1902) 66 JP 121 ... 616
Kray [1970] 1 QB 125, [1969] 3 All ER 941 ... 362
Krgozlu v MPC [2006] EWCA Civ 1691 ... 722
Kuchenmeister v Home Office [1958] 1 QB 496 ... 720
Kuchhadia [2015] EWCA Crim 1252 ... 1059
Kumar, re [2000] Crim LR 504, DC ... 861
Kumar [2005] EWCA Crim 1979, [2005] Crim LR 470 ... 995
Kwan Ping Bang [1979] AC 609, 615, [1979] Crim LR 245 ... 157
Kylsant [1932] 1 KB 442 ... 989
- L [2006] EWCA Crim 2225 ... 808
L [2008] EWCA Crim 1970, [2009] Crim LR 381 ... 259, 260
L [2010] EWCA Crim 1249 ... 65
L v CPS [2008] 1 Cr App R 8 ... 1030
L v CPS [2013] EWHC 4127 (Admin) ... 194
L v DPP [2003] QB 137 ... 749
L v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority [2008] EWHC 2149 (Fam) ... 869
Lahaye [2005] EWCA Crim 2847 ... 696
Laing [1995] Crim LR 395 ... 1016
Lal [2010] EWCA Crim 2393 ... 360
Lamb [1967] 2 QB 981 ... 135, 570, 571, 572, 574
Lamb [1990] Crim LR 58, DC ... 707
Lamb [2007] EWCA Crim 1766 ... 813
Lamb v DPP [2009] EWHC 238 (Admin) ... 1046
Lambert [1972] Crim LR 422, Newcastle CC ... 1002
Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2001] Crim LR 806 ... 20, 24, 160, 163, 164, 315, 972
Lambert [2009] EWCA Crim 2860 ... 997, 1000, 1002, 1003
Lambie [1982] AC 449 ... 926, 947
Lancaster [2010] EWCA Crim 370, [2010] Crim LR 776 ... 934, 984, 985
Land [1999] QB 65, [1998] Crim LR 70 ... 152
Landy (1981) 72 Cr App R 237, [1981] Crim LR 326, CA ... 468
Lane and Lane (1985) 82 Cr App R 5, [1985] Crim LR 789 ... 196, 634
Lang v Evans (Inspector of Police) [1977] Crim LR 286 ... 1035
Langford (1842) Car & M 602 ... 1077
Langmead (1864) Le & Ca 427 ... 1052
Lankford [1959] Crim LR 209 ... 434
Lapier (1784) 1 Leach 320 ... 899
Larsonneur (1933) 24 Cr App R 74 ... 43, 44, 146, 167, 345
Larter [1995] Crim LR 75 ... 666, 774
Lashley [2017] EWCA Crim 260 ... 691
Latif [1996] 1 WLR 104, [1996] 2 Cr App R 92, [1996] Crim LR 414 ... 72, 433, 609
Latimer (1886) 17 QBD 359 ... 123
Lau [2000] Crim LR 580, [2000] 1 FLR 799 ... 737, 738
Lavercombe [1988] Crim LR 435 ... 443
Laverty [1970] 3 All ER 432 ... 937
Lawrence [1972] AC 626, [1971] 2 All ER 1253, HL ... 830, 832, 835, 836
Lawrence [1982] AC 510, [1981] Crim LR 409 ... 106, 109, 113, 137, 206, 593
Lawrence [1982] AC 626 ... 103
Lawrence and Pomroy (1971) 57 Cr App R 64, CA ... 998, 1006
Laws v Eltringham (1881) 8 QBD 283, DC ... 1070, 1073
Layton (1849) 4 Cox CC 149 ... 302
Le Brun [1992] QB 61, (1991) 94 Cr App R 101 ... 69, 126, 127
Le Vine v DPP [2010] EWHC 1128 (Admin) ... 1020
Leather (1993) 98 Cr App R 179 ... 732
Leaver [2006] EWCA Crim 2988 ... 788
Lederman [2015] EWCA Crim 1308 ... 284
Ledger (1862) 2 F & F 857 ... 65
Lee [2001] Cr App R 293 ... 340, 704
Lee [2006] EWCA Crim 240 ... 194, 1054
Lee v Lee's Air Farming Ltd [1961] AC 12, PC ... 440
Lee Cheung Wing v R (1991) 94 Cr App R 355, [1992] Crim LR 440, PC ... 987, 988

- Lee Chun-Chuen v R [1963] AC 220 ... 520, 524
 Leedham, No 200200135/Y3 ... 988
 Leer [1982] Crim LR 310 ... 749, 751
 Leeson [2000] 1 Cr App R 233, [2000] Crim LR 195 ... 31
 Leigh (1775) 1 Car and Kir 28n ... 444
 Leigh v Gladstone (1909) 26 TLR 129 ... 368
 Lemon and Gay News Ltd see Whitehouse v Gay News Ltd and Lemon
 Lemsatel [1977] 1 WLR 812 ... 707
 Lennard's Carrying Co Ltd v Asiatic Petroleum Co Ltd [1915] AC 705 ... 249
 Leonard [2012] EWCA Crim 277 ... 973
 Less (1993) The Times, 30 Mar ... 995
 Lester (1976) 63 Cr App R 144, [1976] Crim LR 389 ... 170
 Letenock (1917) 12 Cr App R 221, CCA ... 535
 Leverick et al [2015] Crim LR 177 ... 147
 Lewin v CPS [2002] EWHC Crim 1049 ... 56
 Lewis [1970] Crim LR 647, CA ... 80, 661, 692
 Lewis (1987) 87 Cr App R 270, [1988] Crim LR 517 ... 163, 164, 972
 Lewis (1993) 96 Cr App R 412 ... 356, 358, 359, 360
 Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 151 ... 81, 572, 581, 662
 Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 496 ... 213, 579
 Lewis and others [2017] EWCA Crim 1734 ... 176, 177
 Lewis v Cox [1985] QB 509, [1984] 3 All ER 672 ... 712
 Lewis v Dickson [1976] RTR 431, [1976] Crim LR 442, DC ... 379
 Lewis v Lethbridge [1987] Crim LR 59, DC ... 862
 Liangsiriraset (Somchai) v United States Government (1991) 92 Cr App R 77, PC ... 434, 454, 461
 Liaquat Ali and others [2005] EWCA Crim 87, [2005] 2 Cr App R 864 ... 114
 Lidar [2000] 4 Archbold News 3 ... 597
 Liepins v Spearman [1985] Crim LR 229 ... 705
 Light (1915) 11 Cr App Rep 111 ... 926
 Lim Chin Aik v R [1963] AC 160, [1963] 1 All ER 223, PC ... 44, 129, 161, 170, 409
 Lindsay [2002] 1 Cr App R (S) 370 ... 1112
 Lindo [2016] EWCA Crim 1940 ... 553, 564
 Linskar [2009] All ER (D) 263 (Nov) ... 819
 Linekar [1995] QB 250, [1995] 2 Cr App R 49, [1995] Crim LR 320 ... 778, 968
 Lines (1844) 1 C & K 393 ... 789
 Linneker [1906] 2 KB 99, CCR ... 423
 Linnett v Metropolitan Police Comr [1946] KB 290 ... 270
 Linsberg (1905) 69 JP 107 ... 719
 Lipman [1970] 1 QB 152 ... 33, 37, 318, 320, 321, 323, 573
 Lister [2005] EWCA Crim 1903 ... 805
 Lister v Hesley Hall Ltd [2001] UKHL 22, [2002] 1 AC 215 ... 267
 Lister & Co v Stubbs (1890) 45 Ch D 1 ... 862
 Litchfield [1998] Crim LR 508 ... 585, 589, 593
 Litholetovs [2002] EWCA Crim 1154 ... 427
 Little [2012] EWCA Crim 3099 ... 818
 Liu and Tan [2006] EWCA Crim 3321 ... 637
 Livesey [2006] EWCA Crim 3344 ... 743
 Lloyd [1967] 1 QB 175, [1966] 1 All ER 107n ... 556
 Lloyd [1985] QB 829 ... 887, 897
 Lloyd [1991] Crim LR 904, DC ... 1072
 Lloyd [1992] Crim LR 361 ... 1041
 Lloyd v DPP [1992] 1 All ER 982, DC ... 1071, 1084
 Lloyd v Grace, Smith & Co [1912] AC 716, HL ... 267
 Loake v CPS [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin) ... 136, 167, 299, 303, 304, 737, 739
 Lobell [1957] 1 QB 547 ... 27
 Lock v Ashton (1848) 12 QB 871 ... 721
 Lockley [1995] Crim LR 656 ... 900
 Lockwood [1986] Crim LR 244 ... 883
 Lockyer v Gibb [1967] 2 QB 243 ... 162, 163, 170
 Logdon v DPP [1976] Crim LR 121, DC ... 661, 662
 Loizou [2005] EWCA 1579, [2005] 2 Cr App R 37 ... 1061, 1062
 Lomas v Peck [1947] 2 All ER 574 ... 156
 London and Globe Finance Corp Ltd [1903] 1 Ch 728 ... 462, 940
 London Borough of Harrow v Shah [2000] Crim LR 692, DC ... 159
 Longman and Cribben (1981) 72 Cr App R 121 ... 220, 460
 Looseley [2001] UKHL 53, [2002] 1 Cr App R 360 ... 231
 Lord Baltimore's case (1768) 1 Black, W 648 ... 788
 Loukes [1996] Crim LR 341 ... 224
 Love [2013] EWCA Crim 257 ... 1019
 Lovelace v DPP [1954] 1 WLR 1468 ... 273
 Lovick [1993] Crim LR 890 ... 441
 Low [1997] Crim LR 692 ... 772
 Low v Bleas [1975] Crim LR 513, DC ... 850, 851, 1018
 Lowe [1973] QB 702, [1973] 1 All ER 805 ... 575
 Lowe, unreported (2005) ... 296
 Luc Thiet Thuan v R [1996] 2 All ER 1033 ... 543
 Lucena v Craufurd (1806) 2 Bos & PNR 269, HL ... 1075
 Ludlow v Burgess [1971] Crim LR 238, CA ... 706, 707, 719
 Luffman [2008] EWCA Crim 1739 ... 187, 189
 Lunn [2017] EWCA Crim 34 ... 995
 Lush v Coles [1967] 1 WLR 685 ... 994
 Lyddaman [2006] EWCA Crim 383 ... 794
 Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland [1975] AC 653, [1975] 1 All ER 913 ... 187, 198, 321, 358, 362, 363
 Lyndsey [1995] 3 All ER 654 ... 659, 660
 M [2003] EWCA Crim 357, [2003] 2 Cr App R 21 ... 287
 M [2003] EWCA Crim 1170 ... 372
 M [2003] EWCA Crim 3067 ... 618
 M [2003] EWCA Crim 3452 ... 282
 M [2004] UKHL 50, [2005] Crim LR 479 ... 1027
 M [2007] EWCA Crim 218 ... 970
 M [2007] EWCA Crim 3228 ... 350
 M [2009] EWCA Crim 2615 ... 155
 M [2011] EWCA Crim 2752, [2012] Crim LR 789 ... 804
 M [2014] EWCA Civ 37 ... 763
 M [2015] EWCA Crim 162 ... 780
 M v DPP [2009] EWHC 525 (Admin) ... 1046
 M, K and H [2001] EWCA Crim 2024, [2002] Crim LR 57 ... 284
 M (J) [2012] EWCA Crim 2293 ... 579
 M (ZM) [2007] EWCA Crim 376 ... 399
 McAllister [1997] Crim LR 233 ... 793

- McAngus [1994] Crim LR 602, DC ... 1027
 McAuley [2009] EWCA Crim 2130 ... 406, 752
 McBride [1962] 2 QB 167 ... 41
 McBride v Turnock [1964] Crim LR 456, DC ... 708
 McCaffery [2014] EWCA Crim 2550 ... 491
 McCalla (1988) 87 Cr App R 372 ... 753, 754
 McCann (1971) 56 Cr App R 359 ... 232
 McCann [2006] EWCA Crim 1078 ... 820, 1081
 McCarthy [1964] Crim LR 225 ... 207
 MacCarthy [1967] 1 QB 68 ... 284
 Maccuish (1999) 6 Archbold News 2, CA ... 1010
 McCullum (1973) 57 Cr App R 645 ... 1051
 McDonald (1980) 70 Cr App R 288, CA ... 525, 1035
 McDonald [2016] EWCA Crim 1529 ... 531
 McDonnell [1966] 1 QB 233 ... 249, 440
 McEneff [2014] EWCA Crim 1633 ... 1010
 McEvilly (1973) 60 Cr App R 150 ... 232
 McGee [2013] EWCA Crim 1012 ... 585
 McGhee [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923 ... 309
 McGill [1970] RTR 209, CA ... 910, 912
 McGill v Shepherd, unreported ... 848
 McGillivray [2005] Crim LR 484, CA ... 698
 McGrath [2003] EWCA Crim 2062, [2004] Crim LR 142 ... 1008
 McGrory [2013] EWCA Crim 2336 ... 527, 546
 M'Growther (1746) Fost 13 ... 348, 355, 361
 McHugh and Tringham (1988) 88 Cr App R 385, CA ... 866
 McLnnes [1971] 3 All ER 295 ... 399
 McLvor [1982] 1 All ER 491, [1982] 1 WLR 409 ... 468
 Mackalley's case (1611) 9 Co Rep 61b ... 177
 McKechnie (1992) Cr App R 51, [1992] Crim LR 194 ... 68, 75, 78
 McKenna v Harding (1905) 69 JP 354 ... 271
 McKenzie [2011] EWCA Crim 1550 ... 285
 Mackie [1973] Crim LR 54 ... 80, 692
 McKinley [1994] Crim LR 944 ... 313
 Macklin and Murphy's case (1838) 2 Lew CC 225 ... 183
 McKnight (2000) The Times, 5 May ... 313
 McKnight v Davies [1974] RTR 4, DC ... 910, 912
 McKoy [2002] EWCA Crim 1628 ... 402, 667, 704
 M'Loughlin (1838) 8 C & P 635 ... 689
 McMenemy [2009] EWCA Crim 42 ... 712
 McMillan v CPS [2008] EWHC 1457 (Admin) ... 668
 McMinn v McMinn [2006] 3 All ER 87 ... 910
 M'Naghten (1843) 4 St Tr NS 847, (1843) 10 Cl & Fin 200 ... 291, 293, 295, 296, 299, 300, 301, 302, 304, 316, 327, 328, 330, 503, 566, 653
 McNally [2013] EWCA Crim 1051 ... 762, 768, 777
 McNamara (1988) 87 Cr App R 246, [1988] Crim LR 440 ... 163, 972
 McNamara [2009] EWCA Crim 2530 ... 197
 MacPherson [1973] RTR 157, CA ... 322, 913
 MacPherson and Watts [1985] Crim LR 508, CA ... 466
 McReadie and Tume (1992) 96 Cr App R 143, [1992] Crim LR 872, CA ... 851
 M'Rue (1838) 8 C & P 641 ... 789
 McShane (1977) 66 Cr App R 97, [1977] Crim LR 737, CA ... 620, 715
 Madan (1961) 45 Cr App R 80 ... 1035
 Maddocks [2006] EWCA Crim 3112 ... 394
 Maddox v Storer [1963] 1 QB 451 ... 748, 749
 Magee v CPS [2014] EWHC 4089 (Admin) ... 325, 1080
 Maginnis [1987] AC 303 ... 978
 Magira [2008] EWCA Crim 1939 ... 646
 Magna Plant Ltd v Mitchell [1966] Crim LR 394 ... 250
 Maidstone Borough Council v Mortimer [1980] 3 All ER 552, DC ... 157, 165
 Mainwaring [2002] FSR 20 ... 852, 860
 Majrowski v Guy's and St Thomas' Hospital [2006] UKHL 34, [2007] 1 AC 224 ... 734, 738
 Malcherek [1981] 2 All ER 422, [1981] 1 WLR 690 ... 63, 67, 71, 77, 78, 508
 Malcolm v DPP [2007] EWHC 363 (Admin), [2007] Crim LR 894 ... 356
 Mallett [1978] 3 All ER 10, [1978] 1 WLR 820, CA ... 983, 984
 Malnik [1989] Crim LR 451, DC ... 743, 752
 Malone [1998] 2 Cr App R 447, [1988] Crim LR 843 ... 766, 774
 Mancini v DPP [1942] AC 1, HL ... 27
 Mandair [1995] AC 208, [1994] Crim LR 666, HL ... 50, 696
 Mandry and Wooster [1973] 3 All ER 996 ... 951
 Mangham [2013] 1 Cr App R (S) 62 ... 1105
 Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Unipolaris Shipping Co Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 743, HL ... 157, 954
 Manley (1844) 1 Cox CC 104 ... 183
 Mann [2011] EWCA Crim 3292 ... 529
 Manning (1671) T Raym 212 ... 538
 Manning [1998] Crim LR 198 ... 755
 Manning [1998] 2 Cr App R 461, [1999] Crim LR 151 ... 982
 Manning and Rogers (1871) LR 1 CCR 338 ... 1013, 1014
 Mansell v Griffin [1908] 1 KB 160 ... 685
 Mansfield [1975] Crim LR 101, CA ... 811, 1030
 Mansfield Justices, ex p Sharkey [1985] QB 613, DC ... 659
 Manutzfarg v Freightliner [2007] EWCA Civ 910 ... 961
 Marcantonio and Chitolie [2016] EWCA Crim 14 ... 283
 Marchant and McAllister (1985) 80 Cr App R 361 ... 909
 Marchese [2008] EWCA Crim 389, [2008] Crim LR 797 ... 618
 Marcus [1981] 2 All ER 833, [1981] Crim LR 490, CA ... 646, 714
 Mark [1961] Crim LR 173 ... 708, 709
 Mark [2004] EWCA Crim 2490 ... 593
 Marks [1998] Crim LR 676 ... 524
 Marlow (1964) 49 Cr App R 49 ... 646, 714
 Marlow [1997] Crim LR 897, [1998] 1 Cr App R (S) 273 ... 480
 Marrinan v Vibart [1963] 1 QB 528, [1962] 3 All ER 380 ... 721
 Marriott (1838) 8 C & P 425 ... 52
 Marriott [1971] 1 WLR 187 ... 164
 Marsh [1997] 1 Cr App R 67, [1997] Crim LR 205 ... 66, 917
 Marsh [2012] EWCA Crim 1442 ... 689
 Marsh v DPP [2015] EW HC 1022 (Admin), [2015] Crim LR 713 ... 401

- Marsh v Loader (1863) 14 CBNS 535 ... 342
 Marshall [1977] Crim LR 106 ... 1035
 Marshall [1998] 2 Cr App R 282 ... 856, 861, 891
 Marshall [2009] EWCA Crim 2076 ... 964
 Martin (1832) 5 C & P 128 ... 510
 Martin (1881) 8 QBD 54, CCR ... 663, 692
 Martin [2006] UKHL 16, [2007] Crim LR 66 ... 367
 Martin [2010] EWCA Crim 1450 ... 192, 194
 Martin [2013] EWCA Crim 1420 ... 1103, 1112
 Martin [2017] EWCA Crim 1359 ... 524, 527, 530, 533
 Martin (Anthony) [2001] EWCA Crim 2245, [2002] Crim LR 136 ... 385
 Martin (Colin) [1989] 1 All ER 652, [1989] Crim LR 284 ... 350, 365, 372, 378
 Martin (DP) [2000] 2 Cr App R 42, [2000] Crim LR 615, CA (Archbold News [2000] Issue 7, p. 6) ... 351, 352, 353, 385
 Martin v Marsh [1955] Crim LR 781 ... 855
 Martin v Watson [1996] 1 AC 74 ... 721
 Martindale (1886) 84 Cr App R 31 ... 754
 Mashta [2010] EWCA Crim 2595 ... 957
 Mason (1756) Fost 132 ... 401
 Mason [2005] All ER (D) 04 (Feb) ... 1079
 Mason v DPP [2009] EWHC 2198 (Admin) ... 428
 Masters [2007] EWCA Crim 142 ... 30, 79
 Masterson (1996) CA 94/2221/X5 ... 987
 Mastin (1834) 6 C & P 396 ... 194
 Matheson [1958] 2 All ER 87, 42 Cr App R 145 ... 305
 Mathew [2010] EWCA Crim 29 ... 696
 Matrix [1997] 8 Archbold News ... 336
 Matthews [1950] 1 All ER 137, CCA ... 1051
 Matthews, Oct 1996, unreported ... 789
 Matthews [2008] EWCA Crim 423 ... 995
 Matthews and Alleyne [2003] EWCA Crim 192, [2003] 2 Cr App R 30, [2003] Crim LR 553 ... 93, 94, 201, 513
 Mattis v Pollock [2003] EWCA Civ 887 ... 267
 Matudi [2003] EWCA Crim 697 ... 153, 158, 159
 Maughan (2016) unreported ... 178
 Mavji (1987) 84 Cr App R 34, [1987] Crim LR 39 ... 47, 993, 994
 Mawji v R [1957] AC 126, [1957] 1 All ER 385, PC ... 441
 Maxwell (1909) 73 JP 176, (1909) 2 Cr App R 26 ... 708
 Maxwell [2017] EWCA Crim 1233, [2018] Crim LR 60 ... 828
 Maxwell-King [2000] All ER (D) 1957, (2001) The Times, 2 Jan ... 480
 May (1867) 10 Cox CC 448 ... 655
 May (1989) 91 Cr App R 157, [1990] Crim LR 415, CA ... 435
 May and Butcher Ltd v R [1934] 2 KB 17n, HL ... 438
 Mayhew v Suttle (1854) 4 E & B 347 ... 1013
 Mayling [1963] 2 QB 717, CCA ... 473
 Mazeau (1840) 9 C & P 676 ... 183
 Mazo [1996] Crim LR 435 ... 833
 MB [2010] EWCA Crim 1684 ... 284
 MB (An Adult: Medical Treatment) [1997] 2 FCR 541 ... 669
 Mba [2012] EWCA Crim 2773 ... 772
 Mbagwu [2007] EWCA Crim 1068 ... 102
 MD [2004] EWCA Crim 1391 ... 91
 Meachen [2006] EWCA Crim 2414 ... 677, 682, 683, 795
 Meanza [2017] EWCA Crim 445 ... 538, 547
 Mearns [1990] 3 All ER 989 ... 660
 Medland (1851) 5 Cox CC 292 ... 886, 889
 Mee v Cruickshank (1902) 20 Cox CC 210 ... 741
 Meech [1974] QB 549, [1973] 3 All ER 939, CA ... 857
 Meeking [2012] EWCA Crim 461 ... 575
 Meering v Grahame-White Aviation Co Ltd (1919) 122 LT 44 ... 720
 Mehmed [1963] Crim LR 780 ... 753
 Mehta [2012] EWCA Crim 2824 ... 439, 440, 445
 Mehtab [2015] EWCA Crim 1665 ... 440
 Melias Ltd v Preston [1957] QB 380 ... 275
 Mellor v Denham (1880) 5 QBD 467 ... 14
 Melwani [1989] Crim LR 565, CA ... 851
 Mendez and Thompson [2010] EWCA Crim 516 ... 181, 187, 188, 213
 Mepstead v DPP [1996] Crim LR 111, DC ... 667
 Mercer [2001] All ER (D) 187 ... 178
 Meredith [1973] Crim LR 253 ... 854
 Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 2 AC 500, PC ... 250, 251–3
 Merrick [1956] 1 Cr App R 130, [1995] Crim LR 802 ... 1091
 Metcalf v CPS [2015] EWHC 1091 (Admin) ... 687
 Metharam [1961] 3 All ER 200 ... 691
 Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Blackburn [1968] 2 QB 118, CA ... 705
 Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Blackburn (No 3) [1973] QB 241, CA ... 705
 Meyrick (1929) 21 Cr App R 94 ... 439
 MFI Warehouses v Nattrass [1973] Crim LR 196 ... 254
 Miah [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 379 ... 997
 Miah [2004] EWCA Crim 63 ... 195
 Miao [2003] EWCA Crim 3486 ... 525
 Michael (1840) 9 C & P 356 ... 83, 182
 Middleton (1873) LR 2 CCR 38 ... 866
 Mikolajczak (Mariusz) v Poland [2013] EWHC 432 (Admin) ... 852, 940, 968
 Miles [2003] EWCA Crim 2892 ... 1020
 Milford Haven Port Authority [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 423 ... 269
 Millard and Vernon [1987] Crim LR 393 ... 413
 Miller (1854) 6 Cox CC 353 ... 1041
 Miller [1954] 2 QB 282 ... 687
 Miller [1976] Crim LR 147, CA ... 908, 914
 Miller [1983] 2 AC 161, [1983] Crim LR 466, HL ... 26, 50, 54, 55, 56, 125, 587, 663, 1070, 1079, 1093
 Miller [2007] EWCA Crim 1891 ... 752
 Miller [2010] EWCA Crim 809 ... 1019
 Miller v Race (1758) 1 Burr 452 ... 1055
 Mills (1857) Dears & B 205 ... 926
 Mills [1963] 1 QB 522, (1963) 47 Cr App R 49, [1963] Crim LR 181, CCA ... 448, 647
 Mills [2003] EWCA Crim 3723 ... 786
 Mills v DPP (1998) 17 Dec, DC ... 737
 Millward [1994] Crim LR 527 ... 175, 184, 223, 224, 652
 Minor v DPP (1987) 152 JP 30, DC ... 1028
 Minshull [2004] EWCA 2673 ... 794
 Mintern [2004] EWCA Crim 7 ... 439

- Mir (1994) 22 Apr ... 458
 Mirahessari [2016] EWCA Crim 1733 ... 1100
 Miskell (1954) 37 Cr App R 214 ... 425
 Misra [2004] EWCA Crim 2375, [2005] Crim LR 234, [2005] 1 Cr App R 21 ... 16, 22, 140, 585, 589, 593, 594, 595, 596
 Mitchell [1983] QB 741, [1983] Crim LR 549, CA ... 122
 Mitchell [1992] Crim LR 723 ... 978
 Mitchell [2004] Crim LR 139 ... 1083, 1084
 Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 850 ... 890, 891, 896, 906
 Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 2552 ... 225, 227, 228, 229
 Mitchell and King (1998) 163 JP 75, [1999] Crim LR 496, DC ... 228, 229
 MK [2008] 2 Cr App R (S) 437 ... 715
 MM [2011] EWCA Crim 1291 ... 792
 Moberly v Allsop [1992] COD 190, 156 JP 514, DC ... 921
 Moens v Heyworth (1842) 10 M & W 147 ... 952
 Mogul Steamship (1888) 21 QBD 544 ... 436
 Mohammed [2005] EWCA Crim 1880 ... 538
 Mohammed [2006] EWCA Crim 1107 ... 811
 Mohan [1976] QB 1, [1975] 2 All ER 193, CA ... 413
 Moir v Williams [1892] 1 QB 264 ... 1014
 Moloney [1985] AC 905, [1985] 1 All ER 1025 ... 91, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 512, 513, 514, 596
 Monaghan and Monaghan [2000] 1 Cr App R (S) 6 ... 897
 Monger [1973] Crim LR 301 ... 694
 Montague [2013] EWCA Crim 1781, [2014] Crim LR 615 ... 177, 194, 213, 971, 1041
 Montila [2004] 1 WLR 3141, [2005] Crim LR 479 ... 114, 117, 976, 978, 979, 1056, 1058
 Moore (1898) 14 TLR 229 ... 679
 Moore [2009] EWCA Crim 1672 ... 286
 Moore [2013] EWCA Crim 85 ... 231
 Moore v DPP [2010] EWHC 1822 (Admin) ... 424, 428
 Moore v Green [1983] 1 All ER 663, DC ... 710
 Moore v I Bresler Ltd [1944] 2 All ER 515 ... 252, 253
 Moore v The State [2001] UKPC 4 ... 303
 Moore and Dorn [1975] Crim LR 229 ... 125
 Moran [1952] 1 All ER 803n, (1952) 36 Cr App R 10 ... 998, 999, 1004
 Morby (1882) 15 Cox CC 35 ... 57
 Morell [2012] EWCA Crim 1410 ... 46, 806
 Morfit (1816) Russ & Ry 307 ... 886
 Morgan [1972] 1 QB 436 ... 237
 Morgan [1976] AC 182, [1975] Crim LR 717 ... 383, 668, 787, 790, 791, 793
 Morgan [2007] EWCA Crim 3313 ... 584
 Morhall [1996] AC 90, [1995] 3 All ER 659, HL, [1995] Crim LR 890 ... 543
 Moriarty v Brooks (1834) 6 C & P 684 ... 689
 Morphis v Salmon [1990] Crim LR 48, DC ... 1070
 Morrell [2002] EWCA Crim 2547 ... 46
 Morris [1984] AC 320, [1983] Crim LR 813 ... 30, 826, 829, 830, 834, 836, 881, 958
 Morris [1998] 1 Cr App R 386 ... 580, 688
 Morris [2005] EWCA Crim 609 ... 689
 Morris [2013] EWCA Crim 436, [2013] Crim LR 995 ... 395, 396, 722, 841, 921, 922
 Morris v Tollman [1923] 1 KB 166 ... 224
 Morrison (1989) Cr App R 17 ... 695
 Morrison [2003] All ER (D) 281 (May) ... 413
 Morton [2004] Crim LR 73 ... 177
 Moseley [1999] 7 Arch News 2 ... 353
 Most (1881) 7 QBD 244 ... 616
 Mouse's case (1608) 12 Co Rep 63 ... 368
 Moussell Bros Ltd v London & North-Western Railway Co [1917] 2 KB 836 ... 249, 269, 273
 Mousir [1987] Crim LR 561 ... 112, 420, 732, 733
 Mowatt [1968] 1 QB 421 ... 104, 105, 690, 696
 Moyle [2008] EWCA Crim 3059, [2009] Crim LR 586 ... 289
 Moynes v Cooper [1956] 1 QB 439, [1956] 1 All ER 450 ... 863, 865
 Moys (1984) 79 Cr App R 72, [1984] Crim LR 494, CA ... 115, 1050
 MPC v Wilson [1984] AC 242 ... 660, 663
 Mu v Customs and Excise [2001] VTD 17504 ... 361
 Muhamed [2002] EWCA Crim 1856, [2003] 2 WLR 1050 ... 149, 151, 158, 166
 Mujuru [2007] EWCA Crim 1249; [2008] Crim LR 54 ... 638, 640
 Mula [2013] EWCA Crim 1293 ... 382
 Mulcahy v R (1868) LR 3 HL 306 ... 438, 452
 Mullally [2012] EWCA Crim 687 ... 360
 Mullally v DPP [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin) ... 351, 356
 Mulligan [1990] STC 220, [1990] Crim LR 427, CA ... 993, 995
 Mullins v Collins (1874) LR 9 QB 292 ... 267, 269
 Munro v Wilmott [1949] 1 KB 295, [1948] 2 All ER 983 ... 874
 Munteanu [2012] EWCA Crim 2231 ... 971
 Murgatroyd v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (2000) All ER (D) 1742 ... 664
 Murphy [2002] Crim LR 674 ... 895
 Murphy [2007] EWCA Crim 2810 ... 400
 Murray [2008] EWCA Crim 1792 ... 289
 Murray v Minister of Defence [1998] 1 WLR 692 ... 720
 Muuse v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] EWCA Civ 453 ... 723
 Mwenya [1960] 1 QB 241 ... 720
 N [2007] EWCA Crim 3479 ... 357
 N [2016] EWCA Crim 92 ... 734
 Narey v Customs and Excise [2005] EWHC 784 (Admin) ... 288
 Nash [1999] Crim LR 308, CA ... 424, 425
 National Coal Board v Gamble [1959] 1 QB 11 ... 187, 195, 198, 199, 207, 208
 National Rivers Authority v Alfred McAlpine Homes (East) Ltd [1994] 4 All ER 286, DC, [1994] Crim LR 960 ... 266
 Natural England v Day [2014] EWCA Crim 2683 ... 73
 Naviede [1997] Crim LR 662 ... 840, 844
 Navvabi [1986] 3 All ER 102, [1986] 1 WLR 1311, CA ... 845
 Neal v Gribble (1978) 68 Cr App R 9, [1978] RTR 409 ... 886, 913
 Neal v Reynolds [1966] Crim LR 393 ... 42
 Neary [2002] EWCA Crim 1736 ... 213

- Nedrick [1986] 1 WLR 1025, [1986] Crim LR 792 ... 91, 92, 93, 94
- Nedrick-Smith [2006] EWHC 3015 (Admin) ... 187
- Neil [2008] EWCA Crim 476 ... 981
- Nelson [2013] EWCA Crim 333 ... 309, 431, 660, 663
- Ness [2011] Crim LR 645 ... 364
- Nevard [2006] EWCA Crim 2896 ... 430
- New Forest Educational Authority v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin) ... 361
- Newbon [2005] Crim LR 738 ... 756
- Newbury [1977] AC 500, [1976] 2 All ER 365 ... 569, 578, 580
- Newbury v Davis [1974] RTR 367, [1974] Crim LR 262 ... 156
- Newport (Salop) Justices [1929] 2 KB 416 ... 685
- Newton [1982] 77 Cr App R 13, [1983] Crim LR 198 ... 169
- Newton and Stungo [1958] Crim LR 469 ... 644, 645
- Ngan [1998] 1 Cr App R 331 ... 839, 842, 845, 865
- NHS Trusts, A v M [2001] 1 All ER 801 ... 59
- NHS Trust A v M, B v H [2001] Fam 348 ... 61
- Nichol (1807) Russ & Ry 130 ... 675
- Nicholls (1874) 13 Cox CC 75 ... 52
- Nicholson [2006] EWCA Crim 1518 ... 147
- Nicholson [2014] EWCA Crim 2710 ... 819
- Nicklin [1977] 1 WLR 403 ... 1032, 1040
- Nicklinson [2014] UKSC 38, [2013] EWCA Civ 961 ... 511, 619, 625, 628, 629
- Nimley [2010] EWCA Crim 2752 ... 971, 974, 977
- Nnamdi [2005] EWCA Crim 74 ... 727, 728
- Noble and Johnson [2016] EWCA Crim 2219 ... 217
- Nordeng (1975) 62 Cr App R 123, CA ... 944
- Norfolk Constabulary v Seekings and Gould [1986] Crim LR 167 ... 1014
- Norman [2008] EWCA Crim 1810 ... 285, 286, 732
- Norreys v Zeffert [1939] 2 LI ER 187, KBD ... 1000
- Norris (1840) 9 C & P 241 ... 1070
- Norris [2007] EWHC 71 (Admin) ... 437
- Norris v USA [2008] UKHL 16 ... 16, 19, 22, 435, 470, 471
- North [2001] EWCA Crim 544 ... 1023
- Northern Strip Mining Construction Co Ltd (Glamorgan Assizes, 1 Feb 1965, unreported) ... 601
- Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Ltd v William H Price Ltd [1934] AC 455 ... 863
- Notman [1994] Crim LR 518 ... 659
- Nott (1958) 43 Cr App R 8 ... 566
- Nottingham City Council v Wolverhampton and Dudley Breweries [2004] 2 WLR 820 ... 274, 275
- Noye [2011] EWCA Crim 650 ... 382, 396
- Nursing [2012] EWCA Crim 2521 ... 712
- NW [2008] Crim LR 900 ... 1059
- O [2008] EWCA Crim 2835 ... 983
- O and H [2010] EWCA Crim 2253, [2011] Crim LR 401 ... 982
- O'Brien [2004] EWCA Crim 2900 ... 380
- O'Connor (1986) 85 Cr App R 298 ... 1036
- O'Connor [1991] Crim LR 135 ... 325, 326, 1080
- O'Connor v Isaacs [1956] 2 QB 288 ... 722
- O'Donnell [1996] 1 Cr App R 286 ... 285
- O'Donoghue (1927) 20 Cr App R 132, CCA ... 631
- O'Flaherty and others [2004] EWCA Crim 526, [2004] Crim LR 751 ... 225, 226, 227, 229
- O'Grady [1987] QB 995, [1987] 3 All ER 420 ... 325, 326, 383, 535
- O'Hadhamail [1996] Crim LR 509 ... 449
- O'Hara v Chief Constable of RUC [1997] AC 286 ... 721
- O'Leary (1986) 82 Cr App R 34, CA ... 1023, 1025
- O'Mahony [2012] EWCA Crim 2180 ... 1067
- O'Neill, McMullen and Kelly (1986) The Times, 17 Oct ... 1018
- O'Riordan v DPP [2005] EWHC 1240 (Admin) ... 149
- O'Toole [1987] Crim LR 759, CA ... 413
- Odyssey (London) Ltd v OIC Run Off Ltd (2000) The Times, 3 Mar, CA (Civ Div) ... 252, 253, 258
- Ofori and Tackie (No 2) (1994) 99 Cr App R 223 ... 1067
- Ogden [2016] EWCA Crim 6 ... 1057, 1061, 1062
- Ogunbowale [2007] EWCA Crim 2739 ... 64, 91
- Ohlson v Hylton [1975] 2 All ER 490, DC ... 750, 751, 1024
- Okanta [1997] Crim LR 451 ... 982
- Oldcastle's case (1419) Hale I PC 50, East I PC 70 ... 361
- OLL Ltd, Winchester Crown Court, 8 Dec 1994 ... 601
- Olugboja [1981] 3 All ER 443 ... 758, 760, 761, 765, 773
- Omara [2004] EWCA Crim 431 ... 286, 287
- Oraki v DPP [2018] EWHC 115 (Admin) ... 402, 403, 407, 707
- Orr [2016] EWCA Crim 889, [2016] Crim LR 865 ... 285
- Ortiz (1986) 83 Cr App R 173 ... 354, 361
- Osborn (1919) 84 JP 63, CCC ... 424
- Osborne [2010] EWCA Crim 547 ... 503, 556
- Osinuga v DPP [1998] Crim LR 216, DC ... 981, 982
- Osman [1988] Crim LR 611 ... 887
- Osman (No 4), Re [1991] Crim LR 533 ... 14
- Ostler v Elliott [1980] Crim LR 584 ... 712
- OT, re [2009] EWHC 633 (Fam) ... 60
- Otway [2011] EWCA Crim 3 ... 226
- Oughton [2010] EWCA Crim 1540 ... 586
- Overington [1978] Crim LR 692, CA ... 1035
- Oversby (1990), unreported ... 681
- Owen [2009] EWCA Crim 2259 ... 637
- Owens, re [2000] 1 Cr App R 195 ... 732, 733
- Owino [1996] 2 Cr App R 128, [1995] Crim LR 743, CA ... 384, 571
- Oxford v Moss (1978) 68 Cr App R 183, [1979] Crim LR 119 ... 852, 1071
- Oye [2013] EWCA Crim 1735, [2014] Crim LR 544 ... 304, 385, 386, 387, 534
- P (2000) 11 Aug, CA, No 0003586 Y5 ... 850
- P [2009] EWCA Crim 1110 ... 770, 793
- P [2010] EWCA Crim 164 ... 795
- P [2016] UKSC 8 ... 187
- P v DPP [2012] EWHC 1657 (Admin), [2013] Crim LR 151 ... 899
- P (SJ) [2006] EWCA Crim 2599 ... 670
- P v Barking Youth Court [2002] EWHC 734, [2002] Crim LR 637 ... 288
- P & O European Ferries Ltd (1990) 93 Cr App R 72, [1991] Crim LR 695 ... 255, 601

- Pabon [2018] EWCA Crim 420 ... 875, 881, 986
 Pace and Rogers [2014] EWCA Crim 186 ... 322, 415, 416, 417, 418, 499, 1058
 Pacurar [2016] EWCA Crim 569 ... 819, 1026
 Page [1954] 1 QB 170, [1953] 2 All ER 1355, C-MAC ... 508
 Page [1971] 2 QB 330 ... 947
 Pagett (1983) 76 Cr App R 279, [1983] Crim LR 393 ... 63, 70, 71, 72, 182
 Pakiyanthur [2010] EWCA Crim 2312 ... 970, 975
 Pal [2000] Crim LR 757 ... 701
 Palm Developments Ltd v SoS for Communities and Local Government [2009] EWHC 220 (Admin) ... 849
 Palmer v R [1971] AC 814, [1971] 1 All ER 1077, PC ... 27, 384, 399, 408
 Papachristos and Kerrison v SFO [2014] EWCA Crim 1863 ... 439, 443
 Parfeni [2003] EWCA Crim 159 ... 585
 Park (1987) 87 Cr App R 164, CA ... 1042
 Parker (1839) 9 C & P 45 ... 1095
 Parker [1977] 1 All ER 475 ... 103
 Parker [1993] Crim LR 856 ... 458
 Parker v British Airways Board [1982] QB 1004 ... 857
 Parker v Green (1862) 2 B & S 299 ... 14
 Parker v R [1964] AC 1369 ... 520
 Parker v South Eastern Rly Co (1877) 2 CPD 416, CA ... 856
 Parkes [1973] Crim LR 358 ... 1006
 Parmenter [1991] 2 All ER 225, CA ... 687, 693
 Parmenter and Savage [1992] 1 AC 699, [1992] Crim LR 288, HL ... 104, 105, 664, 687, 690, 693
 Parr-Moore [2002] EWCA Crim 1907, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 425 ... 480
 Parry v DPP [2004] EWHC 3112 (Admin) ... 699, 1095
 Parsons v Barnes [1973] Crim LR 537 ... 272
 Patel [1970] Crim LR 274 ... 209
 Patel (1991) 7 Aug, unreported (89/4351/S1, CA) ... 458
 Patel [2005] Crim LR 649, [2004] EWCA Crim 3284 ... 736, 743
 Patel [2009] EWCA Crim 67, [2009] Crim LR 466 ... 460
 Patel [2010] EWCA Crim 976 ... 366
 Patel [2013] EWCA Crim 965 ... 112
 Patient [1968] Crim LR 23 ... 44
 Paton v BPAS [1979] QB 276 ... 644
 Pattni [2001] Crim LR 570 (Southwark CC) ... 470, 881, 995
 Pawlicki and Swindell (1992) 95 Cr App R 246, [1992] Crim LR 584 ... 1023
 PE [2007] EWCA Crim 231 ... 802
 Peacock [1973] Crim LR 639 ... 751
 Peake (1932) 97 JPN 353 ... 647
 Pearce [1973] Crim LR 321, CA ... 908
 Pearman (1984) 80 Cr App R 259, CA ... 413
 Pearson [1992] Crim LR 193 ... 526, 529
 Pearson [1994] Crim LR 534 ... 690
 Peart [1970] 2 QB 672, [1970] 2 All ER 823, CA ... 912
 Peck (1839) 9 Ad & El 686 ... 435
 Pedro v Diss [1981] 2 All ER 59, 72 Cr App R 193 ... 706
 Pelham [2007] EWCA Crim 1321 ... 740
 Pembilton (1874) LR 2 CCR 119 ... 123, 1076, 1078
 Pennock and Pennock [2014] EWCA Crim 598 ... 929, 962, 965
 Pepper v Hart [1993] AC 593, HL ... 18
 Percival [2003] EWCA Crim 1561 ... 191
 Percy v Hall [1997] QB 924 (Civ Div) ... 127
 Petch [2005] 2 Cr App R 657 ... 219
 Peters v Stanway (1835) 6 C & P 737 ... 719
 Peterssen v RSPCA [1993] Crim LR 852 ... 87
 Pethick [1980] Crim LR 242 ... 1050
 Petrie [1961] 1 All ER 466 ... 749
 PF [2017] EWCA Crim 983 ... 344, 788
 Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Storkwain Ltd [1986] 2 All ER 635, [1986] Crim LR 813, HL ... 143, 151
 Phelps v Hillingdon LBC [2001] 2 AC 619, HL ... 610
 Phetheon (1840) 9 C & P 552 ... 886, 889
 Phillip v The Queen [2007] UKPC 31 ... 301
 Phillipou (1989) 89 Cr App R 290 ... 866
 Phillips (1987) 86 Cr App R 18, discussed [1988] Crim LR 338 ... 440
 Phillips [2004] EWC Crim 112 ... 91, 694
 Phillips [2008] EWCA Crim 2830 ... 795
 Phillips [2012] EWCA Crim 2149 ... 1010
 Phillips [2013] EWCA Crim 358 ... 586, 588
 Phillips v R [2005] Crim LR 971 ... 545
 Phipoe (1795) 2 Leach 673 ... 998
 Phipps [1970] RTR 209, CA ... 910
 Pick [1982] Crim LR 238 ... 892
 Pickford [1995] 1 Cr App R 420 ... 225, 230
 Piddington v Bates [1960] 3 All ER 660 ... 707
 Pigg (1982) 74 Cr App R 352, CA, [1982] Crim LR 446 ... 111, 415
 Pigg [1983] 1 WLR 56 ... 790
 Pike v Waldrum [1952] 1 Lloyd's Rep 431 ... 721
 Pilgram v Rice-Smith [1977] 2 All ER 658, DC ... 847
 Pinkney v DPP [2017] EWHC 854 (Admin) ... 664
 Pinto [2006] EWCA Crim 749 ... 196
 Pipe v DPP [2012] EWHC 1821 (Admin) ... 390
 Piper [2007] EWCA Crim 2151 ... 778
 Pitchley (1972) 57 Cr App R 30, CA ... 1042, 1044
 Pitham and Hehl (1976) 65 Cr App R 45 ... 841, 1034, 1045
 Pittard v Mahoney [1977] Crim LR 169, DC ... 752
 Pitts (1842) Car & M 284 ... 80
 Pittwood (1902) 19 TLR 37 ... 53
 Planton v DPP [2001] EWHC Admin 450 ... 914
 Pocock v Moore (1825) Ry & M 321 ... 719
 Podola [1960] 1 QB 325 ... 283, 288
 Pogmore [2017] EWCA Crim 925 ... 618, 998
 Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWHC 2673 (Admin) ... 845, 926, 940, 948
 Pommell [1995] 2 Cr App R 607 ... 344
 Poole [2003] All ER (D) 448 (Mar) ... 37
 Pooley, unreported (2007) ... 296
 Pora v The Queen [2015] UKPC 9 ... 585
 Porceddu [2004] EWCA Crim 1043 ... 313
 Pordage [1975] Crim LR 575, CA ... 313, 321
 Porritt [1961] 3 All ER 463, [1961] 1 WLR 1372 ... 537
 Porter [1976] Crim LR 58 ... 1035
 Porter [2006] EWCA Crim 560, [2006] Crim LR 748 ... 973
 Porter v MPC (1999) unreported, 20 Nov CA ... 706, 1013

- Postermobile v LBC (1997) 8 Dec, unreported, DC ... 339
- Potger (1970) 55 Cr App R 42 ... 464
- Potter [2005] EWCA Crim 3050 ... 713, 714
- Poulton (1832) 5 C & P 329 ... 505
- Powell [1963] Crim LR 511, CCA ... 751
- Powell and Daniels, English [1999] AC 1, [1998] 1 Cr App R 261, [1998] Crim LR 48, HL ... 121, 186, 213, 214, 215
- Practice Direction [1994] 2 All ER 413 ... 59
- Practice Direction (Criminal Proceedings) [2013] EWCA Crim 1631 ... 516
- Pratt [1984] Crim LR 51 ... 784
- Pratt v DPP [2001] EWHC 483 (Admin) ... 738
- Prebble (1858) 1 F & F 325 ... 706
- Preddy [1996] AC 815 ... 845, 859, 864, 929, 1033, 1039, 1054
- Prentice [1993] 4 All ER 935, discussed [1994] Crim LR 292 ... 584, 593
- Press [2013] EWCA Crim 1849 ... 386, 387
- Press and Thompson [2013] EWCA Crim 1849 ... 383, 793
- Pretty v DPP see R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP
- Price [1990] Crim LR 200 ... 884
- Price (2004) 1 Cr App R 12, [2003] EWCA Crim 2405 ... 784
- Price [2006] EWCA Crim 3363 ... 144
- Price [2014] EWCA Crim 229 ... 137
- Prince (1875) LR 2 CCR 154 ... 38, 169, 708
- Prior [2004] Crim LR 849 ... 452
- Pritchard (1836) 7 C & P 303 ... 282, 283, 284
- Pritchard (1901) 17 TLR 310 ... 505
- Pritchard and others [2004] EWCA Crim 1981 ... 1088
- Proctor v The Chief Constable of Cleveland Police [2017] EWCA Civ 1531 ... 937
- Proprietary Articles Trade Association v A-G for Canada [1931] AC 310 ... 12
- Provincial Motor Club Co Ltd v Dunning [1909] 2 KB 599 ... 275
- Pull (1998) The Times, 20–21 Mar ... 308
- Pullen [1991] Crim LR 457 ... 322
- Purcell (1986) 83 Cr App R 45, CA ... 695
- Purdy (1946) 10 J Crim L 182 ... 348, 361
- Pyrah [2003] 1 AC 903, [2003] 1 Cr App R 33 ... 516
- Qadir [1997] 9 Arch News 1, CA ... 425
- Qosja [2016] EWCA Crim 1543 ... 744
- Quality Dairies (York) Ltd v Pedley [1952] 1 KB 275 ... 269
- Quayle [2005] EWCA Crim 1415, [2006] Crim LR 148 ... 344, 348, 349, 366, 369, 371, 653
- Quick [1973] QB 910, [1973] Crim LR 434 ... 294, 295, 309, 310, 331
- R [1992] 1 AC 599 ... 673
- R [2007] EWHC 1842 (Admin) ... 799
- R [2008] EWCA Crim 619 ... 426, 809
- R (2008) 16 Jan, unreported, CA (Crim Div) ... 809
- R [2013] EWCA Crim 591 ... 288, 304
- R v A [2000] 2 All ER 177 ... 732
- R v A (No 2) [2002] 1 AC 67 ... 771
- R v A Ltd [2016] EWCA Crim 1469 ... 253
- R v Alliston, 18 Sept 2017 ... 574, 575
- R v Cornish; Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells NHS Trust [2015] EWHC 2967 (QB) ... 603
- R v CW [2004] EWCA Crim 340, CA ... 784
- R v D [2013] EWCA Crim 2398 ... 13
- R v D [1984] AC 778, [1984] Crim LR 558 ... 724
- R v DPP [2001] Crim LR 396 ... 744
- R v DPP [2007] EWHC 739 (Admin) ... 898
- R v DPP, ex p Jones [2000] Crim LR 858, DC ... 72, 585, 594
- R v DPP, ex p Kebilene [2000] 2 AC 326, [2000] Crim LR 486 ... 24
- R v G ... 107
- R v Governor of Brockhill Prison, ex p Evans (No 2) [2001] 2 AC 19 ... 719
- R v Great Western Trains Company (GWT), Central Criminal Ct, 30 June 1999 ... 600
- R v Hatton [2005] EWCA Crim 2951 ... 1080
- R v HM Coroner for East Kent, ex p Spooner (1989) 88 Cr App R 10 ... 263
- R v Home Secretary, ex p Anderson [2002] UKHL 46 ... 516
- R v Howe [1987] 1 AC 417 ... 376
- R v Inglis [2011] 1 WLR 1110 ... 376
- R v Jackson Transport (Ossett) Ltd, reported in Health and Safety at Work, Nov 1996 ... 600
- R v K [2002] 1 AC 462 (see also DPP v B) ... 139, 149, 154, 709, 1055
- R v Khan (Dawood) [2009] EWCA Crim 1569, [2010] 1 Cr App R 4 ... 552
- R v Majewski see DPP v Majewski
- R v Maughan and others (CCC, 29 July 2016) ... 180
- R v Morton (14 July 2017, Nottingham CC) ... 573
- R v Powell; R v English ... 217
- R v R (2017) 15 Nov, unreported CA (Crim) ... 748
- R v Sellafeld; R v Network Rail Infrastructure Ltd [2014] EWCA Crim 49 ... 262
- R v Southern Water Services Ltd [2014] EWCA Crim 120 ... 153
- R v Stephens (1866) LR 1 QB 702, [1861–73] All ER Rep Ext 2059 ... 268
- R v Sui-Tak-Chee (1984) unreported ... 851
- R v T [2009] UKHL 20 ... 555
- R v T [2011] EWCA Crim 729 ... 236
- R v Tonner [1985] 1 WLR 344 ... 994
- R v W (2003) 10 Archbold News 2 ... 788
- R v Williams [2004] 2 LRC 499 ... 117
- R v X Ltd [2013] EWCA Crim 818, [2014] Crim LR 73 ... 254
- R (A) v DPP [2005] ACD 61 ... 744
- R (A) v Snaresbrook Crown Court [2001] All ER (D) 123 ... 839
- R (Ahmad) v Bradford MC [2008] EWHC 2934 (Admin) ... 705
- R (Al Rabbat) v Westminster Magistrates' Court [2017] EWHC 1969 (Admin) ... 1087
- R (Al Skeini) v Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 26 ... 508
- R (AP) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] UKSC 24 ... 668, 718
- R (Aylesbury Crown Court) v CPS [2013] EWHC 3228 (Admin) ... 739
- R (Begley) v Chief Constable of West Midlands Police [2001] EWCA Civ 1571 ... 1107
- R (Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner London [2006] EWHC 196 (Admin) ... 393

- R (Bodycote) v HM Coroner for Hertfordshire [2008] EWCA Crim 164 ... 601
- R (Burke) v GMC [2004] EWHC 1879 (Admin); overruled [2006] QB 273, CA ... 58, 60, 510, 511, 628
- R (Chief Constable of Northumbria) v Newcastle Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 935 (Admin) ... 268
- R (Child Poverty Action Group) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2011] 2 WLR 1 ... 155
- R (Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin), [2016] Crim LR 438 ... 414
- R (Craik) v Newcastle Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 935 (Admin) ... 720
- R (Danny) [2005] EWCA Crim 1296 ... 814
- R (Director of Assets Recovery Agency) v Green [205] EWHC 3168 (Admin) ... 1059
- R (DPP) v Stratford Magistrates' Court [2017] EWHC 1794 (Admin) ... 396, 397, 398, 399
- R (Duggan) v North London Assistant Deputy Coroner [2017] EWCA Civ 142 ... 392, 393, 395
- R (E) v CICA [2003] EWCA Civ 234 ... 666
- R (F) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] UKSC 17 ... 799
- R (Ghai) v Newcastle City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 59, [2010] 3 WLR 737, CA ... 656, 1013, 1014
- R (Gray) v Crown Court at Aylesbury [2013] EWHC 500 (Admin) ... 1080
- R (Gujra) v CPS [2012] UKSC 52 ... 6
- R (H) v Liverpool City Youth Court [2001] Crim LR 487 ... 908
- R (Hasani) v Blackfriars CC [2005] EWHC 3016 (Admin) ... 281
- R (Hicks) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2014] EWCA Civ 3, [2014] Crim LR 681 ... 20, 723
- R (Hilali) v Governor of Whitemoor Prison [2008] 1 AC 805 ... 1094
- R (Keam) v DEFRA [2005] EWHC 1582 (Admin) ... 172, 273
- R (Kenneally) v Snaresbrook Crown Court [2002] QB 1169 ... 282
- R (Khan) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2014] EWCA Civ 24 ... 493
- R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire [2007] 2 WLR 46 ... 707, 708, 723
- R (Moos) v MPC [2012] EWCA Civ 121 ... 708, 723
- R (Nicklinson) and another v Ministry of Justice and others see R (on the application of Nicklinson)
- R (Nicolaou) v Redbridge Magistrates' Court [2012] EWHC 1647 (Admin) ... 730
- R (O'Connor) v HM Coroner for Avon [2009] EWHC 854 (Admin) ... 303
- R (on the application of A) v Snaresbrook Crown Court (2001) 165 JPN 495 ... 866
- R (on the application of A) v Chief Constable of C Constabulary [2014] EWHC 216 (Admin), [2014] Crim LR 761 ... 115
- R (on the application of Abbott) v Colchester Magistrates' Court [2001] Crim LR 564, DC ... 431
- R (on the application of AM) v DPP [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 3 WLR 200 ... 625–6
- R (on the application of Charles) v Criminal Cases Review Commission [2017] EWHC 1219 (Admin) ... 91
- R (on the application of Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin), [2016] Crim LR 438 ... 388
- R (on the application of Conway) v Secretary of State for Justice [2017] EWHC 2447 (Admin); [2018] EWCA Civ 16 ... 626
- R (on the application of F) v DPP [2013] EWHC 945 (Admin) ... 761, 766, 777
- R (on the application of Gladstone plc) v Manchester City Magistrates' Court [2004] All ER (D) 296 (Nov) ... 657
- R (on the application of Gray) v Crown Court at Aylesbury [2013] EWHC 500 (Admin) ... 133
- R (on the application of Kracher) v Leicester Magistrates' Court [2013] EWHC 4627 (Admin) ... 659
- R (on the application of Nicklinson) v DPP [2012] EWHC 2381 (Admin), [2013] EWCA Civ 466, [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 7 Arch Rev 7 ... 23, 58, 59, 375, 378, 511, 619, 622, 623, 625–6, 627, 628, 629, 644
- R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2013] EWCA Civ 961 ... 368, 619
- R (on the application of O) v Coventry Justices [2004] EWHC 905 (Admin), [2004] Crim LR 948 ... 481
- R (on the application of Pinkney) v DPP [2017] EWHC 854 (Admin) ... 102
- R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP [2002] 1 AC 800, HL ... 622
- R (on the application of Purdy) v DPP [2009] UKHL 45 ... 623–5
- R (on the application of Smeaton) v Secretary of State for Health [2002] All ER (D) 115 (Apr); [2002] Crim LR 664 ... 505, 646
- R (on the application of Thames Water Utilities) v Bromley Magistrates' Court [2013] EWHC 472 (Admin) ... 161
- R (on the application of Wilkinson) v DPP [2006] EWHC 3012 (Admin) ... 1067
- R (on the application of Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education and Employment [2002] EWCA Civ 1820 ... 684
- R (on the application of Windsor and Maidenhead RIBC) v East Berkshire Justices [2010] EWHC 3020 (Admin) ... 754
- R (Pearson) v Greenwich MC [2008] EWHC 300 (Admin) ... 945
- R (Pretty) v DPP [2001] UKHL 61 ... 23, 511, 622
- R (Purdy) v DPP [2009] UKHL 45 ... 622
- R (Redcar Cleveland BC) v Dady [2013] EWHC 475 (QB) ... 16
- R (Ricketts) v Basildon Magistrates Court [2010] EWHC 2358 (Admin) ... 870
- R (Rowley) v DPP [2003] EWHC 693 (Admin) ... 594
- R (RSPCA) v C [2006] EWHC 1069 (Admin) ... 136
- R (S) v DPP [2006] EWHC 2231 (Admin) ... 799
- R (Singh) v Stratford MC [2007] EWHC 1582 (Admin) ... 289, 290
- R (Tait) v CICAP [2009] EWHC 767 (Admin), [2010] RTR 6 ... 97
- R (Tolhurst) v CPS [2008] EWHC 2976 (Admin) ... 799

- R (Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education [2005] UKHL 15 ... 684
- R (Wright) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2013] EWHC 2739 (QB) ... 723
- R (Young) v Central Criminal Court [2002] 2 Cr App R 12, [2002] Crim LR 588 ... 286
- Race Relations Board v Applin [1973] QB 815, CA ... 480
- Radford [2004] EWCA Crim 2878 ... 347
- Rae [2013] EWCA Crim 2056 ... 803, 805
- Rafferty [2007] EWCA Crim 1846 ... 229
- Ragg (1860) Bell CC 208 ... 950
- Rahman (1985) 81 Cr App R 349, CA ... 718, 722, 723
- Rahman [2008] EWCA Crim 2290 ... 616
- Rahman [2008] UKHL 45 ... 213, 229, 515
- Rahman [2010] EWCA Crim 235 ... 354
- Rai [2000] 1 Cr App R 242, [2000] Crim LR 192 ... 945
- Rajakumar [2013] EWCA Crim 1512 ... 225, 228
- Ralston [2005] EWCA Crim 3279 ... 1026
- Ram (1893) 17 Cox CC 609 ... 788
- Ramchurn [2010] EWCA Crim 194 ... 556, 557
- Rance v Mid-Downs Health Authority [1991] 1 QB 587, [1991] 1 All ER 801, QBD ... 505, 642
- Rannath Mohan v R [1967] 2 AC 187 ... 193, 194, 444
- Ransford (1874) 31 LT 488 ... 476, 479
- Raphael [2008] EWCA Crim 1014, [2008] Crim LR 995 ... 886, 887, 888, 896, 907
- Rapier (1979) 70 Cr App R 17 ... 750
- Rashford [2005] EWCA Crim 3377; [2006] Crim LR 547 ... 401, 402
- Rashid [1977] 2 All ER 237, 64 Cr App R 201, CA ... 946, 1027
- Ratcliffe [2008] EWCA Crim 471 ... 1090
- Ray [1974] AC 370 ... 926
- Ray [2017] EWCA Crim 1391 ... 7, 388, 389, 390, 400
- Raymond v AG [1982] QB 839, CA, [1982] Crim LR 826 ... 6
- Razoq [2012] EWCA Crim 674 ... 957, 958, 959
- RCN v DHSS [1981] AC 800 ... 647, 652
- Read [2014] EWCA Crim 687 ... 1045
- Reader (1977) 66 Cr App R 33, CA ... 1050, 1051
- Reader, Connor and Hart [1998] 7 April 1998, CA ... 1028
- Reading v A-G [1951] AC 507 ... 988
- Reane (1794) 2 Leach 616 ... 900
- Reardon [1999] Crim LR 392, CA ... 210
- Redfern and Dunlop Ltd (Aircraft Division) (1992) 13 Cr App R (S) 709, [1993] Crim LR 43 ... 250
- Redford (1988) 89 Cr App R 1, CA ... 993
- Redford [1988] STC 845, [1989] Crim LR 152 ... 995
- Reed [1982] Crim LR 819, CA ... 449
- Reed v Wastie [1972] Crim LR 221 ... 397
- Reeves (1839) 9 C & P 25 ... 505
- Reeves [2012] EWCA Crim 2613 ... 585
- Reference under s 48A of the Criminal Appeal (Northern Ireland) Act 1968 (No 1 of 1975) [1976] 2 All ER 937, HL ... 397
- Rehman and Wood [2006] 1 Cr App R (S) 404 ... 153
- Reid [1973] QB 299, [1973] 1 WLR 1283, [1973] Crim LR 760, CA ... 128, 729
- Reid (1975) 62 Cr App R 109 ... 572, 580
- Reid (1989) 91 Cr App R 263 ... 106
- Reid (1992) 95 Cr App R 391, HL ... 110, 137
- Reid (Jason) [2010] EWCA Crim 1478 ... 635
- Rejmanski [2017] EWCA Crim 2061 ... 547, 548
- Renault UK v Fleetpro Technical Service [2007] EWHC 2541, QB ... 940
- Reniger v Forgossa (1552) 1 Plowd 1 ... 368
- Renouf [1986] 2 All ER 449, [1986] Crim LR 408 ... 380, 398
- Revenue & Customs Commissioners v Total Network SL [2008] UKHL 19 ... 993
- Reynolds v G H Austin & Sons Ltd [1951] 2 KB 135, [1951] 1 All ER 606, DC ... 161
- RH [2016] EWCA Crim 1754 ... 730
- Riat [2012] EWCA Crim 1509 ... 1035
- Rice v Connolly [1966] 2 QB 414, DC ... 710, 711, 712
- Richards (1844) 1 Car & Kir 532 ... 886
- Richards [1974] QB 776, CA ... 221, 222
- Richards [2002] EWCA Crim 3175 ... 74
- Richards and Leeming (on appeal from 81 Cr App R 125) (10 July 1986, unreported), HL ... 370
- Richardson (1785) 1 Leach 387 ... 196
- Richardson (1834) 6 C & P 335 ... 1041
- Richardson [1998] 2 Cr App R 200 ... 672, 782
- Richardson [1999] QB 444 ... 674, 762
- Richardson and Brown [1998] 2 Cr App R (S) 87 ... 1009
- Richardson and Irwin [1999] 1 Cr App R 192, [1999] Crim LR 494 ... 316
- Riddell [2017] EWCA Crim 413 ... 380, 398, 407
- Riley [1967] Crim LR 656 ... 132
- Riley v CPS [2016] EWHC 2531 (Admin) ... 261
- Riley v DPP [1990] Crim LR 422, DC ... 709
- Riley v DPP [2016] EWHC 2531 (Admin), [2017] Crim LR 222 ... 155
- Rimington (and Goldstein) [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153 ... 10, 16, 22, 268, 338, 435, 437, 459, 470, 471, 472, 473, 994
- Ringland (2006), 9 Nov, CC ... 997
- Roach [2001] EWCA Crim 2698 ... 292, 308, 331, 332
- Roach [2011] EWCA Crim 918 ... 846
- Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd [1970] 2 QB 54 ... 184, 250
- Roberts (1971) 56 Cr App R 95, [1972] Crim LR 27 ... 81, 581, 687
- Roberts (1984) 78 Cr App R 41, [1985] Crim LR 218, CA ... 460
- Roberts (1985) 84 Cr App R 177 ... 884
- Roberts No 93/0075/Z2, 9 July 1993, unreported ... 1047, 1048
- Roberts [1998] 1 Cr App R 441, [1998] Crim LR 334, CA ... 444
- Roberts [2004] 1 Cr App R 16, [2003] EWCA Crim 2753 ... 753
- Roberts [2008] EWCA Crim 59 ... 238
- Roberts and George [1997] Crim LR 209 ... 224
- Robertson [1968] 3 All ER 557, [1968] 1 WLR 1767, CA ... 282, 288
- Robertson [2006] EWCA Crim 1289 ... 883
- Robinson (1796) 2 East PC 1110 ... 997
- Robinson [1915] 2 KB 342, CCA ... 428, 429
- Robinson [1977] Crim LR 173, CA ... 896, 1006
- Robinson (2000) 5 Archbold News 2, CA ... 228

- Robinson [2006] Crim LR 427 ... 997
- Robinson [2007] EWCA Crim 3120, [2008] 2 Cr App R (S) 201, CA ... 238
- Robinson [2009] EWCA Crim 375 ... 618, 629
- Robinson [2011] UKPC 3 ... 194
- Robinson [2011] EWCA Crim 916 ... 761
- Robinson [2014] EWCA Crim 2385 ... 194
- Robinson [2017] EWCA Crim 923 ... 383
- Robinson v Balmain New Ferry Co Ltd [1910] AC 295, PC ... 721
- Robinson-Pierre [2013] EWCA Crim 2396, (2013) Arch Rev 4 ... 44
- Robinson's case (1746) 1 Leach 37 ... 441
- Robson v Biggar [1908] 1 KB 672 ... 14
- Robson v Hallett [1967] 2 QB 939, [1967] 2 All ER 407 ... 1010
- Rodger and Rose [1998] 1 Cr App R 143 ... 349
- Roe v Kingerlee [1986] Crim LR 735 ... 1070
- Roebuck (1856) Dears & B 24 ... 926
- Rogers [2003] 1 WLR 1374 ... 582
- Rogers [2003] EWCA Crim 945, [2003] Crim LR 555 ... 74, 75, 714
- Rogers [2007] UKHL 8 ... 700
- Rogers [2014] 2 Cr App R 515 ... 1067
- Rolfe (1952) 36 Cr App R 4 ... 658, 786, 796
- Rolle v R [1965] 3 All ER 582 ... 524
- Rook [1993] 2 All ER 955, [1993] Crim LR 698 ... 179, 214, 226
- Rooke v Barnard [1964] AC 1129, [1964] 1 All ER 367, HL ... 14
- Rooney v Snaresbrook Crown Court (1978) 68 Cr App R 78, [1979] Crim LR 109 ... 101
- Roper v Knott [1898] 1 QB 868, DC ... 1071
- Roper v Taylor's Garage (Exeter) [1951] 2 TLR 284 ... 115, 116, 135, 157, 158, 954
- Rose [2004] EWCA Crim 764 ... 193, 194
- Rose [2008] EWCA Crim 239 ... 857
- Rose [2017] EWCA Crim 1168 ... 583, 585, 590, 591, 592
- Rose v Matt [1951] 1 KB 810, [1951] 1 All ER 361, DC ... 853, 857
- Rosenberg (1906) 70 JP 264 ... 655
- Rosinski (1824) 1 Mood CC 19 ... 673
- Ross v Moss [1965] 2 QB 396 ... 272, 275
- Ross v Rivenall [1959] 1 WLR 713 ... 185
- Ross River v Cambridge FC [2007] EWHC 2115 (Ch) ... 963
- Rostron [2003] All ER (D) 269 (Jul), [2003] EWCA Crim 2206 ... 855, 857, 870, 873, 1027
- Rothwell v Barton [1993] Crim LR 626 ... 380
- Rowe (1859) 8 Cox CC 139 ... 857
- Rowe [2007] EWCA Crim 635, [2007] Crim LR 744 ... 411, 970
- Rowland [2003] EWCA Crim 3636 ... 544
- Rowley [1948] 1 All ER 570 ... 219
- Rowley [1991] 4 All ER 649, [1991] Crim LR 785, CA ... 435
- Roxborough (1871) 12 Cox CC 8 ... 706
- Roy Bowles Transport Ltd (1999) The Times, 11 Dec ... 600
- Royal Brunei Airlines Sdn Bhd v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378 ... 116
- Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom see RCN v DHSS
- Royal Exchange Theatre Trust v The Commissioners [1978] VATTR 139 ... 1014
- Royle [2005] EWCA Crim 279 ... 824
- Royle [2013] EWCA Crim 1461 ... 91, 513
- Rubie v Faulkner [1940] 1 KB 571 ... 192
- Ruddock ... 214, 422
- Rudling [2016] EWCA Crim 741 ... 590, 592
- Ruffell [2003] EWCA Crim 122 ... 52, 585, 587
- Ruse v Read [1949] 1 KB 377, [1949] 1 All ER 398 ... 321
- Rushworth (1992) 95 Cr App R 252 ... 690
- Russell (1984) 81 Cr App R 315 ... 754
- Russell and Russell (1987) 85 Cr App R 388, [1987] Crim LR 494 ... 196, 634
- Russen v Lucas (1824) 1 C & P 153 ... 719
- Ryan (1839) 2 Mood & R 213 ... 694
- Ryan [1994] STC 446, [1994] Crim LR 858 ... 905
- Ryan [1996] Crim LR 320, (1996) 160 JP 610, CA ... 1009
- Ryan (1999) The Times, 13 Oct ... 459
- S [1997] 4 Archbold News 1 ... 982
- S [2005] EWCA Crim 819 ... 620
- S [2012] EWCA Crim 389, [2012] Crim LR 62 ... 379
- S [2015] EWCA Crim 558, [2015] Crim LR 553 ... 586, 589, 594
- S v DPP [2003] EWHC 2717 (Admin) ... 194
- S and another (Protected Persons), re [2010] 1 WLR 1082 ... 669
- S and L [2009] EWCA Crim 85 ... 366
- S (C) [2012] EWCA Crim 389, [2012] Crim LR 623, (2012) 76 J Crim L 202 ... 371, 653, 731
- Saad [2009] EWCA Crim 2781 ... 794
- Sabaharwal [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 81 ... 1061
- Sachs v Miklos [1948] 2 KB 23 ... 874
- Sadique [2011] EWCA Crim 2872; [2013] EWCA Crim 1150, (2013) 72 CLJ 497, [2014] Crim LR 61 ... 489, 490, 491, 492
- Safi [2003] EWCA Crim 1809, [2003] Crim LR 721 ... 343, 344, 349, 352
- Sahin [2009] EWCA Crim 2616 ... 744
- Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2007] 1 AC 18, [2006] Crim LR 998 ... 114, 119, 237, 238, 416, 438, 444, 447, 448, 455, 458, 459, 466, 769, 914, 953, 976, 1050
- St George's Healthcare NHS Trust v S [1998] 3 All ER 673 (Civ Div) ... 507, 680
- St Regis Paper Co Ltd [2011] EWCA Crim 2527 ... 251, 252, 253, 267, 271, 272
- Sainthouse [1980] Crim LR 506 ... 1041
- Sakalauskas [2013] EWCA Crim 2278 ... 975
- Saleem [2007] EWCA Crim 2692 ... 615
- Saleh [2012] EWCA Crim 484 ... 1060
- Salford Area Health Authority, ex p Janaway [1989] AC 537 ... 95, 654
- Salih [2007] EWCA Crim 2750 ... 406, 752
- Salii v DPP [2005] EWHC 2689 (Admin) ... 706
- Salmon (1880) 6 QBD 79 ... 192
- Salmon [2005] EWCA Crim 70 ... 564
- Salmon v Chute (1994) 115 FLR 176 ... 62
- Samuels [2016] EWCA Crim 1876 ... 748
- Sanders (1982) 75 Cr App R 84 ... 1042
- Sanders (1991) 93 Cr App R 245, [1991] Crim LR 781 ... 305, 564
- Sanders [2003] EWCA Crim 3079 ... 858
- Sandon v Jervis (1859) EB & E 942 ... 719
- Sandhu [1997] Crim LR 288 ... 170
- Sang (1979) 69 Cr App R 282, [1980] AC 402 ... 231

- Sang [2003] EWCA Crim 2411 ... 1009
- Sangha [1988] 2 All ER 385, (1988) 87 Cr App R 88, CA ... 419, 1092
- Sansom [1991] 2 All ER 145, [1991] Crim LR 126 ... 461
- Santana Bermudez [2004] Crim LR 471 ... 49, 50, 663, 687
- Santos v CPS [2013] EWHC 550 (Admin) ... 167, 372
- Sargeant (1996) 161 JP 127, [1997] Crim LR 50 ... 786, 797
- Saunders [1978] Crim LR 98 ... 705
- Saunders [1985] Crim LR 230 ... 513
- Saunders [1996] Cr App R 463 ... 933
- Saunders [2011] EWCA Crim 1571 ... 237
- Saunders and Archer (1573) 2 Plowd 473 ... 212, 227
- Savage [1992] 1 AC 699, [1991] 4 All ER 698 ... 105, 658, 660, 664, 686, 687, 690, 692
- Savage and Parmenter [1991] 4 All ER at 721, HL ... 690
- Sawoniuk [2000] Cr App R 220 ... 504
- Sayed [2009] EWCA Crim 1922 ... 820
- SB [2012] 2 Cr App R (S) 408 ... 730
- Scarlett [1993] 4 All ER 629, [1994] Crim LR 288 ... 384, 404, 571, 572, 1084
- Schmidt (1866) LR 1 CCR 15 ... 1036
- Scot-Simonds [1994] Crim LR 933 ... 980
- Scott [2007] EWCA Crim 2757 ... 67
- Scott v Metropolitan Police Comr [1975] AC 819, [1975] Crim LR 94, HL ... 462, 463, 464, 465
- Scott v Shepherd (1773) 2 Wm Bl 892 ... 664
- Seaboard Offshore Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1993] Crim LR 611; aff'd [1994] 2 All ER 99, HL ... 87, 251, 267
- Seaman v Burley [1896] 2 QB 344 ... 14
- Searle [1971] Crim LR 592 ... 194, 971
- Sears v Broome [1986] Crim LR 461, DC ... 104, 1087, 1094
- Secretary of State for the Home Department v E [2007] UKHL 47 ... 719
- Secretary of State for the Home Department v JJ [2007] UKHL 45 ... 719
- Secretary of State for the Home Department v MB: Secretary of State v AF [2007] UKHL 46 ... 719
- Secretary of State for the Home Department v Robb [1995] 1 All ER 677 ... 368
- Seedy Tambedou [2014] EWCA Crim 954 ... 767
- Seevaratnarajah [2008] EWCA Crim 346 ... 818
- Sekfali v DPP [2006] EWHC 894 (Admin) ... 706, 707, 710, 1044
- Self [1992] Crim LR 574 ... 191
- Sellu [2016] EWCA Crim 1716 ... 585, 594, 595, 596
- Semple v DPP [2009] EWHC 3241 (Admin) ... 705
- Senior (1832) 1 Mood CC 346 ... 507
- Senior [1899] 1 QB 283 ... 575
- Sentamu [2013] EWCA Crim 248 ... 114, 466
- Seray-Wurie v DPP [2012] EWHC 208 (Admin) ... 102, 1072, 1076
- Serrano [2006] EWCA Crim 3182 ... 528
- Sewell [204] EWCA Crim 2322 ... 352
- Seymour [1983] 2 AC 493, [1983] 2 All ER 1058, [1983] Crim LR 742, HL ... 109, 584
- SFO v Evans [2014] EWHC 3803 (QB) ... 463
- SG (Adult Mental Patient: Abortion), re [1991] 2 FLR 329 ... 651
- Shabbir [2009] EWHC 2754 (Admin) ... 666, 943
- Shacter [1960] 2 QB 52 ... 991
- Shadrokh-Cigari [1988] Crim LR 465, CA ... 826, 865
- Shah v HSBC [2009] EWHC 79 (QB); [2010] EWCA Civ 31 ... 118, 1058, 1063
- Shama [1990] 2 All ER 602, [1990] Crim LR 411, CA ... 48, 944, 984
- Shannon [1974] 2 All ER 1009 ... 219
- Shannon (1980) 71 Cr App R 192, [1980] Crim LR 438 ... 384
- Shannon [1985] AC 717, [1975] Crim LR 703, HL ... 237
- Sharif [2010] EWCA Crim 1709 ... 283
- Sharp [1987] QB 853, [1987] Crim LR 566 ... 358
- Shaw v DPP [1962] AC 220 ... 9, 10, 472
- Shaw (Norman) v R [2002] 1 Cr App R 10, [2002] Crim LR 140, PC ... 384
- Shayler [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [2001] Crim LR 986 ... 344, 349, 350, 361, 378, 379
- Sheard (1837) 2 Mood CC 13 ... 689
- Sheehan [1975] 2 All ER 960, [1975] Crim LR 339 ... 313, 321
- Sheldrake [2005] 1 AC 246 ... 25, 149
- Shelton (1986) 83 Cr App R 379 ... 1031
- Shepherd [1919] 2 KB 125, CCA ... 615, 618
- Shepherd (1987) 86 Cr App R 47 ... 358
- Shepherd v CPS [2017] EWHC 2566 (Admin) ... 733
- Sheppard [1981] AC 394, [1981] Crim LR 171, HL ... 112, 151, 157, 170, 575
- Sheppard and Whittle [2010] EWCA Crim 65, [2010] Crim LR 720 ... 616
- Shergill [2003] CLY 871, Wolverhampton CC ... 425
- Sherif [2008] EWCA Crim 2653 ... 235, 238
- Sheriff [1969] Crim LR 260 ... 664, 705
- Sherlock (1866) LR 1 CCR 20 ... 243
- Serras v De Rutzen [1895] 1 QB 918 ... 150, 158, 159, 267
- Sherry and El Yamani [1993] Crim LR 537 ... 442, 731
- Sherwood [1995] RTR 60 ... 916
- Shiartos, 19 Sep 1961, unreported ... 360
- Shickle (1868) LR 1 CCR 158 ... 857
- Shillam [2013] EWCA Crim 160, [2013] Crim LR 592 ... 438, 439, 445
- Shimmen [1986] Crim LR 800, (1987) 84 Cr App R 7 ... 320
- Shivpuri [1987] AC 1, [1986] 2 All ER 334, [1986] Crim LR 536 ... 29, 31, 301, 336, 496, 497, 498, 500
- Shuck [1992] Crim LR 209 ... 991
- Shulman [2010] EWCA Crim 1034 ... 289
- Sills v DPP [2006] EWHC 3383 (Admin) ... 749
- Silverlock [1894] 2 QB 766, CCCR ... 939
- Silverman (1987) 86 Cr App R 213 ... 951
- Simcox [1964] Crim LR 402 ... 556
- Simpson [1983] 3 All ER 789, [1983] 1 WLR 1494 ... 748
- Simpson v Hill (1795) 1 Esp 431 ... 719
- Sinclair [1968] 3 All ER 241, (1968) 52 Cr App R 618 ... 468
- Sinclair (1998) unreported ... 588
- Sinclair Johnson and Smith (1998) 148 NLJ 1353, (1998) 21 Aug, CA ... 52, 64

- Singh [1973] 1 WLR 1600 ... 348
 Singh [2011] EWCA Crim 2992 ... 441
 Singh v Rathour (Northern Star Insurance Co Ltd, third party) [1988] 2 All ER 16, CA ... 911
 Singh (Gurdev) v R [1973] 1 WLR 1444, [1973] Crim LR 753, CA ... 125
 Singh Rai (Jagjit) [2005] EWCA Crim 3126, [2006] 2 Cr App R (S) 13 ... 615
 Sippings [2008] EWCA Crim 46 ... 820, 821
 Siracusa (1989) 90 Cr App R 340, [1989] Crim LR 712 ... 455, 458
 Sirat (1986) 83 Cr App R 41, CA ... 486
 Skelton [1995] Crim LR 635 ... 65
 Skilton [2014] EWCA Crim 154 ... 533
 Skinner [2016] NICA 40 ... 218
 Skipp [1975] Crim LR 114 ... 831, 836
 Skivington [1968] 1 QB 166, [1967] 1 All ER 483, CA ... 896, 1006
 Sky [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 260 ... 716
 Slater and Suddens [1996] Crim LR 300 ... 1048
 Sleep (1864) 9 Cox CC 559 ... 655
 Slingsby [1995] Crim LR 570 ... 573, 677
 Sloggett [1972] 1 QB 430, [1971] 3 All ER 264 ... 1040, 1047
 Small [1987] Crim LR 777, CA ... 870
 Smedleys Ltd v Breed [1974] AC 839, [1974] Crim LR 309 ... 169
 Smith (1855) Dears CC 559 ... 694, 1041
 Smith (1858) 3 H & N 227 ... 187
 Smith (1869) 11 Cox CC 210 ... 53
 Smith (1910) 6 Cr App R 19 ... 302
 Smith [1959] 2 QB 35 ... 67, 76, 77
 Smith [1961] AC 290, [1960] 3 All ER 161 ... 691
 Smith [1974] QB 354, [1974] Crim LR 101, CA ... 130, 1076, 1077
 Smith [1974] 1 All ER 376, [1973] Crim LR 700, CA ... 652
 Smith [1982] Crim LR 531 ... 296
 Smith [1985] Crim LR 42, CA ... 683
 Smith [2004] EWCA Crim 2187 ... 480
 Smith [2008] EWCA Crim 1342 ... 213
 Smith [2011] EWCA Crim 66, [2011] Crim LR 719 ... 6, 844, 857, 867, 896
 Smith [2012] EWCA Crim 2566 ... 304, 734
 Smith [2014] EWCA Crim 1941 ... 415
 Smith (Augustus) [2015] EWCA Crim 333 ... 1061
 Smith (Clean) v R [2002] 1 Cr App R 92 ... 520
 Smith (D R) [1974] QB 354, [1974] 1 All ER 632, [1974] Crim LR 101, CA ... 325, 340, 457
 Smith (Morgan) [2001] 1 AC 146, [2000] Crim LR 1004, HL ... 110, 543, 544
 Smith (Paul Adrian) [1997] 7 Arch News 4, CA ... 873
 Smith (Wallace Duncan) (No 4) [2004] EWCA Crim 631, [2004] QB 1418 ... 627
 Smith v Baker [1971] RTR 350 ... 194
 Smith v Chief Superintendent of Woking Police Station (1983) 76 Cr App R 234 ... 661
 Smith v Desmond and Hall [1965] AC 960, [1965] 1 All ER 976 ... 900
 Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597 ... 833, 944, 946
 Smith v Jenner [1968] Crim LR 99 ... 205
 Smith v Land and House Property Corp'n (1884) 28 Ch D 7 ... 951
 Smith and Jayson [2002] EWCA Crim 683, [2002] Crim LR 659 ... 152
 Smith and Smith [1986] Crim LR 166, CA ... 420, 893
 Smythe (1980) 72 Cr App Rep 8, CA ... 1040
 Snewing [1972] Crim LR 267 ... 692
 Snooks [1997] Crim LR 230 ... 750, 753
 Soames [2001] EWCA Crim 2964 ... 383
 Sobczak v DPP [2012] EWHC 1319 (Admin), [2013] Crim LR 516 ... 706
 Sockett (1908) 72 JP 428 ... 230, 442, 646
 Sodeman [1936] 2 All ER 1138, PC ... 302, 303
 Sofroniou [2003] EWCA Crim 3681 ... 922
 Sogruno [1997] 2 Cr App R (S) 89 ... 586
 Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1, CA ... 618
 Solomons [1909] 2 KB 980 ... 980
 Soolkal and another v The State [1999] 1 WLR 2011, PC ... 313
 Sopp v Long [1970] 1 QB 518, [1969] 1 All ER 855 ... 270
 Soul (1980) 70 Cr App R 295, [1980] Crim LR 333, CA ... 435
 South Staffordshire Water Company v Sharman [1896] 2 QB 44 ... 857
 Southern Water Services Ltd [2014] EWCA Crim 120 ... 262
 Southward [2012] EWCA Crim 2779 ... 345, 999
 Southwark London Borough v Williams [1971] 2 All ER 175 ... 369, 378
 Spall [2008] 1 Cr App R (S) 250 ... 818
 Spanner [1973] Crim LR 704 ... 752
 Speck [1977] 2 All ER 859 ... 48, 786
 Spence (1957) 41 Cr App R 80, CCA ... 619
 Spicer [1955] Crim LR 772 ... 646
 Spooner (1853) 6 Cox CC 392 ... 689
 Sporle [1971] Crim LR 706 ... 251
 Spratt [1991] 2 All ER 210, [1990] Crim LR 797, CA ... 663, 664, 687
 Squelch [2017] EWCA Crim 204 ... 558
 Squirrel Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2006] 1 WLR 637 ... 1058, 1063
 SS (Adult: Medical Treatment), re [2002] 1 FLR 445 ... 651
 Stallion (1833) 1 Mood CC 398 ... 1095
 Stancomb v Trowbridge UDC [1910] 2 Ch 190 ... 252
 Stanford [2006] EWCA Crim 258, [2006] 2 Cr App R 5 ... 973, 1107 Stanischewski [2001] NTSC 86 ... 901
 Stansbie v Troman [1948] 2 KB 48 ... 73
 Stapylton v O'Callaghan [1973] 2 All ER 782, DC ... 1049
 Starbev GP Ltd v Interbrew Central European Holdings [2014] EWHC 1311 (Comm) ... 741
 Starglade [2010] EWCA Civ 1314 ... 875
 Steane [1947] KB 997, [1947] 1 All ER 813 ... 95, 98, 121, 354, 361
 Steed [2011] EWCA Crim 75 ... 994
 Steer [1988] AC 111, HL ... 716, 1090, 1092
 Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334 ... 108, 137
 Stephens v Myers (1830) 4 C & P 349 ... 662
 Stephenson [1979] QB 695, [1979] Crim LR 590 ... 103, 107
 Stevens v Gourley (1859) 7 CBNS 99 ... 1014
 Stevens v R [1985] LRC (Crim) 17, discussed (1986) J Crim Law 247 ... 426
 Stewart [2009] EWCA Crim 593 ... 553

- Stewart (No 2) [2010] EWCA Crim 2159 ... 553, 562
- Sticklen [2013] EWCA Crim 615 ... 1021
- Stockdale v Coulson [1974] 3 All ER 154, DC ... 409
- Stokes (1848) 3 Car & Kir 185 ... 302
- Stokes (1925) 19 Cr App R 71 ... 716
- Stokes [1983] RTR 59, CA ... 909
- Stokes [2003] EWCA Crim 2977 ... 688
- Stone and Dobinson [1977] QB 354, [1977] 2 All ER 341 ... 52, 53, 586
- Stonehouse [1978] AC 55 ... 423, 425, 426
- Stones [1989] 1 WLR 156, 89 Cr App R 26, CA ... 1024
- Stopford (1870) 11 Cox CC 643 ... 694
- Storrow and Poole [1983] Crim LR 332 ... 844
- Stratton (1779) 21 State Tr 1045 ... 361
- Stringer [2008] EWCA Crim 1222 ... 92
- Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396, [2011] Crim LR 886 ... 181, 185, 188, 189, 195
- Stripp (1978) 69 Cr App R 318, CA ... 308, 315, 329
- Strowger v John [1974] RTR 124, DC ... 146
- Strutt v Clift [1911] 1 KB 1 ... 273
- Stubing v Germany [2013] 1 FCR 107 ... 815
- Stunt v Bolton [1972] RTR 435, [1972] Crim LR 561 ... 711
- Styles [2015] EWCA Crim 1619 ... 125
- Suchedina [2006] EWHC Crim 2543 ... 444, 447
- Sullivan (1836) 7 C & P 641 ... 579
- Sullivan [1981] Crim LR 46, CA ... 690
- Sullivan [1983] 2 All ER 673, [1983] Crim LR 740, HL ... 291, 295, 299
- Sullivan [1984] AC 156, HL ... 42, 293, 296, 309
- Sullivan and Ballion [2002] Crim LR 758 ... 869
- Sultan [2014] EWCA Crim 2648 ... 282
- Sundas [2011] EWCA Crim 985 ... 750
- Sundhers [1998] Crim LR 497 ... 982
- Supply of Ready Mixed Concrete, re [1995] 1 AC 456 ... 252
- Suratan [2004] EWCA Crim 1246 ... 78
- Surujpaul v R [(1958) 1 WLR 1050, 1958] 3 All ER 300, PC ... 175, 220
- Suski [2016] EWCA Crim 24, [2016] Crim LR 558 ... 441
- Sutcliffe (Peter) (1981) 30 Apr, CCC ... 300
- Suter [1997] CLY 1339, Guildford CC ... 1046
- Sweet v Parsley [1970] AC 132, [1969] 1 All ER 347 ... 150, 151, 158, 160, 164, 170, 173
- Sweetland (1957) 42 Cr App R 62 ... 439
- Swinbourne [2013] EWCA Crim 2329 ... 285
- Swindall and Osborne (1865) 4 F & F 504 ... 65, 192
- Swinscoe [2006] EWCA Crim 2412 ... 786
- Syce v Harrison [1981] Crim LR 110n ... 710, 711
- Syed v DPP [2010] EWHC 81 (Admin) ... 707
- Sykes v CPS (Manchester) [2013] EWHC 3600 (Admin) ... 711
- Sykes v DPP [1962] AC 528, [1961] 3 All ER 33 ... 239
- Sylvester (1985) CO/559/84 ... 873
- Symonds [1998] Crim LR 280 ... 371, 406, 899
- T [1990] Crim LR 256 ... 298
- T [2006] EWCA Crim 2557 ... 715
- T [2009] UKHL 20, [2009] 1 AC 1310, HL ... 343
- T [2011] EWCA Crim 729 ... 240
- T v DPP [2003] Crim LR 622 ... 687
- T v T [1988] 1 All ER 613, Fam Div ... 368, 658
- Taaffe [1983] 2 All ER 625, CA; aff'd [1984] AC 539, [1984] 1 All ER 747, [1984] Crim LR 356, HL ... 332, 336, 337, 494, 1003
- Tabassum [2000] 2 Cr App R 328 ... 672, 674, 777, 783
- Tabnak [2007] EWCA Crim 380, [2007] 2 Cr App R 4 ... 18
- Tacey (1821) Russ & Ry 452 ... 1070
- Tafurelli v DPP [2004] EWHC 2791 (Admin) ... 736
- Tait [1990] 1 QB 290 ... 504, 615, 617, 657
- Talbot [1995] Crim LR 396 ... 933, 937
- Tamanda K [2013] EWCA Crim 560 ... 771
- Tame [2012] EWCA Crim 573 ... 916
- Tamm [1973] Crim LR 115, CA ... 990, 1044
- Tan [2017] EWCA Crim 493 ... 735
- Tandy [1989] 1 All ER 267 ... 553, 562
- Tangerine Confectionery Ltd and Veolia ES (UK) Ltd (2011) 176 JP 349 ... 257
- Tansley v Painter (1968) 112 Sol Jo 1005 ... 194
- Tanylidiz [1998] Crim LR 228 ... 785
- Tao [1977] QB 141, [1976] Crim LR 516 ... 165
- Taran (Farid) [2006] EWCA Crim 1498 ... 759, 794
- Tarley [2012] EWCA Crim 464 ... 971
- Tarling v Government of the Republic of Singapore (1980) 70 Cr App R 77, [1978] Crim LR 490, HL ... 462, 468, 962
- Tarmohammed [1997] Crim LR 458 ... 788
- Taylor (1859) 1 F & F 511 ... 434
- Taylor (1869) LR 1 CCR 194 ... 689, 692
- Taylor [1979] Crim LR 649 ... 1008
- Taylor (1984) 80 Cr App R 327 ... 790
- Taylor [1996] 10 Archbold News 2, CA ... 900
- Taylor [1998] Crim LR 582 ... 177
- Taylor [2003] EWCA Crim 1509 ... 984
- Taylor [2009] EWCA Crim 544 ... 695
- Taylor [2016] UKSC 5, [2016] Crim LR 366 ... 64, 67, 146, 159, 160, 161, 166, 917
- Taylor v Jackson (1898) 78 LT 555 ... 1011
- Taylor and others [2001] EWCA Crim 1044, [2002] Crim LR 205 ... 444, 458
- Taylor (RJ) [2002] Crim LR 203 ... 444, 458
- Tennant [1976] Crim LR 133, CC ... 898
- Termes de la Ley (1920) 122 LT 51 ... 719
- Terry [1984] AC 374, [1984] 1 All ER 65, HL ... 464
- Terry [2001] EWCA Crim 2979 ... 872
- Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Nattrass [1972] AC 153, HL ... 172, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 257
- Testouri [2003] EWCA Crim 3735, [2004] Crim LR 372 ... 460
- Thabo Meli [1954] 1 All ER 373 ... 125, 126, 127
- Thakar [2010] EWCA Crim 2136 ... 1090
- Thambiah v R [1966] AC 37, PC ... 208
- Thames Water Utilities [2013] EWHC 472 (Admin) ... 153
- Theodolou [1963] Crim LR 573 ... 753
- Thet v DPP [2006] EWHC 2701 (Admin) ... 18
- Thomas (1976) 63 Cr App R 65, [1976] Crim LR 517 ... 165
- Thomas (1985) 81 Cr App R 331 ... 658, 662, 668, 786
- Thomas [2014] EWCA Crim 1958 ... 457
- Thomas (Robert) [2005] EWCA Crim 2343 ... 814
- Thomas v Lindop [1950] 1 All ER 966 ... 205, 275
- Thomas v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1233 ... 740
- Thompson (1862) Le & Ca 225 ... 853

- Thompson [1984] 3 All ER 565, [1984] 1 WLR 962, CA ... 1112
- Thompson [2010] EWCA Crim 1216 ... 1062
- Thompson (Andrew) [2014] EWCA Crim 836 ... 784
- Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1 ... 454
- Thorne v Motor Trade Association [1937] AC 797, [1937] 3 All ER 157, HL ... 999, 1000
- Thornhill, unreported ... 1042
- Thornton [1992] 1 All ER 306, [1992] Crim LR 54 ... 526, 528
- Thornton v Mitchell [1940] 1 All ER 339 ... 224
- Thumber (1999) No 199900691, 29 Nov, CA ... 998
- Tibbitts and Windust [1902] 1 KB 77, CCR ... 444
- Tilley [2009] EWCA Crim 1426, [2009] Crim LR 162 ... 46, 156
- Tinarwo [2014] EWCA Crim 1409 ... 144, 153
- Tipu Sultan [2008] EWCA Crim 6 ... 35, 791
- Titley (1880) 14 Cox CC 502 ... 648
- Tokeley-Parry [1999] Crim LR 578 ... 1031, 1047
- Toleikis [2013] EWCA Crim 600 ... 870
- Tolley v Giddings [1964] 2 QB 354, [1964] 1 All ER 201, DC ... 915
- Tolson (1889) 23 QBD 168, CCR ... 139, 153, 334
- Tomblin [1964] Crim LR 780, CCA ... 1041
- Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706, CCR ... 999
- Tomsett [1985] Crim LR 369 ... 842
- Tooley (1709) 11 Mod Rep 242 ... 34
- Toor (1986) 85 Cr App R 116, [1987] Crim LR 122, CA ... 118, 1050, 1051
- Toor (1987) 85 Cr App R 116, [1987] Crim LR 122 ... 115, 118
- Toothill [1998] Crim LR 876 ... 420, 424, 1008
- Tosti [1997] Crim LR 746 ... 424, 427
- Towers (1874) 12 Cox CC 530 ... 84
- Townsend [2013] EWCA Crim 771 ... 691
- Toye [1984] Crim LR 555 ... 1035
- Trainer (1864) 4 F & F 105 ... 380
- Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537, [1971] 1 All ER 110, HL ... 29, 618, 998
- Trebilcock (1858) Dears & B 453 ... 886, 889
- Trifonova (Rossitza) [2017] EWCA Crim 240 ... 724
- Trimingham v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2012] EWHC 1296 (QB) ... 740
- Tristmire Ltd v Mew and others [2011] EWCA Civ 912 ... 848
- Troughton v Metropolitan Police [1987] Crim LR 138, DC ... 922
- True (1922) 16 Cr App R 164 ... 302
- Tsap [2008] EWCA Crim 2679 ... 753
- Tuberville v Savage (1669) 1 Mood Rep 3 ... 662
- Tuck v Priestler (1887) 19 QBD 627 ... 18
- Tuck v Robson [1970] 1 WLR 741, DC ... 192
- Tucker [2016] EWCA Crim 593 ... 749
- Turbill [2013] EWCA Crim 1422, [2014] Crim LR 388 ... 112, 134, 712
- Turner (No 2) [1971] 2 All ER 441, CA ... 854
- Turner [1991] Crim LR 57 ... 194, 219
- Turner [2006] EWCA Crim 63 ... 820
- Turner [2008] EWCA Crim 272 ... 157
- Turner v DPP (1978) 68 Cr App R 70, [1978] Crim LR 754 ... 6
- Twine [1967] Crim LR 710 ... 536
- Twose (1879) 14 Cox CC 327 ... 1088
- Tynan v Balmer [1967] 1 QB 91 ... 709
- Tyrrell [1894] 1 QB 710 ... 229, 230, 234, 442, 484, 800
- Uddin [1998] 2 All ER 744 ... 638
- Unah [2011] EWCA Crim 1837, [2012] Crim LR 221 ... 172, 174
- Unsworth [2010] EWHC 3037 (Admin) ... 1081, 1083
- Uxbridge Permanent Building Society v Pickard [1939] 2 KB 248 ... 268
- V [2010] EWCA Crim 721 ... 640
- Vageesan S [2008] EWCA Crim 346 ... 818
- Vaiculevicius [2013] EWCA 185 ... 807
- Valderrama-Vega [1985] Crim LR 220 ... 354, 361
- Valentine [1991] 1 QB 260 ... 699
- Vallente [2011] EWCA Crim 294 ... 813
- Vallor [2004] 1 Cr App R (S) 54 ... 1112
- Valujevs [2014] EWCA Crim 2888 ... 961
- Van Colle v CC of Hertfordshire [2008] UKHL 50 ... 21
- van Dao [2012] EWCA Crim 1717 ... 348
- Van Dongen [2005] EWCA Crim 1728 ... 525, 545
- Vane v Yiannopoulos [1965] AC 486, [1965] Crim LR 401, HL ... 271, 272
- Vann and Davis [1996] Crim LR 52 ... 166
- Various Claimants v Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools [2012] UKSC 56 ... 267
- Varley [2017] EWCA Crim 268 ... 218
- Vasili [2011] EWCA Crim 615 ... 748
- Vaughan [2014] EWCA Crim 1456 ... 697
- Veasey [1999] Crim LR 158 ... 751
- Vehicle and Operator Services Agency v Ace Crane and Transport Ltd [2010] EWHC 288 (Admin) ... 146
- Vehicle Inspectorate v Nuttall [1999] 1 WLR 629, [1999] Crim LR 674 ... 104, 156
- Velasquez [1995] 7 Arch News 3, CA ... 431
- Velumyl [1989] Crim LR 299 ... 888
- Venclovas [2013] EWCA Crim 2182 ... 504
- Venna [1976] QB 421, [1975] 3 All ER 788, CA ... 658, 664
- Verrier [1965] Crim LR 732 ... 361
- Vickers [1957] 2 QB 664, CCA ... 514
- Viera [2009] EWCA Crim 528 ... 942
- Vigon v DPP [1998] Crim LR 289, DC ... 820
- Villinsky [1892] 2 QB 597 ... 1036
- Vinall [2011] EWCA Crim 2652, [2012] Crim LR 386 ... 887, 891, 896, 907
- Vincent [2001] Crim LR 488, [2001] 2 Cr App R 150, [2001] EWCA Crim 295, CA ... 923
- Vinter v UK [2014] Crim LR 81 ... 516
- Virgo (1988) Cr App R (S) 427 ... 643
- VOSA v Conway [2012] EWHC 2930 (Admin) ... 250
- W [2006] EWCA Crim 2723 ... 46
- W [2013] EWCA Crim 1475 ... 807
- W [2014] EWCA Crim 2232 ... 818
- W [2018] EWCA Crim 690 ... 82, 653
- W Stevenson & Sons (A Partnership) [2008] EWCA Crim 273 ... 260, 604
- W B Anderson & Sons Ltd v Rhodes (Liverpool) Ltd [1967] 2 All ER 850 ... 255, 601
- W (A Minor) v Dolbey (1983) 88 Cr App R 1, [1983] Crim LR 681 ... 106
- W(P) [2016] EWCA Crim 745 ... 207
- Wacker [2002] EWCA Crim 1944, [2003] Crim LR 108 ... 585, 588, 607

- Wade (1844) 1 Car & Kir 739 ... 1041
- Wai Yu-tsang v R [1991] 4 All ER 664, PC ... 465, 467, 468
- Wain [1995] 2 Cr App R 660 ... 862
- Wainwright v Home Office [2003] UKHL 53 ... 667
- Wakeman (1912) 8 Cr App R 18 ... 839
- Wakeman [2011] EWCA Crim 1649 ... 732
- Walford (1899) 34 L Jo 116 ... 714
- Walker (1824) 1 C & P 320 ... 65
- Walker [1962] Crim LR 458 ... 438
- Walker (1989) 90 Cr App R 226, [1990] Crim LR 44, CA ... 414
- Walker [2006] EWCA Crim 1907 ... 803, 806
- Walker [2010] EWCA Crim 2184 ... 1002
- Walker [2016] EWCA Crim 751, [2016] Crim LR 848 ... 236
- Walker v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (MPC) [2014] EWCA Civ 897, (2014) The Times, 16 July, CA (Civ Div) ... 667, 705
- Walkington [1979] 2 All ER 716, [1979] 1 WLR 1169, [1979] Crim LR 526, CA ... 420, 1015
- Wall's case (1802) 28 State Tr 51 ... 80
- Walls [2011] EWCA Crim 443, [2011] 2 Cr App R 6 ... 283
- Waltham (1849) 3 Cox CC 442 ... 689
- Walters [1969] 1 QB 255 ... 43
- Walters v Lunt [1951] 2 All ER 645 ... 223, 342, 1035
- Walton v R [1978] AC 788, PC ... 565
- Wang [2003] EWCA Crim 3228 ... 425, 755
- Wang [2005] UKHL 9 ... 748
- Waqanika [2014] EWCA Crim 902 ... 964
- Warburton and Hubbersty [2006] EWCA Crim 627, CA ... 65, 581
- Ward (1872) LR 1 CCR 356 ... 696
- Warne [1997] 7 Archbold News 2 ... 748
- Warner (1970) 55 Cr App R 93, [1967] Crim LR 528 ... 170, 887
- Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] AC 256, [1968] 2 All ER 256, [1967] 3 All ER 93, [1967] Crim LR 528 ... 44, 115, 116, 151, 159, 162, 163, 164, 169, 170, 972, 1036
- Warner v Riddiford (1858) 4 CBNS 180 ... 719
- Waterfall [1970] 1 QB 148, [1969] 3 All ER 1048, CA ... 946
- Waterfield [1964] 1 QB 164, [1963] 3 All ER 659 ... 706
- Waters [2015] EWCA Crim 402 ... 896
- Watkins [2010] EWCA Crim 2349 ... 223
- Watmore v Jenkins [1962] 2 QB 572, [1962] 2 All ER 868, DC ... 39, 167
- Watson [1916] 2 KB 385 ... 1043
- Watson [1989] 2 All ER 865, [1989] Crim LR 733 ... 569, 576, 577, 578, 1008
- Watson (1989) 89 Cr App R 211, CA ... 1018, 1023
- Watson [2015] EWCA Crim 559 ... 761
- Watson v Coupland [1945] 1 All ER 217 ... 272
- Watt and others [2011] EWCA Crim 1325 ... 637
- Watts [1998] Crim LR 833 ... 589
- Waugh (1976) The Times, 1 Oct, Knightsbridge CC ... 243, 711
- Waverley Borough Council v Fletcher [1995] 4 All ER 756 ... 856
- Weatherall [1968] Crim LR 115, CCC ... 646, 717
- Webb [1969] 2 QB 278 ... 282
- Webb [2011] EWCA Crim 152 ... 628
- Webley v Buxton [1977] QB 481, [1977] Crim LR 160, DC ... 431
- Webster [2002] EWCA Crim 1346 ... 1051
- Webster [2003] EWCA Crim 1946 ... 438
- Webster [2006] EWCA Crim 415 ... 192, 193, 488
- Webster [2006] EWCA Crim 2894 ... 865
- Webster [2010] EWCA Crim 2819 ... 148
- Webster v CPS [2014] EWHC 2516 (Admin) ... 569, 589
- Webster and Warwick [1995] 2 All ER 168, [1995] 1 Cr App R 492 ... 1090
- Wedell [2007] EWCA Crim 2878 ... 997
- Weight v Long [1986] Crim LR 746 ... 707
- Weir [2001] 1 WLR 421, [2001] Crim LR 656, HL ... 6
- Welham v DPP [1961] AC 103 ... 464, 465, 991
- Wellard [1978] 3 All ER 161, [1978] 1 WLR 921 ... 672, 726, 728, 773
- Wells [2004] EWCA Crim 79 ... 1046
- Wells [2015] EWCA Crim 2, [2015] Crim LR 359 ... 282, 286, 287
- Wenton [2010] EWCA Crim 2361 ... 1092
- Wershof v Metropolitan Police Comr [1978] 3 All ER 540 ... 709
- Wesley [1963] 1 WLR 1200 ... 186
- West (1848) 2 Cox CC 500 ... 506
- West [1948] 1 KB 709, [1948] 1 All ER 718 ... 459
- West (1999) 14 Sep, CA, unreported ... 900
- Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 ... 863, 864, 865, 866
- Westlake v DPP [2016] EWHC 825 (Admin) ... 109
- Westminster City Council v Croyalghrange Ltd [1986] 2 All ER 353, (1986) 83 Cr App R 155, [1986] Crim LR 693, HL ... 115, 157, 332, 334
- Wheat [1921] 2 KB 119 ... 151
- Wheatley and Penn v Commissioner of Police of the British Virgin Islands [2006] UKPC 24, [2006] 1 WLR 1683, [2006] 2 Cr App R 21 ... 839, 871
- Wheeldon v CPS [2018] EWHC 249 (Admin) ... 403, 707
- Wheeler (1967) 52 Cr App R 28 ... 27
- Wheeler (1990) 92 Cr App R 279, CA ... 826, 843
- Wheeler [2014] EWCA Crim 2706 ... 415
- Whitchurch (1890) 24 QBD 420 ... 442, 646
- White [1910] 2 KB 124, CCA ... 64, 83, 95, 423
- White [2001] Crim LR 576, CA ... 700
- White [2010] EWCA Crim 1929 ... 771
- White [2014] EWCA Crim 714 ... 845, 957
- White v Bayley (1861) 10 CBNS 227 ... 1013
- Whitefield (1984) 79 Cr App R 36 ... 227
- Whitehouse v Gay News Ltd and Lemon [1979] AC 617 ... 146
- Whitely [1991] Crim LR 436, CA ... 1110
- Whiteside [1989] Crim LR 436 ... 1027, 1029
- Whiting (1987) 85 Cr App R 78, [1987] Crim LR 473 ... 1008
- Whitta [2006] EWCA Crim 2626 ... 794
- Whittaker v Campbell [1984] QB 318, [1983] 3 All ER 582, DC ... 911, 912
- Whitton [2006] EWCA Crim 3229 ... 819
- Whitwam [2008] EWCA Crim 239 ... 1065, 1067
- Whybrow (1951) 35 Cr App R 141, CCA ... 412, 413
- Whyte [1987] 3 All ER 416 ... 384, 399
- Wibberley [1966] 2 QB 214, [1965] 3 All ER 718, CCA ... 910

- Widdows [2011] EWCA Crim 1500 ... 743
 Widdowson (1985) 82 Cr App R 314 ... 426, 429
 Wiffin v Kincard (1807) 2 Bos & PNR 471 ... 667
 Wiggins [2001] RTR 37 ... 917
 Wiggins [2012] EWCA Crim 885 ... 1023
 Wilcocks [2016] EWCA Crim 2043, [2017] Crim LR 706 ... 303, 546, 547, 548, 633
 Wilcox v Jeffery [1951] 1 All ER 464 ... 188, 193, 195
 Wiley (1850) 2 Den 37 ... 1040, 1043
 Wilkes [2004] EWCA Crim 3136 ... 743
 Wilkinson v DPP [2006] EWHC 3012 (Admin) ... 1065
 Willer (1986) 83 Cr App R 225 ... 364, 365, 406
 William [2013] EWCA Crim 1262 ... 1058, 1061
 Williams [1923] 1 KB 340, CCA ... 672, 673, 776
 Williams [1953] 1 QB 660, CCA ... 874
 Williams (1986) 84 Cr App R 299, [1987] Crim LR 198, CA ... 101
 Williams [1987] 3 All ER 441 ... 337
 Williams (1991) 95 Cr App R 1 ... 581
 Williams [2001] 1 Cr App R 362, [2001] Crim LR 253 ... 844, 845
 Williams [2005] EWCA Crim 669 ... 400
 Williams [2010] EWCA Crim 2552, [2011] Crim LR 471 ... 65, 77, 85
 Williams [2012] EWCA Crim 1483 ... 1002
 Williams [2012] EWCA Crim 2162, [2013] Crim LR 447, [2013] Crim LR 983 ... 149, 163, 164
 Williams [2013] EWCA Crim 1262 ... 995
 Williams [2013] EWCA Crim 2749 ... 562
 Williams v DPP (1993) 98 Cr App R 209, DC ... 232
 Williams v Phillips (1957) 41 Cr App R 5, (1957) 121 JP 163, DC ... 855, 870
 Williams and Davies (1991) 95 Cr App R 1, [1992] Crim LR 198 ... 68, 81, 687
 Williamson (1977) 67 Cr App R 35, [1978] Crim LR 229 ... 749
 Willis and Syme [1972] 3 All ER 797, CA ... 1040
 Willoughby [2004] EWCA Crim 3365, [2005] Crim LR 393 ... 576, 586, 588
 Wills (1990) 92 Cr App R 297 ... 862
 Wilmott v Atack [1977] QB 498, [1976] Crim LR 575, DC ... 157, 712
 Wilson [1984] AC 242, HL ... 661, 666, 678, 682, 689, 692, 696
 Wilson [1996] Crim LR 573, CA ... 681
 Wilson [1997] 1 All ER 119, [1997] Crim LR 53 ... 257
 Wilson [2007] EWCA Crim 1251, [2008] Crim LR 138 ... 363
 Wilson [2007] EWCA Crim 2762 ... 813
 Wilson [2013] EWCA Crim 1780, [2014] Crim LR 368 ... 257, 990
 Wilson v Pringle [1987] QB 237, [1986] 2 All ER 440, CA ... 658
 Wilson and Jenkins [1984] AC 242, HL ... 1008
 Windle [1952] 2 QB 826 ... 299, 300
 Wines [1953] 2 All ER 1497, CCA ... 987
 Wingate v SRA [2018] EWCA Civ 366 ... 881
 Wings Ltd v Ellis [1984] 1 All ER 1046, [1984] 1 WLR 731; revsd [1985] AC 272, [1984] 3 All ER 577, HL ... 56, 125, 157, 159
 Winsin [1969] 1 QB 371 ... 116, 271, 272
 Winston [1999] 1 Cr App R 337 ... 1116
 Winter [2007] EWCA Crim 3493 ... 617
 Winter and Winter [2011] EWCA Crim 1474 ... 52, 586, 588, 593
 Winzar v Chief Constable of Kent (1983) The Times, 28 Mar, DC ... 43, 167
 Wisniewshi [2004] EWCA Crim 3361 ... 818
 Withers [1975] AC 842, [1975] Crim LR 647 ... 465, 1055
 Woby v AJB and LCO [1986] Crim LR 183, DC ... 183
 Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2003] 3 All ER 932, CA ... 734
 Wood (1830) 1 Mood CC 278 ... 689, 691
 Wood [1999] Crim LR 564 ... 872, 986
 Wood [2002] EWCA Crim 832, CA ... 884
 Wood [2008] EWCA Crim 1305 ... 553, 562
 Wood v DPP [2008] EWHC 1056 (Admin) ... 667, 706
 Wood v Richards [1977] RTR 201, [1977] Crim LR 295, DC ... 368
 Woodman [1974] QB 754, CA ... 855, 857
 Woodrow (1846) 15 M & W 404 ... 144
 Woods [1969] 1 QB 447, [1968] 3 All ER 709, CA ... 1049, 1050
 Woods (1981) 74 Cr App R 312, [1982] Crim LR 42 ... 317, 790
 Woods [2002] EWHC 85 (Admin) ... 70, 701
 Woodward v Koessler [1958] 3 All ER 557 ... 749, 750
 Woolcock [1977] Crim LR 104 ... 1070
 Woollin [1999] AC 82, [1999] 1 Cr App R 8, [1998] Crim LR 890 ... 91, 92, 93, 94, 96, 98, 99, 201, 202, 414, 510, 515, 934
 Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462 ... 23, 27, 302
 Wootton [2005] EWAC Crim 2137 ... 813
 Workman [2006] EWCA Crim 2623, [2007] 1 Cr App R 637, CA ... 640
 Workman [2014] EWCA Crim 575 ... 525
 Workman v Cowper [1961] 1 All ER 683 ... 1085
 Wragg [2006] EWCA Crim 2022 ... 816
 Wragg v DPP [2005] EWHC 1389 (Admin) ... 707
 Wright [1960] Crim LR 366 ... 933
 Wright [1992] Crim LR 596 ... 754
 Wright [2000] Crim LR 510 ... 350
 Wright [2006] EWCA Crim 2672 ... 818
 Wright [2007] All ER (D) 267 (Nov) ... 766
 Wrigley [1957] Crim LR 57 ... 122, 1015
 WT [2005] EWCA Crim 2448 ... 807
 Wynn (1887) 16 Cox CC 231 ... 886, 889
 X [2010] EWCA Crim 2367 ... 732
 X City Council v MB [2006] EWHC 168 (Fam) ... 763
 X Ltd [2013] EWCA Crim 818 ... 172
 X v Bedfordshire County Council [1995] 2 AC 633, HL ... 609
 Y [2008] EWCA Crim 10, [2008] Crim LR 466 ... 237
 Y [2014] EWCA Crim 413 ... 817
 Yaman [2012] EWCA Crim 1075 ... 381, 384
 Yaqoob [2005] EWCA Crim 1269 ... 586, 589
 Yarl's Wood Immigration v Bedfordshire Police Authority [2008] EWHC 2207 (Admin) ... 705
 Yeadon and Birch (1861) 9 Cox CC 91 ... 692
 Yeandel v Fisher [1966] 1 QB 440, [1965] 3 All ER 158 ... 162

Yearworth v North Bristol NHS Trust [2009] EWCA Civ 37 ... 868
 Yew [2013] EWCA Crim 809 ... 977
 Yip Chiu-Cheung [1995] 1 AC 111, [1994] 2 All ER 824, PC ... 88, 232, 379, 443, 452, 454, 459
 Yohannes [2011] EWCA Crim 1362 ... 899
 Yorkshire Traction Co v Vehicle Inspectorate [2001] RTR 518, DC ... 156
 Young [2005] EWCA Crim 2963 ... 509
 Zafar [2008] EWCA Crim 184 ... 761, 970
 Zahid [2010] EWCA Crim 2158 ... 144, 153, 752, 972
 Zaman [2010] EWCA Crim 209 ... 219, 237, 460, 585, 596
 Zebedee [2012] EWCA Crim 1428 ... 535
 Zimmel [1985] Crim LR 213, (1985) 81 Cr App R 279, CA ... 470, 936
 Zerei [2012] EWCA Crim 1114 ... 896, 907
 Zevez [2002] Crim LR 648 ... 1109, 1111
 Zhang [2007] EWCA Crim 2018 ... 772, 774

EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS (ECHR)

A v UK [1998] TLR 578, (1999) 27 EHRR 611 ... 684
 ABC v Ireland [2010] ECHR 2032 ... 643
 Al-Skeini v UK (2011) 53 EHRR 18 ... 508
 Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus, 9 Oct 1997 [1998] Crim LR 823 ... 392
 Antoine v UK (App no 62960/00) ... 286
 Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528 ... 718
 Austin v MPC (2012) 55 EHRR 14 ... 723
 Aydin v Turkey (1997) 25 EHRR 251 ... 795
 Blume v Spain (2000) 30 EHRR 632 ... 718
 Brumarescu v Romania (2001) 33 EHRR 35 ... 338
 Bubbins v UK [2005] 41 EHRR 24 ... 393
 Costello-Roberts v UK (1993) 19 EHRR 112 ... 684
 Da Silva v UK (2016) 63 EHRR 12 ... 393
 Engel v Netherlands [1976] 1 EHRR 647 ... 718
 G v Federal Republic of Germany 60 DR 252, 262 (1989) ... 881
 G v UK (2011) 53 EHRR SE25, [2012] Crim LR 47 ... 144, 149, 152, 799, 800, 802
 Gillan and Quinton v UK (2010) 50 EHRR 45 ... 718
 Giuliani v Italy (2012) 54 EHRR 10 ... 393
 Glass v UK (2000) (App no 61827/00) ... 669
 Glass v UK [2004] 1 FLR 1019 ... 60
 Gul v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 28 ... 392
 Guzzardi v Italy (1981) 3 EHRR 333 ... 668, 718
 H v UK (App no 15023/89) ... 292
 Haas v Switzerland (2011) 53 EHRR 33 ... 626, 628
 Hansen v Denmark (App no 28971/95) ... 149
 Hashman and Harrup v UK (1999) 30 EHRR 241, [2000] Crim LR 185 ... 470, 596
 HL v UK (App no 45508/99) ... 368, 720
 HM v Switzerland 26 Feb 2002 (App no 39187/98) ... 718
 Huohuanainen v Finland [2007] EHRLR 472 ... 392
 Hutchinson v UK (App no 57592/08) [2017] ECHR 65 ... 516
 Iglesias Gil and AIU v Spain (App no 56673/00) 2003 ... 733
 KA & AD v Belgium (2005) (App no 42758/98) ... 683

Kelly (App no 17579/90) ... 395
 Kokkinakis v Greece (1994) 17 EHRR 397 (App no 14307/88), Judgment of 25 May 1993 ... 21, 338
 Laskey v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 39 ... 682, 683, 825
 Ljunqvist v Sweden [2014] ACD 173(60), DC ... 733
 Luberti v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 440 ... 297
 McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 95 ... 392, 393
 Maire v Portugal (2003) (App no 48206/99) ... 733
 Nachova v Bulgaria (2004) 39 EHRR 37 ... 397
 Paton v UK [1980] 3 EHRR 408 ... 505, 655
 Pendragon v UK [1999] EHRLR 223, (1999) 27 EHRR CD 179 ... 700
 Pretty v UK [2002] 35 EHRR 1 ... 23, 622, 628
 RA v UK [2014] ECHR 1288 ... 353
 Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237 ... 718
 Ramsahai v Netherlands (2006) 43 EHRR 39 ... 392
 Reid v UK (2003) 37 EHRR 9 ... 297
 Reynolds v UK (2012) 55 EHRR 35 ... 393
 Rivas v France [2005] Crim LR 305 ... 394
 RL v France [2005] Crim LR 306 ... 394
 RV v UK (App no 75321/12) 2016 ... 353
 Salibaku v France (1998) 13 EHRR 379 ... 24, 149
 Seven Individuals v Sweden 29 DR 104, EComHR ... 684
 Stafford v UK [2002] 35 EHRR 121 ... 516
 Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603 ... 78, 1088
 Sunday Times v United Kingdom (No 1) [1979] 2 EHRR 245 ... 596
 Sutherland v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD 22 ... 825
 SW v UK; CR v UK [1995] 21 EHRR 363 ... 22, 338
 T & V v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 121 ... 343
 Van Colle v UK (2013) 56 EHRR 23 ... 21
 Vinter v UK [2014] Crim LR 81 ... 516
 Vo v France [2004] 2 FCR 577 ... 506, 643, 650, 655
 Winterwerp v Netherlands [1979] 2 EHRR 387, [1994] Crim LR 84 ... 297
 X v Austria (1976) 7 DR 87 ... 506
 X v Norway (App no 867/60) ... 506
 X v UK (1980) 1 DR 244 ... 506
 Y v UK (1992) 17 EHRR 238 ... 684

INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL IN THE FORMER YUGOSLAVIA (ICTY)

Prosecutor v Drazen Erdemovic (Case No IT-96-22-A) ... 363

AUSTRALIA

A v Hayden (No 2) (1984) 156 CLR 532 ... 379
 Aubrey v The Queen [2017] HCA 18 ... 693
 Barker v R (1983) 7 ALJR 426 ... 1011, 1012
 Brien (1903) 3 SRNSW 410 ... 33, 942
 Bruce [1988] VR 579 ... 1046
 Burton v Davies [1953] QSR 26 ... 719
 Davidson [1969] VR 667 ... 653
 Doodeward v Spence (1908) 95 R (NSW) 107 ... 868
 DPP v Fraser [2008] NSWSC 244 ... 1071
 Evans and Gardiner [1976] VR 517 ... 360
 Evans and Gardiner (No 2) [1976] VR 523 ... 76, 360
 Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 22 ... 879

Farrar [1992] 1 VR 207 ... 549
 Farrington v Thomson and Bridgland [1959] VR 286 ... 1011
 Frame v Kennedy 2008 HCJAC 25 ... 751
 G J Coles & Co Ltd v Goldsworthy [1985] WAR 183 ... 254
 Galvin (No 1) [1961] VR 733 ... 708
 Galvin (No 2) [1961] VR 740 ... 708
 Giogianni (1984) 156 CLR 473 ... 206
 Hammond v R [2013] NSWCCA 93 ... 1071
 Haywood [1971] VR 755 ... 573
 Holland (1993) 117 ALR 193, High Ct ... 789
 Hurley and Murray [1967] VR 526 ... 350, 356
 Hyland (1898) 24 VLR 101 ... 648
 Iby [2005] NSWCCA 178, [2005] Crim LR 742 ... 505
 Lambourn [2007] VSCA 187 ... 1012
 Lawrence [1980] 1 NSWLR 122 ... 350
 Loughnan [1981] VR 443 ... 377
 McLeod [2003] HCA 24 ... 879
 Maher v Musson (1934) 52 CLR 100 ... 173
 Matusевич v R (1977) 51 ALJR 657 ... 443
 Menniss [1973] 2 NSWLR 113 ... 313
 Miller v The Queen [2016] HCA 30 ... 204, 217
 Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339 ... 673
 Neil [1909] St R Qd 225 ... 648
 Osland v R (1998) 73 ALJR 173, HC ... 184
 Parsons [1998] 2 VR 478, aff'd 73 ALJR 27, HC ... 846
 Peters v The Queen (1998) 192 CLR 493 ... 879
 Phillips v Pringle [1973] 1 NSWLR 275, CCA NSW ... 1082
 Previsic [2008] VSCA 112 ... 1070
 Proudman v Dayman (1941) 67 CLR 536 ... 173
 R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633 ... 879
 Reynhoudt (1962) 36 ALJR 26 ... 708
 Robinson (1884) 10 VLR 131 ... 943
 Roffel [1985] VR 511 ... 866
 Russell [1933] VLR 59 ... 192
 Ryan v R (1967) 40 ALJR 488 ... 41
 S and Y Investments (No 2) Pty Ltd v Commercial Co of Australia Ltd (1986) 21 App R 204 ... 601
 SAJ v The Queen [2012] VSCA 243 ... 879
 Salisbury [1976] VR 452 ... 692
 Salvo [1980] VR 401 ... 879
 Sancoff v Halford [1973] Qd R 25 ... 128
 Scott [1967] VR 276 ... 125
 Sodeman (1936) 55 CLR 192 ... 302
 Stapleton v R (1952) 86 CLR 358 ... 300
 Storn (1865) 5 SCR (NSW) 26 ... 1014
 Taiapa [2010] HCA 53 ... 357
 Taylor [2004] VSCA 189 ... 1012
 Thomas v R (1937) 59 CLR 279 ... 132
 Timbu Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47 ... 35
 Weise [1969] VR 953 ... 300

CANADA

Ashlee 212 CCC (3d) 477, Alberta CA ... 767
 Aravena [2015] ONCA 250 ... 363
 Bolduc v Bird (1967) 63 DLR (2d) 82 (SCC), rev'd Br Columbia CA 61 DLR (2d) ... 672–3, 782
 Chaulk [1990] 3 SCR 1303 ... 300
 Cicarelli (1989) 54 CCC (3d) 121 ... 679
 City of Sault Ste Marie (1978) 85 DLR 3d 161, (1978) 40 CCC (2d) 353 ... 173, 174
 Conn v David Spencer Ltd [1930] 1 DLR 805 ... 719

Gauthier [2013] SCC 32 ... 227
 Gross v Wright [1923] 2 DLR 171 ... 1011
 Harms [1944] 2 DLR 61 ... 672
 Irwin v R (1968) 68 DLR (2d) 485 ... 648
 JA and the AG of Canada [2011] 2 SCR 440 ... 767
 Kundeus (1976) 24 CCC (2d) 276 ... 122
 Latimer [2001] 1 SCR 3 ... 375
 Leary v R [1978] 1 SCR 29, (1977) 74 DLR (3d) 103, SCC ... 321
 Levine [1927] 1 DLR 740 ... 45
 McLeod (1954) 111 CCC 106 ... 708
 McLeod and Georgia Straight Publishing Co Ltd (1970) 75 WWR 161 ... 208
 Maurantonio (1967) 65 DLR (2d) 674 ... 672
 Maybin [2012] 2 SCR 30 ... 68, 71
 Morgentaler [1976] 1 SCR 616, (1975) 20 CCC (2d) 449 (SCC) ... 368, 653
 O'Brien [1954] SCR 666 (Canada) ... 454
 Oakley (1986) 24 CCC (3d) 351 ... 295
 Oomen [2004] 2 SCR 507 ... 300
 Osolin [1993] 4 SCR 595 ... 771
 Pappajohn v R (1980) 52 CCC (2d) 481, [1980] SCR 120 ... 333, 771
 Park [1995] 2 SCR 836 ... 771
 Parks (1990) 95 DLR (4th) 27 ... 296
 Parnerkar [1974] SCR 449, 10 CCC (2d) 253 ... 297
 Perka (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 1 ... 345, 377
 R v George (1960) 128 Can CC 289 ... 319
 R v Ryan (2013) 290 CCC (3d) 477, Supreme Court ... 363
 R v Sharpe [2001] 1 SCR 45 ... 817
 Rabey (1977) 79 DLR (3d) 414, (1977) 37 CCC (2d) 461; aff'd [1980] SCR 513, 54 CCC (2d) 1 ... 38, 297
 Rabey (1981) 114 DLR (3d) 193 ... 295
 Racimore (1976) 25 CCC (2d) 143 ... 39
 Ryan [2013] SCC 3 ... 355, 356
 Sansregret v R [1985] 1 SCR 570 ... 117
 Smithers (1976) 34 CCC (2d) 427 (Sup Ct) ... 79
 Stewart (1988) 50 DLR 1 ... 852
 Stone [1999] 2 SCR 290 ... 40
 USA v Dynar [197] 2 SCR 462 ... 114
 Vu [2012] 2 SCR 411 ... 724, 726
 Whitehouse [1941] 1 WWR 112, CA BC ... 227

HONG KONG

Chan Kam Shing, [2016] HKCFA 87 ... 204, 216
 Chan Man-sin v A-G of Hong Kong [1988] 1 All ER 1, PC ... 838, 844, 887, 961
 Chan Wai Lam v R [1981] Crim LR 497 ... 889
 Kwok Chak Ming (Hong Kong, 1963) discussed [1963] Crim LR 748 ... 506
 Lee Shek Ching v R [1986] LRC (Crim) 718 (CA) ... 240
 Po Koon Tai [1980] HKLR 492, Cr App No 836/1979, Sup Ct ... 451

INDIA

Khandu (1890) ILR 15 Bom 194 ... 125

IRELAND

A-G v Whelan [1934] IR 518, CCA ... 345, 360
 CC v Ireland (2006) IESC 33 ... 148, 150, 799
 Dunne v DPP [2016] IESC 24 ... 363

NEW ZEALAND

- Baker (1909) 28 NZLR 536 ... 208
 Cottle [1958] NZLR 999 ... 303
 Donaldson v Police [1968] NZLR 32 ... 709
 Douglas [1966] NZLR 45 ... 646
 Finau v Department of Labour [1984] 2 NZLR 396 ... 44, 409
 Kamipeli [1975] 2 NZLR 610 ... 313
 Kilbride v Lake [1962] NZLR 590 ... 146
 Lee (2006) 22 CRNZ 568 ... 667
 Matthews v Dwan [1949] NZLR 1037 ... 711
 Murray Wright Ltd [1970] NZLR 476 ... 602
 Nosworthy (1907) 26 NZLR 536 ... 648
 Palmer-Brown v Police [1985] 1 NZLR 365, CA ... 43
 Police v Smith [1974] 2 NZLR 32 ... 750
 Ramsay [1967] NZLR 1005 ... 126
 Schriek [1997] 2 NZLR 139 ... 189
 Scully (1903) 23 NZLR 380 ... 647, 648
 Sweetman v Industries and Commerce Department [1970] NZLR 139 ... 220
 Williams [1985] 1 NZLR 294 ... 879

NIGERIA

- State v Otu [1964] NNLR 113 (Nigeria) ... 454

NORTHERN IRELAND

- Anderson [2003] NI 12, CA ... 513, 691
 Browne [1973] NI 96, CCA ... 401, 402, 403
 Clinton v Cahill [1998] NI 200 ... 851
 Devlin v Armstrong [1971] NI 13 ... 399, 400
 Fegan [1972] NI 80 ... 406
 Fitzpatrick [1977] NI 20, CA ... 358
 Getty v Antrim County Council [1950] NI 114 ... 1070
 Hopkins [2005] NICC 1 ... 655
 Kelly v Ministry of Defence [1989] NI 341 ... 395
 McCarney [2015] NICA 27 ... 635
 McPhillips (1990) 6 BNIL ... 453, 454
 Mo [2013] NICA 49 ... 1058
 PSNI v MacRitchie [2008] NICA 26 ... 820
 R v McDonald (1999) NICC (4 March) ... 642
 S [2006] NICA 34, CA ... 825
 White [2017] NICA 49 ... 313

RHODESIA

- Shorty [1950] SR 280 ... 125

SCOTLAND

- Ahmad v HM Advocate [2009] HCJAC 60 ... 1058, 1059
 Burns v HM Advocate 1995 SLT 1090 ... 401, 402
 Curlett v M'Kechnie (1938) JC 176 ... 711
 Grieve v MacLeod 1967 SLT 70 ... 752
 HM Advocate v Dingwall (1867) 5 Irv 466 ... 548

- Law Hospital NHS Trust v Lord Advocate [1996] 2 FLR 407 ... 59
 MacAngus and Kane v HM Advocate [2009] HCJAC 8 ... 582
 Ross v HM Advocate (1991) SCCR 823 ... 39
 Smith v Shanks 2014 SLT 626 ... 755
 Transco v HM Advocate 2004 SLT 41 ... 255, 588, 601

SOUTH AFRICA

- Achterdam 1911 EDL 336 ... 167
 Brambles Holdings Ltd v Carey (1976) 15 SASR 270 ... 254
 Canestra 1951 (2) SA 317 (AD) ... 409
 Chiswibo 1960 (2) SA 714 ... 126
 Dodd (1974) 7 SASR 151 ... 40
 Hallett [1969] SASR 141 ... 70
 Harris [1927] NPD 347 ... 454
 King [1978] 19 SASR 118 ... 1014
 McCoy 1953 (2) SA 4 (AD) ... 675
 Mubila 1956 (1) SA 31 ... 80
 O'Sullivan v Fisher [1954] SASR 33 ... 44, 167
 S v De Blom 1977 (3) SA 513 (AD) ... 129
 S v Masilele 1968 (2) SA 558 (AD) ... 127
 S v Robinson 1968 (1) SA 666 ... 211, 219
 S v Thomo 1969 (1) SA 385 ... 191
 Samuels v Stubbs [1972] 4 SASR 200 ... 1070, 1072

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

- Bush v Commonwealth 78 Ky 268 (1880) (Kentucky CA) ... 77, 83
 Bustler v Satte 184 SE 2d 24 (1944) (SC Tennessee) ... 857
 Commonwealth v Crow 303 Pa 91 (1931) ... 430
 Commonwealth v Kennedy 170 Mass 18 (1897) ... 423
 Delany v State 164 Tenn 432 (1932) (Tennessee) ... 454
 McDaniel v State 15 Tex Crim 115 (1942) ... 719
 People v Beardsley (1967) 113 NW 1128 ... 52
 People v Lewis 124 Cal 551 (1899) (Sup Ct California) ... 81, 582
 Pinkerton v United States 328 US 640 (1946) ... 179
 Robinson v California 370 US 660, 8 L Ed 2d 758 (1962) ... 44
 Scales v US 327 US 203 (1961) ... 43
 State v Frazier 98 SW 2d 707 (1936) (Mo) ... 598
 State v Hamilton and Lawrie 13 Nev 386 (1878) ... 177
 State v Kinchen (1910) 52 So 185 ... 227
 State v Tally (1894) 102 Ala 25 ... 444
 State v Volschenk 1968 (2) PH H283 ... 675
 State v Wilson (1955) 218 Ore 575, 346 P (2d) 115 ... 662
 United States v Holmes 26 Fed Cas 360 (1841) ... 373

Abbreviations

The following are the abbreviations used for the principal textbooks and legal journals cited in this book. References are to the latest editions, as shown below, unless it is specifically stated otherwise. The particulars of other works referred to in the text are set out in full in the relevant footnotes. A full bibliography of all references is available free via the online resources at www.oup.com/uk/sho/.

Throughout the book the neutral citation system (UKSC, UKHL, UKPC, EWCA Crim, EWHC (Admin), etc) is commonly adopted in relation to cases in England and Wales since 2001.

Archbold	Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice by JF Archbold (2018) by PJ Richardson and others
Arlidge and Parry on Fraud	Arlidge and Parry on Fraud (5th edn, 2016) by Anthony Arlidge QC, Jonathan Fisher QC, Alexander Milne QC and Polly Sprenger
Blackstone, Commentaries , i–iv	Commentaries on the Laws of England by Sir William Blackstone, vol i–iv (4 vols) (17th edn, 1830) by E Christian
Blackstone’s Criminal Practice	Blackstone’s Criminal Practice (2018) by D Ormerod and D Perry (eds)
Butler Report	Report of the Committee on Mentally Abnormal Offenders (1975) Cmnd 6244
CLJ	Cambridge Law Journal
CLP	Current Legal Problems
Co 3 Inst	Institutes of the Laws of England , vol 3 (4 vols) (1797) by Sir Edward Coke
Cr App R	Criminal Appeal Reports
Crim LR	Criminal Law Review
Crime, Proof and Punishment	Crime, Proof and Punishment: Essays in Honour of Sir Rupert Cross , Punishment edited by CFH Tapper (1981)
Criminal Law Essays	Criminal Law: Essays in Honour of JC Smith edited by PF Smith (1987)
Draft Code	A Criminal Code for England and Wales , Law Com No 177 (1989)
Duff, Answering for Crime	Answering for Crime: Responsibility and Liability in the Criminal Law (2007) by RA Duff
Duff and Green, Defining Crimes	Defining Crimes: Essays on the Special Part of the Criminal Law (2005) by RA Duff and SP Green (eds)
East, I/II PC	A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown by EH East, vol I/II (2 vols) (1803)
Edwards, Mens Rea	Mens Rea in Statutory Offences (1955) by J LI J Edwards
Eighth Report	Criminal Law Revision Committee, Eighth Report, Theft and Related Offences (1966) Cmnd 2977
Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ	Human Rights and Criminal Justice (3rd edn, 2012) by B Emmerson, A Ashworth and A Macdonald
Foster, Crown Law	A Report on Crown Cases and Discourses on the Crown Law by Sir Michael Foster (3rd edn, 1792) by M Dodson
Fourteenth Report	Criminal Law Revision Committee, Fourteenth Report, Offences Against the Person (1980) Cmnd 7844

Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law	Reshaping the Criminal Law: Essays in Honour of Glanville Williams edited by PR Glazebrook (1978)
Gordon	Criminal Law of Scotland (2nd edn, 1978) by GH Gordon
Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing	Lying, Cheating and Stealing: A Moral Theory of White Collar Crime (2006) by SP Green
Green, 13 Ways	13 Ways to Steal a Bicycle (2012) by SP Green
Griew, Theft	The Theft Acts 1968 and 1978 (7th edn, 1995) by EJ Griew
Hale, I/II PC	The History of the Pleas of the Crown by Sir Matthew Hale, vol I/II (2 vols) (1736)
Hall, General Principles	General Principles of Criminal Law (2nd edn, 1960) by J Hall
Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law	Causation in the Law (2nd edn, 1985) by HLA Hart and T Honoré
Harv LR	Harvard Law Review
Hawkins, I/II PC	A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown by W Hawkins, vol I/II (2 vols) (8th edn, 1795) by J Curwood
Horder, APOCL	Ashworth's Principles of Criminal Law (8th edn, 2016) by J Horder
Howard, SR	Strict Responsibility (1963) by Colin Howard
J Cr L & Cr	Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology (USA)
J Crim L	Journal of Criminal Law (English)
JSPTL	Journal of the Society of Public Teachers of Law
Kenny, Outlines	Outlines of Criminal Law by CS Kenny (19th edn, 1966) by JWC Turner
LCCP	Law Commission Consultation Paper
LQR	Law Quarterly Review
LS	Legal Studies, the Journal of the Society of Public Teachers of Law
MACL	The Modern Approach to Criminal Law edited by L Radzinowicz and JWC Turner (1948)
MLR	Modern Law Review
OJLS	Oxford Journal of Legal Studies
Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft	The Law of Theft (9th edn, 2007) by D Ormerod and DH Williams
Perkins, Criminal Law	Criminal Law (2nd edn, 1969) by R Perkins
Perkins and Boyce, Criminal Law	Criminal Law (3rd edn, 1982) by R Perkins and R Boyce
Russell	Crime by Sir WO Russell (12th edn, 1964) by JWC Turner (2 vols)
Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory	Criminal Law Theory: Doctrines of the General Part (2002) edited by S Shute and A Simester
Simester, Appraising Strict Liability	Appraising Strict Liability (2005) edited by A Simester
Simester, Spencer, Stark, Sullivan and Virgo, CLT&D	Simester and Sullivan's Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine (6th edn, 2016) by AP Simester, GR Sullivan, F Stark, JR Spencer and G Virgo
Smith, Justification and Excuse	Justification and Excuse in the Criminal Law by JC Smith (The Hamlyn Lectures, 1989)
Smith, Property Offences	Property Offences (1994) by ATH Smith

Stephen, Digest	A Digest of the Criminal Law by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen (9th edn, 1950) by LF Sturge
Stephen, I–III HCL	A History of the Criminal Law of England by Sir James Fitzjames Stephen, vols I–III (3 vols) (1883)
Tadros, Criminal Responsibility	Criminal Responsibility (2005) by V Tadros
Williams, CLGP	Criminal Law: The General Part (2nd edn, 1961) by GL Williams
Williams, TBCL	Textbook of Criminal Law (2nd edn, 1983) by GL Williams
Wilson, Central Issues	Central Issues in Criminal Theory (2002) by W Wilson
Yale LJ	Yale Law Journal

Part I

General Principles

1	An introduction to the criminal law	3
2	The elements of a crime: actus reus	26
3	The elements of a crime: mens rea	86
4	Crimes of negligence	133
5	Crimes of strict liability	143
6	Parties to crime	175
7	Assistance after the offence	235
8	Corporate and vicarious liability	245
9	Mental conditions, intoxication and mistake	277
10	General defences	341
11	Inchoate crime	410

An introduction to the criminal law

1.1 A universal definition of ‘a crime’?

It is now rather unfashionable to begin law books with definitions.¹ One reason for this is that it is notoriously difficult to define the subject matter of a particular branch of the law; and this is particularly true of the criminal law. But this is a book about crimes, and if it did not at least attempt to tell the reader what a crime is, it would be deficient. It would allow the reader to proceed with preconceived notions about what constitutes a crime. In particular, there would be a danger that the reader might assume the popular meaning of crime which is different from, less precise and narrower than the legal meaning. A criminal law book must be concerned with the legal meaning of crime; and the reader is entitled to know what it is, or at least why it is so difficult to describe.

Common definitions from non-legal dictionaries do not provide much help as a starting point, as they offer only bland definitions such as ‘an act or omission prohibited and punished by law’. Although they may inform us that the meaning of the word ‘crime’ can be traced to the Latin ‘crimen’ (accusation), that takes us no further forward to an understanding of the subject. A simple definition of a crime as a wrong, which is prosecuted and carries a penalty might satisfy the layman without providing any sufficient answer for the lawyer.

Arguably, an exercise in further definition is futile since every lawyer knows a crime when they see it, but a ready response to this claim is that not all crimes are readily identifiable even to the lawyer. This is inevitable when there are well in excess of 10,000 crimes in England and Wales² covering such diverse activities as murder, rape, being in possession of certain breeds of dangerous dog³ and obstructing a clergyman in the discharge of his duties in a place of worship or on his way thither.⁴ But given the importance of the criminal law in terms of what is at stake and how often it is used, surely a definition could and should be produced.

An attempt to define a crime at once encounters a difficulty. If the definition is a good one, it should enable us to recognize any behaviour—whether involving an act or omission—as ¹ For classical accounts of the problem of definition, see Kenny, Outlines (15th edn, 1935) Ch 1; G Williams, ‘The Definition of Crime’ (1955) 8 CLP 107; G Hughes, ‘The Concept of Crime: An American View’ [1959] Crim LR 239 and 331. For more contemporary philosophical accounts, see in particular the collections of essays edited by Duff and Green, Defining Crimes; Duff, Answering for Crime; A Halpin, Definition in the Criminal Law (2004); and essays in J Gardner, Offences and Defences: Selected Essays in the Philosophy of Criminal Law (2007).

² Not including the thousands of by-laws created at a local level.

³ See the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991.

⁴ Offences Against the Person Act 1861, s 36.

a crime, or not a crime, by seeing whether it contains all the ingredients of the definition. When this proposition is given serious consideration it is impossible. When Parliament enacts that particular conduct (doing X) shall become a crime or that conduct (doing X) which is now criminal shall cease to be so, the conduct (doing X) does not change in nature in any respect other than that of legal classification. All its observable characteristics are precisely the same before as after the statute comes into force. At the time of writing, the government has announced a review into cycle safety.⁵ One of the issues being considered by the review is whether a new offence equivalent to causing death by careless or dangerous driving should be introduced for cyclists. The conduct involved is identical at the time of writing in 2017 as it will be in 2018 by which time it may be criminal if a new offence is enacted. Making the conduct criminal does not change the conduct itself; it changes the legal classification of that conduct. Similarly, suicide was a crime until 3 August 1961, when, by the Suicide Act 1961,⁶ it became perfectly lawful to kill oneself. The nature of the act in question, its morality or immorality and the consequence do not change overnight; but its legal nature does.

1.2 A universal purpose in criminal law?

Our quest for a definition of criminal law is not assisted greatly by looking for a declared purpose underlying the creation of criminal law in England and Wales.⁷ The criminal law of this country has developed over many centuries, and with many and varied purposes of those who have framed it and those who have enforced it. Consequently, it is not easy to state confidently what the aims of the criminal law are.

The position would be different if we were starting from scratch—if we were drawing up a new criminal code. The authors of a completely new code of criminal law are in a position to state their objectives at the outset. ‘The general purposes of the provisions governing the definition of offenses’ in the American Law Institute’s Model Penal Code⁸ might be taken as a statement of the proper objectives of the substantive law of crime in a modern legal system. The purposes are:

- (a) to forbid and prevent conduct that unjustifiably and inexcusably inflicts or threatens substantial harm to individual or public interests;
- (b) to subject to public control persons whose conduct indicates that they are disposed to commit crimes;
- (c) to safeguard conduct that is without fault from condemnation as criminal;
- (d) to give fair warning of the nature of the conduct declared to be an offense;
- (e) to differentiate on reasonable grounds between serious and minor offenses.⁹

Whether English criminal law fulfils these purposes is a matter to think about while studying the general principles and particular offences discussed throughout the rest of this book. For example, whether our law is confined to forbidding conduct that is ‘inexcusable’, or whether ⁵ <https://www.gov.uk/government/news/government-launches-urgent-review-into-cycle-safety>.

⁶ See Ch 15.

⁷ For analyses of various theories of criminalization, see Chs 1–5 of RA Duff and SP Green (eds), Philosophical Foundations of Criminal Law (2011) and the essays in RA Duff, L Farmer, SE Marshall, M Renzo and V Tadros (eds), Criminalization—The Political Morality of the Criminal Law (2014).

⁸ Proposed Official Draft, §1.02(1). Cf N Walker, The Aims of the Penal System (1966).

⁹ For criticism, see PH Robinson, ‘The Modern General Part—Three Illusions’ in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 79.

it adequately safeguards conduct that is without fault from condemnation as criminal, are matters which are particularly considered in Ch 3 but which constantly arise elsewhere.

1.3 Universal characteristics of a crime?

Struggling to define crimes and even to identify a clear declared purpose in criminalizing forms of conduct, the student might turn instead to search for characteristics that are universal to every crime so that at least all crimes can be identified even if not readily defined. Those hoping for a straightforward checklist of criteria guaranteed to allow someone to identify any and every crime are destined for disappointment. It is nigh on impossible to agree any determinate criteria. There is considerable force in Professor Duff's concession that we should resist the:

desire to find some single concept or value that will capture the essence of crime or the essential characteristic in virtue of which crimes are properly punished . . . in favour of a pluralism that recognises a diversity of reasons for criminalisation, matching the diversity of kinds of wrong which can legitimately be the criminal law's business.¹⁰

Despite the lack of a universally accepted definition of criminal law, it is possible to point to certain characteristics which are generally found in conduct which is criminal; in particular, it usually involves a public wrong and a moral wrong.¹¹

1.3.1 A 'public' wrong

Crimes generally involve behaviour which has a particularly harmful effect on the public and goes beyond interfering with merely private rights. Sir Carleton Allen writes:

Crime is crime because it consists in wrongdoing which directly and in serious degree threatens the security or well-being of society, and because it is not safe to leave it redressable only by compensation of the party injured.¹²

This statement explains why certain behaviours may have originally been made crimes either by judicial decision or by legislation, but it does not necessarily accurately represent the present state of the entire catalogue of criminal offences. A crime may remain a crime long after it has ceased to be a threat to the security or well-being of society.¹³ Allen's proposition tells us what—as he thinks—ought to be criminal rather than what is criminal.

There is a further dimension to the concept of public wrong.¹⁴ This emphasizes not that the wrong is one done against the public, but rather that a 'public wrong' is significant for defining crimes because it reflects the important role that the public has in punishing crimes. As Duff explains:

we should be held criminally responsible for wrongdoings which are public in the sense that they properly concern all members of the polity, and merit a formal public response of censure and condemnation.¹⁵

¹⁰ Duff, Answering for Crime, 139.

¹¹ Recent years have seen a huge outpouring of theoretical writing on the criminal law. For an interesting reflection on some of this, see RA Duff, 'Theorising About Criminal Law' (2005) 25 OJLS 353.

¹² CK Allen, 'The Nature of a Crime' (1931) Journal of Society of Comparative Legislation, Feb, reprinted in Legal Duties 221 at 233–234.

¹³ G Williams (1955) 8 CLP at 126–127.

¹⁴ G Lamond, 'What is a Crime' (2007) 27 OJLS 609.

¹⁵ Duff, Answering for Crime, 123. See generally Ch 6 of that work.

As Duff acknowledges, that does not assist in determining what wrongdoing should count as 'public'.¹⁶

This 'public' nature of crimes is evidenced by the contrast between the rules of civil and criminal procedure. Any member of the public can, as a general rule and in the absence of some provision to the contrary, bring a criminal prosecution, whether or not he¹⁷ has suffered any special harm over and above other members of the public. As a member of the public he has an interest in the enforcement of the criminal law. D steals V's watch. V may prosecute him—so may X, Y, Z or any other citizen.¹⁸ As the then Lord Chief Justice made clear in Smith,¹⁹ for example, the law of theft protects the Queen's peace and is not a means of enforcing personal property rights.

In practice, of course, the vast majority of prosecutions are performed by the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) or Director of the Serious Fraud Office or other public officers who have no personal interest in the outcome. The victim of an offence cannot prevent the prosecution of the offender.²⁰ The consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) to a prosecution is only rarely subject to judicial review. Proceedings may be stopped by the Crown through the entry of a nolle prosequi by the Attorney General who may stay the proceedings at any time²¹ without the consent of the prosecutor.

If the prosecution succeeds and a sentence is imposed by the court, the instigator of the prosecution has no power to pardon the offender. This power belongs exclusively to the Crown, representing the public interest in the matter. It is important not to confuse the position of the Crown with that of the victim. The recognition of the victim in the criminal process has been marked over the last two decades or so,²² but in terms of substantive law, the formal position is that the prosecution is usually brought by the Crown, and the Crown is not seen as a surrogate victim.²³

All this public control over the proceedings in criminal law stands in sharp contrast with the position regarding civil wrongs—torts and breaches of contract. There, only the person injured may sue. He (and only he) may freely discontinue the proceedings at any time and, if he succeeds and an award of damages is made in his favour, he may, at his entire discretion, forgive the defendant and terminate his liability.

Crimes, then, are wrongs which the judges have held, or Parliament has enacted, to be sufficiently injurious to the public to warrant the application of criminal procedure to deal with them. Of course, this does not enable us to recognize conduct as criminal when we see it. Some forms of conduct are so obviously public wrongs that anyone would say they ¹⁶ Lamond, n 14, argues that it is because they represent blameworthy conduct, in terms of mens rea.

¹⁷ Throughout the book, for the sake of convenience, we use the male pronoun.

¹⁸ The right of private prosecution is unaffected by the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985; but s 24 empowers the High Court, on the application of the Attorney General (AG), to restrain a vexatious prosecutor: Ewing v DPP [2010] EWCA Civ 70. The DPP may take over a private prosecution at any stage (s 6(2)) and may discontinue a prosecution during its 'preliminary stage': s 23. The Supreme Court affirmed the continued existence of this power in R (Gujra) v CPS [2012] UKSC 52.

¹⁹ [2011] EWCA Crim 66, [2011] Crim LR 719.

²⁰ See on victim waiver and settlement, G Dingwall and C Harding, Diversion in the Criminal Law (1998) Ch 3.

²¹ The DPP may intervene and offer no evidence: Turner v DPP (1978) 68 Cr App R 70 (Mars Jones J), [1978] Crim LR 754; Raymond v AG [1982] QB 839, CA, [1982] Crim LR 826 and commentary.

²² For discussion, see SL Walklate, Victimology: The Victim and the Criminal Justice Process (1989); A Bottoms and J Roberts, Hearing the Victim: Adversarial Justice, Crime Victims and the State (2012). It has been suggested that the criminal justice system's increased awareness of the rights of victims is attributable to the ECHR. See K Starmer, 'Human Rights, Victims and the Prosecution of Crime in the 21st Century' [2014] Crim LR 777.

²³ See Weir [2001] 1 WLR 421, [2001] Crim LR 656, HL.

should be criminal—murder or rape, for example.²⁴ These are often referred to as mala in se—intrinsically wrong. All such types of obviously harmful conduct almost certainly are criminal. But there are many other types of conduct—mala prohibita—about which opinions may differ widely: what, for example, of substance abuse, or prostitution?

It is important not to overstate the significance of public condemnation of a form of conduct. Parliament and the courts alone declare the range and scope of the criminal law. When a citizen is heard urging that, ‘There ought to be a law against X . . .’, he is expressing his personal conviction that some variety of behaviour is so harmful to society that it ought to be discouraged by being made the subject of criminal proceedings. There will almost invariably be a body of opinion which disagrees. But even if everyone in England and Wales agreed with him, X would not thereby become a crime. Public condemnation is ineffective without the endorsement of an Act of Parliament or a decision of a court.²⁵

In recent years politicians have been too willing to accede to public condemnation of particular forms of conduct and the clamour to make new crimes.²⁶ The Law Commission reports that:

Since 1997, more than 3000 criminal offences have come on to the statute book. That figure should be put in context, taking a longer perspective. Halsbury’s Statutes of England and Wales has four volumes devoted to criminal laws that (however old they may be) are still currently in force. Volume 1 covers the offences created in the 637 years between 1351 and 1988. Volume 1 is 1382 pages long.

Volumes 2 to 4 cover the offences created in the 19 years between 1989 and 2008. Volumes 2 to 4 are no less than 3746 pages long. So, more than 2 and a half times as many pages were needed in Halsbury’s Statutes to cover offences created in the 19 years between 1989 and 2008 than were needed to cover the offences created in the 637 years prior to that. Moreover, it is unlikely that the Halsbury volumes devoted to ‘criminal law’ capture all offences created in recent times.²⁷

There are, it is argued, just too many criminal offences.²⁸ In particular, there have been a disproportionate number of offences created to deal with regulatory misconduct. The Law Commission has proposed that:

the criminal law should only be employed to deal with wrongdoers who deserve the stigma associated with criminal conviction because they have engaged in seriously reprehensible conduct. It should not be used as the primary means of promoting regulatory objectives.²⁹

It is important at this point to emphasize one of the unique features of the criminal law of which it seems that Parliament may recently have lost sight. The criminal sanction is the most coercive method of regulating an individual’s behaviour which the State can deploy. The whole criminal justice system involves State infringements of personal autonomy from the possibility of investigation and surveillance, arrest, search, seizure, detention, questioning, public court hearings, to a trial process which may include pre-trial detention, and lead to punishment, including the ultimate infringement—imprisonment. Even if no term

²⁴ See the comments in the appeals against rape convictions on Pitcairn: Christian [2006] UKPC 47.

²⁵ Witness the Radio 4 poll to find the listeners’ law, which prompted a Bill to redefine the defence of self-defence as applicable to householders injuring burglars, discussed in Ch 10 and on the interpretation of the Court of Appeal having made little difference to the law in terms of whether the householder is prosecuted: Ray [2017] EWCA Crim 1391.

²⁶ For a quantitative analysis, see J Chalmers and F Leverick, ‘Tracking the Creation of Criminal Offences’ [2013] Crim LR 543.

²⁷ See LCCP 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010) para 1.17. The claim of recent growth has been challenged by F Leverick, J Chalmers et al, ‘Is Formal Criminalisation Really on the Rise? Evidence from the 1950s’ [2015] Crim LR 177.

²⁸ See DN Husak, Overcriminalisation (2008) Ch 1.

²⁹ LC 195, para 1.29.

of imprisonment is imposed, the range of other punishments available to the criminal courts all have one thing in common: a degree of stigma.³⁰ Even if individuals are not taken through the entire process of the criminal trial, but are diverted³¹ before trial and dealt with by way of cautioning, conditional cautions, etc they suffer the stigma. There is a marked public condemnation which is publicly communicated.³²

This degree of coercion is qualitatively different from the outcome in a dispute in civil law. For the liberal minded at least, criminalization should be a matter of last resort because of this stigmatization and the most intrusive forms of State intervention it entails. As Husak has stated, 'a criminal statute cannot be necessary to accomplish a purpose if other means could do so more easily'.³³ Readers will be able to judge for themselves whether English law really respects this principle of what Ashworth calls 'minimal criminalisation'.³⁴ The point is not so much to reduce criminal law to its absolute minimum, as to ensure that resort is only had to criminalization in order to protect individual autonomy, or to protect those social arrangements necessary to ensure that individuals have the capacity and facilities to exercise their autonomy.³⁵

It is important also to note that in English law there is no category of 'violations' or 'administrative wrongs' that sits between criminal and civil wrongs as exists in some jurisdictions.³⁶

1.3.2 A 'moral' wrong

The second characteristic of crimes which is usually emphasized is that they involve conduct which is morally wrong.³⁷ As with 'public wrong', the characteristic is hopelessly vague.

1.3.2.1 Morality

As seen from the previous discussion, the traditional attitude of the common law has been that crimes are essentially immoral acts deserving of punishment. Centuries ago, when the number of crimes was relatively few and only the most outrageous acts were prohibited—murder, robbery, rape, etc—this was, no doubt, true. But experience suggests that the criminal law is not coextensive with morality. A review of the current vast range of criminal offences in England demonstrates that proposition. Many acts are now prohibited on the grounds of social expediency and not because of their immoral nature. This is especially so in the field of summary offences (those that can be tried only in the magistrates' court)—and summary offences are crimes.³⁸ Moreover, many acts which are generally regarded as ³⁰ See N Walker and C Marsh, 'Do Sentences Affect Public Disapproval?' (1984) British Journal of Criminology 27; N Walker, Punishment, Danger and Stigma (1980).

³¹ See G Dingwall and C Harding, Diversion in the Criminal Process (1998) and more recently RA Duff, L Farmer, S Marshall and V Tadros, The Trial on Trial, vol 3 (2007) 180 et seq.

³² See Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 2.

³³ DN Husak, 'The Criminal Law as a Last Resort' (2004) 24 OJLS 207, 212.

³⁴ For an excellent and accessible account of the principles of criminalization, see Horder, APOCL, Chs 3 and 4. See also the suggestion by Jeremy Horder that the focus is too narrow and fails to acknowledge the need for criminalization of conduct giving rise to remoter harms: J Horder, 'Bribery as a Form of Criminal Wrongdoing' (2011) 127 LQR 37.

³⁵ N Lacey, Unspeakable Subjects (1998); State Punishment (1988).

³⁶ See LCCP 195, para 3.32 and the excellent discussion in R White, 'Civil Penalties: Oxymoron, Chimera and Stealth Sanction' (2010) 126 LQR 593 and K Reid, 'Strict Liability: Some Principles for Parliament' (2008) Stat LR 173.

³⁷ For an accessible account of this complex area, see Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 1, and Duff, Answering for Crime, Chs 4 and 6.

³⁸ G Williams (1955) 8 CLP at 110. It is true that courts have frequently treated regulatory offences differently on the grounds that they are 'not truly criminal' or are 'quasi-criminal': Harrow London Borough Council v Shah [1999] 3 All ER 302, [2000] Crim LR 692, DC; p 161. But this is a dubious argument. By any recognized test, the offence is criminal: it carries criminal consequences.

immoral—for example, adultery—are not crimes in England.³⁹ The test of immorality is not a very helpful one in seeking to identify universal characteristics of a crime.⁴⁰

There is a further difficulty which arises in classifying action as criminal on the basis of its purported immorality—whose morality should form the benchmark for criminalization? This problem is illustrated well by the problem of drawing appropriate legal limits on the level of physical harm which an adult, who is not lacking in mental capacity, might consent to being inflicted on him. Very different answers would be provided depending on whether the respondent is, for example, a liberal,⁴¹ a paternalist⁴² or a legal moralist.⁴³ The issue also arises in other contexts. For example, the Fraud Act 2006 creates offences which come close to criminalizing lying: it is sufficient that the defendant dishonestly makes a misleading statement with intent to gain.⁴⁴

Whether conduct ought to be a crime simply on the ground of its immoral nature has been the subject of vigorous debate on different issues through the decades. One of the most well known was the debate in the 1960s about whether consensual homosexual conduct between men in private ought to be decriminalized. The Wolfenden Committee on Homosexual Offences and Prostitution reviewed the position. Its conclusion was that enforcement of morality is not a proper object of the criminal law. The function of the criminal law, as they saw it, is:

to preserve public order and decency, to protect the citizen from what is offensive or injurious, and to provide sufficient safeguards against exploitation and corruption of others, particularly those who are specially vulnerable . . . It is not . . . the function of the law to intervene in the private lives of citizens, or to seek to enforce any particular pattern of behaviour, further than is necessary to carry out the purposes we have outlined.⁴⁵

This view was challenged by Lord Devlin,⁴⁶ who argued that there is a public morality which is an essential part of the bond which keeps society together; and that society may use the criminal law to preserve morality in the same way that it uses it to preserve anything else that is essential to its existence. The standard of morality is that of 'the man in the jury box', based on the 'mass of continuous experience half-consciously or unconsciously accumulated and embodied in the morality of common sense'. To this it was answered⁴⁷ that it is not proper for the State to enforce the general morality without asking whether it is based on ignorance, superstition or misunderstanding; that it is not a sufficient ground for prohibiting an act that 'the thought of it makes the man on the Clapham omnibus sick'.

In the midst of this debate, the House of Lords delivered its controversial decision in Shaw v DPP,⁴⁸ in which Lord Simonds asserted that:

there remains in the courts of law a residual power to enforce the supreme and fundamental purpose of the law, to conserve not only the safety and order but also the moral welfare of the state;

³⁹ Adultery is criminal in some countries. See Duff, Answering for Crime, 144.

⁴⁰ See LCCP 195, para 4.39 on the usefulness of the harm principle in general.

⁴¹ With focus on whether harm is caused to another's interests.

⁴² For whom it will be sufficient that harm is caused to another or the accused.

⁴³ For whom it is sufficient that the conduct is immoral. See the decision of the House of Lords in Brown [1994] 1 AC 212, discussed in Ch 16 in full and LCCP 139, Consent in the Criminal Law (1995) Appendix C. Cf P Roberts, 'Consent in the Criminal Law' (1997) 17 OJLS 389 and S Shute, 'The Law Commission's Second Consultation Paper on Consent' [1996] Crim LR 684.

⁴⁴ See D Ormerod, 'Criminalising Lying?' [2007] Crim LR 193 and see Ch 22. Professor Horder categorizes this as a harm-centred, minimalist conception of the criminal law: Horder (2011) 127 LQR 37.

⁴⁵ Cmnd 247 (1957), para 13.

⁴⁶ The Enforcement of Morals (1965) 1.

⁴⁷ HLA Hart, The Morality of the Criminal Law (1964). Hart challenges the view that society is as morally homogenous as Devlin's approach would require.

⁴⁸ [1962] AC 220, 267; p 472.

and that the appellate courts were the custodian of the morality of the people and had the superintendency of offences contra bonos mores. ‘Lord Devlin, regarded Shaw’s case’, as settling ‘for the purpose of the law that morality in England means what twelve men and women think it means—in other words it is to be ascertained as a question of fact’ by a jury.⁴⁹ Subsequently, however, the particular legal rule (that homosexual conduct between consenting male adults is an offence) that caused the Wolfenden Committee to formulate its general principle⁵⁰ was repealed by the Sexual Offences Act 1967. The House of Lords has also since accepted that it does not have power to extend the criminal law to enforce good morals.⁵¹

This same moral debate is echoed in more recent times with the question of what levels of harm or injury an adult not lacking in mental capacity might consent to in the course of consensual sexual sadomasochism. The issue divided the House of Lords in the case of Brown,⁵² prompted two Law Commission Consultation Papers and provoked a torrent of legal academic writing.⁵³ Many other instances of the debate about morality and criminal law can be seen in recent years and will be replayed in the future.⁵⁴ For example, Parliament recently introduced an offence for an adult to possess extreme pornography depicting images of consenting adult conduct.⁵⁵

1.3.2.2 Harms or wrongs to others

Implicit in a requirement that every crime involves a moral wrong is the acceptance that a ‘wrong’ is done or harm to another or others is involved.⁵⁶ Conduct can be treated as a ‘wrong’ if it violates some moral duty or rule, and harmful if it infringes the autonomy of another or causes serious offence to another. Conduct can be wrongful without being harmful (a white lie to V’s benefit); and harmful without being wrong (D undercutting his competitor’s prices and causing him to go out of business).

Again, this poses a problem since it is only if there is agreement as to the moral bases for criminalizing that there is likely to be agreement as to whether the conduct in question involves a harm.⁵⁷ What will be ‘wrong’ or ‘harmful’ for the paternalist will not necessarily be so for the liberal.

In the last few decades, academic writing has focused heavily on the issue of the harm principle. By far the most refined examination of this has been that of Professor Feinberg,⁵⁸ but he is not alone in recognizing the utility of the harm principle in defining what is ⁴⁹ 110 U Pa L Rev at 648. See also HLA Hart, Law, Liberty and Morality (1963); G Hughes, ‘Morals and the Criminal Law’ (1962) 71 Yale LJ 662. For an excellent discussion of the whole controversy, see B Mitchell, Law, Morality and Religion in a Secular Society (1967).

⁵⁰ See n 45.

⁵¹ Kneller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1973] AC 435, [1975] Crim LR 704, p 472. Such judicial offence-creation would contravene Art 7 of the ECHR which protects against retrospective criminalization. See the recognition of the appropriate limits of judicial law-making in Rimmington [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153.

⁵² [1994] 1 AC 212. ⁵³ See the materials in Ch 16, p 678.

⁵⁴ See the special issue of the British Journal of Criminology ‘Moral Panics—36 Years On’ (2009) 49(1).

⁵⁵ See Ch 30.

⁵⁶ The philosophical literature on this topic is vast. See, inter alia, Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 1, and references therein.

⁵⁷ Harm can be defined to include endangerment to V’s interests where D foresees that he might damage those interests although he is not acting intentionally to damage them. See further Duff, ‘Criminalising Endangerment’ in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes; cf C Clarkson, ‘Aggravated Endangerment’ (2007) 60 CLP 279.

⁵⁸ See the review of 25 years to 2005 by Duff (2005) 25 OJLS 353.

characteristic about crimes.⁵⁹ In the late 1970s, Gross dealt with the issue as had Packer a decade earlier.⁶⁰

The harm to others formula seems to me to have two uses that justify its inclusion in a list of limiting criteria for invocation of the criminal sanction. First, it is a way to make sure that a given form of conduct is not being subjected to the criminal sanction purely or even primarily because it is thought to be immoral. It forces an inquiry into precisely what bad effects are feared if the conduct in question is not suppressed by the criminal law. Second, it immediately brings into play a host of secular inquiries about the effects of subjecting the conduct in question to the criminal sanction. One cannot meaningfully deal with the question of harm to others without weighing benefits against detriments. In that sense, it is a kind of threshold question, important not so much in itself, as in focusing attention on the further considerations relevant to the ultimate decision. It is for these two instrumental reasons rather than for either its intrinsic rightness or ease of application that it deserves inclusion.⁶¹

It is easy to think of the harm principle in a narrow, constrained way as meaning only direct harms to others. For some this fails to provide necessary protection against more remote harms.⁶² A valuable refined statement of the harm principle is that by Professors Gardner and Shute:

It is no objection to the harm principle that a harmless action was criminalised nor even that an action with no tendency to cause harm was criminalised. It is enough to meet the demands of the harm principle that, if the actions were not criminalised that would be harmful... . Non-instrumental wrongs, even when they are perfectly harmless in themselves, can pass this test if their criminalisation diminishes the occurrence of them, and would detract from people's prospects—for example diminishing some public good.⁶³

Classification of an activity as involving a 'setback to interests' or a 'diminution of a public good' will often be a controversial question.⁶⁴ As noted, Parliament has in recent years too readily accepted that a form of behaviour is sufficiently harmful or wrong to warrant criminalization rather than some alternative less coercive form of regulation.⁶⁵ This has been particularly striking in the context of so-called regulatory offences.⁶⁶

In identifying the interests to be protected by the criminal law, it is increasingly important to recognize the State's obligation to protect the rights of citizens as protected by the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Where Art 3 guarantees a right to be free from inhuman and degrading treatment, it is incumbent on the State through the process of the criminal law to provide adequate protection against the infliction of such harm as ⁵⁹ For arguments that the harm principle is over- and under-inclusive, see Duff, Answering for Crime, Ch 6.

⁶⁰ J Feinberg, Harm to Others (1984); H Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968) 266; H Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (1979) 119.

⁶¹ Packer, ibid, 262.

⁶² Professor Horder advances a 'true' understanding of Mill's harm principle, based upon harm prevention and the risk of the harm that might result if the conduct were not criminalized. Horder (2011) 127 LQR 37. However, he does not propose any de minimis threshold nor does he establish how remote the risk of harm must be before it may be legitimately the subject of the criminal law.

⁶³ J Gardner and S Shute, 'The Wrongness of Rape' in J Horder (ed), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (2000) 216.

⁶⁴ Elaborate systems for differentiating levels of harm and relative offence seriousness have been devised, see A von Hirsch and N Jareborg, 'Gauging Criminal Harm: A Living Standard Analysis' (1991) 11 OJLS 1.

⁶⁵ See A Ashworth, 'Interpreting Criminal Statutes: A Crisis of Legality' (1991) 117 LQR 419.

⁶⁶ See LCCP 195.

corporal punishment. Similarly, where Art 2 of the ECHR guarantees a right to life, it is incumbent on the State to provide adequate protection of that right for each citizen.

1.3.2.3 Agreed basis of criminalization?

Numerous scholarly analyses have devoted thousands of pages to an attempt to identify the basis on which conduct ought to be criminalized. These philosophical inquiries lie beyond the scope of this work which provides a doctrinal analysis of the criminal law.⁶⁷ A compelling examination of the criminalization problem is offered by Husak in his work Overcriminalisation.⁶⁸ He advances a number of factors which should guide whether conduct ought to be criminal. These are in brief: that the criminal law ought not to be used to prohibit 'non trivial harm or evil';⁶⁹ that a criminal offence must target some wrongful conduct by the defendant;⁷⁰ that punishment for an offence is justified only when and to the extent it is deserved;⁷¹ the burden on justifying the creation of a criminal offence is on those who seek to introduce it;⁷² that the crime to be created must identify a substantial and legitimate State interest to be protected;⁷³ that the criminal law introduced will directly advance that interest;⁷⁴ and that criminalization will ensure that criminal law ought not to be more extensive in scope than is necessary to achieve its purpose.⁷⁵

1.3.3 Definition by process?

As the brief discussion above has demonstrated, it is impossible to define the intrinsic quality of conduct which renders it criminal, or to identify any universal purpose, and difficult to agree readily on any universal moral foundation for a crime. Because of this, most writers—and the courts—have been driven to 'define' whether conduct is criminal by turning to the nature of the legal proceedings which may follow from its commission.⁷⁶ The criminal quality of conduct cannot be discerned by intuition; nor can it be discovered by reference to any standard but one: is the conduct prohibited with penal consequences?⁷⁷

The problem then becomes one of distinguishing criminal proceedings from civil proceedings. Any attempt to distinguish between crimes and torts comes up against the same kind of difficulty encountered in defining crimes generally: that most torts are crimes as well, though some torts are not crimes and some crimes are not torts. It is not in the nature of the conduct but in the nature of the proceedings that the distinction consists; and both types of proceeding may follow where conduct is both a crime and a tort.⁷⁸

Professor Kenny,⁷⁹ in his famous book in which he attempted to define a crime, directed his attention to ascertaining the essential distinction between civil and criminal procedure. He rejected any distinction based on: (a) the extent to which the State was involved in the two types of proceeding; because that was incapable of being applied with precision; (b) the tribunals; because both civil and criminal cases may be heard in the magistrates' courts and the Supreme Court; (c) the object of the proceedings; because, while 'the object of criminal procedure is always Punishment', the award of exemplary damages in civil actions is also ⁶⁷ See n 37 and references therein.

⁶⁸ (2008).

⁶⁹ ibid, 66.

⁷⁰ ibid, 72.

⁷¹ ibid, 82.

⁷² ibid, 100.

⁷³ ibid, 120.

⁷⁴ ibid, 145.

⁷⁵ ibid, 153.

⁷⁶ See LCCP 195, para 3.39.

⁷⁷ Proprietary Articles Trade Association v A-G for Canada [1931] AC 310 at 324, per Lord Atkin.

⁷⁸ A civil action for assault or battery is barred by the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, ss 44 and 45 if criminal proceedings brought in the magistrates' court by or on behalf of the victim (a) have been dismissed and a certificate of dismissal has been issued; or (b) have resulted in conviction and the defendant has paid anything he was ordered to pay or has served any imprisonment imposed. See Stevens and Whitehouse (1991) 155 JP 697.

⁷⁹ Kenny, Outlines, Ch 1.

punitive; (d) the nature of the sanctions; because, while criminal sanctions never enrich any individual, it was not true to say that all civil actions do, since some civil actions for penalties could be brought only by the Crown. The action in civil law is subject to a limitation period which does not apply in criminal law—prosecutions for conduct as long as 63 years earlier have been successful.⁸⁰

Kenny finally seized upon the degree of control exercised over the two types of proceedings by the Crown as the criterion, and defined ‘crimes’ as:

wrongs whose sanction is punitive and is in no way remissible by any private person, but is remissible by the Crown alone, if remissible at all.⁸¹

Kenny’s definition has been much criticized. Professor Winfield⁸² thought it led to a vicious circle:

What is a crime? Something that the Crown alone can pardon. What is it that the Crown alone can pardon? A crime.⁸³

Winfield thought it advisable not to accept this part of Kenny’s definition; and he concentrated on the question, what is punishment? The answer he arrived at is that: ‘The essence of punishment is its inevitability . . . no option is left to the offender as to whether he shall endure it or not’; whereas, in a civil case, ‘he can always compromise or get rid of his liability with the assent of the injured party’.⁸⁴ Thus we seem to arrive back at the test we have just rejected: who can remit the sanction.

More substantial is the point made by Professor Williams.⁸⁵ If we are going to define crime by reference to procedure, we ought to make use of the whole law of procedure, not just one item of it—the power to remit the sanction. If a court has to decide whether a particular act which has been prohibited by Parliament is a crime, it may be guided by a reference in the statute to any element which exists only in civil, or only in criminal, procedure as the case may be. A crime is:

an act that is capable of being followed by criminal proceedings, having one of the types of outcome (punishment, etc) known to follow these proceedings.⁸⁶

This definition is by no means so unhelpful as at first sight it may appear; for there are many points of distinction between civil and criminal procedure, and if the statute prescribes one procedural step peculiar to the criminal law that will point to the provision creating a criminal offence. In some instances, this may mean that the determination of whether a provision creates a crime or a civil wrong turns on whether a rule of criminal or a rule of civil procedure should be followed.⁸⁷ Of course, using procedural clues to classify a provision as one creating a crime tells us nothing about what acts ought to be crimes, but that is not its purpose.⁸⁸

There is a further problem with reliance on the procedural differences between crime and civil law to identify a crime. In recent years, Parliament has introduced a series of measures which although formally civil orders have a quasi-criminal nature: for example, Football Banning Orders, Sexual Harm Prevention Orders, Serious Crime Prevention ⁸⁰ See R v D [2013] EWCA Crim 2398. Note that there are some offences to which time limits apply.

⁸¹ Kenny, Outlines, 1. ⁸² Province of the Law of Tort (1931) Ch VIII.

⁸³ ibid, 197. ⁸⁴ ibid, 200. ⁸⁵ (1955) 8 CLP at 128. ⁸⁶ ibid, 123.

⁸⁷ cf PJ Fitzgerald, ‘A Concept of Crime’ [1960] Crim LR 257 at 259–260.

⁸⁸ Writers who set out to define a crime by reference to the nature of the conduct, on the other hand, inevitably end by telling us not what a crime is but what the writer thinks it ought to be; and that is not a definition of a crime.

Orders.⁸⁹ Although civil procedures and civil rules of evidence may apply, the consequences of breaching such an order are criminal.⁹⁰ In addition, the stigma attached to such orders is greater than that which would usually be associated with a civil order.⁹¹ The Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 created new Anti-Social Behaviour Injunctions and Criminal Behaviour Orders (for convicted offenders).⁹² Whether these new orders are in fact less punitive than the original Anti-Social Behaviour Orders has been doubted by many commentators including, for example, the campaign group Liberty.

1.3.4 The practical test: is it a crime?

From time to time, the courts have found it necessary to determine whether particular proceedings are criminal or not. Before the Criminal Evidence Act 1898, the defendant could not give evidence on oath on his own behalf in a criminal case whereas (since the Evidence Act 1851) he had been able to do so in a civil action. If he wished to give evidence, the nature of the proceeding had to be ascertained.⁹³ The same problem could arise today if it were sought to compel the defendant to give evidence.⁹⁴

This problem arose frequently under legislation⁹⁵ that provided that no appeal should lie to the Court of Appeal ‘in any criminal cause or matter’. The question whether a particular proceeding was a criminal cause or matter frequently came before the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords. The test which was regularly applied was whether the proceedings may result in the punishment of the offender. If they may, then it was a criminal proceeding.⁹⁶ As a practical test, this seems to work well enough. However, it must always be remembered that it is a rule with exceptions, because some actions for penalties are undoubtedly civil actions, and yet they have the punishment of the offender as their objective; for this reason the test of punishment is jurisprudentially unsatisfactory.⁹⁷

⁸⁹ Serious Crime Act 2007, Part 1, on which see R Fortson, Blackstone’s Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (2008).

⁹⁰ There is a danger that these orders can create ‘personal’ criminal laws—eg, while it is not an offence for a person to enter a particular shopping centre, if D is made subject to an order not to do so, his entering the shopping centre becomes a crime personal to him. Admittedly, he is criminally liable for the breach of the court order and not the entry per se, but the effect is the same and the dangers for misuse are obvious. See for discussion S Hoffman and S Macdonald, ‘Should ASBOs be Civilized?’ [2010] Crim LR 457; P Ramsay, ‘Substantively Uncivilized ASBOs’ [2010] Crim LR 761; S Hoffman and S Macdonald, ‘Substantively Uncivilized ASBOs: A Response’ [2010] Crim LR 764.

⁹¹ See on these, A Ashworth, ‘Social Control and “Anti-Social Behaviour”: The Subversion of Human Rights’ (2004) 120 LQR 263. See also White (2010) 126 LQR 593.

⁹² For discussion, see KJ Brown, ‘Replacing the ASBO with the Injunction to Prevent Nuisance and Annoyance: A Plea for Legislative Scrutiny and Amendment’ [2013] Crim LR 623; P Jarvis, ‘The New Criminal Behaviour Order’ [2015] Crim LR 275.

⁹³ Cattell v Ireson (1858) EB & E 91; Parker v Green (1862) 2 B & S 299.

⁹⁴ He is compellable in a civil but not in a criminal case.

⁹⁵ The Judicature Act 1873, s 47, and its successor, the Judicature Act 1925, s 31(1)(a) in force until 1968. Appeal now lies to the Court of Appeal (Crim Div) as provided by the Criminal Appeal Act 1968. See LCCP 184, The High Court’s Jurisdiction in Relation to Criminal Proceedings (2007), and Report of that name LC 324 (2010). The government has yet to respond to the Law Commission’s report. See also on this Belhaj and Boudchar v DPP [2017] EWHC 3056 (Admin).

⁹⁶ eg Mellor v Denham (1880) 5 QBD 467; Seaman v Burley [1896] 2 QB 344; Robson v Biggar [1908] 1 KB 672; Re Clifford and O’Sullivan [1921] 2 AC 570; Amand v Home Secretary and Minister of Defence of the Royal Netherlands Government [1943] AC 147; Re Osman (No 4) [1991] Crim LR 533. In a different context, see recently Belhaj v DPP [2017] EWHC 3056 (Admin).

⁹⁷ It is thought not to be a substantial objection that exemplary damages may be awarded in some civil cases; for this is merely ancillary to the main object and the occasions for their award are now much restricted: Rookes v Barnard [1964] AC 1129 at 1221, HL; Cassell & Co Ltd v Broome [1972] AC 1027, HL; AB v South West Water Services Ltd [1993] QB 507.

The meaning of punishment itself is not easy to ascertain; for the defendant in a civil case, who is ordered to pay damages by way of compensation, may well feel that he has been punished. It has been suggested⁹⁸ that:

What distinguishes a criminal from a civil sanction and all that distinguishes it . . . is the judgment of community condemnation which accompanies and justifies its imposition.

According to this view it is the condemnation, plus the consequences of the sentence—fine or imprisonment, etc—which together constitute the punishment; but the condemnation is the essential feature. From this, it is argued that we can say readily enough what a ‘crime’ is:

It is not simply anything which the legislature chooses to call a ‘crime’. It is not simply anti-social conduct which public officers are given a responsibility to suppress. It is not simply any conduct to which a legislature chooses to attach a ‘criminal’ penalty. It is conduct which, if duly shown to have taken place, will incur a formal and solemn pronouncement of the moral condemnation of the community.⁹⁹

But if ‘the formal and solemn pronouncement’ means the judgment of a criminal court (and what else can it mean?) we are driven back to ascertaining whether the proceeding is criminal or not. How is the judge to know whether to make ‘solemn and formal pronouncement of condemnation’ or to give judgment as in a civil action? Surely, only by ascertaining whether the legislature (or the courts in the case of a common law crime) have prescribed that the proceedings shall be criminal; and this must depend, primarily, upon whether it is intended to be punitive.

1.3.5 Conclusion

Readers will by now have realized that the task of defining ‘crime’ by reference to a universal purpose for criminalization or by identifying some universally accepted ingredients such as public wrongs and harms would be extremely difficult. There is no sufficient agreement as to what these purposes or ingredients are. The best that can be offered in practical terms is to consider the trial process and likely outcomes if liability is established.

1.4 The sources of the criminal law

Having considered whether there is a universal definition of a crime, it is useful to consider the sources of the criminal law. As this section will demonstrate, there is no criminal code in England and Wales. The criminal law is therefore dispersed throughout not only the common law, but also a multitude of legislative provisions.

1.4.1 Common law

A particular difficulty in English criminal law is that many important and serious offences, including for example, murder, manslaughter, misconduct in public office and conspiracy to defraud, derive from the common law rather than statute. It may seem surprising that the courts in the twenty-first century are still relying on definitions of offences from judicial pronouncements of centuries ago, or even from the ancient common law writers and ⁹⁸ By HM Hart, ‘The Aims of the Criminal Law’ (1958) 23 Law and Contemporary Problems 401, 404.

⁹⁹ ibid, 405.

reporters—East,¹⁰⁰ Hale,¹⁰¹ Coke,¹⁰² Hawkins,¹⁰³ etc. This poses problems in terms of the principle of legality and of potentially retrospective application. Challenges to some of the best established common law offences—for example, the gross negligence manslaughter offence,¹⁰⁴ public nuisance¹⁰⁵ and conspiracy to defraud—have been mounted in recent years on the grounds of uncertainty and retrospectivity.

There has been a growing concern that these old common law offences are being used inappropriately. For example, in *Norris v USA*¹⁰⁶ and *GG Plc*¹⁰⁷ the House of Lords rejected attempts to use the ancient common law crime of conspiracy to defraud to deal with an alleged price-fixing cartel. For centuries, the common law offence had been available but at no time had anyone, whether an individual or a company, been successfully prosecuted for being a party or giving effect to a price-fixing agreement per se.¹⁰⁸ It was a novel, yet inappropriate, use of this common law offence.

It has been accepted repeatedly by the courts in recent decades that they will not create new offences. This stance is to be welcomed since it is well recognized that judicial law-making is an undemocratic process with a tendency to create uncertainty. In Jones et al,¹⁰⁹ the House of Lords made clear that statute law was the sole source of new criminal offences and it was for those elected representatives of the country in Parliament, not the executive and not the judges, to decide what conduct should be treated as criminal. This echoed their lordships' statements in Goldstein and Rimmington,¹¹⁰ where it was observed that just as the courts had no power to create new offences so they had no power to abolish offences (public nuisance in that case).

A further problem with common law offences arises in relation to their overlap with statute. The House of Lords has since accepted that where Parliament has defined the ingredients of an offence, that statutory offence should ordinarily be charged rather than a common law offence which might not include the same defences and for which the potential penalty is unlimited.¹¹¹ This issue has arisen with increasing frequency in relation to the common law offences of conspiracy to defraud and cheating the Revenue, which overlap with a number of statutory offences.¹¹²

There have been repeated calls to abolish common law offences.¹¹³ The problems posed by common law offences are examined further in the relevant chapters in which the offences are discussed.

It should not be forgotten that the common law also provides most of the 'defences' in English law, including insanity, automatism, intoxication, mistake,¹¹⁴ duress, duress of ¹⁰⁰ East, I/II PC. ¹⁰¹ Hale, I/II PC. ¹⁰² Co 1 Inst.

¹⁰³ J Curwood (ed), A Treatise of the Pleas of the Crown (8th edn, 1795).

¹⁰⁴ Misra [2004] EWCA Crim 2375, [2005] Crim LR 234, see Ch 15.

¹⁰⁵ Rimmington [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153, see Ch 31. See also LCCP 193, Simplification of Criminal Law: Public Nuisance and Outraging Public Decency (2010) and report LC 358 (2015).

¹⁰⁶ [2008] UKHL 16. ¹⁰⁷ [2008] UKHL 17.

¹⁰⁸ Parliament criminalized price-fixing cartels under the Enterprise Act 2002.

¹⁰⁹ [2006] UKHL 16, [2007] Crim LR 66. ¹¹⁰ [2005] UKHL 63.

¹¹¹ ibid, [30]. There is no strict prohibition on a prosecution for the common law offence in such circumstances.

¹¹² In R (Redcar Cleveland BC) v Dady [2013] EWHC 475 (QB), [17], Coulson J stated: 'It seems to me, therefore, that the court must look, first, at whether there is a relevant statutory offence and, if so, how and why the Crown has chosen not to prefer conspiracy charges by reference to that offence, and whether it is proper in all the circumstances to allow the common law allegation of conspiracy to defraud to be maintained.' In the subsequent case of Dosanjh [2013] EWCA Crim 2366 D was charged with cheating the public revenue and sought to argue that it offended the principle of legality for him not to have been charged with a statutory offence when one was available. The Court of Appeal rejected this contention, finding that there was a good reason for the Crown to have preferred the common law offence.

¹¹³ See G McBain, 'Abolishing Some Obsolete Common Law Crimes' (2009) 20 KLJ 89.

¹¹⁴ All dealt with in Ch 9.

circumstances and necessity;¹¹⁵ even self-defence, which in 2008 Parliament has claimed to clarify by statute, rests on common law principles.¹¹⁶

The Law Commission has been prolific in recent years in producing Consultation Papers and Reports affecting many areas of the substantive criminal law including in the last few years: murder, manslaughter, infanticide, provocation, diminished responsibility, incitement, conspiracy, attempt, secondary liability, bribery and corruption, intoxication, insanity and automatism, hate crime, unfitness to plead, offences against the person, and kidnapping. The papers produced are high quality with analysis of the present law and its defects, often providing empirical and comparative materials and stimulating discussion of the law. Much of the Law Commission's work consists of analysing common law offences and recommending that they be placed on a statutory footing. Reference to the Law Commission's valuable work is made throughout the book at the relevant points.¹¹⁷

1.4.2 Statute

Notwithstanding the common law—with all its ambiguities and flexibility—most of English criminal law is now contained in thousands of independent statutory offences.¹¹⁸ These are not collected together as a catalogue of 'criminal legislation', and many offences appear in an otherwise unrelated statute as, for example, with offences in the Companies Act 2006 or the Insolvency Act 1986. In addition, there are thousands of statutory instruments to consider as ministers and bodies such as local authorities are commonly provided with powers to create criminal offences by subordinate legislation.

Even within the exclusively criminal statutes it is often difficult to discern the present law since the statutes are too readily and heavily amended without being republished in consolidated form. As Toulson LJ noted in Chambers,¹¹⁹ in a case dealing with tobacco importation:

To a worryingly large extent, statutory law is not practically accessible today, even to the courts whose constitutional duty it is to interpret and enforce it. There are four principal reasons... First, the majority of legislation is secondary legislation... Secondly, the volume of legislation has increased very greatly over the last 40 years.^[120] Thirdly, on many subjects the legislation cannot be found in a single place, but in a patchwork of primary and secondary legislation. Fourthly, there is no comprehensive statute law database... This means that the courts are in many cases unable to discover what the law is, or was at the date with which the court is concerned, and are entirely dependent on the parties for being able to inform them what were the relevant statutory provisions which the court has to apply.

¹¹⁵ See Ch 10.

¹¹⁶ See Ch 10 and the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, s 76 as repeatedly amended.

¹¹⁷ It is worth emphasizing that the views expressed in this book are the authors' and not those of the Law Commission.

¹¹⁸ This makes it extremely difficult to ascertain how many criminal offences actually exist. For discussion, see J Chalmers and F Leverick, 'Tracking the Creation of Criminal Offences' [2013] Crim LR 543.

¹¹⁹ [2008] EWCA Crim 2467, [24]–[27]. On the unfairness this creates, see A Ashworth (2011) MLR 1, 21, and Ch 9.

¹²⁰ His lordship referred to 'The Law Commission's Report on Post-Legislative Scrutiny' (2006) Law Com 302, which gave some figures in Appendix C. In 2005, there were 2,868 pages of new Public General Acts and approximately 13,000 pages of new Statutory Instruments, making a total well in excess of 15,000 pages (which is equivalent to over 300 pages a week) excluding European Directives and European Regulations, which were responsible for over 5,000 additional pages of legislation. See also LCCP 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010). Cf F Leverick, J Chalmers et al, 'Is Formal Criminalisation Really on the Rise? Evidence from the 1950s' [2015] Crim LR 177.

So extensive is the problem of criminalizing by secondary legislation that the Law Commission proposed that no new criminal offence-making provision should be created otherwise than in primary legislation.¹²¹

Even once the relevant provision has been identified and it has been ascertained that it is in force, as any student of the English legal system will know, the fact that an offence is laid down in a statute does not mean that its meaning is guaranteed to be clear and undisputed. Many of the decisions discussed in this book involve the appellate criminal courts wrestling with matters of statutory construction. This has the potential to generate vast numbers of appellate decisions (all of which are now accessible via the internet and legal research databases) and there is a real danger that the principle under consideration in a given case is lost in the voluminous citation of authority.¹²²

This is not the place to rehearse general principles of statutory construction. However, it is worth emphasizing one particular principle of statutory construction in criminal law: that if a provision is ambiguous it ought to be interpreted in the manner favourable to the accused.¹²³ The courts have acknowledged a new dimension to that principle where the ambiguity might be resolved by reference to ministerial statements. In Thet v DPP,¹²⁴ it was suggested that it is not permissible to use the doctrine in *Pepper v Hart*¹²⁵ and refer to the parliamentary debates to enlarge the scope of liability. However, in Tabnak,¹²⁶ Lord Philips CJ, again giving the judgment of the court, qualified, obiter, what had been said in Thet v DPP.¹²⁷ Defence reliance on Pepper v Hart, to admit parliamentary material as an aid to statutory construction, may be more readily received by the court than where the prosecution rely on Pepper v Hart. The criminal courts' use of Pepper v Hart continues to be rather unorthodox.¹²⁸

1.5 EU

The law of the European Union is an often overlooked source of English criminal law.¹²⁹ There is little doubt that the domestic criminal lawyer in England is experiencing the influence of EU law in criminal process (with extradition and European Arrest Warrants, and European Investigation Orders, etc).¹³⁰ In terms of substantive criminal law rather than process, although it might seem as if there is little English case law dealing explicitly with EU criminal law, in fact EU law does have an important influence on a number of areas of mainstream criminal law in this country. One way EU law may influence domestic criminal law is by introducing criminal law measures at EU level. Another way is to influence the interpretation of domestic law by EU principles. Obvious examples include: cartels in competition law that are now criminalized by ¹²¹ See LCCP 195, para 3.144.

¹²² See Erskine [2009] EWCA Crim 1425, [2010] Crim LR 48 and commentary.

¹²³ Tuck v Priester (1887) 19 QBD 627. ¹²⁴ [2006] EWHC 2701 (Admin), [15].

¹²⁵ [1993] AC 593, HL. ¹²⁶ [2007] EWCA Crim 380, [2007] 2 Cr App R 4.

¹²⁷ [2006] EWHC 2701 (Admin), [2007] 2 All ER 425.

¹²⁸ See eg the decision in JTB [2009] UKHL 20 on doli incapax, discussed in Ch 9 in full and see F Bennion [2009] Crim LR 757.

¹²⁹ See for an accessible account, E Baker, 'The European Union's "Area of Freedom, Security and (Criminal) Justice" 10 Years On' [2010] Crim LR 833. For more detailed analysis, see V Mitsilegas, EU Criminal Law (2009). See also E Baker, 'Taking European Criminal Law Seriously' [1998] Crim LR 361; H Jung, 'Criminal Justice—A European Perspective' [1993] Crim LR 237; J Dine, 'European Community Criminal Law' [1993] Crim LR 246; N Bridge, 'The European Communities and the Criminal Law' [1976] Crim LR 88.

¹³⁰ For detailed analysis, see D Atkinson (ed), EU Law in Criminal Practice (2013).

the Enterprise Act 2002,¹³¹ consumer protection offences, areas of VAT evasion and carousel frauds and environmental crimes.¹³² EU law is clearly an important source of statutory criminal law in England and will remain so even after the UK leaves the EU. This is because clause 2(1) of the European Union (Withdrawal) Bill provides that, 'EU-derived domestic legislation, as it has effect in domestic law immediately before exit day, continues to have effect in domestic law on and after exit day'.

1.6 International law

As supranational legal regimes have begun to exert more of an influence on English criminal law, the range of sources extends ever wider. There are several aspects to acknowledge. First, there are of course some crimes created by English law which can be committed abroad but these are not international at all, simply extraterritorial.¹³³

In addition, there are numerous crimes of a transnational form, in particular money laundering offences.

There is also the potential for international law¹³⁴ to influence domestic law directly as was illustrated in *Jones*¹³⁵ where the appellants sought to argue that the definition of crime in s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 should be interpreted to include the crime of aggression recognized in international law. This would have permitted them to argue that they were acting in prevention of a 'crime' (the international crime of aggression) when they damaged property at military establishments in England as a protest against the Iraq war. The House of Lords rejected that interpretation, recognizing that it was for Parliament to incorporate such international crimes into English law, and not for the courts.¹³⁶

International law also influences domestic criminal law because the origin of domestic criminal law may be found in the UK's obligations to give effect to international law, specifically those obligations contained in treaties. For example, the offences contained in the International Criminal Court Act 2001 (genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity) are defined by reference to the Rome Statute.¹³⁷

1.7 The ECHR and Human Rights Act 1998

The enactment of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA 1998) was one of the most significant developments in English law in the last century. Its impact has been felt on the criminal law as elsewhere. Detailed consideration of the Act and the ECHR can be found in specialist texts, and the following pages offer simply an introductory overview of the most important ¹³¹ C Graham, 'The Enterprise Act 2002 and Competition Law' (2004) 67 MLR 273; C Harding and J Joshua, 'Breaking Up the Hardcore: The Prospects for the Proposed Cartel Offence' [2002] Crim LR 933. See also Norris v USA [2008] UKHL 16.

¹³² As an illustration of the way that EU law might impact on domestic criminal law, see the relatively recent realization that the Video Recordings Act 1984 was invalid since it was never referred to the EU Commission. The Video Recordings Act 2010 was then enacted in identical terms. See Buidimir [2010] EWCA Crim 1486.

¹³³ See P Alldridge, Relocating Criminal Law (2000) Ch 7.

¹³⁴ See generally the essays contained in V Mitsilegas, P Alldridge and I Cheliotis (eds), Globalisation, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2014).

¹³⁵ [2006] UKHL 16; see also the commentary at [2007] Crim LR 66.

¹³⁶ See Lord Bingham [2006] UKHL 16, [12], [23], [28], [2007] Crim LR 66.

¹³⁷ See the excellent review by K Grady, 'International Crimes in the Courts of England and Wales' [2014] Crim LR 693.

aspects of the ECHR and its impact on substantive criminal law.¹³⁸ The Convention rights are dealt with at relevant points throughout the book.

As with other areas of law, the criminal court is, by virtue of s 2 of the HRA 1998, obliged to 'take account' of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in construing English law. This is problematic since much of the Strasbourg jurisprudence is vague and general in nature and not in the familiar form of common law case precedents. In addition, there is the problem that all too often in criminal matters the ECtHR accepts that the actions of the relevant State are within the margin of appreciation. This accommodates the Member States' distinctive criminal law traditions and cultures, but renders the protection in substantive law relatively weak.¹³⁹

Under s 3 of the HRA 1998 the courts must ensure that statutes 'so far as it is possible to do so, be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights'. Examples of the criminal courts' approach to that duty can be seen in numerous cases. Lord Bingham summarized the position:

First, the interpretative obligation under s 3 is a very strong and far reaching one, and may require the court to depart from the legislative intention of Parliament. Secondly, a Convention-compliant interpretation under s 3 is the primary remedial measure and a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 an exceptional course. Thirdly, it is to be noted that during the passage of the Bill through Parliament the promoters of the Bill told both Houses that it was envisaged that the need for a declaration of incompatibility would rarely arise. Fourthly, there is a limit beyond which a Convention-compliant interpretation is not possible In explaining why a Convention-compliant interpretation may not be possible, members of the committee used differing expressions: such an interpretation would be incompatible with the underlying thrust of the legislation, or would not go with the grain of it, or would call for legislative deliberation, or would change the substance of a provision completely, or would remove its pith and substance, or would violate a cardinal principle of the legislation All of these expressions, as I respectfully think, yield valuable insights, but none of them should be allowed to supplant the simple test enacted in the Act: 'So far as it is possible to do so . . .'. While the House declined to try to formulate precise rules . . . it was thought that cases in which s 3 could not be used would in practice be fairly easy to identify.¹⁴⁰

Where necessary the High Court, Court of Appeal or Supreme Court may declare a statute to be incompatible (HRA 1998, s 4) but cannot 'strike down' legislation. The courts have held some criminal statutes incompatible in controversial circumstances.¹⁴¹ A court may 'read down' a statute to avoid a declaration of incompatibility. This has proved necessary in some criminal cases.¹⁴²

The ECHR imposes positive and negative obligations. Thus, the State cannot infringe a person's rights by, for example, denying his right to life (negative obligation). Equally, the ¹³⁸ See generally Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ; J Cooper and M Colvin, Human Rights in the Investigation and Prosecution of Crime (2009). For a review of developments in the past decade and a half, see A Ashworth, 'A Decade of Human Rights in Criminal Justice' [2014] Crim LR 325.

¹³⁹ See K Cavanagh, 'Policing the Margins: Rights Protection and the European Court of Human Rights' [2006] EHRLR 422.

¹⁴⁰ A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2002) [2004] UKHL 43, [28], [2005] Crim LR 215. See R (Hicks) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2014] EWCA Civ 3, [2014] Crim LR 681.

¹⁴¹ See eg A v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2004] UKHL 56 on the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001.

¹⁴² See eg Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] Crim LR 806.

State is obliged to provide protection for an individual's rights by ensuring that the criminal law punishes and deters those who infringe rights (positive obligation).¹⁴³

Some Articles of the Convention expressly impose such positive obligations,¹⁴⁴ as for example with Art 2 providing that the right to life 'shall be protected by law'. Many other guarantees under the Convention have been interpreted by the ECtHR to impose an obligation on the State to create laws which will protect the Convention rights of one individual from being infringed by another.¹⁴⁵

1.7.1 Convention rights and substantive criminal law

Although the ECHR's impact is most significant in the context of evidence and procedure, the ECHR also has a direct impact on the operation of the substantive criminal law in many ways.¹⁴⁶

1.7.1.1 Definition and interpretation

In terms of definition of crimes, the greatest impact might be under Art 7, which proscribes retrospective criminalization. Article 7 has been interpreted so as to prohibit vague criminal offences, as well as those that are truly retrospective. Article 7 provides:

1. No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.
2. This Article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

The European Court held in Kokkinakis v Greece,¹⁴⁷ and has reiterated many times since, that:

Article 7 . . . is not confined to prohibiting the retrospective application of the criminal law to an accused's disadvantage. It also embodies, more generally, the principle that only the law can define a crime and prescribe a penalty (nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege) and the principle that the criminal law must not be extensively construed to an accused's detriment, for instance by analogy; it follows that an offence must be clearly defined in law.

The Strasbourg Court looks to whether the individual can know from the wording of the relevant provision and, if need be, with the assistance of the courts' interpretation of it, ¹⁴³ See further L Lazarus, 'Positive Obligations and Criminal Justice: Duties to Protect or Coerce?' in L Zedner and JV Roberts (eds), Principles and Values in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2013); J Rogers, 'Applying the Doctrine of Positive Obligations in the European Convention of Human Rights to Domestic Substantive Criminal Law in Domestic Proceedings' [2003] Crim LR 690. See also on the State's duty to protect life: Van Colle v CC of Hertfordshire [2008] UKHL 50. The principle was affirmed in Van Colle v UK (2013) 56 EHRR 23. For the impact this has on failures properly to investigate crime, see Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis v DSD [2018] UKSC 11.

¹⁴⁴ See generally S Fredman, Human Rights Transformed (2008).

¹⁴⁵ See Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, para 2.53.

¹⁴⁶ There was a substantial debate as to how significant an impact the HRA would have: for a minimalist view, see Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and the Substantive Criminal Law' [2000] Crim LR 331; and for a more radical expectation, see A Ashworth, 'HRA 1998 and Substantive Law' [2000] Crim LR 564.

¹⁴⁷ (1994) 17 EHRR 397 (App no 14307/88), Judgment of 25 May 1993, para 52.

which acts and omissions will make him criminally liable. This is not a prohibition on the development of the common law. As the Court noted in SW:¹⁴⁸

However clearly drafted a legal provision may be, in any system of law, including criminal law, there is an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. There will always be a need for elucidation of doubtful points and for adaptation to changing circumstances. Indeed, in the United Kingdom, as in the other Convention States, the progressive development of the criminal law through judicial law-making is a well entrenched and necessary part of legal tradition. Article 7 of the Convention cannot be read as outlawing the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation from case to case, provided that the resultant development is consistent with the essence of the offence and could reasonably be foreseen.

In general, the English courts have taken a very narrow view of the protection afforded by Art 7¹⁴⁹ and have failed to accept that common law crimes such as manslaughter by gross negligence,¹⁵⁰ and public nuisance,¹⁵¹ are incompatible with Art 7 on the grounds of their vagueness. One striking example of the English courts' narrow approach is Haw v Secretary of State,¹⁵² where the court held that there was no infringement when the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 imposing restrictions on demonstrations in Parliament Square was applied to someone whose protest there had started before the Act was even drafted.

The House of Lords¹⁵³ did rely on Art 7 in rejecting the Crown's use of conspiracy to defraud when that offence had never previously been used to prosecute the alleged wrongdoing—price fixing. The House acknowledged the 'consistent message . . . through cases decided from 1875 through to 1984, was that price-fixing was not of itself capable of constituting a crime There was no reported case, indeed, it would appear, no unreported case, no textbook, no article which suggested otherwise.'¹⁵⁴ As such, it would infringe the principle of legality to impose the offence without warning. The House of Lords distinguished SW since in that case there was a gradual change in the law incrementally criminalizing marital rape and hence the availability of the charge had become reasonably foreseeable.

Many of the other Articles of the Convention will also affect the application of existing and future¹⁵⁵ crimes.

1.7.2 The Convention rights

Many of the ECHR rights as specified in Sch 1 to the HRA 1998, are of importance in determining the appropriate scope and application of offences. There are numerous examples provided throughout the book, but a few simple examples show how widely the impact of the Convention can be felt in substantive criminal law:

- Art 2 impacts on the scope of the protection offered by the law of homicide and the qualifications on the scope of self-defence, on abortion and euthanasia.¹⁵⁶ In ¹⁴⁸ See SW v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 363, para 35.

¹⁴⁹ See C Murphy, 'The Principle of Legality in Criminal Law under the ECHR' [2010] EHRLR 194.

¹⁵⁰ Misra [2004] EWCA Crim 2375, [2005] Crim LR 234.

¹⁵¹ Rimmington [2006] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153.

¹⁵² [2005] EWCA Civ 532.

¹⁵³ Norris v USA [2008] UKHL 16; GG [2008] UKHL 17.

¹⁵⁴ At [55].

¹⁵⁵ As the minister must give an assurance to Parliament that any Bill is compatible with the ECHR: HRA 1998, s 19. Note, however, this assurance is provided when the Bill is in its original form when presented to Parliament. See generally ATH Smith, 'The Human Rights Act and the Criminal Lawyer: The Constitutional Context' (1999) 197 CLR 251. The Law Commission's proposals are very keenly influenced by ECHR concerns; see eg LC 282, Children: Their Non-Accidental Deaths or Serious Injury (2003); LC 348, Hate Crime: Should the Current Offences be Extended (2014).

¹⁵⁶ See Chs 12 and 15.

R (Pretty) v DPP,¹⁵⁷ as confirmed in Pretty v UK,¹⁵⁸ Art 2 does not enshrine the right to self-determination so as to require the State to permit the terminally ill to determine for themselves when they die;¹⁵⁹

- Art 3 impacts on regulation of the parental administration of corporal punishment;¹⁶⁰
- Art 4 led to the introduction of a slavery offence in 2009 and its amendment in 2015;
- Art 5 affects the manner in which defendants found unfit to plead or not guilty by reason of insanity will be treated¹⁶¹ and also, for example, the definition of the offence of false imprisonment;¹⁶²
- Art 6 impacts on the use of reverse burden of proof defences;¹⁶³
- Art 8 is relevant in protecting the rights of consenting adults to engage in sexual behaviour;¹⁶⁴
- Art 9 could impact on the public order offences and the right of a religious group to conduct a service in public;
- Art 10 could offer a defence to those charged with offences in which they are expressing themselves in the form of protest—criminal damage or public order or obscenity;¹⁶⁵
- Art 11 could affect the way the public order restrictions on a meeting are enforced;¹⁶⁶ and
- Art 14 could impact on the way that the criminal law discriminates against spouses or non-married couples.¹⁶⁷

1.7.3 Article 6(2) of the ECHR and the burden of proof

The famous case of *Woolmington v DPP*¹⁶⁸ makes clear that the requirement for the prosecution to prove the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt is a fundamental principle of English law.¹⁶⁹ Article 6(2) of the ECHR reinforces this, providing that a person ‘charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the law’. The effect of the presumption is that in any criminal trial the prosecution bear the burden of proving (beyond a reasonable doubt) that the defendant performed the relevant actus reus with the requisite mens rea in the crime alleged. The defendant will bear the burden of raising sufficient evidence to get any defences off the ground. For example, where it is alleged that D murdered V, the prosecution must establish all the elements of murder, and D will have an obligation to adduce sufficient evidence to raise his defence, for example self-defence. The prosecution will then be obliged to rebut that defence to the criminal standard of proof; that is, making the jury satisfied so that they are sure that D was not acting in self-defence. The defendant bears what is called an evidential burden.

In exceptional circumstances, D bears the legal burden of proof. This is a more onerous duty: to prove a fact on the balance of probabilities, rather than merely to adduce evidence ¹⁵⁷ [2001] UKHL 61. ¹⁵⁸ (2002) 35 EHRR 1.

¹⁵⁹ See also R (on the application of Nicklinson and another) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38.

¹⁶⁰ See Ch 16. ¹⁶¹ See Ch 9. ¹⁶² See Ch 16. ¹⁶³ See Ch 10.

¹⁶⁴ See Ch 17. ¹⁶⁵ Chs 27, 30, 31. ¹⁶⁶ Ch 31. ¹⁶⁷ Ch 11.

¹⁶⁸ [1935] AC 462.

¹⁶⁹ See generally HL Ho, ‘The Presumption of Innocence as a Human Right’ in P Roberts and J Hunter (eds), Criminal Evidence and Human Rights: Reimagining Common Law Procedural Traditions (2012); D Hamer, ‘A Dynamic Reconstruction of the Presumption of Innocence’ (2011) 31 OJLS 417; A Stumer, The Presumption of Innocence, Evidential and Human Rights Perspectives (2010).

of it. The first exception is where D pleads insanity. His obligation is to prove that it is more probable than not that he was 'insane' in law.¹⁷⁰ A second exception is where D pleads diminished responsibility under s 2 of the Homicide Act 1957. Again, it is for D to prove that it is more probable than not that he suffered from an abnormality of mental functioning arising from a recognized medical condition that substantially affected his relevant capacity and caused him to kill (see further the discussion in Ch 13). Further exceptional categories are created by Parliament, but these must be treated with caution, since all must comply with Art 6(2).¹⁷¹ Finally, there are implied statutory exceptions where the offence provides any 'exception, exemption, proviso, excuse or qualification whether or not it accompanies the description of the offence in the enactment creating the offence'.¹⁷² It is rather unsatisfactory that such an important matter as who bears the burden of proof turns on the matter of form in the statutory drafting, and is not obvious in every offence-creating provision.

Where an offence imposes a legal burden on the accused to prove a matter, rather than imposing merely an evidential burden to raise evidence of a matter, the question of compatibility with Art 6(2) arises. The leading ECtHR authority on the application of Art 6(2) is Salabiaku v France.¹⁷³ The Court recognized that Art 6(2) does not regard presumptions of fact or of law provided for in the criminal law with indifference. It requires States to confine them within reasonable limits which take into account the importance of what is at stake and maintain the rights of the defence.¹⁷⁴

The English courts rapidly, though not consistently, developed a domestic jurisprudence on the imposition of a burden on the accused.¹⁷⁵ No fewer than four visits to the House of Lords failed to produce definitive guidance on the matter.¹⁷⁶ In the most recent major pronouncement, the House held that the court's responsibility in construing statutory provisions which appear to place a burden on a defendant is not to decide whether a reverse burden should be imposed on a defendant, but rather to evaluate whether Parliament's enactment unjustifiably infringes the presumption of innocence. Consider the case of a legal burden of proof placed on the accused on a charge of membership of a proscribed organization under s 11 of the Terrorism Act 2000,¹⁷⁷ where Lord Bingham identified five reasons¹⁷⁸ for his conclusion that the presumption was unjustifiably infringed:

- (a) the reverse burden created a real risk that innocent individuals might be convicted, since the section is capable of applying to people who have no culpability;
- (b) it could be difficult for any individual to prove that he has not participated in activities, since terrorist organizations do not often keep records;

¹⁷⁰ See T Jones, 'Insanity, Automatism and the Burden of Proof on the Accused' (1995) 111 LQR 475. For a full discussion see, Ch 9, p 302.

¹⁷¹ Arguably these are not so exceptional—see A Ashworth and M Blake, 'The Presumption of Innocence in English Criminal Law' [1996] Crim LR 306, who found around 40 per cent of crimes imposing a burden on D.

¹⁷² See the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, s 101, in relation to summary offences. The House of Lords applied the same essential criteria in finding implied burdens in indictable offences: Hunt [1987] AC 352.

¹⁷³ (1988) 13 EHRR 379. ¹⁷⁴ Para 28.

¹⁷⁵ See IH Dennis, 'Reverse Onuses and the Presumption of Innocence' [2005] Crim LR 901.

¹⁷⁶ See R v DPP, ex p Kebeline [2000] 2 AC 326, [2000] Crim LR 486; Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] Crim LR 806; Johnstone [2003] 1 WLR 1736, [2004] Crim LR 244; A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2002) [2004] UKHL 43, [2005] Crim LR 215. See also Chargot Ltd [2008] UKHL 73.

¹⁷⁷ Section 11(2) provides: It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (1) to prove that the organisation was not proscribed on the last (or only) occasion on which he became a member or began to profess to be a member, and that he has not taken part in the activities of the organisation at any time while it was proscribed.

¹⁷⁸ At [51]. See generally on the ECHR and terrorism, R Buxton [2010] Crim LR 533.

- (c) if the legal burden rested on defendants, courts would in some cases convict those who could not establish their innocence;
- (d) the potential punishment for the relevant offence is up to ten years' imprisonment;
- (e) the security considerations, although important, do not absolve Member States from their duty to ensure that basic standards of fairness are observed.

This can be contrasted with their lordships' conclusion in the conjoined appeal in Sheldrake, dealing with s 5(2) of the Road Traffic Act 1988 which provides a defence to the offence of drink-driving.¹⁷⁹ The House of Lords held unanimously that Parliament had not acted unjustifiably in placing the legal burden on the accused in relation to that defence.¹⁸⁰

The defendant has a full opportunity to show that there was no likelihood of his driving, a matter so closely conditioned by his own knowledge and state of mind at the material time as to make it much more appropriate for him to prove on the balance of probabilities that he would not be likely to drive than for the prosecutor to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that he would . . . If a driver tries and fails to establish a defence under section 5(2), I would not regard the resulting conviction as unfair.

The guiding principles in determining the compatibility of a reverse onus provision appear to be the severity of sentence, the ease of proof for the defence and the risk of convicting the innocent.¹⁸¹ These principles do not form a sufficiently solid or clear basis to guide the lower courts in future decision-making, and it is likely that the matter will require further appellate attention.¹⁸²

¹⁷⁹ Which provides that it is a defence for the defendant to prove that although he was in charge of the vehicle and was intoxicated beyond the legal limit 'the circumstances were such that there was no likelihood of his driving the vehicle whilst the proportion of alcohol' in his body exceeded the limit.

¹⁸⁰ At [41]. See also Chargot Ltd [2008] UKHL 73.

¹⁸¹ For cogent criticism, see A Ashworth, commenting in [2005] Crim LR 215.

¹⁸² See especially Dennis [2005] Crim LR 901.

2

The elements of a crime: actus reus

2.1 Introduction

It is a fundamental principle of criminal law that a person may not be convicted of a crime unless he has manifested his wrongdoing in some behaviour. There is no thought crime. Different crimes identify different forms of proscribed behaviour. Some are conduct crimes, where the acts or omissions of the accused are (with any required mental element) sufficient to constitute the offence. Examples include perjury and rape. In these conduct offences there is no need to prove that any result was caused by D's conduct. Some crimes are result crimes and in those it must be proved that D's conduct caused a proscribed result. Murder, criminal damage and causing death by dangerous driving are examples.

The prosecution must prove beyond reasonable doubt (a) in a conduct crime that responsibility is to be attributed to D for certain behaviour or the existence of a certain state of affairs, in circumstances forbidden by criminal law; and (b) in a result crime, that responsibility is to be attributed to D for conduct in specified circumstances that has caused a proscribed event. That is the actus reus or external elements of the offence. To convict D, the prosecution must also prove that he had a defined state of mind in relation to the behaviour, existence of the state of affairs or causing of the event. The state of mind is the mens rea, or mental element, of the crime. The principle that a person is not criminally liable for his conduct unless the prescribed state of mind (mens rea) coincides with the prohibited actus reus also being present is frequently stated in the form of a Latin maxim: actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea.¹

2.1.1 Proof and the elements of the offence

As an example of these fundamental principles in operation, consider a charge of murder. If it is absolutely clear that D killed V—that is, he has caused an actus reus—he must be acquitted of murder if there is a reasonable possibility that the killing was accidental. If that is the case, it has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt that he had the requisite mens rea. That was laid down by the House of Lords in *Woolmington v DPP*² where it was held, overruling earlier authorities, that it is a misdirection to tell a jury that D must satisfy them that the killing was an accident. The true rule is that the jury must acquit even though they are not satisfied that D's story is true, if they think it might reasonably be true. They should convict only if satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that D's account is not true.

¹ 'Properly translated, this means "An act does not make a man guilty of a crime, unless his mind be also guilty." It is thus not the actus which is "reus" but the man and his mind respectively' per Lord Hailsham in Haughton v Smith [1975] AC 476 at 491–492, [1974] Crim LR 305. It is, however, convenient to follow the established usage of 'actus reus'. Cf Lord Simon in DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] AC 653 at 690, and Lord Diplock in Miller [1983] 2 AC 161, [1983] Crim LR 466, HL.

At common law, this rule is of general application³ and there is only one exception to it at common law—the defence of insanity.⁴ If D pleads a defence of insanity, he must prove, on the balance of probabilities, that defence.⁵ For other common law defences, for example duress, the only burden on D is to raise enough evidence of the existence of the constituents of the defence;⁶ whereupon it is for the Crown to satisfy the jury that at least one of those constituents did not exist.⁷ If there is evidence of a defence, though it has not been specifically raised by D, the judge must direct the jury to acquit unless they are satisfied that the defence has been disproved.⁸

By statute, however, a legal burden may expressly or impliedly be placed on the defendant to prove his defence.⁹ Since the HRA 1998 such provisions may not always be fully effective,¹⁰ and the court will be required to examine their compatibility with Art 6(2) of the ECHR. Whenever a legal burden of proof is put upon D, he satisfies it if he proves the issue on a balance of probabilities—the same standard as that on the claimant in a civil action—and he need not prove it beyond reasonable doubt.¹¹ The Law Commission's recommendations in relation to a number of offences include creating defences for which D bears a legal burden of proof,¹² and this may become a more common feature in statutes.

2.1.2 Identifying elements of actus reus and mens rea

It is impossible to catalogue every type of conduct, circumstance or result that might constitute the actus reus of a crime. There are many thousands of offences, and in each case it is necessary to look to the specific terms of the offence, as defined by statute or common law, to determine what the elements of actus reus will be. As ever, care must be taken to be precise about the form of the actus reus of the particular offence. For example, the actus reus of murder is not simply the result—‘a killing’—but includes elements of conduct and circumstances: the causing of the death of a human being under the Queen's peace, and that human being must first have been born alive. Similarly, the actus reus of rape is not simply non-consensual sex but, more specifically, consists of elements of conduct (penile penetration of ² [1935] AC 462. See Lord Cooke, ‘One Golden Thread’ in Turning Points in the Common Law (The Hamlyn Lectures, 1997) 28. See generally C Tapper, Cross and Tapper on Evidence (12th edn, 2010) Ch 10; IH Dennis, The Law of Evidence (6th edn, 2017) Ch 11.

³ Mancini v DPP [1942] AC 1; Chan Kau v R [1955] AC 206; Lobell [1957] 1 QB 547 (self-defence) and see now s 76 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, p 381; Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 (automatism); Gill [1963] 1 WLR 841 (duress). But the onus of proving procedural bars to trial such as autrefois convict or acquitted, may be on D: Coughlan (1976) 63 Cr App R 33 at 36, [1976] Crim LR 628.

⁴ See Ch 9. ⁵ He has a legal burden of proof.

⁶ This is known as an evidential burden. ⁷ The Crown has the legal burden of proof.

⁸ Palmer v R [1971] AC 814; Wheeler (1967) 52 Cr App R 28 at 30–31; Hamand (1985) 82 Cr App R 65, [1985] Crim LR 375. See Batchelor [2013] EWCA Crim 2638 and Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794.

⁹ Hunt [1987] AC 352, [1987] Crim LR 263, HL.

¹⁰ See p 23. On the HRA 1998 and the burden of proof, see, inter alia, Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, Ch 29.

¹¹ Carr-Briant [1943] KB 607.

¹² See eg the defence of reasonableness in s 50 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 (LC 300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006); a similar defence was recommended for conspiracy in LC 318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009) (see Ch 11); and that recommended for duress to murder in LC 304 (discussed in Ch 12)).

the vagina, anus or mouth of a person) and proscribed circumstances (without the person's consent). A key skill that the criminal lawyer must develop is the ability to identify which elements of an offence are those of actus reus and which relate to the mens rea. It is usually easier to identify the elements of a crime that comprise the mens rea since these are represented by common expressions—intentionally, knowingly, wilfully, recklessly, etc—all of which are examined fully in the next chapter.

It should be noted that the separation of elements into actus reus and mens rea in this manner is principally to allow for the most convenient exposition and discussion of any given crime.¹³ In practical terms, there is no need for the prosecution to approach its case by breaking down the crime into constituent parts of actus reus and mens rea to prove each element in turn to the jury's satisfaction; it will commonly, and sensibly, approach the task as one of proving all the elements of the crime as a whole. Moreover, it is not always possible to separate precisely actus reus from mens rea.¹⁴ Sometimes a word that describes the actus reus, or part of it, implies a mental element. Without that mental element the actus reus simply cannot exist. For example, there are many offences of possession of specified objects (drugs, knives, etc) and it has always been recognized that 'possession', which might appear to be an element of actus reus, consists also in a mental element.¹⁵ The same is true of words like 'permits',¹⁶ 'appropriates',¹⁷ 'cultivates',¹⁸ 'abandons'¹⁹ and many more that appear across the range of offences. Having an offensive weapon in a public place is the actus reus of an offence; but whether an article is an offensive weapon depends, in some circumstances, on the intention with which it is carried. In the absence of that intention, the thing is not an offensive weapon and there is no actus reus.²⁰ Making a false representation is the actus reus of fraud, but the element of falsity requires D to know the representation was untrue or misleading.²¹ Similarly, transferring criminal property is a money laundering offence, but the definition of criminal property depends in part on whether D knows or suspects it is criminal property.²²

The significance of this is that where the crime has an actus reus which incorporates a mental element, that necessarily becomes an element of the offence. It is the combination of the two which becomes the complete definition of the prohibited conduct.

2.1.3 The nature of an actus reus

Since the actus reus includes all the elements in the definition of the crime except D's mental element or fault,²³ it follows that the actus reus is not merely an 'act'. It may comprise conduct and its attendant circumstances and/or results.

¹³ See ATH Smith, 'On Actus Reus and Mens Rea' in P Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law; see also the more recent analysis of the significance of the differentiation: Duff, Answering for Crime, 202–208.

¹⁴ See ACE Lynch, 'The Mental Element in the Actus Reus' (1982) 98 LQR 109.

¹⁵ See Ch 5. For an interesting analysis of possession offences, see MD Dubber, 'The Possession Paradigm' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes.

¹⁶ See Ch 5.

¹⁷ See Ch 18. In Gomez [1993] AC 442 at 495, [1993] Crim LR 304. Lord Browne-Wilkinson regarded 'appropriation' in the offence of theft as not involving any mental state; but this is hard to believe. See the discussion, p 831.

¹⁸ Champ (1981) 73 Cr App R 367, [1982] Crim LR 108 and commentary.

¹⁹ Hunt v Duckering [1993] Crim LR 678, DC (abandoning a dog in circumstances likely to cause unnecessary suffering).

²⁰ See p 748.

²¹ See Ch 22, s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006.

²² See Ch 26.

²³ It should be said that this is not the only possible definition of an actus reus, and that a more limited view is taken of it by some writers. It is thought, however, that it is the most useful conception of the actus reus and is adopted throughout this book. Cf Williams, CLGP, 16, who suggests that the elements of actus reus ought also to incorporate the absence of some defences. See also the discussion in Duff, Answering for Crime, 202.

Usually the actus reus requires proof of an act or an omission by D (which might be better described as ‘conduct’). In fraud, D’s conduct (making a false representation) is the full actus reus. For some conduct crimes the actus reus comprises conduct and circumstances: perjury is committed as soon as D makes a statement (conduct) on oath (circumstance) that he does not believe to be true. It is irrelevant whether there is a result in terms of whether his testimony is believed or not. In result crimes,²⁴ in addition to conduct and circumstances it must also be proved that the proscribed conduct caused a particular result. In murder, for example, it must be shown that D’s conduct caused the death. The actus reus of murder consists of elements of conduct, circumstance (that the victim was a human being under the Queen’s peace who had been born alive—a foetus is not yet a person to the law) and result (that the victim died).

In some rare instances, the actus reus may consist in a set of circumstances or ‘state of affairs’, not including any conduct or action by D at all.²⁵ An example might be where D is charged with ‘being found’ drunk in a public place.

2.1.3.1 Result crimes

There are many examples of result crimes, some of the most obvious being murder, manslaughter, wounding, etc. It has been said²⁶ that in ‘result crimes’ the law is interested only in the result and not in the conduct bringing about the result. Similarly, a well-known definition of actus reus is ‘such result of human conduct as the law seeks to prevent’.²⁷ But a dead person with a knife in his back is not the actus reus of a murder. It is putting the knife in the back thereby causing the death that is the actus reus. The law is just as interested in the conduct that brings about the result in a ‘result crime’ as it is with a ‘conduct crime’.²⁸

2.1.3.2 Conduct crimes

True conduct crimes, such as perjury, are rare. The term ‘conduct crime’ has been interpreted more widely by Glanville Williams to include rape and abduction—in these crimes, ‘you do not have to wait to see if anything happens as a result of what the defendant does’.²⁹ This method of classification is controversial. If the test is whether you ‘have to wait to see’, wounding is a conduct crime if committed with a knife but a result crime if committed with a gun, crossbow or catapult. If the distinction between conduct and result crimes is to be made,³⁰ these offences of wounding and abduction are better regarded as result crimes. A result has to flow from D’s physical movements, whether you have to wait for it or not.

Since the Criminal Attempts Act 1981,³¹ all indictable offences are now, in a sense, potentially conduct crimes because any act, done with intent thereby³² to commit an indictable offence, may be an indictable attempt to commit it. D who aims a rifle at V and is about to shoot is, by that conduct, attempting to murder him. The actus reus of the substantive offence attempted need never happen and may, indeed, be impossible (the gun is unloaded). The definition of the elements of the substantive offence serves only to define the mens rea of the attempt.

²⁴ Some crimes can be both—bribery can be committed by causing B to receive (result) or by offering to B (conduct): Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing, 35. See the Bribery Act 2010, s 1 dealing with D who bribes and s 2 with R who receives.

²⁵ See p 43. ²⁶ Gordon, 61. ²⁷ Kenny, Outlines, 17.

²⁸ See Lord Diplock in Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537 at 560.

²⁹ ‘The Problem of Reckless Attempts’ [1983] Crim LR 365 at 366, 368.

³⁰ It is not clear that it has, or should have, any practical consequences except perhaps as to jurisdiction.

³¹ As interpreted in Shivpuri, p 496.

³² ie D intends to cause the result by that act; it is the last act D intends, and needs to do not a merely preparatory act. An earlier act is sufficient, if ‘more than merely preparatory’: Ch 11.

An argument can be made that the law should always have regard only to the conduct and not to the result. Whether the conduct results in harm is generally a matter of chance and does not alter the blameworthiness and dangerousness of the actor.³³ But the law has not gone so far.³⁴ If D hurls a stone, being reckless whether he injures anyone, he is guilty of an offence if the stone strikes V but of no offence—not even an attempt—if no one is injured. From a retributive point of view, it might be argued that D should be equally liable in either event. This could be achieved by the creation of general offences of reckless endangerment.³⁵ On utilitarian grounds, however, it is probably undesirable to turn the whole criminal law into ‘conduct crimes’. The needs of deterrence are probably adequately served in most cases by ‘result crimes’; and the criminal law should be extended only where a clear need is established.

It has been argued that in some offences it may be that the actus reus can take different forms (result or conduct) depending on the circumstances.³⁶ Thus, theft can be committed where D assumes only one of the rights of the owner over his property (conduct crime)³⁷ or where he assumes them all (result crime). This ambiguity is all the less satisfactory because the different categorization of a crime as a conduct or result crime may have implications for procedure, in terms of the form of the indictment, and for jurisdictional issues.

The fact that an offence is a ‘conduct offence’ does not mean that it should automatically be classified as a ‘continuing’ offence. The term ‘conduct’ is being used to distinguish the type of crime from a ‘result’ crime. The conduct crime of perjury is completed once the testimony leaves the lips of the witness. It is not a continuing crime in any real sense. Identifying the starting and finishing points of the actus reus will be important in ensuring that the element of mens rea coincides in time, and may as noted be significant for procedural purposes of charging, in terms of the specific dates and actions alleged in the indictment and the territorial jurisdiction of the courts.

2.1.3.3 Actus reus includes circumstances

Circumstances, like consequences, are relevant if they are included in the definition of the crime. The definition of theft, for example, requires proof that D dishonestly appropriated property belonging to another with intention permanently to deprive the other of it. If the property belonged to no one (because it had been abandoned), D’s appropriation in those circumstances could not constitute the actus reus of theft. However dishonest he might be, he could not be convicted of theft because an essential constituent of the crime is missing.³⁸ In child sex offences, the conduct of sexual touching, etc must be committed in the prescribed circumstance of the child being under a specified age (13 or 16 depending on ³³ A Ashworth, ‘Belief Intent and Criminal Liability’ in J Eekelaar and J Bell (eds), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (1987); ‘Taking the Consequences’ in S Shute, J Gardner and J Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) and ‘Defining Offences Without Harm’ in Criminal Law Essays.

³⁴ As noted in the 12th edn, the Court of Appeal rejected this type of argument in a sentencing appeal where D who had stabbed V was guilty of her murder, even though unknown to anyone V had a very short life expectancy owing to a deep vein thrombosis. D claimed that his sentence ought to reflect this fact. He also sought to argue that his sentence should be reduced because V’s pre-existing medical condition meant that she would die young and V’s family had not been deprived of her ‘long life’: Master [2007] EWCA Crim 142.

³⁵ See, inter alia, the discussion in Duff, ‘Criminalising Endangerment’ in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes; Duff, Answering for Crime, Ch 7; KJM Smith, ‘Liability for Endangerment: English Ad Hoc Pragmatism and American Innovation’ [1983] Crim LR 127; D Lanham, ‘Danger Down Under’ [1999] Crim LR 960; C Clarkson, ‘Aggravated Endangerment Offences’ (2007) 60 CLP 278; A Ashworth and L Zedner, Preventive Justice (2014) Ch 5.

³⁶ See M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) 128.

³⁷ See Morris [1984] AC 320, [1983] Crim LR 813, p 829.

³⁸ He might, however, be convicted of an attempt to steal.

the charge). In burglary, D's conduct of entering a building must be in prescribed circumstances: as a trespasser; and so on.

2.1.3.4 Victim's conduct/state as part of the actus reus

Sometimes a particular state of mind on the part of the victim is an essential element of the actus reus of a crime and, if the prosecution are unable to prove its existence, they must fail. If D is prosecuted for rape, it must be proved that V did not consent to the act of penile penetration. The absence of consent by V is an essential constituent of the actus reus. But in many crimes the consent or other state of mind of the victim is entirely irrelevant. If D is charged with the murder of V, it is no defence for him to show that V asked to be killed.

2.1.3.5 Summary

It is apparent from these examples that we can only see what elements comprise the actus reus of any particular crime by looking at the definition of that crime. We find this definition, in the case of common law crimes, in the decisions of the courts and, in the case of statutory crimes, in the words of the statute as construed by the courts. The actus reus elements of crimes are as diverse as the criminal offences themselves; for example, in bigamy, the fact that D is validly married; in treason committed abroad, that D is a British national (or under the protection of the Crown for some other reason);³⁹ in handling stolen goods, that the goods have, in fact, been stolen; and so on.

2.1.4 The effect of penalty provisions in determining the elements of the actus reus

Sometimes Parliament provides that an offence shall be more severely punishable when a particular fact, say 'X', is present. For example, causing a person to engage in sexual activity is part of the actus reus of a narrow group of offences. In all of those, if the sexual activity the person is caused to engage in involves penile penetration, the maximum sentence is higher. When this happens, it is 'plain beyond argument that Parliament has created two offences', according to Lord Diplock (on behalf of a unanimous House of Lords) in Courtie.⁴⁰ The offence when condition X is present is a different and graver offence than when X is not present. X is an element in the actus reus, or the mens rea, or both, of the greater offence. The courts apply this principle where it can be presumed that Parliament intended to create two offences by giving one form of the offence a higher penalty; the courts will therefore disapply the principle if it would lead to such inconvenient and absurd results that, in the opinion of the courts, Parliament could not have intended it to apply: DPP v Butterworth.⁴¹

When Courtie applies, the effect is (a) that D can be convicted of the greater offence only if the charge alleges X, and (b) it is for the jury to decide whether X is proved and to give their verdict accordingly, not a matter for the judge to decide after verdict.

Where Parliament provides an elaborate structure of maximum penalties, as in the case of drug offences, the criminal offences are correspondingly complex.⁴² But the Courtie

³⁹ Joyce v DPP [1946] AC 347.

⁴⁰ [1984] AC 463 at 471, HL; Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299.

⁴¹ [1995] 1 AC 381, HL. Section 7(6) of the Road Traffic Act 1988 on its face creates only one offence of failing to provide a specimen of breath; but there is a higher penalty where the offender was driving or attempting to drive than when he was merely in charge. Nevertheless, there is only one offence. By contrast, s 5(1)(a) of the Act (driving/attempting to/being in charge of a motor vehicle on a road after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in the breath/blood/urine exceeds the prescribed limit) creates nine offences, all punishable with the same penalty: Bolton Justices, ex p Khan [1999] Crim LR 912.

⁴² Shivpuri [1987] AC 1, [1986] Crim LR 536 and commentary; Ellis, Street and Smith (1986) 84 Cr App R 235, [1987] Crim LR 44, CA, and commentary; Bett [1999] Crim LR 218. Courtie seems to have been completely overlooked in Leeson [2000] 1 Cr App R 233, [2000] Crim LR 195. See commentary at 196.

principle is sound. Where proof of fact X will result in D being liable to a higher penalty, the requirement to prove X should be no less stringent than in the case of the other facts of the offence.

2.1.5 Actus reus and the relationship with justifications or excuses

There is a long-standing debate not only as to the value of the use of terms such as actus reus and mens rea,⁴³ but precisely how the terminology ought to be applied. In the terminology used by Glanville Williams:⁴⁴

Actus reus includes . . . the absence of any ground of justification or excuse, whether such justification or excuse be stated in any statute creating the crime or implied by the courts in accordance with general principle . . .

An alternative view is that of David Lanham:⁴⁵

As a matter of analysis we can think of a crime as being made up of three ingredients, actus reus, mens rea and (a negative element) absence of a valid defence.

Other variations on these two basic views can be advanced including, for example, the suggestion that the actus reus includes the absence of any elements of justification, but not those of excuse.⁴⁶

A simple example illustrates these different approaches. D punches V hard in the stomach, but does so in self-defence. No offence would be committed—according to Williams, because there is no actus reus (or, indeed, mens rea) and, according to Lanham, because, although there is both actus reus and mens rea (the intentional assault) there is a valid defence. Williams' opinion is attractive both because it seems strange to describe an act which is required or permitted by the law as an *actus reus*⁴⁷ and because there are practical difficulties in distinguishing (as Lanham's analysis requires) between the definitional elements of an offence and defence elements.⁴⁸ On the other hand, the cataloguing of every element of an offence becomes impossibly cumbersome if it has to include all conceivable defences to each element—as the authors of the Draft Criminal Code put it, 'the inapplicability of every exception admitted by the definition of an offence must be treated as an element of it'.⁴⁹ Moreover, defences may also require mental as well as external elements. Duress is a defence but only, of course, if D is aware of the threatening facts.⁵⁰ If the purpose of using the terms actus reus and mens rea is convenience of explaining and examining the law, there is much to be said for the Lanham approach and it is generally (but not invariably) followed in this book.⁵¹

⁴³ See PH Robinson, 'Should the Criminal Law Abandon the Actus Reus–Mens Rea Distinction?' in Shute, Gardner and Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law, arguing for the abandonment of the oversimplistic categorization which obscures the doctrines lying beneath the overarching labels. See also Duff, Answering for Crime, Ch 5.

⁴⁴ CLGP, 19. See also TBCL, Ch 2. ⁴⁵ [1976] Crim LR 276.

⁴⁶ See MS Moore, Act and Crime: The Philosophy of Action and its Implications for Criminal Law (1993) 177–183. See further Ch 9.

⁴⁷ But, as noted earlier, actus reus implies no moral judgement, the only point of the analysis being convenience in exposition.

⁴⁸ Although arguably the same is true of Williams' analysis since it requires us to exclude any ground of justification or excuse.

⁴⁹ Draft Code, vol 2, 7.2, 7.3. ⁵⁰ See p 349.

⁵¹ The Latin terms are frequently used by the courts but no detailed analysis has been made of them and it cannot be said that there is a standard judicial usage. The judicial trend is to avoid Latin in the criminal trial. "'Throw Latin out of court'" says Woolf: The Times, 20 July 2000.

2.1.6 No conviction without actus reus

There must be proof of actus reus. There are no 'thought crimes'.⁵² In some instances, the actus reus of a crime might be relatively minimal in physical terms, and may even otherwise seem innocuous—as in conspiracy where the actus reus comprises 'an agreement'. This underlines the importance of keeping in mind the crime as a whole, and not allowing the fragmentation into elements of actus reus and mens rea to distort one's understanding of the offence.

It is important to note that every element of the actus reus must be proved. For example, taking the actus reus of assault—causing a person to apprehend immediate unlawful personal violence⁵³—that might be broken down into elements of conduct towards 'a person', 'causing apprehension', of 'immediate', 'unlawful', 'personal violence'. Unless the prosecution can make the jury sure D's conduct fulfilled all of these requirements there would be no actus reus. Thus, if D caused V to apprehend personal violence, but not immediately, as where D telephoned V in Leeds and said 'I'm in London, but when I get back tomorrow I will hit you', there would be no assault. Similarly, if D caused V to apprehend immediate personal violence, but D was acting with V's consent such as at the outset of a professional boxing match, there would be no unlawfulness and hence no assault.

Offences can exist without any requirement for proof of mens rea in whole or in part—offences of strict or absolute liability—but, except in the anomalous case of an intoxicated offender,⁵⁴ the courts will not dispense with the actus reus element.

If the crime does require mens rea and that has been proved, unless the actus reus is proved that crime is not committed. Although D with a dishonest state of mind believes that he is appropriating V's property he cannot in any circumstances be guilty of theft if the property belongs to no one. D has the mens rea but the actus reus, the other fundamental element of the crime, is lacking. D may penetrate V with his penis with intent to have intercourse with her without her consent but, if in fact she consents, his act cannot amount to rape. D may act with intent to marry during the lifetime of his wife but if, unknown to him, she is dead, he cannot commit bigamy. If D makes a statement, which he believes to be false, with intent to gain, he cannot be convicted of fraud if the statement is, in fact, true. In each case, D may now be convicted of attempting to commit the crime in question.⁵⁵

In Deller,⁵⁶ D induced V to purchase his car by representing (inter alia) that D had ownership and was entitled to sell it. In fact, D had previously executed a document that purported to mortgage the car to a finance company and, no doubt, D thought he was telling a lie. He was charged with obtaining by false pretences.⁵⁷ It then appeared that the document dealing with the purported mortgage of the car was probably void in law for the technical reason that it was as an unregistered bill of sale. If the document was void the car was owned by D and he was entitled to sell it: 'quite accidentally and, strange as it may sound, dishonestly, the appellant had told the truth'.⁵⁸ D's conviction was, therefore, quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal, for, though he had mens rea, no actus reus had been established. Under the present law, D could be convicted of an attempted fraud.⁵⁹

⁵² For a theoretical analysis of why this is so, see Duff, Answering for Crime, 95 et seq. Cf DN Husak, 'Does Criminal Liability Require an Act?' in RA Duff, Philosophy and the Criminal Law (1998).

⁵³ See p 661.

⁵⁴ See Lipman [1970] 1 QB 152. See also the discussion of Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2007] Crim LR 654, p 319.

⁵⁵ See p 412.

⁵⁶ (1952) 36 Cr App R 184. Cf Brien (1903) 3 SRNSW 410; Dyson [1908] 2 KB 454.

⁵⁷ Under the Larceny Act 1916, s 32, now replaced by the Fraud Act 2006, s 2, see p 936.

⁵⁸ (1952) 36 Cr App R 184 at 191.

⁵⁹ See p 942. This was confirmed in Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500, although the Court of Appeal declined to substitute D's conviction for fraud for one of attempted fraud and simply quashed his conviction.

2.1.6.1 The problematic case of Dadson

A case which is sometimes said to be inconsistent with this fundamental principle, but which is worth discussing because it illustrates the difficulties that may arise in connection with its application, is Dadson.⁶⁰ A full discussion of the case occurs in the context of defences in Ch 10.

D was a constable, employed to watch a copse from which wood had been stolen. He carried a loaded gun. V emerged from the copse carrying wood that he had stolen, and, ignoring D's calls to stop, ran away. D, having no other means of bringing him to justice, fired and wounded him in the leg. He was convicted of shooting at V with intent to cause him grievous bodily harm. V had been repeatedly convicted of stealing wood, but D did not know this. Under s 39 of the Larceny Act 1827, stealing wood was a felony if V already had two previous convictions for the same offence. V was a felon. D did not know he was when he shot him. It was lawful to wound an escaping felon⁶¹ if this was the only way of arresting him.⁶² Could D rely on what would be a compelling justifying circumstance when D was unaware of its existence? Erle J told the jury that the alleged felony, being unknown to D, constituted no justification. On a case reserved, the judges thought the conviction was correct: D was not justified in firing at V because the fact that V was committing a felony was not known to D at the time.

Many have argued that this case is wrong because, if we ignore D's state of mind and look at the actual facts, what he did was lawful; there was no actus reus.⁶³ It is submitted that this approach is incorrect. It is important to distinguish between two types of 'defence' that may be raised. In the first type, D merely denies the existence of an element (other than the mens rea) in the definition of the crime. If D successfully raises that plea he certainly cannot be convicted of that crime, whatever his state of mind. This is what happened in Deller—there was no false representation.⁶⁴ In the second type, D admits that all the elements in the definition of the crime have been established and goes on to assert other facts that afford him a defence in law. The establishment of this type of defence may require D to assert the existence of a mental element as well as external facts.

In Dadson,⁶⁵ D did not deny that he shot at V or that he intended to cause him grievous bodily harm. He admitted the necessary constituents of the crime (other than 'unlawfulness') but went on to assert other facts that, he alleged, made his act lawful. He was pleading a defence. Whether his act was lawful depended on what were the constituents of the defence that he raised; and all that the case decided was that that defence, like duress and self-defence, required the assertion not merely of external facts but also of a state of mind.⁶⁶ Dadson, then, is perfectly reconcilable with Deller. It does not decide that a person can be convicted where there is no actus reus. There was an actus reus for D did unlawfully wound V. All that the case decided was that the defence to wounding, 'I was arresting an escaping felon', was a defence which required a mental as well as a physical element and, because ⁶⁰ (1850) 2 Den 35. Cf Tooley (1709) 11 Mod Rep 242 at 251, per Holt CJ; and see Williams, CLGP, 23 et seq.

⁶¹ A term used before the Criminal Law Act 1967 to denote those committing serious offences.

⁶² This was assumed in the case.

⁶³ See Williams, CLGP, 22; Lady HM Trevelyan (ed), The Works of Lord Macaulay, vol 7 (1866) 552; PH Robinson, 'Competing Theories of Justification' in A Simester and ATH Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (1996) 45. Cf J Gardner, 'Justifications and Reasons' in A Simester and ATH Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability, 103.

⁶⁴ See the previous section. ⁶⁵ See n 60.

⁶⁶ A doctrine of actus reus which says that such a course must be wrong, as contravening a fundamental principle, is much too constricting. Whether the defence should consist simply in the external facts, or in the facts plus the state of mind, is a matter of policy; and it was a not unreasonable decision of policy to say that a person who deliberately shot another should be guilty of an offence unless he knew of circumstances justifying or excusing his conduct.

the mental element was lacking (D was not aware that V was a felon), the wounding was unlawful.⁶⁷

2.1.7 Coincidence of actus reus and mens rea

Not only must the prosecution establish every element of the actus reus of the crime in question and the relevant mens rea, they must, as a general rule, establish that they occurred at the same time—that there was a coincidence of actus reus and mens rea. This principle is examined in greater detail in the following chapter.

The actus reus amounts to a crime only when it is accompanied by the appropriate mens rea. To cause an actus reus without the requisite mens rea is not a crime and may be an ordinary, innocent act. For example, the offence of perjury⁶⁸ consists in D's conduct of making a statement, whether true or not, in the prescribed circumstances of D being on oath in a judicial proceeding, with the mens rea of knowing the statement to be false or not believing it to be true. Thus, every statement on oath in a judicial proceeding might be seen as the actus reus of perjury. The offence turns on D's mens rea. When we say that certain conduct comprises the actus reus of a crime, what we mean is that the conduct or result would be a crime if it were perpetrated by a person with mens rea. The description of the conduct as an actus reus does not necessarily imply any judgement whatever as to its moral or legal quality. The analysis into actus reus and mens rea is for convenience of exposition only. The only concept known to the law is the crime; and the crime exists only when actus reus and mens rea coincide.

2.2 Analysis of an actus reus

We have seen that the actus reus of the offence comprises all those elements that are not identifiable as mens rea or fault. Central to the element of the actus reus is the voluntary conduct of the defendant. That usually involves some act on his part, but we must take care not to oversimplify things by describing the actus reus as simply D's 'act'. Some writers have suggested that 'an act' is nothing more than a willed muscular movement—for example, the deliberate crooking of a finger. But, if D crooked his finger around the trigger of a loaded pistol which was pointing at V, with the result that V was killed, to say 'D crooked his finger' would be a most misleading way of describing D's 'act'. 'Again, suppose a person orally demands money backed by threats of injury. Can the action of his vocal chords be separated from the resulting sound issuing from his mouth and its intended meaning to the hearer?'⁶⁹ We naturally say, 'D shot V' or 'D demanded money from V'. This way of describing the act takes account of the circumstances surrounding the actual movement of the body (insofar as they are relevant) and its consequences (again, insofar as they are relevant), and, for ordinary purposes, it is obviously the sensible way of describing it.⁷⁰ But for the purposes of the criminal law as we have seen it is sometimes necessary to break down an 'act', so ⁶⁷ See p 689. For a defence of Dadson, see Hall, General Principles, 228 and Perkins, Criminal Law, 39. And of the crime of perjury where D may be convicted if he makes a statement on oath which he believes to be false though it is in fact true.

⁶⁸ Perjury Act 1911, s 1(1), Stephen, Digest, 95–96.

⁶⁹ Timbu Kolian v R (1968) 119 CLR 47 at 69, per Windeyer J. D's act was demanding with menaces.

⁷⁰ See eg the discussion of crimes involving hate speech in J Jaconelli, 'Context-Dependent Crime' [1995] Crim LR 771. For a more theoretical analysis of the significance of considering the actus reus as more than a bodily willed movement, see Duff, Answering for Crime, 98 et seq discussing how 'action' in this context cannot be seen as simply a natural or mechanical phenomenon.

comprehensively described, into the constituents of: (a) the conduct which is the central feature of the crime; (b) the surrounding material circumstances; and (c) the consequences. One reason for so doing is that the law may require different mental elements for the various constituents.

2.2.1 D's conduct must be voluntary

If the actus reus of the crime includes an act, it must, of course, be proved that D performed that act voluntarily. Although generally expressed as a requirement of 'voluntariness' there is a degree of confusion as to whether the law is truly concerned that D was 'conscious' of his actions, whether he 'willed' them or whether they were 'voluntary'.⁷¹ These terms are not synonymous, and their precise definition involves complex questions of philosophy and neurology,⁷² presenting distractions which for pragmatic reasons the criminal courts are keen to avoid. The requirement that the act was voluntary is fundamental to the imposition of criminal liability since it reflects the underlying respect for the individual's autonomy and the principle that 'unless a man has the capacity and fair opportunity to adjust his behaviour to the law its penalties ought not to be applied to him'.⁷³

The clearest cases of involuntariness might be thought to be those where D is unconscious. If D is unconscious or, for example, asleep, he cannot exercise his will, he cannot control his movement so any movements of his body that are made are involuntary.⁷⁴ This is subject to an important exception where the reason for the lack of consciousness is D's own voluntary intoxication or other prior fault.

Even where D is conscious, there are many well-established circumstances in which the act will be found to be involuntary for the purposes of the criminal law. Suppose the offence is 'wounding' and the evidence shows that, while D was holding a knife in his hand, E seized D's hand and, against D's will, plunged the knife still held by D's hand into V. Plainly D is not guilty of wounding because it was not 'his' act. Similarly, D would not be guilty of a battery if he was afflicted by St Vitus' dance and his fist shot out in an uncontrolled spasm and struck V; or if D who was carefully carrying a heavy weight was startled by an unexpected explosion and dropped it onto V's foot; or if D tripped onto V. If D, while driving, is attacked by a swarm of bees and, in his panic at having been suddenly engulfed by the swarm, is temporarily disabled from controlling the vehicle, which crashes into V, he may be held to ⁷¹ See generally RD Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in the Criminal Law (1995) Ch 1, and HLA Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (1968) Ch 4. There is considerable philosophical literature on the subject, including MS Moore, Act and Crime: The Philosophy of Action and its Implications for Criminal Law (1993). See also Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 4; A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 140–151. In addition, there is a growing body of literature evaluating the insights that neuroscience can provide in this area. Eg see NA Vincent (ed), Neuroscience and Legal Responsibility (2013). For a sceptical account of the relevance of neuroscience to criminal law doctrine, see MS Pardo and D Patterson, Minds, Brains and Law (2013).

⁷² See eg DW Denno, 'How Psychological Research on Consciousness can Enlighten the Criminal Law' [2002] Amicus Curiae 28; R Schopp, Automatism, Insanity and the Psychology of Criminal Responsibility: A Philosophical Inquiry (1991); B McSherry, 'Voluntariness, Intention and the Defence of Mental Disorder: Towards a Rational Approach' (2003) 21 Behavioural Sciences and the Law 581; K Saunders, 'Voluntary Acts and the Criminal Law: Justifying Culpability Based on the Existence of Volition' (1988) 49 U Pitt LR 443. See also I Ebrahim et al, "'Violence Sleepwalking and the Criminal Law' (1) The Medical Aspects' [2005] Crim LR 601; W Wilson et al, "'Violence Sleepwalking and the Criminal Law' (2) The Legal Aspects' [2005] Crim LR 614, criticizing the current law and exposing the dissonance with medical knowledge.

⁷³ HLA Hart, Punishment and Responsibility, 181.

⁷⁴ Viscount Kilmuir LC in Bratty suggested that automatism is a term connoting the state of a person who, though capable of action, is not 'conscious of what he is doing... it means unconscious voluntary action', Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386, 401.

be no longer ‘driving’.⁷⁵ In each of these cases the movement of D’s limbs was involuntary in that it did not flow from an exercise by D of his will.⁷⁶ The event happened either against, or at least without, his will. In these examples, note that D was conscious but exercised no control over his movements.

In Ch 9 we discuss the rules governing pleas of automatism—where D claims to have lacked voluntariness.

For present purposes it is important to be aware that these rules will not exclude liability if the reason for involuntariness was D’s voluntary intoxication.

If D is conscious and the physical movement is voluntary, D may be liable for its consequences if the crime is one of strict liability or negligence, even though it is unintentionally misdirected, as where D put his foot on the accelerator of a bus instead of, as he intended, the brake.⁷⁷

2.2.1.1 Self-induced involuntarism

As noted, there is an exception to the rule that there is no liability for an involuntary act: where the ‘act’ was done while in a state of self-induced intoxication.⁷⁸ The rule is a complex one to be examined in full in Ch 9. In short, if D has voluntarily intoxicated himself so that D was unconscious or otherwise ‘acting’ involuntarily, that will provide no excuse for any crimes he commits while in that state if they are crimes of ‘basic intent’ (ie on an orthodox interpretation at least,⁷⁹ those which do not require proof of mens rea of intention). D who is not at fault in inducing his involuntariness will be able to rely on that involuntariness as an excuse for crimes he committed while in that state.

So, for example, consider D who, owing to his voluntary ingestion of LSD, kills his girlfriend V, mistakenly believing that he is slaying a serpent at the centre of the earth.⁸⁰ At the time of the killing D is acting involuntarily. However, D’s prior fault by voluntarily reducing himself to that drug-induced state provides a sufficient basis of fault in law to regard his subsequent involuntary conduct as blameworthy. He is guilty of manslaughter. It has been argued⁸¹ that this is part of a wider rule that any automatism induced by D’s ‘fault’ whether involving drugs or not is no defence. ‘Fault’ here means doing or omitting to do something that could reasonably be foreseen to be likely to bring about such a state. The decided cases, however, all appear to involve the use or misuse of drink or drugs (including prescribed medicines)⁸² and it may be that the anomalous rule whereby the courts hold a defendant liable despite his automaton state at the time of the offence is properly confined to cases of voluntary intoxication. The basis for the courts adopting that exceptional course is the grave social danger presented by intoxicated individuals.⁸³ One can imagine (perhaps fanciful) scenarios in which D causes some harm while in a state of automatism but he has carelessly ⁷⁵ Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 QB 277 at 286. See the discussion in the Law Commission Discussion Paper, Criminal Liability: Insanity and Automatism (2013) Ch 5.

⁷⁶ Duff provides an interesting account of how, rather than focusing on action in terms of willed movement, this aspect of actus reus might be better described as turning on whether D had control: Answering for Crime, 99–106.

⁷⁷ A-G’s Reference (No 4 of 2000) [2001] Crim LR 578 and commentary (causing death by dangerous driving).

⁷⁸ Hardie [1985] 1 WLR 64, CA. See the discussion in Ch 10 and LC 314, Intoxication and Criminal Liability (2009).

⁷⁹ cf Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125, see Ch 10.

⁸⁰ Lipman [1970] 1 QB 152; approved in DPP v Majewski [1977] AC 443. See p 315.

⁸¹ RD Mackay, ‘Intoxication as a Factor in Automatism’ [1982] Crim LR 146, 147. See also RD Mackay, Mental Condition Defences.

⁸² See Poole [2003] All ER (D) 448 (Mar) where D’s failure to take his epilepsy medicine led to his loss of consciousness.

⁸³ These issues are discussed in full in Ch 9.

or knowingly set up the circumstances for his involuntariness, as where he visits a hypnotist to receive the suggestion that he should kill V and goes on to carry out that homicide when in the trance, but such circumstances have not been addressed by the courts.⁸⁴

Of course, if the 'fault' exhibited by D's 'prior' conduct is itself sufficient to found liability for the offence charged, then D is properly convicted of it under ordinary principles.⁸⁵ An elementary example is where a driver, feeling sleepy, continues to drive until he falls asleep and has an accident. His failure to take a break from driving may itself constitute the fault element of the offence of careless driving or even dangerous driving.⁸⁶ The subsequent conduct of falling asleep is not blameless: D's culpability lies precisely in the failure to safeguard against its occurrence.

2.2.1.2 Voluntariness as actus reus or mens rea?

Writers dispute whether the voluntariness of D's conduct should be regarded as part of the actus reus or as part of the mens rea.⁸⁷ On the one hand, it is a mental element; on the other, it is said that it is an essential constituent of the act, which is part of the actus reus. Some have argued that the classification is important. The argument runs: some offences, known as offences of strict liability, do not require mens rea. If voluntariness is part of the mens rea of an offence because it relates to D's state of mind, a person charged with an offence of strict liability might be convicted for a mere involuntary act because, since the court is not inquiring into D's state of mind, it will not be considering voluntariness. The fallacy in this argument lies in the proposition that offences of strict liability require 'no mens rea'.⁸⁸ This is not so.

If the actus reus of the offence requires regard to be had to D's state of mind (as in, eg, possession) then there is certainly no way of dispensing with it;⁸⁹ but it does not follow that it must be dispensed with where an offence is held to be one of strict liability. An actus reus must be proved, even for an offence of strict liability; therefore if voluntariness is part of the actus reus, no one can be convicted of any crime if his act was involuntary. Voluntariness is best regarded as an element of the actus reus. That reflects the true basis of the defence as a denial of voluntary 'conduct'.

For 125 years, *Prince*⁹⁰ was regarded as the leading case on strict liability. Although now superseded by statute,⁹¹ it remains a good illustration of the principle that even strict liability crimes require proof of voluntary conduct. Prince decided that D may be convicted of the offence (now repealed) of taking a girl under the age of 16 out of the possession and against ⁸⁴ C Finkelstein, 'Involuntary Crimes, Voluntarily Committed' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 143; PH Robinson, 'Causing the Condition of One's Own Defense: A Study in the Limits of the Criminal Law Doctrine' (1985) 71 Virg LR 1. See also Finnegan v Heywood (2000), 10 May, High Ct of Justiciary, where D's transitory state of sleepwalking (and driving) was induced by his voluntary intoxication and he was aware of the likelihood of that outcome. The decision does not make it clear whether D would have had a defence of automatism if he was unaware of the likelihood. See also the valuable discussion by Wilson et al, n 72, proposing a defence of 'not guilty by reason of sleep disorder'.

⁸⁵ The dictum of Martin JA in Rabey (1977) 79 DLR (3d) 414, 425 quoted by Mackay as a 'typical example of a dictum in support of "fault liability"', n 71, seems to be saying no more than this.

⁸⁶ Kay v Butterworth (1945) 173 LT 191, see n 108.

⁸⁷ Turner (MACL, 195 and 199 and Kenny, Outlines, 23) thought 'voluntariness' an element of mens rea. Williams, CLGP, s 8 and I Patient, 'Some Remarks about the Element of Voluntariness in Offences of Absolute Liability' [1968] Crim LR 23 think it part of the actus reus. See generally PH Robinson, 'Should the Criminal Law Abandon the Actus Reus-Mens Rea Distinction?' in S Shute, J Gardner and J Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) 187, 196–197.

⁸⁸ cf Blackburn v Bowering [1994] 1 WLR 1324, [1995] Crim LR 38, p 702; Howard, SR 1; RS Clark (ed), Essays on Criminal Law in New Zealand (1971) 49; HL Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968) 126.

⁸⁹ See p 162.

⁹⁰ (1875) LR 2 CCR 154.

⁹¹ At p 731.

the will of her father, even though D believed in good faith and on reasonable grounds that the girl he was taking was over 16. Even if this was an offence 'requiring no mens rea' as to the age of the girl (ie strict liability as to that part of the actus reus), it is quite clear that it involved a substantial mental element. It would be essential to have proved that D intended to take a girl out of the possession of her parents. If he thought the girl was in no one's possession, he was not guilty. If he thought the girl was a boy, he was probably not guilty. No one suggests, however, that we should say that his knowledge that the girl was in the possession of her parents is part of the actus reus. The fact is that, even in offences of strict liability, some degree of mens rea must be proved. Therefore, even though the elements of an offence may suggest that D can be guilty without having regard to his state of mind, this will not necessarily be the case.

A denial of the voluntariness of D's conduct can be seen as a denial of his act (actus reus) or as a denial of the voluntariness of the act (mens rea). What is clear is that whether D's act was involuntary is a more fundamental element of criminal liability than what we normally think of as mens rea—the intention to cause, or foresight of, results of the act and awareness of circumstances. If D's conduct may have been involuntary, the actus reus has not been proved by the Crown and there can be no conviction.

What is missing in such cases appears to most people as a vital link between mind and body; and both the ordinary person and the lawyer might well insist on this by saying that in these cases there is not 'really' a human action at all and certainly nothing for which anyone should be made criminally responsible however 'strict' legal responsibility might be.⁹²

2.2.1.3 Automatism

The defendant's claim of a lack of voluntariness is described in criminal law as a plea of automatism; that is, that D was acting as an automaton. Automatism has narrow limits as a 'defence'. According to Lord Denning,⁹³ it is restricted to acts done while unconscious and to spasms, reflex actions and convulsions.⁹⁴ The courts approach the defence with great scepticism.⁹⁵ It commonly arises in driving cases, particularly where diabetic defendants claim that they were suffering from hyperglycaemic or hypoglycaemic

⁹² See the classic account by HLA Hart, 'Acts of Wills and Responsibility', Jubilee Lectures of the Faculty of Law, University of Sheffield (1960) 115 at 137. Note that Turner, while regarding voluntariness as mens rea, thought it a different and more fundamental element than foresight of consequences; MACL, 195–205.

⁹³ In Bratty [1963] AC 386, [1961] 3 All ER 523 at 532. It is confined to 'involuntary movement of the body or limbs of a person': Watmore v Jenkins [1962] 2 All ER 868 at 878, per Winn J. This case was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923. In a Canadian case, Racimore (1976) 25 CCC (2d) 143, a 'failure to remain' after an accident was held to be involuntary because D did not know there had been an accident. This seems to be an unsatisfactory device for introducing a requirement of mens rea into an offence of strict liability. Cf Davey v Towle [1973] RTR 328, [1973] Crim LR 360.

⁹⁴ See the discussion in the Scottish case of Ross v HM Advocate 1991 SCCR 823 where the court identified four criteria: an external factor; which was not self-induced; which D was not bound to foresee; and which caused a total alienation of reason rendering him incapable of controlling or appreciating what he was doing. See on this P Ferguson, 'The Limits of the Automatism Defence' (1991) 36 JLSS 446. In Foye [2013] EWCA Crim 475, [2013] Crim LR 839, Lord Hughes observed that Ross is entirely in accordance with the English law of automatism.

⁹⁵ See H Phoenix, 'Automatism: A Fading Defence' (2010) 56 Criminal Law Quarterly 328, 332.

states.⁹⁶ The Law Commission has acknowledged the difficulty in defining automatism, but suggested that:

the correct definition of the defence is focused not on whether the accused was conscious or unconscious,^[97] but on whether he or she was conscious of what he or she was doing, in other words, whether he or she was acting with or without control at the time of the alleged offence.⁹⁸

In Broome v Perkins,⁹⁹ D, though in a hypoglycaemic state, was held guilty of driving without due care and attention because from time to time he apparently exercised conscious control over his car, veering away from other vehicles so as to avoid a collision, braking violently, and so on. Automatism is not a defence to a driving charge unless there is 'a total destruction of voluntary control'.¹⁰⁰ A condition described by an expert witness as 'driving without awareness' was not sufficient where it in fact amounted to merely reduced or imperfect awareness. Clearly, policy plays a part in the courts' adoption of such a strict approach to the degree of involuntariness constituting automatism, particularly in road traffic offences. Some passages suggest that the plea applies only if there is a complete lack of consciousness rather than a lack of voluntariness. That seems unduly narrow and to risk losing sight of the focus on whether D had the capacity to control his actions. In relation to other crimes, the courts have not consistently adopted such a strict approach. In the case of Charlson,¹⁰¹ for example, where the evidence was that D was 'acting as an automaton without any real knowledge of what he was doing' (emphasis added) as a result of a cerebral tumour, Barry J directed the jury to acquit if the defence might reasonably be true.

More recently, in Coley,¹⁰² the Court of Appeal affirmed that D cannot successfully plead automatism unless he suffers from a 'complete destruction of voluntary control'. Hughes LJ emphasized that while automatism does not require D to be unconscious, it does require his actions to be involuntary. His lordship stated that disinhibition is similarly insufficient. D was convicted of attempted murder, demonstrating that the principle that was originally developed in the context of road traffic offences applies more generally throughout the criminal law.

2.2.1.4 Automatism as physical involuntariness

Although the courts have sometimes confused the issue of consciousness and voluntariness in seeking to determine the scope of the 'defence' of automatism, they have been clear and consistent in holding that automatism is about physical, not moral, involuntariness. Pleas of 'irresistible impulse' have been consistently rejected as a defence even where arising from insanity. The fact that, as a result of hysterical amnesia, or hysterical fugue, D was unaware of 'legal restrictions or moral concern', is no defence if he knew the facts which constitute the offence charged.¹⁰³ An irresistible craving for drink is not a defence to a charge of stealing alcohol.¹⁰⁴ Similarly if D has punched V it is no defence (though it may mitigate the ⁹⁶ For discussion, see J Rumbold and M Wasik, 'Diabetic Drivers, Hypoglycaemic Unawareness, and Automatism' [2011] Crim LR 863.

⁹⁷ As the Court of Appeal held in Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [23]: 'automatism does not require that'.

⁹⁸ Discussion Paper, Criminal Liability: Insanity and Automatism (2013), para 5.2. See also the comment of Bastarache J of the Canadian Supreme Court in Stone [1999] 2 SCR 290, [156] that the term 'unconscious' is in fact inaccurate in this context, preferring 'impaired consciousness in which an individual, though capable of action, has no voluntary control over that action'.

⁹⁹ (1987) 85 Cr App R 321, [1987] Crim LR 271, DC.

¹⁰⁰ This has been criticized on the basis that it could be considered 'unduly harsh' to restrict automatism to cases such as these. See Horder, APOCL, 106.

¹⁰¹ [1955] 1 All ER 859.

¹⁰² [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923.

¹⁰³ Isitt [1978] Crim LR 159, CA.

¹⁰⁴ Dodd (1974) 7 SASR 151 at 157. See generally LS Tao, 'Legal Problems of Alcoholism' (1969) 37 Fordham LR 405; J Tolmie, 'Alcoholism and Criminal Liability' (2001) 64 MLR 688.

sentence) to say that this was an immediate and irresistible reaction to provocation by V. But the borderline between this and a 'reflex action' must be a fine one. The legal nature and legal effect of a reflex action is, itself, uncertain. In Ryan v R,¹⁰⁵ D with one hand pointed a loaded shotgun at V whom he had robbed, while with the other hand he attempted to tie V up. V moved. D was startled and, he said, 'involuntarily' pressed the trigger because of a 'reflex action'. Barwick CJ thought that, if this story had been true, D would not have been responsible in law for the 'act' of pressing the trigger; but Windeyer J held that, while that act may have been 'involuntary' in a dictionary sense, it was one for which he was responsible in law and not properly analogous to an act done in convulsions or an epileptic seizure. With respect, however, it seems closer to these than to 'the sudden movement of a tennis player retrieving a difficult shot; not accompanied by conscious planning but certainly not involuntary'.¹⁰⁶

It is, of course, very important to identify the precise conduct which it is alleged is voluntary and for which D is therefore to be held responsible. In Ryan v R, the pointing of the loaded gun and the placing of the finger on the trigger were clearly voluntary acts and, provided that it could be said that these acts caused death, the accused would be liable for homicide, whether the pressing of the trigger was an act for which he was responsible or not. Similarly, in the English civil case of *Gray v Barr*¹⁰⁷ D approached V with a loaded gun and fired a shot to frighten V. D and V grappled together and V fell on the gun and was shot and killed. The trial judge and Salmon LJ thought that the real cause of V's death was the accident of his falling on the gun; whereas Lord Denning MR and Phillimore LJ thought that the cause was D's deliberate act in approaching V with the gun. All the judges agreed, however, that D could properly have been convicted of manslaughter on these facts. The act for which D would be held responsible was not the firing of the fatal shot—that was not his act—but deliberately approaching V in that threatening way. Similarly, a person who is in an unconscious state through an epileptic fit is not liable for an offence involving 'driving', though he is sitting at the controls of a moving vehicle, unless, having regard to the degree and frequency of epilepsy and the probability that he might have an attack, he is liable because of his conscious act of starting or continuing to drive.¹⁰⁸

An interesting example arose in *Brady*¹⁰⁹ where, having voluntarily consumed alcohol and drugs, D had fallen from a balcony in a nightclub onto the dance floor below and had landed on the victim, thereby causing her serious injuries. The Crown's evidence was to the effect that D had climbed onto the balcony railings and had jumped from them deliberately; D's account was that he perched his bottom against the railings and lost his balance and fell. The single issue in the trial was whether D had acted with the requisite mens rea. The Court of Appeal noted, obiter, that there was arguably evidence of 'deliberate non-accidental conduct on the part of the accused that inflicted grievous bodily harm', in that D had deliberately perched precariously on a low railing above a crowded dance floor and having consumed considerable quantities of alcohol and drugs. This deliberate act, on any view, led almost immediately and directly to the fall over the railing and to the infliction of grievous bodily harm. It is submitted that there was an actus reus. A contrasting factual scenario would have been if a person was perched on the railings and fell because he lurched

¹⁰⁵ (1967) 40 ALJR 488, discussed by ID Elliott, 'Responsibility for Involuntary Acts: Ryan v The Queen' (1968) 41 ALJ 497.

¹⁰⁶ Elliott, n 105.

¹⁰⁷ [1971] 2 QB 554. Cf Jarman [1946] KB 74; Blayney v Knight (1975) 60 Cr App R 269, DC. Cf A-G's Reference (No 3 of 2004) [2005] EWCA Crim 1882.

¹⁰⁸ Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 QB 277 at 286, per Pearson LJ; McBride [1962] 2 QB 167. Similarly where D goes to sleep: Kay v Butterworth (1945) 173 LT 191.

¹⁰⁹ [2006] EWCA Crim 2413, [2007] Crim LR 564 and commentary.

backwards involuntarily to avoid that unforeseen swarm of bees which academics often pray in aid.¹¹⁰

2.2.1.5 Involuntariness not arising from automatism

A person may have full control over his body but no control over events in which it is involved. A driver's brakes fail without his fault and, consequently, he inevitably fails to accord precedence to a pedestrian on a pedestrian crossing.¹¹¹ Although it has been said that this offence is absolute,¹¹² requiring no evidence of negligence, it was held in *Burns v Bidder*¹¹³ that such a driver has a 'defence'. The court equated the driver's situation with that of one stunned by a swarm of bees, disabled by epilepsy¹¹⁴ or propelled by a vehicle hitting his car from behind. The offence is therefore not an absolute one, as 'voluntariness' is essential. On the other hand, it seems to have been held that it is no defence that the failure to accord precedence on the zebra crossing arises inevitably from the unforeseeable behaviour of the pedestrian.¹¹⁵ That seems inconsistent because the driver in such a case has no more power to avert the failure than where his brakes fail. It is submitted that D should never be held criminally liable for an 'act' or result of an 'act' over which he has no control.¹¹⁶

2.2.1.6 Reform

In 2013 the Law Commission published a Discussion Paper, setting out its provisional proposals for reform of the defences of insanity and automatism.¹¹⁷ This was derived from an earlier Scoping Paper¹¹⁸ and is discussed in Ch 9.

2.3 A 'state of affairs' as an actus reus

A crime may be so defined that it can be committed although there is no 'act' in the sense considered previously.¹¹⁹ There may be no necessity for any 'willed muscular movement'. Instead, it may be enough if a specified 'state of affairs' is proved to exist. These offences are sometimes called 'status'¹²⁰ or 'situation'¹²¹ offences. Under s 4(2) of the Road Traffic Act 1988, for example, any person who, when in charge of a mechanically propelled vehicle on a road or other public place, is unfit to drive through drink or drugs, commits an offence. One cannot take charge without consciously doing so, but it is not taking charge of the vehicle, or becoming unfit, which is the offence, but simply being in charge and being unfit. So long as this state of affairs continues, the actus reus of the crime is committed. The actus reus ¹¹⁰ See further the commentary at [2007] Crim LR 564.

¹¹¹ Contrary to the Zebra, Pelican and Puffin Pedestrian Crossings Regulations and General Directions 1997, SI 1997/2400, reg 25.

¹¹² Hughes v Hall [1960] 1 WLR 733. ¹¹³ [1967] 2 QB 227.

¹¹⁴ But see now Sullivan [1984] AC 156.

¹¹⁵ Neal v Reynolds [1966] Crim LR 393. The case is only briefly reported and may be explained on another ground.

¹¹⁶ See also KJM Smith and W Wilson, 'Impaired Voluntariness and Criminal Responsibility' (1993) 13 OJLS 69, considering the question of voluntariness in terms of a person's capacity to conform to the law's requirements. See also DN Husak, Philosophy of Criminal Law (1987) 102 and Duff, Answering for Crime on the significance of the issue of control. Duff suggests that use of the concept of control avoids many of the difficulties experienced in trying to distinguish acts and omissions.

¹¹⁷ Ashworth [2013] Crim LR 787.

¹¹⁸ For discussion of which, see J Peay, 'Insanity and Automatism: Questions From and About the Law Commission's Scoping Paper' [2012] Crim LR 927.

¹¹⁹ See P Glazebrook, 'Situational Liability' in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 108.

¹²⁰ Howard, SR, Ch 3.

¹²¹ MD Cohen, 'The Actus Reus and Offences of Situation' (1972) 7 Israel L Rev 186.

may even be in the process of being committed while D is sleeping,¹²² for he may still be 'in charge'. A further example is provided by the offence under s 25 of the Theft Act 1968: a person commits an offence if, when not at his place of abode, he has with him any article for use in the course of, or in connection with, burglary, etc.¹²³ So long as he has the article with him, he is committing the offence. Of course, in all these examples D will, almost invariably, have done the acts of taking charge, getting drunk or taking up the article, but these acts are not part of the crime. Although attempts have been made to defend these offences on the basis of D's prior fault, these are not wholly convincing.¹²⁴

Offences of this type must be treated with great caution. They are commonly associated with tyrannical regimes in which offences of 'status' are enacted, for example offences of being a member of a particular political organization¹²⁵ or being of a particular race or religion (criminalization of which is arguably yet worse because the person may have made no conscious choice to become such a member). It has been suggested that criminalizing such conduct may contravene the ECHR.¹²⁶

Even in modern-day England and Wales this type of offence has led to extraordinary results in offences of 'being found' in a particular situation. In Larsonneur,¹²⁷ D was convicted under the Aliens Order 1920 in that she, 'being an alien to whom leave to land in the United Kingdom has been refused' was found in the UK. She had been brought from Ireland into the UK against her will in the custody of the police. Notwithstanding the wide condemnation of that decision,¹²⁸ similar results were reached in respect of the offence under s 12 of the Licensing Act 1872 of being found drunk in a highway. In Winzar v Chief Constable of Kent,¹²⁹ D was taken to hospital on a stretcher but was found to be drunk and told to leave. When he was seen slumped on a seat in the corridor, the police were called and they took him to a police car parked in the highway outside the hospital. He was convicted of being 'found drunk' in the highway. The words 'found drunk' were held to mean 'perceived to be drunk'. The decision is a controversial one: 'perceive' means 'to become aware of' and it seems that the police became aware of D's condition in the hospital and not in the highway.

Larsonneur and Winzar were convicted of offences the commission of which was in fact procured by the police;¹³⁰ and this seems peculiarly offensive. These offences of 'being found' are unusual¹³¹ in that they require an act on the part of the finder but no act or mens ¹²² Duck v Peacock [1949] 1 All ER 318; but see the defence provided by Road Traffic Act 1956, s 9(1) proviso, now re-enacted in the Road Traffic Act 1988, s 4(3), on which see K McCormac (ed), Wilkinson's Road Traffic Offences (27th edn, 2015) Ch 4.

¹²³ Theft Act 1968, s 25, p 1026.

¹²⁴ See Crime, Reason and History, 148.

¹²⁵ See Scales v US, 327 US 203 (1961) re Communist Party membership.

¹²⁶ See GR Sullivan, 'Strict Liability and the ECHR' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 207.

¹²⁷ (1933) 24 Cr App R 74. Cf Walters [1969] 1 QB 255 (being an incorrigible rogue). See the criticism of Larsonneur by Howard, SR, 47. For a spirited but unconvincing defence of the case, see DJ Lanham, 'Larsonneur Revisited' [1976] Crim LR 276 and RC Doegar, 'Strict Liability in Criminal Law and Larsonneur Revisited' [1998] Crim LR 791 with response by JC Smith [1999] Crim LR 100, and DJ Lanham, Letter [1999] Crim LR 683.

¹²⁸ 'The acme of strict injustice', Hall, General Principles, 329 fn 14; Williams, CLGP, 11; Howard, SR, 47; Gordon, 287. J Horder, Excusing Crime (2004) explains such cases as 'far from being exceptional', rather they were 'all too characteristic of the period', at 251.

¹²⁹ (1983) The Times, 28 Mar, DC. Cf Palmer-Brown v Police [1985] 1 NZLR 365, CA (D not 'found' behaving in a particular way when behaviour occurred some time after encounter with constable).

¹³⁰ It might be argued that the police action breaks the chain of causation between any prior wrongdoing of D and the ultimate forbidden status.

¹³¹ But not unique. Being the parent of a child of compulsory school age who was a registered pupil at a school was an offence under the Education Act 1944, s 39(1) if the child failed to attend that school regularly. It was unnecessary to prove any knowledge or neglect on the part of the parent: Crump v Gilmore [1970] Crim LR 28. Glazebrook, 'Situational Liability' in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 108, contends that Larsonneur-type liability is by no means unusual, pointing, inter alia, to the similarity, from the defendant's point of view, of vicarious liability (on which see Ch 8).

rea on the part of D. As a matter of principle, even 'state of affairs' offences ought to require proof that D either caused the state of affairs or failed to terminate it or act in order to do so when it was within his control and possible to do so.¹³²

The Court of Appeal cited the previous paragraph with approval in Robinson-Pierre,¹³³ in which Pitchford LJ stated:

we have no doubt that the supremacy of Parliament embraces the power to create 'state of affairs' offences in which no causative link between the prohibited state of affairs and the defendant need be established. The legal issue is not, in our view, whether in principle such offences can be created, but whether in any particular enactment Parliament intended to create one.

This decision is a welcome affirmation that while the principle of parliamentary sovereignty dictates that Parliament can create situational offences of absolute liability, this is not something that will be lightly inferred. If Parliament considers it appropriate for a defendant to be guilty in the absence of any causative link between his conduct and the prohibited state of affairs, then unequivocal language must be used.

Physical impossibility of compliance with the law should be a defence, at least where it is not proved that the impossibility arose through D's own fault.¹³⁴ So, situational offences are rightly condemned when they do not allow D to adjust his behaviour to remain within the law.¹³⁵

It has been held by the Privy Council that the offence of 'remaining' in Singapore, having been prohibited from entering that country, could not be committed by one who was ignorant of the prohibition.¹³⁶ Implicit in the decision is that if D 'remained' in the country because he was being detained he would not commit the offence. It is true that 'remaining' may be said to be D's act while 'being found' is the act of another; but the substance of the two offences is the same.

It was held¹³⁷ at common law that 'being in possession' was an insufficient act to constitute the actus reus of a crime, but there are now many cases where, by statute, mere possession is enough. Thus, possession of dangerous drugs,¹³⁸ explosive substances, firearms, articles for fraud and forged banknotes all constitute the actus reus of various crimes. 'Being in possession' does not involve an act in the sense of a muscular movement at all, for a person may possess goods merely by knowingly¹³⁹ keeping them in his house. Possession which is initially lawful may become criminal because of a change of circumstances without any act by D,¹⁴⁰ but only after he has failed to divest himself of possession within a reasonable ¹³² Patient [1968] Crim LR 23. Cf Burns v Nowell (1880) 5 QBD 444. Other jurisdictions have avoided the result in Larsonneur: Achterdam 1911 EDL 336 (EM Burchell and PMA Hunt, South African Criminal Law and Procedure (1970) 105); O'Sullivan v Fisher [1954] SASR 33. In the United States, similar offences have been held unconstitutional: Robinson v California, 370 US 660, 8 L Ed 2d 758 (1962) (being addicted to the use of narcotics).

¹³³ [2013] EWCA Crim 2396.

¹³⁴ See A Smart, 'Criminal Responsibility for Failing to do the Impossible' (1987) 103 LQR 532.

¹³⁵ Wilson, Central Issues, 83.

¹³⁶ Lim Chin Aik v R [1963] AC 160. See also Finau v Department of Labour [1984] 2 NZLR 396 (failure to leave New Zealand after revocation of permit not an offence where impossible to leave because of pregnancy). But cf Grant v Borg [1982] 1 WLR 638, HL, where an immigrant was held guilty of knowingly remaining beyond the time limit although, because of a mistake of law, he may have believed the time had been extended.

¹³⁷ Heath (1810) Russ & Ry 184; Dugdale v R (1853) 1 E & B 435.

¹³⁸ See, in particular, the comprehensive analysis in R Fortson, Misuse of Drugs: Offences, Confiscation and Money Laundering (6th edn, 2012) Ch 3.

¹³⁹ A person may possess a thing in the civil law although he does not know of its existence; but knowledge will usually be required in criminal law: cf Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr, see p 162; Cugullere [1961] 1 WLR 858.

¹⁴⁰ cf Buswell [1972] 1 WLR 64.

time.¹⁴¹ 'Being in possession' is simply a state of affairs which in certain circumstances involves criminal liability.

2.4 Omissions

Considerable controversy persists over whether, and to what extent, the law ought to regard inactivity as a sufficient basis for criminal liability.¹⁴² There are powerful arguments of principle and practicality against the imposition of general criminal liability for failing to act in circumstances which give rise to a prohibited harm.¹⁴³ The strongest argument against imposing any such general criminal liability is that to do so would infringe the autonomy of the citizen in a qualitatively different manner to circumstances where liability is imposed for positive action. It is argued that it is legitimate for the law to criminalize holding V under water so that he drowns, but not to seek to compel a person to act by criminalizing, for example, his refusal to save a drowning stranger.¹⁴⁴ However, in some circumstances the law can, consistent with this principle of autonomy, impose liability for omission—as where the drowning V is not a stranger but is D's child. These categories of exceptional liability for omission are examined in the following sections. Irrespective of the existence of these exceptions, the arguments of individual autonomy have been challenged for their failure generally to respect obligations of social responsibility, particularly where the potential harm that can be averted (eg death) is disproportionate to the infringement of the person's liberty (eg the simple act of plucking a child from a shallow pool of water).¹⁴⁵

A further argument against imposing general liability for omissions is that to do so would infringe principles of legality. It is questioned whether the law can impose liability with sufficient clarity, specificity and certainty to respect adequately the principles of fair warning, fair labelling, maximum certainty, coherence with civil law, etc.¹⁴⁶ An additional argument is that failing to act cannot be regarded as a cause of harm, so there should be no general liability for omission in result crimes. But these denials of causation often take an unduly simplistic approach. Further arguments against the imposition of general criminal liability for omissions include the practical difficulty in defining the standard of duty which the law would impose on the person required to act, and of the potential unfairness in singling out for punishment a particular individual from the population as a whole, or a group of individuals, none of whom acted. In the discussion that follows, we can examine the extent to ¹⁴¹ Burns v Nowell, n 132. Levine [1927] 1 DLR 740 is contrary.

¹⁴² There is a wealth of academic literature on the topic, see in particular: A Ashworth, 'Positive Duties, Regulation and the Criminal Sanction' (2017) 133 LQR 606; A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013); G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) Ch 8; G Hughes, 'Criminal Omissions' (1958) 67 Yale LJ 590; Duff, Answering for Crime, Ch 5; P Glazebrook, 'Criminal Omissions: The Duty Requirements in Offences Against the Person' (1960) 76 LQR 386; A Ashworth, 'The Scope of Criminal Liability for Omissions' (1989) 105 LQR 424; JC Smith, 'Liability for Omissions in Criminal Law' (1984) 4 LS 88. See on Scots law: R Shiels, 'Scots Law and Liability for Omissions' (2006) 70 J Crim L 413.

¹⁴³ cf Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 184.

¹⁴⁴ See G Williams, 'Criminal Omissions—The Conventional View' (1991) 107 LQR 86. For criticism, see Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 189 arguing that such cases are better dealt with by providing defences of justification.

¹⁴⁵ See especially A Ashworth (1989) 105 LQR 424. On qualitative moral differences between act and omission, see A Simester 'Why Omissions are Special' (1995) 1 Legal Theory 311.

¹⁴⁶ For an accessible account of the academic concerns, see Wilson, Central Issues, 82–102. and A Ashworth, 'Ignorance of the Criminal Law and Duties to Avoid It' (2011) 74 MLR 1.

which the law has satisfactorily overcome these objections in those exceptional categories of case in which liability for failure to act has been recognized.¹⁴⁷

2.4.1 Offences of mere omission

Statutes frequently make it an offence to omit to do something. There are many legislative provisions requiring companies and others to submit returns of various kinds (tax, licences, etc) and making it an offence to fail to do so.¹⁴⁸ This type of offence is not restricted to corporate regulation: the driver of a vehicle which is involved in an accident must give his details to anyone who has reasonable grounds for requesting them, or must report the accident.¹⁴⁹ A motorist who fails to provide a police officer with a specimen of breath when properly required to do so commits an offence.¹⁵⁰ So does a person legally liable to maintain a child if he fails to provide him with adequate food, clothing, medical aid or lodging.¹⁵¹ These offences, although they provide that D is liable for a criminal offence by omission, are uncontroversial provided that they respect the general principles of criminal law. Most of them are of a regulatory nature, but there are controversial examples relating to more serious crimes. Modern legislation has created a number of offences for failure to report criminal activities, such as ss 19 and 38B of the Terrorism Act 2000,¹⁵² which respectively criminalize failure to report suspicions of certain terrorist offences having been committed, when the information is acquired in a professional capacity, and failure to disclose information which would be of material assistance in the prevention of an act of terrorism.¹⁵³ There are also numerous examples of offences of failing to control others, including even adult strangers, such as the offence in s 111A(1B) of the Social Security Administration Act 1992 (allowing false benefit claim).¹⁵⁴

Parliament has demonstrated an increased willingness to impose positive duties upon citizens. As Ashworth explains,¹⁵⁵ there are an increasing number of duties to report, duties to prevent¹⁵⁶ and duties to protect. Ashworth argues that there is now a trend towards the 'responsibilization' of professionals, other individuals and commercial organizations. Some of these positive duties are enforced by way of criminal offences. In his most recent engagement with this issue, Ashworth analyses the development of these offences, which he argues represent a new generation of omissions-based liability.¹⁵⁷ As he points out, these offences are not of general application, but only apply selectively. Ashworth suggests that the enactment of offences of this nature reflects the particular concerns of government and the legislature at ¹⁴⁷ For an interesting comparison with some continental European systems, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2012) 68–110.

¹⁴⁸ See eg: Companies Act 1985, s 444 (as amended by the Companies Act 2006, Sch 3, para 1), (Secretary of State's power to require a company or individual to produce documents); Insolvency Act 1986, s 235 (duty on officers and employees of a company to cooperate with the 'office-holder' or official receiver of a company); Data Protection Act 1998, s 47 (failing or refusing to comply with an enforcement or an information notice).

¹⁴⁹ Road Traffic Act 1988, s 170(4). ¹⁵⁰ ibid, s 6.

¹⁵¹ Children and Young Persons Act 1933, s 1(2)(a). Non-reporting of the harm caused by others to children could amount to 'neglect' under the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, s 1(1) (see W [2006] EWCA Crim 2723) or in the case of wilfully neglecting a mental patient contrary to the Mental Health Act 1983, s 127(1) (Morrell [2002] EWCA Crim 2547). See also the offences in ss 20 and 21 of the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015. Note also failure to safeguard a girl from risks of FGM: Serious Crime Act 2015, s 72.

¹⁵² See C Walker, Blackstone's Guide to the Anti-Terrorism Legislation (3rd edn, 2014) para 3.89.

¹⁵³ Section 330 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 also creates an offence for failing to disclose suspicions of money laundering.

¹⁵⁴ See Tilley [2009] EWCA Crim 1426 and [2009] Crim LR 162 and commentary.

¹⁵⁵ A Ashworth, 'Positive Duties, Regulation and the Criminal Sanction' (2017) 133 LQR 606.

¹⁵⁶ These offences are discussed in Ch 8.

¹⁵⁷ A Ashworth, 'A New Generation of Omissions Offences?' [2018] Crim LR 351.

given points in history and do not proceed from a holistic examination of whether there are good arguments for general offences such as these. Ashworth convincingly concludes that it is necessary to consider whether it is right to have omissions offences in relation to money laundering but not murder, female genital mutilation but not other forms of child abuse, and bribery and tax offences rather than wounding.

At common law, offences of pure omission are also to be found, though rarely. A police officer was held to be guilty of a common law crime when, without justification or excuse, he failed to perform his duty to preserve the Queen's peace by protecting a citizen who was being kicked to death.¹⁵⁸ A citizen is guilty of an offence if he fails to respond to a constable's call for assistance in keeping the peace.¹⁵⁹ The courts appear reluctant to extend common law offences to include liability for omission.¹⁶⁰ There has been some debate about the desirability of a general offence of failing to report a crime.¹⁶¹

2.4.2 Offences of omission causing a result

Where, as in the examples in the previous section, the offence is defined in terms of the failure to act itself, there are no special difficulties. Problems with omissions arise when the offence requires proof of a result as, for example, in homicide and other offences against the person. Stephen stated the rule for these offences as follows: 'It is not a crime to cause death or bodily injury, even intentionally, by any omission . . .'¹⁶²

He gave the following famous illustration:

A sees B drowning and is able to save him by holding out his hand. A abstains from doing so in order that B may be drowned, and B is drowned. A has committed no offence.

Stephen went on to state exceptional cases where the law imposes a duty to act. If A in the example were B's parent, A would have a duty to act and would be guilty of murder if he did not act and the child drowned. There are a number of problems which need to be considered.

- (1) Is the offence in question one under which conviction can arise for omission?
- (2) If so, is A under a duty to act?
- (3) If so, can we truly say that A has 'caused' the prohibited result?
- (4) Is the conduct in question properly regarded as an omission? In many cases the courts may strain the concept of an act so as to avoid difficulties, particularly in cases involving medical care terminating life.

¹⁵⁸ Dytham [1979] QB 722, [1979] Crim LR 666. For a definitive modern definition of misconduct in public office see A-G's Reference (No 3 of 2003) [2004] EWCA Crim 868, holding that D must be subjectively aware of the duty and subjectively reckless in its fulfilment (at [30]). See also Belton [2010] EWCA Crim 2857 where it is not even clear D knew of her public office status and Cosford [2013] EWCA Crim 466. The Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, s 26 creates an offence of corrupt or improper exercise of police powers and privileges, triable only on indictment and punishable by up to 14 years' imprisonment. See for discussion, LCCP 229, Misconduct in Public Office (2016) Ch 3 and C Nicholls et al, Corruption and Misuse of Public Office (3rd edn, 2017).

¹⁵⁹ Brown (1841) Car & M 314, p 243. See D Nicholson, 'The Citizen's Duty to Assist the Police' [1992] Crim LR 611. PACE Code C, para 1K provides 'all citizens have a duty to help police officers to prevent crime and discover offenders'. This is a civic rather than a legal duty. Cf J Wanik, 'Forcing the Bystander to Get Involved' (1985) 94 Yale LJ 1787.

¹⁶⁰ eg rejection of perverting the course of justice by omission: Clark [2003] EWCA Crim 991; cf the extension in relation to cheating the public revenue: Mavji (1987) 84 Cr App R 34, [1987] Crim LR 39 which may be explained on the basis of the Court of Appeal's exceptional preparedness to read dishonesty offences broadly, see p 827.

¹⁶¹ See Ashworth, Positive Obligations, 62, and see Ch 7.

¹⁶² Stephen, Digest (4th edn, 1887) art 212.

2.4.2.1 Is the offence one capable of being committed by omission?

Assuming that the defendant's conduct can properly be described as an omission, for example standing by and watching a person drowning or failing to feed a person, the question to determine is whether the offence with which he is charged can be fairly interpreted to apply to omissions.

Statutes generally

In statutory offences this question becomes one of construction. Is the verb, in its context, properly construed to include an omission? Glanville Williams has written:

In my opinion the courts should not create liability for omissions without statutory authority. Verbs used in defining offences and prima facie implying active conduct should not be stretched by interpretation to include omissions. In general the courts follow this principle. They do not say, for instance, that a person 'wounds' another by failing to save him from being wounded, or 'damages' a building by failing to stop a fire. At least, this has never been decided.¹⁶³

But Professor Williams himself pointed out that the courts have often held offences to be capable of being committed by omission although the statute did not expressly provide for it. As a matter of principle, it might be argued that the interpretation of a statute that is ambiguous in this regard ought to be resolved in the defendant's favour. However, in many cases the words of the statute can be read to include omissions without straining their meaning.

There are numerous examples of the courts' construction of words to include liability for omission. In Shama,¹⁶⁴ a conviction was upheld for falsifying a document required for an accounting purpose contrary to s 17(1)(a) of the Theft Act 1968 where D omitted entirely to fill in a form which it was his duty to complete. In Firth,¹⁶⁵ a doctor was held to have deceived a hospital contrary to s 2(1) of the Theft Act 1978 (now repealed), by failing to inform the hospital that certain patients were private patients. 'Obstruct', 'falsify' and 'deceive' are all verbs which the courts have held to be capable of satisfaction by omission. So why not any other verb? The difficulty is to find any principle to limit such construction.

In Ahmad,¹⁶⁶ it was held that the words 'does acts' in a modern statute, the Protection from Eviction Act 1977, were to be strictly construed and were not satisfied by proof of an omission. A person commits an offence if he 'does acts' likely to interfere with the peace or comfort of a residential occupier with intent to cause him to give up occupation of the premises. D, having done such acts without any such intent, omitted, with the required intention, to rectify the situation he had created. He was not guilty. But in some instances even the word 'act' has been held to be satisfied by an omission.¹⁶⁷ It was held that a man 'commits an act of gross indecency' with a child by totally passive submission to an act done by the child.¹⁶⁸ As noted, the courts often sidestep the issue by treating the whole of the circumstances as forming the basis for liability, as in *B*¹⁶⁹ where the issue was regarded as whether D 'acted with or towards a child' by remaining motionless as the boy pressed his erect penis against D.

¹⁶³ Letter to the Editor [1982] Crim LR 773.

¹⁶⁴ [1990] 2 All ER 602, [1990] Crim LR 411.

¹⁶⁵ (1990) 91 Cr App R 217, [1990] Crim LR 326.

¹⁶⁶ (1986) 84 Cr App R 64, [1986] Crim LR 739. It will be noted that the court did not regard the act plus omission as an act. Cf 'Creating a dangerous situation/supervening fault' at p 54.

¹⁶⁷ This has particular significance because the entire law of attempts is based on the requirement of an 'act': Criminal Attempts Act 1981.

¹⁶⁸ Speck [1977] 2 All ER 859, [1977] Crim LR 689.

¹⁶⁹ [1999] Crim LR 594.

Homicide

The courts have long accepted without debate that murder and manslaughter are capable of commission by omission.¹⁷⁰ Most cases of homicide by omission have resulted in convictions for manslaughter but there is at least one reported case of murder. In Gibbins and Proctor,¹⁷¹ a man and the woman with whom he was living were convicted of murder of the man's child by withholding food. By living with the man and receiving money from him for food, the woman had assumed a duty towards the child (see later). The judge was held to have rightly directed that they were guilty of murder if they withheld food with intent to cause the child grievous bodily harm, as a result of which she died. If the child had sustained grievous bodily harm but not died, the court would no doubt have held the defendants guilty of an offence under s 18 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861.¹⁷² The commission of this offence seems to have been an essential constituent of the Ds' liability, in the way the case was left to the jury. It would be strange indeed if causing death should be capable of commission by omission and causing grievous bodily harm not. If that were the case it would mean that D was not in breach of a duty to act until death occurred, at which point the duty was retrospectively imposed, and one of the aims of the criminal law, to deter wrongdoing or prevent wrongdoing from continuing, would be impossible to fulfil. Those are surely unacceptable consequences.

Parliament has intervened to create specific statutory offences of causing or allowing the death or serious injury of a child in the same household as the offender. These are discussed in detail in Ch 15.

Non-fatal offences against the person

Although the courts have accepted that homicide can be perpetrated by omission, they have assumed that assault or battery requires an act.¹⁷³ The words 'kill' and 'slay' in an indictment have been held to be satisfied by proof of an omission, so why not 'assault' or 'battery'? It is said that if D digs a pit for V to fall into, he commits an assault.¹⁷⁴ Why should it be different if he digs the pit without any such intention but then, forming the intention, leaves it unfilled, intending for V to fall in? Glanville Williams argues in respect of a similar case that 'in such circumstances of act-omission the total conduct should be regarded as an act . . .'.¹⁷⁵ But 'should be regarded as' suggests a fiction and criminal liability should not turn on fictions. And his proposal would not meet the case where the hole has been dug by D's gardener and D, hearing that V is coming, decides to leave it unfilled.

Why should not the court legitimately interpret this situation as one where D causes V immediate unlawful violence? This view may derive some support from the decision in *Ireland*¹⁷⁶ that D's silent telephone call can constitute an assault. Again, however, it is likely that the courts would regard the assault as deriving from D's whole course of conduct by making the call coupled with his remaining silent. It is submitted that it would be realistic for the courts to recognize that one can 'assault', no less than 'kill', by omission.¹⁷⁷

As for committing battery by omission, whereas assault only requires proof that D caused V to apprehend unlawful violence, battery requires the application of unlawful violence.

¹⁷⁰ For discussion of whether the state of the law is so uncertain as to undermine the rule of law, see A Ashworth, 'Manslaughter by Omission and the Rule of Law' [2015] Crim LR 563.

¹⁷¹ (1918) 13 Cr App R 134, CCA.

¹⁷² See p 694.

¹⁷³ Leaving aside for now the case where D creates a dangerous situation and fails to take steps within his power to avert that: Santana-Bermudez [2003] EWHC 2908 (Admin), [2004] Crim LR 471.

¹⁷⁴ The 'indirect violence' cases are doubted by M Hirst, 'Assault, Battery and Indirect Violence' [1999] Crim LR 577. Cf Smith (1984) 4 LS 88.

¹⁷⁵ G Williams, 'What Should the Code do about Omissions?' (1987) 7 LS 92.

¹⁷⁶ [1998] AC 147, [1997] Crim LR 810.

¹⁷⁷ cf Wilson, Central Issues, 101.

Can it be said that D can apply force by omission? Such an interpretation of 'apply' might be a more difficult extension than with assault where the word 'cause' is the operative one.¹⁷⁸

The discussion in the previous two paragraphs has dealt with the issue of whether there can be liability for assault and battery by omission, assuming that the elements of duty and causation can be established.

As a separate matter, there can be liability for supervening fault in assault or battery—where D's course of conduct creates a dangerous situation towards any person and D omits to negate or remove the risk. In Fagan v Metropolitan Police Commissioner,¹⁷⁹ where D accidentally drove his car onto a policeman's foot and then intentionally left it there, the majority of the court held that there was an assault (technically a battery) on the ground that, because D remained sitting in the car, there was a continuing act, not a mere omission. This again suggests, if not a fiction, a straining of words. Why should it be different if D had got out immediately, leaving the car on the officer's foot? The case would nowadays be decided under the exceptional category of duty recognized in Miller,¹⁸⁰ namely that D had created a dangerous situation by his act of driving onto V's foot and he then came under a duty to take reasonable steps to alleviate that danger. In Santana-Bermudez,¹⁸¹ this reasoning was applied to uphold D's conviction for assault occasioning actual bodily harm where D told a police officer who was about to search him that there were no needles on his person. The officer was pricked by a needle in D's pocket.

On the basis of Gibbins (in the previous section), it would seem that causing grievous bodily harm contrary to s 18 of the 1861 Act may be committed by omission. Although under s 20 of the 1861 Act the offence of wounding or inflicting grievous bodily harm would require proof of an 'infliction' of a 'wound' or grievous bodily harm, it is not clear that the words would be construed more narrowly than 'cause' in this context.¹⁸² Since the offence under s 47 of the 1861 Act requires proof of an assault or battery and the 'occasioning', that is, 'causing' of actual bodily harm, subject to what was said earlier regarding assault, there is no reason to assume that this offence cannot also be committed by omission.

The Criminal Law Revision Committee (CLRC) recommended that liability for omissions in offences against the person should be confined to murder, manslaughter and their proposed offences of causing serious injury with intent, unlawful detention, kidnapping, abduction and aggravated abduction.¹⁸³ The Home Office in its reform proposals¹⁸⁴ redrafted the offences against the person in terms of causing injury and serious injury. This approach would present few problems in relation to liability for commission by omission. The law would be simplified.¹⁸⁵

Offences against property

The Draft Criminal Code Team, being obliged by their terms of reference to follow the CLRC recommendations, concluded that if injury to the person was to be incapable of commission by omission, so, a fortiori, should be damage to property. This leads to the following illustration:¹⁸⁶

D is employed as a night watchman at a factory. His duties are to take all reasonable steps to ensure the safety of the building. D sees that a small fire has broken out. There is an adjacent bucket of sand

¹⁷⁸ See Lord Hope in Ireland [1998] AC 147, 165. ¹⁷⁹ [1969] 1 QB 439, DC.

¹⁸⁰ [1983] 2 AC 161. ¹⁸¹ [2003] EWHC 2908 (Admin), [2004] Crim LR 471.

¹⁸² Mandair [1995] 1 AC 208, [1994] Crim LR 666.

¹⁸³ Fourteenth Report, Offences Against the Person (1980) Cmnd 7844, paras 252–255.

¹⁸⁴ Violence: Reforming the Law of Offences Against the Person (1998). See now the Law Commission's Scoping Consultation Paper No 217 (2014) and Report No 361 (2015), Ch 5 discussed in Ch 16.

¹⁸⁵ See also the Law Commission recommendations on Offences Against the Person LC 361 (2015) para 4.107.

¹⁸⁶ LC 143, Criminal Law: Codification of the Criminal Law—A Report to the Law Commission (1985) 212, 20(v).

with which, as he knows, he could easily put out the fire. Having a grievance against his employer, he walks away and lets the fire burn. The factory is destroyed. He is not guilty of arson.

Such a conclusion may be unacceptable to the courts. If so, the remedy is in their hands. 'Destroy' and 'damage' in the Criminal Damage Act 1971¹⁸⁷ are capable of being construed to include omissions. It is submitted that in light of the shift in the proposals for reform of offences against the person this approach also needs to be reconsidered.

2.4.2.2 Who owes a duty?

Assuming that the offence itself is one capable of being committed by omission, the next question is whether the individual defendant is one who may be under a duty to act.¹⁸⁸ Since most cases of omission have concerned homicide, the duties so far recognized¹⁸⁹ have been examined in the context of the duty to preserve life. This context is important because when a fatality occurs there is an enhanced danger that the courts will find a duty in previously unrecognized circumstances where the inquiry involves an entirely ex post facto rationalization of the relationships involved. Ashworth has convincingly argued that the duty-situations developed by the courts in the current law of manslaughter by omission are unprincipled, unpredictable and capable of producing injustice.¹⁹⁰

Family and other relations

It is difficult to describe with precision the categories of relationship that might trigger criminal liability based on an omission. Ashworth, in an illuminating analysis of the cases, has suggested that liability for omission may arise if there is a settled relationship of dependence.¹⁹¹

Parents owe a duty to their children to act to save them from harm.¹⁹² Presumably children above the age of responsibility owe a corresponding duty to their parents.¹⁹³ Other close relationships, whether of a family,¹⁹⁴ domestic, business or other nature, possibly impose similar duties. The criminal law is increasingly willing to protect wide categories of individuals on the basis of their existence within an extended family,¹⁹⁵ but it is unclear how far it would be willing to extend liability. The courts have managed to avoid identifying with precision those relationships which can be sufficient to ground liability. Indeed, they have failed to identify what is significant about those relationships in which a duty has been imposed. As a matter of principle, it can be argued that the important issue is not one of blood or formal legal relationship, but of interdependence.¹⁹⁶

¹⁸⁷ See p 1069.

¹⁸⁸ See generally L Alexander, 'Criminal Liability for Omissions: An Inventory of Issues' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory.

¹⁸⁹ Other than in cases of 'supervening fault', p 54.

¹⁹⁰ A Ashworth, 'Manslaughter by Omission and the Rule of Law' [2015] Crim LR 563.

¹⁹¹ Ashworth, Positive Obligations, 44–46.

¹⁹² In some instances there are specific statutory offences such as that of child neglect under the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 or the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Acts 2004 and 2012.

¹⁹³ eg if a muscular 14-year-old leaves his fainting mother to drown in the notorious shallow pool. In Evans [2009] EWCA Crim 650, [2009] Crim LR 661 a teenager did not owe a duty on the basis of family relationships to her half-sister to whom she had supplied drugs.

¹⁹⁴ eg marriage—in Hood [2003] EWCA Crim 2772, [2004] 1 Cr App R (S) 73: D was convicted of gross negligence manslaughter for failing to call medical assistance for his wife for three weeks after she fell and broke bones. See also the discussion of the imposition of liability in such cases in J Horder and L McGowan, 'Manslaughter by Causing Another's Suicide' [2006] Crim LR 1035.

¹⁹⁵ See eg the extensive definition of family in the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 27.

¹⁹⁶ Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law, 613.

A further unresolved issue is what the relationship duty obliges D to do if it does arise. This would seem to be resolved on a case-by-case basis. One important issue will be whether the offence can be committed where D performed an act which he believed to be sufficient to fulfil his duty, or if he had a reasonable belief that what he was doing was sufficient. These issues will become intertwined with the mens rea of the offence.

It is equally unclear when, if ever, the relationship duty ends. In the case of a parent and child, for example, a parent of a child of normal capacity may well be absolved on the attainment of the child turning 18, but this could hardly be so in the case of a disabled dependent child.

Voluntarily incurred obligations

The need to define precisely the categories of relationship which trigger a duty has often been avoided by the courts because the particular case calling for adjudication has involved a number of overlapping bases of liability including, significantly, the fact that D has voluntarily undertaken a position of responsibility towards V. For example, a person who has undertaken to care for a helpless and infirm relative¹⁹⁷ who has become dependent on him may be held to owe a duty, particularly where he is to receive some reward for caring for the other.¹⁹⁸ The holder of a public office requiring him to care for others may also incur criminal liability by failing to do so.

There may be wide-ranging circumstances in which a person might be treated as owing a legal duty because he voluntarily engaged in a certain activity and can therefore be treated as also voluntarily assuming a positive obligation to V. D's voluntary engagement in a business, or in a specific activity,¹⁹⁹ or in a relationship with V may all suffice.²⁰⁰

It is submitted that people who jointly engage in a hazardous activity whether lawful (like mountaineering), or unlawful (eg involving misuse of drugs offences²⁰¹) may also owe duties to one another. The courts have exhibited reluctance to impose obligations on this basis alone. In Sinclair Johnson and Smith,²⁰² the court considered the manslaughter liability for those who failed to seek medical care for a comatose fellow drug-taker, but any duty was based on the previous friendship and bond between the individuals, rather than the joint act of drug administration. The convictions were overturned, but on a different point relating to causation. The duty of care point was only relevant (though in effect obiter) as far as Sinclair and Johnson were concerned. Johnson would not have had a duty of care—he was a medically unqualified stranger. Sinclair would have had a duty of care in part because of their close bond, but also because he paid for and supplied V with the methadone and because he remained with V throughout his unconsciousness. In Ruffell,²⁰³ a manslaughter conviction was upheld where D had been jointly involved in drug taking with the deceased. D, who had placed V outside in temperatures of six degrees, had also been a friend and host to V, and it is unclear on precisely which basis his duty arose. The matter is discussed further later in relation to the case of Evans.

This category of duty could surely extend to unrelated persons who voluntarily undertake responsibility. It is arguable, therefore, that D who sees a stranger, V, drowning, but who ¹⁹⁷ Marriott (1838) 8 C & P 425; Nicholls (1874) 13 Cox CC 75 (D was V's grandmother).

¹⁹⁸ Instan [1893] 1 QB 450 (D was V's niece, living in V's house, consuming food provided at V's expense but not supplying any to V); Stone and Dobinson [1977] QB 354, [1977] Crim LR 166.

¹⁹⁹ Such as storing hazardous materials, see Winter and Winter [2010] EWCA Crim 1474 in Ch 14.

²⁰⁰ See Ashworth, Positive Obligations, 49–52.

²⁰¹ The point was not decided in Dalby [1982] 1 All ER 916, [1982] Crim LR 439. Cf People v Beardsley (1967) 113 NW 1128.

²⁰² Sinclair Johnson and Smith (1998) 148 NLJ 1353, (1998) 21 Aug, CA.

²⁰³ [2003] EWCA Crim 122.

voluntarily begins to go to V's assistance could be liable should he then abandon the rescue. Underlying bases for imposing a duty in such circumstances include the argument that in such cases D may be the best placed to act and that V may have relied to his detriment on D's actions—in the case of the drowning swimmer, V may be worse off by relying on D since he may, for example, have stopped calling for assistance from other potential rescuers.²⁰⁴

The extent to which a 'voluntary assumption of responsibility' is a free-standing basis for the imposition of a duty, and the scope of circumstances in which it might apply, remain unresolved. One of the most controversial cases may well turn on the existence of this duty. In Stone and Dobinson,²⁰⁵ although the defendants' liability for manslaughter arose in part from their family relationship, and their cohabitation with the victim, their voluntary undertaking of responsibility for the victim seems to have been significant in the court's conclusion that a duty was owed, although it seems that the voluntary undertaking was implied.

As in other categories of duty, the courts have failed to define the content of the duty arising from voluntary assumption. The conviction of the defendants in Stone and Dobinson, both of whom had limited mental capacity, suggests that the courts might adopt a strict line when faced with claims that the accused had done what he believed to be sufficient to fulfil his duty. In terms of the termination of such a duty, one who has undertaken the duty can probably divest himself of it only by passing it on to some responsible authority or other person.

Contractual duties

A well-established basis for imposing criminal liability for omissions is where D has contractually accepted the obligation. This could be seen as a subset of the previous category—the voluntary assumption of responsibility.²⁰⁶

A contract may found a duty in criminal law to persons, including those not party to the contract but likely to be injured by failure to perform it. The most obvious examples in this category are those who are employed as carers or health-care professionals. In Pittwood,²⁰⁷ a railway crossing gate-keeper opened the gate to let a cart pass and went off to his lunch, forgetting to shut it again. Ten minutes later a haycart was struck by a train while crossing the line and V was killed. D was convicted of manslaughter. It was argued on his behalf that he owed a duty of care only to his employers, the railway company, with whom he contracted. Wright J held, however, that:

there was gross and criminal negligence, as the man was paid to keep the gate shut and protect the public . . . A man might incur criminal liability from a duty arising out of contract.²⁰⁸

Again, the courts have not addressed the issue of whether the duty owed under a contract exists strictly within the bounds of the terms of that contract. If D is a lifeguard whose terms of employment stipulate that he finishes at 5 pm daily, is he under a duty to save V who is ²⁰⁴ See for analysis of the problems, G Mead, 'Contracting into Crime: A Theory of Criminal Omissions' (1991) 11 OJLS 147.

²⁰⁵ [1977] QB 354, [1977] Crim LR 166.

²⁰⁶ See Ashworth, Positive Obligations, 51.

²⁰⁷ (1902) 19 TLR 37.

²⁰⁸ Wright J said that this was not a mere case of non-feasance, but of misfeasance. However, D's breach of duty was not in opening the gate, but in omitting to close it again. Cf, however, Smith (1869) 11 Cox CC 210, where Lush J ruled that there was no duty because D's employer had no duty to provide a watchman. (If D makes a practice of seeing old ladies across the road, he is not responsible if one day he fails to be present and an old lady is killed.) H Beynon, 'Doctors as Murderers' [1982] Crim LR 17 at 22 suggests that opening and not shutting might be regarded as one 'act'; but would it really have been different if the gate had been opened by D's colleague who had just gone off duty? One hopes not.

drowning at 5.05 pm? It seems clear at least that the duty will terminate when the relationship ends, as when an employee leaves the service of his employer.

Creating a dangerous situation/supervening fault

Where D's conduct puts in peril V's person, his property, his liberty or any other interest protected by the criminal law, and D is aware that he has created the peril, he has a duty to take reasonable steps to prevent the harm in question resulting.²⁰⁹ The initial conduct may be done without any kind of fault but, if D fails to intervene, it is undoubtedly his conduct which is the cause of the harm. For this reason the principle may apply to a wider range of offences than can be committed by simple omission. This category of liability might therefore be treated as entirely separate from the four bases for imposing liability previously discussed. This category of liability differs from the voluntary assumption of responsibility category discussed earlier because this category can give rise to liability where D's original conduct creating the danger was accidental.²¹⁰

The principle derives from Miller,²¹¹ where D, a squatter in V's house, went to sleep holding a lighted cigarette. He awoke to find the mattress smouldering. He did nothing to put it out but moved into an adjoining room and went to sleep there. The house caught fire. D was convicted of arson contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. The House of Lords held that the judge had rightly directed the jury that, when D woke up, he was under a duty to take some action to put the fire out. Lord Diplock said:²¹²

I see no rational ground for excluding from conduct capable of giving rise to criminal liability conduct which consists of failing to take measures that lie within one's power to counteract a danger that one has oneself created, if at the time of such conduct one's state of mind is such as constitutes a necessary ingredient of the offence.

The Court of Appeal had upheld the conviction on a different basis:

We would only say that an unintentional act followed by an intentional omission to rectify it or its consequences, or a reckless omission to do so when recklessness is a sufficient mens rea for the particular case, should only be regarded in toto as an intentional or reckless act when reality and common sense so require; this may well be a matter to be left to the jury. Further, in the relevant analysis we think that whether or not there is on the facts an element of adoption on the part of the alleged offender of what he has done earlier by what he deliberately or recklessly fails to do later is an important consideration.

In some cases the application of this 'continuous act' theory would apparently produce different results from the duty theory. For example, in *Ahmad*²¹³ if D could be deemed to have acted intentionally (ie with intent to cause the residential occupier to give up occupation) when he rendered the flat uninhabitable, the difficulty of convicting him would have disappeared. This theory, again, involves an undesirable legal fiction. Fictions should have no place in the criminal law. Lord Diplock preferred the 'duty to avert danger' to the 'continuous act' theory but only on the ground that the former is easier to explain to a jury. It is submitted, however, that they are different in substance, as the example based on Ahmad

²⁰⁹ See M Bohlander, Principles of German Law (2009) 44.

²¹⁰ See Ashworth, Positive Obligations, 53–54.

²¹¹ [1983] 2 AC 161. See [1982] Crim LR 466. See [1982] QB 532, [1982] Crim LR 526 and 773–774. The principle is replicated in the Home Office Draft Bill, cl 16 in Violence: Reforming the Law of Offences Against the Person (1998). Cf LC 361.

²¹² [1983] 2 AC 161. See on the Scots law application of the principle, J Chalmers, 'Fireraising by Omission' 2004 SLT 59.

²¹³ See p 48.

shows.²¹⁴ Under Miller, D must have the mens rea required for the crime with which he is charged at the time of the omission to avert the danger he has created.

Again, one issue to be resolved is the extent of any such duty. Although expressed in terms of 'reasonable' steps, it is unclear how objective this test is to be in application, and in particular whether it is sufficient that D believes on the facts as he sees them that the remedial measures he took were sufficient. Moreover, it is unclear how the law would deal with an individual who claimed impossibility of performance of such a duty.²¹⁵

The scope of the Miller doctrine remains unclear. The Court of Appeal has been prepared to adopt an extended interpretation of the Miller principle in the case of Evans.²¹⁶ In that case D gave her half sister, V, heroin to take, knowing that she was a recovering addict. V slipped into a coma. D became aware of that and chose not to call the emergency services but to sit with V. V died. The Court of Appeal upheld D's conviction for gross negligence manslaughter. The court faced two difficulties in doing so: (a) identifying a duty; and (b) establishing that D's act caused V's death. For present purposes we are interested in the duty question. The court did not deal with the case on the basis of a sibling duty nor on the basis solely that D had supplied the drugs, nor on the basis that they were engaged in a dangerous activity together. The court focused on whether D owed a duty when her sister lapsed into a coma. In applying Miller, albeit in extended form, the court held that there was a duty.

The extension of Miller was significant. Although Miller was charged with criminal damage which at that time was satisfied by proof of objective recklessness, the House of Lords held that his duty only arose on his subjective realization of the danger. Gross negligence manslaughter is also a crime based on objective fault, but in Evans the court held that the duty arises when D realizes or ought to have realized the danger.²¹⁷ The court did not provide further detailed examination of whether the duty arises from the creation or the realization of the danger.²¹⁸ It is certainly the case that the full scope of the Miller doctrine has not been satisfactorily explained. Nevertheless, it is submitted that the courts will be likely to continue applying a Miller-type analysis in these cases on various possible bases.

In these exceptional cases where D supplies drugs and remains present but fails to make reasonable efforts to seek medical attention when V experiences serious illness, Lord Diplock's statements in Miller are likely to be construed broadly to establish that a duty arises when D became aware (or ought to have become aware) of the events resulting from his act. Liability might also be imposed for V's death caused or contributed to by D's failure to act where a sufficient duty is imposed when D realized/ought to have realized V's post-injection predicament and: (a) D is in a pre-existing relationship of interdependence (parent, carer, etc) which persists irrespective of V's self-administration (eg the husband of a woman who has self-injected and who realizes or ought to have realized that she is having breathing difficulty); or (b) because D has voluntarily assumed responsibility being engaged with V in a dangerous joint enterprise; or (c) where D has voluntarily assumed a duty to care for V who is in such a state. An example might be where V becomes dependent on D's assistance (eg where D starts to care for V, who has overdosed at a party, by moving him from one room to a more secluded space, but then abandons him, leaving V worse off as he is less likely to be seen and rescued by others).²¹⁹

²¹⁴ See commentary [1982] Crim LR 526 and 773–774 and (1984) 4 LS 88 at 91.

²¹⁵ See Smart (1987) 103 LQR 532.

²¹⁶ [2009] EWCA Crim 650.

²¹⁷ Per Judge LCJ at [31].

²¹⁸ Norrie argues that 'there is a whiff of ad hoc, and misdirected, legal moralism about Evans', A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 162. See also Glenys Williams, 'Gross Negligence Manslaughter and Duty of Care in "Drugs" Cases: R v Evans' [2009] Crim LR 631. For interesting comparison with some continental European systems, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2012) 145.

²¹⁹ Ashworth argues that the significance of acts of assistance remains unclear. See Ashworth, n 190.

One aspect of the scope of Miller is at least clear: it is necessary to invoke the Miller principle only in the case of a result crime requiring fault where the act causing the result is done without the relevant fault at that time. Where the offence requires no fault, there is no need to rely on it. In Wings Ltd v Ellis,²²⁰ D Ltd, a tour operator, published a brochure which, unknown to D, contained misrepresentations. On discovering the truth, D did all they could to correct the errors but, subsequently, V read an uncorrected brochure and booked a holiday in reliance on it. D was convicted under s 14(1)(a) of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 of making a statement which they knew to be false and, s 14(1)(b), recklessly making a false statement. The statement was 'made' when it was read by V and, by then, D knew it was false. The Divisional Court, applying Miller, quashed both convictions. D had done all that could reasonably be expected to correct the false trade descriptions. The prosecutor appealed in respect of the offence under s 14(1)(a) only. The appeal was allowed. Subject to a statutory defence which was not pleaded, the House held that s 14(1)(a) created an 'absolute' offence.²²¹ D knew the statement was false and no other fault was required. There was no room for the application of Miller.

Where the offence is one requiring fault, whether mens rea strictly so called or negligence, it is submitted that the Miller principle is of general application.²²² If D, sitting alone in the passenger seat of a car, were accidentally to knock off the handbrake, so that the car rolled away, it is submitted that he could be convicted of murder if he wilfully omitted to put the brake on again, intending the car to run over and kill or cause grievous bodily harm to V. Similarly, D who locks the door of a room not knowing that V is inside and, having learned that V is within, omits to unlock the door should be liable for false imprisonment.²²³ Since the principle requires the appropriate element of fault at the time of the subsequent omission, it is submitted that liability should arise in such a case.²²⁴

Further clarification from the courts would be welcome on how it is to be determined when the duty imposed under Miller comes to an end. In the case of Lewin v CPS,²²⁵ a decision not to prosecute was upheld where D left his heavily intoxicated friend, V, asleep in a car in the summer heat in Spain where he died. The Divisional Court observed that D's responsibility for the welfare of his passenger 'persisted for so long as the vehicle was in motion, but . . . would normally have come to an end as soon as the vehicle was properly parked in a safe place at the end of its journey . . . [it] could only persist in a way which would be relevant to the offence of manslaughter if a reasonable person would have foreseen [the risk of death]'. The court went on, 'the young man who was left in the unlocked car was an adult, not a small child or dog'.²²⁶ Had not D created a dangerous situation by leaving V, heavily intoxicated, in the car? Was he not at fault for not summoning help when he realized the temperature had risen so high? Is the case distinguishable from Evans? Ashworth argues that the court's conclusion emphasizes that an assumption of responsibility alone is not enough for manslaughter, without knowledge (or reasonable grounds for realizing) that the other person is in a life-threatening situation.²²⁷

²²⁰ [1984] 1 WLR 731; revsd [1985] AC 272, HL.

²²¹ See p 146.

²²² As eg in Green v Cross (1910) 103 LT 279—D innocently caught a dog in a trap. Instead of releasing it he left it until it was freed two hours later by the police. Held, Channell J dissenting, that there was evidence on which he could be convicted of 'cruelly ill-treating' the dog.

²²³ See the unusual case of Bowell [2003] EWCA Crim 3896 in which D falsely imprisoned V in his car, V jumped from the car and escaped, but D put V back in the car and falsely imprisoned her again before taking her to hospital several hours later: she was rendered paraplegic by these actions. The court suggested that D 'could have left her in the road without committing an offence' when she had jumped out.

²²⁴ What of the case in which D hosts a party and X drinks alcohol to excess? If D allows X to drive home and X kills V, should D be liable?

²²⁵ [2002] EWHC 1049 (Admin).

²²⁶ At [24].

²²⁷ Ashworth, n 190 at 572.

2.4.2.3 Causation and omissions

Once it has been determined that there is an offence that can be committed by omission and a defendant who can be held liable owing to the existence of a relevant duty, there remains the question of whether his failure to act has caused the prohibited harm.²²⁸

Considering again the example of the child, B, left to drown by his parent, A, Stephen saw no difficulty in saying that the death (or bodily injury) was caused by A's omission. Others have taken a different view.²²⁹ It has been argued that B's death would have occurred in precisely the same way if his parent, A, had not come on the scene for any reason, so how can A be said to have caused it? He simply allowed it to happen. The cause of B's death could be said to be simply his falling into the water. Nothing else had to happen. He just drowned. If A and strangers C, D and E had walked by the pool together ignoring B's plight it is impossible to say that, as a matter of fact, A has caused the death but C, D and E have not.

There is a danger of oversimplifying things and seeking to resolve the entire issue of liability on the basis of causation without regard to the prior question of duty.²³⁰ In the case of A, C, D and E, it is possible to describe their failure as a factual cause of B's death, and if A is under a duty towards B, it is therefore possible to say that A's failure to act may be a legal cause of B's death.²³¹ As the Draft Code puts it (cl 17(b)):

a person causes a result which is an element of an offence when . . . (b) he omits to do an act which might prevent its occurrence and which he is under a duty to do according to the law relating to the offence.

It may be that this provision goes beyond the present law (and beyond what is desirable) in one respect: it extends liability to results which the act D omitted to do might have prevented. Arguably, it should be limited to results which that act would have prevented.²³² In the drowning child example, if A is B's parent and fails to act, under the present law it is submitted that the prosecution would have to establish that the failure on A's part would have, not might have, prevented B's death.

2.4.2.4 Act or omission?

It is not always easy to distinguish between an act and an omission. Some of the most difficult examples of the distinction arise in the context of a cessation of medical treatment. If a doctor is keeping a patient alive by cranking the handle of a machine and he stops, this looks like a clear case of omission. So, too, if the machine is electrically operated but switches itself off every 24 hours and the doctor deliberately does not restart it. Switching off a functioning machine looks like an act; but is it any different in substance from the first two cases?²³³ On the other hand, is it any different from cutting the high-wire on which a tightrope walker is balancing?²³⁴ (which is an act, if ever there was one)? Is the ending of a programme of dialysis an omission, while switching off a ventilator an act? Is the discontinuance of a drip feed, which is keeping a patient alive, by withdrawing the tube from his body an act²³⁵ and ²²⁸ See AP Simester, 'Causation in (Criminal) Law' (2017) 133 LQR 416; Wilson, Central Issues, 186–192; H Beynon, 'Causation, Omissions and Complicity' [1987] Crim LR 539; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 171.

²²⁹ See B Hogan, 'Omissions and the Duty Myth' in Criminal Law Essays.

²³⁰ See A Leavens, 'A Causation Approach to Criminal Omissions' (1988) 76 Cal LR 547.

²³¹ As considered, p 67, it is sufficient that D's conduct is a substantial and operative cause of V's death for homicide; there is no need to prove that D's conduct is the sole cause of death.

²³² Williams (1987) 7 LS 92 at 106–107, citing Morby (1882) 15 Cox CC 35.

²³³ Examples put by I Kennedy, 'Switching Off Life Support Machines: The Legal Implications' [1977] Crim LR 443.

²³⁴ See Kennedy, ibid, at 452. See the discussion by Beynon [1982] Crim LR 17.

²³⁵ Beynon, ibid.

failure to replace an emptied bag an omission? In theory, it might be possible to distinguish between these cases. It seems offensive if liability for homicide is so heavily dependent on such very fine distinctions of this kind; but it appears that that is the case.²³⁶

A doctor is, no doubt, under a duty to make reasonable efforts, in the light of customary medical practice and all other relevant factors, to keep a patient alive.²³⁷ Unfortunately, this does not solve the problem because the content of any duty there may be to ‘keep alive’ is different from that of the duty ‘not to kill’. The issue has become further complicated with recognition that public authorities must respect not only the right to life under Art 2 of the ECHR, but also the right to be free, in the course of treatment, from inhuman and degrading treatment under Art 3. The doctor must also respect the Art 8 privacy rights of the patient which might involve a declared wish to die, or for treatment to be withheld in specific circumstances. The Mental Capacity Act 2005 (ss 24–26) provides statutory recognition of the ability of a competent person to give a binding refusal of treatment (eg ‘do not resuscitate’). The individual can provide a binding advance refusal where he is presently competent but anticipates that he may lose that competence as his condition deteriorates.

The difficulties are brought into sharp focus where parents refuse their consent to operations on young children suffering from disabilities knowing that without the operation the child will die. It has been held that such parents are not necessarily guilty of a homicide offence if death ensues.²³⁸ In Re B (A Minor),²³⁹ on these facts, the child was made a ward of court, and the court gave consent as being in the interests of the child. Dunn LJ said that the decision of the parents to allow the child to die was one which everyone accepted as ‘entirely responsible’. It was a decision, it seems, that the parents could lawfully take, so that the death of the child, if it had followed, would not have been an actus reus. Templeman LJ thought there might possibly be cases ‘where the future is so certain and where the life of the child is bound to be full of pain and suffering that the court might be driven to a different conclusion’—that is, to allow the child to die.²⁴⁰ Yet there is no doubt that if the parents—or anyone—did any positive act to kill the child, they would be guilty of murder, subject to a relevant defence of necessity.²⁴¹ The undoubted duty of parents to preserve the life of their child is different from, and more restricted than, their duty not to kill it.

In Arthur,²⁴² a doctor, having noted that the parents of a Down’s Syndrome child did not wish the child to survive, ordered ‘nursing care only’ and the administration of a drug, allegedly to stop the child seeking sustenance. At the trial of the doctor for attempted ²³⁶ See also S Ost, An Analytical Study of the Legal, Moral and Ethical Aspects of the Living Phenomenon of Euthanasia (2003), discussing public perceptions of whether these types of act are equivalent. In R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38 Lord Neuberger stated that characterizing these cases as involving omissions was ‘somewhat uncomfortable’.

²³⁷ Williams, TBCL (1st edn, 1978) 236. See the discussion in R (Burke) v GMC [2004] EWHC 1879 (Admin), overruled and regarded as going too far in the discussion of some of these issues: R (Burke) v GMC [2006] QB 273, CA.

²³⁸ If it were an offence, it would (in the absence of diminished responsibility) be murder, because the parents intend the death of the child.

²³⁹ [1981] 1 WLR 1421.

²⁴⁰ cf the views in R (Burke) v GMC [2004] EWHC 1879 (Admin).

²⁴¹ See the discussion of Re A [2001] Fam 147, [2001] Crim LR 400, in the following section, and Inglis [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243. For a discussion of whether necessity can operate successfully as a defence in these cases, see P Lewis, ‘The Failure of the Defence of Necessity as a Mechanism of Legal Change on Assisted Dying in the Common Law World’ in DJ Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013). There are some who argue that there ought to be a specific partial defence of ‘compassionate killing’. See H Keating and J Bridgeman, ‘Compassionate Killings: The Case for a Partial Defence’ (2012) 75 MLR 697. The authors conceptualize Inglis as a case concerning pity rather than compassion.

²⁴² (1981) 12 BMLR 1, discussed by M Gunn and JC Smith, ‘Arthur’s Case and the Right to Life of a Down’s Syndrome Child’ [1985] Crim LR 705 and I Kennedy, Treat Me Right (1991) Ch 8.

murder of the child, Farquharson J directed the jury that it was for them to decide whether ‘there was an act properly so-called on the part of Dr Arthur, as distinct from simply allowing the child to die’. Simply allowing the child to die would apparently have been lawful,²⁴³ and withholding food was, according to the medical evidence put by the judge to the jury, ‘a negative act’—a mere omission. It is submitted that a better view is that an omission to provide such a child with food and the ordinary necessities of life ought to be equated with an act causing death rather than with an omission to perform an operation or to take some other extraordinary action. The position seems to be the same with a helpless, elderly person, incapable of taking decisions. It may be lawful for his family and the doctor to decide that an operation which would prolong a useless and painful life should not be performed; but it surely cannot be lawful to starve him to death, whether with the assistance of drugs or not.

Terminating life

The distinction between act and omission was the basis of the important decision in Airedale National Health Service Trust v Bland.²⁴⁴ B, a victim of the Hillsborough stadium disaster, had been in a persistent vegetative state for three and a half years and medical opinion was that there was no hope of improvement or recovery. The Trust, with the support of B’s parents, applied for a declaration that they might lawfully discontinue ventilation, nutrition and hydration by artificial means and end medical treatment except to allow B to die peacefully. The application was resisted by the Official Solicitor, who argued that the withdrawal of artificial feeding would constitute murder. The judge granted the declaration and the House of Lords, affirming the Court of Appeal, upheld it. There was no doubt about the intention to kill. The object of the exercise was to terminate B’s life. It was accepted that to kill by administering a lethal injection or any similar act would be murder; but what was proposed was held to be not an act, but an omission. Lord Goff said:

The question is not whether the doctor should take a course which will kill his patient, or even take a course which has the effect of accelerating his death. The question is whether the doctor should or should not continue to provide his patient with medical care which, if continued, will prolong his patient’s life.

Lord Goff added that it might be difficult to say that it was in the patient’s best interests that the treatment should be ended but that it could sensibly be said that it was not in his best interests that it should be continued. ‘Ending’ and ‘not continuing’ look uncommonly like the same thing; but the former expresses the conduct as an act, which could not be ²⁴³ It is submitted that nothing turned on the fact that the charge had been reduced from murder to attempted murder—see [1986] Crim LR 760–762 and D Poole, ‘Arthur’s Case: A Comment’ [1986] Crim LR 383; D Brahm, ‘Putting Arthur’s Case in Perspective’ [1986] Crim LR 387.

²⁴⁴ [1993] 1 All ER 821, [1993] Crim LR 877, HL. See J Keown, ‘Restoring Moral and Intellectual Shape to the Law After Bland’ (1997) 113 LQR 481. For an analysis of the Bland case and its implications for euthanasia, see D Price, ‘What Shape to Euthanasia after Bland? Historical, Contemporary and Futuristic Paradigms’ (2009) 125 LQR 142. The Scottish courts have reached the same result by a different route: Law Hospital NHS Trust v Lord Advocate [1996] 2 FLR 407. Bland’s case was distinguished in Re A (Children; Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation), p 375. Bland was relied upon in a number of the speeches in R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2014] UKSC 38. Note that the termination by non-feeding of a patient in a persistently vegetative state should normally only occur with the sanction of the High Court: Practice Direction [1994] 2 All ER 413. The approach has been held to be compatible with the obligations of the State to secure the right to life under Art 2 of the ECHR: NHS Trusts, A v M [2001] 1 All ER 801; A Hospital v W [2007] EWHC 425 (Fam). For a valuable review of the academic arguments in medical law, see A McGee, ‘Finding a Way Through the Ethical and Legal Maze: Withdrawal of Medical Treatment and Euthanasia’ (2005) 13 Med L Rev 357.

justified, and the latter as an omission, which could.²⁴⁵ In Re A (Conjoined Twins: Surgical Separation), the Court of Appeal held, rightly, it is submitted, that surgery to separate twins was an act.²⁴⁶ In R (Burke) v GMC,²⁴⁷ Lord Phillips stated that Bland should not be read as requiring a persistent vegetative state (PVS) patient to be kept alive simply because he has made an advance directive to that effect. Section 26 of the Mental Capacity Act requires compliance with a valid advance directive to refuse treatment, but the crucial issue is what is in the best interests of a patient.²⁴⁸

ECHR concerns

In Glass v UK,²⁴⁹ the ECtHR gave detailed consideration to the position under English law, acknowledging first: 'the regulatory framework . . . is firmly predicated on the duty to preserve the life of a patient, save in exceptional circumstances. Secondly, that same framework prioritises the requirement of parental consent [in the case of a child] and, save in emergency situations, requires doctors to seek the intervention of the courts in the event of parental objection.'

In R (Burke) v GMC,²⁵⁰ the High Court recognized that a withdrawal of artificial feeding and hydration which a competent patient wishes to continue or which an incompetent person has previously, when competent, directed to continue would infringe Art 8 of the ECHR.²⁵¹ It was also held that withdrawal of treatment would breach Art 3 if it exposed the patient to acute mental and physical suffering, irrespective of the awareness of the patient to that suffering. The court in Burke also suggested that it would be difficult to envisage circumstances in which the withdrawal of artificial feeding from a sentient patient would be compatible with the Convention. The Court of Appeal subsequently reversed the High Court's decision, upholding the legitimacy of the GMC Guidelines on the withdrawal of nutrition and hydration. The Lord Chief Justice emphasized the duty on doctors to take reasonable steps to keep the patient alive. The Court of Appeal concluded that the guarantees in Arts 2, 3 and 8 did not alter the common law position. The court endorsed the comments of Munby J in the High Court,²⁵² that Art 2 does not entitle anyone to continue with life-prolonging treatment where to do so would expose the patient to 'inhuman or degrading treatment' breaching Art 3, but that at the same time, withdrawal of life-prolonging ²⁴⁵ It has been argued that the importance of the judgment is its discussion of the content of the duty of care in respect of an insensate patient. See A du Bois-Pedain, 'The Duty to Preserve Life and its Limits in English Criminal Law' in DJ Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013).

²⁴⁶ For criticism of the approach in Bland and the consequences for the conjoined twin case, see also J McEwan, 'Murder by Design: The Feel-Good Factor and the Criminal Law' (2001) 9 Med L Rev 246. See also M Wilks, 'Medical Treatment at the End of Life' in C Erin and S Ost, Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007).

²⁴⁷ [2006] QB 273. See, for discussion, C Dupré, 'Human Dignity and the Withdrawal of Medical Treatment: A Missed Opportunity' [2006] EHRLR 678, lamenting the Court of Appeal's refusal to engage with the human dignity and ECHR arguments.

²⁴⁸ At [57].

²⁴⁹ [2004] 1 FLR 1019, [75]. The case concerned the treatment of a child whom doctors thought was dying and to whom they administered diamorphine by way of palliative care despite the objections of the mother.

²⁵⁰ [2004] EWHC 1879 (Admin). See also Re OT [2009] EWHC 633 (Fam): withdrawal of life-sustaining treatment which was no longer in the patient's best interests was not a breach of Art 2 or 8.

²⁵¹ On the GMC Guidelines, see J Keown, 'Beyond Bland: A Critique of the BMA Guidance on Withholding and Withdrawing Medical Treatment' (2000) 20 LS 66; cf D Price, 'Fairly Bland: An Alternative View of a Supposed New "Death Ethic" and the BMA Guidelines' (2001) 21 LS 618. See also the discussion of the Schiavo case in the United States—RA Destro, 'Lessons in Legal and Judicial Ethics from Schiavo' in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007).

²⁵² [2005] QB 424, [162].

treatment within the common law parameters will not breach Art 2. Lord Phillips stated that this conclusion:

does not, however, lead to the further conclusion that if a National Health doctor were deliberately to bring about the death of a competent patient by withdrawing life-prolonging treatment contrary to that patient's wishes, Article 2 would not be infringed. It seems to us that such conduct would plainly violate Article 2. Furthermore, if English law permitted such conduct, this would also violate this country's positive obligation to enforce Article 2. As we have already indicated, we do not consider that English criminal law would countenance such conduct. However, the fact that Articles 2, 3 and 8 of the Convention may be engaged does not, in our judgment, advance the argument or alter the common law.²⁵³

In NHS Trust A v M, NHS Trust B v H,²⁵⁴ it was confirmed that the withdrawal of nutrition and hydration by artificial means from a patient in a persistent vegetative state would not infringe Art 2.

It will be appreciated from the discussion of these difficult medical cases that the courts struggle to distinguish between acts and omissions. The difficulty all too often leads to distinctions without any apparent difference, or in some cases to a sidestepping of the issue by a convenient treatment of the actus reus as the defendant's conduct viewed in toto.

2.4.2.5 'Easy rescue' statutes

As noted, there are hotly contested philosophical arguments about the desirability of creating liability for omissions in general, and much of the academic discussion has centred on the liability for failing to rescue.²⁵⁵ Many jurisdictions have dealt with the 'shallow pool' case by creating a specific offence for anyone failing to take steps which he could take without any personal risk, to save another from death or injury. It is important to note that these statutes do not equate omissions with acts. The offender is liable for a specific statutory offence of failing to rescue (with its own penalty) and not the harmful result which D may have prevented and has allowed to happen. Thus, D is not necessarily guilty of homicide if the victim dies.²⁵⁶

Some commentators have called for the enactment of an 'easy rescue' or 'Bad Samaritan' offence such as that adopted by our European neighbours,²⁵⁷ certain US states²⁵⁸ and elsewhere. A clear example of the type of offence is provided in the Northern Territory in Australia in the Criminal Code Act, s 155. This makes it an offence for any person who, being able to provide rescue, resuscitation, medical treatment, first aid or succour of any kind to a person urgently in need of it and whose life may be endangered if it is not provided, ²⁵³ At [39]. ²⁵⁴ [2001] Fam 348.

²⁵⁵ See, especially, J Feinberg, Harm to Others (1984) Ch 4. Compare H Gross, A Theory of Criminal Justice (1979) 61–65; M Menlowe, 'The Philosophical Foundations of a Duty to Rescue' and A McCall Smith, 'The Duty to Rescue and the Common Law' in M Menlowe and A McCall Smith (eds), The Duty to Rescue: The Jurisprudence of Aid (1993). See also T Elliott and D Ormerod, 'Acts and Omissions: A Distinction Without a Defence' (2009) 39 Cambrian L Rev 40.

²⁵⁶ J Andanaes, The General Part of the Criminal Law of Norway (1965) 132.

²⁵⁷ eg France: Code pénal, art 223-6 (which replaces art 63 of the previous criminal code). See A Ashworth and E Steiner, 'Criminal Omissions and Public Duties: The French Experience' (1990) 10 LS 153. For more recent analysis, see M Vranken, 'Duty to Rescue in Civil Law and Common Law: Les Extrêmes se Touchent?' (1998) 47 ICLQ 934 at 937–938, and A Cadoppi, 'Failure to Rescue and the Continental Criminal Law' in MA Menlowe and A McCall Smith (eds), The Duty to Rescue: The Jurisprudence of Aid (1993) 93, which discusses the imposition of legal duties to rescue in European countries.

²⁵⁸ 'Rescue' legislation has also been adopted in Rhode Island (Gen Laws RI, ss 11-37-3.1, 11-37-3.3 and 11-56-1), Massachusetts (Gen Laws Ann Ch 268, s 40), Minnesota (Stat Ann, ss 604.01(a), 609.02), Hawaii (Haw Rev Stat Ann, s 663-1.6) and Wisconsin (Wis Stat Ann, s 940.34 [1], [2]).

to 'callously'²⁵⁹ fail to do so. Powerful arguments have been made that such an offence would promote social cooperation, which is itself worthy of promotion by criminal regulation and that such laws are ultimately necessary for individual autonomy to be realized.²⁶⁰

The objections to Bad Samaritan laws are well rehearsed.²⁶¹ They have been criticized as being so vague that they are either unenforceable and/or contravene the principle of legality. Some of the examples from around the world, including those such as the Northern Territory's offence, may support the criticisms. They are alleged to impose too great a burden on investigators and leave too much to prosecutorial discretion since there may be hundreds of potential defendants who failed to rescue (as opposed to the usual scenario with one criminal who acted). In addition, it is questionable how well they operate in practice since there seem to be very few prosecutions, at least in common law jurisdictions, which is not to say that they do not operate at a symbolic level in encouraging greater communitarianism.²⁶² More fundamentally, they are claimed to represent a more significant infringement on autonomy (being told you must do X) and impose ambiguous burdens (what to do if someone else has started to rescue) of uncertain duration (when does the duty end).

Despite this, the Bad Samaritan laws are numerous²⁶³ and have an ancient pedigree.²⁶⁴ It is possible to draft legislation narrowly enough to meet or outweigh the objections. In particular, it is possible to include elements of mens rea such as that in the Northern Territory's offence which requires 'callousness'.²⁶⁵

2.4.2.6 Act, omission or control?

The numerous complications which flow from the law's attempts to distinguish between acts and involuntary movement, states of affairs and omissions has prompted some academics²⁶⁶ to argue that the problems can be avoided if the focus shifts to whether D had 'control' of the potential consequences of his behaviour at the relevant time.²⁶⁷ Duff suggests:

A control requirement does not distinguish action from omission: whether X is an outcome of my action or an event that I could do but do not prevent, I have the same degree of control over whether X ensues, and thus can be criminally responsible on just the same basis in both cases.²⁶⁸

Adopting a focus on whether the defendant had control will, Duff claims, make 'criminal responsibility for omissions unproblematic'.²⁶⁹ There are many theoretical benefits to be gained from a control approach, but the criminal law's practical response to omissions would nevertheless remain problematical in several ways.²⁷⁰

²⁵⁹ 'Callous' here means with more than normal intent, which requires that 'it be proved that a person deliberately and consciously chose not to provide help or assistance': Salmon v Chute (1994) 115 FLR 176, Kearney J at 199. For a brief discussion of this case, see JT Pardun, 'Good Samaritan Laws: A Global Perspective' (1998) 20 Loyola LA Int'l & Comp LJ 591 at 595–596. Murphy suggests that there is a greater need for imposing upon individuals a positive requirement to assist in the Northern Territory because its terrain and climate are particularly harsh and it is sparsely populated: L Murphy, 'Beneficence, Law and Liberty: The Case of Required Rescue' (2001) 89 Georgetown LJ 605 at 659 fn 234.

²⁶⁰ A Ashworth, 'The Scope of Criminal Liability for Omissions' (1989) 105 LQR 424 at 432. Cf A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 162–168. See also EJ Weinrib, 'The Case for a Duty to Rescue' (1980) 90 Yale LJ 247 and compare J Dressler, 'Some Brief Thoughts (Mostly Negative) about Bad Samaritan Laws' (2000) 40 Santa Clara LR 971.

²⁶¹ See JT Pardun, 'Good Samaritan Laws a Global Perspective' (1997–98) 20 Loyola LA Int'l & Comp LJ 591.

²⁶² See ibid., 597. ²⁶³ See ibid., Appendix.

²⁶⁴ See ibid., 593 and references therein to similar laws in Ancient Egypt.

²⁶⁵ See eg Duff, Answering for Crime. Cf D Husak, Philosophy of Criminal Law: Selected Essays (2010) 38.

²⁶⁶ Answering for Crime, 105.

²⁶⁷ ibid., 107.

²⁶⁸ ibid., 107.

²⁶⁹ ibid., 107.

²⁷⁰ See Elliott and Ormerod, n 255.

2.5 Causation

In every result crime causation is, by definition, an issue.²⁷¹ Although the issue often arises in the context of homicide, causation is important in all result crimes.²⁷² In many cases it is not a contentious issue because it is not disputed.²⁷³ When it is disputed, the prosecution must prove that D, by his own act or unlawful omission, caused the relevant result.²⁷⁴ Theoretical disputes abound as to whether the element of causation can be properly seen as being exclusively an element of actus reus or whether it ought also to be seen as including consideration of D's fault. Tadros argues that the causal inquiry is sensitive to both moral factors and to the states of mind of the defendant.²⁷⁵ There is no doubt that the cases are heavily policy-laden, and it is clear that the courts are keen to avoid an unduly theoretical approach to the issue.

2.5.1 Law or fact?

A common approach of the courts has been²⁷⁶ to assert that causation is a question of fact to be answered by the application of common sense. The view that it is so simple is belied by the existence of a book on causation in law of over 500 pages with a 24-page table of cases.²⁷⁷ What D did and what happened are certainly questions of fact. Whether D's act caused what happened is more complicated. If that is a question of fact, it is one which is closely circumscribed by cases deciding what is incapable in law of being a cause, and what cannot reasonably be held to be a cause. Questions of fact and law are involved.

Whether D's act caused the result is a question that must be left to the jury but, in answering the question, they must apply legal principles, which it is the judge's duty to explain to them.²⁷⁸ In one case²⁷⁹ Lawton LJ said that where 'there is no conflict of evidence and all the jury has to do is to apply the law to the admitted facts, the judge is entitled to tell the jury what the result of that application will be'. Other cases,²⁸⁰ however, show that the jury may have a substantial role in evaluating the primary facts, and that carries the attendant problems involved in their exercising moral judgement.

²⁷¹ See generally H Hart and T Honoré, Causation in the Law (2nd edn, 1985); A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) Ch 7; Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 6.

²⁷² Especially in cases of strict liability where, in the absence of mens rea elements, disputes over causation become the most critical, eg in environmental offences: N Padfield, 'Clean Water and Muddy Causation' [1995] Crim LR 683.

²⁷³ In Kimel [2016] EWCA Crim 1456, the Court of Appeal observed that the fact that a pathologist may be unable to identify a clear cause of death does not mean that the issue of causation could or should not be left to the jury. It was also held that if there is any suggestion that death may have been caused by the actions of some person other than D, this may need to be addressed with care in the trial judge's directions and in any route to verdict provided to the jury.

²⁷⁴ On the issue of causing an event through the use of an innocent agent, see p 70.

²⁷⁵ Criminal Responsibility, 159. Tadros poses an example (p 179) of D stabbing V in the leg. In the first scenario D is unaware that there is a bomb nearby. It explodes killing V. D would not be liable for murder even though he stabbed with intent to kill. In the second scenario, D stabs V and leaves him, being aware that a bomb is nearby. He concludes that in this second example the bomb would not break the chain of causation because D was aware of it. The law already asks whether the explosion of the bomb was reasonably foreseeable, however.

²⁷⁶ But see now the Empress Car case, p 72.

²⁷⁷ Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law.

²⁷⁸ Page (1983) 76 Cr App R 279, [1983] Crim LR 393, CA. See Judicial College, Crown Court Compendium (November 2017) which provides illustrative directions.

²⁷⁹ Blau [1975] 3 All ER 446 at 450, [1975] Crim LR 648, CA, p 79. In Malcherek [1981] 1 WLR 690, [1981] Crim LR 401, p 77, it was held that the jury were bound to conclude that D caused V's death.

²⁸⁰ eg Cheshire [1991] 1 WLR 844, [1991] Crim LR 709, p 77.

In some cases, particularly homicides, expert witnesses will play an important role. Where the question is whether the act caused a prohibited result such as certain injuries or death, the expert's function is to give the court an opinion on the medical issues. It is then for the jury to find the facts and apply the legal principles under the direction of the judge. Thus, cases such as Jordan (discussed in the following section) have been criticized²⁸¹ because medical experts were permitted to say that the cause of V's death was certain medical treatment, and not wounds inflicted by D.²⁸² Whether the wound was capable of being 'a cause', for the purpose of the decision, was a question of law, not of medicine. Certainly it was relevant and proper for the court to know if the medical treatment was effective to cause death, either in conjunction with, or independently of, the wound; and perhaps all that the witnesses intended to say was that the treatment alone was the medical cause of death.²⁸³ Of course, it is not necessary in every case for the trial judge to give detailed directions on every aspect of causation set out in the following sections.²⁸⁴

2.5.2 The 'but for' principle

The first legal principle to apply is that D's act cannot be regarded as the cause of an event if the event would have occurred in the same way had D's conduct never been performed. For D to be liable, it must be proved that, but for D's conduct, the event would not have occurred.²⁸⁵ Thus, if D poisons V's drink but V dies of natural causes before the poison has had any effect on V, D's conduct is not a 'but for' cause of V's death.²⁸⁶ When deciding whether D's act was a 'but for' cause, a simple approach is to eliminate D's behaviour from the narrative and ask whether the result would have occurred anyway. If so, D is not liable. In the traditional Latin terminology, D's act must be a sine qua non of the prohibited consequence (eg death in murder). But this is only a starting point. There are many acts that are sine qua non of an event but are not, either in law or common sense, the cause of it. It is necessary to keep the test in perspective; otherwise blame could be attributed to D's ancestors!

If D invites V to dinner and V is run over and killed on the way, V would not have died but for the invitation; but as a matter of common sense, no one would say 'D killed V', and in law D has not caused his death. In Jordan,²⁸⁷ D stabbed V inflicting a wound that was certainly a sine qua non of the death of V because it led directly to the badly performed medical treatment that, according to the medical experts, caused death. It did not necessarily follow that the treatment was, in law, the only cause of the death. That depended on the application of the further principles considered in the following sections. The 'but for' principle is a starting point in the causation inquiry, but nothing more.²⁸⁸

²⁸¹ (1956) 40 Cr App R 152, p 76. See G Williams, 'Causation in Homicide' [1957] Crim LR 431 and F Camps and J Havard, 'Causation in Homicide—A Medical View' [1957] Crim LR 576.

²⁸² cf Cato [1976] 1 All ER 260 at 264, [1976] Crim LR 59, p 715 where the medical experts said it was not for them to state the cause of death; they spoke to facts, and deductions therefrom were for the jury.

²⁸³ The medical evidence may take on an additional significance in the case of an omission. See Sinclair (1998) 148 NLJ 1353, and Gowans [2003] EWCA Crim 3935.

²⁸⁴ See Ogunbowale [2007] EWCA Crim 2739. The Crown Court Compendium (2017) contains further guidance at Ch 7, section 9.

²⁸⁵ Even this basic rule may have exceptions, but only in very unlikely circumstances, eg D and E, independently and simultaneously, shoot at V. D's bullet goes through V's heart and E's bullet blows his brains out. It seems safe to assume that both will be held to have caused V's death. Cf Hall, General Principles, 267.

²⁸⁶ See White [1910] 2 KB 124; D may be liable for the attempted murder of V.

²⁸⁷ Discussed in detail, p 76.

²⁸⁸ This point was emphasized in unequivocal terms by the Supreme Court in Hughes [2013] UKSC 56, [2014] Crim LR 234 and reaffirmed in Taylor [2016] UKSC 5, [2016] Crim LR 366.

2.5.3 Contributory causes

It is clear that D's conduct need not be the sole or the main cause of the result. It is wrong to direct a jury that D is not liable if he is, for example, less than one-fifth to blame.²⁸⁹ So, where D struck V who was suffering from meningitis and V died, it was enough that the death would not have been caused by the meningitis at the time when it occurred but for the blows (and it was immaterial that the blows would not have caused death but for the meningitis).²⁹⁰ In L, a case concerning death by driving, the Court of Appeal, after referring to Hennigan, Skelton and Barnes, stated:

Those authorities establish or recognise these principles: first, the defendant's driving must have played a part not simply in creating the occasion for the fatal accident, i.e. causation in the 'but for' sense, but in bringing it about; secondly, no particular degree of contribution is required beyond a negligible one; thirdly, there may be cases in which the judge should rule that the driving is too remote from the later event to have been the cause of it, and should accordingly withdraw the case from the jury.²⁹¹

The principles are equally applicable beyond the context of road traffic offences.

Contributory causes may be the acts or omissions of others, including the conduct of the deceased himself. The contributory negligence of the claimant in civil actions of negligence was an absolute defence at common law, but no such principle applied in the criminal law. In Swindall and Osborne,²⁹² where one or other of the two accused ran over and killed an old man, Pollock CB directed the jury that it was immaterial that the victim was deaf or drunk or negligent and contributed to his own death. One or other of the two accused was a cause of death and, on the evidence, the other was an accessory.

An example of a case in which third parties contributed to V's death is Benge.²⁹³ D, a foreman, was employed to take up a certain section of railway line. He misread the timetable and as a result the repairs to the line meant there was no track in place and a train crashed causing deaths. D had placed a man with a flag to warn oncoming trains but had ordered the flagman to go to a distance of only 540 yards, instead of 1,000 yards as required by the company's regulations. D also entirely omitted to place fog signals, although the regulations specified that these should be put at 250-yard intervals for a distance of 1,000 yards. At D's trial for manslaughter it was urged that, in spite of his mistakes, the accident could not have happened if the other servants of the company had done their duty—if the flagman had gone the proper distance or if the engine driver had been keeping a proper look-out, which he was not. Pigott B ruled that this was no defence; if D's negligence mainly or substantially caused the accident, it was irrelevant that it might have been avoided if other persons had not been negligent.

In Warburton and Hubbersty,²⁹⁴ the Court of Appeal rejected a submission that 'where a person has died from a number of injuries caused by different people and the defendant has caused (or been a party to causing) only injuries "A", then the defendant would not have caused the death unless the jury were sure that the deceased would have died from injuries "A" on their own'. Hooper LJ, delivering the judgment of the court, emphasized that 'the test

²⁸⁹ Hennigan [1971] 3 All ER 133. And see Williams [2010] EWCA Crim 2552, [2011] Crim LR 471.

²⁹⁰ Dyson [1908] 2 KB 454.

²⁹¹ [2010] EWCA Crim 1249, [9]. See also Jenkins [2012] EWCA Crim 2909.

²⁹² (1846) 2 Car & Kir 230. Ledger (1862) 2 F & F 857 is contrary but was regarded by Stephen J as 'a very peculiar case': Digest, 161 fn 4.

²⁹³ (1865) 4 F & F 504. See also Walker (1824) 1 C & P 320 (Garrow B).

²⁹⁴ [2006] EWCA Crim 627, CA.

for the jury is a simple one: did the acts for which the defendant is responsible significantly contribute to the victim's death'.

2.5.4 Connection between fault and result

The proscribed result is not attributable to D if the culpable element in his conduct in no way made a relevant contribution to the result. This is a difficult principle that is often misunderstood. A good illustration of its operation is in Dalloway.²⁹⁵ D was driving a cart on a highway with reins not in his hands but loose on the horse's back. A three-year-old child ran into the road a few yards in front of the horse and was killed. Erle J directed the jury that, if D had reins and by using the reins could have saved the child, he was guilty of manslaughter; but that, if they thought D could not have saved the child by the use of the reins, then they should acquit him. If D had not been driving the cart at all the incident could not have occurred, and in that sense, he 'caused' it; but it was necessary to go further and show that the death was due to the culpable element in his conduct—his negligence in not using the reins.²⁹⁶

In Williams,²⁹⁷ W was convicted of the draconian offence of causing death by driving without insurance and without a licence contrary to s 3ZB of the Road Traffic Act 1988. W drove his car without a driving licence or insurance. V crossed a dual-carriageway and stepped out in front of W's car. W argued that he could not avoid the accident. The Court of Appeal held that W's driving was 'a cause' if it was 'more than negligible or de minimis'. The court rejected the value of applying Dalloway. It is respectfully submitted that the case does assist. Dalloway serves as a reminder that the causation analysis must focus on the relevant act—which act is it alleged is the cause of the death? In Dalloway it was the negligent driving by misuse of the reins. In Williams it is submitted that the statute makes clear that it is the act of 'driving', not the existence of the car on the road. There has to be a causal link between the driving and not just the fact that the car was on the road at the time of the death. The Court of Appeal's interpretation focused only on the link between the fact of the vehicle being on the road and the death. The statutory wording is not limited to that fact, but requires that the act of 'driving' causes the death. Consider a truly extreme case of a suicidal person jumping from a high motorway bridge and landing on D's uninsured car. Has D's driving caused V's death? V's death would have arisen if he had hit V's stationary car or the road. D's driving is not a cause of death.

In Hughes,²⁹⁸ the Supreme Court overruled Williams. Lords Hughes and Toulson emphasized that s 3ZB is not only a penal provision, but is one that creates a homicide offence. For that reason, it had to be construed in a way favourable to the defendant. It was held, therefore, that to be guilty of the offence in s 3ZB it was not enough for D simply to put his car on the road for it to be struck. It was necessary for the Crown to prove that there was something that D did or omitted to do by way of driving it that contributed in a more than minimal way to the death.²⁹⁹ Their lordships emphasized that the Crown does not need to prove that D's driving is careless or inconsiderate, but there must be 'something open to proper criticism in the driving of the defendant, beyond the mere presence of the vehicle on the ²⁹⁵ (1847) 2 Cox CC 273, cf Marsh [1997] 1 Cr App R 67, [1997] Crim LR 205.

²⁹⁶ cf the discussion of Clarke (1990) 91 Cr App R 69.

²⁹⁷ [2010] EWCA Crim 2552, [2011] Crim LR 471. For criticism, see GR Sullivan and AP Simester, 'Causation Without Limits: Causing Death While Driving Without a Licence, While Disqualified, or Without Insurance' [2012] Crim LR 753. See also Carey [2006] EWCA Crim 17, [2006] Crim LR 842 discussed in Ch 14.

²⁹⁸ [2013] UKSC 56, [2014] Crim LR 234, (2014) 73 CLJ 14.

²⁹⁹ Professor Simester argues that the approach adopted in Hughes demonstrates an under-appreciation of the core, physical, dimension of causation. See AP Simester, 'Causation in (Criminal) Law' (2017) 133 LQR 416.

road, and which contributed in some more than minimal way to the death'. In Taylor, the Supreme Court upheld in emphatic terms the approach adopted in Hughes.³⁰⁰ Delivering the judgment of a unanimous seven-member Supreme Court, Lord Sumption held that, for the purposes of aggravated vehicle-taking, there must have been some act or omission in the control of the car, which involved some element of fault, and which contributed in some more than minimal way to the death of V.

2.5.5 Negligible causes

It is sometimes said³⁰¹ that D's conduct must be a 'substantial' cause, but the use of the word is misleading and seems to mean only that D's contribution must be more than negligible or not be so minute that it will be ignored under the 'de minimis' principle.³⁰²

It may, therefore, be misleading to direct a jury that D is not liable unless his conduct was a 'substantial' cause, but that is not the same as saying that D is always liable, no matter how trivial his contribution to the outcome.³⁰³ For example, D and V are roped mountaineers. V has fallen over a 1,000-foot precipice and is dragging D slowly after him. D cuts the rope and V falls to his death five seconds before both V and D would have fallen. Any acceleration of death is killing but factors that produce a very trivial acceleration may be ignored. D's act is not a cause of V's death because it is merely de minimis. Similarly, where two persons independently inflict wounds on V:

suppose one wound severed the jugular vein whereas the other barely broke the skin of the hand, and as the life blood gushed from the victim's neck, one drop oozed from the bruise on his finger . . . metaphysicians will conclude that the extra drop of lost blood hastened the end by the infinitesimal fraction of a second. But the law will apply the substantial factor test and for juridical purposes the death will be imputed only to the severe injury in such an extreme case as this.³⁰⁴

These are, perhaps, rather unlikely examples but the principle would apply, for example, to a person visiting a dying man and contributing to his exhaustion by talking with him; and probably to the administration of pain-killing drugs which accelerate death.³⁰⁵ In the context of homicide, the problems raise controversial questions of science, law and morality as to the degree of acceleration of death that needs to be established to constitute a cause of death.³⁰⁶

³⁰⁰ [2016] UKSC 5. For discussion, see K Laird, 'The Decline of Criminal Law Causation Without Limits' (2016) 132 LQR 566.

³⁰¹ See eg Benge, discussed earlier; Smith [1959] 2 QB 35 at 42–43 (p 77); Hall, General Principles, 283; Perkins (1946) 36 J Cr L & Cr at 393, and Criminal Law, 606–607.

³⁰² Cato [1976] 1 All ER 260 at 265–266; 'it need hardly be added that [that cause] need not be substantial to render the accused guilty': Malcherek [1981] 2 All ER 422 at 428, [1981] Crim LR 401. But note that there is no defence of de minimis per se in English criminal law: Scott [2007] EWCA Crim 2757 (D 30 minutes late in answering bail).

³⁰³ Hennigan, n 289. Something more than a 'slight or trifling link' is required: Kimsey [1996] Crim LR 35. See also eg Fitzgerald [2006] EWCA Crim 1655.

³⁰⁴ Perkins and Boyce, Criminal Law, 779. But cf Garforth [1954] Crim LR 936.

³⁰⁵ See p 509.

³⁰⁶ Numerous high-profile cases involved doctors who have 'eased the passing' of a terminally ill patient. Examples include: Cox (1992) 12 BMLR 38 (see Editorial, 'Hard Cases Make Bad Law: Mercy Killing and Dr Cox' (1992) 142 NLJ 1293) and Adams, H Palmer, 'Dr Adams' Trial for Murder' [1957] Crim LR 365. There was considerable comment following the case of David Moor: see A Arlidge, 'The Trial of Dr David Moor' [2000] Crim LR 31; JC Smith, 'A Comment on Moor's Case' [2000] Crim LR 41 and also J Goss, 'A Postscript to the Trial of Dr David Moor' [2000] Crim LR 568. The trial judge, Hooper J, was prepared to leave the question of unlawfulness to the jury—if the act was proper treatment for the illness and pain management, it would be lawful even if the effect was fatal.

The problem of an intervening cause, which is discussed in the following section,³⁰⁷ is sometimes put on the basis of substantial cause. Thus, Hall writes:

For example, a slight wound may have necessitated going to a doctor or drugstore, and en route the slightly injured person was struck by an automobile or shot by his mortal enemy. The slight wound, though a necessary condition of the death, did not contribute substantially to it.³⁰⁸

In Williams,³⁰⁹ the court emphasized that the judge must explain to the jury what is meant by ‘cause’. A simple reference to ‘significant’ or ‘substantial’ might be insufficient, as the terms could easily be misunderstood.

2.5.6 Intervening acts or events

Although D’s culpable conduct is a factual (but for) and more than de minimis cause of the prohibited result, he is not necessarily legally responsible for it on that basis alone. If there is an intervening event (act or omission) either as a naturally occurring phenomenon or by some human conduct, it may operate to ‘break the chain of causation’, precluding D’s liability for the ultimate result although D may remain liable for an attempt in many cases. The Supreme Court of Canada has framed the issue in the following terms: ‘Any assessment of legal causation should maintain focus on whether the accused should be held legally responsible for the consequences of his actions, or whether holding the accused responsible for the death would amount to punishing a moral innocent.’³¹⁰

If, despite the intervening events, D’s conduct remains a ‘substantial and operative cause’ of the result, D will remain responsible (and if the intervention is by another person, that actor may also become liable in such circumstances but that is a matter for a speared criminal investigation separate from the question whether D is liable). Subject to this, and some exceptional cases, the principles appear to be as follows.

- (1) D will remain liable if his subsequent act is part of the same transaction perpetrated by D. For example, D stabs V and then shoots him. D remains liable.
- (2) D will not be liable if a natural event which is extraordinary or not reasonably foreseeable, supervenes and renders D’s contribution merely part of the background.
- (3) In relation to third party interventions, D will not be liable if a third party’s intervening act is either:
 - (a) one of a free, deliberate and informed nature (whether reasonably foreseeable or not);³¹¹
 - (b) if not a free, deliberate informed act, one which was not reasonably foreseeable.
- (4) D will not be liable if a medical professional intervenes to treat injuries inflicted by D and the treatment is so independent of D’s conduct³¹² and so potent as to render D’s contribution part of the history and not a substantial and operating cause of death. The jury must remain focused on whether D remains liable, not whether the medical ³⁰⁷ See later. ³⁰⁸ Hall, General Principles, 283, 393.

³⁰⁹ See n 397; see also Barnes [2008] EWCA Crim 2726. ³¹⁰ Maybin [2012] 2 SCC 24, [29].

³¹¹ This includes acts instinctively done for self-preservation and acts of an involuntary nature by the third party. Cf Empress Car [1999] 2 AC 22, in the case of a strict liability environmental offence only if the intervening act was extraordinary would it break causation.

³¹² Although usually an act, it can be an omission to act. In McKechnie (1992) 94 Cr App R 51, [1992] Crim LR 194 where doctors discovered that V had an ulcer but decided that it would be too dangerous to operate because V was still unconscious from D’s beating. V died as a result of the ulcer bursting: ‘The Recorder’s statement of the question of the intervening events—the doctor’s decision not to operate on the duodenal ulcer because [V’s] head injuries made such an operation dangerous—properly directed the jury, not to the correctness of the medical decision, but to its reasonableness’, per Auld J at 58.

professional's conduct ought to render him criminally liable for his part. Even where incorrect treatment leads to death or more serious injury, it will only break the chain of causation if it is (a) unforeseeably bad, and (b) the sole significant cause of the death (or more serious injury) with which D is charged.

(5) In relation to victims:

- (a) D will be liable if the victim has a pre-existing condition (which includes, after Blaue, a religious belief) rendering him unusually vulnerable to physical injury; D must accept liability for any unusually serious consequences which result: Hayward;³¹³ Blaue.³¹⁴
- (b) D will not be liable if the victim's subsequent conduct in response to D's act is not within a range of responses that could be regarded as reasonable and foreseeable in the circumstances. Was V's act so daft as to be wholly disproportionate to D's act? If so, it will break the chain.

In summary, in a homicide case D, who did what would have been a fatal act but for some independent intervention, is not responsible where the intervening independent act or unforeseen event is the immediate and sufficient cause of death. For example, D administers poison to V but, before it takes any effect on V's body, V is struck by lightning, shot dead by a burglar or dies of a heart attack not induced by the poison. In such cases, D may be guilty of attempted murder, but he cannot be convicted of murder.

The courts have struggled to produce a clear approach in this complex area. This problem is exacerbated by the diversity of factual circumstances in which such interventions arise, thereby encouraging the courts to distinguish cases too readily. Decisions have also been heavily influenced by policy considerations and this is illustrated by the willingness to conclude, for example, that interventions do not break the chain of causation where the intervention is by a health-care professional. The courts have also adopted rather loose language in determining whether intervening events 'break the chain of causation', often resorting simply to the use of that metaphor. The best that can be offered by way of guidance is an examination of this series of principles, some of which are openly in conflict.

2.5.6.1 D's subsequent conduct

Where D has performed the conduct element of the offence a subsequent act by him will not break the chain of causation so as to excuse him where that subsequent act is part of the same transaction.³¹⁵ The earlier example is a clear one: D stabs V and then shoots him before V has died from the wound. The position is different if the act which causes the proscribed result for the crime (eg death) is part of a completely different transaction from D's original act. For example D, having wounded V, visits him in hospital and accidentally infects him with smallpox of which he dies.³¹⁶ D is not liable for V's death.

2.5.6.2 Naturally occurring interventions

The accepted principle in relation to naturally occurring events is illustrated by the examples given by the academic Perkins:³¹⁷

if one man knocks down another and goes away leaving his victim not seriously hurt^[318] but unconscious, on the floor of a building in which the assault occurred, and before the victim recovers ³¹³ (1908) 21 Cox CC 692. ³¹⁴ [1975] 1 WLR 1411.

³¹⁵ See p 65; Russell, 53–60, where the cases are set out; Williams, CLGP, 65; Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 333.

³¹⁶ This paragraph was cited by the court in Le Brun (1991) 94 Cr App R 101.

³¹⁷ (1946) 36 J Cr L & Cr at 393.

³¹⁸ The result would appear to be the same if he were seriously hurt.

consciousness he is killed in the fall of the building which is shaken down by a sudden earthquake, this is not homicide. The law attributes such a death to the 'Act of God' and not to the assault, even if it may be certain that the deceased would not have been in the building at the time of the earthquake, had he not been rendered unconscious. The blow was the occasion of the man's being there, but the blow was not the cause of the earthquake, nor was the deceased left in a position of obvious danger. On the other hand if the blow had been struck on the seashore, and the assailant had left his victim in imminent peril of an incoming tide which drowned him before consciousness returned, it would be homicide.³¹⁹

In the second example, V's being drowned was a 'natural' consequence of D's action—that is, a consequence which might be expected to occur in the normal course of events. It was foreseeable as likely to occur in the normal course of events.³²⁰ There is no break in the chain of causation by this naturally occurring intervening act and D remains liable for the result if the prosecution have established factual and legal causation as discussed earlier. In contrast, in the first example, V's being killed by the falling building was an abnormal and unforeseeable consequence. The act or event was not the natural consequence of D's act. This is sufficient to break the chain of causation. D may be liable for an attempted murder or some relevant offence against the person.

2.5.6.3 Third party interventions

Several categories of actor need to be considered.

Innocent agent

Where D knowingly employs an innocent agent³²¹—for example, a person who is under the age of criminal responsibility, or insane or merely someone without mens rea—to commit an offence, D, in law, causes the result, though the immediate causer is the innocent agent.

Involuntariness

A truly involuntary act clearly does not break the chain: D so startles E that E involuntarily drops a weight he is carrying which causes damage to V's property. There is no true intervening 'act' and D has caused the damage.

Justified and excused responses to D's act

The principles applicable to involuntary actors have been extended beyond innocent agency, and beyond what might naturally be regarded as 'involuntariness'. It is clear that human intervention, where it consists in a foreseeable act instinctively done for the purposes of self-preservation, or in the execution of a legal duty, does not break the chain of causation. In the case of Pagett,³²² D, to resist lawful arrest, held a girl in front of him as a shield and shot at armed police officers. The police 'instinctively'³²³ fired back and killed the girl. D was held to have caused her death and to be guilty of manslaughter.³²⁴ Though the court regarded the officer's instinctive act as 'involuntary', they also held that neither a reasonable act of self-defence nor an act done in the execution of a duty to prevent crime or arrest an offender, ³¹⁹ cf Hallett [1969] SASR 141, where the court followed this passage in relation to similar facts.

³²⁰ The courts use these terms interchangeably, but there is a difference. Not all naturally occurring events are foreseeable. In Empress Car, Lord Hoffmann used the term 'extraordinary' events rather than unforeseeable events in this context.

³²¹ See p 182.

³²² (1983) 76 Cr App R 279, [1983] Crim LR 393.

³²³ Is not the purpose of firearms training to avoid acts of an 'instinctive' nature such as this?

³²⁴ Since the jury acquitted of murder, it must be taken that they were not satisfied D had the necessary mens rea as was then defined in Hyam [1975] AC 55, [1974] Crim LR 365—that he knew it was highly probable that the girl would suffer death or grievous bodily harm.

using such force as is reasonable in the circumstances, will break the chain of causation. It is not clear that such acts of self-defence or in the prevention of crime are necessarily in the same class as a truly 'involuntary' act. Moreover, it cannot be 'reasonable' for anyone intentionally to kill V, an innocent person, in order to save his own life³²⁵ or to arrest X; and whether it is reasonable for him to take a risk of killing V must be doubtful. *Page*tt does not deal with the case where the officer's intervening act is unlawful. If it is, it does not necessarily follow that D's act is not a cause of death. There may be two unlawful causes.

The same principles should apply in determining whether in a *Page*tt-like case the killing of an innocent bystander, or another policeman, by police bullets should be taken to be caused by D. It is obvious that in such a case the police firearms officer causes death³²⁶ but, if the officer's shot was a reasonable act of self-defence then he has no liability; as far as the officer is concerned he has not unlawfully caused a death.³²⁷

Third party act which is not free, deliberate, informed, but is reasonably foreseeable

If the third party human intervention is not a free, deliberate and informed one, but is reasonably foreseeable, the third party will not break the chain and D will have caused the result.³²⁸ In Girdler,³²⁹ D had driven dangerously. D shunted the car driven by V into the path of oncoming traffic. V's car was avoided by most oncoming traffic but not by C. She drove into V killing him and herself. D was charged with causing both their deaths by dangerous driving. The Court of Appeal quashed the convictions after concluding that the trial judge's direction did not give sufficient assistance to the jury. The court concluded that if the immediate cause of the death of V was the 'free, deliberate, and informed' intervention of C then the chain of causation would be broken, but that there were problems in applying that test in this case. C's driving which led to the collision with V could not readily be described as falling within that category even if her driving was careless or dangerous. The court went on to recognize that a test based on reasonable foreseeability was applicable, but doubted whether directing a jury with those words would be apt. The court preferred a simpler expression of the concept:

a jury could be told, in circumstances like the present where the immediate cause of death is a second collision, that if they were sure that the defendant drove dangerously and were sure that his dangerous driving was more than a slight or trifling link to the death(s) then: the defendant will have caused the death(s) only if you are sure that it could sensibly have been anticipated that a fatal collision might occur in the circumstances in which the second collision did occur.

³²⁵ Dudley and Stephens (1884) 14 QBD 273, p 373; Howe [1987] AC 417, [1987] Crim LR 480, HL. Cf commentary on *Page*tt [1983] Crim LR 394.

³²⁶ cf Malcherek [1981] 1 WLR 690, [1981] Crim LR 401, p 78.

³²⁷ The court said that its comments were confined to homicide: but the same principles must surely apply to non-fatal offences.

³²⁸ In Maybin [2012] 2 SCR 30, the Supreme Court of Canada considered what exactly needs to have been reasonably foreseeable and held that, 'it is the general nature of the intervening acts and the accompanying risk of harm that needs to be reasonably foreseeable. Legal causation does not require that the accused must objectively foresee the precise future consequences of their conduct. Nor does it assist in addressing moral culpability to require merely that the risk of some non-trivial bodily harm is reasonably foreseeable. Rather, the intervening acts and the ensuing non-trivial harm must be reasonably foreseeable in the sense that the acts and the harm that actually transpired flowed reasonably from the conduct of the appellants. If so, then the accused's actions may remain a significant contributing cause of death.' At [38]. D's conviction for manslaughter was upheld on the basis that when he got into a fight with V, physical intervention by the bar staff, with its risk of non-trivial harm, was objectively foreseeable. That sufficed to ground D's liability, as the specific details of that intervention did not need to be foreseen. That a member of the bar staff struck V on the back of the head with significant force was therefore insufficient to break the chain of causation.

³²⁹ [2009] EWCA Crim 2666.

Third party voluntary actors

If the intervening event between D's conduct and V's death comprises the conduct of a third party acting in a 'fully voluntary' manner, the position should be straightforward. As Glanville Williams put it:

What a person does (if he has reached adult years, is of sound mind and is not acting under mistake, intimidation or similar pressure) is his own responsibility and is not regarded as having been caused by other people. An intervening act of this kind, therefore, breaks the causal connection that would otherwise have been perceived between previous acts and the forbidden consequence.³³⁰

So, in a homicide case, the 'free, deliberate and informed' intervention by a third party has been held to have the effect of relieving D of criminal responsibility.³³¹ As a matter of principle, this seems right since the voluntary actor has chosen his course of action which leads to a prohibited result, and on orthodox principles of criminal liability he is liable for his voluntary actions which are now the immediate cause.

In Latif,³³² British customs officers in Pakistan intercepted heroin which D intended to import into England. The officers brought it to England where D took delivery. It was held that D was not guilty of being concerned in the fraudulent evasion of the prohibition on importation because this had been effected by the 'free, deliberate and informed act' of the officers, exploiting the situation created by, but not acting in concert with, D. This broke the chain of causation. This can be contrasted with non-intentional intervening acts, for example a failure by an employer to establish a safe system of work may remain a legal cause of death although the fatal accident would not have occurred but for the inadvertent, probably negligent, act of an employee operating the system.³³³

This is a fundamental principle, but one that has given rise to difficulty in two categories of case that can be examined in more detail.

Empress Car

In the Empress Car case,³³⁴ D Ltd was held by the House of Lords to have caused the pollution of a river by bringing oil on to a site and failing to take precautions against the ever-present and foreseeable possibility that someone would release the oil into the river. The escape may have been caused by the fully voluntary act of a stranger, but it was also, in the opinion of the House, caused by the company. In reaching this conclusion, Lord Hoffmann appears to confuse culpability with causation.³³⁵ A householder may be blameworthy for forgetting to lock his door and set the burglar alarm at night but he could hardly be said to have 'caused' an ensuing burglary, though it would not have occurred if he had taken the proper precautions.³³⁶ He may have been a factual cause, but as noted earlier with the example of the dinner invitation, that can never be enough to found liability in law. Lord Hoffmann put the case of a factory owner who carelessly leaves a drum containing highly inflammable vapour in a place where it could easily be accidentally ignited. He thought the owner would have caused an explosion if it occurred when a workman threw in a cigarette butt, believing the drum to be empty, but he would not have done so if a person knowing ³³⁰ TBCL, 391. See, to the same effect, Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 364–365.

³³¹ Page (1983) 76 Cr App R 279, 339, [1983] Crim LR 393.

³³² [1996] 2 Cr App R 92, [1996] Crim LR 414.

³³³ R v DPP, ex p Jones [2000] Crim LR 858, DC.

³³⁴ Environmental Agency (formerly National Rivers Authority) v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1998] 1 All ER 481, HL.

³³⁵ See his example of the irate wife at [1998] 1 All ER 487a–c.

³³⁶ As we saw earlier, it may be accurate to describe the householder as a cause where he has a duty to lock up, p 57.

exactly what the drum contained, had thrown in a lighted match. In the former case, the workman's act is not fully voluntary because he is making a fundamental mistake of fact; he is not acting with all the relevant information. In the latter case, the act is fully voluntary – and it appears to be indistinguishable from the actual facts of the Empress Car case. Lord Hoffmann concludes, it is submitted rightly, that, in the latter case, the carelessness of the owner had merely provided the person with an opportunity to do what he did—which appears to be equally true of the Empress Car Co Ltd. In suggesting that the chain of causation would be broken by the trespasser's act if it were an extraordinary one, but not merely by its being a free, voluntary and informed act, his lordship seems to confuse the principles dealing with natural interventions and those with third party human interventions.

The principal authority relied on was that from the law of tort—Lord Hoffmann cited Stansbie v Troman.³³⁷ In that case a decorator, left in charge of a house, went out to buy wallpaper, leaving the door open. He was held liable in negligence for an ensuing theft. Hart and Honoré³³⁸ cite, along with Stansbie v Troman, an American case in which it was held that a railway company would be liable if a girl they put down at nightfall in a dangerous area were raped. That may be true for the law of tort, but clearly, the railway or its officials could not be criminally liable for rape.

Empress ought to be regarded as an aberrant authority. On a charitable view, it might be explained on its own facts by the House of Lords being too heavily influenced by the policy of protecting the environment. In such cases, the original actor has control of the potentially hazardous product and is under a duty to protect against environmental harm. Fortunately, the House of Lords confirmed in *Kennedy (No 2)*³³⁹ that the extreme interpretation of the principles as set down in Empress is applicable in relation to offences of pollution and is not of general application throughout the criminal law. The Court of Appeal decisions which had sought to apply Empress to, for example, manslaughter, were overruled.³⁴⁰

Lord Hoffmann further recognized in Empress that common sense is not a sufficient guide to resolving causation issues, and that legal principles are involved. This is valuable, but the guidance offered may be baffling to the courts. Causation, it appears, is a variable concept. According to Lord Hoffmann, the answer to the causation question requires the court to ascertain the purpose and scope of the rule alleged to have been broken; and 'Not only may there be different answers to questions about causation when attributing responsibility to different people under different rules . . . but there may be different answers when attributing responsibility to different people under the same rule.' This suggests that the principles of causation have, in this narrow category of pollution and environmental offences, become merely a matter of fact to be determined on a case-by-case basis.³⁴¹

In Natural England v Day,³⁴² the Court of Appeal declined the opportunity to address the continued validity of the approach in Empress. The court noted that there were strong arguments for following the Empress Car approach if the issue ever arose on the facts of any properly developed case.

Drug administration cases

The principle that a fully voluntary act breaks the chain of causation was overlooked, ignored and circumvented in a series of cases dealing with drug administration. The problem in these cases is simple to state. V self-injects what turns out to be a fatal overdose of drugs. D has either: supplied the drugs, made up the syringe, assisted by holding the tourniquet for ³³⁷ [1948] 2 KB 48.

³³⁸ See n 330.

³³⁹ [2007] UKHL 38, [2008] Crim LR 222.

³⁴⁰ Finlay [2003] EWCA Crim 3868 was the most striking example.

³⁴¹ This might reflect Lord Hoffmann's preference for issues to be left for jury determination in the criminal trial.

³⁴² [2014] EWCA Crim 2683.

V to find an injection site or otherwise encouraged V's self-injection. In what circumstances is D liable for manslaughter of V? On a charge of unlawful act manslaughter, requiring proof of an unlawful, intentional and dangerous act causing death (see Ch 14), the sticking point is in establishing causation. On orthodox principles of causation, V's free, voluntary, deliberate informed act by self-injecting should break the chain of causation. As Glanville Williams explained:

The new intervening act (novus actus interveniens) of a responsible actor, who had full knowledge of what he is doing, and is not subject to mistake or pressure, will normally operate to relieve the defendant of liability for a further consequence, because it makes the consequence too remote . . . What a person does (if he has reached adult years, is of sound mind and is not acting under mistake, intimidation or other similar pressure) is his own responsibility, and is not regarded as having been caused by other people.³⁴³

The Court of Appeal adopted a confused approach to these cases in Kennedy, Dias, Richards,³⁴⁴ *Rogers*³⁴⁵ and Finlay.³⁴⁶ In Kennedy (No 2),³⁴⁷ the conclusion was that 'if [D] either caused [V] to administer the drug or was acting jointly with the deceased in administering the drug, [D] would be acting in concert with [V] and there would be no breach in the chain of causation'. The jury is entitled to convict if it finds that the actions of D and V are a 'combined operation'. The conclusion was heavily criticized.³⁴⁸ The Court of Appeal certified the following question of general public importance:

When is it appropriate to find someone guilty of manslaughter where that person has been involved in the supply of a class A controlled drug, which is then freely and voluntarily self-administered by the person to whom it was supplied, and the administration of the drug then causes his death?

The House of Lords, in a clear and concise unanimous judgment delivered by Lord Bingham, provided an unequivocal and welcome answer to the certified question. D who supplies drugs for V to self-inject can never be guilty of unlawful act manslaughter if V is a fully informed adult making a voluntary decision to self-inject. The House emphasized that the criminal law generally assumed the existence of free will; a defendant was not to be treated as causing an adult of sound mind to act in a certain way if the latter made a voluntary and informed decision to act in that way.³⁴⁹ The heroin was 'freely and voluntarily self-administered' by V who chose to inject himself knowing what he was doing. The House of Lords went further and overruled Rogers,³⁵⁰ where D had provided the drugs for V and had held ³⁴³ TBCL, 391.

³⁴⁴ [2002] EWCA Crim 3175.

³⁴⁵ [2003] EWCA Crim 945, [2003] Crim LR 555.

³⁴⁶ [2003] EWCA Crim 3868.

³⁴⁷ [2005] EWCA Crim 685.

³⁴⁸ See D Ormerod and R Fortson, 'Drug Suppliers as Manslaughterers (Again)' [2005] Crim LR 819. For a defence of manslaughter charges in this scenario and proposals for a specific offence to achieve that, see T Jones, 'Causation, Homicide and the Supply of Drugs' (2006) 26 LS 139, and see L Cherkassky (2008) 72 J Crim L 387.

³⁴⁹ The Supreme Court endorsed the principle enunciated in Kennedy (No 2) in Hughes [2013] UKSC 56, [2014] Crim LR 234. In that case, however, it was held that the principle stated by the House of Lords was not applicable. The Supreme Court held that the fact that V drove whilst under the influence of drugs did not break the chain of causation connecting D's driving to V's death. The Supreme Court distinguished Kennedy (No 2) in Hughes on the basis that V did not deliberately set out to kill himself. At first glance this may seem confusing, as the victim in Kennedy (No 2) did not set out to kill himself either. As a number of commentators have explained, however, the basis for distinguishing the two cases lies in the fact that Kennedy (No 2) concerned liability for unlawful act manslaughter. The issue in that case was whether D caused V to inject heroin, whereas the issue in Hughes was whether D's driving caused V's death. See Ormerod [2014] Crim LR 234; AP Simester and GR Sullivan (2014) 73 CLJ 14. Norrie suggests that a dangerous and thoughtless act can break the chain of causation and questions whether the Supreme Court ought to have distinguished Kennedy (No 2). See A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) Ch 7 fn 13.

³⁵⁰ [2003] EWCA Crim 945, [2003] Crim LR 555.

the tourniquet for V as V freely and voluntarily injected himself with what turned out to be a lethal dose of heroin.³⁵¹ The House also overruled Finlay,³⁵² where the Court of Appeal held that the question of whether V's act broke the chain of causation was one of fact for the jury and, following Empress, involved the assessment of whether V's act was extraordinary. Norrie argues that while it may be right from a moral, political and policy point of view to restrict the scope of causation based on the principle enunciated in Kennedy (No 2), he questions whether the principle is as compelling as Lord Bingham suggests.³⁵³ When presented with a loaded syringe, Norrie suggests that it is reasonable to expect a drug addict to inject and questions whether the idea of joint, concerted action is really so implausible. He suggests that there are defensible moral grounds for culpability in drug supply cases. He states that these conflict with the idea that V's final act of pushing the plunger represents an instance of irreducible human agency. Depending upon how one contextualizes or decontextualizes this final act, Norrie argues that the outcome of Kennedy (No 2) could have gone either way. Norrie's ultimate point is that the principle Lord Bingham placed such reliance upon is malleable and he suggests that it may have been deployed to achieve moral and policy outcomes of which the House of Lords approved. It is submitted that while there is merit in much of what Norrie claims, the decision in Kennedy (No 2) is nevertheless a welcome one for its reaffirmation of the orthodox approach to causation.

In Burgess,³⁵⁴ the Court of Appeal subsequently suggested that had the matter fallen for consideration (on the facts D had pleaded on a basis that could not stand in light of Kennedy), D raising the vein for V to self-inject would suffice for a manslaughter conviction. It was held that 'if a defendant may be convicted on the basis that the fatal dose was jointly administered then it follows that he is not automatically entitled to be acquitted if the deceased rather than the defendant physically operated the plunger'.³⁵⁵ There is obviously a difficult borderline between contributory acts which might properly be regarded as administering a noxious thing and acts which might not. The evidence is likely to be patchy—one participant is dead and the other, the defendant, commonly heavily intoxicated. Burgess might therefore serve as an example falling just the other side of the line from Rogers. Whether the necessary proximity existed between the actions of D and V is for the jury to determine. Liability for manslaughter will exist where D has provided the drugs to V whose act of self-administration was not free and voluntary and probably also where V is a child.

The House of Lords in Kennedy (No 2) emphasized that nothing it had said cast doubt on liability for gross negligence manslaughter in such cases and the Court of Appeal in *Evans*³⁵⁶ has confirmed that convictions for that offence can be secured although not for supply alone.³⁵⁷

2.5.6.4 Medical interventions

Largely for reasons of policy, the courts have adopted a particularly strict approach in cases where the alleged break in the chain of causation involves the conduct³⁵⁸ of medical professionals. These are third parties who are intervening in a fully informed manner (although ³⁵¹ It is submitted that there will be few of the imaginable 'factual scenarios', aside from where D injects V, in which D can be said to be administering.

³⁵² [2003] EWCA Crim 3868. D was found to have 'caused to be administered'.

³⁵³ A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 183–185.

³⁵⁴ [2008] EWCA Crim 516. See Hughes (2008) 72 J Crim L 516. See also Keen [2008] EWCA Crim 1000.

³⁵⁵ At [12]. ³⁵⁶ [2009] EWCA Crim 650, [2009] Crim LR 661.

³⁵⁷ See p 586 for discussion and Ch 14.

³⁵⁸ Although usually an act, it can be an omission to act, McKechnie (1992) 94 Cr App R 51, [1992] Crim LR 194.

not fully voluntarily since they are under a duty to act³⁵⁹), but whose conduct is generally insufficient to break the chain of causation in this context.

Before the advent of a rigorous science of forensic pathology, it was less easy to establish causes of death. The nineteenth-century cases held that, where the immediate cause of death was the medical treatment received by V consequent upon his injury by D, D was guilty of homicide, whether the treatment was proper or improper, negligent or not. If the treatment was given bona fide by competent medical officers, evidence was not admissible to show that it was improper or unskilful. In the earlier cases, this rule was applied only where the wound was dangerous to life. Later, and logically, it was extended to less serious injuries. Those cases must now be regarded in the light of the modern decisions in Jordan,³⁶⁰ *Smith*³⁶¹ and Cheshire.³⁶²

In Jordan, D stabbed V who was admitted to hospital and died eight days later. At the trial 'it did not occur to the prosecution, the defence, the judge or the jury that there could be any doubt but that the stab caused death'.³⁶³ In the Court of Criminal Appeal, the fresh evidence of two doctors was allowed to the effect that, in their opinion, death had not been caused by the stab wound, which was mainly healed at the time of the death. Rather, their view was that it was caused by the reaction to large quantities of liquid and to a drug called terramycin which had been administered with a view to preventing infection despite the deceased man having already shown he was intolerant to that drug. This treatment, according to the evidence, was 'palpably wrong'. The court quashed the conviction, holding that if the jury had heard this evidence they would have felt precluded from saying that they were satisfied that the death was caused by the stab wound.

The case has been interpreted by Glanville Williams³⁶⁴ as one where the medical treatment was grossly negligent, but he argues³⁶⁵ that any degree of negligence which would be recognized by the civil courts should be enough. The court did not say in express terms that there was evidence of negligence, gross or otherwise, though it may reasonably be inferred that 'palpably wrong' treatment is negligent. While anxiously disclaiming any intention of setting a precedent³⁶⁶ they stated the basis of their decision in even broader terms. They were 'disposed to accept it as law that death resulting from any normal treatment employed to deal with a [criminal] injury may be regarded as caused by the [criminal] injury'; but it was 'sufficient to point out here that this was not normal treatment'. Surely, treatment that is 'not normal' is not necessarily negligent, even in the civil law?³⁶⁷ The case gave rise to some concern in the medical profession and it was predicted³⁶⁸ that the result of it would be that if, in future, the victim of a homicidal assault died as a result of the medical treatment instituted to save his life, it would be considered homicide by the assailant only if the treatment was 'normal'.

Jordan was distinguished by the court in *Smith*³⁶⁹ and by the Court of Appeal in *Blaue*³⁷⁰ as 'a very particular case depending upon its exact facts'.

³⁵⁹ As Wilson points out, 'doctors who have emergency surgery thrust upon them cannot be expected to get it right all the time', Central Issues, 181.

³⁶⁰ (1956) 40 Cr App R 152. For an historical account, see D Ibbetson, 'R v Jordan' in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017).

³⁶¹ [1959] 2 QB 35. Followed in Gowans [2003] EWCA Crim 3935.

³⁶² [1991] 3 All ER 670, [1991] Crim LR 709.

³⁶³ See (1956) 40 Cr App R 152 at 155.

³⁶⁴ [1957] Crim LR at 430. ³⁶⁵ ibid, 513.

³⁶⁶ But no court has the right to preclude future courts from considering the effects of its decisions.

³⁶⁷ See Bolam v Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582 and Bolitho v City and Hackney HA [1998] AC 232 and the discussion in E Peel and J Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) Ch 5.

³⁶⁸ By Camps and Havard [1957] Crim LR 576 at 582–583.

³⁶⁹ [1959] 2 QB 35 at 43.

³⁷⁰ [1975] 3 All ER 446. Likewise in Evans and Gardiner (No 2) [1976] VR 523 at 531.

In Smith,³⁷¹ in the course of a fight between soldiers of different regiments, D stabbed V twice with a bayonet. One of V's comrades, trying to carry V to the medical reception station, twice tripped and dropped him. At the reception station the medical officer, who was trying to cope with a number of other cases, did not realize that one of the wounds had pierced a lung and caused haemorrhage. He gave V treatment which, in the light of the information regarding V's condition available at the time of the trial, was 'thoroughly bad and might well have affected his chances of recovery'. D's conviction for murder was upheld and counsel's argument that the court must be satisfied that the treatment was normal, and that this was abnormal, was brushed aside:

if at the time of death the original wound is still an operating cause and a substantial cause, then the death can properly be said to be the result of the wound, albeit that some other cause of death is also operating. Only if it can be said that the original wounding is merely the setting in which another cause operates can it be said that the death does not result from the wound. Putting it in another way, only if the second cause is so overwhelming as to make the original wound merely part of the history can it be said that death does not flow from the wound.³⁷²

In Malcherek,³⁷³ the court thought that if a choice had to be made between Jordan and Smith, Smith was to be preferred; but they did not believe it was necessary to choose. In Blaue, Jordan was thought to be 'probably rightly decided on its facts'. It is submitted that this is so. Smith is distinguishable. Jordan was a case where a jury might have found, in the light of the new evidence, that the wound was, or may have been, merely the setting in which medical treatment caused death—as if a nurse had, with gross negligence, administered a deadly poison in mistake for a sleeping pill or, as in a Kentucky case, Bush v Commonwealth,³⁷⁴ the medical officer attending V inadvertently infected him with scarlet fever and he died of that. None of these is an act which might be expected to occur in the ordinary course of events and they free D from liability. But, if the injured V is receiving proper and skilful medical attention and he dies from the treatment or the operation, D will be liable.

In Cheshire,³⁷⁵ the bullet wounds which D inflicted upon V had ceased to be a threat to life and there was evidence that V's death was caused by the tracheotomy performed and negligently treated by the doctors so that it narrowed his windpipe and caused asphyxiation. The Court of Appeal held that the judge had misdirected the jury by telling them that only recklessness on the part of the doctors would break the chain of causation but upheld the conviction, asserting that 'the rare complication . . . was a direct consequence of the appellant's acts, which remained a significant cause of his death'. The test proposed by the court is not easy to apply:

Even though negligence in the treatment of the victim was the immediate cause of his death, the jury should not regard it as excluding the responsibility of the accused unless the negligent treatment was so independent of his acts, and in itself so potent in causing death, that they regard the contribution made by his acts as insignificant.

It is difficult to know what 'so independent' and 'so potent' mean. In all these cases, D's act caused V to undergo the treatment and if that renders it 'dependent', D would be taken to have caused death, however outlandish the treatment; but it is clear that this is not intended. There is a similar problem with 'potent'. Suppose that the tracheotomy would have caused death even if the wound had been completely healed which on the facts is not entirely ³⁷¹ [1959] 2 QB 35 at 43.

³⁷² Per Lord Parker CJ [1959] 2 QB 35 at 42–43. The passage was applied in Gowans, n 361.

³⁷³ [1981] 2 All ER 422, [1981] Crim LR 401.

³⁷⁴ 78 Ky 268 (1880) (Kentucky Court of Appeals).

³⁷⁵ [1991] 3 All ER 670, [1991] Crim LR 709.

clear.³⁷⁶ No greater potency can then be imagined; but it is unlikely that the court would regard D as not having caused death. The wound would not have been an operating and substantial cause but the ultimate question is whether D's act was a cause and it is clear that it might be, even if the wound was not. The problem could well surface if a victim who has been hospitalized due to a wound inflicted by D contracts MRSA in an unclean hospital.

It is submitted that the following propositions³⁷⁷ at present represent the law.

- (1) Medical evidence is admissible to show that the medical treatment of an injury was the cause of death and that the injury itself was not.³⁷⁸ This is so whether or not the injury is life-threatening. The conflict of medical evidence may present the jury with a difficult decision as to the potency of the medical intervention.³⁷⁹ Juries will need careful guidance on such issues.³⁸⁰
- (2) If an injury inflicted by D was an operating and substantial cause of death, D is guilty of homicide, however badly the injury was treated.³⁸¹
- (3) If an injury inflicted by D was not an operating and substantial cause of death (eg it was effectively healed) but V was killed by, for example, the inadvertent administration of deadly poison by a nurse, the wrongful administration of a drug or the ill-treatment of a tracheotomy, D may or may not be guilty of homicide. The test we must now apply is the Cheshire independence/potency test. A better test, it is submitted, would be whether the treatment, or the manner of administering it, was so extraordinary as to be unforeseeable—which may be much the same thing as asking whether it was grossly negligent.

Jordan and Cheshire were cases where the medical treatment, not the wound, may have been the cause of death. The same principle applies where the injury prevents medical treatment for an independent condition which would have saved V's life: McKechnie,³⁸² where the injuries inflicted by D precluded medical treatment for the duodenal ulcer which killed V. Only an 'extraordinary and unusual' medical decision that the life-saving treatment was not possible would have broken the chain of causation.

It is important to keep in mind that where the question at D's trial is whether the medical professional has broken the chain of causation, the medical professional is not on trial. In Malcherek,³⁸³ D inflicted upon V injuries which resulted in brain damage. She was put on a life-support machine. Some days later, after carrying out five of the six tests³⁸⁴ for brainstem death prescribed by the Royal Colleges, doctors disconnected the machine and half an hour later she was pronounced dead. The judge withdrew the question of causation from the jury, ruling that there was no evidence on which they could decide that D did not cause V's death.

³⁷⁶ Indeed, according to the Court of Appeal (at 678) the judge directed the jury that the prosecution must prove that 'the bullets were one operative and substantial cause of death'; but the bullets (unless they were still in V's body) could not be an operating cause, if that is what is meant, in the sense that a wound might be.

³⁷⁷ Approved in Dear [1996] Crim LR 595.

³⁷⁸ Jordan must be authority for this at least. Moreover, at the trial in Smith, Dr Camps gave evidence that, with proper treatment, V's chances of recovery were as high as 75 per cent.

³⁷⁹ See eg Gowans [2003] EWCA Crim 3935 where V contracted fatal septicaemia in hospital.

³⁸⁰ Suratan [2004] EWCA Crim 1246.

³⁸¹ But cf Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 361, discussing Blaue, suppose that V had called for a blood transfusion and the doctor had refused because he wanted to play golf, whereupon V bled to death. They argue that death would have been 'caused by the doctor's callousness, not the original wound'. Surely, it would have been caused by both. The wound would certainly have been an operating and substantial cause.

³⁸² [1992] 94 Cr App R 51, [1992] Crim LR 194.

³⁸³ [1981] 1 WLR 690, [1981] Crim LR 401. The appeal of Steel, heard at the same time, was materially the same.

³⁸⁴ There were reasons for not applying the sixth test.

On appeal, it was argued that there was evidence on which the jury could have found that the doctors caused death by switching off the machine. The appeal was dismissed. There was no doubt that the injury inflicted by D was an operating and substantial cause of death. Whether or not the doctors were also a cause of death was immaterial. They were not on trial;³⁸⁵ D was. It was enough that a continuing and substantial cause of V's death was the injury inflicted by D.

2.5.6.5 Victim's conduct breaking the chain of causation

General principle (1): D takes his victim as found

It is a well-established principle in civil law that the defendant takes the victim of his wrongdoing as he finds him—with all V's subsisting weaknesses that might exacerbate the injury resulting from D's act, as where D pricks a haemophiliac with a pin, or slaps the head of a person with an 'egg-shell' skull. According to Blaue,³⁸⁶ in the criminal law as in the civil, the defendant must 'take his victim as he finds him'.

If the principle is restricted to taking V as found in physical terms, little difficulty arises. It seems unnatural to describe V's body's 'response' to D's act as an intervening 'act' between D's infliction of injury and V's death. It is correct, therefore, that D takes V as he finds him with all V's subsisting physical conditions being taken into account.³⁸⁷ However, controversially, the court in Blaue held that the principle applies so that D takes the victim as found in a more holistic sense—taking the victim's mind as well as his body as found.

In Blaue, D stabbed V, a young girl, and pierced her lung. She was told that she would die if she did not have a blood transfusion. Being a Jehovah's Witness, she refused on religious grounds. She died from the bleeding caused by the wound. D was convicted of manslaughter and argued that V's refusal to have a blood transfusion, being unreasonable, had broken the chain of causation. It was held that the judge had rightly instructed the jury that the wound was a cause of death. Lawton LJ said:³⁸⁸

It has long been the policy of the law that those who use violence on other people must take their victims as they find them. This in our judgment means the whole man, not just the physical man. It does not lie in the mouth of the assailant to say that his victim's religious beliefs which inhibited him from accepting certain kinds of treatment were unreasonable. The question for decision is what caused the death. The answer is a stab wound.

In this case, the wound was 'an operating cause and a substantial cause', so the dictum was unnecessary to the decision. It is unclear whether the court would take the same approach if V had not previously held the religious belief, but had adopted it to spite D (an unlikely scenario).³⁸⁹

The Blaue principle, if valid, would impose liability upon D for unforeseeable intervening events causing death and is probably confined to acts or omissions by the victim in person. If the parents of a rape victim were to kill their daughter on the ground that their religion ³⁸⁵ The court remarked, obiter, that they thought the suggestion that the doctors had caused the death 'bizarre'—they had done their skilful best to save life, but failed and so discontinued treatment. The policy dimension to causation in homicide where medical negligence is alleged is obvious.

³⁸⁶ [1975] 3 All ER 446, [1975] Crim LR 648 and commentary. Smithers (1976) 34 CCC (2d) 427 (Sup Ct of Canada) is to the same effect. It was immaterial that death was caused in part by malfunctioning epiglottis, where a kick was a contributing cause, outside the de minimis range.

³⁸⁷ See eg Masters [2007] EWCA Crim 142, D liable for murder where V had deep vein thrombosis which hastened death and would have killed her soon anyway.

³⁸⁸ [1975] 3 All ER 446, 450.

³⁸⁹ On advance decisions to refuse life-sustaining treatment, see now Mental Capacity Act 2005, s 25.

required them to do so, it is thought that D would not be liable for the death. If, however, in Blaue, V had been too young to make a decision about a blood transfusion and her parents had succeeded on religious grounds in preventing a transfusion being given, it is thought that the wound would have remained an operating and substantial cause, so D would still have been liable. The parents might also have been guilty of some homicide offence.

Blaue followed *Holland*³⁹⁰ in which D waylaid and assaulted V, cutting him severely across one of his fingers with an iron instrument. V refused to follow the surgeon's advice to have the finger amputated, although he was told that if he did not his life would be in great danger. The wound caused lockjaw, the finger was then amputated, but it was too late and V died of lockjaw. The surgeon's evidence was that if the finger had been amputated at first, V's life could probably have been saved. Maule J told the jury that it made no difference whether the wound was in its own nature instantly mortal, or whether it became the cause of death by reason of the deceased not having adopted the best mode of treatment. The question was whether, in the end, the wound inflicted by the prisoner was the real cause of death. The argument³⁹¹ that medical science has advanced greatly since 1841 and that a refusal to undergo medical treatment, reasonable then, would be unreasonable now, did not impress the court in Blaue. Whether V's conduct was reasonable or not was irrelevant.

The principle stated by the court in Blaue, if valid, is capable of wider application. Given that D would be liable for wounding or attempted murder, it is arguable that the principle can operate unduly harshly, but the same harshness would apply where the victim has an egg-shell skull, and that rule is not commonly criticized. The true force of the criticisms levelled against the decision is perhaps against the emphasis the law places on the result (death) rather than the blameworthiness of the life-threatening conduct (unlawful wounding).³⁹²

(2) Self-neglect by the victim

The common law rule is that neglect or maltreatment by the injured person of himself does not exempt D from liability for his ultimate death. In Wall's case,³⁹³ where the former Governor of Goree was convicted³⁹⁴ of the murder of a man by ordering the illegal infliction on him of a flogging of 800 lashes, there was evidence that V had aggravated his condition by drinking spirits. MacDonald LCB told the jury:³⁹⁵ there is no apology for a man if he puts another in so dangerous and hazardous a situation by his treatment of him, that some degree of unskilfulness and mistaken treatment of himself may possibly accelerate the fatal catastrophe. One man is not at liberty to put another into such perilous circumstances as these, and to make it depend upon his own prudence, knowledge, skill or experience what may hurry on or complete that catastrophe, or on the other hand may render him service.

In any event, the drink might have been regarded as a merely de minimis cause.

(3) Subsequent conduct of the victim

A long line of cases has established that D will be held to have caused death or injury by so frightening V that V has jumped from a window or a car or behaved in some other manner dangerous to himself.³⁹⁶ If D's unlawful conduct has prompted the response from V, D will ³⁹⁰ (1841) 2 Mood & R 351. Cf Mubila 1956 (1) SA 31.

³⁹¹ By Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, at 360.

³⁹² See the discussion, p 422 and A Ashworth, 'Belief Intent and Criminal Liability' in J Eekelaar and J Bell (eds), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence; 'Taking the Consequences' in Shute, Gardner and Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law and 'Defining Offences Without Harm' in Criminal Law Essays.

³⁹³ (1802) 28 State Tr 51.

³⁹⁴ Twenty years after the event.

³⁹⁵ At 145.

³⁹⁶ Pitts (1842) Car & M 284; Halliday (1889) 61 LT 701; Curley (1909) 2 Cr App R 96 at 109; Lewis [1970] Crim LR 647; Mackie [1973] Crim LR 54 (Cusack J); Boswell [1973] Crim LR 307 (Judge Gower); Daley (1979) 69 Cr App R 39, [1979] Crim LR 182.

remain liable if V's reaction was within the range of responses which might be expected from a victim in his situation.³⁹⁷ If the reaction was 'so daft as to make it [V's] own voluntary act' the chain of causation is broken. Where V's act is daft it will not be reasonably foreseeable so it seems right that D may be absolved of criminal liability. The range of responses to be expected will, of course, vary according to the age and perhaps the sex of the victim.³⁹⁸ This approach was followed in Lewis.³⁹⁹ L chased V into the road following an argument and V was knocked down by an oncoming car. The Court of Appeal held, dismissing the appeal, that in cases of death during flight from an unlawful act it had to be shown that there was cause and effect; that is, but for the unlawful act, flight and therefore death would not have taken place. In the flight cases V is seeking to avoid further harm.

What of the position where V inflicts greater harm in response to that inflicted by D already and which remains a substantial and operative cause? It is submitted that if D's act is a continuing and operative cause, D remains liable even if the victim is a contributory cause of the final result (eg death in a murder case).

In People v Lewis,⁴⁰⁰ V, having received a mortal gunshot wound from which he would have died within the hour, cut his throat and died within five minutes. D was held liable for manslaughter on the ground that the original wound was an operating cause. 'Here, when the throat was cut, [V] was not merely languishing from a mortal wound; he was actually dying; and after the throat was cut he continued to languish from both wounds. Drop by drop the life current went out from both wounds, and at the very instant of death the gunshot wound was contributing to the event.'⁴⁰¹ The application of this principle would have provided a different answer if V had blown his brains out and died instantly, for then the bleeding from the original wound would not have been an operating cause. The conviction could then have been upheld only by applying a different principle—that the first act provided a reason for the second⁴⁰²—and the court would indeed have decided the case on that ground if they had been satisfied that the first act was the cause of the second; but they thought that V's suicide might have been out of remorse or a desire to shield D.

If the victim of a rape were to be so traumatized as to commit suicide by shooting herself it might be argued that it was the bullet that caused the death and not the rape. Certainly the rape is not 'an operating and substantial cause' in the same sense as the wound in Blaue; depending upon the circumstances, the response may be found by the jury not to be daft and unforeseeable and D may therefore be guilty. This may be the effect of *Dear*⁴⁰³ where D's conviction for murder was upheld, even though V may have intentionally caused his own death by aggravating the wounds inflicted on him by D. If V would not have killed himself but for those injuries, D caused his death. It would have been different if V had so acted only for some reason unconnected with D's attack on him—for example, shame at his own disgraceful conduct (paedophilia) which had led D to attack him. The decision is, perhaps, not quite conclusive of the rape victim/suicide case: the wounds as well as V's acts may have been the physical cause of death, whereas in the rape case the bullet is the sole physical cause of death. In Dear, it was apparently regarded as immaterial that V's conduct was unforeseeable. In this respect, the decision is not easily reconcilable with the line of authority establishing that V's 'daft' conduct will break the chain of causation.

³⁹⁷ Williams and Davies (1991) 95 Cr App R 1, [1992] Crim LR 198; Corbett [1996] Crim LR 594. Cf Roberts (1971) 56 Cr App R 95 at 102, [1972] Crim LR 27.

³⁹⁸ Presumably, following Blaue, religions, no matter how esoteric, cannot be regarded as 'daft'. What of an irrational but entrenched fear of hospitals?

³⁹⁹ [2010] EWCA Crim 151. ⁴⁰⁰ 124 Cal 551 (1899) (Sup Ct of California).

⁴⁰¹ But was the contribution of the gunshot wound substantial or de minimis (slight or trifling)? Cf the example given by Perkins, p 69 and Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 243.

⁴⁰² Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 244.

⁴⁰³ [1996] Crim LR 595.

In Dhaliwal,⁴⁰⁴ the accused had struck his partner a minor blow on the forehead and she had then committed suicide. This was against a lengthy background of domestic abuse amounting to psychological, but not psychiatric, injury by D. The charge of manslaughter was dismissed since the Crown relied on the history of abuse as founding an unlawful and dangerous act. The trial judge held that this was incapable of amounting to actual bodily harm absent psychiatric injury and the Court of Appeal agreed.⁴⁰⁵ In an obiter dictum, the Court of Appeal left open the possibility that a manslaughter conviction might be available: 'where a decision to commit suicide has been triggered by a physical assault which represents the culmination of a course of abusive conduct, it would be possible . . . to argue that the final assault played a significant part in causing the victim's death'. In terms of causation, even if D's conduct was treated as a sufficient unlawful and dangerous act, could it ever be a sufficient cause in law? There may be little doubt that in fact it operated as a cause of the suicide, but does V's action in choosing to commit suicide break the chain of causation?

Can D ever be liable for homicide where V has committed suicide and D's act is not at that moment a continuing and operative cause of death? It has been argued that in such cases a jury might be willing to conclude that suicide was not outside the range of reasonable responses to be expected of someone in V's position, particularly where the jury were made aware of the history of abuse.⁴⁰⁶ It should be noted that in none of the reported 'flight' cases does it appear that the victims have chosen to commit suicide; rather, they have behaved in a dangerous fashion, being aware that their choice of escape may expose them to danger of injury or death.

In *W*⁴⁰⁷ the Court of Appeal considered this issue directly. D was alleged to have inflicted catastrophic injuries upon V which left him severely disfigured, permanently paralysed, and in a state of unbearable physical and psychological suffering. V travelled to his native Belgium to be with his family. In Belgium euthanasia is lawful. V was euthanized by doctors in accordance with Belgian law. The issue for the Court of Appeal was whether the conduct of the defendant was a legally sufficient cause of V's death, or whether his actions in asking for euthanasia combined with the actions of the Belgian doctors in complying with his request broke the chain of causation between D's conduct and his death. After a comprehensive review of the applicable authorities the Court of Appeal held,⁴⁰⁸ rightly it is submitted, that it was open to the jury to conclude that V's request to his doctors and the act of euthanasia carried out in accordance with his wishes were not discrete acts or events independent of the defendant's conduct. It was open to the jury to conclude that these acts were not voluntary, as they were not the product of the sort of free and unfettered volition to which Lord Bingham referred in Kennedy (No 2). It was held that a jury could find that the acts which led to V's death were the direct response to the injuries inflicted by D and to the circumstances created by them for which she was responsible.⁴⁰⁸

⁴⁰⁴ [2006] EWCA Crim 1139, [2006] Crim LR 923.

⁴⁰⁵ See p 661.

⁴⁰⁶ See further Horder and McGowan [2006] Crim LR 1035.

⁴⁰⁷ [2018] EWCA Crim 690.

⁴⁰⁸ Per Sharp LJ.

2.5.6.6 Intended consequences

It is sometimes said that intended consequences cannot be too remote; that is, that D must always be liable for them. This, however, is an oversimplification,⁴⁰⁹ and is not always accurate because the sine qua non rule remains applicable. Thus, in White,⁴¹⁰ the consequence intended by D—the death of his mother—occurred; but its occurrence—a fatal heart attack—had nothing to do with D's act in administering the poison and would have happened just the same if D had done nothing. Even where the sine qua non rule is satisfied, the consequence, though intended, may be too remote where it occurs as a result of the intervention of some new cause. So in the cases of *Bush*⁴¹¹ and *Jordan*⁴¹² it may be that D intended V's death, and V's death occurred; moreover, in neither case would death have occurred without D's act; but in the one case it was caused by scarlet fever and not by D's bullet, and in the other it was caused by medical treatment and not by D's knife.

Where the death occurs in the manner intended by D, he will be guilty even if the course of events was not what he expected; for example, he shoots at V's head, but the bullet misses, ricochets and kills V by striking him in the back. The case of *Michael*⁴¹³ is perhaps a rather extreme example of this. D's child, V, was in the care of a nurse, X. D, intending to murder the child, delivered to X a large quantity of laudanum, telling her it was a medicine to be administered to V. X did not think the child needed any medicine and left it untouched in her room. In X's absence, one of her children, Y, aged five, took the laudanum and administered a large dose to V who died. All the judges held that the jury were rightly directed that this administration by 'an unconscious agent' was murder. Hart and Honoré⁴¹⁴ criticize the case on the ground that the child was:

not in any sense an agent, conscious or unconscious, of the mother, who intended [X] alone to give the poison to the child; but the decision may be justified on the ground that, in our terminology, the act of the child of five did not negative causal connexion between the prisoner's act and the death.

According to this view, the result would have been different if Y had been, not five, but 15. It does not appear that Y knew, from the labelling of the bottle or otherwise, that this was 'medicine' for V. If she did know this, and acted on that knowledge, then there seems no difficulty in imputing the death to D, whatever Y's age. No such fact being reported, however, the case must be treated as one where Y's intervention was in no way prompted by D's instructions. Thus, if Y had taken the poison herself, her death would have been just as much caused by D's act as was V's in the actual case; but it would require an extension of the decision to hold D guilty in such a case, for Y's death was not an intended consequence.⁴¹⁵ If such an extension is not made, the result is quite arbitrary, for it was pure chance whether Y administered the poison to V, or to herself or another child.

2.5.7. Special instances of causation

There are a few instances of causation which require special mention, by reason of the unsatisfactory state of the authorities.

⁴⁰⁹ But note the rather stronger rejection by some—'slogans like intended consequences are never too remote simply cannot be accepted': C Finkelstein, 'Involuntary Crimes, Voluntarily Committed' in Shute and Simester (eds), Criminal Law Theory, 150.

⁴¹⁰ [1910] 2 KB 124.

⁴¹¹ 78 Ky 268 (1880); p 77.

⁴¹² (1956) 40 Cr App R 152.

⁴¹³ (1840) 9 C & P 356.

⁴¹⁴ Causation in the Law, 337.

⁴¹⁵ But the doctrine of transferred malice (p 122) would support such an extension.

2.5.7.1 Killing by mental suffering or shock

The view of earlier writers was that the law could take no cognizance of a killing caused merely by mental suffering or shock, because ‘no external act of violence was offered, whereof the common law can take notice and secret things belong to God’.⁴¹⁶ Stephen thought that the fear of encouraging prosecutions for witchcraft was the reason for the rule and that it was ‘a bad rule founded on ignorance now dispelled’.⁴¹⁷

Suppose a man were intentionally killed by being kept awake till the nervous irritation of sleeplessness killed him, might not this be murder? Suppose a man kills a sick person intentionally by making a loud noise when sleep gives him a chance of life; or suppose knowing that a man has aneurysm of the heart, his heir rushes into his room and roars in his ear, ‘Your wife is dead!’ intending to kill and killing him, why are not these acts murder? They are no more ‘secret things belonging to God’ than the operation of arsenic.

This view now represents the law. Hale’s proposition was first modified in *Towers*⁴¹⁸ where D violently assaulted a young girl who was holding a four-and-a-half-month-old child in her arms. The girl screamed loudly, so frightening the baby that it cried till it was black in the face. From that day it had convulsions and died a month later. Denman J held that there was evidence to go to the jury of manslaughter. In the case of an adult person, he said that murder could not be committed by using language so strong or violent as to cause that person to die:

mere intimidation, causing a person to die from fright by working upon his fancy, was not murder, but that rule did not apply to a child of such tender years as this:

if the man’s act brought on the convulsions or brought them to a more dangerous extent, so that death would not have resulted otherwise, then it would be manslaughter.⁴¹⁹

This was extended to the case of an adult person by Ridley J in Hayward.⁴²⁰ D, who was in a condition of violent excitement and had expressed his determination to ‘give his wife something’, chased her from the house into the road using violent threats against her. She fell dead. She was suffering from an abnormal heart condition, such that any combination of physical exertion and fright or strong emotion might cause death. Ridley J directed the jury that no proof of actual physical violence was necessary, but that death from fright alone, caused by an illegal act, such as a threat of violence, was enough. D was unaware of V’s condition, and following the general principle outlined earlier, he must take his victim as found. It is irrelevant to the issue of causation whether the fright is one that would have an effect on a reasonable person or only one of exceptional timidity. D’s awareness of the likely effect of his conduct will be a relevant issue in determining his mens rea.

2.5.7.2 Killing by perjury

With the abolition of the death penalty, discussion of D ‘causing’ V’s death by giving false testimony leading to V’s conviction for a capital crime seems now to be redundant. The principles are discussed in the 10th edition of this book, at p 57.

2.5.8 Reform

The Criminal Law Team of the Law Commission produced a Working Paper on causation in 2002. The proposal was to codify the law as follows:

- (1) Subject to subsections (2) to (5), a defendant causes a result which is an element of an offence when—

⁴¹⁶ Hale, 1 PC, 429; and see East, 1 PC, 225.

⁴¹⁷ Stephen, Digest, 217 fn 9.

⁴¹⁸ (1874) 12 Cox CC 530.

⁴¹⁹ ibid, 533.

⁴²⁰ (1908) 21 Cox CC 692.

- (a) he does an act which makes a substantial and operative contribution to its occurrence; or
- (b) he omits to do an act, which he is under a duty to do according to the law relating to the offence, and the failure to do the act makes a substantial and operative contribution to its occurrence.

(2)

- (a) The finders of fact may conclude that a defendant's act or omission did not make a substantial and operative contribution to the occurrence of a result if compared with the voluntary intervention of another person, unless:
 - (i) the defendant is subject to a legal duty to guard against the very harm that the intervention or event causes; and
 - (ii) the intervention was not so extraordinary as to be unforeseeable to a reasonable person in the defendant's position; and
 - (iii) it would have been practicable for the defendant to have taken steps to prevent the intervention.
- (b) The intervention of another person is not voluntary unless it is:
 - (i) free, deliberate and informed; and
 - (ii) performed or undertaken without any physical participation from the defendant.

(3)

- (a) The finders of fact may conclude that a defendant's act or omission did not make a substantial and operative contribution to the occurrence of a result if compared with an unforeseeable natural event;
- (b) A natural event is not unforeseeable unless:
 - (i) the defendant did not foresee it; and
 - (ii) it could not have been foreseen by any reasonable person in the defendant's position.
- (4) A person who procures, assists, or encourages another to cause a result that is an element of an offence does not himself cause that result so as to be guilty of the offence as a principal except when—
 - (a) section 26(1)(c) applies; or
 - (b) the offence itself consists in the procuring, assisting or encouraging another to cause the result.⁴²¹

These were not formal recommendations of the Law Commission and have not been acted upon since.

⁴²¹ This was referred to in Williams [2010] EWCA Crim 2552, [2011] Crim LR 471.

The elements of a crime: mens rea

3.1 Introduction

In the preceding chapter the actus reus or external elements of the offence were examined. This chapter deals with the mens rea or mental fault of the accused.¹ An actus reus is, in the eyes of the law, a ‘bad’ thing. The particular conduct that constitutes the actus reus of a given crime is not necessarily a bad thing in everyone’s eyes or even in the eyes of the majority of people. But the law requires us to accept its legal ‘badness’. Many people think that, in certain circumstances, mercy killing is morally right. In law it is the actus reus of murder, legally very bad indeed.² It follows from the fact that an actus reus is treated in law as a bad thing that an intention to cause it is, in law, a bad intention, a guilty mind. Similarly, consciously taking an unjustified risk of causing an actus reus—that is, being reckless whether the actus reus be caused—is also a bad state of mind, though less so than intentionally causing the actus reus. Inadvertently causing an actus reus by failing to take reasonable care—negligence—may also be regarded as legally blameworthy, though still less than intention or recklessness. Intention, recklessness and negligence imply different degrees of ‘fault’ in the criminal law. This is set out concisely and clearly in the Draft Criminal Code Bill, cl 6, which provides:

‘fault element’; means an element of an offence consisting—

- (a) of a state of mind with which a person acts; or
- (b) of a failure to comply with a standard of conduct; or
- (c) partly of such a state of mind and partly of such a failure...

Most serious crimes and many minor offences require proof that D had the specified blameworthy state of mind; that is, fault element with respect to all the elements of the actus reus. For example, in the offence of assault, D must be shown to have caused V to apprehend immediate unlawful personal violence (the actus reus) and to have intended or been reckless as to whether his conduct would cause V to apprehend immediate unlawful violence. If D intended V to apprehend violence, but not immediate violence, he would be acquitted. The fault element for that part of the actus reus would not have been established.

¹ Theoretical analyses of this vast topic include RA Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability (1990); Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, esp Chs 8 and 9; A Brudner, Punishment and Freedom: A Liberal Theory of Penal Justice (2009) Ch 2; W Chan and AP Simester, ‘Four Functions of Mens Rea’ (2011) 70 CLJ 381; F Stark, ‘It’s Only Words: On Meaning and Mens Rea’ (2013) 72 CLJ 155. For more classical writings (which although largely historical are still pertinent) on the topic, see: JWC Turner, ‘The Mental Element in Crimes at Common Law’, MACL, 195; G Williams, The Mental Element in Crime (1965) and CLGP, in Ch 2; HLA Hart, ‘Negligence, Mens Rea and Criminal Responsibility’ in Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (1961) 29; JC Smith, ‘The Guilty Mind in the Criminal Law’ (1960) 76 LQR 78; A Ashworth, ‘Reason, Logic and Criminal Liability’ (1975) 91 LQR 102; G Williams, ‘Oblique Intention’ (1987) 46 CLJ 417.

² See Inglis [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243 and see Ch 15.

In some offences—which we call ‘offences of strict liability’—some elements of the actus reus do not require proof of fault. For example, where D is charged with rape of a child under 13. The prosecution must establish that D penetrated V’s vagina, anus or mouth with his penis, and that at the time V was under 13. However, in terms of mens rea the prosecution are only required to prove that D intended to penetrate V with his penis. There is no requirement to prove that D knew or was reckless as to V being under 13—liability as to that element of the actus reus relating to age is ‘strict’.³

The traditional term for the state of mind which must be proved, ‘mens rea’, is unfortunately sometimes used by courts to include all degrees of fault, including failure to comply with a standard of conduct—negligence. Frequently the terminology is of no consequence, but it can lead to confusion.⁴ In this book we use ‘mens rea’ to mean the state of mind (intention, recklessness, knowledge, belief, suspicion, wilfulness, malice, etc), required by the particular crime and we use the term ‘negligence’ to describe failures by the defendant to comply with a prescribed standard of conduct irrespective of his personal state of mind. We consider negligence in the next chapter and strict liability in Ch 5.

3.1.1 Subjective and objective fault

There is an ongoing debate between: (a) ‘subjectivists’ who assert that, for serious crimes at least, the mental element should require proof that D has personal awareness of his actions and of the relevant circumstances and consequences comprising the actus reus of the offence; and (b) ‘objectivists’, for whom it is sufficient to prove that the reasonable person would have been aware of the relevant circumstances/consequences comprising the actus reus, irrespective of whether D himself was aware of them. This is, of course, a grossly oversimplistic summary of the competing positions. A more realistic view is that there are shades of subjectivism and objectivism along a spectrum. There are competing claims as to the merits of the approaches, both in terms of their principled foundations and their practical application.⁵ Some subjectivists argue that the requirement of personal awareness on the part of D is crucial since it secures respect for the autonomy of the individual: D is punished where he has chosen to act in a way contrary to law. Objectivists point out that D might also be regarded as sufficiently culpable to deserve criminal punishment where his inadvertence related to a substantial and obvious risk of the proscribed harm, which D had the capacity to be aware of even if he was not actually aware on the occasion in question.

Despite weighty academic opinion that ‘the torch of orthodox subjectivism carried by Glanville Williams and Smith and Hogan and then by the Law Commission should be doused’,⁶ the subjective approach continues to be that favoured by the courts, at least in serious crimes, and this was emphasized in the clearest terms by the highest tribunal. In the landmark case of G⁷ Lord Bingham stated that:

³ G [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818.

⁴ Commentary on Seaboard Offshore Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1993] 1 WLR 1025, [1993] Crim LR 611; affd [1994] 2 All ER 99; Peterssen v RSPCA [1993] Crim LR 852.

⁵ The major proponents of the subjectivist view have been Glanville Williams and Sir John Smith. The subjectivist view has been challenged by prominent academic writers including Horder, APOCL; A Duff, Intention Agency and Criminal Liability (1990); and A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014): see the articles cited later in this chapter. For an excellent account of the positions in the context of manslaughter, see LC 237, Involuntary Manslaughter (1996) Part IV.

⁶ A Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law (5th edn, 2006) 253. See also A Norrie, ‘Between Orthodox Subjectivism and Moral Contextualism’ [2006] Crim LR 486, 487.

⁷ [2003] UKHL 50, [2004] 1 AC 1034, [2004] Crim LR 369.

it is a salutary principle that conviction of serious crime should depend on proof not simply that the defendant caused (by act or omission) an injurious result to another but that his state of mind when so acting was culpable. This, after all, is the meaning of the familiar rule actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. The most obviously culpable state of mind is no doubt an intention to cause the injurious result, but knowing disregard of an appreciated and unacceptable risk of causing an injurious result or a deliberate closing of the mind to such risk would be readily accepted as culpable also. It is clearly blameworthy to take an obvious and significant risk of causing injury to another. But it is not clearly blameworthy to do something involving a risk of injury to another if (for reasons other than self-induced intoxication: R v Majewski [1977] AC 443) one genuinely does not perceive the risk. Such a person may fairly be accused of stupidity or lack of imagination, but neither of those failings should expose him to conviction of serious crime or the risk of punishment.⁸

However, despite this strong endorsement of the subjectivist position from the House of Lords, Parliament has demonstrated a willingness to create serious offences in which the fault element is explicitly objective. Recent examples include many sexual offences in the Sexual Offences Act 2003, the Terrorism Acts; some of the money laundering offences in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA 2002); and offences involving organized crime in the Serious Crime Act 2015.

3.1.2 Mens rea concerns legal not moral guilt

The literal meaning of ‘mens rea’—‘a guilty mind’—is misleading unless it is kept in mind that we are concerned with legal not moral guilt. In some exceptional circumstances the law will treat D as having mens rea though neither D, nor any reasonable person, would regard D’s state of mind as blameworthy.⁹ Mens rea is simply the label for the mental element required by the definition of the particular crime—typically, intention to fulfil the elements of the actus reus of that crime, or recklessness whether they be fulfilled. The word ‘rea’ refers to the criminality of the act, not its moral quality. English courts focus on the accused’s cognitive state—whether he foresaw the risk, etc—rather than on whether he was acting in a morally culpable manner.¹⁰

In Yip Chiu-Cheung,¹¹ D was charged with conspiring with E to export drugs from Hong Kong to Australia. E was an undercover drug-enforcement officer who was called as a prosecution witness and testified that he made the agreement with D and intended, with the authority of his superiors, to carry it out. He was going to take the drugs to Australia to entrap other drug dealers. It takes two conspirators to make a conspiracy and D’s unsuccessful defence was that E was not a conspirator because he lacked mens rea. It was held that E did have the mens rea of conspiracy—that is, an intention to commit the agreed crime. Neither E’s good motives nor the superior orders under which he was acting would have been a defence if he had been charged. Yip was followed in Kingston.¹²

In Kingston,¹³ D, a paedophile, was charged with indecent assault on a 15-year-old boy, V. D and V had both been drugged surreptitiously by P. P knew of D’s tendencies, and he drugged D and V in the hope that D would indecently assault V and that he, P, would be ⁸ Per Lord Bingham at [32].

⁹ Dodman [1998] 2 Cr App R 338, C-MAC, holding that ‘Mens rea does not . . . involve blameworthiness’, citing the 8th edition of this book and disapproving the Manual of Air Force Law (6th edn, 1983) s 69 fn 2.

¹⁰ For a criticism of equating mens rea with culpability, see W Chan and AP Simester, ‘Four Functions of Mens Rea’ (2011) 70 CLJ 381. The authors argue that denoting culpability is merely one of the functions of mens rea.

¹¹ [1995] 1 AC 111, [1994] Crim LR 824.

¹² [1994] 3 WLR 519. See also Hales [2005] EWCA Crim 1118, on the difference between intention and motive.

¹³ ibid.

able to video-record the events so as to blackmail D. D did indeed indecently assault V and P video-recorded the events. The House of Lords held that D had been rightly convicted; simply because blame or moral fault was absent did not mean that the necessary mens rea was also absent. Lord Mustill stated that:

Each offence consists of a prohibited act or omission coupled with whatever state of mind is called for by the statute or rule of the common law which creates the offence. In those offences which are not absolute the state of mind which the prosecution must prove to have underlain the act or omission—the ‘mental element’—will in the majority of cases be such as to attract disapproval. The mental element will then be the mark of what may properly be called a ‘guilty mind’. The professional burglar is guilty in a moral as well as a legal sense; he intends to break into the house to steal, and most would confidently assert that this is wrong. But this will not always be so. In respect of some offences the mind of the defendant, and still less his moral judgment, may not be engaged at all. In others, although a mental activity must be the motive power for the prohibited act or omission the activity may be of such a kind or degree that society at large would not criticize the defendant’s conduct severely or even criticize it at all. Such cases are not uncommon. Yet to assume that contemporary moral judgments affect the criminality of the act, as distinct from the punishment appropriate to the crime once proved, is to be misled by the expression ‘mens rea’, the ambiguity of which has been the subject of complaint for more than a century.¹⁴

The circumstances of these two cases are exceptional. An actus reus generally is, or includes, some very undesirable results—killing, wounding, theft or damage to property, etc—and an intention to cause the actus reus is nearly always a state of mind which ordinary people would regard as blameworthy. Nevertheless, moral blameworthiness is not the legal test.

3.2 Forms of mens rea

It is generally accepted that the different types of mens rea form a hierarchy, with intention and knowledge being the most culpable, followed by recklessness, belief and then by suspicion. There are other specific forms of mens rea arising in the context of individual offences, which it is difficult to fit within this hierarchy. We can now turn to examine each form of mens rea commonly found in English criminal law.

3.2.1 Intention

Numerous offences are defined so as to require proof of ‘intention’ to cause specified results.¹⁵ These commonly include the more serious crimes. It might therefore be expected that the meaning of such a fundamental term would have been settled long ago, but this is not so. The cases are inconsistent, judicial opinion has changed and there is still some measure of uncertainty.¹⁶ We may begin, however, with one well-settled proposition. Everyone agrees that a person intends to cause a result if he acts with the purpose of doing so.¹⁷ If D has resolved to kill V and he fires a loaded gun at him with the object of doing so, he intends to kill. It is immaterial that he is aware that he is a poor shot, that V is nearly out of range and that his chances of success are small. It is sufficient that killing is his object or purpose: that he acts in order to kill.¹⁸ Note that the focus is on D's purpose,¹⁹ not his desire²⁰ or wish as to the consequences. D can intend a result by having that as his purpose without desiring it, as where D kills V with a lethal injection to put him out of his pain, but wishes he did not have to. Note also that the definition of intention is wider than 'premeditation' where that term is used to denote planning or calculated acts. 'Intention' in English law extends beyond such cases to include spontaneous conduct.²¹

¹⁴ At 526.

¹⁵ The literature on this topic is voluminous. Many of the publications are of a philosophical nature. See, inter alia, JC Smith, ‘Intention in Criminal Law’ (1974) 27 CLP 93; Lord Goff, ‘The Mental Element in the Crime of Murder’ (1988) 104 LQR 30; G Williams, ‘The Mens Rea for Murder—Leave it Alone’ (1989) 105 LQR 387; J Buzzard, ‘Intent’ [1978] Crim LR 5 and JC Smith, ‘A Reply’ [1978] Crim LR 14; AR White, Misleading Cases (1991) 47; J Finniss, ‘Bland: Crossing the Rubicon’ (1993) 109 LQR 329; N Lacey, ‘A Clear Concept of Intention’ (1993) 56 MLR 621; Horder, ‘Intention in the Criminal Law—A Rejoinder’ (1995) 58 MLR 678; N Lacey, ‘In(de) terminable Intentions’ (1995) 58 MLR 692; MC Kaveny, ‘Inferring Intention from Foresight’ (2004) 120 LQR 81; I Kugler, Direct and Oblique Intention in the Criminal Law (2002); Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 8; MS Moore, ‘Intention as a Marker of Moral Culpability and Legal Punishability’ in RA Duff and SP Green (eds), Philosophical Foundations of Criminal Law (2011); A Duff, ‘Intention Revisited’ in DJ Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013). See also the discussion in LCCP 177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales (2006) Chs 3 and 4; LC 304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2007); G Coffey, ‘Codifying the Meaning of “Intention” in the Criminal Law’ (2009) 73 J Crim L 394.

One view is that in law 'intention' should be limited to the narrow definition of purposive or direct intention. On this view, a result should never be regarded as intended unless it was the actor's purpose; that is, unless he acted in order to bring about that result. This is often considered to be the ordinary meaning given to the word.²² However, the courts have frequently given the word a wider meaning, sometimes described as 'oblique' (as distinct from 'direct') intention.²³ Under this alternative approach, it may be sufficient that D has foreseen the prohibited result as one which is highly probable, or virtually certain to occur, even if achieving that result is not his purpose.²⁴

3.2.1.1 Current legal position

The cases in which this issue arises almost always involve murder. The mens rea for murder is that D intends to kill or do GBH. The question that recurs is whether D has a sufficient mens rea where he does not have as his purpose that V will be killed or caused GBH by his conduct, but he foresees V's death or GBH as probable, or highly probable or virtually certain to result.

Until relatively recently, the predominant judicial view was that D intended a result if he knew that it was a highly probable (or perhaps merely probable) result of his conduct, although it was not his purpose or object to cause that result. In 1975, Lord Diplock in *Hyam v DPP*²⁵ endorsed this view. A majority of the House in Hyam were certainly of the opinion that this was the law. The actual decision was that foresight of a high probability of GBH was ¹⁶ The fact that the main cases defining intention are all murder cases, with the difficult policy issues that offence entails, exacerbates inconsistency and uncertainty. See also the discussion in Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 232.

¹⁷ A majority of the Supreme Court in Hayes v Willoughby [2013] UKSC 17 held, in the context of s 1(3)(a) of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, that 'purpose' denotes a wholly subjective state of mind.

¹⁸ Duff suggests that this can be ascertained by asking: would D treat his action as a failure if he did not achieve the result? If so, D intended the result. Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability, 61.

¹⁹ See the recognition of this by the Supreme Court in Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [90].

²⁰ The danger of using this term was acknowledged in Hales [2005] EWCA Crim 1118, [28].

²¹ See M Kremnitzer, 'On Premeditation' (1998) Buffalo Crim LR 627. LCCP 177 rejects it as an option owing to difficulties of proof.

²² On the problems of using the ordinary language approach in this context, see Lacey (1993) 56 MLR 621.

²³ cf J Bentham, Principles of Morals and Legislation (Harrison edn, 2007).

²⁴ Williams (1987) 46 CLJ 417. See also A Norrie, 'Oblique Intention and Legal Politics' [1989] Crim LR 793; A Norrie, 'Intention—More Loose Talk' [1990] Crim LR 642; RA Duff, 'The Politics of Intention: A Response to Norrie' [1990] Crim LR 637; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 215–218 and 228–229; Kugler, Direct and Oblique Intention, Ch 1.

²⁵ [1975] AC 55, [1974] Crim LR 365.

a sufficient mens rea for murder, not that such a state of mind necessarily amounted to an intention to cause GBH. In Moloney,²⁶ however, the House held that the mens rea of murder is intention to cause death or GBH so it was essential to determine the meaning of ‘intention’. Moloney must be read in the light of the explanation of it by the House in Hancock and Shankland,²⁷ the Court of Appeal in *Nedrick*²⁸ and by the House in Woollin.²⁹ The effect of these numerous pronouncements from the appellate courts is that the current state of the law (at least in murder) is:

- (1) a result is intended when it is the actor’s purpose to cause it;
- (2) a court or jury may also find that a result is intended, though it is not the actor’s purpose to cause it, when—
 - (a) the result is a virtually certain consequence of his act, and
 - (b) the actor knows that it is a virtually certain consequence.

It seems clear that (1) and (2) are distinct forms of intention. In MD,³⁰ the Court of Appeal described the second form of intention—oblique intention—as:

designed to help the prosecution fill a gap in the rare circumstances in which a defendant does an act which caused death without the purpose of killing or causing serious injury, but in circumstances where death or serious bodily harm had been a virtual certainty (barring some unforeseen intervention) as a result of the defendant’s action and the defendant had appreciated that such was the case. Woollin is not designed to make the prosecution’s task more difficult. Many murderers whose purpose was to kill or cause serious injury would escape conviction if the jury was only [directed under (2)(a) and (b)]. The man who kills another with a gun would be able to escape liability for murder if he could show^[31] that he was such a bad shot that death or serious bodily harm was not a virtual certainty or that the defendant had thought that death or serious bodily harm was not a virtual certainty.³²

3.2.1.2 Difficulties with the present law

The blurring of evidence and substantive law

Within the definition of oblique intention, why is 2(a) in the summary in the previous section relevant? The fact that the result was a virtually certain consequence of D’s act is very good evidence that he knew that it was a virtually certain consequence; but it is difficult to see why it should be regarded as a necessary condition as a matter of substantive criminal law.³³ If D thinks that the result is virtually inevitable, but is making a mistake, surely he ²⁶ [1985] AC 905, [1985] Crim LR 378.

²⁷ [1986] AC 455, [1986] Crim LR 400.

²⁸ [1986] 1 WLR 1025, [1986] Crim LR 792.

²⁹ [1999] 1 AC 82, [1998] Crim LR 890. See LCCP 177, para 4.38.

³⁰ [2004] EWCA Crim 1391.

³¹ Surely this is a slip and the burden is on the Crown to rebut such a defence?

³² The extended intention direction is only rarely needed. It is needed where D denies his purpose, not where, eg, D denies any part in the crime: Phillips [2004] EWCA Crim 112. The trial judge is best placed to make the decision on the appropriate direction. In Allen [2005] EWCA Crim 1344 the Court of Appeal emphasized that it ‘is only in an exceptional case that the extended direction by reference to foresight becomes necessary’, [63]. See also Hales [2005] EWCA Crim 1118, [27]; Ogunbowale [2007] EWCA Crim 2739; Royle [2013] EWCA Crim 1461. More recently, in R (on the application of Charles) v Criminal Cases Review Commission [2017] EWHC 1219 (Admin), Gross LJ stated that ‘save very exceptionally, a judge directing a jury in a case of murder ought not to elaborate on what is meant by intent, leaving it to the jury’s good sense to decide whether the Crown has made them sure that the defendant killed the victim with the necessary intent for murder’. At [57].

³³ This criticism as stated in the 10th edition of this book was acknowledged by the Court of Appeal in MD [2004] EWCA Crim 1391.

intends the result even though it was not, in fact, inevitable? If D fires a gun pointed at V's heart, his intention can hardly be affected by the fact, unknown to D, that V is wearing a bullet-proof vest. D's state of mind is as culpable whether V is wearing the vest or not. The difference is in the external circumstances. This point may not be of great practical importance because the best evidence that D knew that the consequence was virtually certain will be the fact that it was virtually certain; but this is not invariably so.

Equally, the fact that a result is virtually certain is not proof of intention—the inquiry into intention is one involving an assessment of D's state of mind. Did he have the result as his purpose or foresee the result as virtually certain? It is easy to lose sight of this. In Stringer M, aged 14, was alleged to have started a fire in his family home early one morning and walked off, knowing that five occupants were asleep upstairs. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction for murder and arson with intent to endanger life:

if the jury were satisfied (as they must have been) that M started the fire after putting accelerant at the foot of the stairs, that he watched it take hold and then walked away, there could be only one answer to the question whether in fact it was a virtual certainty that somebody in the house would suffer really serious harm or death from M's actions. It would be wholly unrealistic to imagine all the occupants escaping from the house by jumping from the upstairs windows without any of them suffering any serious harm. This must have been obvious to any ordinary person at the time. Even taking account of M's age and the fact that his IQ was low/average, the inference that he must have appreciated it on that morning was also overwhelming. On the facts as the jury must have found them, the conclusion that M had the necessary intent was bound to follow.³⁴

In practice that may be true, but strictly there is a difference between finding that the result was virtually certain and finding that D foresaw it as such.

'Finding' intention

The second major criticism with the present description of the law offered in Woollin, and summarized earlier, concerns the use of the phrase, italicized in point (2), 'may also find'. There has been a long-standing debate about whether the descriptions of intention offered in the House of Lords' cases in recent decades define intention exhaustively, or whether they merely describe states of mind which a jury may choose to categorize as intention if they wish. In other words, is D's foresight of a virtually certain result conclusive proof that he intended that result? Or is D's foresight of a virtually certain result merely evidence from which the jury may go on to find that he intended that result, if they wish so to categorize his state of mind?

In Nedrick, the Court of Appeal had stated that foresight of virtual certainty is merely evidence from which intention may be inferred. On that approach a jury may conclude that D foresaw V's death as virtually certain and yet the jury may choose not to treat that as intention. At one point in the judgment in Woollin Lord Steyn said that, 'The effect of the critical direction is that a result foreseen as virtually certain is an intended result' (emphasis added). That was welcomed by many commentators since it seemed to be an unequivocal statement from the House of Lords that there was no room for any 'finding' of intention by the jury. On a literal reading, it seemed to follow from Lord Steyn's statement that once a court or jury was satisfied that D had such foresight, it must (not 'may') find that the result was intended by D. Such an approach, equating foresight of virtual certainty with intention, would be advantageous, in terms of optimizing the certainty and consistency in application of this important mens rea element.

³⁴ [2008] EWCA Crim 1222 (emphasis added).

An alternative view was that Woollin did leave a degree of flexibility for the jury; the decision of the House of Lords was that the jury 'may' find intention. This suggests there is something further for the jury to decide once they have concluded that D foresaw³⁵ the result as virtually certain. It has been suggested by, amongst others, Professor Norrie, that a test in which foresight of virtual certainty was intention, rather than something from which intention may be found, would be over-inclusive and would not reflect the degree of 'moral malevolence' in D's act. The argument is that the jury, having decided that D did foresee some prohibited consequence as certain, should go on to consider whether, in all the circumstances, he was so 'wicked' that an intention to cause the evil should be attributed to him.³⁶ Although this might enhance the prospects of achieving justice in the individual case, it does little to secure certainty and consistency in general application.

The Court of Appeal remains unwilling to interpret Woollin as laying down a clear rule that foresight of virtually certain consequences is intention. In Matthews and Alleyne,³⁷ M and A were convicted of robbery, kidnapping and murder. V was attacked on leaving a club in the early hours of the morning, and ultimately thrown off a bridge 25 feet high into a river 64 feet wide. V, being unable to swim, drowned. A co-accused gave evidence that V had said he could not swim. One ground of appeal against convictions for murder was that the judge had directed the jury that foresight of virtual certainty of consequences was intention. The Court of Appeal held that Woollin did not reach or lay down such a rule of substantive law; Woollin was concerned with the law of evidence. The judge had gone further than permitted.

[T]he law has not yet reached a definition of intent in murder in terms of appreciation of a virtual certainty . . . On the contrary, it is clear from the discussion in Woollin as a whole that Nedrick was derived from the existing law, at that time ending in Moloney and Hancock, and that the critical direction in Nedrick was approved, subject to the change of one word.

The proper direction should have been in the terms from Woollin quoted earlier. However, the court acknowledged that once it was accepted that what was required was appreciation of virtual certainty, and not a lesser foresight of probable consequences, there was very little to choose between evidence and substantive law.

It seems, then, that following Woollin the jury retain their 'moral elbow room'.³⁸ A defendant who is found to have (or admits to having) seen the result as virtually certain will not necessarily be found to have intended the result; the jury will have the discretion to find that he did. This is, it is submitted, an unsatisfactory position, leaving undefined a key term of fault applicable in the most serious crimes. The potential for inconsistent decisions on identical facts is stark. Professor Mitchell's empirical work for the Law Commission³⁹ confirms that the discretionary element in the definition has the potential to impact on the way crimes are investigated and prosecuted. It renders it more difficult to predict accurately the outcome of cases. This approach does not merely pose problems of a practical nature. If ³⁵ There is a further criticism that the word foresight adds to the confusion. It suggests that D must have a mental picture of the result in his mind, but that is not required. For this reason some prefer the use of the terms 'knowledge or belief', ie that the jury may find intention from D's knowledge or belief that the result will occur. See Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 218–219.

³⁶ A Norrie, 'After Woollin' [1999] Crim LR 532; Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 67–71. See also Kugler, Direct and Oblique Intention, 17.

³⁷ [2003] EWCA Crim 192, [2003] 2 Cr App R 30, [2003] Crim LR 553.

³⁸ Horder (1995) 58 MLR 678, 688. V Tadros, 'The Homicide Ladder' (2006) 69 MLR 601, 604, argues that the moral elbow room allows for the jury to convict in cases where D believes that the result will occur where he does not desire it. See also the discussion in LCCP 177, paras 4.43–4.49 and 4.66, and LC 304, para 3.32.

³⁹ See LCCP 177, Appendix A; B Mitchell, 'Distinguishing between Murder and Manslaughter in Practice' (2007) 71 J Crim L 318.

this ‘moral threshold’ test is to be applied to oblique intention so as to save hard cases from conviction, why should it not also apply to direct intention—that is, purpose? The typical mercy-killer acts with the purpose of killing—and his may be the hardest case of all.⁴⁰

Lord Lane CJ recognized the force of the criticism of this aspect of his judgment in Nedrick in the debate on the Report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Murder when he stated:

in Nedrick the court was obliged to phrase matters as it did because of earlier decisions in your Lordships’ House by which it was bound. We had to tread very gingerly indeed in order not to tread on your Lordships’ toes. As a result, Nedrick was not as clear as it should have been. However, I agree with the conclusions of the committee that ‘intention’ should be defined in the terms set out [in the Draft Code]. That seems to express clearly what in Nedrick we failed properly to explain.⁴¹

The definition referred to is that stated in cl 18(b) of the Draft Code:

A person acts ‘intentionally’ with respect to . . . a result when he acts either in order to bring it about or being aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

In Woollin, Lord Steyn, stressing ‘will occur’, noted the similarity between the Code and the virtual certainty test. In Moloney, Lord Bridge gave a notable example of a man who boards a plane which he knows to be bound for Manchester—the last place he wants to be—in order to escape pursuit: by boarding the Manchester plane, the man ‘conclusively demonstrates his intention to go there, because it is a moral certainty that that is where he will arrive’.⁴² There is nothing here about this being merely evidence upon which the jury may find intention—intention is conclusively demonstrated.⁴³ Nevertheless, the Court of Appeal in Matthews and Alleyne, having been referred to the above passage in the 10th edition of this book, remained unconvinced that the law had yet reached that position.

In summary, aside from the complexity and lack of definition, the present law may be seen by some as too wide in treating as intention those cases in which D has foreseen as a very high probability that a particular consequence will arise, but asserts that that result was not his purpose. The Law Commission recommends a codification of the present law (see later), having provisionally considered and rejected various forms of exhaustive definition.⁴⁴

3.2.1.3 Intention and results known to be a condition of achievement of purpose

It may be said that no one can ever know that a result is certain to follow from an act. This is why courts and writers are driven to speak of ‘virtually’ or ‘almost’ certain results. But a person may know that he cannot achieve his purpose, A, without bringing about some other result, B. If he is to bring about A, he knows he must also, at the same time or earlier, bring about B. It may be that, in any other circumstances, he would much rather B did not happen, indeed its occurrence may be abhorrent to him. But, the choice being between (a) going without A and (b) having A and B, he decides to have A and B. It seems fair to say that he intends to cause B as well as A.

Suppose that V has made a will, leaving the whole of his large estate to D. D loves V but he has an overwhelming desire to enjoy his inheritance immediately. If he gives V what ⁴⁰ See Inglis [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243.

⁴¹ HL paper 78-I, 1989; HL vol 512, col 480, 6 Nov 1989.

⁴² [1985] AC 905 at 926 (emphasis in original).

⁴³ This was the view taken by Ward and Brooke LJ in Re A (Conjoined Twins) [2000] 4 All ER 961, [2001] Crim LR 400.

⁴⁴ See LCCP 177; Norrie [2006] Crim LR 486, 495. See p 93.

he knows to be a fatal dose of poison, he intends to kill V, though he says truthfully that it causes him anguish. Similarly, consider D who wishes to injure his enemy, V, who is standing inside the window of the house of D's friend, Y. If, knowing the window to be closed, D throws the stone through it at V, can it be doubted that he intends to break his friend's window? Since result 'A' is the actor's purpose, it is immaterial that he is not certain that it will happen. He does not have a good throwing arm and he knows the stone may miss—but he intends to strike V. And, since he knows that, if he strikes V, it will be because he has broken Y's window, he intends to break the window. It seems from these examples that we might safely say that where D knows or believes a result to be a condition of the achievement of his purpose, D intends it.

Yet even this modest conclusion is not beyond doubt; there are a number of cases in which the generally accepted principles of intention seem to have been qualified in their application by the appellate courts. In Moloney,⁴⁵ Lord Bridge referred with approval to *Steane*⁴⁶ where D, who, during the Second World War in order to save himself and his family from the horrors of the concentration camp, gave broadcasts which would assist the enemy. He was held not to have had an 'intent to assist the enemy' in performing those broadcasts. Steane may have been a loyal citizen who, in other circumstances, would have wished to do nothing to assist the enemy; but, being faced with the choice, 'Assist us—or back to the concentration camp', he chose to do as the enemy required. Of course, his purpose was to keep his wife and children out of the camp; but it seems plain that he knew that his purpose could only be achieved by doing required acts that might assist the enemy. Reading the broadcast script and making the propaganda films were the acts likely to assist the enemy.⁴⁷ There are numerous similar cases. In Ahlers,⁴⁸ a German consul who assisted German nationals to return home after the declaration of war in 1914 was held to have intended only to do his duty as consul. In Gillick's case,⁴⁹ some of the judges seem to have been of the opinion that a doctor, who knew or believed that his provision of contraceptive advice to a girl under 16 would encourage a man to have sexual intercourse with her, would not be guilty of abetting the man's commission of the sexual offence, because the doctor's intention was to protect the girl, not to encourage sexual intercourse with her.

In some of these cases, it seems that the concept of intention is strained to do a job for which it is not fitted. The courts appear, in some of these admittedly hard cases, to examine the motives or justifications of the defendant while purporting to be determining his intention. Steane's acquittal would more properly have been based on duress and the case envisaged in Gillick seems to have been, in substance, one of necessity—some degree of encouragement of sexual intercourse was a lesser evil than an unwanted pregnancy in the young girl.⁵⁰ In each of these cases, D had an 'honourable' purpose. Where D's purpose is disreputable, the court is most unlikely to interpret intention so narrowly. If Steane, being a ⁴⁵ [1985] AC 905 at 929.

⁴⁶ [1947] KB 997. See also Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability, 95. For a historical account, see GR Rubin, 'New Light on Steane's Case' (2003) 24 Legal History 143.

⁴⁷ It might be argued that, even in these circumstances, B is not necessarily a condition of A. Someone might open the window while the stone is in flight towards it. The microphone into which Steane spoke might have been disconnected or the transmitter broken down. Lord Bridge's man who boards the plane for Manchester (the last place he wishes to go) to escape arrest intends (as Lord Bridge says [1985] AC at 986) to go to Manchester although it is possible that the plane will be diverted to Luton. Even in the case of D who gives V the fatal dose of poison to accelerate his inheritance, it is possible that V will die of natural causes before the poison takes effect: cf White [1910] 2 KB 124, CCA. See the discussion in Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 219.

⁴⁸ [1915] 1 KB 616.

⁴⁹ Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority [1986] AC 112, [1986] Crim LR 113, HL and commentary. See also Salford Health Authority, ex p Janaway [1989] AC 537.

⁵⁰ See now the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 73, p 802.

chain-smoker deprived of cigarettes, had performed the broadcast in order to get a packet, it is probable that Lord Goddard CJ would have had no hesitation in holding that, of course, he intended to assist the enemy. Yet, from the point of view of intention, there seems to be no difference between the cases.⁵¹ If this is so, it produces an undesirable distortion of the concept of intention and it would be better if the true reason for the decision were admitted by the courts.⁵² Moloney, and Woollin, however, encourage such decisions—the jury appears to be left a measure of discretion to say whether they think the state of mind should be categorized as intention or not.

It is arguable that intention, in law, should extend to results known or believed by the actor to be conditions of the achievement of his purpose but should go no further. This would give effect to the constantly reiterated opinion of the courts that intention is different from desire. If D acts in order to cause ‘A’ and knows ‘B’ will follow, ‘B’ is not desired, at least it is not desired for its own sake; but it is intended. The court can avoid treating this as a case of recklessness as to B. D is not merely taking a risk of causing B; he knows or thinks he knows that, if he achieves his aim of causing ‘A’, ‘B’ will happen or will have already happened.

3.2.1.4 Results known or believed to be virtually certain to accompany achievement of purpose

Result B may also be intended, according to Moloney, where B is not a condition of A. It is possible for result A (D’s purpose) to occur without result B also happening, but as D knows, causing A is virtually certain to cause B as well.⁵³

To take an example, D, wishing to collect the insurance on a cargo (result A), puts a time bomb in a plane to blow up in the mid-Atlantic. He has no wish to kill the crew. It is possible for the plane and cargo to be destroyed and the crew to escape—people do occasionally fall from aircraft at great heights and survive—but the possibility is so remote as to be negligible; and D knows that.⁵⁴ There is certainly a strong argument for saying that he intends to kill. This is so even if, as D knows, this type of bomb has a 50 per cent failure rate. There is an even chance that nothing will happen. But he wants the explosion (result A) to happen and, if it does, killing (result B) is, as he knows, a virtual certainty. So a jury may (not must) find that there is an intention to kill.⁵⁵

The difficulty is that once we depart from absolute certainty, there is a question of degree and an uncertain boundary between intention and recklessness. In Hyam,⁵⁶ D, in order to ⁵¹ Williams, The Mental Element in Crime, 21.

⁵² For consideration of the importance of the role of motive in defining intention, see Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 43 et seq; D Husak, The Philosophy of Criminal Law (2010) Ch 2; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 202. After a lengthy philosophical account, Tadros concludes that D’s intention must be motive-related. He suggests that where D does X believing that in doing X, D will also do Y, if Y is a reason that motivated D to do X, D intends Y. If D believes that Y was a reason against him doing X despite which he still did X, D intentionally did X, although he did not intend to do Y (at 225). The courts are best avoiding such sophistications.

⁵³ For comparisons of English, Dutch and German approaches to intention and recklessness, see J Blomsma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012). See in particular the discussion of the mens rea of ‘dolus eventualis’: the conscious acceptance of a risk. It is enough that D has, with the purpose of achieving result A, foreseen B as a probability and accepted that B can occur or takes that for granted, at 99–134.

⁵⁴ This and the example in n 59, have prompted a voluminous literature, see A Pedain, ‘Intention and the Terrorist Example’ [2003] Crim LR 579 and references therein. Kaveny (2004) 120 LQR 81 argues that in the virtual certainty cases D’s gross disregard for human life justifies D’s conviction as a murderer.

⁵⁵ cf the view of I Kugler, ‘Conditional Oblique Intention’ [2004] Crim LR 284, seemingly suggesting that the question will depend on whether D has a guilty motive or Parliament’s motive in creating an offence of that form or the degree of harm actually caused. It is difficult to see how these issues affect D’s intention in substantive law.

⁵⁶ [1975] AC 55, [1974] Crim LR 365.

frighten Mrs Booth, her rival for the affections of X, put blazing newspaper through the letter box of Booth's house and caused the death of two of her children. Ackner J directed the jury that D was guilty of murder if she knew that it was highly probable that her act would cause at least serious bodily harm. The jury convicted so they clearly found that she did know that. In the light of subsequent cases, that direction was wrong (foresight of virtual certainty is required before a jury can find intention) but in Moloney Lord Bridge⁵⁷ thought that, on a proper direction, no reasonable jury could have failed to convict Hyam. Is that really so? Might not a jury have been satisfied that D knew that serious injury to the occupants was a highly probable result without being satisfied that she knew it was virtually certain?

In Moloney,⁵⁸ Lord Hailsham and Lord Bridge gave the example of the case of a terrorist who plants a time bomb in a public building and gives a warning to enable the public to be evacuated. He knows that it is virtually certain that a bomb disposal squad will attempt to defuse the bomb. The squad does so, the bomb explodes and a member of the squad is killed. It is assumed by their lordships that this is murder.⁵⁹ The bomber intends to endanger the squad's lives (because he knows that it is virtually certain they will attempt to defuse the bomb) but he does not, surely, know that it is virtually certain that one of them will be killed or even seriously injured. It is doubtful if this would be murder even under the 'highly probable' formula of Hyam. It looks like recklessness, which is not enough for murder. The example might be justified if it could be proved that the terrorist wants the bomb to go off at a time when he knows it is virtually certain that the squad will be attempting to defuse it. That would be indistinguishable from the 'bomb-in-the-plane' case, earlier in this section, where the bomber wants the bomb to go off in the mid-Atlantic.

In Moloney, D shot his stepfather, whom he loved, when, in the course of a drunken game to establish who was quicker 'on the draw' with loaded shotguns, he pulled the trigger in response to a challenge, 'if you have [the guts] pull the trigger'. He may not have realized that the gun was aimed, at point-blank range, at V's head. His conviction was quashed because the judge misdirected the jury that D intended serious bodily harm if he foresaw that it would 'probably' happen. In the House of Lords, Lord Bridge insisted on the need for 'a moral certainty', a probability which is 'little short of overwhelming' and an act that 'will lead to a certain event unless something unexpected supervenes to prevent it'.⁶⁰ Unfortunately, in summing up his opinion in the form of guidelines for trial judges, he used the term, 'natural consequence' to mean a consequence that is virtually certain to ensue.

In Hancock and Shankland,⁶¹ two miners taking industrial action pushed from the parapet of a bridge heavy concrete blocks which struck a taxi carrying a working miner to work and killed the taxi-driver. They said they intended to push the blocks on to the middle lane of the road, not the lane in which the taxi was travelling, and that they intended to frighten the working miner and prevent him going to work, but not to hurt anyone. At their trial for murder, the judge closely followed the Moloney 'guidelines'. The Court of Appeal held that the conviction must be quashed. The guidelines were defective. The jury might well have understood 'natural consequence' to mean 'direct consequence' and not to convey the notion of moral certainty or overwhelming probability of which Lord Bridge spoke. The House of Lords agreed. Both courts stressed that even if D has awareness that the consequence is virtually certain that is not intention, but only evidence from which a jury may infer intention, if they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that this is the right inference. The difficulties with this approach are considered earlier.

⁵⁷ [1985] AC 905 at 926. ⁵⁸ ibid at 913, 927.

⁵⁹ cf A Pedain [2003] Crim LR 579, suggesting that this is a form of intent because of D's 'motive'. Pedain argues that the terrorist in these cases is sufficiently morally culpable because of his willingness to risk another's death such that he can properly be regarded as having a direct intent for murder.

⁶⁰ [1985] AC 905 at 925, 926, 929. See also R (Tait) v CICAP [2009] EWHC 767 (Admin), [2010] RTR 6.

⁶¹ [1986] AC 455, [1986] Crim LR 400.

3.2.1.5 Intention in crimes other than murder

Nearly all the leading cases relate to murder and Lord Steyn prefaced his decision in Woollin by remarking that ‘intent’ does not necessarily have precisely the same meaning in every context of the criminal law.⁶²

Earlier the House in Moloney said that they were laying down the law not only for murder but for offences requiring ‘specific intent’ generally (which, here, seems to mean merely offences requiring intent). The approval in Moloney of cases like Steane and the difficulty of reconciling the example of the bomber with intention as defined in that case suggests that the word may well be held to bear different shades of meaning in different contexts. Sometimes the context may indicate a narrower meaning—that nothing less than purpose will do. This may be the explanation of Steane, though that decision has been regularly cited in murder cases. A strong case can be made that the very nature of an attempt involves purpose, and that ‘intent’ in the Criminal Attempts Act⁶³ should be construed accordingly. The Draft Criminal Code recognizes that the context may require some modification of its proposed definition. But, while the context may require a narrower meaning, it is submitted that a court should be slow to give the term a wider one. Woollin draws a clear line between intention and recklessness and it is desirable to preserve that clarity throughout the criminal law.

3.2.1.6 Intention as to conduct and circumstances

Most of the cases arise in the context of murder where the issue is whether D has intent as to the consequences of his conduct—death or GBH. In some offences, the issue will be about D’s intent as to circumstances which must exist for the offence to be committed. In such cases, intention means either hope that the circumstance exists—which corresponds to purpose in relation to consequences—or knowledge (or belief that it is virtually certain) that the circumstance exists—which corresponds to foresight of certainty in relation to consequences. D charged with murder must intend GBH or death, but also the relevant circumstances—that V is a human being under the Queen’s peace.⁶⁴

Where an offence requires proof of an intent as to circumstances, a lesser mens rea will not suffice. So, if D receives a car which he knows to be stolen, that is an intentional handling of stolen goods even though D would, perhaps, much prefer that the car was not stolen. If, however, D believed merely that it was probable, or highly probable, that the car was stolen, this would not be an intentional handling. He neither hoped it was stolen, nor knew it was.

3.2.1.7 Reform

The definition⁶⁵ in cl 18(b) of the Draft Code provides:

A person acts ‘intentionally’ with respect to . . . a result when he acts either in order to bring it about or being aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

There were two possible defects in the definition proposed in the Draft Code: (a) it did not provide for the case where D knows that the relevant result will occur if, but only if, he succeeds in achieving some other purpose⁶⁶ and he is not certain that he will achieve that other purpose—this is exemplified by the case of the bomb with the 50 per cent failure rate;⁶⁷

⁶² For criticism, see F Stark, ‘It’s Only Words: On Meaning and Mens Rea’ (2013) 72 CLJ 155. Stark objects to the idea that mens rea terms ought to be defined differently depending upon context. He argues that such an approach undermines the criminal law’s goal of guiding effectively the conduct of citizens who wish to avoid punishment and that it leaves too much discretion to the criminal law’s institutions.

⁶³ See p 412. See LCCP 183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para 14.27; LC 318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009).

⁶⁴ See p 508.

⁶⁵ See the discussion in LCCP 177, para 4.22.

⁶⁶ See p 94.

⁶⁷ See n 59.

(b) in certain, admittedly rather unlikely, circumstances, the definition might mean that a person intended a result which it was his purpose to avoid—which does not seem to be very good sense. The starkest example is that of D who throws his child from the upper window of a burning house when he believes that death from the flames is inevitable.⁶⁸

To avoid these difficulties, the Law Commission⁶⁹ proposed a definition of intention for the purposes of non-fatal offences against the person which, slightly modified, was included in the draft Bill, cl 14(1) in the Home Office Consultation Paper of February 1998:⁷⁰

... a person acts intentionally with respect to a result if—

- (a) it is his purpose to cause it; or
- (b) although it is not his purpose to cause it, he knows that it would occur in the ordinary course of events if he were to succeed in his purpose of causing some other result.

Woollin, however, shows that this may be too narrow. D lost his temper and threw down his three-month-old son on to a hard surface, killing him. The Crown did not contend that his purpose was to kill or cause serious injury. He was convicted of murder on a direction that it was enough that he knew there was a 'substantial risk' that he would cause serious injury. His conviction was upheld by the Court of Appeal but quashed by the House of Lords. If the law was as stated in cl 14, even if Woollin knew that serious bodily injury was certain, he would not have an intention to cause it—it was not his purpose and he had no other purpose, except to vent his anger, which is not a purpose to cause a result. To meet this point it was suggested that the clause should be amended to read '... he knows that it will occur in the ordinary course of events, or that it would do so if he were to succeed in his purpose of causing some other result'. The Law Commission more recently rejected that suggestion on the ground that it presents problems where the result is the very thing that D is seeking to avoid (as in the case of the burning house and the father who throws his child to her virtually certain death).⁷¹

Parliament has accepted in one context at least that a person has intention in relation to a consequence where he means to cause the consequences or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.⁷²

The Law Commission's homicide review led it to consider a number of proposals in relation to intention,⁷³ finally settling on one retaining the flexibility inherent in the present law (and the moral elbow room it provides):⁷⁴

⁶⁸ As to whether this is properly seen as a case of intention where a defence of necessity should apply, see the discussion at p 369. See also LCCP 177, para 4.26; Norrie [2006] Crim LR 486, 495.

⁶⁹ LC 218, paras 7.1–7.14 and cl 1 of draft Bill, following LCCP 122, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences Against the Person and General Principles (1992) paras 5.4–5.11 and JC Smith, 'A Note on Intention' [1990] Crim LR 85.

⁷⁰ JC Smith, 'Offences Against the Person: The Home Office Consultation Paper' [1998] Crim LR 317. See also A Khan, 'Intention in the Criminal Law: Time to Change' (2002) 23 Stat LR 235. See also Law Commission Scoping Consultation Paper No 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person (2014) Ch 4 and LC 361 (2015).

⁷¹ LCCP 177, paras 4.26 and 4.42–4.44.

⁷² See the International Criminal Courts Act 2001, s 66(3)(a).

⁷³ In LCCP 177 Ch 4, the Commission offered two models for consideration, one based on the clauses discussed, and one seeking to codify the common law position as set out in Woollin. The proposed revision of cl 18(b)(ii), to provide a definition of 'intentionally' for the offence of murder, was as follows: Subject to the proviso set out below: a person acts 'intentionally' with respect to a result when he or she acts either: (1) in order to bring it about, or (2) knowing that it will be virtually certain to occur; or (3) knowing that it would be virtually certain to occur if he or she were to succeed in his or her purpose of causing some other result. Proviso: a person is not to be deemed to have intended any result, which it was his or her specific purpose to avoid. Objections levelled at this provision by Norrie [2006] Crim LR 486 included that it concealed a defence of necessity.

⁷⁴ Academics tended to favour a full definition and practitioners and judges favoured the codification proposal adopting the present law (LC 304, para 3.17).

- (1) A person should be taken to intend a result if he or she acts in order to bring it about.
- (2) In cases where the judge believes that justice may not be done unless an expanded understanding of intention is given, the jury should be directed as follows: an intention to bring about a result may be found if it is shown that the defendant thought that the result was a virtually certain consequence of his or her action.

This definition removes the unnecessary requirement that the result was a virtual certainty.

3.2.1.8 The distinction between motive and intention

If D causes an actus reus with mens rea, he is guilty of the crime and on the orthodox view it is entirely irrelevant to his guilt that he had a good motive.⁷⁵ The mother who kills her severely disabled and suffering child out of motives of compassion is just as guilty of murder as is the person who kills for gain or hatred. On the other hand, if either the actus reus or the mens rea of any crime is lacking, no motive, however evil, will make a person guilty of a crime. The orthodox view that motive should not be confused with mens rea has come under challenge.⁷⁶ Consider, for example, that V is about to commit a serious terrorist attack and D takes the justified step of killing V thereby preventing the serious crime. Some argue that if D was motivated to do so by the desire to promote social well-being he should not be guilty; if D was simply motivated by hatred of V, a long-standing enemy, D should be liable. The intent is the same in either case—to kill the person; the difference between innocence and guilt lies in the motive which prompted this intent.

It is submitted, however, that, assuming that D knew of the facts which justified the killing, this view is contrary to principle. If it were correct, it would seem to follow that D, the public executioner, would be guilty of murder in hanging X, who had been condemned to death by a competent court, if it were shown that D had postponed his retirement to carry out this particular execution because he had a grudge against X and derived particular pleasure from hanging him. This can hardly be the law. If a surgical operation, though dangerous to life, is clearly justifiable on medical grounds, a surgeon who performs it with all proper skill cannot be said to be guilty of attempted murder, or, if the patient dies, murder, because he hopes the patient will die so that he can marry his wife, or inherit his property, or so that the patient will avoid the thoroughly miserable life he will face if he survives.⁷⁷

One of the difficulties in determining the relevance of motive in criminal law lies in the ambiguity of language. Sometimes, when we speak of motive, we mean an emotion such as jealousy or greed, and sometimes we mean a species of intention. For example, D intends: (a) to put poison in his uncle's tea; (b) to cause his uncle's death; and (c) to inherit his money. We would normally say that (c) is his motive. Applying our previous test of intention (p 91), (c) is certainly also intended, but the reason why it is considered merely a motive is that it is a consequence ulterior to the mens rea and the actus reus; it is no part of the crime. If this criterion as to the nature of motive were adopted then it follows that motive, by definition, is irrelevant to criminal responsibility—that is, a person may be lawfully convicted of a crime whatever his motive may be, or even if he has no motive. The courts are not always consistent in their terminology. If D dismisses E, an employee, who has given evidence against him, in accordance with the terms of E's contract, D will be guilty of contempt of court, it is said, if his 'motive' was to punish E for his evidence but not if it was for any other reason—for example, incompetence or redundancy.⁷⁸ A desire for consistency in terminology would suggest that in such a case we should speak of intent or purpose rather than motive. For example, if this variety of contempt were to be defined, the definition might say, ‘with intent to punish the witness’.

⁷⁵ See A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2002) [2002] EWCA Crim 2392, where D, a police officer, was prepared to fabricate evidence to convict a person who was factually guilty. Her 'good' motive was not an excuse for perverting the course of justice. It may affect sentence: Inglis [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243.

⁷⁶ See Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 5; Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 43–53; Norrie, Punishment, Responsibility and Justice, 170–181; J Horder, 'On the Irrelevance of Motive in Criminal Law' in J Horder (ed), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 8.

⁷⁷ See ATH Smith in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 95.

In some exceptional cases motive does form an element of an offence. A conspicuous example is the series of ‘aggravated offences’ first created by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.⁷⁹ Any of the existing offences specified in the Act⁸⁰ become new racially or religiously aggravated offences with an enhanced penalty if, inter alia, the offence is motivated (wholly or partly) by hostility towards members of a racial group, based on their membership or presumed membership of that group. In blackmail, contrary to s 21 of the Theft Act 1968,⁸¹ the accused’s motive may be relevant in ascertaining whether his demand was unwarranted.⁸² There are other circumstances in which motive may be relevant to the offence (eg dishonour) or defence (eg revenge denies a defence of loss of self-control).⁸³

As evidence, motive is always relevant.⁸⁴ This means simply that if the prosecution can prove that D had a motive for committing the crime, they may do so since the existence of a motive makes it more likely that D in fact did commit it. People do not usually act without a motive.

In sentencing, motive is again important. When the law allows the judge a discretion in sentencing, he will obviously be influenced by the culpability of the offender’s motive.

3.2.2 Recklessness

The definitions of many crimes specify that either intention to cause the proscribed result or recklessness as to whether that result is caused is sufficient mens rea for liability. A person who does not intend to cause a harmful result may nonetheless take an unjustifiable risk of causing it. If he does so, he may be held to be reckless. Unjustifiably taking risks in conduct which might harm others is culpable behaviour. In some scenarios, if we factor in the justifications for the conduct we might even say that some cases of intended action are less culpable than those involving recklessness.⁸⁵ The test involves assessing two issues: (a) whether D foresaw a risk of the proscribed result or circumstance in the actus reus of the crime in question; and (b) whether it was reasonable for D to take the risk in the circumstances known to him. These two elements are closely interrelated.

3.2.2.1 The current law

In the landmark case of G Lord Bingham based his definition of recklessness in the context of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 on the Draft Criminal Code, cl 18(c):

A person acts recklessly within the meaning of section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 with respect to—

- (i) a circumstance when he is aware of a risk that it exists or will exist;
- (ii) a result when he is aware of a risk that it will occur;

and it is, in the circumstances known to him, unreasonable to take the risk.

⁷⁸ A-G v Butterworth [1963] 1 QB 696, CA. Cf Rooney v Snaresbrook Crown Court (1978) 68 Cr App R 78, [1979] Crim LR 109.

⁷⁹ See Ch 16. ⁸⁰ See p 699. ⁸¹ See Ch 25.

⁸² p 1000; Chandler v DPP [1964] AC 763.

⁸³ This restriction is made explicit in the new defences discussed in Ch 13.

⁸⁴ Williams (1986) 84 Cr App R 299, [1987] Crim LR 198, CA, not following Berry (1986) 83 Cr App R 7, [1986] Crim LR 394.

⁸⁵ See eg the discussion in Kugler, Direct and Oblique Intention in the Criminal Law, 27. Considering D1 who intentionally terminates V’s life to spare him pain, compared to D2 who shoots at an apple on V’s head and misses, killing V.

It is submitted that this subjective definition of recklessness ought to be applied in all statutory offences of recklessness unless Parliament has explicitly provided otherwise.⁸⁶ In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 2003),⁸⁷ the Court of Appeal emphasized that although the House of Lords in G had stated that their decision was one specifically on recklessness under the Criminal Damage Act, 'general principles were laid down'. It was established that a defendant could not be culpable under the criminal law of doing something involving a risk of injury to another or damage to property if he genuinely did not perceive the risk.⁸⁸ The court refused to restrict the application of G to cases of positive action rather than those where liability arose by D's omission, and applied the subjective test to D's foresight of circumstances as well as consequences.⁸⁹

3.2.2.2 Subjective awareness of 'a' risk

The standard test of recklessness set out in the previous paragraph is traditionally called 'Cunningham' recklessness after the case of that name. It requires proof that D was aware of the existence of a risk of the proscribed result or circumstance. It is a subjective form of mens rea, focused on D's own cognition of the existence of a risk.⁹⁰

In Cunningham,⁹¹ D tore a gas meter from the wall of the cellar of an unoccupied house to steal the money in it. He left the gas gushing out. It seeped into a neighbouring house and was inhaled by V whose life was endangered. D was convicted under s 23 of the Offences Against the Person Act (OAPA) 1861⁹² of maliciously⁹³ administering a noxious thing so as to endanger life. Because the judge directed the jury that 'malicious' meant simply 'wicked', D's conviction was quashed. The Court of Criminal Appeal quoted with approval the principle first propounded by Professor Kenny in 1902:⁹⁴ in any statutory definition of a crime 'malice' must be taken not in the old vague sense of 'wickedness' in general, but as requiring either (i) an actual intention to do the particular kind of harm that in fact was done, or (ii) recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not (ie the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it). It is neither limited to, nor does it indeed require, any ill-will towards the person injured.

Cunningham was not guilty unless he was aware, when he broke off the gas meter, or left the broken pipe with the gas gushing out,⁹⁵ that it might be inhaled by someone. It is not ⁸⁶ cf the offences relating to the Uranium Enrichment Technology (Prohibition on Disclosure) Regulations 2004, SI 2004/1818, made under the Anti-terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001, s 80(2) where an objective form of recklessness is expressly adopted. For an argument that the Caldwell test applies in some consumer offences, see Professor Cartwright in Appendix B to LCCP 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010) para B17.

⁸⁷ [2004] EWCA Crim 868, [2004] 2 Cr App R 23. ⁸⁸ At [12].

⁸⁹ See also Mbagwu [2007] EWCA Crim 1068, where Hughes LJ noted at [20], 'the element of recklessness necessarily meant that the Defendant in question would have to be shown to be reckless in the sense understood in Cunningham (1957) 41 Cr App Rep 155. As is well known, recklessness in that sense requires (and indeed these days in every sense requires) that it be shown that the Defendant in question actually foresaw some harm to such a person' (emphasis added).

⁹⁰ It is important to point out that if D claims he did not foresee the risk, this will not preclude him from being guilty. Juries remain free to come to conclusions about D's subjective state of mind and may simply disbelieve his claim. This may be especially likely to occur if the risk was an obvious one and D has no cognitive dysfunction that would have rendered him unable to perceive it. The Administrative Court emphasized that this does not turn a subjective test into an objective one in Seray-Wurie v DPP [2012] EWHC 208 (Admin). See also R (on the application of Pinkney) v DPP [2017] EWHC 854 (Admin).

⁹¹ [1957] 2 QB 396, [1957] Crim LR 326. ⁹² See p 713.

⁹³ Subject to what is said later, we can treat malice as equivalent to recklessness for the purposes of this discussion.

⁹⁴ Outlines (16th edn, 1952) 186.

⁹⁵ See on omissions, p 102.

sufficient that, if D had stopped to think, it would have been obvious to him that there was a risk. He must actually recognize the existence of such a risk and deliberately take it. In Cunningham, the court was considering the requirement of ‘malice’, a form of recklessness, but the definition in Cunningham applies generally to crimes of recklessness.⁹⁶

It is well established that where D closes his mind to the risk he can be found reckless within the subjective definition, as where he claims that his extreme anger blocked out of his mind the risk involved in his action.⁹⁷ As Lane LJ, as he then was, put it, ‘knowledge or appreciation of a risk of [the proscribed harm] must have entered the defendant’s mind even though he may have suppressed it or driven it out’.⁹⁸

It is only necessary for D to foresee a risk of the proscribed harm. In Brady,⁹⁹ D was drunk when he climbed on railings at a nightclub and fell onto the dance floor below causing serious injuries to V who was dancing there. The issue at trial was whether D had the mens rea: recklessness (strictly malice but for present purposes not distinguishable). D argued that the effect of the decision in *G*¹⁰⁰ was to require the jury to be directed that the Crown had to establish that D had foreseen ‘an obvious and significant risk’ of injury to another by his actions, or else that he would have done so had he been sober. The Court of Appeal rejected that argument. G does not require proof that D had foreseen ‘an obvious and significant risk’ in order to establish that he had acted recklessly; and it followed that there was no need for a trial judge directing a jury as to malice or recklessness to qualify the word ‘risk’ by the words obvious and significant. The court was surely right to reject this argument: to introduce a requirement that the risk was ‘obvious and significant’ would create uncertainty and complexity in an area of mens rea which desperately does not need it. The question would certainly arise whether the requirement was to prove that the degree of risk was ‘obvious and significant’, or whether that qualifying expression related to the consequences should the risk materialize.¹⁰¹

3.2.2.3 An unjustified risk

Not all risk-taking constitutes recklessness. Sometimes the accused will have identified a risk and rejected it as being so negligible as to be a reasonable one to take.¹⁰² In other circumstances, the risk may have been rightly recognized to be much greater, but the social utility of

⁹⁶ In one sense the definition pronounced by the court in Cunningham is defective since it fails to make explicit that not only must D foresee the risk of the proscribed harm, but he must take it unjustifiably as discussed, p 104

⁹⁷ Parker [1977] 1 All ER 475 (D slammed phone down in anger and broke it). Ashworth describes this case as ‘troublesome’. He states that cases such as these, involving sudden reaction or rage, leave little room for the kind of reasoning presupposed by the subjectivist paradigm. A Ashworth, ‘A Change of Normative Position: Determining the Contours of Culpability in Criminal Law’ (2008) 11 New Crim LR 232.

⁹⁸ Stephenson [1979] QB 695, 704, [1979] Crim LR 590. See also the comments of Lord Bingham in G [2004] 1 AC 1034 at [39] and Lord Steyn at [58]. As a more striking example, see Booth [2006] EWHC 192 (Admin), where D damaged V’s car when he was knocked down by V. D was convicted of criminal damage since he was reckless as to the damage having seen the risk of being knocked down and closed his mind to that risk.

⁹⁹ [2006] EWCA Crim 2413, [2007] Crim LR 564. The trial judge’s direction on the recklessness test was also flawed in not referring to the second limb—not only must the jury find that the accused personally saw a risk of the relevant harm, but that he went on unreasonably to take that risk.

¹⁰⁰ G [2004] 1 AC 1034.

¹⁰¹ Difficulties with a similar qualification were experienced when the House of Lords in Lawrence [1982] AC 626 held that in reckless driving the risk must be an obvious and ‘serious’ one. On the difficulties of that aspect of that test see: G Williams, ‘Recklessness Redefined’ (1981) 40 CLJ 252, 276; J Braby, ‘A Sequel to Seymour, Made in Hong Kong’ [1987] Crim LR 84 at 90–91.

¹⁰² In LC 304 the definition of recklessness for the purposes of the Law Commission’s proposed second degree murder requires awareness of a serious risk, where seriousness does not denote the degree of risk, but that the risk is one that should not be ignored. See LC 304, para 3.39.

the action justifies taking it.¹⁰³ It can be justifiable to take a risk of causing harm to another's property or his person or even of causing his death. The pilot of an aircraft, the surgeon performing an operation and the promoter of a tightrope act in a circus must all know that their conduct might cause death but none of them would properly be described as reckless unless the risk taken was an unreasonable one. The law allows the use of reasonable force in the lawful arrest of an offender or in private defence. If D, in the course of an act of reasonable self-defence, damages V's window, he is not guilty of reckless criminal damage.¹⁰⁴

Whether it is justifiable to take a risk depends on the social value of the activity involved relative to the probability and the gravity of the harm which might be caused. The question is whether the risk was one which a reasonable and prudent person might have taken. It might be reasonable for D to shoot V's ferocious dog which is attacking his sheep, but it does not follow that it would be reasonable to take a risk of causing injury or death to V—still less a bystander. This element of the test is objective—that is to say, the court or jury lays down the required standard of care.

What degree of risk? It is impossible to say in general terms that recklessness requires any particular degree of probability of the occurrence of the harm in question.¹⁰⁵ If the conduct has no social utility—for example, a game of 'Russian roulette' or an armed robbery—the slightest possibility of any harm should be enough. If the act has a high degree of social utility—for example, the performance of a surgical operation—then only a very high degree of probability of grave harm that outweighs the social utility will suffice to condemn it as reckless.¹⁰⁶

3.2.2.4 Malice

In Cunningham, it will be recalled, the mens rea of the offence was that of 'malice'. That form of mens rea is found in many old offences, including some commonly used offences under the OAPA 1861.

It is clear that the test for malice requires proof that D foresaw a risk of the relevant result. In Cunningham the court stated: 'In our opinion, the word "maliciously" in a statutory crime postulates foresight of consequence.' Cunningham was not guilty unless he was aware, when he broke off the gas meter, or left the broken pipe with the gas gushing out,¹⁰⁷ that it might be inhaled by someone. In a series of cases, of which the most important is the House of Lords decision in Parmenter,¹⁰⁸ convictions for malicious wounding have been quashed because trial judges directed the jury that it was enough that D 'should have foreseen' the risk¹⁰⁹ thus leading the jury to think that it is enough that D ought to have foreseen; it is not. To be 'malicious', D must actually foresee some harm and the fact that he ought to have foreseen is, at best, some evidence that he did foresee.

The test of recklessness requires, as we have seen, that D not only foresaw a risk, but unjustifiably went on to take it. The question arises whether that element is also a requirement for the mens rea of malice.

¹⁰³ For discussion of the relative moral culpability of these two scenarios, see W Wilson, 'The Structure of Criminal Homicide' [2006] Crim LR 471; J Rogers, 'The Law Commission's Proposed Restructuring of the Law of Homicide' (2006) 70 J Crim L 223.

¹⁰⁴ Sears v Broome [1986] Crim LR 461, DC.

¹⁰⁵ See Vehicle Inspectorate v Nuttall [1999] 1 WLR 629, [1999] Crim LR 674.

¹⁰⁶ See A Norrie, 'Subjectivism, Objectivism and the Limits of Criminal Recklessness' (1992) 12 OJLS 45; PH Robinson, 'The Modern General Part: Three Illusions' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 88–91.

¹⁰⁷ See on omissions, p 54.

¹⁰⁸ [1992] 1 AC 699, [1992] Crim LR 288, HL.

¹⁰⁹ The trial judges fell into error by taking the words of Diplock LJ out of their context in Mowatt [1968] 1 QB 421 at 426.

On the one hand, in the case of Cunningham, the court did not include within its definition of malice any requirement that D's taking of the risk was unjustifiable. Subsequent cases, including the House of Lords in Parmenter and Savage have approved the Cunningham formulation when interpreting the word malice.¹¹⁰ The Cunningham formulation was based, as noted, on Professor Kenny's definition. That definition made no reference to the requirement that D has to act unjustifiably or unreasonably in taking the risk he has foreseen. *Mowatt*¹¹¹ also followed Cunningham, but did not expressly require that D was unjustified in taking the risk.¹¹²

On the other hand, the Court of Appeal in *Brady*¹¹³ accepted the decision in G defining recklessness as applicable in s 20 without acknowledging the point under discussion. The G definition is also followed in the Crown Court Compendium.¹¹⁴ While the House in G expressed itself to be dealing with s 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971, the Court of Appeal Criminal Division has accepted the wider application of the decision.¹¹⁵ The mens rea of offences requiring malice, such as s 20 of the OAPA 1861, remains intention or subjective recklessness and is therefore in line with G (ie the defendant was aware of a risk of some harm which he then, unreasonably, went on to take).¹¹⁶

Despite the absence of express reference to this element in the malice test, it is submitted that the definition of malice ought to be construed as requiring proof that D was aware of a risk and that it was an unjustifiable risk to take in the circumstances known to him. As the Law Commission noted, a 'surgeon may justifiably carry out a surgical procedure despite knowing that there is a risk of serious harm, and should not be guilty of an offence if the operation miscarries'.¹¹⁷

3.2.2.5 The rise and fall of objective recklessness

The Cunningham, subjective, approach to recklessness or 'advertent recklessness' as it is also called, was the accepted definition until a controversial and, it is now accepted, erroneous turn by the House of Lords in the 1980s. Although the House of Lords restored orthodoxy by affirming that the definition of recklessness is as stated in Cunningham, set out earlier, it is valuable to examine, briefly,¹¹⁸ the temporary shift of English law towards objective recklessness in some offences.

Caldwell v MPC

It was accepted that the Cunningham definition of recklessness applied, inter alia, to the offences of damaging property under the Malicious Damage Act 1861. The Law Commission in its *Report on Criminal Damage*¹¹⁹ made many proposals for the reform of that law but considered that the mental element, as interpreted in Cunningham, was satisfactory. In relation to the mens rea, it proposed only that it be 'expressed with greater simplicity and clarity' and that this should be achieved by using 'intentionally or recklessly' in place of the archaic and ¹¹⁰ Reference is made in Savage to the dissenting views in Caldwell [1982] AC 341, [1981] Crim LR 392 in which reference is made to justification, but the final conclusion in Savage was based on Cunningham: [1992] 1 AC 699, 750, [1992] Crim LR 288.

¹¹¹ [1968] 1 QB 421. ¹¹² See n 110. ¹¹³ [2006] EWCA Crim 2413, [2007] Crim LR 564.

¹¹⁴ See Crown Court Compendium (2017) Part 1, para 8-2.

¹¹⁵ AG's Reference (No 3 of 2003) [2004] EWCA Crim 868, [2004] Cr App R 23 (misconduct in public office); Brady [2006] EWCA Crim 2413, [2007] Crim LR 564 (s 20 OAPA 1861).

¹¹⁶ Brady, ibid.

¹¹⁷ Scoping Paper, para 2.96, citing the CLRC, Fourteenth Report, Offences against the Person (1980) Cmnd 7844, para 8.

¹¹⁸ For a full examination and compelling critique of the Caldwell definition and its implications, see the 10th edition of this book, and the references cited therein.

¹¹⁹ LC 29 (1970), confirming proposals in Working Paper No 23 (1969).

misleading term 'maliciously'. Parliament adopted the proposals in the Criminal Damage Act 1971. Unfortunately, the Commission proposed no definition of recklessness and the Act contains none. It was assumed that the definition under Cunningham would apply. The Court of Appeal held, though after some hesitation, that 'reckless' in the 1971 Act bore the Cunningham meaning. But in 1981, the House of Lords decided in *Caldwell*¹²⁰ (Lords Wilberforce and Edmund-Davies dissenting) and in *Lawrence*¹²¹ that where the statute uses the word 'reckless' a different test applied. In Caldwell, Lord Diplock said that a person is reckless as to whether any property would be destroyed or damaged:

if (1) he does an act which in fact creates an obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged and (2) when he does the act he (i) either has not given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or (ii) has recognised that there was some risk involved and has nonetheless gone on to do it.

Under both limbs (i) and (ii) of the direction, as formulated, it had to be proved that the risk taken was an 'obvious [and serious]¹²² risk'. The further element of culpability was either:

- (1) D's failure to give thought to whether there was 'such a risk' (which might be designated 'inadvertent recklessness'); or
- (2) D's knowledge that there was 'some risk' ('advertent recklessness').

This represented a very different test to that in Cunningham.¹²³ It was sufficient to convict D for an offence to which the Caldwell recklessness test applied where the reasonable person would have seen the risk even if D did not, nor even where D could not see the risk because of some limitation in his capacity.¹²⁴

The 'model direction' contained inconsistencies and lacked precision,¹²⁵ in particular it left the knotty question whether there was a loophole or lacuna: D would not be reckless if he had considered the matter and decided that there was no risk. It was questionable whether such an individual was any less culpable than one who had given no thought (and who was therefore guilty).¹²⁶ There were also more principled objections to the test. First, it resulted in an indefensible distinction in law between the tests applicable to various offences. To take an example based on W (A Minor) v Dolbey,¹²⁷ if D took an air rifle and, ¹²⁰ [1982] AC 341, [1981] Crim LR 392. See, especially, EJ Griew, 'Reckless Damage and Reckless Driving—Living with Caldwell and Lawrence' [1981] Crim LR 743; J McEwan and J Robilliard, 'Recklessness: The House of Lords and the Criminal Law' (1981) 1 LS 267; G Syrota, 'A Radical Change in the Law of Recklessness?' [1982] Crim LR 97; Williams (1981) 40 CLJ 252; G Williams, 'The Unresolved Problem of Recklessness' (1988) 8 LS 74.

¹²¹ [1982] AC 510, [1981] Crim LR 409. For discussion of these decisions see also the commentaries at [1981] Crim LR 393 and 410.

¹²² According to the definition in Lawrence, decided in the House on the same day.

¹²³ The difference can be seen by considering post-G cases applying Cunningham to overturn convictions where the direction had, erroneously, been based on Caldwell: eg Castle [2004] EWCA Crim 2758, [2004] All ER (D) 289 (Oct); Cooper [2004] EWCA Crim 1382.

¹²⁴ See S Field and Lynn, 'The Capacity for Recklessness' (1992) 12 LS 74; S Field and M Lynn, 'Capacity Recklessness and the House of Lords' [1993] Crim LR 127.

¹²⁵ To whom must the risk be obvious? Was it always necessary for the risk to be obvious to a reasonable person? What if D was an expert who would have foreseen the risk but the reasonable person would not have done? (See further the commentary on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Reid (1989) 91 Cr App R 263 at [1991] Crim LR 269, 271.) Was the degree of risk that ought to have been foreseen restricted to serious risks?

¹²⁶ D Birch, 'The Foresight Saga: The Biggest Mistake of All' [1988] Crim LR 4. The relative culpability of one who gives no thought to the risk as compared to one who wrongly believes that there is no risk is difficult to assess. We need to know why the person had the state of mind. If it was because although he had the capacity to see the risk he was too careless or lazy to investigate the risks properly we would properly describe him as culpable: Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 255.

¹²⁷ (1983) 88 Cr App R 1, [1983] Crim LR 681.

not even considering the possibility that it might be loaded (as was the fact), aimed and fired it at V, breaking V's spectacles and destroying his eye, D would, under Caldwell, have been liable for recklessly causing criminal damage to the spectacles but would not have been criminally liable at all for the destruction of the eye because that offence (s 20 OAPA 1861) imposes a subjective test of malice. The law appeared to give greater protection to spectacles than to eyes.

Secondly, it failed to respect the principle that for serious crimes at least, the defendant should be proved to have a culpable state of mind. Caldwell allowed for conviction on the basis of D having no state of mind as to the risk of the proscribed harm. The most significant principled failing of the Caldwell approach was its potential to create injustice, and this led, ultimately, to its downfall. The test worked harshly in cases of young people and those whose capacity to see risk was diminished for reasons which involved no fault on their part. Recklessness was proved if the reasonable person would have foreseen the risk even if D did not or could not because of his lack of experience or understanding or intelligence.¹²⁸ For example, in Stephenson,¹²⁹ a homeless person sheltered in a hollow in a haystack. Feeling cold, he lit a fire in the hollow. The haystack was destroyed. Any reasonable person would have been aware of the risk but Stephenson was suffering from schizophrenia and may not have been aware of it. Because this was not clearly left to the jury, the court—pre-Caldwell—quashed his conviction. Even if he had stopped to think whether a risk existed, it is possible that, because of his condition, he might not have realized that there was a risk of damage. Stephenson would have been convicted under Caldwell. The objective test therefore had the potential to criminalize the blind person who damaged property being unaware of a risk which would have been obvious to a sighted person. And those with temporary disabilities—the person who strikes a match, being unaware because of his heavy cold that the premises reek of petrol fumes, could be convicted. Sir John Smith wrote of Caldwell: 'The decision sets back the law concerning the mental element in criminal damage in theory to before 1861.'¹³⁰

R v G

In G,¹³¹ Ds aged 11 and 12 went camping. During the night they set fire to newspapers in the yard at the back of a shop and threw the lit newspapers under a bin. They left without putting out the fire. The fire spread to the wheelie bin and to the shop causing £1m worth of damage. Ds' case was that they expected the newspapers to burn themselves out on the concrete floor. Neither appreciated the risk of the fire spreading as it did. They were charged with arson contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the 1971 Act. The judge directed the jury in accordance with Caldwell, expressing reservations about that being a harsh test in this context. The Court of Appeal upheld the convictions stating that Caldwell had been rightly applied and certified the issue of recklessness as one of general public importance. The House of Lords reviewed ¹²⁸ 'The criminal law ought not to be used to criminalise the merely stupid or irrational': Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 239.

¹²⁹ [1979] QB 695, [1979] Crim LR 590.

¹³⁰ [1981] Crim LR 393. Note that inadvertent recklessness is established in other jurisdictions: see eg the discussion of German law in JR Spencer and A Pedain, 'Strict Liability in Continental Criminal Law' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 241.

¹³¹ For criticism, see A Halpin, Definition in the Criminal Law (2004) Ch 3, especially 102–121; M Davies, 'Lawmakers, Law Lords and Legal Fault' (2004) 68 J Crim L 130, noting the 'delicious irony' that G was decided at a time when Parliament was introducing objective fault elements for serious sex offences in the Sexual Offences Act 2003. See also D Kimel, 'Inadvertent Recklessness in Criminal Law' (2004) 120 LQR 548 suggesting that the problem lay with the application of Caldwell in subsequent cases such as Elliott; and K Amirthalingham, 'Caldwell Recklessness is Dead: Long Live Mens Rea's Fecklessness' (2004) 63 MLR 491.

the history of the term ‘recklessness’¹³² and unanimously overruled Caldwell. It was recognized that having regard to the Law Commission Report No 29 on which the Criminal Damage Act 1971 was based, and the parliamentary intent, the majority in Caldwell erred in redefining ‘reckless’ in s 1 of the Act. The subjective test of recklessness required proof that the accused had foreseen the risk and yet had gone on unjustifiably to take it.¹³³ That was a much broader conclusion than was necessary to dispose of the certified question. The decision in Caldwell was acknowledged to be based on ‘fragile foundations’ because the House of Lords was not referred to the Law Commission Report. Moreover, Lord Bingham in G noted the fact that the majority decision in Caldwell had been in the face of a powerful dissent from Lord Edmund-Davies, and had been subjected to sustained and cogent academic¹³⁴ and judicial criticism.¹³⁵

Acknowledging the force of the principled criticisms outlined above, the House of Lords in G concluded that it should depart from Caldwell because it was ‘just’ to do so. Caldwell was castigated as being ‘unfair’, Lord Bingham referred to it as ‘neither just nor moral’ and Lord Steyn as a ‘cynical strategy’. Lord Steyn also cited UK treaty obligations and the general shift in recent years towards greater subjectivity in mens rea as supporting the outright overruling of Caldwell. In short, as Lord Bingham observed, whilst it is clearly blameworthy to take a risk obvious to the individual, it is not ‘clearly blameworthy’ to do something involving a risk of harm when D has not perceived that risk.¹³⁶ Professor Keating’s empirical work,¹³⁷ based on hypothetical scenarios similar to those in G, reveals that a large majority (69 per cent) of members of the public do regard behaviour such as that of the boys as criminally blameworthy. Most of those believed that the boys of that age (11 and 12) were old enough to have realized the risks involved. Of those who would not support convicting such boys, the majority were against doing so because of what they considered to be the inappropriateness of the application of the criminal process in such a case.

In G, their lordships rejected the narrower solution of a capacity-based exception to the Caldwell test. This approach had been suggested as a compromise between the subjectivism of Cunningham and the objectivism of Caldwell. It would have restricted Caldwell recklessness to cases in which D himself, having regard to his capacity to see risk, ought to have foreseen the risk of the proscribed harm. The House of Lords held that such an exception would be likely to create further difficulties in defining the relevant exceptional category, and would still impose liability generally on those who caused damage inadvertently.¹³⁸ Lord Bingham noted that:

¹³² Norrie suggests that a historical analysis reveals yet another approach to recklessness of which their lordships in G were seemingly unaware. In some of the earlier authorities, Norrie argues, the issue of cognitive foresight is stated separately from the question of recklessness. Norrie’s point is that the definition of recklessness that was favoured in the late nineteenth century juxtaposed a morally substantive element with the cognitive psychological test. Norrie relies on this to suggest that the opposition between subjective and objective recklessness is simplistic. See Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 80–82.

¹³³ Cunningham [1957] 2 QB 396, [1957] Crim LR 326.

¹³⁴ See n 120.

¹³⁵ Notably, Ackner LJ in Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334, and Goff LJ in Elliott v C (A Minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103, [1983] Crim LR 616.

¹³⁶ cf Lord Rodger of Earlsferry at [69], ‘there is much to be said for treating as reckless D who does not trouble his mind to a risk that would have been obvious to him’, and see the important article by J Horder, ‘Two Histories and Four Hidden Principles of Mens Rea’ (1997) 113 LQR 95. See also Kimel, n 131, commenting that this conclusion of Lord Bingham is ‘clearly unsatisfactory’. See also the review of the two approaches by S Cunningham, ‘Recklessness: Being Reckless and Acting Recklessly’ (2010) 21 KLJ 445–467.

¹³⁷ ‘Reckless Children’ [2006] Crim LR 546.

¹³⁸ See also A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 80–81.

this refinement also has attractions, although it does not meet the objection of principle and does not represent a correct interpretation of the section. It is, in my opinion, open to the further objection of over-complicating the task of the jury (or bench of justices). It is one thing to decide whether a defendant can be believed when he says that the thought of a given risk never crossed his mind. It is another, and much more speculative, task to decide whether the risk would have been obvious to him if the thought had crossed his mind. The simpler the jury's task, the more likely is its verdict to be reliable.¹³⁹

In practical terms, the House of Lords expressed concern at the complexity of Caldwell directions. Their lordships were confident that juries could be trusted to apply the Cunningham test without blindly accepting a defendant's assertion that he never thought of a certain risk when all the circumstances and probabilities and evidence of what he did and said at the time showed that he did or must have done. It was noted that there is nothing to suggest that this was seen as a problem before Caldwell.¹⁴⁰

The decision in G is also welcome for its explicit adoption of the key provision from the Draft Criminal Code defining recklessness. Lord Bingham based his conclusion on the Draft Criminal Code, cl 18(c) as quoted earlier.

Does Caldwell still have a role to play?

At one stage in the mid-1980s it looked as if the Caldwell test was destined to be the principal form of recklessness in English criminal law. Lord Roskill, when holding the Caldwell/Lawrence test to be applicable to manslaughter, said that 'reckless' should be given the Caldwell meaning in all offences, 'unless Parliament has otherwise ordained'.¹⁴¹ Even before G it was clear that its application was much more limited. Lord Bingham explicitly limited his judgment in that case to overruling Caldwell in its application to criminal damage,¹⁴² so the question remains: post-G, are there any offences to which the Caldwell formula applies? Other offences to which Caldwell had been applied included s 5 of the Data Protection Act 1984¹⁴³ but that has now been repealed by the Data Protection Act 1998. Blackstone's Criminal Practice (2003), immediately prior to G, suggested Caldwell applied to recklessly making a declaration, etc which is false in a material particular;¹⁴⁴ recklessly giving false information in purported compliance with any obligation under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971,¹⁴⁵ and recklessly making a misleading or deceptive statement or forecast.¹⁴⁶ Although some authority supported these propositions, it is submitted that there is now no basis for applying anything other than the test set out in the Draft Criminal Code, cl 18 as applied in G, to each of these offences.¹⁴⁷

The courts are vigilant in stopping any slide back into the Caldwell test. For example, in *Foster v CPS*¹⁴⁸ the Administrative Court quashed D's conviction for interfering with a badger sett by destroying it with intent or being reckless as to whether his actions would have that consequence, contrary to s 3 of the Protection of Badgers Act 1992. The case stated indicated that D had been convicted on the basis of his having been reckless in destroying the sett, rather than his destroying it intentionally. D claimed that he did not realize that badgers were still occupying the sett. In rejecting D's claim, the magistrates found that he was reckless on the basis that he would have been able to recognize the continued presence

¹³⁹ At [38]. ¹⁴⁰ At [39]. ¹⁴¹ Seymour [1983] 2 All ER 1058 at 1064, [1983] Crim LR 742, HL.

¹⁴² At [28]. ¹⁴³ Data Protection Registrar v Amnesty International [1995] Crim LR 633.

¹⁴⁴ Customs and Excise Management Act 1979, s 167(1). ¹⁴⁵ Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, s 18(3).

¹⁴⁶ Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 397(1)(c). This offence has since been replaced by the Financial Services Act 2012, s 89.

¹⁴⁷ For a theoretical discussion of why there ought to be uniform definitions of mens rea that are not context dependent, see F Stark, 'It's Only Words: On Meaning and Mens Rea' (2013) 72 CLJ 155.

¹⁴⁸ [2013] EWHC 3885 (Admin). See also Westlake v DPP [2016] EWHC 825 (Admin).

of badgers had he made rudimentary checks. King J held that the justices had applied the 'now discredited' test of inadvertent recklessness, which necessitated the quashing of D's conviction. This case demonstrates the importance of not conflating recklessness, which is a subjective test, with inadvertence, which has objective connotations.

3.2.2.6 The relative merits of subjective and objective recklessness

The decision in G is important in reasserting the primacy of subjectivism, echoing other significant decisions in the House of Lords.¹⁴⁹ Lord Rodger¹⁵⁰ acknowledged that there are academic arguments of substantial pedigree in favour of an objective approach to recklessness.¹⁵¹ The choice is not simply between strict subjective and objective approaches.¹⁵² Norrie suggests that G merely gives the law of recklessness the appearance of a fixed and stable nature. He argues that underneath the surface, recklessness still consists of two incompatible approaches, neither of which seems right on its own, but that no synthesis seems possible either.¹⁵³ Many commentators have put forward versions of a compromise position in which the unacceptable harshness of a purely objective test is avoided. These approaches seek to reflect D's culpability in failing to advert to a risk that would have been obvious to him, that is, one that was within his capacity to recognize.¹⁵⁴ Alternative suggestions have included tests of 'practical indifference'.¹⁵⁵

3.2.2.7 Indifference as to results

It is submitted that D's indifference to the risk of a relevant result, where it is proved to exist, is an aggravating factor, but not an element in the definition of the required fault.¹⁵⁶ A person who knowingly takes an unreasonable risk of causing a forbidden result may hope, sincerely and fervently, that it will never happen; but he is, surely, reckless. In Reid, Lord Goff suggested that a person may be indifferent to a risk without being aware of its existence.¹⁵⁷ Surely, however, the most we can say is that D would have been indifferent to the risk if he had been aware of it. Such a conclusion could usually be drawn only from evidence as to his general character and habits which the law of evidence does not allow.¹⁵⁸

The Law Commission did provisionally propose a form of reckless indifference in its offence of second degree murder. This concept was treated as a more culpable form of mens rea than 'simple' recklessness.¹⁵⁹ The Commission proposed that indifference to causing the proscribed result (in that case death) would be defined as follows:

¹⁴⁹ DPP v B [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403; K [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] Crim LR 993 (strict liability); (Morgan) Smith [2001] 1 AC 146, [2000] Crim LR 1004 (provocation).

¹⁵⁰ At [69].

¹⁵¹ See J Horder (1997) 113 LQR 95. For a comparative perspective of English, Dutch and German approaches to recklessness, see J Blomsma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 134 et seq.

¹⁵² For extensive analysis, see Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 82–88. ¹⁵³ ibid, 88.

¹⁵⁴ See HLA Hart, 'Negligence, Mens Rea and Criminal Responsibility' in Punishment and Responsibility (1968). See also Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 9; Duff, Answering for Crime, 70.

¹⁵⁵ Duff, Intention, Agency and Criminal Liability, arguing that a test of practical indifference could be applied where D's conduct, 'including any conscious risk taking, any failure to notice an obvious risk created by her action and any unreasonable beliefs on which she acted, display a seriously culpable practical indifference to the interests which the agent's actions in fact threatened', p 172. For a critique see Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 90–96. Norrie argues that Duff's approach is incompatible with the prevailing social and legal order.

¹⁵⁶ cf Gardiner [1994] Crim LR 455 and commentary.

¹⁵⁷ (1992) 95 Cr App R 391, HL. L Leigh, 'Recklessness after Reid' (1993) 56 MLR 208.

¹⁵⁸ cf the proposals by V Tadros, 'Recklessness and the Duty to Take Care' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory arguing that D should be liable if he did not fulfil his duty of investigating the risks which his 'background beliefs' led him to realize were present. See further Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 9.

¹⁵⁹ LCCP 177, para 3.21

D is indifferent, manifesting a 'couldn't care less' attitude to the result, when he or she realises that there is an unjustified risk of the result being caused by his or her conduct, but goes ahead with that conduct, causing the result. D's own assessment of the justifiability of taking the risk, in the circumstances, is to be considered, along with all the other evidence, in deciding whether D was recklessly indifferent and 'couldn't care less' about causing the result.¹⁶⁰

This would have created confusion by introducing a further test of recklessness into the law when it had only recently settled to a universally accepted test in G. The Law Commission resiled from this proposal in its final report, preferring a test based on one of subjective recklessness.¹⁶¹

3.2.2.8 Recklessness and indifference to circumstances

There is a particular difficulty in requiring proof of subjective recklessness as to an actus reus element which is of a morally indifferent nature. Many offences include in their definition that D does some act in specified circumstances, where the circumstances may appear to be completely arbitrary. For example, it is an offence to possess a shotgun with a barrel length of less than 24 inches unless you have a firearm certificate (as distinct from a shotgun certificate).¹⁶² The circumstance element of the offence is that the barrel is less than 24 inches. Should there be a requirement to prove mens rea as to that particular circumstance?

The answer will lie in the statutory definition of the offence. Definitions of various crimes involve such circumstance elements based on seemingly arbitrary lines as to a person's age, or as to time, weight, size and other matters of degree. There is no reason why a person who is unaware of the law should direct his mind to the question whether the arbitrary line has been crossed in the particular case, and ignorance of the law is no defence.¹⁶³ The possessor of the shotgun has no reason to consider whether the barrel is less than 24 inches in length unless he knows that, if it is, possession without a firearm certificate is an offence.¹⁶⁴ The case is different in a material respect from that of the person who has a positive but mistaken belief that the shotgun is under that length.

Glanville Williams¹⁶⁵ sought to resolve the difficulty by distinguishing between cases of 'mistaken belief' (where there is a positive belief) which will negative recklessness and 'simple ignorance' (where there is no advertence to the question) which will not. This distinction gained some support from Caldwell.¹⁶⁶ D can truly be said to be indifferent as to the circumstance—he does not care whether the barrel of the gun is more or less than 24 inches, because he is unaware that it matters. This principle, however, could only be properly applicable in respect of age, time, weight, size and other circumstances which everyone knows to exist in some degree. D knows that the barrel has length and, ex hypothesi, he does not care what it is. Where the circumstance is not simply a matter of degree but of kind, it is no longer possible to say that D was indifferent.¹⁶⁷ D may buy and deliver to V a book with an attractive cover without looking at the contents and without considering whether it might contain obscene material, but to infer that he was indifferent about the content would be quite unwarranted. It might be that, when he learned the ¹⁶⁰ ibid, para 3.150. For criticism, see A Norrie, 'Between Orthodox Subjectivism and Moral Contextualism: Intention and the Consultation Paper' [2006] Crim LR 489, 491; Wilson, n 103 [2006] Crim LR 471.

¹⁶¹ LC 304, para 2.56. ¹⁶² Firearms Act 1968, ss 1 and 4(4).

¹⁶³ cf Horder [2001] Crim LR 15. ¹⁶⁴ Firearms Act 1968, s 1.

¹⁶⁵ Williams, CLGP (1st edn) 122, (2nd edn) 151. Cf A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1995) [1996] 2 Cr App R 320, [1996] Crim LR 575.

¹⁶⁶ See p 105; cf Pigg (1982) 74 Cr App R 352, [1982] Crim LR 446.

¹⁶⁷ There is an argument that in relation to sex offences the fact that V is under 16 renders D's acts towards her qualitatively different. See Horder [2001] Crim LR 15.

facts, he might be quite horrified.¹⁶⁸ An objective form of mens rea may be appropriate in such a case.¹⁶⁹

3.2.2.9 Wilfulness and recklessness

The mens rea term ‘wilful’ appears in hundreds of statutory offences including some which are commonly prosecuted (eg wilfully obstructing a police officer: Police Act 1996, s 89). It also features in important common law offences including misconduct in public office.¹⁷⁰ It is surprising that the definition of the mens rea element ‘wilful’ or ‘wilfully’ is not as clear as it might be. Clarity of definition would certainly seem to be important. Historically, the term generated a great deal of inconsistent case law, particularly in the nineteenth century.¹⁷¹

The primary meaning of ‘wilful’ is ‘deliberate’ but it may also include recklessness, as accepted by the majority of the House of Lords in Sheppard.¹⁷² In the context of the offence under s 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, the parent must neglect the child ‘intending, or at least foreseeing, that the probable consequence of neglect is that the child will suffer injury to his health’.¹⁷³ Sheppard left a number of ambiguities, but in light of subsequent case law, including D,¹⁷⁴ these appear to have been resolved. First, few if any problems arise in satisfying the wilfulness test in any offence when it is alleged that D’s conduct was ‘wilful’ on the basis that his conduct was ‘deliberate’ or ‘intentional’. Secondly, when the allegation is that the alleged ‘wilfulness’ is demonstrated by D being reckless, it is now settled that the question is whether D was reckless in the subjective (G)¹⁷⁵ sense rather than the objective (Caldwell) sense of the word.¹⁷⁶ In other words, if D has seen the risk of the proscribed circumstances or consequences and has nevertheless gone on unreasonably to take that risk, his conduct can be described as wilful. Thirdly, the definition of wilful applies whether the allegation is that D performed acts or omissions within the definition of the relevant offence.¹⁷⁷ It would be illogical and create great practical difficulties if the definition of wilfulness for the offence differed depending on the form of harm alleged.

¹⁶⁸ The possessor of the shotgun might be equally horrified when they learned the law, but that is not the same thing. We are considering recklessness as to facts, not law. Cf Mousir [1987] Crim LR 561 and commentary.

¹⁶⁹ See Ch 30.

¹⁷⁰ Attorney-General’s Reference (No 3 of 2003) [2005] QB 73.

¹⁷¹ See Edwards, Mens Rea, Ch II; J Andrews, ‘Wilfulness: A Lesson in Ambiguity’ (1981) 1 LS 303. Andrews suggests (p 305) that one of the reasons that the meaning remained ambiguous in criminal law for so long was the ‘relative sloppiness’ in the ‘construction and practice’ of criminal law compared with the ‘greater degree of intellectual discipline which is commonly observed by those who make and practice in ‘commercial, chancery and revenue’ law’.

¹⁷² [1981] AC 394 at 408, [1981] Crim LR 17.

¹⁷³ At 408 per Lord Diplock. Note that the Serious Crime Act 2015, s 66 extends the offence so that ill-treatment may be ‘physical or otherwise’ and may in particular include a likelihood of injury ‘of a physical or psychological nature’.

¹⁷⁴ [2008] EWCA Crim 2360, [2009] Crim LR 280. See also Patel [2013] EWCA Crim 965 and Turbill [2013] EWCA Crim 1422, [2014] Crim LR 388 both of which concern the interpretation of ‘wilful’ in s 44 of the Mental Capacity Act 2005.

¹⁷⁵ [2003] UKHL 50, [2004] Crim LR 369.

¹⁷⁶ It was reiterated in Turbill [2013] EWCA Crim 1422, [2014] Crim LR 388 that wilfulness connotes a subjective state of mind and that Sheppard is the decisive precedent. It was also held, however, that ‘recklessness per se was not enough’ to be guilty of the offence of wilful neglect, contrary to s 44 of the Mental Capacity Act 2005. This is at odds with the definition of wilfulness that has now become reasonably settled, thus demonstrating how this term continues to be misinterpreted. See the commentary at [2014] Crim LR 388.

¹⁷⁷ See also Emma W [2006] EWCA Crim 2723. Lord Diplock in Sheppard had equivocated on this. His lordship sought expressly to confine his definition to omissions, but rejected as not a ‘natural meaning’ a narrower interpretation for positive acts which would limit wilful to mean only that the accused had mens rea as to the doing of the act and not its consequences: Sheppard at 404.

3.2.2.10 Reform of recklessness

The Law Commission's draft Criminal Law Bill (cl 1) reproducing, with a slight modification, the definition in the Draft Code (cl 18(b)) provides that:

a person acts—

(a) 'recklessly' with respect to—

(i) a circumstance, when he is aware of a risk that it exists or will exist, and

(ii) a result when he is aware of a risk that it will occur, and it is unreasonable, having regard to the circumstances known to him, to take that risk . . .

The draft Criminal Law Bill would apply this definition to non-fatal offences against the person, and the draft Code Bill would apply it to criminal offences generally. That would result in a great simplification of the law. It is submitted that it would also be a great improvement.

3.2.3 Negligence

After G and the eradication of Caldwell and Lawrence, it is possible once again confidently to draw a clear distinction between recklessness and negligence.¹⁷⁸ Recklessness is the conscious taking of an unjustifiable risk, while negligence is the inadvertent taking of an unjustifiable risk. If D is aware of the risk and decides to take it, he is reckless if that was unjustifiable; if he is unaware of the risk, but ought to have been aware of it, he is negligent.¹⁷⁹ Where D did consider whether or not there was a risk and concluded, wrongly and unreasonably, either that there was no risk, or the risk was so small that it would have been justifiable to take it, he is negligent.

3.2.4 Intention, recklessness and negligence as to circumstances

It is worth emphasizing again that intention, recklessness and negligence may be relevant not only to result elements of the actus reus but with respect to the circumstance elements too. Moreover, in some crimes intention as to one or more elements of the actus reus is needed, but mere recklessness or negligence will suffice as to another or other elements. For example, in the offence of sexual touching of a child under 16, D must intend to touch, but he need not intend that the child is under 16; it is sufficient to found liability that D does not have a reasonable belief that the child is 16 or older.

It would seem that, in determining whether D's fault amounted to intention, recklessness or negligence, the same criteria should be applied to circumstances as to consequences. So an act is intentional as to a circumstance¹⁸⁰ when D wants the circumstance to exist or knows that it exists; or, if the broader view of intention¹⁸¹ is accepted, he is virtually certain that it exists. He is reckless whether a circumstance exists or will exist if D is aware of a risk that it exists or will exist and unjustifiably takes the risk. He is negligent with respect to a circumstance when a reasonable person would know that it exists or will exist and D fails to appreciate that it exists, whether he has given thought to the question or not.

¹⁷⁸ See Ch 4, and J Brady, 'Recklessness, Negligence, Indifference and Awareness' (1980) 43 MLR 381.

¹⁷⁹ Orthodoxy suggests that negligence is an objective state of mind; however, there are those who argue that negligence can be reconciled with subjectivism by adding the element that D had the personal capacity to reach the required standard. See Horder, APOCL, 204–207.

¹⁸⁰ This is not the same as saying that the circumstance is intended, because that implies a belief by D that he may be able to influence the existence of the circumstance. ¹⁸¹ See p 91.

3.2.5 Knowledge

By comparison with mens rea elements such as intention and recklessness, knowledge has attracted comparatively little scholarship. Academic attention has focused on how knowledge plays a part in the general scheme of mens rea and to what extent it factors into negative fault elements (ie mistaken beliefs) that displace mens rea. It is, however, a term deserving attention as it features in many statutes. It is usually considered to sit alongside intention in the mens rea hierarchy, but whereas intention is usually descriptive of states of mind as to consequences (eg I intend to kill), knowledge is usually used in relation to circumstances (eg importing an article or substance knowing it is prohibited).

Knowledge is not the only legislative term to describe prohibited states of mind as to circumstances. Parliament has deployed a range of terms: 'knowledge', 'belief', 'suspicion', 'having reasonable grounds to suspect' and even 'recklessness'. These different terms do not share the same meaning in law. The terms are used in many offences as alternative mens rea requirements.¹⁸² The difficult issue lies in identifying the respective boundaries of each concept. More light has been shed on the matter by academic scholarship, with Professors Shute and Sullivan¹⁸³ in particular seeking to identify essential conditions which must exist before a state of mind might legitimately be described as 'knowledge'. The current definition of knowledge in English criminal law is that it is satisfied by proof of a true belief. For example, D knows goods are stolen when he correctly believes that they are.

The judicial view is clear: knowledge is true belief and one cannot know something or some circumstance that has yet to occur. As the Canadian Supreme Court explained in USA v Dynar:¹⁸⁴

In the Western legal tradition, knowledge is defined as true belief: 'The word "know" refers exclusively to true knowledge; we are not said to "know" something that is not so'.

This view has been endorsed in the House of Lords in two modern cases. In Montila,¹⁸⁵ the House accepted that:

A person cannot know that something is A when in fact it is B. The proposition that a person knows that something is A is based on the premise that it is true that it is A. The fact that the property is A provides the starting point. Then there is the question whether the person knows that the property is A.¹⁸⁶

Subsequently, in Saik the House of Lords concluded:

the word 'know' should be interpreted strictly and not watered down. In this context knowledge means true belief.¹⁸⁷

In conspiracy, for example, if D1 and D2 agree that they will, in the future, exchange money that comes into their bureau de change, they cannot be said to be agreeing to launder money which they know to be from a criminal source if they merely see the risk that it might be from a criminal source.¹⁸⁸

¹⁸² See the comprehensive catalogue provided by S Shute, 'Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, Ch 8, and see GR Sullivan, 'Knowledge, Belief and Culpability', ibid, Ch 9.

¹⁸³ See n 182. ¹⁸⁴ [1997] 2 SCR 462 (emphasis added).

¹⁸⁵ [2004] 1 WLR 3141, [2005] Crim LR 479. ¹⁸⁶ At [27].

¹⁸⁷ At [26]. See also Hooper LJ in Liaquat Ali and others [2005] EWCA Crim 87, [2005] 2 Cr App R 864 (at [98]), [2005] Crim LR 864.

¹⁸⁸ They might be said to intend that circumstance. See Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998. Relied upon in Sentamu [2013] EWCA Crim 248.

3.2.5.1 Distinguishing knowledge from belief and suspicion

The orthodox view is that ‘one cannot know a thing unless it is so’,¹⁸⁹ and ‘one cannot know a thing will be so unless it will be so’.¹⁹⁰ The critical feature distinguishing knowledge and belief is that the fact or circumstance ‘is’.¹⁹¹ As Shute acknowledges ‘there are good reasons why the law should decline to extend its definition of knowledge generally to include knowledge that [the disputed proposition] is possible, likely, etc’.¹⁹² Mere suspicion is therefore not knowledge.¹⁹³ The more difficult question lies in distinguishing knowledge from mere belief.¹⁹⁴

3.2.6 Belief

The relationship between knowledge and belief has been examined in close detail in the context of handling stolen goods. According to the Court of Appeal in Hall:¹⁹⁵

Belief, of course, is something short of knowledge. It may be said to be the state of mind of a person who says to himself: ‘I cannot say I know for certain that [the circumstance exists] but there can be no other reasonable conclusion in the light of all the circumstances, in the light of all that I have heard and seen’.

In Forsyth,¹⁹⁶ the court said that the judgment in Hall is ‘potentially confusing’. In Moys,¹⁹⁷ the court suggested simply that the question whether D knew or believed that the proscribed circumstance existed is a subjective one and that suspicion, even coupled with the fact that D shut his eyes to the circumstances, is not enough.

3.2.7 Wilful blindness

For centuries the courts have¹⁹⁸ willingly interpreted knowledge as including ‘shutting one’s eyes to an obvious means of knowledge’ or ‘deliberately refraining from making inquiries the results of which the person does not care to have’.¹⁹⁹ Even the House of Lords controversially adopted this proposition:

It is always open to the tribunal of fact, when knowledge on the part of a defendant is required to be proved, to base a finding of knowledge on evidence that the defendant had deliberately shut his eyes to the obvious or refrained from inquiry because he suspected the truth but did not want to have his suspicion confirmed.²⁰⁰

¹⁸⁹ JC Smith, ‘Conspiracy under the Criminal Law Act 1977 (1)’ [1977] Crim LR 598, 603.

¹⁹⁰ ibid. See also G Williams, CLGP (1953) 133, and more generally writings on knowledge in philosophy—eg AJ Ayer, The Problem of Knowledge, ‘I conclude that the necessary and sufficient conditions for knowing that something is the case are first that what one is said to know be true, secondly that one be sure of it and thirdly that one should have the right to be sure’ at 35, cited by R Buxton, ‘Complicity in the Criminal Code’ (1969) 85 LQR 252.

¹⁹¹ As is made clear in Hall (1985) 81 Cr App R 260, [1985] Crim LR 377, knowing a fact might be is not the same as knowing it is.

¹⁹² Shute, ‘Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law’ in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 195.

¹⁹³ ‘Suspicion in its ordinary meaning is a state of conjecture or surmise where proof is lacking: ‘I suspect but I cannot prove’: Hussein v Chong Fook Kam [1970] AC 942, 948. See also Griffiths (1974) 60 Cr App R 14, CA. These authorities have been cited with approval in numerous cases. For a more recent example, see R (on the application of ‘A’) v Chief Constable of ‘C’ Constabulary [2014] EWHC 216 (Admin), [2014] Crim LR 761.

¹⁹⁴ Hall (1985) 81 Cr App R 260, 264, see p 1050. ¹⁹⁵ ibid at 264, [1985] Crim LR 377.

¹⁹⁶ A Hall direction is not necessary in every case—Toor (1987) 85 Cr App R 116, [1987] Crim LR 122.

¹⁹⁷ (1984) 79 Cr App R 72, [1984] Crim LR 494, CA.

¹⁹⁸ See the discussion of the early case law in Edwards, Mens Rea (1955) Ch IX, ‘The Criminal Degrees of Knowledge in Statutory Offences’, 194.

¹⁹⁹ Roper v Taylor’s Central Garages (Exeter) [1951] 2 TLR 284 (Devlin J). See also eg Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 2 AC 256, 279 (Lord Reid); Atwal v Massey (1972) 56 Cr App R 6, DC.

²⁰⁰ Westminster City Council v Croyalgrange Ltd (1986) 83 Cr App R 155, 164 (Lord Bridge), [1986] Crim LR 693.

A precise definition of wilful blindness or connivance²⁰¹ remains elusive.²⁰² Perhaps the best known exposition of the concept is that of Devlin J in Roper v Taylor's Central Garages (Exeter). His lordship distinguished: (a) actual knowledge; (b) wilful blindness (knowledge in the second degree); and (c) constructive knowledge (knowledge in the third degree).²⁰³ Actual knowledge has been considered: it means true belief. As for wilful blindness, Devlin J emphasized:

a vast distinction between a state of mind which consists of deliberately refraining from making inquiries, the result of which a person does not care to have [wilful blindness], and a state of mind which is merely neglecting to make such inquiries as a reasonable and prudent person would make [constructive knowledge].²⁰⁴

Other judicial definitions²⁰⁵ have variously incorporated elements of:

- (1) a deliberate or intentional refusal to investigate the circumstances suspected;
- (2) an opportunity to investigate them;
- (3) an absence of doubt as to outcome or at least an awareness by D of the likely outcome of investigation and that the outcome would not be one D desired if he investigated his suspicions;
- (4) a causal link between the refusal to investigate and the assumed likely outcome.²⁰⁶

The core elements appear to be a degree of awareness of the likely existence of the prohibited circumstances coupled with a blameworthy conscious refusal to enlighten oneself. Academic opinion seems united in requiring proof of more than mere suspicion.²⁰⁷ Glanville Williams described it in terms of suspicion ‘plus’ a deliberate omission to inquire.²⁰⁸ More recently Sullivan described it in terms of ‘suspicion coupled with deliberate failure to use readily available and effective means to resolve the suspicion’.²⁰⁹ However described, the ²⁰¹ See Winson [1969] 1 QB 371, 383 (Parker LCJ). Old statutes often used the word ‘connivance’ but none currently seem to use wilful blindness.

²⁰² It seems this was owing to the confusion historically over its relationship with vicarious liability: Edwards, Mens Rea, 196–198.

²⁰³ More sophisticated subdivisions have been attempted including Peter Gibson J’s five categories in the Baden case [1993] 1 WLR 509, para 250. Although these were rejected as unhelpful by the House of Lords in the particular context of dishonesty in Royal Brunei Airlines v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378, they are worth noting: ‘(i) actual knowledge; (ii) wilfully shutting one’s eyes to the obvious; (iii) wilfully and recklessly failing to make such inquiries as an honest and reasonable man would make; (iv) knowledge of circumstances which would indicate the facts to an honest and reasonable man; (v) knowledge of circumstances which would put an honest and reasonable man on inquiry.’

²⁰⁴ Roper v Taylor's Central Garages (Exeter) [1951] 2 TLR 284, 288. See also Davis LJ in Wheeler [2014] EWCA Crim 2706: ‘wilfully shutting eyes to the obvious may constitute evidence connoting knowledge or belief; and it need not necessarily be assumed in all cases that suspicion is all that can safely be inferred from the relevant facts’ (at [10]).

²⁰⁵ See those discussed by Edwards, Mens Rea, 199. The Draft Criminal Code also suggests that knowledge includes wilful blindness in cl 18(1)(a); a person acts knowingly ‘with respect to a circumstance not only when he is aware that it exists or will exist but also when he avoids taking steps that might confirm his belief that it exists or will exist’.

²⁰⁶ See eg Roper; Agip (Africa) Ltd v Jackson [1990] Ch 265, 293 ‘deliberately shutting eyes to facts he would prefer not to know’; ‘it is a commonplace that, if the accused had a suspicion but deliberately shut his eyes, the court or jury is well entitled to hold him guilty’; Warner v MPC [1969] AC 256, 279 (Lord Reid). See also Evan v Dell [1937] 1 All ER 349, 353: ‘deliberately refraining from making inquiries, the results of which [D] might not care to have’.

²⁰⁷ Although not judicially accepted in the nineteenth century: see Edwards, Mens Rea, 207.

²⁰⁸ CLGP (1953) 127, para 41. In his article on mens rea in secondary liability, ‘Complicity, Purpose and the Draft Criminal Code’ [1990] Crim LR 98, he described the element as ‘an attempted fraud on the law’, fn 4.

²⁰⁹ See Sullivan, ‘Knowledge, Belief and Culpability’ in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 214.

second limb of the test requires that D must have possessed more than a state of awareness of the risk—he must demonstrate a blameworthiness²¹⁰ in his lack of inquiry that justifies treating his state of mind as akin to actual knowledge.²¹¹

The boundaries of ‘wilful blindness’ are imprecise. None of the core elements are defined with adequate precision. It is unclear what degree of awareness of risk D must hold. Is suspicion sufficient or must D hold a belief?²¹² It is unclear how readily available the bases of enlightenment must be to D. Is he only wilfully blind if he can reasonably or immediately discover the truth, or is the matter one of proportionality depending on the degree of risk and the severity of the harm posed if the risk materializes? It is unclear how convinced of the outcome of investigation D must be—must it be proved, as Horder suggests, that D refrained from making inquiries because he was virtually certain that suspicion would be confirmed?²¹³ Further, to constitute wilful blindness it is unclear what motivation or purpose D must have in seeking to avoid the enlightenment for his refusal. In principle, there are strong arguments against the courts applying a mens rea element of wilful blindness unless its elements can be defined with much greater precision.

Some commentators²¹⁴ suggest that recklessness is akin to wilful blindness, but academic consensus seems to be that wilful blindness is a narrower category of mens rea.²¹⁵ It is narrower for several reasons including: (a) it assumes that D has the opportunity to avail himself of the facts or circumstances that he is aware may exist; (b) that D’s assessment of the likelihood of the fact is higher than foresight of a risk (as required for recklessness);²¹⁶ and (c) he intentionally chooses not to enlighten himself. The distinction has been acknowledged in other jurisdictions, for example the Canadian Supreme Court has observed:

Wilful blindness is distinct from recklessness because, while recklessness involves knowledge of a danger or risk and persistence in a course of conduct which creates a risk that the prohibited result will occur, wilful blindness arises where a person who has become aware of the need for some inquiry declines to make the inquiry because he does not wish to know the truth. He would prefer to remain ignorant.²¹⁷

3.2.8 Suspicion and reasonable grounds to suspect

Parliament has demonstrated a greater willingness in recent years to create offences with low-level mens rea requirements such as ‘suspicion’ and ‘having reasonable grounds to suspect’. The money laundering offences in POCA 2002 are some of the most obvious examples.²¹⁸ The Terrorism Acts also include offences based on suspicion. By s 18(1) of the ²¹⁰ See generally M Wasik and MP Thompson, ‘Turning a Blind Eye as Constituting Mens Rea’ (1981) 32 NILQ 324, 337–341.

²¹¹ Described as ‘purposeful avoidance’ by W Wilson, Criminal Law: Doctrine and Theory (2001) 167.

²¹² G Williams argued that it should be ‘realisation that the fact in question is probable, or at least possible above average’, CLGP, 127, para 41. The Law Commission proposed a formula based on D having ‘no substantial doubt’. See Wasik and Thompson (1981) 32 NILQ 324, 333.

²¹³ Horder, APOCL, 204.

²¹⁴ IH Dennis, ‘The Mental Element for Accessories’ in Criminal Law Essays. Edwards treated them as similar in his Mens Rea in Criminal Statutes, citing only very few instances where they were treated as synonymous, 203.

²¹⁵ See the characteristically forthright statements of EJ Griew, ‘Consistency, Communication and Codification Reflection on Two Mens Rea Words’ in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 73.

²¹⁶ Especially when recklessness is construed in its subjective sense following G [2004] 1 AC 1034.

²¹⁷ R v Williams [2004] 2 LRC 499, [27], quoting from Sansregret v R [1985] 1 SCR 570 at 584 (McIntyre J).

²¹⁸ The offences are much broader in respect of mens rea than the international treaties demand as noted by their lordships in Montila [2004] UKHL 50 at [28], [2005] Crim LR 479.

Terrorism Act 2000, a person commits an offence if he enters into an arrangement which facilitates another person's retention or control of terrorist property, but it is a defence for D to prove that he 'did not know and had no reasonable cause to suspect' that the arrangement related to such property.²¹⁹ Requiring only that D 'suspects' relevant facts is a remarkably low threshold for a criminal offence; 'suspicion' and 'reasonable suspicion' have been criticized as too low even as a threshold for the exercise of certain police powers (in which area of law they are commonly found in statutes).

3.2.8.1 The meaning of 'suspicion'

In Da Silva,²²⁰ 'suspicion' was held to impose a subjective test: D's suspicion need not be based on 'reasonable grounds'.²²¹ D must think that there is a possibility, which is more than fanciful, that the relevant facts exist. The court held that:

A vague feeling of unease would not suffice. But the statute does not require the suspicion to be 'clear' or 'firmly grounded and targeted on specific facts' or based on 'reasonable grounds'.²²²

The court stated that using words such as 'inkling' or 'fleeting thought' is liable to mislead.

The Civil Division of the Court of Appeal has endorsed this subjective test of suspicion. In Shah v HSBC,²²³ the court held that a bank had suspicion that property was criminal if it thought there was a possibility, which was more than fanciful, that it was criminal. There was no requirement to show that that suspicion had been clear or firmly grounded and targeted on specific facts or based on reasonable grounds.

The courts have adopted the dictionary definitions, which are consistent with the previous judicial interpretations of the concept of suspicion in the related field of criminal procedure. One of the most famous statements is that of Lord Devlin in Hussien v Chang Fook Kam:²²⁴

Suspicion in its ordinary meaning is a state of conjecture or surmise where proof is lacking: 'I suspect but I cannot prove'. Suspicion arises at or near the starting point of an investigation of which the obtaining of prima facie proof is the end.

Further (albeit limited) guidance might be derived from the numerous decisions of the Court of Appeal on the mens rea of handling stolen goods, in which the distinction between belief and 'mere' suspicion has been problematic.²²⁵ The court in Da Silva was right, it is submitted, not to impose a gloss on the definition by requiring that the suspicion be 'clear' or 'firmly grounded and targeted on specific facts', even though that approach has been adopted by the House of Lords in various civil law contexts.

The court in Da Silva expressed concern about the need for a more detailed direction in cases in which D has suspected but then 'honestly dismissed' his suspicion. This should not be made complicated. This is not a situation in which there is 'a lacuna' where D has failed to form the suspicion despite addressing his mind to it. The appropriate question is, it is submitted, whether D has formed the suspicion and whether he holds that state of mind at the time at which he performs the acts alleged to constitute the actus reus. If D had been ²¹⁹ See the Terrorism Act 2000, s 18(2).

²²⁰ [2006] EWCA Crim 1654, [2007] Crim LR 77.

²²¹ For further discussion as to what is meant by 'knowledge', 'belief' and 'suspicion': see G Williams, 'Handling, Theft and the Purchaser Who Takes a Chance' [1985] Crim LR 432 and see Hall [1985] Crim LR 377; Toor (1987) 85 Cr App R 116, [1987] Crim LR 122.

²²² At [16]. Applied in Afolabi [2009] EWCA Crim 2879.

²²³ [2010] EWCA Civ 31. The court's interpretation of suspicion was held to apply in the civil law relating to money laundering, K Ltd v National Westminster Bank Plc [2006] EWCA Civ 1039.

²²⁴ [1970] AC 942 at 948.

²²⁵ See Hall (1985) 81 Cr App R 260, [1985] Crim LR 377, CA; Forsyth [1997] 2 Cr App R 299, [1997] Crim LR 581.

suspicious, but by the time of the act those suspicions had been allayed by the receipt of other information, this will mean that he lacked the necessary mens rea.

As the Privy Council confirmed in Holt v Attorney-General,²²⁶ the test is a subjective one: actual suspicion is essential, it is not enough to show that D 'ought to have realised'.²²⁷

3.2.8.2 'Reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting'

In Saik,²²⁸ the House of Lords held that the mens rea element 'reasonable grounds to suspect' in the context of s 93C(2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, and now found, for example, in many of the money laundering provisions²²⁹ includes a requirement that D had actual suspicion.²³⁰ Lord Hope concluded that 'the first requirement contains both a subjective part—that the person suspects—and an objective part—that there are reasonable grounds for the suspicion'.²³¹

It had previously been widely assumed that this fault element was a purely objective one,²³² requiring proof only that the reasonable person would have formed the suspicion on the facts available, irrespective of whether the individual defendant formed such suspicion himself. The test is now confirmed, in this context, as a mixed one comprising subjective (D suspects) and objective (there are reasonable grounds for D doing so) elements. This echoes the approach in police powers contexts, although arguably those are distinguishable because the dual requirement there serves as a check on the abuse of authority. It is easy to envisage circumstances in which the Crown will fail to prove this element because D lacked suspicion (through naivety or stupidity) even though reasonable grounds existed for forming suspicion. But in what circumstances is a prosecution ever likely to falter because D had suspicion, but his suspicion was one not based on reasonable grounds? There is a strong case for saying that, as a matter of policy, a person ought not to be criminally culpable for his failure to suspect even if, objectively viewed, there were grounds for suspecting.

In AB and CD,²³³ the Court of Appeal considered the construction of s 17 of the Terrorism Act 2000. This provision makes it an offence to enter into or become concerned in an arrangement as a result of which money or other property is made available or is to be made available to another and D knows or has reasonable cause to suspect that it will or may be used for the purposes of terrorism. Lloyd Jones LJ, as he then was, held that an individual can commit this offence even if he did not subjectively suspect that the money or other property is or was to be made available for the purposes of terrorism. To commit the offence, it suffices for the jury to be sure that there existed reasonable grounds for suspecting that the property would or might be used for a prohibited purpose. Whether the Supreme Court agrees with this construction remains to be seen.

²²⁶ [2014] UKPC 4.

²²⁷ In that case involving money laundering, D had to shown to have applied mind to the circumstances in which the money had been produced and to have knowledge or suspicion that it would be irregular to receive trust money.

²²⁸ [2006] 2 WLR 993, [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

²²⁹ The expression 'reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting' appears in POCA, s 330 (failure to disclose: regulated sector), s 331 (failure to disclose: nominated officers in the regulated sector), and s 337 (protected disclosure). The shorter phrase 'reasonable grounds for suspecting' appears in many other sections of POCA.

²³⁰ See principally Lord Hope's speech at [52]–[55]. See further the commentary at [2006] Crim LR 998.

²³¹ At [53].

²³² The assumption that the term 'reasonable grounds to suspect' was in this context a purely objective one is supported by the use of that term as a form of fault in some POCA offences (cf Lord Brown at [110]). Eg in s 330 of the 2002 Act it is a sufficient mens rea either that the defendant suspected, or that he had reasonable grounds to suspect, the relevant facts.

²³³ [2017] EWCA Crim 129.

3.3 Further principles of mens rea

Mens rea is a term which has no single meaning. Every crime has its own mens rea which can be ascertained only by reference to its statutory definition or the case law. The most we can do is to state a general principle, or presumption, which governs its definition.

Having understood the meaning attaching to each mens rea element as discussed earlier, it is necessary to apply them in the context of the particular offence charged. It is necessary to examine the structure of the offence with care, seeking to identify each of the elements of the actus reus and then to identify what mens rea element, if any, attaches to each actus reus element.

For example, in criminal damage, the actus reus elements are D's conduct, towards property belonging to another (circumstances), which results in its damage or destruction (result). The mens rea elements are that D's conduct is voluntary, that he intends or is reckless whether the property belongs to another and he intends or is reckless whether it is damaged. There is complete 'correspondence' in that offence because every element of actus reus has an element of mens rea attaching to it.

3.3.1 The correspondence principle

The general principle,²³⁴ which is a desirable one though not always respected by Parliament, is expressed in the Draft Criminal Code as follows:

24—(1) Unless a contrary intention appears, a person does not commit a Code offence unless he acts intentionally, knowingly or recklessly in respect of each of its elements . . .

The justification for requiring mens rea as to every element of the actus reus is that it must be presumed that every element contributes to the criminality of it. If it does not, it should not be there.²³⁵ The requirement is therefore described as one of correspondence between the elements of actus reus and mens rea. This is an important aspect of the subjective approach to mens rea.

However, under the present law very many offences fall far short of precise correspondence; there are elements of the actus reus to which no corresponding mens rea attaches.²³⁶ For example, in assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to s 47 of the OAPA 1861,²³⁷ the actus reus elements are that D's conduct causes V to (1) either (a) apprehend immediate unlawful personal violence or (b) have direct physical force applied to his body and (2) suffer some minor injury as a result. The mens rea elements are that D's conduct is voluntary and that he intentionally or recklessly causes (1)(a) or (b). There is no mens rea attaching to (2).

3.3.1.1 Constructive crime

Sometimes the mens rea for a crime 'X' requires no more than proof that D had the mens rea of a lesser offence 'Y'—this is sometimes called 'constructive' crime. Liability for X is constructed from D performing the actus reus for X with the mens rea for Y. For example, an intention to cause serious bodily harm is the mens rea of murder. There is no need to prove ²³⁴ For comparisons of English, Dutch and German approaches correspondence, see J Blomsma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 206–234.

²³⁵ A view criticized by J Horder in writing on the requirement of mens rea as to age in sex crimes, 'How Culpability Can, and Cannot, be Denied in Under-Age Sex Crimes' [2001] Crim LR 15. See also the more general debate about the application of the correspondence principle and its merits: J Horder, 'A Critique of the Correspondence Principle' [1995] Crim LR 759; B Mitchell, 'In Defence of a Principle of Correspondence' [1999] Crim LR 195; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 3 and 256–258; see also LCCP 177, Ch 2.

²³⁶ For the relationship between strict liability and constructive liability, see SP Green, 'Six Senses of Strict Liability' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability.

²³⁷ The offence is examined in full in Ch 16, this is a simplistic summary.

that D intended to cause, or was reckless whether he caused, death—although death is the crucial element in the definition.²³⁸ Lords Mustill and Steyn have criticized the application of this rule in murder as a ‘conspicuous anomaly’ and an example of ‘constructive crime’.²³⁹ Similarly, manslaughter may be committed by doing an unlawful and dangerous act which happens to cause death, although D has no mens rea as to the death.

Those are common law offences, but statutes are sometimes similarly interpreted. For example, constructive crime (ie where the mens rea of a lesser offence suffices for a greater) is the general rule in offences against the person. D may be convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm, if he foresaw some harm, not necessarily ‘grievous’.²⁴⁰ Section 47 of the OAPA (as set out in the previous section) is another example: D is liable for the s 47 offence even though he foresaw no harm to V but had only the mens rea for the lesser offence of assault or battery.

Some offences are so defined that it is sufficient to prove intention with respect to only one or more elements in the definition of the actus reus. Sometimes it is enough to prove only negligence; sometimes even this is not necessary and D may be convicted although he was blamelessly inadvertent as to a circumstance of the actus reus. In the latter case, we shall say that the crime imposes ‘strict liability’ as to that circumstance.²⁴¹ Strict liability is discussed in Ch 5.

3.3.1.2 Ulterior intent

There is another way in which some offences fail to respect precise correspondence between actus reus and mens rea. Unlike constructive crimes where there are elements of actus reus without mens rea, with some crimes there are elements of mens rea that do not attach to an element of actus reus. These are called crimes of ulterior intent. Crimes are quire commonly defined so that the mens rea includes an intention to produce some further consequence beyond the actus reus of the crime in question. Burglary is an example. It is not enough that D intended to enter a building as a trespasser; that is, to achieve the actus reus of burglary. It is necessary to go further and to show that D had the intention of committing one of a number of specified offences in the building. To be guilty of burglary it is not necessary that D committed any one of those offences—that is not part of the actus reus of burglary which is complete as soon as D enters. Other examples include causing grievous bodily harm with intent to resist the lawful apprehension of any person,²⁴² and placing gunpowder near a building with intent to do bodily injury to any person.²⁴³ Where such an ulterior intent must be proved, it is sometimes referred to as a ‘specific intent’.²⁴⁴ This term, however, is one which should be regarded with caution.²⁴⁵ It is variously used to mean: (a) whatever intention has to be proved to establish guilt of the particular crime before the court;²⁴⁶ (b) a ‘direct’ as distinct from an ‘oblique’ intention;²⁴⁷ or ²³⁸ For criticism see LCCP 177, paras 3.17 etseq, A Ashworth (2008) 11 New Crim LR 232.

²³⁹ In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1998] 1 Cr App R 91, [1997] Crim LR 829, p 124 and Powell and Daniels [1999] 1 AC 1, [1998] 1 Cr App R 261, [1998] Crim LR 48, p 506. Simester suggests that constructive crimes are not unfair if the element of actus reus to which lesser mens rea attaches is not unrelated to the actus reus for which D is required to have mens rea. So in an offence of causing death by dangerous driving, the fact that no mens rea as to death is required does not render the crime unfair since there is an element of mens rea as to the driving and the element of death is an ‘intrinsic’ risk to the element of driving. Seemingly, on this test, unlawful act manslaughter is not fair since although there is a requirement of mens rea as to some harm being caused to V, death (as to which no mens rea attaches) is not an intrinsic risk to that harm: see Appraising Strict Liability, 46.

²⁴⁰ cf the proposals of the Law Commission in its Report No 218, on offences against the person where the correspondence principle is respected in full. See Ch 16. Note also LCCP 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person (2014) and the report LC 361 (2015).

²⁴¹ See Ch 5. ²⁴² OAPA 1861, s 18. ²⁴³ ibid, s 30.

²⁴⁴ See R Perkins, ‘A Rationale of Mens Rea’ (1939) 52 Harv LR 905, 924.

²⁴⁵ See R Cross, ‘Specific Intent’ [1961] Crim LR 510.

²⁴⁶ DPP v Beard [1920] AC 479 at 501–502; p 312.

²⁴⁷ See p 95. Steane [1947] KB 997 at 1004.

(c) an intention ulterior to the actus reus; or (d) a category of crime where D may successfully plead lack of the prescribed mens rea notwithstanding the fact that he relies on evidence that he was intoxicated at the time.²⁴⁸ The phrase ‘ulterior intent’ is therefore preferred. The nature of the ulterior intent which does not relate to an element of actus reus varies widely from crime to crime—in burglary it is an intention to commit one of a number of specified offences; in forgery it is an intention to cause V to act to his prejudice, in theft it is an intention permanently to deprive the owner, and so on.²⁴⁹

Where an ulterior intent is required, it is obvious that recklessness is not enough. On a charge of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm, proof that D was reckless whether he caused grievous bodily harm will not suffice.²⁵⁰

It should again be emphasized that most crimes do not require ulterior intent. In rape, for example, it is enough that D intentionally perpetrated the actus reus—penile penetration of a person’s vagina, anus or mouth without their consent—and no ulterior intention need be proved.

Bearing in mind the existence of constructive crimes and crimes of ulterior intent, it is obvious that careful analysis of the offence is always required. It cannot be assumed that there will be perfect correspondence between actus reus and mens rea.

3.3.2 Transferred malice or transferred mens rea

If D, with the mens rea of a particular crime, causes the actus reus of the same crime,²⁵¹ he is guilty, even though the result, in some respects, is an unintended one. D intends to murder X and, in the dusk, shoots at a person whom he believes to be X. He hits and kills the person at whom he aims, who is in fact V.²⁵² In one sense this is obviously an unintended result; but D did intend to cause the actus reus which he has caused and he is guilty of murder. Similarly, where D intends to enter a house, No 6 King Street, and steal property. In the dark he mistakenly enters No 8. He is guilty of burglary.²⁵³

The law, however, carries this principle still further. Suppose that D, intending to murder X, shoots at a man who is in fact X, but misses and kills V who unknown to D was standing close by. This is an unintended result in a different—and more fundamental—respect than the example considered above. Yet, once again, D, with the mens rea of a particular crime, has caused the actus reus of the same crime; and, once again, he is guilty of murder. So, where D struck X, who fell against V, who also fell and sustained a fatal injury, D was guilty of manslaughter: ‘The criminality of the doer of the act is precisely the same whether it is [X] or [V] who dies.’²⁵⁴ The application of the principle to cases of this second type is known as the doctrine of ‘transferred malice’.²⁵⁵

²⁴⁸ See p 316. See the discussion of Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2007] Crim LR 654, p 318.

²⁴⁹ See J Horder, ‘Crimes of Ulterior Intent’ in A Simester and ATH Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (1996) 153, arguing for more crimes of this nature to reflect more accurately the moral differences in wrongdoing.

²⁵⁰ Belfon [1976] 3 All ER 46, where this passage was cited at 49, [1976] 1 WLR 741, 744, [1976] Crim LR 449.

²⁵¹ See Hussain [1969] 2 QB 567, [1969] Crim LR 433 and commentary; Ellis, Street and Smith (1987) 84 Cr App R 235, [1987] Crim LR 44 and commentary; cf Kundeus (1976) 24 CCC (2d) 276 at 282–283.

²⁵² Horder calls this an ‘impersonality doctrine’ [2006] Crim LR 383 at 384.

²⁵³ See Wrigley [1957] Crim LR 57.

²⁵⁴ Mitchell [1983] QB 741, [1983] Crim LR 549, CA. Cf Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [2000] 3 All ER 890, [2000] Crim LR 758, DC.

²⁵⁵ See Ashworth, Reshaping the Criminal Law, 77–94 and Crime, Proof and Punishment, 45–70; G Williams, ‘Convictions and Fair Labelling’ (1983) 42 CLJ 85; J Chalmers and F Leverick, ‘Fair Labelling in Criminal Law’ (2008) 71 MLR 217; J Horder, ‘Transferred Malice and the Remoteness of Unexpected Outcomes from Intentions’ [2006] Crim LR 383, and comparing the German system, M Bohlander, ‘Problems of Transferred Malice in Multiple-Actor Scenarios’ (2010) 74 J Crim L 145; P Westen, ‘The Significance of Transferred Intent’ (2013) 7 Crim L & Phil 321.

In Latimer,²⁵⁶ D had a quarrel in a public house with X. He took off his belt and aimed a blow at X which struck him lightly, but the belt bounced off and struck V who was standing close by and wounded her severely. The jury found that the blow was unlawfully aimed at X, but that the striking of V 'was purely accidental and not such a consequence of the blow as the prisoner ought to have expected'—that is, he was not even negligent with respect to this result. It was held that D was properly convicted of unlawfully and maliciously wounding V.

It is important to notice the limitations of this doctrine. It operates only when the actus reus and the mens rea of the same crime coincide.²⁵⁷ D shoots at V's dog with intent to kill it but misses and kills V who, unknown to D, was standing close by. Obviously, he cannot be liable for criminal damage in respect of killing the dog, for he has not done so; nor can he be convicted of murder,²⁵⁸ for he has not the mens rea for that crime. A similar result follows where D shoots at V with intent to kill him and, quite accidentally, kills V's dog—which in law is property: D is guilty of neither crime.²⁵⁹ As Horder puts it, such 'alchemy', translating fault elements and external elements between crimes is not permitted and would undermine the moral distinctiveness of each individual crime.²⁶⁰ In such a case, D would be liable for attempting to murder V and the availability of the attempt charge in most cases prompts Ashworth to question whether the transferred malice doctrine is needed.²⁶¹

In Pembliton,²⁶² D was involved in a fight outside a public house and, as a result, was charged with maliciously breaking a window. The jury found:

that the prisoner threw the stone which broke the window, but that he threw it at the people he had been fighting with, intending to strike one or more of them with it, but not intending to break the window.²⁶³

His conviction was quashed by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, because there was no finding that he had the mens rea of the crime, the actus reus of which he had caused. Lord Coleridge pointed out that it would have been different if there had been a finding that he was reckless as to the consequence which had occurred—but there was no such finding.²⁶⁴ The intent which is transferred must be a mens rea, whether intention or recklessness. If D shoots X with intent to kill, because X is making a murderous attack on him and this is the only way in which he can preserve his own life, D does not intend an actus reus (in the broader sense, described earlier), for to kill in these circumstances is justified. If, however, D misses X and inadvertently kills V, an innocent bystander, he does cause an actus reus but he is not guilty of murder for there is no mens rea (in the broader sense) to transfer; the result which he intended was a perfectly lawful one.²⁶⁵

The case of *Grant*²⁶⁶ is significant in this regard, as it is one of the few cases in which the Court of Appeal has had the opportunity to examine the application of the doctrine of transferred malice. DD were chasing V1, who ran into a shop to escape them. DD then fired a number of shots into the shop, with the purpose of killing V1. Their intention was therefore to kill. None of the bullets hit V1, but they did hit V2 and V3, who suffered serious injuries. DD were convicted of one count of attempted murder of V1. That is uncontroversial—their intent was to kill. DD were also convicted of two counts of causing GBH with intent in respect of V2 and V3. DD appealed arguing that the Crown ought to have been ²⁵⁶ (1886) 17 QBD 359. ²⁵⁷ This is subject to what is said later about Grant [2014] EWCA Crim 143.

²⁵⁸ As to whether it could be manslaughter, see p 569.

²⁵⁹ For a contrary view, see S Eldar, 'The Limits of Transferred Malice' (2012) 32 OJLS 633.

²⁶⁰ [2006] Crim LR 383, 393.

²⁶¹ ibid.

²⁶² (1874) LR 2 CCR 119.

²⁶³ ibid., 120.

²⁶⁴ Under Caldwell, recklessness was easy to establish in such a case and there was less need to rely on the doctrine of transferred malice.

²⁶⁵ cf Gross (1913) 23 Cox CC 455.

²⁶⁶ [2014] EWCA Crim 143. See also T Storey (2014) 78 J Crim L 214.

required to choose between prosecuting attempted murder of V1 or the GBH offences. This was founded on the argument that it was not possible to seek a conviction for two different offences of specific intent that had an identical actus reus and mens rea. The court upheld the conviction. DD had mens rea for intent to kill V1 and that was transferred to the actus reus of GBH that they actually caused to V2 and V3. In dismissing their argument, Rafferty LJ held that:

Proof of the mens rea for attempted murder by definition involves proof of the mens rea for causing grievous bodily harm with intent. Once that is clear the fallacy in the submissions is exposed. A useful test of whether submissions to us were well founded lies in considering the obverse. If the point were well made it would follow that an intent to kill must exclude an intent to cause grievous bodily harm.²⁶⁷

Although Grant might at first seem to represent a departure from orthodoxy, it is merely the application of the principles discussed earlier. DD had the intent to kill, and that mens rea was more than adequate for the actus reus they actually caused—GBH (for which intent to do GBH would suffice). The more controversial issue, and the one not addressed by the Court of Appeal, is whether DD could have been guilty of the attempted murder of V2 and V3. This, it is submitted, would be to extend the doctrine too far.

In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994),²⁶⁸ D stabbed a pregnant woman. Her child was born prematurely because of the stabbing and died in consequence of the premature birth. The fact that death resulted from premature birth, not directly from the stab wound, 'an unexpected difference of mode', was immaterial. Whether D was negligent in relation to the child was also irrelevant. In fact, D knew that the woman was pregnant but it seems that it would have made no difference if he had not known, and had had no reason to know that. His 'malice' against the mother was transferred to the child whose death he had in fact caused. The Court of Appeal gave full effect to the doctrine as described earlier, declining to impose two limitations advocated by Glanville Williams:²⁶⁹ (a) that 'an unexpected difference of mode will be regarded as severing the chain of causation if it is sufficiently removed from the intended mode'; and (b) that the doctrine 'should be limited to cases where the consequence was brought about by negligence in relation to the actual victim'.

The House of Lords, unenthusiastically, confirmed the existence of this ancient principle of transferred malice but declined to extend it to what they regarded as a double transfer of intent—from the mother to the foetus, and from the foetus to the child. D was not guilty of murder. Remarkably, however, they held that D might be convicted of manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act—the assault on the mother. This looks like the application of the just rejected doctrine of transferred malice. But D did not intend a merely unlawful and dangerous act. He intended to cause grievous bodily harm; and the act, done with that intention, admittedly caused death—which looks like murder.²⁷⁰ Horder argues that the correct question should have been whether murder was a representative label for D given that there was (a) an unintended victim and (b) the death arose in a way that was not intended.²⁷¹ This is an attractive though complex theoretical model, but leaving the issue of the remoteness of the manner of infliction of the harm and the representativeness of the label of conviction to the jury is an impractical solution.

²⁶⁷ At [36]. ²⁶⁸ [1996] 1 Cr App R 351, [1996] Crim LR 268.

²⁶⁹ CLGP, 48. Williams would abolish the doctrine for criminal damage. It results in 'unfair labelling' where the property damaged is more valuable than the property D intended to damage. He would retain it for offences against the person: (1983) 42 CLJ 85. Injury to one person is (presumably) as bad as the same injury to any other person.

²⁷⁰ For criticism see S Gough (1999) 62 MLR 128.

²⁷¹ [2006] Crim LR 383, 386–387.

3.3.3 Coincidence in time of actus reus and mens rea

The mens rea must coincide in point of time, even if fleetingly,²⁷² with the act which causes the actus reus.²⁷³ 'If I happen to kill my neighbour accidentally, I do not become a murderer by thereafter expressing joy over his death. My happiness over the result is not the same as a willingness to commit the illegal act.'²⁷⁴ Mens rea implies an intention to do a present act, not a future act.²⁷⁵

Suppose that D is driving to V's house, bent on killing V. A person steps under the wheels of D's car, giving D no chance to avoid him, and is killed. It is V. Clearly, D is not guilty of murder. D who walks out of prison while in a state of automatism does not commit the offence of escape by deliberately remaining at large.²⁷⁶ Suppose that D, having resolved to kill his wife, V, prepares and conceals a poisoned apple with the intention of giving it to her tomorrow. She finds the apple today, eats it and dies. D is not guilty of murder. He might be guilty of manslaughter on the ground that the act of leaving the apple where it might be found was reckless or grossly negligent and caused death.²⁷⁷ However, if D does an act with intent thereby to cause the actus reus, and does so, it is immaterial that he has repented before the actus reus occurs. Where D dispatched suitcases from Ghana to London which she knew to contain cannabis, her repentance before the importation took place was no defence.²⁷⁸

Where D has, with mens rea, gone beyond mere preparation and is in the course of committing an offence, it should be no answer that the final step was involuntary or accidental—as where D is on the point of pulling the trigger with intent to murder and, being startled by an explosion, does so involuntarily.²⁷⁹

Where the actus reus of the crime charged is a continuing act, it is sufficient that D has mens rea at some point during the continuance of the actus reus.²⁸⁰ Where the actus reus is part of a larger transaction, it may be sufficient that D has mens rea during the transaction, though not at the moment the actus reus is accomplished. D inflicts a wound upon V with intent to kill him. Then, believing that he has killed V, he disposes, as he thinks, of the 'corpse'. In fact V was not killed by the wound but dies as a result of the act of disposal. D has undoubtedly caused the actus reus of murder by the act of disposal but he did not, at that time, have mens rea. In cases in India and what was then Rhodesia,²⁸¹ it was held, accordingly, that D must be acquitted of murder and convicted only of attempted murder. But in Thabo Meli,²⁸² the Privy Council held that it was:

²⁷² See Styles [2015] EWCA Crim 1619.

²⁷³ Jakeman (1982) 76 Cr App R 223, [1983] Crim LR 104 and commentary thereon. See also G Marston, 'Contemporaneity of Act and Intention' (1970) 86 LQR 208; AR White, 'The Identity and Time of the Actus Reus' [1977] Crim LR 148. For comparisons of English, Dutch and German approaches to contemporaneity, see J Blomsma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 250–268.

²⁷⁴ J Andanaes, The General Part of the Criminal Law of Norway (1965) 194.

²⁷⁵ 'There is no law against a man's intending to commit a murder the day after tomorrow. The law only deals with conduct': RM Holmes, The Criminal Law (John Harvard edn) 54.

²⁷⁶ See Scott [1967] VR 276; discussed by C Howard, 'Escaping from Gaol' [1967] Crim LR at 406.

²⁷⁷ cf Burke [1987] AC 417, [1987] Crim LR 480 and commentary at 484.

²⁷⁸ Jakeman, n 273. Cf Wings Ltd v Ellis, p 56.

²⁷⁹ See commentary on Burke [1987] Crim LR 480. Note the possibility of applying the Miller principle (Ch 2) where D has created the dangerous situation and comes under a duty to avert risk.

²⁸⁰ Fagan v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 1 QB 439, p 50. Cf Miller [1983] 2 AC 161, [1983] Crim LR 466, HL; Singh (Gurdev) v R [1973] 1 WLR 1444, [1973] Crim LR 753, CA. See also Styles [2015] EWCA Crim 1619.

²⁸¹ Khandu (1890) ILR 15 Bom 194; Shorty [1950] SR 280.

²⁸² [1954] 1 All ER 373. Followed in Moore and Dorn [1975] Crim LR 229. For forceful criticism of this decision, see KJ Arenson, 'Thabo Meli Revisited: The Pernicious Effects of Result-Driven Decisions' (2013) 77 J Crim L 41. Arenson argues that the effect of this decision has been to, 'emasculat[e] the doctrine of temporal coincidence beyond recognition.'

impossible to divide up what was really one series of acts in this way. There is no doubt that the accused set out to do all these acts in order to achieve their plan, and as parts of their plan: and it is much too refined a ground of judgment to say that, because they were at a misapprehension at one stage and thought that their guilty purpose was achieved before it was achieved, therefore they are to escape the penalties of the law.

This suggests that the answer might be different where there was no antecedent plan to dispose of the body. Thabo Meli was distinguished on this ground in New Zealand²⁸³ and, at first, in South Africa.²⁸⁴ But in England, in *Church*²⁸⁵ the Court of Criminal Appeal applied Thabo Meli where D, in a sudden fight, knocked V unconscious and, wrongly believing her to be dead, threw her into the river where she drowned. He was charged with murder and his conviction for manslaughter was upheld. Here there was no antecedent plan. The point was not considered by the court, but it was apparently thought to be enough that D's conduct constituted 'a series of acts which culminated in [V's] death'. This is an extremely flexible approach to the principle of concurrence or contemporaneity as it is sometimes called, and it facilitates convictions in awkward fact scenarios.

In Le Brun,²⁸⁶ the court followed Church, holding that it was immaterial that there was no preconceived plan and that the same principles apply to manslaughter as to murder.²⁸⁷ D, in a quarrel, knocked his wife unconscious and while attempting to drag her body away dropped and killed her. The jury were rightly told that they could convict D if either he accidentally dropped V while (a) attempting to return her to her home against her wishes and/or (b) attempting to dispose of her body or otherwise cover up the assault. It would be murder if D struck her the original blow with intent to do GBH or kill, and manslaughter if he intended to assault her or cause her injury. The court appears to uphold the manslaughter conviction on both of two alternative principles, as follows.

3.3.3.1 The transaction principle

This appears to operate so that D is guilty of homicide if he kills during the continuance of the transaction, the sequence of events initiated by the unlawful blow, and that transaction continues at least during the conduct described under (a) and (b) in the previous paragraph. This suggests that it certainly continues while D is engaged in some kind of wrongdoing arising out of, and immediately following, the unlawful blow. Though Le Brun does not decide this, the result might have been different if D had dropped V in the same manner and at the same time and place while attempting to get her to hospital, or to her home if he had thought that was where she would wish to be taken; or, if he believed her to be dead, while he was attempting to deliver the corpse to the police. Under this principle it is immaterial that the second act is the sole cause of death.

3.3.3.2 The causation principle

This approach holds that the initial blow is a cause of death. As that blow was struck with mens rea, there is no further problem—Le Brun is guilty of murder or manslaughter as the case may be. The second event was also a cause of death but it is clear that there may be more than one cause (see p 65). This may suggest that Le Brun would have been guilty if V had been similarly dropped by a passerby who was trying to get her to hospital. But it may be that an intervening act by a third party is regarded as breaking the chain of causation, particularly where it is unforeseeable, whereas the same thing done by the original actor is not.²⁸⁸

²⁸³ Ramsay [1967] NZLR 1005. ²⁸⁴ Chiswibo 1960 (2) SA 714.

²⁸⁵ [1966] 1 QB 59. ²⁸⁶ [1992] QB 61.

²⁸⁷ In A-G's Reference (No 4 of 1980) [1981] 2 All ER 617 at 620, the court left open the question whether the principle applies to manslaughter and whether it was part of the ratio decidendi of Church that it does so. Commentary at [1981] Crim LR 493.

The causation principle represents the ratio decidendi of the South African case of S v Masilela.²⁸⁹ D, intending to kill V, knocked him unconscious and, believing him to be dead, set fire to the house. V died from the fumes. If he had not been unconscious he would have been able to walk out, so knocking him unconscious was a cause of death. But it is probable that the chain of causation would be regarded as broken if the house had been set on fire by a stranger who happened to come along after D's departure.

In all these cases the second act was a cause of the death. Where it is impossible to say which act caused death, it has been held that D may be convicted only if it can be proved that he acted with mens rea (or other appropriate degree of fault) on both occasions. Where D knocked V downstairs and then, believing that he had killed her, cut her throat in order to dispose of the body, and it was impossible to say which act caused death, it was held that the jury should have been directed that they should convict of manslaughter if they were satisfied both (a) that knocking V downstairs was an intentional act which was unlawful and dangerous²⁹⁰ and (b) that the act of cutting the throat was one of gross criminal negligence.²⁹¹ If manslaughter was committed, it was immaterial that it was impossible to prove on which of these two closely related occasions it occurred.²⁹² If the jury were not satisfied on both points, there was a 50 per cent chance that this was a case of accidental death, in which case acquittal must follow. But if Thabo Meli applies to manslaughter,²⁹³ the direction is too favourable. Assuming it was all one 'transaction', it should have been enough to prove that D had the required mens rea on the first occasion.

3.3.4 Ignorance of the law is no defence

In our discussion of the general principles of mens rea nothing has been said about whether D knows his act is against the law, for, in the great majority of cases, it is irrelevant whether he knows it or not:²⁹⁴ 'the principle that ignorance of the law is no defence in crime' said Lord Bridge, 'is so fundamental that to construe the word "knowingly" in a criminal statute as requiring not merely knowledge of facts material to the offender's guilt, but also knowledge of the relevant law, would be revolutionary and, to my mind, wholly unacceptable'.²⁹⁵ This view has been powerfully criticized by Ashworth²⁹⁶ who describes the proposition that ignorance of the criminal law is no defence as preposterous. He suggests that the doctrine is unfair and that it fails to recognize the State's duty to render the criminal law accessible to citizens to 'respect the right of individuals not to be convicted of offences for which it is not reasonable to expect them to have knowledge'.²⁹⁷

As the law presently stands, it must usually be proved that D intended to cause, or was reckless whether he caused, the event or state of affairs which, as a matter of fact, is forbidden by law; but it is quite immaterial to his conviction (though it may affect his sentence)

²⁸⁸ See the passage earlier, cited by the court in Le Brun. ²⁸⁹ 1968 (2) SA 558 (AD).

²⁹⁰ This is manslaughter. See p 569.

²⁹¹ This may be considered to be manslaughter and, indeed, was held to be so in this case. See p 583.

²⁹² A-G's Reference (No 4 of 1980) [1981] 1 WLR 705, CA, [1981] Crim LR 493 and commentary.

²⁹³ This question was left open. Church suggests that it does; and that seems right in principle.

²⁹⁴ See Ch 9, and A Ashworth, 'Excusable Mistake of Law' [1974] Crim LR 652; M Matthews, 'Ignorance of the Law is No Excuse' (1983) 3 LS 174.

²⁹⁵ Grant v Borg [1982] 2 All ER 257 at 263, HL but cf Curr [1968] 2 QB 944. Acts done by D to V in the reasonable belief that V was committing a by-law offence may be justified even if it turns out that the by-law was void for uncertainty: Percy v Hall [1997] QB 924 (Civ Div).

²⁹⁶ 'Ignorance of the Criminal Law, and Duties to Avoid it' (2011) 74 MLR 1.

²⁹⁷ ibid, 5. This is particularly true of offences based on omissions.

whether he knew that the event or state of affairs was forbidden by law. This is so even though it also appears that D's ignorance of the law was quite reasonable and even, apparently, if it was quite impossible²⁹⁸ for him to know of the prohibition in question. It was no defence for a 'native' man visiting from Baghdad, charged with a sexual offence on board a ship lying in an English port, to show that the act he performed was lawful in his own country and that he did not know English law.²⁹⁹ It was held that a Frenchman might be guilty of murder in the course of duelling in England, even if he did not know that duelling was against English law.³⁰⁰ In Bailey,³⁰¹ D was convicted of an offence created by a statute which was passed while he was on the high seas although he committed the act before the end of the voyage when he could not possibly have known of the statute.³⁰²

In each of these cases it might be argued that D at least intended something immoral; but that makes no difference. A motorist's mistaken belief that a constable has no right in the particular circumstances to require a specimen of breath is not a reasonable excuse for not providing the specimen.³⁰³

A mistaken belief that a firearm certificate was current was held to be incapable of being a reasonable excuse under the Firearms Act 1968, on the ground that it was a mistake of law.³⁰⁴ Ignorance that certain banking transactions require the consent of the Bank of England is no defence to a charge of unauthorized deposit-taking.³⁰⁵

Since the courts are keen on saying that the meaning of an ordinary word in a statute is not a question of law,³⁰⁶ it is easy to see how many cases might involve an argument by D that he did not interpret the statutory words to apply to his conduct and therefore did not realize his act was criminal. If D studies the Public Order Act 1986 and concludes that the conduct in which he proposes to indulge is not 'abusive', but the court takes a different view, it is most unlikely that a court would entertain D relying on his mistake 'of fact'. It is thought that such a defence would be regarded as subversive of the criminal law;³⁰⁷ but, if it is accepted that Brutus v Cozens applies (so that statutory words be interpreted as ordinary English words), it is in theory a principled approach.³⁰⁸

In the case of the most serious crimes the problem does not arise; everyone knows it is against the law to murder, rob or rape.³⁰⁹ In the case of many less serious crimes, however, a person may very easily, and without negligence, be ignorant that a particular act is a crime. In such cases there will usually be nothing immoral about the act; and the conviction of a morally innocent person requires justification. Various justifications have been advanced for the rule that ignorance is not a defence. Blackstone³¹⁰ thought that all sane people know ²⁹⁸ Bailey, see later in this paragraph. ²⁹⁹ Esop (1836) 7 C & P 456.

³⁰⁰ Barronet and Allain (1852) Dears CC 51. ³⁰¹ (1800) Russ & Ry 1.

³⁰² But the judges recommended a pardon. Where a continuing act was made unlawful it was held that a reasonable time must be allowed for its discontinuance and that ignorance of the law was relevant to determine this question: Burns v Nowell (1880) 5 QBD 444.

³⁰³ Reid [1973] 1 WLR 1283, [1973] Crim LR 760, CA: 'if you choose at the street side to act out the part of Hampden, you have got to be right': per Scarman LJ at 1289.

³⁰⁴ Jones [1995] 1 Cr App R 262, [1995] Crim LR 416. But was not this really a mistake of fact—though probably an unreasonable one?

³⁰⁵ A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1995) (B and F) [1996] 2 Cr App R 320, [1996] Crim LR 575. The more difficult question was whether the ignorant directors 'consented' to the commission of the offence. It was held that they did.

³⁰⁶ Brutus v Cozens [1973] AC 854, [1973] Crim LR 56, HL.

³⁰⁷ cf Sancoff v Halford [1973] Qd R 25. (Belief that books were not obscene is a mistake of law.)

³⁰⁸ See Ashworth, n 296.

³⁰⁹ But see Christian [2006] UKPC 47 in which Pitcairn islanders charged with sexual offences claimed to have no access to the English law making that conduct criminal. See the fascinating article by H Power [2007] Crim LR 609.

³¹⁰ Commentaries, iv, 27.

the law—a proposition which is manifestly untrue today. Austin³¹¹ based the rule upon the difficulty of disproving ignorance of the law, while Holmes,³¹² who considered this no more difficult a question than many which are investigated in the courts, thought that to admit the plea of ignorance would be to encourage ignorance of the law. A more modern writer, Jerome Hall,³¹³ argued that to allow the defence would be to contradict one of the fundamental tenets of a legal order: that rules of law enforce objective meanings, to be ascertained by the courts:

If that plea [ie ignorance of the law] were valid, the consequence would be: whenever a defendant in a criminal case thought that the law was thus and so, he is to be treated as though the law were thus and so, that is, the law actually is thus and so.³¹⁴

As Hall points out, the criminal law represents an objective code of ethics which must prevail over individual convictions and he therefore argues:³¹⁵

Thus, while a person who acts in accordance with his honest convictions is certainly not as culpable as one who commits a harm knowing it is wrong, it is also true that conscience sometimes leads one astray. Mens rea underlines the essential difference. Penal liability based on it implies the objective wrongness of the harm proscribed—regardless of motive or conviction. This may fall short of perfect justice but the ethics of a legal order must be objective.

Much modern legislation is devoid of moral content, apart from the moral obligation to obey the law. For example, one who, being ignorant of the law, sells goods at a price in excess of the maximum fixed by statute could hardly be said to have been led astray by his conscience while the 'harm proscribed' lacks 'objective wrongness'. Ashworth regards the rule as one based on shaky foundations.³¹⁶

The common law rule is not universally followed and the arguments by which it is supported have been found 'not very convincing to those used to another system'.³¹⁷ In Scandinavian criminal law, ignorance of the law is, in varying degrees, a defence. Thus, in Norway, a person will not be excused for ignorance of 'the general rules of society which apply to everybody' or 'the special rules governing the business or activity in which the individual is engaged'. But 'a fisherman need not study the legislation on industry'; an employee may be excused for bona fide and reasonable obedience to illegal orders of his employer; or a stranger for breaking a rule which he could not be expected to know about; or liability may be negated because the legislation is very new, or its interpretation doubtful. Such rules seem to have much to commend them, compared with the rigid and uncompromising attitude of English law. They seek to relate guilt to moral responsibility in a way in which our rule does not.³¹⁸

³¹¹ Lectures on Jurisprudence (1885) 497.

³¹² The Common Law (1881) 48.

³¹³ 'Ignorance and Mistake in Criminal Law' (1957) 33 Ind LJ 1. Cf General Principles, 382–383.

³¹⁴ (1957) 33 Ind LJ at 19. In Cooper v Simmons (1862) 7 H & N 707 at 717, Martin B thought that to allow the defence would be 'to substitute the opinion of a person charged with a breach of the law for the law itself'.

³¹⁵ 33 Ind LJ at 22.

³¹⁶ See n 296.

³¹⁷ J Andenaes, 'Ignorantia Juris in Scandinavian Law' in GOW Mueller (ed), Essays in Criminal Science (1961) 217 at 222. For South African law, see S v De Blom 1977 (3) SA 513 (AD) discussed by C Turpin (1978) 37 CLJ 8.

³¹⁸ An exception to the general rule is created by the Statutory Instruments Act 1946, s 3. See D Lanham, 'Delegated Legislation and Publication' (1974) 37 MLR 510. On a charge brought under a statutory instrument it is a defence for D to prove that the instrument had not been issued at the time of the alleged offence; unless the Crown then proves that reasonable steps had been taken to bring it to the notice of the public, or persons likely to be affected by it, or D. See Defiant Cycle Co Ltd v Newell [1953] 2 All ER 38. The Privy Council has held that, in a jurisdiction where there is no similar provision, a person who is unaware that a ministerial order applying a prohibition to him has been made may set up his ignorance as a lack of mens rea: Lim Chin Aik v R [1963] AC 160, p 161.

3.3.5 Mistake of law may negative mens rea

If D, with the prescribed mens rea of an offence causes the proscribed actus reus, he is guilty and it will not help him to say that he did not know the actus reus was forbidden by the criminal law. But the actus reus may be so defined that if D makes a mistake of law it may mean that he was not acting intentionally or recklessly with respect to some element in the actus reus and so he would lack mens rea. In such a case, his mistake, whether reasonable or not, is a defence.³¹⁹ '[A]n honest belief in a certain state of things does afford a defence, including an honest though mistaken belief about legal rights.'³²⁰ Unless the prosecution can prove that the mistake was not made, they have not established the requisite mens rea. For example, if D is charged with intentionally or recklessly damaging property belonging to another, even if he admits intentional damage to the property, his honest belief, arising from a mistake of law, that the property is his own, is a 'defence'. He will not have an intention or recklessness as to the element of actus reus—that the property belongs to another. The court so held, in Smith,³²¹ not because of any special provision in the Criminal Damage Act but by 'applying the ordinary principles of mens rea'. The plea of mistake is considered in full in Ch 9.

3.3.6 Absence of a 'claim of right' as an element in mens rea

Sometimes the mens rea of an offence is so defined as to require the absence of a claim of right. In other words, if D believed he had a right to do the act in question, he had no mens rea and therefore was not guilty of the crime. This defence will prevail even if D's belief is mistaken and is based upon an entirely wrong view of the law. It is available in a number of important crimes, including theft,³²² criminal damage to property³²³ and a number of other offences requiring wilfulness or fraud. This is in accordance with the ordinary principle that a mistake of law may, indirectly, operate as a defence by preventing D from having mens rea in acting as he did. It is important to notice the limits within which this excuse operates. The mistake must be one which leads D to believe he has a right to act as he does; it is not enough that he simply believes his act is not a crime. Here, too, the distinction between mistake as to the criminal and as to the civil law seems to be important. Thus, if D, having read in an out-of-date book on criminal law that it is not stealing to take another's title deeds to land,³²⁴ were to take V's deeds, thinking that this was a way in which he could injure V without any risk of being punished, he could, no doubt, be convicted of theft under s 1 of the Theft Act 1968. He had no claim of right. It would be otherwise if D, owing to a misunderstanding of the law of property, thought that the title deeds were his, and that V was wrongfully withholding them from him. Here, clearly, he had a claim of right. Therefore, while a mistake as to the criminal law only will not give rise to a claim of right, an error as to the civil law may do so.

It certainly cannot be asserted with confidence that the absence of a claim of right is a general requirement of mens rea, as it is in the case of theft and the other crimes referred to previously. The question will therefore be considered in relation to specific crimes discussed throughout this book.

³¹⁹ See Ch 9, p 332. Kenneth Simons argues that a distinction ought to be made within the category of mistake of law. The distinction he is in favour of is between mistakes about the criminal law itself and mistakes about non-criminal law norms that the criminal law makes relevant, such as about the civil law of property in the context of theft. See KW Simons, 'Ignorance and Mistake of Criminal Law, Noncriminal Law, and Fact' (2012) 9 Ohio St J Crim L 487.

³²⁰ Barrett and Barrett (1980) 72 Cr App R 212 at 216, CA.

³²¹ [1974] QB 354, [1974] Crim LR 101, CA; p 1076.

³²² See p 872.

³²³ See p 1088.

³²⁴ This was the rule at common law.

3.3.7 Proof of intention and foresight

There was formerly House of Lords authority³²⁵ for the view that there is an irrebuttable presumption of law that a person foresees and intends the natural consequences of his acts. Proof that he did an act, the natural consequence of which was death, was conclusive proof that he intended to kill, in the absence of evidence of insanity or incapacity to form an intent. To what extent, if at all, this actually represented the law was disputed: but it is now clear beyond all doubt that it is not the law. The question in every case is as to the actual intention of the person charged at the time when he did the act. Section 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 provides:

A court or jury in determining whether a person has committed an offence,

- (a) shall not be bound to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of those actions; but
- (b) shall decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances.

To what extent intention or foresight need be proved in any particular case depends on the law relating to the crime which is in issue. Section 8 is concerned with how intention or foresight must be proved, not when it must be proved.³²⁶ On a charge of unlawful act manslaughter, for example, it remains unnecessary to prove that D intended or foresaw that death was likely to result from his act.³²⁷ Section 8 was once construed so as to affect the substantive definition of the law of murder³²⁸ but it is now clear that it applies only to proof and never affects the substantive law.

Although s 8 requires the court to have regard to all the evidence, that is, all the evidence relevant to the question whether D did intend or foresee, there is one exception. The courts have consistently held that evidence that D did not intend or foresee because he had taken drink or drugs is no defence, except in the case of crimes requiring 'specific intent'. This practice has been reconciled with the words of s 8 by holding that where D relies on evidence that he had taken drink or drugs for the purpose of showing that he lacked any mens rea, there is a rule of substantive law that the prosecution need prove no mens rea unless the offence is one of 'specific intent'.³²⁹ This is discussed further in Ch 9.

It might be thought, at first sight, that proof of intention, foresight and knowledge presents almost insuperable difficulties. Direct evidence of a person's state of mind, except through his own confession, is not available. But the difficulties, in practice, are not so great. If D points a loaded gun at V's head, pulls the trigger and shoots him dead, it is reasonable to infer that D intended and foresaw V's death. A jury might well be convinced by such evidence that D intended to kill. If D offered an explanation of any kind—he thought the gun was unloaded, or he intended to fire above V's head—and the jury thought that it might reasonably be true, then they should acquit him of an intention to kill. If he offered no explanation, as s 8 makes clear, the jury would not be bound to convict him of having such an intention; they would have to ask themselves whether, in the light of all the evidence, they were satisfied beyond reasonable doubt. Sometimes D's acts may afford apparently ³²⁵ DPP v Smith [1961] AC 290. The decision cannot be technically overruled by the Privy Council but five judges, all members of the House of Lords, declared that it was wrongly decided in Frankland [1987] AC 576, [1988] Crim LR 117, PC. Cf the facts in Hales [2005] EWCA Crim 1118.

³²⁶ DPP v Majewski [1977] AC 443, [1976] Crim LR 374, HL.

³²⁷ DPP v Newbury [1977] AC 500, [1977] Crim LR 359, HL. See Ch 14.

³²⁸ Hyam v DPP [1975] AC 55, [1974] Crim LR 365, p 96.

³²⁹ DPP v Majewski [1977] AC 443, [1976] Crim LR 374, HL.

overwhelming evidence of his intention to produce a particular result but evidence to the contrary is always admissible and the question must be left to the jury.³³⁰ Similarly, the fact that any reasonable person would, in the circumstances, have known of a fact is cogent evidence that D knew of it.

The difficulty of distinguishing between 'he foresaw' and 'he ought to have foreseen', 'he knew' and 'he ought to have known', is not a good reason for not drawing the line at this point. It is an inescapable difficulty when we have a law which requires us to look into individuals' minds; and such a requirement is essential to a civilized system of criminal law.

[A] lack of confidence in the ability of a tribunal correctly to estimate evidence of states of mind and the like can never be sufficient ground for excluding from enquiry the most fundamental element in a rational and humane criminal code.³³¹

³³⁰ Riley [1967] Crim LR 656, is a striking instance of the rebuttal of apparently conclusive evidence of an intent.

³³¹ Thomas v R (1937) 59 CLR 279 at 309, per Dixon J.

Crimes of negligence

4.1 Negligence as failure to comply with an objective standard

Negligence¹ describes conduct that falls below the standard to be expected of a reasonable person in the relevant circumstances.² Offences can be drafted with requirements to prove D's negligence as to consequences or circumstances.³ The question in either case is whether D's conduct falls below the reasonable standard.⁴ That might be because he has seen the risk of the proscribed consequence or circumstance but reacted unreasonably to it, or because he has not seen the risk when he ought to. If the reasonable person would have seen the risk of the proscribed harm or circumstance, D can be liable for crimes of negligence even if he personally failed to see the risk.

Negligence involves a failure by D to comply with an objective standard of behaviour set by the law. Intention, recklessness and negligence all involve a failure to comply with an objective standard of conduct; that is, they are all forms of fault.⁵ It is important to appreciate the difference between (a) negligence and (b) intention or Cunningham/G recklessness.⁶ Whereas intention requires proof of D's personal state of mind—acting with the purpose of causing the harm or foresight of a virtual certainty, and subjective recklessness requires personal foresight of a risk of the proscribed harm and an unjustified taking of the ¹ See generally HLA Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (1968) Ch VI, 'Negligence, Mens Rea and Criminal Responsibility'; liability for negligence in manslaughter and road traffic offences is considered in detail in Ch 14 and Ch 32. For a review of approaches in European jurisdictions, see J Blomsma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 166 et seq.

² Some commentators argue that there is no principled and rational way to construct the 'reasonable person' against whom D is judged and who it is assumed would have adverted to the risk D failed to advert. See L Alexander and K Ferzan, 'Beyond the Special Part' in RA Duff and SP Green, Philosophical Foundations of Criminal Law (2011).

³ There are occasions when it is unclear whether Parliament has intended to create a crime of negligence. In such instances the court must have regard to the statutory language and the purpose underlying the creation of the offence to ascertain whether it can be committed negligently. For an example of this exercise in the context of s 4(1) of the Animal Welfare Act 2006, see R (on the application of Gray) v Crown Court at Aylesbury [2013] EWHC 500 (Admin).

⁴ It has been argued that asking whether a defendant's conduct fell short of a reasonable person's conduct is insufficient to ground personal blame, as there is an insufficient linkage between the defendant and wrongdoing that ought to be required for conviction. Objective accounts do have a role to play, however. See F Stark, Culpable Carelessness (2016).

⁵ cf the argument that since negligence involves no culpable choice by the accused it is not properly a fault element: RA Duff, 'Criminalising Endangerment' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 48.

⁶ See p 108.

risk—negligence may be conclusively proved by simply showing that D's conduct failed to measure up to an objective standard irrespective of D's personal state of mind.⁷

The now discredited form of Caldwell recklessness was also said by the House of Lords to involve proof of a state of mind; but this is misleading. Caldwell recklessness was only a state of mind in the sense that not giving thought might be described as a state of mind.⁸ An important distinction between Caldwell recklessness and negligence was the subject of much of the debate. Under Caldwell recklessness, D would not have been liable if he had given thought to the matter of the risk of harm his conduct posed, and wrongly concluded that there was no risk.⁹ In contrast, in a crime of negligence D would be liable on such facts. In a crime based on negligence, evidence of D's personal state of mind is no excuse. Negligence is proved by D's conduct failing to measure up to an objective standard. It is no answer for him to say, 'I considered whether there was a risk and decided there was none.' Where the risk is one that he ought to have foreseen, that is an admission of negligence.¹⁰

Furthermore, it could never be a 'defence' to a charge of negligence to show that the careless act was done recklessly or intentionally. If D were charged with manslaughter and the prosecution's case was that he killed V by gross negligence it is inconceivable that it could be a defence for him to say convincingly, 'I wasn't negligent; I intended to kill him'; or 'I took a quite deliberate risk of killing him'. The more blameworthy state of mind must include the less; so, if D failed to comply with the objective standard, he is liable whatever his state of mind.¹¹

4.1.1 Negligence as mens rea

Writers differ as to whether negligence can properly be described as mens rea. If the term mens rea is used simply as a compendious expression for the varieties of fault that may give rise to criminal liability, then it does, of course, include negligence. If it is taken in its more literal sense of 'guilty mind', the usage is inappropriate.

It is sometimes argued that the absence of foresight or knowledge is just as much a state of mind as its presence;¹² but, since negligence may be proved without establishing anything as to what was going on in D's mind or not, it seems more appropriate and convenient to restrict the label mens rea to intention, recklessness, knowledge, belief, etc, and that is the sense in which it is used in this book. Crimes requiring mens rea are contrasted with crimes of negligence discussed in this chapter and strict liability crimes (discussed in the next).¹³

The courts have made abundantly clear that negligence is not a form of 'knowledge'. Devlin J emphasized that there is 'a vast distinction between a state of mind which consists of deliberately refraining from making inquiries, the result of which a person does not care

⁷ It is important not to conflate different states of mind. The Court of Appeal in Turbill [2013] EWCA Crim 1422, [2014] Crim LR 388 confirmed that wilful neglect is not the same as negligence, as the former embodies a subjective test.

⁸ See p 106. See G Williams, 'Recklessness Redefined' (1981) 40 CLJ 252 at 256–258. On the justification for culpability when D has not troubled to investigate risks that would be obvious to the reasonable person, see Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 3.

⁹ See p 107.

¹⁰ See generally J Brady, 'Recklessness, Negligence, Indifference and Awareness' (1980) 43 MLR 381. Note also the conclusion in A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999) [2000] QB 796, [2000] Crim LR 475, that it is not necessary to produce evidence of the 'state of mind' of the accused on a charge of gross negligence manslaughter.

¹¹ A cold-blooded murderer does not behave reasonably, but we would not describe him as negligent.

¹² G Williams, Salmond on Jurisprudence (11th edn, 1957) 329. See also P Brett, An Inquiry into Criminal Guilt (1963) 99.

¹³ cf Duff, Answering for Crime who summarizes Hart's position that if D was negligently responsible for bringing about the creation of the risk of the harm he is at 'fault', at 70–71.

to have [wilful blindness], and a state of mind which is merely neglecting to make such inquiries as a reasonable and prudent person would make [constructive knowledge].¹⁴ In Flintshire County Council v Reynolds,¹⁵ it was reiterated that a person who has ‘constructive notice’ of a fact may be negligent, but this is not the same as ‘knowing’ that fact.¹⁶

4.1.2 Purely objective standards?

Although negligence is conduct that departs from the standard to be expected of a reasonable person that is not to say that a person’s state of mind is always completely irrelevant when negligence is in issue. Two factors need to be considered: (a) is it permissible to take into account D’s state of mind where that involves special knowledge that a reasonable person would not possess; and (b) is it possible to take into account D’s state of mind where he has less knowledge or capacity to see a relevant risk?

4.1.2.1 Where D possesses special knowledge

If D has special knowledge that an ordinary person would not possess, the appropriate question becomes whether a reasonable person, with that knowledge, would have acted as he did. For example, behaviour with a revolver that is possibly not negligent in the case of an ordinary person with no special knowledge might be grossly negligent if committed by a firearms expert.¹⁷ D has more knowledge or capacity for foresight, and a higher standard will legitimately be expected of him.

Section 2A(3) of the Road Traffic Act 1988, defining dangerous driving,¹⁸ also recognizes that in deciding whether a driver drove dangerously, the standard is ‘what would be expected of a competent and careful driver’; but, in determining that standard:

regard shall be had not only to the circumstances of which he could be expected to be aware, but also to any circumstances shown to be within the knowledge of the accused.

So, if D is aware of facts which would not be obvious to a reasonable driver, D may nevertheless be guilty since the Act provides that regard must be had to any circumstances shown to be within his knowledge. If D is reasonably unaware, for example, of the tendency of a car to swerve to the right when braked hard, D cannot be held to have driven dangerously or even carelessly, but once D becomes aware of this tendency he may properly be held to have driven dangerously if it would then be obvious to a competent and careful driver that to drive the car with this tendency would be dangerous.¹⁹ Similarly, D’s actual knowledge of an uneven road surface may count against him though other drivers would be unaware of the hazard.

Several cases have highlighted the difficulty in applying the objective test in situations where a driver has superior driving ability. The Court of Appeal has confirmed that the test is objective: Bannister.²⁰ The current state of the law is that the superior driving ability of the driver is irrelevant when a driver is charged with dangerous driving. To have regard to those abilities is inconsistent with the objective test of the competent and careful driver set out in the Act. These are not relevant to the dangerousness test because they go to the standard of the competent and careful driver and not the knowledge or circumstances. That distinction is a fine one.

¹⁴ Taylor’s Central Garages (Exeter) Ltd v Roper [1951] 2 TLR 284, 288.

¹⁵ [2006] EWHC 195 (Admin) obtaining benefit contrary to Social Security Administration Act 1992, s 112.

¹⁶ At [17]. ¹⁷ cf Lamb [1967] 2 QB 981; see p 570. ¹⁸ See Ch 32.

¹⁹ cf Haynes v Swain [1975] RTR 40, [1974] Crim LR 483, DC, see Ch 32.

²⁰ [2009] EWCA Crim 1571. Discussed in full in Ch 32. See also J Goudkamp (2010) 69 CLJ 8.

4.1.2.2 Where D is unable to appreciate the relevant risk

More controversial is the question of whether the negligence test should take account of the individual defendant's personal inability to appreciate the risk of the proscribed harm. The orthodox answer is that if D has less knowledge or capacity for foresight than the reasonable person this will not generally help him. For example, on a charge of careless driving a learner driver, who was exercising all the skill and attention to be expected from a person with his short experience but who has failed to attain the required standard of the competent and careful driver, would be held guilty.

A further example arises in the offence of harassment under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, s 1(1)(b) read with s 1(2), which imposes a requirement that the course of conduct (which is alleged to amount to harassment) must be one which D knew or ought to have known amounts to harassment. That is a statutory crime of negligence. The test of whether D knew or ought to have known is, under s 1, whether a reasonable person in possession of the same information as D would think the course of conduct did amount to harassment. In C,²¹ the defendant, who suffered from paranoid schizophrenia, had performed the conduct for the offence by sending offensive letters to his MP on at least two occasions. He was convicted and appealed on the basis that the judge should have directed the jury to consider his mental disorder as a relevant condition of the hypothetical reasonable person in s 1(2). The Court of Appeal held that s 1(2) involved a purely objective test relating to the reasonable person and reasonable conduct. D's illness was not relevant to that question. Section 1(2) seeks to endow the reasonable person with knowledge of circumstances that would render otherwise seemingly innocuous conduct harassing (eg when D knows that previous advances towards V have been rejected and continues to send gifts). In such cases, D's inculpatory state of mind is taken into account. Why, then, should the reasonable person not also be possessed with knowledge about D's exculpatory states of mind (eg his Asperger's preventing him picking up the cues that his attention is not wanted) in order to assess whether the conduct is harassment? This is not the same as asking whether a reasonable person with the characteristics of the accused would regard it as harassment, particularly where the characteristic inhibits cognition of the wrongdoing.²²

However, the courts have accepted that the strictness of the objective test ought, in some circumstances, to be modified where the defendant is a child. In R (RSPCA) v C,²³ it was held that the question whether a juvenile (15) was negligent in not taking an injured cat to the vet should be judged by the standards of a reasonable girl of her age. It is submitted that this is a sensible qualification of the negligence standard, but it poses two problems.

First, it must be treated with caution. Should account of the defendant's age only be taken when that will affect his ability to appreciate the risk of the relevant harm? Some risks are obvious even to very young children. Equally importantly the question arises whether taking into account the defendant's age (and capacity to appreciate risk) will undermine the policy of negligence-based crimes. What of the 14-year-old tearaway who is driving a car illegally and causes injury? Should the evaluation of his carelessness in driving take account of his age? Surely not.²⁴

²¹ [2001] EWCA Crim 1251, [2001] Crim LR 845 and commentary.

²² Arguably the strong policy grounds of protection on which the Act is founded justify the court's rejection of any attempt to diminish the objective stance under this offence. See the discussion of Loake v CPS [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin) at p 304.

²³ [2006] EWHC 1069 (Admin).

²⁴ For an argument that in crimes of gross negligence at least the age of the actor ought to be considered, see A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 193–194.

Secondly, if the courts accept this qualification of the purely objective standard for young defendants, that begs the question whether modification of the objective test on grounds of recognized disabilities ought also to be unacceptable. Some commentators have suggested that the objective standard ought to be qualified to the extent necessary to take account of the defendant's shortcomings that affect his ability to behave reasonably and which are not a result of his fault.²⁵ This would include characteristics such as age, hearing, sight, cognitive capacity, etc. It is doubtful that the courts would entertain such a radical qualification of the objective standard. The only English case following this approach seems to be Hudson.²⁶ In deciding whether a man who had sexual intercourse with a 'defective woman', contrary to s 7 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 (now repealed), had 'no reason to suspect her to be a defective', the court was bound:

to take into account the accused himself. There may be cases of which this is not one, where there is evidence before the jury that the accused himself is a person of limited intelligence, or possibly suffering from some handicap which would prevent him from appreciating the state of affairs which an ordinary man might realize.

The decisions in Caldwell and Lawrence in 1981 were open to the interpretation that an 'obvious' risk meant obvious to the particular defendant but the courts rejected that notion. 'Obvious' under that test meant obvious to the reasonable person, even if the defendant was a 14-year-old schoolgirl with a learning disability.²⁷ Some academics rely on the cases decided under Caldwell to support the argument that the courts are (and ought to be) amenable to an interpretation of the concept of the reasonable person that is not entirely objective. Some further support for this might derive from the decision of the House of Lords in G.²⁸ However, a response to this claim might be that these cases²⁹ are merely examples of the courts' desperate attempts to mitigate the harshness of the Caldwell formulation of recklessness which applied to serious offences, and that the cases do not provide support for any broader judicial willingness to subjectivize the test of negligence. In other contexts, the court has rejected an opportunity to endow the reasonable person with the personal characteristics of the accused.³⁰

The Court of Appeal had the opportunity to consider this issue in Price,³¹ in which D was convicted of negligently performing a duty, contrary to s 15(2) of the Armed Forces Act 2006. The issue was whether the test should be based on a reasonable person with the same limited skills, professional training, knowledge and experience as D. The Court of Appeal approved the Judge Advocate's direction to the board (the equivalent of the jury in a military trial) that D's conduct was to be measured against the standard to be expected of the reasonable serviceman having similar lack of training, knowledge and experience as ²⁵ See Simester, Spencer, Stark, Sullivan and Virgo, CLT&D, 163; Horder, APOCL, 204–207; Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 82–83. See further T Hörnle, 'Social Expectation in the Criminal Law: The Reasonable Person in a Comparative Perspective' (2008) 11 New Crim LR 1 at 19.

²⁶ [1966] 1 QB 448. But see now the many offences under the Sexual Offences Act 2003 where the issue turns on the reasonableness of D's belief. In B [2013] EWCA Crim 3, [2014] Crim LR 312, the court rejected D's reliance on his paranoid schizophrenia as a factor to be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of his belief in consent. See Ch 18.

²⁷ Elliott v C (A Minor) (1983) 77 Cr App R 103, [1983] Crim LR 616; Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334.

²⁸ [2003] UKHL 50.

²⁹ And those relating to driving such as Reid (1992) 95 Cr App R 391, HL.

³⁰ See eg C [2001] Crim LR 845 discussed earlier. See more generally on negligence as an element of harassment under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, E Finch, 'Stalking the Perfect Stalking Law: An Evaluation of the Efficacy of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997' [2002] Crim LR 703, 714.

³¹ [2014] EWCA Crim 229.

him. Pitchford LJ went on to state, however, that the direction had been overly generous to D. There was the possibility that, by referring to D's 'skills', the Judge Advocate had inadvertently diluted the objective nature of the test. The Court of Appeal emphasized that the word 'skills' was intended to add nothing to the endowment of the reasonable man with D's training, knowledge and experience. It was observed that if the court accepted D's contention that the reasonable person ought to be endowed with all of D's shortcomings, then no one could ever be found to be negligent. The court stated emphatically that a subjective consideration of D's 'skills' or 'weaknesses' has no place in an objective judgement about whether he reached the appropriate standard of care. Attempts in other contexts to dilute the concept of the reasonable person resulted in an unsatisfactory state of affairs.³²

4.2 Negligence as the basis of liability

There are few serious crimes in English law in which negligence is the gist of the offence. Manslaughter, causing or allowing a child to die or suffer serious injury by an unlawful act under the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Acts 2004 and 2012, and public nuisance³³ are the most conspicuous examples, although arguably manslaughter is a separate form of offence because it requires 'gross negligence'. Other examples where negligence is the central feature of the crime include s 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 under which it is an offence to drive a mechanically propelled vehicle on a road without due care and attention or without reasonable consideration for other persons using the road. The offence may be committed by making an error of judgement of a kind that a reasonably prudent and skilful driver would not make. It will be noted that it is not necessary to prove that any harmful consequence ensued; it is enough to show that D drove in a manner in which a reasonable person would not have driven because the reasonable person would have realized that it involved an unjustifiable risk. The same considerations apply to the more serious offence of dangerous driving (see Ch 32).

In a number of other serious crimes negligence is not the gist of the offence because intention or recklessness is required as to the central features of the offence, but negligence with respect to some subsidiary element in the actus reus is sometimes enough. So, under s 9 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, it is an offence intentionally to touch a person, B, aged under 16 where that touching is sexual and either B is under 16 and D does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over, or B is under 13. The conduct element of the offence in the form of 'touching' has to be shown to be intentional, but as to the circumstance of B's age (where between 13 and 16), it is expressly provided that D is guilty if he does not reasonably believe B to be 16 or over. An honest but unreasonable belief that B is 16 is no excuse. Negligence with respect to that circumstantial element of the actus reus will suffice. Such a provision, as well as catching the negligent person, disposes of another difficult case. It deals satisfactorily with the case of D who does not stop to think about B's age at all (simple ignorance),³⁴ for he cannot say that he reasonably believed B to be 16 or over.

It should be noted that the Sexual Offences Act, although moving from a purely subjective approach to recklessness as to consent, has not produced an offence of rape (nor other offences) in which the fault element is exclusively objective. The question for the jury in rape is whether the prosecution has made them sure that the particular defendant did not have a reasonable belief in consent in all the circumstances including whether any steps he took to ascertain consent were reasonable, and whether he intentionally penetrated the victim's vagina, anus or mouth.

³² See the discussion in relation to the old law of provocation in Ch 13.

³³ The Law Commission proposes making this a crime of recklessness. See Ch 31.

³⁴ For philosophical arguments about whether D who does not think about the risk in such circumstances can be described as reckless or culpable at all, see Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 3 and 255–258.

In B,³⁵ rape charges related to occasions when D had sex with V despite her objections. Expert medical evidence was adduced that D suffered from a mental disorder, probably paranoid schizophrenia, at the time of the offences but D was not insane. D claimed that he had a reasonable belief in V's consent and that what was 'reasonable' must take account of his personal mental state. The judge directed the jury that they should ignore D's mental illness when asking whether any belief that he might have had in V's consent had been reasonable. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction. D must genuinely believe that V is consenting, and must have some objective foundation for that belief, but the belief that D holds must be assessed by the jury on purely objective bases. 'Unless the state of mind amounted to insanity in law, beliefs in consent arising from conditions such as delusional psychotic illness or personality disorders had to be judged by objective standards of reasonableness and not by taking into account a mental disorder that induced a belief which could not reasonably arise without it.'³⁶ However, the court recognized that there may be cases in which D's personality or abilities might be relevant to whether his positive belief in consent was reasonable, but that was for determination on specific facts. So, for example, a defendant with Asperger's might not understand subtle and non-verbal cues to desist. Such beliefs would not be so irrational as to be ignored under the Act. This leaves scope for some fine distinctions to be drawn in future cases.

4.2.1 Negligent mistakes

It used to be thought that a mistake was never a defence unless it was reasonable, and that such a rule was capable of turning almost any crime into a crime of negligence. It is now clear since Morgan,³⁷ *B (A Minor)*³⁸ and *K*³⁹ that there is no such general rule. For example, before those cases it was held that if D went through a ceremony of marriage to V, believing wrongly but without reasonable grounds that he was no longer married to X because he believed X was dead, or his marriage had been dissolved or annulled, he was guilty of bigamy.⁴⁰ This, in effect, was to turn bigamy into a crime of negligence so far as this element of the offence is concerned. D was to be held liable because he did not take sufficient care to ascertain that his first marriage was at an end, before going through the second ceremony. It appears that these cases would be decided differently today. D would be guilty only if he knew that his wife was or might be alive, or that his first marriage was or might be subsisting, as the case may be.

4.3 Degrees of negligence

It has been said that there can be no 'degrees of inadvertence when that word is used to denote a state of mind, since it means that in the man's mind there has been a complete absence of a particular thought, a nullity; and of nullity there can be no degrees'.⁴¹

³⁵ [2013] EWCA Crim 3, [2014] Crim LR 312. See further P Rook and R Ward, Rook and Ward on Sexual Offences: Law and Practice (5th edn, 2016) paras 1.392–1.395.

³⁶ At [40] per Hughes LJ. ³⁷ See p 332. ³⁸ See p 151.

³⁹ See p 152.

⁴⁰ Tolson (1889) 23 QBD 168, CCR; Gould [1968] 2 QB 65.

⁴¹ Kenny, Outlines, 39, criticized by Hart, Punishment and Responsibility, n 1, who writes: 'Negligence is gross if the precautions to be taken against harm are very simple, such as persons who are but poorly endowed with physical and mental capacities can easily take.'

It is true that there can be no degrees of inadvertence but there can be degrees of fault in failing to appreciate a risk. The more obvious the risk, and the greater D's capacity to advert to it, the greater his fault in failing to be aware of it. If negligence is regarded as non-attainment of a required standard of conduct then it is clear that there are degrees of it. One person may fall just short of the required standard, another may fall far short. The existence of degrees of negligence is recognized by s 2A of the Road Traffic Act 1988 (as substituted by the Road Traffic Act 1991)⁴² when it provides that a person drives dangerously if:

- (a) the way he drives falls far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver, and
- (b) it would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving in that way would be dangerous.

A driver whose driving falls below, but not far below, what would be expected of a competent and careful driver is negligent and probably guilty of careless driving contrary to s 3 of the 1988 Act; but he is not sufficiently negligent to be guilty of the more serious offence of dangerous driving.

The fault required for the present offence of causing death by dangerous driving probably falls short of that required by the law of manslaughter as restated in Adomako:⁴³ that is, 'whether, having regard to the risk of death involved, the conduct of the defendant was so bad as in all the circumstances as to amount in [the jury's] judgement to a criminal act or omission'. There are two possible distinctions. First, driving may fall far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver without involving any apparent risk to life. The only apparent risk may be to property but, if the driving unforeseeably causes death, that will amount to a Road Traffic Act offence. Secondly, the Road Traffic Act offence is not subject to the jury's assessment of its 'badness'. True, the jury find, or, more accurately, have to accept the judge's direction, that even careless driving is a 'criminal act'; but the principle in Adomako has to be read against the background that the crime charged is manslaughter; and clearly the jury will be looking to see whether the conduct is bad enough to amount to that very serious crime, not careless driving. Conceivably, a jury of motorists might think that the particular driving, though falling far below the standard expected of a competent and careful driver, ought not to amount to a crime. It would be their duty to convict of causing death by dangerous driving, but not of manslaughter.⁴⁴ The more likely charge in such a case is now one of causing death by careless driving. Section 20(1) of the Road Safety Act 2006 creates an offence (inserting s 2B into the 1988 Act) of causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving.⁴⁵

4.4 Should negligence be a ground of liability?

4.4.1 Negligence as a form of culpable fault

Distinguished academic writers have strongly contended that negligence should have no place in criminal liability.⁴⁶ Their arguments for the most part assume a clear-cut distinction between conscious and inadvertent risk-taking that clearly distinguishes Cunningham/G

⁴² See Ch 32.

⁴³ [1995] 1 AC 171, [1994] Crim LR 757, HL, see p 584.

⁴⁴ There has to be a serious and obvious risk of death for gross negligence manslaughter: Misra [2004] EWCA Crim 2375, [2005] Crim LR 234. See Ch 14, p 589.

⁴⁵ The maximum penalty on conviction on indictment is five years' imprisonment or a fine, or both.

⁴⁶ See eg J Hall, 'Negligent Behaviour Should be Excluded from Criminal Liability' (1963) 63 Col LR 632; L Alexander, K Ferzan and S Morse, Crime and Culpability (2009), but note Leipold's response, see A Leipold, 'A Case for Criminal Negligence' (2010) 29 Law & Phil 455.

recklessness from negligence.⁴⁷ Caldwell brought much inadvertent risk-taking within the criminal law, but it no longer has any application (although there are numerous serious offences with an objective element including, eg: manslaughter, dangerous driving, various terrorism offences,⁴⁸ money laundering offences⁴⁹ and many sexual offences under the Sexual Offences Act 2003).

Turner acknowledged that negligence connotes that D was 'in some measure blameworthy, and that we should expect an ordinary reasonable man to foresee the possibility of the consequences and to regulate his conduct so as to avoid them';⁵⁰ however, he also contended that the moral test on which criminal liability should be (and, indeed, is) based is the proof of subjective fault of foresight of the consequences of one's conduct. Hall goes further and finds it difficult to accept that negligently caused harm reflects a moral fault.⁵¹ He rejects the thesis that negligent persons may be ethically blameworthy insofar as they are insensitive to the rights of others. He also rejects the view that punishment stimulates care, arguing that the deterrent theory postulates a person who weighs the possibility of punishment in the balance before acting; but the inadvertent harm-doer, by definition, does not do this. Hall appears to suggest that the courts themselves do not really believe that punishment deters negligence, suggesting that sentences, even for negligent homicides, are relatively light. In the case of negligently caused car accidents, for example, he argues that it seems much more probable that a dull mind, slow reactions, awkwardness and other ethically irrelevant factors were the underlying cause. Other commentators take a different view. Brett, for example, suggests that it is:

common knowledge that as soon as traffic police appear on the roads, drivers begin to pay greater attention to what they are doing and the standard of driving rises sharply.⁵²

The negligent handling of certain articles—notably vehicles—can have such drastic consequences that society is almost bound to adopt any measures that seem to have a reasonable prospect of inducing greater care; and it seems reasonable to suppose that the threat of punishment does have an effect on the care used in their handling.

Glanville Williams acknowledges that 'it is possible for punishment to bring about greater foresight, by causing the subject to stop and think before committing himself to a course of conduct'; but thinks that this justification does not go very far and that the law is wise in penalizing negligence only exceptionally.⁵³

Lord Nicholls, in rejecting the former rule that only a reasonable mistake will excuse, invoked a presumption against liability for mere negligence:

When [a person is held liable because his mistake, though negating mens rea, was made without reasonable grounds] the defendant's 'fault' lies exclusively in falling short of an objective standard. His crime lies in his negligence. A statute may so provide expressly or by necessary implication. But this can have no place in a common law principle, of general application, which is concerned with the need for a mental element as an essential ingredient of a criminal offence.⁵⁴

⁴⁷ There are, however, those who argue that the distinction between the two is in fact an uncertain one. See KW Simons, 'The Distinction between Negligence and Recklessness is Unstable' in PH Robinson, SP Garvey and K Ferzan (eds), Criminal Law Conversations (2009). See also D Husak, 'Negligence, Belief and Criminal Liability: The Special Case of Forgetting' (2011) 5 Crim L & Phil 199. Husak states that it is 'scandalous' that there is not a greater body of literature analysing the distinction between recklessness and negligence.

⁴⁸ Terrorism Act 2000, ss 15–18.

⁴⁹ POCA 2002, ss 330–333.

⁵⁰ MACL, 207.

⁵¹ General Principles, 136.

⁵² Brett, An Inquiry into Criminal Guilt, 173.

⁵³ Chan and Simester proffer a different reason for why negligence should be used rarely, which is based on the proposition that mens rea performs functions other than denoting culpability. See W Chan and AP Simester, 'Four Functions of Mens Rea' (2011) 70 CLJ 381.

⁵⁴ B (A Child) v DPP [2000] 2 AC 428 at 462, [2000] 1 All ER 833 at 837, [2000] Crim LR 403.

In an impressive account of recklessness and negligence in the criminal law, Stark argues that negligence ought to be recognized as culpable only when certain conditions are met. The conditions he specifies are that the defendant was possessed of background beliefs and perceptions that could have led to the belief that a risk was present, but he failed to form that belief—in circumstances demonstrating insufficient concern for others—because of an accepted facet of his character.⁵⁵

4.4.2 Negligence and capacity

Hart famously challenged the commonly accepted criterion of foresight. The reason why in most cases it is thought proper to punish the person who foresees the forbidden harm is that he can choose to cause it or not; but in some cases of negligence, at least, it may be said:

‘he could have thought about what he was doing’ with just as much rational confidence as one can say of an intentional wrong-doing, ‘he could have done otherwise’.⁵⁶

Hart’s approach to negligence, however, differs from that so far generally adopted by the courts. He would not enforce an objective, external and impersonal standard which took no account of the individual’s lack of capacity. He would recognize that punishment might be proper only if two questions are answered in the affirmative.⁵⁷

- (1) Did the accused fail to take those precautions which any reasonable man with normal capacities would in the circumstances have taken?
- (2) Could the accused, given his mental and physical capacities, have taken those precautions?

As noted earlier, the courts have not yet demonstrated a willingness to subjectivize the negligence standard in this way.

4.4.3 Due diligence defences

There have been many suggestions to include more negligence-based liability in the criminal law by replacing strict liability offences—usually by accepting as a defence to strict liability offences that D acted with all due diligence. The ‘no negligence’ defence is examined further in the context of strict liability in the next chapter.

⁵⁵ F Stark, Culpable Carelessness (2016).

⁵⁶ Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence, 29.

⁵⁷ ibid, 46. Hart was not advocating the punishment of negligence, only seeking to dispel the belief that negligence is a form of strict liability.

Crimes of strict liability

5.1 The nature of strict liability

Crimes which do not require mens rea or even negligence as to one or more elements in the actus reus are known as offences of strict liability or, sometimes, ‘of absolute prohibition’.¹ An example is s 58(2) of the Medicines Act 1968 which prohibited the sale by retail of specified medicinal products except in accordance with a prescription given by an appropriate medical practitioner.² In Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Storkwain Ltd,³ D, a pharmacist, supplied to X specified drugs on prescriptions purporting to be signed by a Dr Irani. The prescriptions were forged. There was, therefore, no prescription given by an appropriate medical practitioner. There was no finding that D acted dishonestly, improperly or even negligently in acting on that prescription and providing X with the medicines. It appeared that the forgery was good enough to deceive the pharmacists without any negligence on their part. Yet the House of Lords held that the Divisional Court was right to direct the magistrate to convict. The case highlights the difficulties with imposing strict liability, particularly in offences of a serious nature: there is a real sense of unfairness in convicting someone for conduct which on his part was ‘faultless’.⁴

¹ For more detailed discussion of this topic, see especially A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (2014), 102–117; A Ashworth, ‘Should Strict Criminal Liability be Removed from all Imprisonable Offences?’ in A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013); J Horder, ‘Strict Liability, Statutory Construction and the Spirit of Liberty’ (2002) 118 LQR 458; the collection of essays edited by Simester, Appraising Strict Liability and see K Reid, ‘Strict Liability: Some Principles for Parliament’ (2008) 29 St LR 173. For more historical accounts of the development of strict liability, see the seminal works by Edwards, Mens Rea; Howard, Strict Responsibility; F Sayre, ‘Public Welfare Offences’ (1933) 33 Col LR 55. See also M Smith and A Pearson, ‘The Value of Strict Liability’ [1969] Crim LR 516; WG Carson, ‘Some Sociological Aspects of Strict Liability and the Enforcement of Factory Legislation’ (1970) 33 MLR 396; B Hogan, Criminal Liability without Fault (1969); JC Smith, ‘Responsibility in Criminal Law’ in P Bean and DK Whynes (eds), Barbara Wootton, Essays in Her Honour (1986) 141; P Brett, ‘Strict Responsibility: Possible Solutions’ (1974) 37 MLR 417; L Leigh, Strict and Vicarious Liability (1982).

² Section 58(2) has been repealed, but is replaced by very similar provisions in the Human Medicines Regulations 2012, SI 2012/1916, regs 214 and 255.

³ [1986] 2 All ER 635, [1986] Crim LR 813, HL discussed by BS Jackson in ‘Storkwain: A Case Study in Strict Liability and Self Regulation’ [1991] Crim LR 892, who shows that the Society’s policy was to prosecute only where the pharmacist had not acted with due diligence; but the Society does not have a monopoly of the right to prosecute; and if, in practice, fault is required, should not the decision whether it exists be made in court? See also R Cooke, Turning Points (Hamlyn Lectures, 1997) 40.

⁴ Duff provides an interesting account of the relationship between strict liability and strict responsibility, classifying crimes into categories where liability is ‘formally’ strict (no intention, recklessness or negligence) and/or those where it is ‘substantially’ strict (ie no moral fault). See Answering for Crime, Ch 10.

It should not be imagined that strict liability applies only in 'regulatory' offences, assuming indeed that such a category can be defined.⁵ For example, s 5 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 creates an offence where D intentionally penetrates with his penis the vagina, anus or mouth of a child under 13. The conduct element of the offence—penile penetration—must be intentional; that much is clear. But as to the circumstance element that V is under 13, the House of Lords⁶ held that Parliament intended this element of the offence to be strict. So, even if V told D she was 16, and even if it was reasonable for D to believe her in the circumstances, D will be guilty of the offence if he intentionally penetrates her. The offence carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment and, obviously, serious stigma. Numerous other serious criminal offences are strict as to at least one element of the actus reus, including possession of firearms,⁷ terrorism offences, possession of indecent images of children⁸ and many sexual offences.⁹ The imposition of criminal liability and punishment (including imprisonment) for such conduct where D had no mens rea and was not negligent seems 'unjust'.¹⁰ In one case in which D was convicted of possessing a firearm which he claimed had been slipped into his bag without his knowledge, the court, following a strong line of binding authority stated:

The effect of the authorities is that ignorance of the contents of a bag of which a person is in possession can afford no defence where the contents include a firearm. It makes no difference whether there is something in the bag that the carrier is unaware of, or is mistaken to its nature, or does not know that the bag has any contents, far less that it contains a gun. In each case the question for the jury for consideration relates to possession, which in turn depends on control. This may or may not be harsh, but it is not for this court to re-write the statute, far less when it has already been interpreted by different constitutions of this court on separate occasions.¹¹

The offence carries a mandatory minimum sentence of five years' imprisonment unless there are exceptional circumstances.

The first case to impose strict liability is said¹² to be that of Woodrow.¹³ D was found guilty of having in his possession adulterated tobacco, although he did not know it was adulterated. The prosecution emphasized the absence of the word 'knowingly' or any similar word in the definition of the offence and the purpose of the relevant statute—it was for the protection of the revenue. The court, in interpreting the offence, relied on a section of the Act which gave the Commissioners of Excise a power not to prosecute where there was no 'intention of fraud or of offending against this Act', the implication being that the crime was still committed even when there was no fraud or intention of offending against the Act.

⁵ See later where LCCP 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010) is examined. This point is emphasized by Ashworth. See A Ashworth, 'Should Strict Criminal Liability be Removed from all Imprisonable Offences?' in A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013).

⁶ G [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818. D's application to the ECtHR on the basis that his conviction violated Arts 6 and 8 was found inadmissible. See G v UK (2011) 53 EHRR SE25, [2012] Crim LR 47.

⁷ See Deyemi [2007] EWCA Crim 2060, [2008] Crim LR 327; Zahid [2010] EWCA Crim 2158; Gregory [2011] EWCA Crim 1712.

⁸ See eg Price [2006] EWCA Crim 3363—Protection of Children Act 1978, s 1. For a comprehensive and accessible review of the issues, see A Gillespie, 'Child Pornography Balancing Substantive and Evidential Law to Safeguard Children' (2005) 9 E & P 29.

⁹ Some have argued that rape ought to be a strict liability offence: see, for discussion, K Huigens, 'Is Strict Liability Rape Defensible' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 196.

¹⁰ See Duff, Answering for Crime, 231–232.

¹¹ Tinarwo [2014] EWCA Crim 1409, per HHJ Goldstone QC at [12]–[13].

¹² By Sayre (1933) 33 Col LR 55. S Salako, 'Strict Criminal Liability: A Violation of the Convention' (2006) 70 J Crim L 531, erroneously attributes that conclusion, which he considers to be wrong, to the 6th edn of this book.

¹³ (1846) 15 M & W 404.

Practical problems were also weighed in the balance. Parke B thought that the prosecution would very rarely be able to prove knowledge in such cases; and that the public inconvenience which would follow if they were required to do so would be greater than the injustice to the individual if they were not. Even the exercise of reasonable care would not have saved D; according to Parke B, he was liable even if the adulteration was discoverable only by a 'nice chemical analysis'. Liability was strict.

Notwithstanding the subsequent mass of case law, the considerations taken into account in this early case are very much the same as those which influence the decisions of the courts today when interpreting a statutory offence to determine whether it is one of strict liability: the public welfare purpose of the legislation, the precise statutory form of words in creating the offence, the penalty and whether the offence would otherwise be impossible or almost impossible to prove. These issues will be considered later in this chapter.

It is important to appreciate that where an offence is interpreted to be one of strict liability, the fact that D could not have avoided the prescribed harm even if he had tried to will not absolve him of liability. For example, in Hobbs v Winchester Corpn,¹⁴ the case turned on whether a butcher had sold contaminated meat. The butcher was unaware, and he could not have discovered by any examination which he could reasonably be expected to make, that the meat was contaminated. He was guilty of the crime of selling such meat. Kennedy LJ, having regard to the policy of the statute in protecting consumers said:¹⁵

I think that the policy of the Act is this: that if a man chooses for profit to engage in a business which involves the offering for sale of that which may be deadly or injurious to health he must take that risk, and that it is not a sufficient defence for anyone who chooses to embark on such a business to say 'I could not have discovered the disease unless I had an analyst on the premises'.

Similarly, in the famous case of Cundy v Le Cocq,¹⁶ D was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor to a drunken person contrary to what was then s 13 of the Licensing Act 1872. It was proved that D did not know the person was drunk and nothing had occurred to show that he was drunk. While some sections of the 1872 Act contained the word 'knowingly', s 13 did not do so. The Divisional Court held that it was not necessary to consider whether D knew, or had means of knowing, or could with ordinary care have detected, that the person served was drunk. If he served a drink to a person who was in fact drunk, he was guilty.

In each of these cases D was not even negligent. He intended the conduct element of the offence—to sell medicine or meat or liquor or to possess tobacco—but he was blamelessly unaware of the crucial circumstance element in the actus reus—that the tobacco was adulterated, that the meat was contaminated, that the person was drunk, etc. In each case he was criminally liable despite not having been at fault in relation to this material element of the offence.

5.1.1 Irrelevance of mens rea

Where an offence is held to be one of strict liability, not only is it unnecessary for the prosecution to tender evidence of any mens rea as to the matter of strict liability (eg that D had knowledge of or was negligent as to the prescription being duly signed by a practitioner, that the tobacco is adulterated, etc), they must not adduce evidence of D's mens rea as to that aspect of the offence. Such evidence is irrelevant and, as it shows the defendant to be at fault, it is prejudicial. In Sandhu,¹⁷ D was charged with the strict liability offence of causing ¹⁴ [1910] 2 KB 471, CA.

¹⁵ ibid, 483. Note the modern statutory defence, p 143.

¹⁶ (1884) 13 QBD 207.

¹⁷ [1997] Crim LR 288 and commentary. See Hill [1997] 2 Cr App R (S) 243, and commentary at [1997] Crim LR 459 on the sentencing implications.

a listed building to be altered without authority. Although D objected, the prosecution were allowed to prove that he knew the work went beyond what was permitted. This was an error and D's conviction was quashed.¹⁸ This seems an unnecessarily narrow view.

5.1.2 Distinction from 'absolute' liability

Until relatively recently, only limited academic attention had been paid to defining what was meant by strict liability. One particular problem that has generated is that there is no universally accepted definition of the terms 'strict liability' and 'absolute liability' and how they relate.

It is commonly said that 'no mens rea' need be proved in strict liability offences: 'D can be convicted on proof by the prosecution of actus reus only'.¹⁹ In fact it is only in an extreme case²⁰ that this is true.²¹ The label 'absolute offence' is best reserved for those rare situations where the offence criminalizes D whose conduct has caused²² an actus reus with no mens rea and who is precluded from relying on defences.²³ Absolute liability denotes those crimes in which there is no mens rea attaching to any element of the actus reus and no due diligence defence available.²⁴

Strict liability is different. The label 'strict liability' should be used to denote crimes in which one element or more (but not all) of the actus reus requires no proof of mens rea. Even this definition of strict liability is problematical since it encompasses constructive crimes. Lord Edmund-Davies said that 'an offence is regarded—and properly regarded—as one of strict liability if no mens rea need be proved as to a single element in the actus reus'.²⁵ By this test, even murder is an offence of strict liability because no mens rea is required as to ¹⁸ For proof of strict liability offence by D's previous similar misconduct, see eg Vehicle and Operator Services Agency v Ace Crane and Transport Ltd [2010] EWHC 288 (Admin).

¹⁹ Howard, SR, 1. ²⁰ Larsonneur, p 43.

²¹ Confusingly, some offences are referred to as being 'double strict liability' offences. These are offences where the underlying or qualifying condition is an offence (eg uninsured driving) which can be committed without mens rea, and the aggravating element can be constituted by an event for which D has no fault. The Supreme Court in Hughes [2013] UKSC 56, [2014] Crim LR 234 held that the offence in s 3ZB of the Road Traffic Act 1988, causing death by driving while uninsured or without a licence was an offence of strict liability in the sense that it did not require the Crown to prove mens rea, but it did require proof of some fault in the manner of D's driving which contributed to V's death in a more than minimal way. See also Taylor [2016] UKSC 5, [2016] Crim LR 366. For further discussion, see Ch 32.

²² In Kilbride v Lake [1962] NZLR 590, discussed by M Budd and A Lynch, 'Voluntariness, Causation and Strict Liability' [1978] Crim LR 74, D was acquitted of permitting a vehicle not displaying a current warrant of fitness to be on the highway, when the warrant was detached during his absence. The court took the view that there was an actus reus (sed quare?) but that D had not caused it and he was not liable even if the offence was one of strict liability. Cf Strowger v John [1974] RTR 124, [1974] Crim LR 123. See the discussion at Ch 2, p 44.

²³ In Gregory [2011] EWCA Crim 1712, Lord Judge CJ stated that the judge had been wrong to characterize the offence in s 1(1) of the Firearms Act 1968 as being one of absolute liability. It is an offence of strict liability, as there is nothing that precludes D from pleading a defence.

²⁴ See on this SP Green, 'Six Senses of Strict Liability: A Plea for Formalism' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability. Green identifies six possible uses of 'strict liability' and concludes that the correct one is where the offence lacks mens rea as to at least one element. See also DN Husak, 'Varieties of Strict Liability' (1995) 8 Canadian J L & Jurisprudence 189. Similarly, Ashworth adopts the following definition: 'an offence should be treated as a crime of strict liability if it provides for conviction without requiring fault as to at least one material element'. See A Ashworth, 'Should Strict Criminal Liability be Removed from all Imprisonable Offences?' in A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 112.

²⁵ Whitehouse v Gay News Ltd [1979] AC 617 at 656, quoting the 4th edition of this book, at p 79 where 'single' was clearly meaning 'one' and not 'any'. See on the constructive crime and strict liability relationship, Green, n 24, 2.

the crucial element of death.²⁶ Murder, however, does require an intention to cause grievous bodily harm, the mens rea of a lesser offence but nevertheless a substantial mens rea.²⁷

Care should also be taken with loose definitions related to whether the offence can be committed without proof of moral fault: the focus is on whether there needs to be mens rea, and as the House of Lords has reminded us, mens rea is not necessarily synonymous with moral fault.²⁸ Unfortunately, the courts and practitioners do not always adopt consistent and clear terminology.²⁹

On the definition of strict liability adopted in this work, there must be one or more elements of actus reus as to which no mens rea is required. The element(s) as to which liability is strict will usually be of great significance. In many cases the courts have held that Parliament intended to impose strict liability and have convicted defendants who lacked mens rea, not merely as to some subsidiary matter, but as to the central feature of the actus reus. For example, in a case of sexual touching of a child under 13, liability to the age of the child is strict. D is guilty whether he thought the child was older, whether he had good reason to think so or not. If the child is under 13 that element of the offence is satisfied.

The fact that liability as to the central element of the offence is strict does not necessarily mean that mens rea will be required as to the remaining actus reus elements of the offence. In one of the leading cases, Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v A-G of Hong Kong, construing the Hong Kong Building Ordinance, Lord Scarman said: 'Each provision clearly requires a degree of mens rea, but each is silent whether it is required in respect of all the facts which together constitute the offence created.' The Privy Council held that D was liable for deviating in a material way from the approved building plan, even though there was no evidence that he knew that his act constituted a material deviation from the plan—liability as to that element was strict.³⁰

5.1.3 Common law and statute

Crimes of strict liability are almost invariably statutory. There are many thousands of these offences, mostly involving offences triable in the magistrates' court,³¹ but with many triable on indictment.³² There has been an increase in such offences being implemented by Parliament on matters of regulation.³³ This was the subject of close scrutiny in the Macrory Report³⁴ which led to the Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions Act 2008. That Act

²⁶ It is for this reason that some eminent judges regard murder as an anomaly and an instance of 'constructive crime'. See p 515.

²⁷ See p 513.

²⁸ See Lord Mustill in Kingston [1995] 2 AC 355, [1994] Crim LR 846. For theoretical discussion of the moral issues, see RA Duff, 'Strict Liability, Legal Presumption and the Presumption of Innocence' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability. A similar point is also made by Chan and Simester, who argue that it is a mistake to view mens rea as constituting the fault element of an offence. They argue that it is a necessary but not a sufficient component for a finding of culpability. See W Chan and AP Simester, 'Four Functions of Mens Rea' (2011) 70 CLJ 381.

²⁹ cf Nicholson [2006] EWCA Crim 1518 where the Court of Appeal declined to adopt the term strict liability to describe an absence of a reasonable excuse. See also Charles [2009] EWCA Crim 1570, [2010] Crim LR 303 in the context of ASBOs.

³⁰ Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v A-G of Hong Kong [1985] AC 1, [1984] Crim LR 479, PC.

³¹ See Justice, Breaking the Rules (1980).

³² A Ashworth and M Blake, 'The Presumption of Innocence in English Criminal Law' [1996] Crim LR 306 found almost half of the offences in Archbold were strict in one sense.

³³ See R Baldwin, 'The New Punitive Regulation' (2004) 67 MLR 351. Cf Leverick et al [2015] Crim LR 177.

³⁴ Macrory Review of Regulatory Penalties (2006). See J Norris and J Phillips, The Law of Regulatory Enforcement and Sanctions (2011).

encourages the use of civil administrative sanctions rather than criminal offences in regulatory contexts. In 2010, the Law Commission addressed the problem in Consultation Paper No 195³⁵ in which more radical proposals were made to avoid the use of criminal offences in regulatory sectors.³⁶

As for the common law, it used to be said that there were only two exceptions to the rule requiring mens rea. These were public nuisance and criminal libel. Public nuisance, however, is an anomalous crime and is treated in several respects rather as if it were a civil action than an indictable offence. Criminal libel has now been abolished, although Parliament has now expressly recognized the existence of strict liability in this context by the Contempt of Court Act 1981.³⁷ Other contempts of court at common law require mens rea.³⁸

Apart from these instances, the common law generally required mens rea, though sometimes the mens rea of a lesser offence—as in the case of murder where intention to cause grievous bodily harm is sufficient.

5.1.4 Strict liability and the presumption of innocence

The HRA 1998 prompted challenges to strict liability offences on the basis that they might infringe rights guaranteed under the European Convention. Since the HRA 1998 does not empower courts to ‘strike down’ statutes, the challenge is not of the same magnitude as that in, for example, the United States where it is possible for some strict liability offences to be held to be unconstitutional.³⁹ It has been argued that the imposition of strict liability might engage, for example, Art 3 (freedom from inhuman or degrading treatment),⁴⁰ Art 8 (respect for privacy),⁴¹ Art 10 (freedom of expression)⁴² and possibly Art 7 (guarantees against retrospectivity) owing to the ambiguity over whether the courts will hold liability to be strict.

The controversy has been over whether strict liability offences infringe the presumption of innocence guaranteed under Art 6(2) of the ECHR.⁴³ Some commentators argued that strict liability offences may offend against Art 6(2) because once the prohibited act is proved, D is ‘presumed’ to be liable.⁴⁴ It was argued that the effect of the presumption and the ³⁵ Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010).

³⁶ The most radical suggestion in LCCP 195 is for all criminal offences with strict liability to be read subject to a defence for the accused to show that he had acted with all due diligence. See para 1.68.

³⁷ See: B [2006] EWCA Crim 2692; Attorney General v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2011] EWHC 418 (Admin).

³⁸ Akthar [2006] EWCA Crim 469.

³⁹ See A Michaels, ‘Imposing Constitutional Limits on Strict Liability: Lessons from the American Experience; in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability. See also the Irish Supreme Court decision in CC v Ireland [2006] IESC 33 noted by L McGowan, ‘Irish Supreme Court: Sexual Offence: Constitutionality’ (2006) 70 J Crim L 406. The English courts may of course read down statutes incompatible with the HRA—see eg the reverse burden case of Keogh [2007] EWCA Crim 528 (Official Secrets Act 1989), and Webster [2010] EWCA Crim 2819 (corruption).

⁴⁰ See GR Sullivan, ‘Strict Liability for Criminal Offences in England and Wales Following Incorporation into English Law of the ECHR’ in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 206; Michaels, n 39, 229–231. See also S Salako (2006) 70 J Crim L 531, arguing that ‘it is degrading and inhuman to put a person who is not culpable through the process of a criminal trial’. The issue is most acute where D is sentenced to a lengthy term of imprisonment for a strict liability offence.

⁴¹ As in the Barnfather case discussed later. See also on this Michaels, n 39, 233.

⁴² eg in contempt of court cases: Michaels, n 39. This might also be significant in offences involving communication: DPP v Collins [2006] UKHL 40, [2007] Crim LR 98, Ch 30, on the communication of racist views and the element of mens rea.

⁴³ A full examination of the issues of Art 6 belongs more properly in an evidence textbook. See C Tapper, Cross and Tapper on Evidence (12th edn, 2010) Ch III.

⁴⁴ See V Tadros and S Tierney, ‘The Presumption of Innocence and the Human Rights Act’ (2004) 67 MLR 402.

imposition of strict liability is the same.⁴⁵ That alleged functional equivalence was keenly disputed by others,⁴⁶ who regard the rules of procedure and substantive law as fundamentally distinct. Professor Ashworth has summarized the objection to strict liability as:

that it is wrong to convict people of serious offences without proof of culpability, and that is a separate argument from the presumption of innocence. It is not an argument about evidence and procedure at all but an argument about the proper preconditions of criminal liability.⁴⁷

Although there is some faint support in the ECtHR case law for the application of Art 6(2) to strict liability offences,⁴⁸ the European Court has held that strict liability offences are compatible with the Article: 'in principle the contracting States may, under certain conditions, penalize a simple or objective fact as such irrespective of whether it results from criminal intent or from negligence'.⁴⁹

The English courts have taken account of that conclusion in holding that Art 6(2) is restricted to providing procedural protection and does not render the imposition of strict liability incompatible with Art 6(2).⁵⁰ As Lord Bingham stated in Sheldrake:⁵¹

The overriding concern is that a trial should be fair, and the presumption of innocence is a fundamental right directed to that end. The Convention does not outlaw presumptions of fact or law but requires that these should be kept within reasonable limits and should not be arbitrary. It is open to states to define the constituent elements of a criminal offence, excluding the requirement of mens rea. But the substance and effect of any presumption adverse to a defendant must be examined, and must be reasonable. Relevant to any judgment on reasonableness or proportionality will be the opportunity given to the defendant to rebut the presumption, maintenance of the rights of the defence, flexibility in application of the presumption, retention by the court of a power to assess the evidence, the importance of what is at stake and the difficulty which a prosecutor may face in the absence of a presumption.⁵²

Examples of the domestic courts' approach include the rejection of the argument that strict liability offences restricting press publication of trial proceedings are incompatible with Arts 6 and 10,⁵³ that strict liability offences are incompatible with Art 7 on the basis of their ambiguity⁵⁴ and that the imposition of strict liability in sexual offences with children is incompatible with Art 6.

⁴⁵ See RA Duff, 'Strict Liability, Legal Presumptions and the Presumption of Innocence' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 125.

⁴⁶ See P Roberts, 'Strict Liability and the Presumption of Innocence' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 151.

⁴⁷ A Ashworth, 'Four Threats to the Presumption of Innocence' (2006) 10 E & P 241, 252–253. Cf the views of eg S Salako (2006) 70 J Crim L 53, who suggests such a distinction is 'artificial'.

⁴⁸ See Hansen v Denmark (App no 28971/95).

⁴⁹ Salibaku v France (1998) 13 EHRR 379; Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 9.74–9.77. For analysis, see Williams [2012] EWCA Crim 2162, [2013] Crim LR 983 and Ashworth's criticisms at [2013] Crim LR 447.

⁵⁰ G [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818. D's application to the ECtHR on the basis that his conviction violated Arts 6 and 8 was judged inadmissible. See G v UK (2011) 53 EHRR SE25, [2012] Crim LR 47. See also Barnfather v Islington LBC [2003] EWHC 418 (Admin). On which see Tadros and Tierney (2004) 67 MLR 402, and J Horder, 'Whose Values Should Determine Whether Liability is Strict' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 105 and see the valuable comment by B Fitzpatrick, 'Divisional Court—Strict Liability and Article 6(2) of the European Convention on Human Rights: School Non-Attendance Offence' (2004) 68 J Crim L 16.

⁵¹ [2005] 1 AC 264, [21] (emphasis added).

⁵² See also the comments of leading commentators such as Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, para 9.74, concluding that even the landmark decisions in DPP v B and R v K (discussed later) have no bearing on the relationship between the presumption of innocence and the imposition of strict liability.

⁵³ O'Riordan v DPP [2005] EWHC 1240 (Admin).

⁵⁴ Muhammed [2002] EWCA Crim 1856, and Kearns [2002] EWCA Crim 748, [2003] 1 Cr App R 7, [2002] Crim LR 653.

In G,⁵⁵ G, who was aged 15, pleaded guilty to rape of a child under 13 (Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 5). G's basis of plea was that V consented and that he reasonably believed her to be older than 13, because she had told him so. The House of Lords confirmed that s 5 creates an offence of strict liability to which belief in consent or the age of the victim has no application. The actus reus of the offence is penile penetration of the vagina, anus or mouth of a victim under 13, whether the victim consented or not and irrespective of how old the defendant thought she was. Section 5 criminalizes this conduct even where the defendant reasonably believed that the child he was penetrating was over 16. The House of Lords reached that conclusion having regard to a number of factors including, in particular, the fact that in other sections of the 2003 Act⁵⁶ it is expressly stated that the offence is not committed if D believes that V is over 16; but in s 5 there is no reference to D having a reasonable belief as to age. In relation to the offences dealing with children under 13, liability as to age is strict. This may seem harsh, particularly where D is of similar age and had every reason to believe that V was over 13 (including because she told him so), but the court construed Parliament's intention to impose strict liability in order to protect such young children, and D would have been convicted of an offence on his admitted belief in any event.

5.2 The presumption of mens rea

Since, as noted, strict liability offences are almost always found in statutes, the courts, in enforcing them, profess merely to be implementing the intention of Parliament, express or implied, as they find it in the statute. This has frequently been mere lip-service. In 1958, Devlin J wrote:

The fact is that Parliament has no intention whatever of troubling itself about mens rea. If it had, the thing would have been settled long ago. All that Parliament would have to do would be to use express words that left no room for implication. One is driven to the conclusion that the reason why Parliament has never done that is that it prefers to leave the point to the judges and does not want to legislate about it.⁵⁷

Subject to any existing precedent the courts have a fairly free hand in this matter of deciding whether an offence is one of strict liability. It is only rarely that the statute rules out mens rea expressly. An example is s 53A of the Sexual Offences Act 2003,⁵⁸ criminalizing use of exploited sex workers. It is made clear that it is 'irrelevant . . . whether [D] is, or ought to be, aware that [a third party linked to V] has engaged in exploitative conduct'.⁵⁹

Aside from such rare cases, when strict liability has been imposed it is usually because the judges have regarded that interpretation as necessary or desirable in the public interest—effectively exercising a legislative function. In the past, judges were quick to state that there is a presumption in favour of mens rea, commonly reciting the well-known statement by Wright J in Sherras v De Rutzen:⁶⁰

There is a presumption that mens rea, or evil intention, or knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act, is an essential ingredient in every offence; but that presumption is liable to be displaced either by the words of the statute creating the offence or by the subject-matter with which it deals, and both must be considered.

⁵⁵ [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818, see Lord Hope at [28]–[29].

⁵⁶ cf the approach in Ireland in a very similar case: CC v Ireland [2006] IESC 33.

⁵⁷ Samples of Lawmaking (1962) 71. Cf GC Thornton, Legislative Drafting (2006) 264. Lord Reid in Sweet v Parsley [1969] 1 All ER 347 at 351.

⁵⁸ Inserted by s 14 of the Policing and Crime Act 2009.

⁵⁹ The drafting of the offence is very poor in other respects.

⁶⁰ [1895] 1 QB 918 at 921, p 158.

Adopting that approach, the judges readily found the presumption rebutted.⁶¹ The position is said⁶² to have reached its nadir when even bigamy was held to be a crime of strict liability in Wheat,⁶³ now happily overruled. The trend in the years before *Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr*⁶⁴ (the first case on the point to reach the House of Lords) seems to have been in favour of strict liability; but Lord Reid in that case (where he dissented) and in *Sweet v Parsley*⁶⁵ powerfully reaffirmed the presumption: 'whenever a section is silent as to mens rea there is a presumption that, in order to give effect to the will of Parliament, we must read in words appropriate to require mens rea'; and 'it is a universal principle that if a penal provision is reasonably capable of two interpretations, that interpretation which is most favourable to the accused must be adopted'.⁶⁶ In 1980, in Sheppard,⁶⁷ Lord Diplock noted that, 'The climate of both parliamentary and judicial opinion has been growing less favourable to the recognition of absolute [sic] offences over the last few decades . . .'.⁶⁸

The decisions of the House of Lords in *B (A Minor) v DPP*⁶⁹ and *K*⁷⁰ signalled an emphatic reassertion of the presumption that all serious offences ought to be offences of mens rea.

5.2.1 A twenty-first century revitalized presumption of mens rea

The House of Lords in those cases declared that there is a constitutional presumption of mens rea in offences. In interpreting a statute, the courts will ask whether that presumption is rebutted, with the consequence that the offence is one of strict liability: 'the test is not whether it is a reasonable implication that the statute rules out mens rea as a constituent part of the crime—the test is whether it is a necessary implication'.⁷¹ In K, the House followed this emphatically.⁷² Section 14 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 (indecent assault—now repealed)⁷³ provided that neither a girl under 16 (s 14(2)) nor a 'defective' (as the Act labelled someone with a learning disability or mental disorder) (s 14(4)) could give consent which would prevent an act being an assault for the purposes of the section. It was, however, a defence for the person who had acted indecently towards a consenting 'defective' to prove that he did not know and had no reason to suspect her to be a 'defective'. It necessarily followed that a person who failed to prove this was guilty, although he honestly believed the woman was not a defective; that is, subject to the statutory defence, the section imposed strict liability on that person. Section 14(3) provided that where D had gone through a ceremony of marriage with V which was invalid because she was under 16, it was a defence for him to prove that he believed, and had reasonable cause to believe, her to be his wife. Again, it necessarily followed that a person who was unable to prove that fact was guilty, ⁶¹ In Brown [2013] UKSC 43, Lord Kerr, at [29], cited the 13th edition of this work and noted how the authors 'deprecated the tendency of some judges to declaim that the presumption was well-embedded only to willingly find that it was easily rebutted'. It is arguable that the judgment in that case exhibits the same flaw.

⁶² Williams, CLGP, 178. ⁶³ [1921] 2 KB 119, overruled by Gould [1968] 2 QB 65.

⁶⁴ [1969] 2 AC 256, Lord Reid (whose speech still merits careful study) dissenting on this issue. The case is more fully considered at p 162.

⁶⁵ [1970] AC 132, HL, p 164 but the House again imposed strict liability in Alphacell Ltd v Woodward [1972] AC 824, [1972] Crim LR 41, p 165. ⁶⁶ Per Lord Reid at 349–350.

⁶⁷ [1981] AC 394, [1981] Crim LR 171. ⁶⁸ At 407.

⁶⁹ [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403. ⁷⁰ [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] Crim LR 993.

⁷¹ [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403, [2000] 1 All ER at 855d–e per Lord Hutton.

⁷² For strong criticism, see J Horder, 'How Culpability Can, and Cannot, Be Denied in Under-Age Sex Crimes' [2001] Crim LR 15, commenting that the decision in B v DPP 'flies in the face of legislation and case law across much of the rest of the common law world'; PR Glazebrook, 'How Old Did You Think She Was?' (2001) 60 CLJ 26. For criticism of the decision for failing to take a more radical look at the use of due diligence defences, see LCCP 195, para 6.15.

⁷³ See Ch 17, p 769.

although he honestly believed the girl to be his wife. Subject to the statutory defence, the section therefore imposed strict liability. But, in contrast, there was no comparable statutory defence for the person who ‘assaulted’ the consenting girl under 16. Previous decisions over many years had held that, in this scenario, the section imposed unmitigated strict liability.

In K, the House overruled those cases and decided that it was for the prosecution to prove that D did not honestly believe that V was 16 or over. The section creating the offence did not, expressly or by necessary implication, exclude full mens rea with respect to age; mens rea as to age was therefore required to be proved in every case. The decision was a controversial one. While Lord Bingham thought this result was not absurd, Lord Millett thought that, ‘To afford a defendant who has not married the girl a more generous defence than one who believes he has is grotesque.’⁷⁴ Nevertheless, to do justice in the case before him, he concurred in the decision. He, at least, seemed ready to abandon all pretence that he was implementing the intention of Parliament. Parliament had failed to discharge its responsibility. Although the Sexual Offences Act 2003 has reversed the effect of the decision by creating offences in which liability as to age is strict,⁷⁵ the decisions in B and K afford a pre-eminence to the presumption of mens rea which, if applied generally, should result in a substantial diminution of strict liability in English law. It is important to note that the principle of these decisions is not confined to offences of this type. The judges thought that: ‘In principle, an age-related ingredient of a statutory offence stands on no different footing from any other ingredient.’⁷⁶ The strength of the presumption of mens rea and of a requirement of mens rea in the subjective sense was endorsed in the strongest terms in the case of *G*⁷⁷ on recklessness.⁷⁸

Arguably, all offences of strict liability are vulnerable to challenge by the revitalized presumption declared by the House.⁷⁹ For example, some of their lordships in *K*⁸⁰ refused, obiter, to apply the presumption to what was the offence of sexual intercourse with a girl under 13. That was an offence punishable with a maximum of life imprisonment and there was nothing in the words of that section itself which could possibly exclude mens rea. In Kumar,⁸¹ the Court of Appeal applied B and K to hold that the offence of buggery (under the 1956 Act, now repealed by the Sexual Offences Act 2003) did not impose strict liability as to the age of the participants. A degree of caution must, however, be exercised as the impact of B and K is felt in the lower courts. It would be misleading to think that since B and K the courts have consistently rejected strict liability; far from it. There are numerous instances of provisions being interpreted as imposing strict liability as, for example, in *Muhammed*⁸² (materially contributing to insolvency by gambling carrying two years’ imprisonment);

⁷⁴ [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] Crim LR 993, [2001] 3 All ER 897, [43].

⁷⁵ G [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818. D’s application to the ECtHR on the basis that his conviction violated Arts 6 and 8 was found inadmissible. See G v UK (2011) 53 EHRR SE25, [2012] Crim LR 47.

⁷⁶ Lord Nicholls in B [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403. Lord Hobhouse in K [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] Crim LR 993.

⁷⁷ [2003] UKHL 50, [2004] 1 AC 1034, [2004] Crim LR 369.

⁷⁸ At [32]. Lord Steyn observed that the ‘general tendency in modern times is towards adopting a subjective approach’, at [55].

⁷⁹ A key contender could be the strictness as to age in offences of possession of indecent images of children, following Land [1999] QB 65, [1998] Crim LR 70, cf the commentary on Smith and Jayson [2002] EWCA Crim 683, [2002] Crim LR 659. Other likely challenges have been rejected, eg to the offences of possession of a weapon: see Deyemi [2007] EWCA Crim 2060, [2008] Crim LR 327—liability for possession even where D was unaware it (stun gun) was a firearm, believing it to be a torch. For critique of the prevalence of strict liability in the context of firearms offences, see A Ashworth [2013] Crim LR 447.

⁸⁰ [2000] 1 All ER 833 at 843g–h per Lord Steyn and 854h–j per Lord Hutton, [2001] UKHL 41, [33] per Lord Bingham.

⁸¹ [2004] EWCA Crim 3207, [2005] Crim LR 470.

⁸² [2002] EWCA Crim 1856.

*Matudi*⁸³ (importing prohibited animal products); *Hart v Anglian Water Services Ltd*⁸⁴ (causing sewage effluent to be discharged); *Jackson*⁸⁵ (low-flying aircraft); *K*⁸⁶ (possession of a ball-bearing gun constituting an imitation firearm); *Deyemi*⁸⁷ (possession of an electronic stun gun constitutes possession of firearm where D unaware it was a weapon); *Zahid*⁸⁸ (possession of ammunition for a firearm); *Thames Water Utilities*⁸⁹ (depositing controlled waste on land without a waste management licence); *Ezeemo and others*⁹⁰ (EU waste trans-frontier shipment regulations prohibiting export of hazardous waste to a non-OECD country for recovery requiring no proof of knowledge that the product transported was waste nor intention to transport waste to such a country); *Johnson*⁹¹ (conveying prohibited articles into prison).

The Supreme Court had the opportunity to examine what impact, if any, the revitalized presumption of mens rea had on the offence of ‘having unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl under the age of 14’, contrary to s 4 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Acts (Northern Ireland) 1885–1923. Lord Kerr, delivering the judgment of the court in Brown,⁹² observed that:

The constitutional principle that mens rea is presumed to be required in order to establish criminal liability is a strong one. It is not to be displaced in the absence of clear statutory language or unmistakably necessary implication. And true it is, as the appellant has argued, that the legislative history of an enactment may not always provide the framework for deciding whether the clearly identifiable conditions in which an implication must be made are present. It is also undeniable that where the statutory offence is grave or “truly criminal” and carries a heavy penalty or a substantial social stigma, the case is enhanced against implying that mens rea of any ingredient of the offence is not needed.

Although Lord Kerr’s recognition of the robust nature of the constitutional presumption in favour of mens rea is welcome, his lordship ultimately concluded that there could be no doubt that s 4 was intended to impose strict liability as to the age of V and that none of the subsequent amendments made to it suggested a parliamentary intention for it to be interpreted any differently. Citing G, it was held that there were policy considerations that militated against reading s 4 as being subject to a defence that D had a reasonable belief that V was over the prescribed age.

5.2.2 What mens rea is to be presumed?

Although the highest court has stated that there is a presumption of mens rea in statutory offences, the courts do not usually tell us what they mean by mens rea—what type: recklessness? Negligence? A commonly cited statement is that of Cave J in Tolson:⁹³

At common law an honest . . . [94] belief in the existence of circumstances, which, if true, would make the act for which a prisoner is indicted an innocent act has always been held to be a good defence.

⁸³ [2003] EWCA Crim 697. ⁸⁴ [2003] EWCA Crim 2243.

⁸⁵ [2006] EWCA Crim 2380. The Court of Appeal’s decision provides a very clear example of the discussion of the relevant factors to consider.

⁸⁶ [2006] EWHC 2183 (Admin).

⁸⁷ [2007] EWCA Crim 2060, [2008] Crim LR 327. See also Rehman and Wood [2006] 1 Cr App R (S) 404.

⁸⁸ [2010] EWCA Crim 2158. See also Tinarwo [2014] EWCA Crim 1409.

⁸⁹ [2013] EWHC 472 (Admin). See also R v Southern Water Services Ltd [2014] EWCA Crim 120. For discussion of offences relating to the environment, see J Adshead, ‘Doing Justice to the Environment’ (2013) 77 J Crim L 215.

⁹⁰ [2012] EWCA Crim 2064, [2013] Env LR 15. ⁹¹ [2017] EWCA Crim 189, [2017] Crim LR 483.

⁹² [2013] UKSC 43. ⁹³ (1889) 23 QBD 168, CCCR, at 181.

⁹⁴ The words ‘and reasonable’ are omitted as being no longer applicable in the light of B v DPP.

This is ambiguous. Does ‘an innocent act’ mean:

- (1) not the crime charged; or
- (2) neither the crime charged nor some lesser offence; or
- (3) not a civil wrong; or
- (4) not a moral wrong?

The Draft Criminal Code, cl 20, ‘General requirement of fault’, would provide a clear rule based on (1):

Every offence requires a fault element of recklessness with respect to each of its elements other than fault elements, unless otherwise provided.

If that were enacted, we would know exactly where we stood with respect to offences to which the Code applied. In the meantime there remains a degree of uncertainty.

5.3 Recognizing offences of strict liability

As noted, in some rare instances Parliament makes it explicit that it is imposing an offence of strict liability. Surely there is an argument for imposing an obligation on Parliament always to use one of a specified list of mens rea words when drafting offence-creating legislation and to make explicit if an offence is to be one of strict liability? The level of scrutiny of criminal legislation in Parliament is so poor that such matters do not always seem to be understood. An obligation of this nature on Parliamentary Counsel would at least assist those in Parliament and clarify matters for the courts.⁹⁵

In all cases where Parliament has not made the matter of mens rea explicit, the courts are obliged to interpret the will of Parliament relating to the elements of mens rea.⁹⁶ The courts have not adopted a clear and consistent approach. Indeed, Glazebrook has suggested that there is an ‘all too familiar litany of vague overlapping criteria which from time out of mind has signally failed to compel from judges predictable consensus’.⁹⁷ The court must start from the presumption of mens rea and, by reference to a number of interpretative techniques, decide whether Parliament displaced that presumption by necessary implication.⁹⁸

As Lord Scarman explained in Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v A-G Hong Kong:⁹⁹

(1) There is a presumption of law that mens rea is required before a person can be held guilty of a criminal offence. (2) The presumption is particularly strong where the offence is ‘truly criminal’ in character. (3) The presumption applies to statutory offences, and can be displaced only if this is clearly or by necessary implication the effect of the statute. (4) The only situation in which the presumption can be displaced is where the statute is concerned with an issue of social concern . . . (5) Even where a statute is concerned with such an issue, the presumption of mens rea stands unless it can also be shown that the creation of strict liability will be effective to promote the objects of the statute by encouraging greater vigilance to prevent the commission of the prohibited act.

5.3.1 The offence in its statutory context

One of the principal methods of determining if the presumption of mens rea is displaced in an offence is by reference to the statutory terminology. The decisions in B and K in the ⁹⁵ See Reid (2008) 29 St LR 173.

⁹⁶ See generally LCCP 195, Part 6.

⁹⁷ ‘How Old Did You Think She Was?’ (2001) 60 CLJ 26.

⁹⁸ This was emphasized by the Supreme Court in Brown [2013] UKSC 43.

⁹⁹ [1985] AC 1, [1984] Crim LR 479.

House of Lords illustrate the supreme importance attached to the words of the statute. The presumption, we are told, 'can only be displaced by specific language, that is an express provision or a necessary implication'.¹⁰⁰ If that is taken literally, many, if not most, cases of strict liability were wrongly decided; but subsequent case law has demonstrated that that is not the effect of B and K. In some instances the courts have taken greater notice of B and K. In M,¹⁰¹ in which the court upheld the judge's ruling that the offence of bringing a prohibited article into a prison¹⁰² was not an offence of strict liability, Rix LJ said:

The default position is that, despite the absence of any express language, there is a presumption, founded in constitutional principle, that mens rea is an essential ingredient of the offence. Only a compelling case for implying the exclusion of such an ingredient as a matter of necessity will suffice. Therefore the absence of express language, even in the presence of express language elsewhere in the statute, is not enough to rebut the presumption unless the circumstances as a whole compel such a conclusion.

In Cambridgeshire CC v Assoc Lead Mills Ltd,¹⁰³ Walker J, having regard to the discussion in this book of the 'revitalised presumption', questioned whether even an offence based on 'use', on which there is plenty of binding authority, is to be construed as one of strict liability.

In other cases, the courts have read B and K restrictively to mean that where there is an existing interpretation of an offence which holds it to be one of strict liability and that is a binding precedent, B and K are not sufficient in themselves to cause a reassessment.¹⁰⁴

5.3.1.1 Verbs importing a mental element

We have already noticed that a particular verb may imply a mental element.¹⁰⁵ The obvious examples are to intend, to be malicious or reckless, to know, to suspect, to have reasonable grounds to suspect, etc.¹⁰⁶ With other verbs the courts take a less clear position. The use of one verb in the definition of an offence may import a requirement of fault when the use of a different verb with no such implication would result in an offence of strict liability.

A good example is *M*¹⁰⁷ in which the court upheld the judge's ruling that the offence of bringing, throwing or conveying a prohibited article into a prison¹⁰⁸ was not an offence of strict liability. Rix LJ had regard to the statutory language:

It is hard to think that the verb 'throws' does not involve an intentional act of some kind. It is difficult to conceive (but I do not say impossible) of a person throwing some [proscribed] article into or out of prison without knowing what he is doing. The verb 'brings' is perhaps more neutral, but it takes its colour from the verb 'throws'. The expression 'otherwise conveys', being of a catch-all nature, must plainly take its colour from what has gone before. These are therefore unpromising words with which to begin to find an offence of [strict] liability.¹⁰⁹

¹⁰⁰ Per Lord Steyn in K [2001] UKHL 41, [32].

¹⁰¹ [2009] EWCA Crim 2615.

¹⁰² Contrary to the Prison Act 1952, s 40C(1). See now Serious Crime Act 2015, s 79. See also Johnson [2017] EWCA Crim 189, [2017] Crim LR 483.

¹⁰³ [2005] EWHC 1627 (Admin).

¹⁰⁴ See Deyemi [2007] EWCA Crim 2060, [25]. See also the comments of Lord Phillips, President of the Supreme Court, in R (Child Poverty Action Group) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2011] 2 WLR 1 describing the House in B as 'doing no more than applying a well-established common law presumption or requirement', [30].

¹⁰⁵ See Ch 3.

¹⁰⁶ In Riley v DPP [2016] EWHC 2531 (Admin), [2017] Crim LR 222 it was held that the offence in s 4(2) of the Animal Welfare Act 2006 is not a strict liability offence. The Divisional Court reached this conclusion on the basis that one element of the offence is that D failed to take such steps as were reasonable in all the circumstances to prevent an animal suffering unnecessarily. Gross LJ stated that it is the circumstances which determine what steps were reasonable and knowledge of the circumstances is an essential ingredient of the charge.

¹⁰⁷ [2009] EWCA Crim 2615.

¹⁰⁸ Contrary to the Prison Act 1952, s 40C(1), as inserted by the Offender Management Act 2007.

¹⁰⁹ At [25].

A further illustration is provided by the offence for a person to 'use or cause or permit to be used' a motor vehicle in contravention of certain regulations. 'Using', 'causing' and 'permitting' are three separate offences. In James & Son Ltd v Smeed,¹¹⁰ the court held that using a vehicle in contravention of a regulation (in that it had a defective braking system) was an offence of strict liability; but D was charged with permitting the use which, said the court, 'in our opinion, at once imports a state of mind'; that is, mens rea. A person might 'use' a vehicle with defective brakes although he had no idea that the brakes were defective; but he would not properly be said to 'permit' use with defective brakes unless he knew that the brakes were defective or, at least, was turning a blind eye to that fact. Knowledge is not necessarily the only mental element required. Does a person who knows that his premises are being used for producing or supplying drugs 'permit' if he does nothing about it? Is mere acquiescence enough?¹¹¹

Unfortunately, the courts are inconsistent in their interpretation of this and similar words in other statutes. An example is the offence of 'permitting' a vehicle to be used without insurance. Take the common case where D lends his car to X on condition that it is only driven by an insured driver. If it is in fact driven by a person who is uninsured, the courts have held that D commits the offence. The court ignores the ordinary meaning of the word 'permit'. D who says: 'Here is my car, but you must not drive it until you have insurance' is taken in law 'to permit' what he actually forbids: driving without insurance.¹¹² In what appears to be the first case to reach the House of Lords on this, Vehicle Inspectorate v Nuttall,¹¹³ it was said that the meaning depends on the context but it remains difficult to discern how and when the context operates. In Nuttall, two judges held that D had a duty to take reasonable steps to detect and prevent breaches and that, if he failed to do so, he 'permitted'. Two judges thought that a mental element of recklessness, in the sense of not caring whether a breach took place, was required. What is reasonable is an objective question and D's opinion is irrelevant.¹¹⁴ Similar inconsistency is to be found in the interpretation of the verbs, 'suffer', 'allow' and 'cause'.¹¹⁵

It seems that the courts will generally give verbs their natural meaning, including any mental element they imply, unless they consider that social policy requires them to decide otherwise. In relation to the offences of uninsured driving, the courts take a strict approach, presumably because of the danger to the public. In that context, the courts refuse to give effect to what they recognize in other social contexts to be the natural meaning of the words used by Parliament.¹¹⁶

5.3.1.2 The use of adverbs

'Knowingly'

The use of an adverb in a statute is a more explicit way in which Parliament can make clear that mens rea is required. The clearest example is the word 'knowingly'.¹¹⁷ Devlin J said that ¹¹⁰ [1955] 1 QB 78, DC. Cf Lomas v Peek [1947] 2 All ER 574.

¹¹¹ Bradbury [1996] Crim LR 808. Perhaps this is a case where the alternative verb, 'suffer', more appropriately describes the conduct. There are lots of other examples in drugs offences.

¹¹² DPP v Fisher [1991] Crim LR 787, distinguishing Newbury v Davis [1974] RTR 367, [1974] Crim LR 262.

¹¹³ [1999] 1 WLR 629, [1999] Crim LR 674, HL (employer (D) permitting driver to contravene rules regarding rest periods). Cf Yorkshire Traction Co v Vehicle Inspectorate [2001] RTR 518, DC.

¹¹⁴ Brock and Wyner [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 48, [2001] Crim LR 320 (permitting premises to be used for supplying drugs).

¹¹⁵ A modern example is the approach in Tilley [2009] EWCA Crim 1426, [2010] Crim LR 162, interpreting the offence of dishonestly 'allowing' a person to fail to give prompt notification of a change in her social benefit circumstances under s 111A(1B) of the Social Security Administration Act 1992.

¹¹⁶ But is uninsured driving a greater social evil than driving with defective brakes?

¹¹⁷ See C Manchester, 'Knowledge Due Diligence and Strict Liability in Regulatory Offences' [2006] Crim LR 213.

'knowingly' only says expressly what is normally implied¹¹⁸—it does expressly what the presumption in favour of mens rea would do by implication. The use of the word suggests that Parliament wanted to make sure that the courts would not displace the presumption and hold the offence to be one of strict liability. Similarly, where Parliament provides that it is an offence to 'knowingly permit' something to be done, Parliament intends the presumption of mens rea to apply—perhaps the word 'permit' would have been sufficient to import mens rea, but Parliamentary Counsel uses the word knowingly for the avoidance of doubt. When 'knowingly' is used, it should be difficult for any court to hold that mens rea is not required as to all the elements of the offence, though it might not extend to an exception clause in the definition of the crime.¹¹⁹

As a matter of evidence, the substantive law requirement that D acted 'knowingly' may be proved by what is sometimes called 'wilful blindness':¹²⁰ 'it is always open to the tribunal of fact, when knowledge on the part of a defendant is required to be proved, to base a finding of knowledge on evidence that the defendant had deliberately shut his eyes to the obvious or refrained from enquiry because he suspected the truth but did not want to have his suspicion confirmed'.¹²¹ Sometimes, however, the courts take a stricter view, as in handling stolen goods, on which see Ch 26. In Kwan Ping Bang,¹²² it was accepted that proof of knowledge by inference is possible provided the inference was compelling—'one (and the only one) that no reasonable man could fail to draw from the direct facts proved'.

'Wilfully'

The word 'wilfully' looks like a 'mens rea word' and it is sometimes treated as such. It was considered in Ch 3. D does not 'wilfully' obstruct a police officer simply because he does a deliberate act which in fact obstructs the officer; an intention to obstruct must be proved.¹²³ There are, however, cases in which the courts have imposed strict liability notwithstanding the use of this word. 'Wilful' in these cases is held to apply only to the conduct element of the offence but not to some circumstance or consequence which is an element of the crime. In these cases, liability as to the consequences or circumstances elements of the offence has been held to be strict. So, for example, D was held guilty of wilfully fishing in private water, although he believed there was a public right to fish there;¹²⁴ of wilfully killing a house pigeon when he shot a bird, believing it was a wild pigeon;¹²⁵ and of wilfully destroying an oak tree in contravention of a tree preservation order when he was unaware of the order and believed that permission had been given for the tree to be felled.¹²⁶ In these cases, the conduct of fishing, killing a bird and cutting down a tree were all 'wilful'; but in none of them was the commission of the crime 'wilful'.

Following the most important authority, Sheppard,¹²⁷ discussed in Ch 3, it is arguable that 'wilfully' should be construed to mean wilfully committing the crime; but in practice it may be that the courts are still willing to interpret elements of an offence as imposing strict liability despite that word appearing in the statute.

¹¹⁸ Roper v Taylor's Central Garage (Exeter) Ltd [1951] 2 TLR 284 at 288. See also S Shute, 'Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory.

¹¹⁹ cf Brooks v Mason [1902] 2 KB 743, DC and Wings Ltd v Ellis, p 56.

¹²⁰ This is discussed in Ch 3.

¹²¹ Westminster City Council v Croyalgrange Ltd [1986] 2 All ER 353 at 359, [1986] Crim LR 693, HL; Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Uni-Polaris Shipping Co Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 743, HL.

¹²² [1979] AC 609, 615, [1979] Crim LR 245.

¹²³ Willmott v Atack [1977] QB 498, [1976] Crim LR 575, DC.

¹²⁴ Hudson v MacRae (1863) 4 B & S 585, DC. ¹²⁵ Cotterill v Penn [1936] 1 KB 53.

¹²⁶ Maidstone Borough Council v Mortimer [1980] 3 All ER 552, DC.

¹²⁷ [1981] AC 394, [1981] Crim LR 171, HL. Cf Turner [2008] EWCA Crim 272.

5.3.1.3 Effect of usage of mens rea words in some sections but not others

Where a mens rea word is used in one section of a statute but not in another that may suggest that the second creates an offence of strict liability; but Lord Reid has said:

It is also firmly established that the fact that other sections of the Act expressly require mens rea, for example because they contain the word ‘knowingly’, is not itself sufficient to justify a decision that a section which is silent as to mens rea creates an absolute offence.¹²⁸

In the famous example of Sherras v De Rutzen,¹²⁹ D was charged with supplying liquor to a constable on duty.¹³⁰ The policeman was not wearing the armband which would signal that he was a police officer, and it was admitted that the failure to wear it was an indication that he was off duty. D, who was in the habit—quite lawfully—of serving constables in uniform but without their armlets, made no inquiry and took it for granted that this policeman was off duty. The Act provided an offence (in s 16(1)) for a licensee knowingly to harbour or suffer to remain on his premises any constable on duty. In contrast, the offence with which D was charged (s 16(2)) did not include the word ‘knowingly’, but D’s conviction was quashed. Day J said that the only inference to be drawn was that under s 16(1) the prosecution had to prove knowledge, while under s 16(2) the defendant had to prove he had no knowledge.¹³¹

Wright J made no attempt to reconcile the two subsections, contenting himself with pointing out that:¹³²

if guilty knowledge is not necessary, no care on the part of the publican could save him from conviction . . . since it would be as easy for the constable to deny that he was on duty when asked, or to produce a forged permission from his superior officer as to remove his armlet before entering the public house.¹³³

This factor was influential in many cases including the modern-day cases of G in the House of Lords (dealing with sexual offences against under 13s where the statute is explicit about mens rea as to under 16s and silent as to under 13s); *Muhamad*¹³⁴ (Insolvency Act offences); and *Matudi*¹³⁵ (importation of endangered species).

5.3.2 The offence in its social context

In addition to the statutory context of the offence, the court must have regard to the broader social context of the legislation and the purpose it was designed to serve, and this has historically been highly influential. Cases where strict liability was imposed primarily on social grounds may be even more vulnerable to attack after B and K. If mens rea is not ruled out expressly or by necessary implication from the text, it cannot, according to dicta in K, be excluded. As noted, this has not prevented the Court of Appeal subsequently imposing strict liability in cases such as Muhamad,¹³⁶ *Matudi*¹³⁷ and Ezeemo and others.¹³⁸

¹²⁸ Sweet v Parsley [1970] AC 132 at 149. ¹²⁹ [1895] 1 QB 918.

¹³⁰ Contrary to the Licensing Act 1872, s 16(2).

¹³¹ This view was doubted by Devlin J in Roper v Taylor’s Central Garage (Exeter) Ltd [1951] 2 TLR 284. If Day J intended to refer to the evidential burden only, the dictum is unobjectionable. See Edwards, Mens Rea, 90–97.

¹³² [1895] 1 QB 918 at 923.

¹³³ An example of this criterion as a determinant of strict liability is the case of Matudi [2003] EWCA Crim 697 dealing with the importation of endangered species.

¹³⁴ [2002] EWCA Crim 1856. ¹³⁵ [2003] EWCA Crim 697.

¹³⁶ [2002] EWCA Crim 1856. ¹³⁷ [2003] EWCA Crim 697.

¹³⁸ [2012] EWCA Crim 2064, [2013] Env LR 15.

5.3.2.1 'Real' or 'quasi' crime?

An important matter is whether the court considers the offence to be a 'true' or 'real' crime or a 'quasi-crime'.¹³⁹ Parliament makes no such distinction. A form of behaviour either is, or it is not, declared by Parliament to be a crime.¹⁴⁰ Unlike many European jurisdictions, England does not create a separate category of administrative offences called 'violations' in which strict liability is imposed.¹⁴¹ The Law Commission rejected the idea of adopting such a system.

Determining what is meant by 'real' crime is not easy. Mitchell J said that he did not regard the offence of selling a lottery ticket to a child under 16 as 'truly criminal in character' although it was punishable on indictment with two years' imprisonment.¹⁴² This is a peculiar understanding of the word 'truth'. The truth is that it is a crime. It is the courts that take it upon themselves to decide whether it is a 'real' or 'quasi' crime. They do so on the basis that an offence which, in the public eye, carries little or no stigma and does not involve 'the disgrace of criminality',¹⁴³ is only a quasi-crime. Then, strict liability may be imposed because 'it does not offend the ordinary man's sense of justice that moral guilt is not of the essence of the offence'.¹⁴⁴

The attempt to distinguish an offence on the basis of whether it is a regulatory or real crime is not particularly helpful.¹⁴⁵ In academic terms, the question is often posed as whether the offence is malum in se (intrinsically morally wrong, eg murder or rape) or merely malum prohibitum (wrong being prescribed by law) but this too provokes as many disputes as it solves.¹⁴⁶

Judicial utterances are no more helpful in giving the meaning of 'real' or quasi-crime. In Sherras v De Rutzen, Wright J distinguished 'a class of acts . . . which are not criminal in any real sense, but are acts which in the public interest are prohibited under a penalty'.¹⁴⁷ More recently, in Taylor, Lord Sumption held that 'quasi-crimes' tend to have two characteristic features.¹⁴⁸ First, the requirements of such legislation are founded on collective convenience rather than moral imperatives. Secondly, his lordship held that although fault in the actual commission of the offence may be unnecessary, there are nevertheless positive steps that the prospect of criminal liability may cause people to take, with the aim of preventing the offence from occurring.

In determining whether the offence involves a 'stigma', it is necessary to consider the case where the offence is committed intentionally. If Parliament prohibits the causing of results because it deems them in some measure harmful, the intentional causing of the harm in question probably deserves some measure of moral condemnation. Stigma attaches to, or should attach to, the person who deliberately sells lottery tickets to children or even the motorist who deliberately leaves his car in a parking space for longer than is permitted by ¹³⁹ See J Horder (2002) 118 LQR 458, noting that regulatory offences are also stigmatizing for the accused. See also G Lamond, 'What is a Crime' (2007) 27 OJLS 609.

¹⁴⁰ See Ch 1.

¹⁴¹ See the interesting discussion by Reid (2008) 29 St LR 173, and JR Spencer and A Pedain, 'Approaches to Strict and Constructive Liability in Continental Criminal Law' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability.

¹⁴² London Borough of Harrow v Shah [2000] Crim LR 692, [2000] Crim LR 692, DC. See further LCCP 195, Part 3.

¹⁴³ Per Lord Reid in Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 2 AC 256 at 272.

¹⁴⁴ ibid. Cf Wings Ltd v Ellis, p 56. See also Matudi [2003] EWCA Crim 697.

¹⁴⁵ cf A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 116; A Simester, 'Is Strict Liability Always Wrong?' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 37–41.

¹⁴⁶ See DN Husak, 'Malum Prohibitum and Retributivism' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes and SP Green, 'Why It's a Crime to Tear the Tag off a Mattress' (1997) 46 Emory LJ 1533.

¹⁴⁷ [1895] 1 QB 918 at 922.

¹⁴⁸ [2016] UKSC 5, [26].

law—it is an anti-social act, likely to cause inconvenience to others. But few people, even ‘right-thinking’ people, would consider such an act so iniquitous, even when done intentionally, that the actor ought to be locked up or even shunned and avoided. Since offences of strict liability do not distinguish between degrees of fault and no fault at all, a conviction fixes the offender with whatever stigma might attach to the offence and that is the same stigma as would attach to an intentional offender convicted of that offence.¹⁴⁹ Despite the difficulty in distinguishing between ‘real’ and quasi-crimes, the judgment in Taylor demonstrates that the distinction remains influential amongst judges in determining whether the presumption of mens rea is displaced.¹⁵⁰

5.3.2.2 A crime of general or special prohibition?

A second factor which may be of great significance when considering social context is whether the provision is of general application or relates only to those following a particular trade, profession or special activity (especially where D has voluntarily engaged in that activity). In the latter type of case, the court may be much more ready to hold such a ‘regulatory offence’ to impose strict liability.¹⁵¹ Lord Diplock put it as follows:¹⁵²

Where penal provisions are of general application to the conduct of ordinary citizens in the course of their everyday life, the presumption is that the standard of care required of them in informing themselves of facts which would make their conduct unlawful is that of the familiar common law duty of care. But where the subject-matter of a statute is the regulation of a particular activity involving potential danger to public health, safety or morals, in which citizens have a choice whether they participate or not, the court may feel driven to infer an intention of Parliament to impose, by penal sanctions, a higher duty of care on those who choose to participate and to place on them an obligation to take whatever measures may be necessary to prevent the prohibited act, without regard to those considerations of cost or business practicability which play a part in the determination of what would be required of them in order to fulfil the ordinary common law duty of care.

So we find most instances of strict liability in statutes regulating the sale of food, and drugs, the management of industrial activities, the management of waste,¹⁵³ the conduct of licensed premises and the like.¹⁵⁴ That said, the ‘particular activity’ may be one in which citizens generally engage, like driving a car, but this is something which people choose to do and, as it involves potential danger to others, it is not inconsistent with this statement of principle that some offences regulating the conduct of motorists should be strict.

Some commentators have argued that this factor, and in particular whether the activity involved is one for which a licence is required, is the most important in the courts’ decision as to whether a statute should be interpreted as imposing strict liability.¹⁵⁵ Lord Clyde recognized this in Lambert:¹⁵⁶

¹⁴⁹ See JC Smith in Barbara Wootton, Essays in Her Honour, 141 and in commentary on Bat [2000] Crim LR 408. And see Harrow v Shah, n 142.

¹⁵⁰ For further discussion, see K Laird, ‘The Decline of Criminal Law Causation Without Limits’ (2016) 132 LQR 566.

¹⁵¹ See further A Brudner, ‘Imprisonment and Strict Liability’ (1990) 40 U Toronto LJ 738.

¹⁵² In Sweet v Parsley [1970] AC 132 at 163.

¹⁵³ Ezeemo [2012] EWCA Crim 2064, [2013] Env LR 15.

¹⁵⁴ See generally LCCP 195.

¹⁵⁵ See R Glover, ‘Regulatory Offences and Reverse Burdens: The Licensing Approach’ (2007) 71 J Crim L 259, arguing that the licence holders have accepted an obligation to prove defences to avoid liability, and therefore reverse burdens are not problematical in this context. See also Green (1997) 46 Emory LJ 1586; Husak in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 82–84.

¹⁵⁶ [2002] 2 AC 545, [154].

A strict responsibility may be acceptable in the case of statutory offences which are concerned to regulate the conduct of some particular activity in the public interest. The requirement to have a licence in order to carry on certain kinds of activity is an obvious example. The promotion of health and safety and the avoidance of pollution are among the purposes to be served by such controls. These kinds of cases may properly be seen as not truly criminal. Many may be relatively trivial and only involve a monetary penalty. Many may carry with them no real social disgrace or infamy.

5.3.2.3 Possibility of compliance

According to Devlin J, it is:

a safe general principle to follow . . . that where the punishment of an individual will not promote the observance of the law either by that individual or by others whose conduct he may reasonably be expected to influence, then, in the absence of clear and express words, such punishment is not intended.¹⁵⁷

This principle has been restated many times, for example by the Privy Council in both *Lim Chin Aik*¹⁵⁸ and Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v A-G of Hong Kong,¹⁵⁹ by the Divisional Court in *Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Storkwain Ltd*¹⁶⁰ and more recently by the Supreme Court in Taylor.¹⁶¹ But, if implemented, it would seem to require negligence, though not perhaps of a high degree, rather than impose strict liability. D, it appears, must be shown to have fallen short in some respect of the standard to be expected of him. But was the principle applied in Storkwain? Was the pharmacist expected to keep a handwriting expert on the premises to scrutinize the prescriptions? Or to telephone the doctor each time he received a prescription for confirmation that he wrote it?¹⁶² In Harrow v Shah, it was acknowledged that D had done all he could to ensure compliance with the law. What else could he do, except stop selling lottery tickets? Obviously, the courts do not expect such wholly unreasonable steps to be taken—but how, then, can the principle be satisfied in such cases?

It is worth noting that the evidence from empirical studies is that use of strict liability crimes is not necessarily successful in securing compliance with regulations.¹⁶³

5.3.2.4 Social danger

Fourthly, in construing social context, the courts are influenced by the degree of social danger which, in their opinion, will follow from breach of the particular prohibition.¹⁶⁴ They take judicial notice of the problems with which the country is confronted. The greater the degree of social danger, the more likely it is that the offence will be interpreted as one of strict liability. Drug misuse, road accidents and pollution are constantly brought to our attention as pressing evils; and in each case the judges have at times invoked strict liability as a protection for society.

¹⁵⁷ Reynolds v GH Austin & Sons Ltd [1951] 2 KB 135, [1951] 1 All ER 606, DC.

¹⁵⁸ [1963] AC 160 at 174. ¹⁵⁹ [1985] AC 1 at 14–15.

¹⁶⁰ [1985] 3 All ER 4, approved by the House of Lords [1986] 2 All ER 635 at 640.

¹⁶¹ [2016] UKSC 5, [26].

¹⁶² It appears that in Storkwain the pharmacist, not knowing Dr Irani, did telephone the number on the prescription but it was false and he was deceived by the forger or his accomplice who answered: Jackson [1991] Crim LR at 895.

¹⁶³ G Richardson, 'Effective Means of Regulating Industry Strict Liability for Regulating Crime: The Empirical Evidence' [1987] Crim LR 295. See Appendix A to LCCP 195 by Professor Black.

¹⁶⁴ In R (on the application of Thames Water Utilities) v Bromley Magistrates' Court [2013] EWHC 472 (Admin), Gross LJ stated that this criterion concerned him, on the ground that most statutes are, at least in the view of the legislators who enact them, to do with some social danger or concern.

Dangerous drugs

Legislation concerning dangerous drugs has had a chequered recent history.¹⁶⁵ Lord Parker declared in 1966¹⁶⁶ that he took judicial notice of the fact that drugs are a great danger and the Divisional Court imposed strict liability of a most draconian character in a number of cases at about that time. In one case D was held to be guilty of being 'concerned in the management of premises used for the purpose of smoking cannabis' though he did not know and had no means of knowing that such smoking was taking place.¹⁶⁷ In other cases, it was held that D was guilty of being in unauthorized possession of a drug¹⁶⁸ if he knew he had control of a thing which was in fact a dangerous drug, even though he did not know, and had no reason to know, that it was either dangerous or a drug.¹⁶⁹ He might have reasonably believed that he had a bottle of sweets, but that would have been no defence.

Problems of possession

The first case on strict liability considered by the House of Lords, Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr,¹⁷⁰ concerned possession of prohibited drugs.¹⁷¹ D, who as a part-time job sold perfume, collected two boxes which had been left for him at a cafe. One box contained perfume, the other controlled drugs. D said he assumed both boxes contained perfume. The jury were told that such a belief went only to mitigation. The Court of Appeal agreed. If D was in possession of the box and he knew the box contained something, he was in possession of the contents, whatever they were; and, as it was an 'absolute' offence, that was all the prosecution had to prove.

The House of Lords, Lord Reid dissenting, agreed with the courts below that the section created an 'absolute' offence, not requiring any mens rea as such. But it was, of course, necessary to prove the actus reus, that is, possession, and that involved proving a mental element. Lord Guest agreed with the Court of Appeal—D's knowledge that he had a box containing something under his control was enough—but the other judges held that more was required.

Though D's possession of the box gave rise to a strong inference that he was in possession of the contents, that inference might be rebutted. Their lordships' opinions are obscure and various but it seems that the inference certainly would be rebutted if: (a) D believed the box contained perfume; (b) perfume was something of 'a wholly different nature' from the drugs; (c) D had no opportunity to ascertain its true nature; and (d) he did not suspect there was 'anything wrong' with the contents. These issues (or at least some of them, for the majority of the House were far from being in complete accord) ought to have been left to the jury and, as they had not, three judges held that there had been a misdirection (but upheld the conviction under the proviso which was then available to the appellate courts).

Possession is a neutral concept, not implying any kind of blame or fault but experience has shown that, when it becomes the determinant of guilt, it tends to acquire a refined and artificial meaning of great complexity. It seems the most obvious common sense to say that a person firmly grasping a parcel is in possession of it and a distinction between the parcel and its contents is too absurd to contemplate. However, if it is a grave offence merely to possess a particular article and that is what is contained in the parcel, courts may strive to find ¹⁶⁵ See generally R Fortson, The Misuse of Drugs and Drug Trafficking Offences (6th edn, 2012).

¹⁶⁶ In Yeandel v Fisher [1966] 1 QB 440 at 446, [1965] 3 All ER 158 at 161.

¹⁶⁷ ibid. ¹⁶⁸ Contrary to s 1(1) of the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964.

¹⁶⁹ eg Lockyer v Gibb [1967] 2 QB 243. ¹⁷⁰ [1969] 2 AC 256.

¹⁷¹ See for a theoretical consideration of the issues raised by possession offences, MD Dubber, 'The Possession Paradigm' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 115; A Ashworth, 'The Unfairness of Risk-Based Possession Offences' (2011) 5 Crim L & Phil 237. See also A Ashworth and L Zedner, Preventive Justice (2014) Ch 5.

means to say that an innocent person is not in possession, by refining the meaning of that concept. Of course, this problem would not arise if it were held that the offence required some element of fault—possession, as observed, is neutral and in itself incapable of being ‘fault’—but, sadly, of all the judges involved, only Lord Reid was willing to take this sensible course. The result was a calamitous decision by the House.

The five speeches delivered in Warner differ so greatly and it is so difficult to make sense of parts of them that courts in later cases have found it impossible to extract a ratio decidendi. The law has been modified by the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 but the onus remains on the Crown to prove possession and the Act has nothing to say about that concept. It has, however, influenced the approach of the courts. In McNamara,¹⁷² the Court of Appeal, while paying lip-service to the House of Lords, has gone back to the view of the Court of Appeal and the dissenting opinion (on this issue) of Lord Guest. D was in possession of a cardboard box containing cannabis resin. He said he thought it contained pornographic material. Because he knew he was in control of the box and that the box contained something, he was in possession of cannabis. The court was able to reach this conclusion without misgiving because it no longer followed automatically from that finding that D was guilty of the offence. Under s 28 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 it is a defence to prove¹⁷³ that he neither believed nor suspected nor had reason to suspect that the thing of which he was in possession was a controlled drug.

McNamara provides a welcome simplification of the law where D knows he has the thing or a container with something in it but claims he thought it was something else. It does not solve the problem when D claims he was unaware of the existence of an article in the container. In Warner,¹⁷⁴ there was unanimous agreement about a hypothetical case posed earlier by Lord Parker CJ¹⁷⁵—if something is slipped into a woman's bag and she has no idea that it is there, she is not in possession of it. It is easy to find authority in the vast case law on possession to contradict that proposition but Parker LCJ, the Court of Appeal and the House were entirely confident about it: the woman is in possession of the bag and the known contents but not the thing secretly inserted. The judges shrank from saying that the hypothetical woman was in possession of the thing because they were thinking of a packet of controlled drugs and, if she was in possession, she would have been guilty of a grave offence. If the thing were a box of chocolates dropped in by a friend as a birthday present it is unlikely that they would have hesitated to hold that she was in possession of it. Suppose that, before she discovered it, the box had been removed by a pickpocket; would they have hesitated to hold that it was stolen from her (it was not stolen from anyone else) and that the pickpocket was a thief? Of course not. So far as possession is concerned, there is no rational distinction between the drugs and the chocolates.

In Lewis,¹⁷⁶ it was held that the judge had not misdirected the jury by telling them that the tenant of a house might be found to be in possession of drugs found on the premises although he did not know they were there, provided he had had an opportunity to find out that they were. But there is no material difference between planting drugs in a person's house and planting them in her basket.¹⁷⁷ The decision seems to contradict the one thing on ¹⁷² (1988) 87 Cr App R 246, [1988] Crim LR 440 and commentary.

¹⁷³ Interpreted, obiter, by the House of Lords in Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] Crim LR 806 to mean not ‘prove’ but ‘introduce evidence of’ so as to comply with the HRA 1998. For a case in which it was held that there was a clear intention to impose a legal burden upon D, see Williams [2012] EWCA Crim 2162, [2013] Crim LR 983 and Ashworth's criticisms at [2013] Crim LR 447.

¹⁷⁴ [1969] 2 AC 256 at 282, 286, 300, 303 and 311.

¹⁷⁵ Lockyer v Gibb [1967] 2 QB 243 at 248.

¹⁷⁶ (1987) 87 Cr App R 270, [1988] Crim LR 517 and commentary.

¹⁷⁷ ‘First of all man does not have possession of something which has been put into his pocket or into his house without his knowledge’: McNamara (1988) 87 Cr App R 246 at 248.

which their lordships in Warner were unanimous. In introducing the idea of opportunity, the court relied on a statement of Lord Morris. But Lord Morris was dealing with a quite different question: possession, he said, was ‘being knowingly in control of a thing in circumstances which have involved an opportunity (whether availed of or not) to learn or discover, at least in a general way, what the thing is’.¹⁷⁸ In Lewis, D was not knowingly in control of the thing.

Warner does not affect the law where the drug was not in a container. D must know he has the thing, but it is not necessary that he should know or comprehend its nature.¹⁷⁹ In Marriott,¹⁸⁰ D was convicted of being in possession of 0.03 grains of cannabis adhering to a penknife. It was held that the jury had been wrongly directed that he was guilty if he knew he was in possession of the penknife. It was necessary to prove at least that he knew that there was some ‘thing’ adhering to the knife. The court thought that no further mens rea was necessary—so that the accused would be guilty if he thought the matter was tobacco or toffee—but now, under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, it would be a defence for him to prove¹⁸¹ that he neither believed, nor suspected, nor had reason to suspect, that the ‘thing’ attached to the knife was a controlled drug.

Being concerned in the management of premises

The second case concerning strict liability to reach the House of Lords was Sweet v Parsley.¹⁸² On this occasion, the House overruled the cases which decided that being ‘concerned in the management of premises used for the purpose of smoking cannabis’ is an offence of strict liability. D, a schoolmistress, let the rooms of a country farmhouse, retaining one room for her own use and visiting the farm occasionally to collect rent and see that all was well. Cannabis was smoked in the farmhouse but it was found as a fact that she had no knowledge whatsoever of this. The Divisional Court nevertheless upheld her conviction.¹⁸³ She was ‘concerned in the management’ and that was enough. The House quashed her conviction. The ‘purpose’ referred to in the section must be that of the person concerned in the management; and D had no such purpose. Only Lord Wilberforce was content to stop with this ‘prosaic interpretation’. The remainder relied, in varying degrees, on a presumption in favour of mens rea. The actual decision in Warner was not affected,¹⁸⁴ but the attitude of the House, with the exception of Lord Reid who saw no reason to alter what he had said in the earlier case, is very different. The judges are no less sensitive to the public’s view of injustice than to their need for protection; and, for once, a case of strict liability had excited public interest. The public outcry and sense of injustice may not have been without influence.¹⁸⁵

¹⁷⁸ [1969] 2 AC 256 at 289 (emphasis in original).

¹⁷⁹ Boyesen [1982] AC 768, [1982] 2 All ER 161, [1982] Crim LR 596. (It is immaterial how minute the quantity is provided only that it amounts to something and D knows he has it.)

¹⁸⁰ [1971] 1 WLR 187.

¹⁸¹ Interpreted, obiter, by the House of Lords in Lambert [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2001] Crim LR 806 to mean not ‘prove’ but ‘introduce evidence of’ so as to comply with the HRA 1998. For a case in which it was held that there was a clear intention to impose a legal burden upon D, see Williams [2012] EWCA Crim 2162, [2013] Crim LR 983 and Ashworth’s criticisms at [2013] Crim LR 447.

¹⁸² [1970] AC 132, [1969] 1 All ER 347.

¹⁸³ It has been suggested that strict liability in such a case might infringe Art 3 of the ECHR by subjecting D to degrading treatment. See Sullivan, ‘Strict Liability for Criminal Offences’ in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 206.

¹⁸⁴ Fernandez [1970] Crim LR 277 where it was held to be enough that D knew a package might contain some prohibited article and was prepared to take it, whatever the contents were.

¹⁸⁵ ‘fortunately the press in this country are vigilant to expose injustice . . .’, per Lord Reid, Sweet v Parsley at 150.

The corresponding provisions of the Misuse of Drugs Act now require mens rea and leave the onus of proof more appropriately on the Crown. It is an offence if an occupier¹⁸⁶ or person concerned in the management of premises 'knowingly permits or suffers' the smoking of cannabis and other specified activities in connection with drugs. The word 'knowingly' was introduced for the first time in the Act; but it does not alter the decisions under the Dangerous Drugs Act 1965 that knowledge or wilful blindness is enough, but reasonable grounds for suspicion are not.¹⁸⁷

Pollution

In view of the ever greater concern about the environment,¹⁸⁸ it is scarcely surprising that modern examples of strict liability crimes should arise in this context. In Alphacell Ltd v Woodward,¹⁸⁹ the House of Lords held that D Ltd was guilty of causing polluted matter to enter a river, contrary to s 2(1)(a) of the Rivers (Prevention of Pollution) Act 1951.¹⁹⁰ They had built and operated settling tanks with an overflow channel into the river and provided pumps designed to prevent any overflow taking place. Because the pumps became obstructed with vegetation, an overflow of polluted water occurred. There was no evidence that D knew that pollution was taking place or that they had been in any way negligent. Lord Salmon stressed the public importance of preventing pollution and the risk of pollution from the vast and increasing number of riparian industries and said:¹⁹¹

If . . . it were held to be the law that no conviction could be obtained under the 1951 Act unless the prosecution could discharge the often impossible onus of proving that the pollution was caused intentionally or negligently, a great deal of pollution would go unpunished and undeterred to the relief of many riparian factory owners. As a result, many rivers which are now filthy would become filthier still and many rivers which are now clean would lose their cleanliness.

Another example is Atkinson v Sir Alfred McAlpine & Son Ltd,¹⁹² where it was held that the company was guilty of failing to give written notice, as required by the Asbestos Regulations 1969, that they were going to undertake work involving crocidolite though they neither knew nor had reason to know that the work involved crocidolite. The court distinguished Harding v Price,¹⁹³ where Lord Goddard CJ, holding that D was not guilty of failing to report an accident, the happening of which he was unaware, said:

If a statute contains an absolute prohibition against the doing of some act, as a general rule mens rea is not a constituent of the offence, but there is all the difference between prohibiting an act and imposing a duty to do something on the happening of a certain event. Unless a man knows that the event has happened, how can he carry out the duty imposed? . . . Any other view would lead to calling on a man to do the impossible.

In McAlpine, the court said that, unlike the accident, it was 'probably possible' to ascertain whether crocidolite was involved; but since they held that the mischief would not be ¹⁸⁶ The occupier is a person whose degree of control is sufficient to enable him to exclude anyone likely to commit an offence under the Act. It is not limited to persons in legal possession and includes a student with rooms in college: Tao [1977] QB 141, [1976] Crim LR 516.

¹⁸⁷ Thomas (1976) 63 Cr App R 65, [1976] Crim LR 517.

¹⁸⁸ For detailed discussion, see J Adshead, 'Doing Justice to the Environment' (2013) 77 J Crim L 215.

¹⁸⁹ [1972] AC 824, [1972] Crim LR 41. Cf Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd v National Rivers Authority [1998] 1 All ER 481, HL, p 72; Maidstone Borough Council v Mortimer [1980] 3 All ER 552; Kirkland v Robinson [1987] Crim LR 643, DC (possession of live wild birds an offence of strict liability under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, s 1(1)(a), taking into account the outstanding social importance of an Act designed to protect the environment).

¹⁹⁰ Now repealed. ¹⁹¹ [1972] AC 824 at 848.

¹⁹² (1974) 16 KIR 220, [1974] Crim LR 668, DC. ¹⁹³ [1948] 1 KB 695 DC.

met if 'knows or ought to know' were read into the regulation, it is clear that impossibility would not be regarded as a defence.

5.3.2.5 The severity of the punishment

It is often argued that the provision for a severe maximum punishment shows that strict liability could not have been intended by Parliament. To some extent, this is in conflict with the principle previously discussed, since the provision for only a slight punishment would suggest that Parliament thought the social danger involved to be slight. In Muhamed,¹⁹⁴ accepting that materially contributing to the extent of insolvency by gambling was an offence of strict liability, the seriousness of the offence was described as the 'starting point' for the court in its determination. The court explained that the more serious the offence, the greater the weight to be attached to the mens rea presumption and vice versa.

However, the courts do not seem to have been deterred in recent years from imposing strict liability in the case of offences carrying heavy maximum sentences—the offence under the Dangerous Drugs Act 1965 of which Ms Sweet was convicted was punishable on indictment with ten years' imprisonment. Causing death by dangerous driving was (originally) punishable with five. The fact that an offence under s 58(2) of the Firearms Act 1968 was punishable with three years' imprisonment did not deter the court from holding that an honest and reasonable belief that the firearm was an antique was no defence.¹⁹⁵ The maximum sentence of life imprisonment in G did not prevent the House of Lords interpreting s 5 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 as strict.¹⁹⁶ In Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v A-G of Hong Kong,¹⁹⁷ the Privy Council admitted that the fact that the offence was punishable with a fine of HK$250,000 and imprisonment for three years was 'a formidable point'; but found 'there is nothing inconsistent with the purpose of the ordinance in imposing severe penalties for offences of strict liability'. Of relevance in Taylor to whether aggravated vehicle-taking could be characterized as a 'quasi-crime' was the fact that s 12A of the Theft Act 1968 imposes a maximum sentence of 14 years' imprisonment if death is caused.¹⁹⁸ It was held that such a lengthy maximum sentence suggested the offence was in no way a 'quasi-crime'.

5.3.3 Other factors

It is impossible to catalogue all factors that may assist the court in interpretation but, in addition to those discussed previously, factors influencing the court's decision as to whether the presumption of mens rea is necessarily rebutted include: the presence of due diligence defences; the stigma of the offence;¹⁹⁹ the need for such offences as a method of prosecuting corporate entities; and the ease of proof for the prosecution unless strict liability is imposed.²⁰⁰ This final factor must be treated with caution since, logically, it would allow for ¹⁹⁴ [2002] EWCA Crim 1856, [2003] 2 WLR 1050.

¹⁹⁵ Howells [1977] QB 614, [1977] Crim LR 354. Section 19 of the Act (carrying a firearm in a public place) also imposes strict liability, although the maximum penalty (in the case of non-imitation firearms) is seven years: Vann and Davis [1996] Crim LR 52.

¹⁹⁶ This is a striking example because G's argument was not that he should be acquitted because he was not at fault but that he should only be liable for the lesser offences (sex with under 16-year-old which on his version he had admitted) carrying a lesser sentence.

¹⁹⁷ [1985] AC 1 at 17. ¹⁹⁸ [2016] UKSC 5, [2016] Crim LR 366.

¹⁹⁹ See Barnfather v Islington Education Authority [2003] EWHC 418 (Admin). In terms of the potential use of strict liability offences as evidence of D's bad character, see Goss [2003] EWCA Crim 3208, [2005] Crim LR 61.

²⁰⁰ See Ezeemo [2012] EWCA Crim 2064, [2013] Env LR 15 recognizing that if the offence was not one of strict liability then proof of knowledge would be required and that would render the offence very difficult to prove, frustrating Parliament's intention.

strict liability in, for example, murder because the prosecution face a difficult task in proving D's mens rea of intention.²⁰¹

5.3.3.1 Liability is strict, not 'absolute'

It was observed at the beginning of this chapter that the fact that an offence is one of strict liability does not rule out the need for any mental element whatsoever. It may be necessary to prove that D had mens rea as to the conduct or circumstances of the offence save the one element in respect of which strict liability was imposed. In addition, a strict liability offence does not preclude reliance on defences.²⁰² When the court holds that it is an offence of strict liability to sell meat which is unfit for human consumption, it decides that a reasonable mistake as to that particular fact is not a defence. It does not decide that no other defence is available to D; and, as we have seen, a mistake as to other circumstances of the actus reus may afford a defence depending on the statutory form of words.²⁰³ There is no reason why all other defences should not be available as they are in the case of offences requiring full mens rea. Even when the former offence of dangerous driving was thought to impose strict liability,²⁰⁴ it was held to be a 'defence' if D was in a state of automatism when he 'drove' the vehicle.²⁰⁵ Similarly, it is perfectly clear that a child under the age of ten could in no circumstances be convicted of an offence of strict liability.²⁰⁶ It is submitted that other general defences—insanity,²⁰⁷ necessity,²⁰⁸ duress²⁰⁹ and coercion—should be available equally on a charge of an offence of strict liability as in the case of any other offence.²¹⁰

*Larsonneur*²¹¹ and *Winzar v Chief Constable of Kent*²¹² establish that lawful compulsion is not a defence to offences of 'being found'. It does not follow that unlawful duress would not be a defence. If D, being drunk, were forced at gunpoint into the highway he should not be guilty of being found drunk there. Nor does it follow that even lawful compulsion may not found a defence to other, less extreme, cases of strict liability than those of 'being found'.

5.3.3.2 ECHR

The arguments based on Art 6(2) have been considered previously.

²⁰¹ See the comparative study by J Spencer and A Pedain, 'Approaches to Strict and Constructive Liability in Continental Criminal Law' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability noting that a reason for continental systems avoiding strict liability is that their procedures allow for proof more easily than the strict adversarial system in England.

²⁰² For judicial acceptance of this proposition, see Gregory [2011] EWCA Crim 1712.

²⁰³ See p 130.

²⁰⁴ cf Gosney [1971] 3 All ER 220.

²⁰⁵ Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 QB 277; Budd [1962] Crim LR 49; Watmore v Jenkins [1962] 2 QB 572.

²⁰⁶ See p 341.

²⁰⁷ See H v DPP [1997] 1 WLR 1406, discussed later, in which insanity was wrongly regarded as a defence displacing mens rea. See now Loake v CPS [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin).

²⁰⁸ This proposition was accepted in Santos v CPS [2013] EWHC 550 (Admin). But see Cichon v DPP [1994] Crim LR 918 (defence of necessity not open under Dangerous Dogs Act 1991, s 1(2)(d), because an 'absolute' offence).

²⁰⁹ See Eden DC v Baird [1998] CODS 209. Hampshire CC v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin), p 372 seems too narrow, and unfair. See J Donoghue (2011) 74 MLR 216 at 235 et seq.

²¹⁰ For discussion of this question, see F Sayre, 'Public Welfare Offences' (1933) 33 Col LR 55 at 75–78; Howard, SR, Ch 9.

²¹¹ (1933) 24 Cr App R 74; p 43.

²¹² (1983) The Times, 28 Mar, p 70. Cf O'Sullivan v Fisher [1954] SASR 33, discussed by Howard, SR at 193; Achterdam 1911 EDL 336 (EM Burchell and PMA Hunt, South African Criminal Law and Procedure (1970) 114).

5.4 Arguments for and against strict liability

The proliferation of offences of strict liability, while generally deplored by legal writers, was welcomed by some commentators, including the distinguished social scientist Lady Wootton, on the ground that ‘nothing has dealt so devastating a blow at the punitive concept of the criminal process . . .’²¹³

If, however, the primary function of the courts is conceived as the prevention of forbidden acts, there is little cause to be disturbed by the multiplication of offences of strict liability. If the law says that certain things are not to be done, it is illogical to confine this prohibition to occasions on which they are done from malice aforethought; for at least the material consequences of an action, and the reasons for prohibiting it are the same whether it is the result of sinister malicious plotting, of negligence or of sheer accident.²¹⁴

Accepting for the sake of argument that the primary function of the courts is the prevention of forbidden acts, there remains the question which acts should be regarded as forbidden? Surely, only such acts as we can assert ought not to have been done. Suppose that a butcher, who has taken all reasonable precautions, has the misfortune to sell some meat which is unfit for human consumption. That it was so unfit is undiscoverable by any precaution which a butcher can be expected to take. Ought the butcher to have acted as he did? Unless we want butchers to stop selling meat, or to take precautions so extreme as to be unreasonable (like employing an analyst),²¹⁵ it would seem that the answer should be ‘yes’; we want butchers, who have taken all reasonable precautions, to sell meat—the act of this butcher was not one which the law should seek to prevent. The imposition of strict liability rather than liability for negligence seems wholly inappropriate.²¹⁶

The most prominent opponent of strict liability offences in recent times is Andrew Ashworth.²¹⁷ In his analysis of this issue, Ashworth limits his focus to serious offences. He argues that there are two arguments explaining why the principle of mens rea is so influential in the common law world. The first he calls the ‘rule of law’ argument and it is founded upon the proposition that it would be wrong to convict and punish anyone who has not been given a ‘fair opportunity’ to exercise the capacity for ‘doing what the law requires and abstaining from what it forbids’.²¹⁸ Ashworth therefore identifies the principle of mens rea as being central to fairness in the criminal law. Strict liability is so objectionable because it leads to the conviction of people who it has not been proved were sufficiently at fault in respect of a material element of the offence. Ashworth terms the second argument the ‘censure-based’ argument and it is a corollary of the seriousness with which a criminal conviction should be treated. This, it is argued, provides a strong reason for requiring fault. Failure to do so, he argues, imposes public condemnation without properly laying the foundations for it. Ashworth argues that, either separately or in combination, these arguments provide convincing reasons for regarding strict liability as wrong in principle. He states:

²¹³ Crime and the Criminal Law (2nd edn, 1963) 44. See also at 63, criticized by B Hogan, Criminal Liability without Fault (1969); HLA Hart, The Morality of the Criminal Law (1965) 13 et seq.

²¹⁴ ibid., 51. ²¹⁵ See Kennedy LJ cited p 145 and see p 169.

²¹⁶ This point is also made by Ashworth, who criticizes Lady Hale’s speech in G on the basis that she did not consider the case for having a negligence standard as an alternative to imposing strict liability. See A Ashworth, ‘Should Strict Criminal Liability be Removed from All Imprisonable Offences?’ in A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 121.

²¹⁷ ibid.

²¹⁸ Here Ashworth is citing HLA Hart, Punishment and Responsibility: Essays in the Philosophy of Law (2008) 152.

The rule-of-law rationale links with the criminal law's function of guiding behaviour and the censure-based rationale links with the criminal conviction's function of expressing official censure. Thus, both rationales connect the criminal law with wider issues of political obligation, in the sense that they emphasise the importance of respect for individuals as rational and autonomous persons.²¹⁹

Some commentators take a different view, arguing that strict liability offences perform a valuable role²²⁰ in 'setting out schemes of conduct that have the effect of co-ordinating risk reduction or the promotion of certain goods'. In the famous, but now overruled, case of Prince where D was convicted of taking a girl under 16 out of the possession of her parents, even though he had no mens rea as to her age, some of the judges reached their conclusion on the ground that men should be deterred from taking girls out of the possession of their parents, whatever the girl's age. This reasoning can hardly be applied to many modern offences in which strict liability is adopted. We do not wish to deter people from driving cars, being concerned in the management of premises or canning peas.²²¹ These acts, if done with all proper care, are not such acts as the law should seek to prevent. The fallacy in the argument lies in looking at the harm done in isolation from the circumstances in which it was brought about. Many acts, which have in fact caused harm, ought to have been done. The surgeon performing a justified operation with all proper skill may cause death, yet we would still want him to perform the operation.

Another argument that is frequently advanced in favour of strict liability is that, without it, many guilty people would escape—'that there is neither time nor personnel available to litigate the culpability of each particular infraction'.²²² This argument assumes that it is possible to deal with these cases without deciding whether D had mens rea or not, whether he was negligent or not. Certainly, D may be convicted without deciding these questions, but how can he be fairly sentenced? Clearly, the court ought to deal differently with: (a) the butcher who knew that the meat was contaminated; (b) the butcher who did not know, but ought to have known; and (c) the butcher who did not know and had no means of finding out. Sentence cannot properly be imposed without deciding into which category the convicted person falls. Treating the offence as one of strict liability, in the case of jury trial, merely removes the decision of these vital questions of fact from the jury and puts them in the hands of the judge; in the case of summary trial, it removes the questions from the sphere of strict proof according to law and leaves them to be decided in the much more informal way in which questions of fact relating purely to sentence are decided.²²³

There is a further problem with strict liability and sentencing.²²⁴ If the offence is one of strict liability, then strictly speaking evidence is not admissible at the trial either to show

²¹⁹ See n 216, 115.

²²⁰ Lamond (2007) 27 OJLS 609.

²²¹ See Smedleys Ltd v Breed [1974] AC 839, [1974] Crim LR 309. 'Obviously any consequence is avoidable by the simple expedient of not engaging in the process at all. But that clearly is not what is meant unless the process itself is open to serious criticism as unnecessary or inefficient', per Lord Hailsham [1974] 2 All ER 21 at 28.

²²² H Wechsler, 'The Model Penal Code' in JL Edwards (ed), Modern Advances in Criminology (1965) 73. The argument was met by the authors of the code by 'the creation of a grade of offence which may be prosecuted in a criminal court but which is not denominated criminal and which entails upon conviction no severer sentence than a fine or civil penalty or forfeiture'.

²²³ Disputed facts affecting sentence may be decided by the judge in a 'Newton hearing' after conviction—see Newton (1982) 77 Cr App R 13, [1983] Crim LR 198. In some cases judges have preferred the use of additional counts to obtain the jury's decision on important issues of culpability which would not appear from a verdict of guilty on a single count. See Hoof (intentional or reckless arson?), Ch 27. This course is not open where the offence is one of strict liability. In Warner (p 162) the recorder asked the jury after verdict whether D knew the box contained drugs but they said, reasonably, that they had not decided that question.

²²⁴ These problems are discussed in A Ashworth, 'Should Strict Criminal Liability be Removed from All Imprisonable Offences?' in A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 127.

that D was blameworthy—*Sandhu*²²⁵—or that he was not—Gosney.²²⁶ On the assumption (held, on appeal, to be wrong) that the former offence of dangerous driving was one of strict liability, the judge, no doubt rightly, excluded evidence alleged to show that D was blameless. If the rules relating to proof at the trial have any value at all, it is extraordinary that they should not be applied to the most important facts in the case. That the sentence should be imposed by the judge on a basis of fact different from that on which the jury convicted is deplorable; but it is always possible in the case of strict liability unless the judge questions the jury as to the grounds of their decision—and there are difficulties about this.²²⁷

An illustration of how mens rea may be relevant to sentence even where strict liability is imposed is in cases of under-age sex. As a child under 13 cannot, in law, give consent to any sexual activity, an offender's belief in the age of the child, even if reasonably held, is irrelevant. However, when considering culpability, actual consent has been recognized as being capable of being a mitigating factor.²²⁸

The argument which is probably most frequently advanced by the courts for imposing strict liability is that it is necessary to do so in the 'interests of the public'.²²⁹ Of course, it may be conceded that in many of the instances where strict liability has been imposed, the public does need protection against negligence and, assuming that the threat of punishment can make the potential harm-doer more careful, there may be a valid ground for imposing liability for negligence as well as where there is mens rea. But that is an argument for negligence offences, and it is only valid as an argument for strict liability if the courts are not prepared to hold that where the presumption of mens rea is rebutted, it is replaced with a requirement to prove negligence. The judges have generally proceeded on the basis that there is no such 'middle way': where the presumption of mens rea is rebutted liability is strict.

The case against strict liability crimes being created then is, first, that it is unnecessary. It results in the conviction of persons who have behaved impeccably and who should not be required to alter their conduct in any way. Secondly, that it is unjust.²³⁰ Even if an absolute discharge can be given (as in Ball),²³¹ D may feel rightly aggrieved at having been formally convicted of an offence for which he bore no responsibility. It is significant that Ball thought it worthwhile to appeal. Moreover, a conviction may have far-reaching consequences outside the courts,²³² so that it is no answer to say that only a nominal penalty is imposed.²³³

5.5 Negligence/lack of due diligence as a preferred approach

The imposition of liability for negligence would in fact meet the arguments of most of those who favour strict liability. Roscoe Pound, in a passage which has been frequently and uncritically accepted as a justification for such offences, wrote:²³⁴

²²⁵ [1997] Crim LR 288. ²²⁶ [1971] 2 QB 674.

²²⁷ cf comment on Lockyer v Gibb [1966] Crim LR 504 and on Sheppard [1981] AC 394, [1981] Crim LR 171 at 172; Dalas [1966] Crim LR 692; Warner [1967] 3 All ER 93, [1967] Crim LR 528; Lester (1976) 63 Cr App R 144, [1976] Crim LR 389; Foo [1976] Crim LR 456 and commentaries on these cases.

²²⁸ F [2007] EWCA Crim 2550. See also the obiter comments in Jackson [2006] EWCA Crim 2380, p 153.

²²⁹ This rationale is derided by Ashworth as being 'vacuous'. See A Ashworth, 'Should Strict Criminal Liability be Removed from All Imprisonable Offences?' in A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 117.

²³⁰ See for a philosophical account, A Simester, 'Is Strict Liability Always Wrong?' and DN Husak, 'Strict Liability, Justice and Proportionality' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability.

²³¹ (1966) 50 Cr App R 266 (blameless driver guilty of causing death by dangerous driving).

²³² With employment, travel restrictions, etc. See the case of Sweet v Parsley [1970] AC 132, [1969] 1 All ER 347.

²³³ This was accepted by the Privy Council in Lim Chin Aik [1963] AC 160 at 175 and by Lord Reid in Warner [1968] 2 All ER 356 at 366.

²³⁴ The Spirit of the Common Law (1921) 52.

The good sense of the courts has introduced a doctrine of acting at one's peril with respect to statutory crimes which expresses the needs of society. Such statutes are not meant to punish the vicious but to put pressure upon the thoughtless and inefficient to do their whole duty in the interest of public health or safety or morals.

The 'thoughtless and inefficient' are, of course, the negligent. The objection to offences of strict liability is not that these negligent persons are penalized, but that others who are completely innocent are also liable to conviction. There is therefore a strong argument for saying that where the presumption of mens rea is rebutted on the grounds discussed earlier, then liability should not be strict but should turn on whether D was negligent. One way of achieving this is by including 'due diligence' defences.

5.5.1 Statutory due diligence defences

It is common for the drastic effect of a statute imposing strict liability to be mitigated by the provision of a statutory defence allowing the defendant to prove that he acted with all due diligence. The Law Commission has reviewed the use of due diligence defences and the various forms they take—the most general ones based on whether D has taken all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of the offence.²³⁵

As an example, the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 created a number of offences, some of which replaced earlier offences of strict liability, and s 24 provided that it is a defence to prove (a) that the commission of the offence was due (inter alia) to a mistake or accident and (b) that D 'took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of such an offence by himself or any person under his control'.²³⁶ Thus, though the prosecution do not have to prove negligence, it is a defence for D to show that he was not negligent. Similar provisions have been included in some offences in the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

A further more recent example is in s 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 which creates a strict liability offence for a commercial organization where a person associated with it bribes another person intending to obtain or retain a business advantage. This is a very widely defined offence.²³⁷ Section 7 provides:

- (1) A relevant commercial organisation ('C') is guilty of an offence under this section if a person ('A') associated with C bribes another person intending—
 1. (a) to obtain or retain business for C, or
 2. (b) to obtain or retain an advantage in the conduct of business for C.

There is, crucially, a due diligence defence in s 7(2) for C to prove that it had in place adequate procedures designed to prevent persons associated with C from undertaking such conduct.²³⁸

Sometimes due diligence defences are extremely complex with various specific elements that D must prove. Examples include those relating to the treatment and sale of food. Several of the offences enacted by ss 7 to 20 of the Food Safety Act 1990 are strict liability offences.

²³⁵ LCCP 195, para 6.28.

²³⁶ See generally DL Parry, 'Judicial Approaches to Due Diligence' [1995] Crim LR 695. See P Cartwright, Consumer Protection and the Criminal Law (2001).

²³⁷ Section 7 is triable only on indictment (s 11(3)). The maximum sentence is an unlimited fine. See the valuable analysis by S Gentle [2011] Crim LR 101. The offence has been in force from 1 July 2011.

²³⁸ The offences of failing to prevent the facilitation of tax evasion in ss 45 and 46 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 contain similar defences. There is a crucial difference, however. In the Criminal Finances Act, it is open to the corporate to prove that it was not reasonable in all the circumstances to expect it to have in place prevention procedures. For discussion, see K Laird, 'The Criminal Finances Act 2017—An Introduction' [2017] Crim LR 915.

Section 21(1), however, provides that it shall be a defence for the person charged with any of the offences to prove that he took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of the offence by himself or by a person under his control;²³⁹ but, where this defence involves an allegation that the offence was in consequence of the act or default of another person, the defendant may not, without the leave of the court, rely on it unless within a prescribed period he has served on the prosecutor a notice in writing giving such information identifying or assisting in the identification of the other person as was then in his possession (s 21(5)).

The statutory due diligence defences usually impose on D a burden of proving both that he had no mens rea and that he took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid the commission of an offence.²⁴⁰ The effect of such provisions is that the prosecution need do no more than prove that the accused did the prohibited act and it is then for him to establish, if he can, that he did it innocently. Such provisions are a distinct advance on unmitigated strict liability; but they are still a deviation from the fundamental principle that the prosecution must prove the whole of the allegation.

Arguments over what the particular statutory due diligence defence requires D to prove can also arise. In Croydon LBC v Pinch a Pound (UK) Ltd,²⁴¹ P Co sold knives. An employee at P Co sold a utility knife to two 15-year-olds. P was convicted in the magistrates' court under s 141A of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 ('selling' a knife to anyone under 18). P argued successfully in the Crown Court that the company had exercised all due diligence and taken all reasonable precautions to prevent the commission of the offence, and therefore had the statutory defence in s 141A(4). The Divisional Court held that the Crown Court had misconstrued the due diligence test.²⁴² The defence in s 141A(4) comprised two elements: (a) taking reasonable precautions (eg a no sales policy, signage and staff training) and (b) the exercise of due diligence in the management and operation of sales of the items (ensuring that the policy was adhered to, recording refused sales correctly, etc). The Crown Court appeared to have focused on whether D had shown an absence of negligence and an absence of a reprehensible state of mind. That was too generous to the defendant as it imported mens rea into the offence. The case was remitted with an order to convict.

5.5.1.1 Due diligence and reasonable excuse as a cloak for mens rea

In 2011, in Unah,²⁴³ the Court of Appeal considered the relationship between strict liability and the defence of reasonable excuse in the context of the Identity Card Act 2006.²⁴⁴ D was a Nigerian with indefinite leave to remain in the UK. In D's possession was found a false passport, which had expired, in addition to a valid current passport. D's contention was that the passport was genuine. D was charged with an offence under s 21(5) of the Identity Cards Act 2006 and sought to argue that her belief that the passport was genuine ought to constitute a 'reasonable excuse' within the meaning of that section. The judge ruled that the offence was one of strict liability and therefore 'reasonable excuse' could not include D's state of mind as to the genuineness of the passport. The Court of Appeal noted that the offence in s 21(5), unlike s 21(1), did not refer to D having intention or knowledge that the ²³⁹ It has been held that there is no liability for D where he has taken all reasonable steps to delegate his duty to another who then fails to perform to the relevant standard. See eg R (Keam) v DEFRA [2005] EWHC 1582 (Admin).

²⁴⁰ See X Ltd [2013] EWCA Crim 818.

²⁴¹ [2010] EWHC 3283 (Admin).

²⁴² Misapplying words from Lord Diplock's speech in Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass [1972] AC 153, HL; see Ch 8, p 250.

²⁴³ [2011] EWCA Crim 1837, [2012] Crim LR 221.

²⁴⁴ This has since been repealed and been replaced by similar offences in the Identity Documents Act 2010. The provisions are similar and the decision in this case ought to be applicable to the new offences.

passport was false. To that extent, the judge was right to infer that Parliament had intended to create an offence of strict liability. Elias LJ, however, also stated that it did not follow that lack of knowledge or belief would not be relevant at all to a defence of reasonable excuse. The jury ought to have been directed to consider objectively whether D had a reasonable excuse for possessing the passport and her conviction was quashed.²⁴⁵ A similar approach was taken in the case of JB where the allegation was of a breach of an ASBO.²⁴⁶ The court noted that the statute:

does not require the Crown to prove a specific mental element on the part of a defendant at the time he committed the acts which constitute the breach of an ASBO. However, if the issue of reasonable excuse arises in any given case a Defendant can raise his state of mind at the time of the alleged breach since the state of mind will usually be relevant to the issue of reasonable excuse. As the effect of s 1(10) is to criminalise conduct that would otherwise not be criminal (cf paras 10 and 11 of the judgment in Charles [[2009] EWCA Crim 1570]), it would not be right, on principle, to exclude matters that go to a Defendant's state of mind (such as forgetfulness or a misapprehension about the meaning of the order or an accidental breach).²⁴⁷

5.5.2 Due diligence defences imposed at common law?

In some common law jurisdictions it has become commonplace for the courts to adopt a 'halfway house' between strict liability and full mens rea. Once the actus reus has been proved, an onus is imposed on D, sometimes to introduce evidence and sometimes to prove, that he had reasonable grounds for his failure to be aware of, or to foresee, relevant facts, as the case may be. The lead first came from Australia.²⁴⁸ In Canada also, the Supreme Court, in a notable judgment delivered by Dickson J, held that public welfare offences prima facie fall into an intermediate class between offences requiring mens rea and offences 'of absolute liability'. The prosecution need prove only that D caused the actus reus but he may escape liability by proving that he took all reasonable care to avoid the commission of the offence.²⁴⁹

Where there is no such express due diligence provision in a statute, it is unlikely that the courts will hold it to be implied. It is true that the House of Lords in *Sweet v Parsley*²⁵⁰ looked favourably on such a doctrine:²⁵¹

When a statutory prohibition is cast in terms which at first sight appear to impose strict responsibility, they should be understood merely as imposing responsibility for negligence but emphasising that the burden of rebutting negligence by affirmative proof of reasonable mistake rests upon the defendant.²⁵²

However, the English courts have subsequently showed no inclination to put such a principle into practice. In Gammon (Hong Kong) Ltd v A-G of Hong Kong,²⁵³ the Privy Council, while stressing the need for very high standards of care, regarded the choice as a straight ²⁴⁵ It has been argued that this case demonstrates how the reasonable excuse defence acts as a bulwark against the imposition of strict liability. See A Reed, 'Strict Liability and the Reasonable Excuse Defence' (2012) 76 J Crim L 293.

²⁴⁶ JB v DPP [2012] EWHC 72 (Admin). ²⁴⁷ At [17].

²⁴⁸ Maher v Musson (1934) 52 CLR 100; Proudman v Dayman (1941) 67 CLR 536.

²⁴⁹ City of Sault Ste Marie (1978) 40 CCC (2d) 353.

²⁵⁰ [1969] 1 All ER 347 at 351 per Lord Reid, at 357 per Lord Pearce and at 362 per Lord Diplock.

²⁵¹ As it had developed in Australia, see n 248.

²⁵² G Orchard, 'The Defence of Absence of Fault in Australia and Canada' in Criminal Law Essays.

²⁵³ [1985] AC 1, [1984] Crim LR 479, [1984] 2 All ER 503 at 509.

one between mens rea and strict liability. Just as the judges invented the presumption in favour of mens rea, they could have invented a presumption of a negligence requirement in particular types of case. They chose not to do so. Lord Devlin has explained this:

It is not easy to find a way of construing a statute apparently expressed in terms of absolute liability so as to produce the requirement of negligence. Take, for example, an offence like driving a car while it has defective brakes. It is easy enough to read into a statute a word like 'wilfully' but you cannot just read in 'carelessly'. You cannot show that no one should carelessly drive a car with defective brakes; you are not trying to get at careless driving. What you want to say is that no one may drive a car without taking care to see that the brakes are not defective. That is not so easy to frame as a matter of construction and it has never been done.²⁵⁴

The judicial reluctance to read due diligence defences into strict liability is in part born of a reluctance to impose a burden of proof on the defence. But as the former Law Lord, Lord Cooke of Thorndon observed:

It does seem odd that in the home of Woolmington absolute (or strict) liability is so extensively accepted by the courts, and with some equanimity. It is as if the great case has created a judicial mindset which recoils at a shifting of the onus, yet tolerates a harsher solution.²⁵⁵

There is nothing wrong, it is submitted, with the 'judicial mindset' which recoils at a shifting of the onus onto the defendant—that reflects a healthy commitment to the presumption of innocence—but when combined with a refusal to imply a requirement of either mens rea or negligence, it does indeed lead to an unduly harsh solution. The opportunity to adopt the halfway house was presented to the House of Lords in *B (A Minor) v DPP*²⁵⁶ but was declined in favour of a requirement of full mens rea. It seems the halfway house has no future in England and Wales, except where it is embodied in a statute, although it could be argued that the judgments in Unah and JB indicate a different attitude, at least amongst certain members of the Court of Appeal. The extent to which these cases represent a more general willingness to accept the halfway house remains to be seen but the situation does not look promising.

5.5.3 Reform

The Law Commission made the welcome recommendation that:

In an ideal world, criminal offences created by statute would always indicate when fault need not be proved, or if it needs to be proved what kind of fault (or defence) is involved. Since there are so many criminal offences under statute that fall short of the ideal, we believe that, subject to some possible exceptions, the courts should be given the power to apply a defence of due diligence in all the circumstances to statutory offences that would otherwise involve strict liability with no adequate defence. This approach has the advantage of leaving the strict basis of liability in the relevant provision intact. That means the courts will no longer need to search for what may be non-existent Parliamentary intention respecting fault requirements and will no longer need to decide whether a presumption that fault must be proved applies, and if so, whether the presumption has been displaced.²⁵⁷

²⁵⁴ Samples of Lawmaking (1962) 76.

²⁵⁵ 'One Golden Thread' in Turning Points of the Common Law (Hamlyn Lectures, 1997) 28 at 47. See also City of Sault Ste Marie (1978) 85 DLR 3d 161 (Can). On defences of due diligence, see G Orchard, 'The Defence of Absence of Fault in Australia and Canada' in Criminal Law Essays.

²⁵⁶ [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403.

²⁵⁷ LCCP 195, para 6.92, recognizing that in some contexts, eg road traffic, due diligence would not be an appropriate innovation.

6

Parties to crime

6.1 Introduction

A person may be liable for an offence as a ‘principal’ or ‘joint principal’ where he has played a part in the commission of the actus reus of the offence.¹ To be a principal offender the person must directly and immediately perform the actus reus of an offence (in this chapter we will refer to the principal as ‘P’).

Plainly, the principal is not necessarily the only one who can be criminally liable for an offence. A person (in this chapter, D), might also be liable as an ‘accessory’, or as it is also called, a ‘secondary party’. Specific common law and statutory rules govern whether a person is liable as an accessory; these rules apply to all offences, unless expressly² or impliedly excluded.³ Where D is liable as an accessory, he is liable because he aided, abetted, counselled or procured (for convenience we can say ‘assisted or encouraged’) P who committed the principal offence.

A person, D, other than the principal, P, might also be liable for an inchoate offence—assisting or encouraging P under the Serious Crime Act 2007 (SCA 2007) or for conspiring with P that the offence would be committed. There is a crucial difference from secondary liability: D’s liability for inchoate offences arises irrespective of whether P has committed the offence. We deal with inchoate liability in Ch 11.

In secondary liability we can describe D’s liability as ‘derivative’ on the commission of the principal offence.⁴ Logically, therefore, the easiest way of ascertaining D’s potential liability is to assess whether the principal offence has been committed, then to consider whether D has fulfilled the requirements of aiding and abetting it. This does not involve asking whether D fulfilled the actus reus and mens rea of the principal offence. Instead, we ask whether D performed the relevant conduct sufficient to constitute assisting or encouraging and did so with the mens rea required for liability as an accessory.

Occasionally, statutory offences are drafted in such a way that assisting or encouraging someone to commit an offence is itself a statutory offence⁵ (the statute provides: it is an ¹ See generally KJM Smith, A Modern Treatise on Complicity (1991). For an excellent discussion of the current law, see LC 305, Participating in Crime (2007) Part 2 and Appendix B.

² eg under the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 there is no secondary liability for individuals.

³ Arguably this occurs where a statute creates offences of ‘using or causing or permitting to be used’. See Carmichael & Sons (Worcester) Ltd v Cottle [1971] RTR 11. Cf Farr [1982] Crim LR 745, CA, and commentary.

⁴ Russell, 128; Surujpaul v R [1958] 3 All ER 300 at 301, PC. This is now subject to the rule in Millward [1994] Crim LR 527, p 223.

⁵ See eg Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003. Note the Serious Crime Act 2015, ss 70–75, extending the extraterritorial effect of the offence, adding protective orders and adding an offence of failing to protect a girl from the risk of genital mutilation.

offence to 'do x' and it is an offence to assist any person 'to do x'). In those cases D can be liable for the statutory offence of assisting even if the offence D has assisted is not committed. There are numerous offences of 'being knowingly concerned in' a type of behaviour such as drug importation or supply of drugs, and the person 'knowingly concerned in' the conduct commits an offence of his own accord not merely as an accessory to someone else's.⁶

Within the scope of secondary liability there also existed at common law a controversial and much misunderstood form of liability known as joint enterprise liability. We will consider that in detail later in this chapter, but following the seminal⁷ decision of the Supreme Court in *Jogee*⁸ that doctrine no longer exists as a separate basis of liability.

6.1.1 Summary

Before discussing in detail the different bases of liability,⁹ it is worth summarizing them to provide an overview. D may be liable in the following ways:

- (1) As a principal or joint principal where he has played a part in the commission of the actus reus of the offence; or where he acts through an innocent agent.¹⁰
- (2) As an accessory under s 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 where D has aided, abetted, counselled or procured P in his conduct which constituted the principal crime.
- (3) For the commission of a full statutory offence itself if it is one defined in terms of assisting or encouraging.
- (4) Prior to the Supreme Court's judgment in Jogee,¹¹ there was an additional basis upon which D could be liable. Under the common law, D could be liable on the basis of what was known as 'joint enterprise' or 'parasitic accessory'¹² liability. This was a controversial doctrine that was held by the Supreme Court in Jogee to have been the result of a 'legal wrong turn' that the court concluded it was necessary to correct. The rise and fall of this doctrine is discussed later in this chapter.¹³

Despite the Supreme Court's efforts to clarify the law in Jogee, the current law of secondary liability remains unsatisfactorily complex, and displays many of the characteristic weaknesses of a common law doctrine that has been allowed to develop in a pragmatic and unprincipled way. Statutory reform would be welcome, although there is considerable doubt whether that should be in the form the Law Commission proposed in 2007 (Report No 305 discussed later).¹⁴

⁶ See eg the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, s 4(3)(b).

⁷ The term used by Sir Brian Leveson P in Anwar [2016] EWCA Crim 551, [20].

⁸ [2016] UKSC 8.

⁹ We do not include in this summary any possible inchoate liability. See Ch 11.

¹⁰ See p 179. See recently Lewis and others [2017] EWCA Crim 1734.

¹¹ [2016] UKSC 8. For extensive discussion, see p 214.

¹² This expression was coined by Professor Sir John Smith. See JC Smith, 'Criminal Liability of Accessories: Law and Law Reform' (1997) 113 LQR 453.

¹³ At the risk of oversimplifying, D could be liable for P's crime B where D and P had set out with a common purpose to commit crime A and P had gone on to commit crime B and D foresaw as a real possibility that P might commit crime B.

¹⁴ See R Buxton [2009] Crim LR 230; cf W Wilson, 'A Rational Scheme of Liability for Participation in Crime' [2008] Crim LR 3, suggesting the proposals generally 'succeed admirably'; cf GR Sullivan, 'Participating in Crime' [2008] Crim LR 19, suggesting the proposals on joint ventures show a 'disregard for the minimum standards of clarity and comprehensibility' and RD Taylor 'Procuring, Causation, Innocent Agency and the Law Commission' [2008] Crim LR 32, who is also critical of the complexity and incoherence of the proposals.

6.2 Bases of liability

By s 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861, as amended by the Criminal Law Act 1977:

Whosoever shall aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of any indictable offence whether the same be an offence at common law or by virtue of any act passed or to be passed, shall be liable to be tried, indicted and punished as a principal offender.¹⁵

The section does not create an offence. It specifies the procedure and punishment for the aiders, abettors, counsellors and procurers, conveniently called ‘accessories’.

6.2.1 Distinguishing accessories and principals

English law treats the accessory and principal in identical terms for the purposes of procedure and punishment. It has always been sufficient to prove that the defendant was either the principal¹⁶ or accessory.¹⁷ A person who is charged with an offence, say theft, may be convicted whether the evidence proves that he committed the theft (ie was a principal), or aided, abetted, counselled or procured it (ie was an accessory). But the charge should, wherever possible, specify whether the accused is alleged to have been the principal offender or an accessory.¹⁸ The prosecution can nevertheless secure a conviction without specifying precisely what role they allege D played. So, in Giannetto, it was acceptable for the prosecution to allege that D killed his wife or that he was an accessory to her killing (by contracting a killer to do so).¹⁹ The jury could convict on that basis. The prosecution could not be sure whether D was the principal offender or an accessory, but could establish beyond doubt that he was involved in plotting her killing.²⁰ The Supreme Court confirmed in Jogee that, ‘in some cases the prosecution may not be able to prove whether a defendant was principal or accessory, but it is sufficient to be able to prove that he participated in the crime in one way or another’.²¹

Difficulties of this type are commonplace as, for example, where V is attacked by a group of individuals and killed but the medical evidence points to death resulting from a single stab wound.²² Unless the evidence can establish that a particular member of the group must have been responsible for inflicting the fatal wound, the prosecution may have no alternative but to allege that each member was either the principal offender or an accessory. Considerable difficulty would arise in such cases if the prosecution had to choose. If there is only one fatal stab wound, the Crown cannot simply allege that each defendant was the principal. As a matter of fact, that is most unlikely to be true; only one person will have plunged the knife in. Equally, the Crown would face difficulty if they alleged that each ¹⁵ Similar provisions relating to summary trial are to be found in the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980, s 44.

¹⁶ The common law of felonies designated the actual perpetrator ‘the principal in the first degree’ and distinguished secondary parties into principals in the second degree—those who participated at the time when the felony was actually perpetrated—and accessories before the fact—those who participated at an earlier time. It was traditional to state that the distinction was that the principal in the second degree was present at the commission of the offence; but in fact he might be a considerable distance away—in a US case (State v Hamilton and Lawrie, 13 Nev 386 (1878)—signals from mountain top, 30–40 miles away), so long as he was assisting or available to assist, at the time. Hawkins, II PC, c 29, ss 7 and 8; Foster, Crown Law, 350. The abolition of felonies in the Criminal Law Act 1967 renders the distinction redundant.

¹⁷ Mackalley’s Case (1611) 9 Co Rep 61b; Fitzgerald [1992] Crim LR 660.

¹⁸ DPP for Northern Ireland v Maxwell [1978] 3 All ER 1140, HL; Taylor [1998] Crim LR 582.

¹⁹ [1997] 1 Cr App R 1, CA and commentary [1996] Crim LR 722 for criticism. See also Morton [2004] Crim LR 73.

²⁰ See also Montague [2013] EWCA Crim 1781, [2014] Crim LR 615 and commentary.

²¹ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [88].

²² cf the observations made by Davis LJ in Lewis [2017] EWCA Crim 1734, [46].

defendant was an accessory; unless the jury could be sure when considering the case against a particular defendant that he was not the principal, he would have to be acquitted. In view of these forensic difficulties, the pragmatic solution of being able to charge D with being either an accessory or principal is understandable. The lack of precision in such an indictment has been held not to render it incompatible with Art 6 of the ECHR on the basis of the requirement that a defendant must know 'in detail' the nature of the case against him.²³

Although the law treats the accessory and principal in identical terms for the purposes of procedure and punishment, it is important to distinguish them for several reasons.

First, the accessory is only liable once the principal offence has been committed.²⁴ Secondary liability derives from the commission of the principal offence.²⁵ This derivative approach to secondary liability means that, with a murder for example, D may supply the weapon to P, who kills V, but it is not until that killing takes place (or is attempted) that D can be liable as an accessory. This contrasts with inchoate liability where D who supplies the weapon is liable (depending on his mens rea) as soon as he performs his act of supply, irrespective of whether P goes on to kill V or, indeed, whether P does any further act.

Secondly, in some cases, it is only an offence to do something to another and not to assist someone to do it to themselves (eg injecting drugs). It is essential to establish if it is alleged that D helped P to perform the conduct on himself (no liability), or whether D performed it on P (potential liability).²⁶

A third reason for distinguishing principals and accessories is that, even in offences of strict liability, accessories must always be proved to have mens rea.²⁷

Fourthly, in some cases offences are defined in such a way that they can be committed, as a principal offender, only by someone who is a member of a particular group or who has a particular qualification (eg the 'driver' of a vehicle or the licensee of a pub).²⁸

Fifthly, in some offences vicarious liability may be imposed for the act of another who is a principal offender or does the act of a principal offender; but there is no vicarious liability for the act of an accessory.²⁹

Finally, in some exceptional cases the available sentencing differs significantly between principal and accessory.³⁰

6.2.2 Secondary as distinct from inchoate liability

As noted, with inchoate offences D's liability crystallizes as soon as he has assisted or encouraged P or agreed with him to commit an offence irrespective of whether that leads ²³ Mercer [2001] All ER (D) 187. Cf A Ashworth, 'A Decade of Human Rights in Criminal Justice' [2014] Crim LR 325, 327.

²⁴ Committing the offence includes 'attempting' to commit the offence. If P, with D's aid, has attempted to murder V, D, as well as P, can be convicted of the offence of attempted murder.

²⁵ See GP Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) Ch 8; KJM Smith, A Modern Treatise on Complicity (1991) Ch 4; D Lanham, 'Primary and Derivative Criminal Liability: An Australian Perspective' [2000] Crim LR 707; LC 300, paras 2.7 et seq. The law in application fails to remain true to this theory: Wilson describes English law as 'fudging' the theoretical basis: Central Issues, Ch 7. An alternative analysis sees the secondary as causally responsible for the principal's crime (see Smith, above, Ch 3; M Moore, Causation and Responsibility An Essay in Law, Morals and Metaphysics (2009); J Gardner, Offences and Defences: Selected Essays in the Philosophy of Criminal Law (2007), Ch 4). See p 180.

²⁶ Kennedy (No 2) [2008] 1 AC 269; cf Empress Car [1999] 2 AC 22.

²⁷ See p 205. ²⁸ See p 205.

²⁹ See p 192. There is no vicarious liability at common law, as confirmed in Craik v CC of Northumbria Police [2010] EWHC 935 (Admin).

³⁰ In road traffic offences, where disqualification of the principal is obligatory, disqualification of accessories is discretionary: Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, s 34(5).

to P committing or even attempting to commit the substantive offence.³¹ Under ss 44 to 46 of the SCA 2007 there is an overlap with secondary liability. Where D does an act which is capable of encouraging or assisting, for example supplying a gun to P for him to murder V, D will be liable under ss 44 to 46 (see Ch 11), subject to mens rea, irrespective of whether the anticipated offence is committed or attempted by P. The offences in ss 44 to 46 are extremely wide-reaching. If P commits the murder, D can be charged as an accessory or under ss 44 to 46. There will often be little advantage in charging D as an accessory.³² The procedure and sentence will be the same for the offence under the SCA 2007 as for the anticipated substantive offence.

There is an even more complex relationship between conspiracy and secondary liability. A conspiracy is complete as soon as A and B agree to commit an offence (say, murder) with the intention³³ that the offence should be committed. There is no secondary liability for anyone unless and until the murder is committed. If B commits murder, A is liable as an accessory to murder by having agreed with B and thereby provided B with encouragement.³⁴ Liability as an accessory might also arise in this scenario if A assists or encourages B even without an agreement.³⁵ If B commits the offence, A and B can also still be charged with conspiracy to do so (see Ch 11). Finally, there is the issue of being an accessory to a conspiracy—for example, A intentionally assists D1 and D2 (eg providing D1 and D2 with facilities to meet) when they are making an agreement to murder V; A does not assist in the murder itself, but merely in setting up the agreement. If D1 commits murder as part of his conspiracy with D2, D2 is liable as an accessory (as well as for the conspiracy) because D2 has encouraged D1. Arguably, A has assisted D1 and D2 to commit the conduct element of conspiracy, but it cannot reasonably be said that A has done any act that has assisted or encouraged³⁶ D1 to perpetrate the conduct element of murder. It is submitted that A's act is not enough to render him an accessory to murder.

6.3 The principal offender

It is important to identify the principal offender.³⁷ Where there are several participants in a crime, the principal offender is the one whose act is the most immediate cause of the actus reus. In murder, for example, he is the person who, with mens rea, fires the gun or administers the poison which causes death; in theft, the person who, with mens rea, appropriates ³¹ At common law D had no inchoate liability for assisting P to commit an offence which P did not subsequently commit or attempt to commit. The SCA 2007, ss 44–46, introduced such offences following the recommendation of the Law Commission in LC 300, Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006). See the discussion in Buxton, n 14.

³² Section 45 requires that D should believe that P will commit the conduct element of the actus reus of the principal offence. In some respects this may actually be narrower than accessorial liability. Eg D, sells P a knife believing that P will use it in the kitchen, if D also believes that P might use it to murder his wife, D is not liable under s 45, but may be liable as an accessory if P does commit murder subject to mens rea. See Ch 11.

³³ Cf Anderson [1986] AC 27 which is surely wrong on this.

³⁴ Even in the unusual case where it is not A's intention that the murder be committed. See p 453.

³⁵ Rook [1993] 2 All ER 955, [1993] Crim LR 698 and commentary. Cf Stephen, Digest (9th edn) art 28; Williams, CLGP, 363; Pinkerton v United States, 328 US 640 (1946). See, however, D Lanham, 'Complicity, Concert and Conspiracy' (1980) 4 Crim LJ 276.

³⁶ Arguably there is no encouragement by A in this conduct. Some light may be shed on the meaning of that concept when the courts grapple more fully with the SCA 2007 provisions.

³⁷ Sometimes this is overlooked, as is evident from the judge's direction in Bristow [2013] EWCA Crim 1540, [2014] Crim LR 457. Even if P cannot be identified, it is crucial that the jury are directed to consider first whether there was a principal offender before going on to evaluate the other possible bases of liability.

the property which is stolen; in bigamy, the person who, knowing himself to be already married, goes through a second ceremony of marriage; and so on. With offences in which there is no result or consequence to be proved, the principal offender is perhaps more accurately the person who engages in the conduct element of the actus reus. In the case of statutory offences, whether a person is a principal offender will turn on whether he satisfies the precise form of words used to describe the conduct element of the offence.³⁸ One of the reasons why it is important to identify the principal is because he can be guilty if liability is strict as to one of the elements of the substantive offence, but this will not be the case with the secondary party. The Supreme Court confirmed in Jogee that to be guilty the secondary party must have knowledge of any facts or circumstances necessary for the principal's conduct to be criminal.³⁹ To take an example, the principal can be guilty of making an indecent image of a child even though he may not have known that the victim was under the age of 18. This is because liability as to the age of V is strict. To be guilty of being an accomplice to this offence, however, the secondary party must have known that the victim was under the age of 18. Failure to identify accurately who is the principal and who is the secondary party risks the latter being convicted even though he may not have possessed the requisite mens rea.

It is a fundamental principle that criminal liability arises from wrongdoing for which a person is himself responsible and not for the wrongdoing of others. If, by performing acts of assistance, an accessory were taken to have brought about the commission of the offence he would for all purposes become a principal offender. If D, having persuaded P to murder V, were taken to have caused V's death, that is, killed V, he would satisfy the definition of murder as a principal. Anyone whose assistance or encouragement in fact caused another to commit a crime would then be a principal. That is not the law. Accessorial liability is based on the assumption that the accessory does not cause the actus reus.⁴⁰ The distinction between principal and accessory is fundamental and the two ought not to be elided.⁴¹ As Lord Kerr pointed out in Gnango: 'To speak of joint principal offenders being involved in a joint enterprise is, at least potentially, misleading. The essential ingredient for joint principal offending is a contribution to the cause of the actus reus.'⁴²

The House of Lords in *Kennedy (No 2)*⁴³ reaffirmed these fundamental principles.⁴⁴ As Lord Bingham made clear, referring to Glanville Williams' article 'Finis for Novus Actus', the doctrine of secondary liability was developed precisely because an informed voluntary choice was ordinarily regarded as a novus actus interveniens breaking the chain of causation:

Principals cause, accomplices encourage (or otherwise influence) or help. If the instigator were regarded as causing the result he would be a principal, and the conceptual division between principals (or, as I prefer to call them, perpetrators) and accessories would vanish. Indeed, it was because the instigator was not regarded as causing the crime that the notion of accessories had to be developed. This is the irrefragable argument for recognising the novus actus principle as one of the bases of our criminal law. The final act is done by the perpetrator, and his guilt pushes the accessories, conceptually speaking, into the background. Accessorial liability is, in the traditional theory, 'derivative' from that of the perpetrator.⁴⁵

³⁸ See eg Corporation of London v Eurostar [2004] EWHC 187 (Admin), where Eurostar were guilty as principals for 'landing' an Alsatian dog as prohibited under anti-rabies legislation.

³⁹ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [99].

⁴⁰ HLA Hart and T Honoré, Causation in the Law (2nd edn, 1985) 380; SH Kadish, Blame and Punishment: Essays in the Criminal Law (1987) 143–144.

⁴¹ This passage in the 14th edition of this work was cited with approval by Spencer J in R v Maughan and others (CCC, 29 July 2016).

⁴² [2011] UKSC 59, [129]. It is submitted that the reference to 'contributing to the cause of the actus reus' should be treated with caution.

⁴³ [2007] UKHL 38, [2008] Crim LR 223.

⁴⁴ See p 74.

⁴⁵ [2007] UKHL 38, [17].

Despite these clear statements, the courts still occasionally refer to D as a 'cause' of P's act. In Mendez and Thompson,⁴⁶ Toulson LJ, after a scholarly analysis of the historical position, concluded that 'at its most basic level secondary liability is founded on a principle of causation, that a defendant (D) is liable for an offence committed by a principal actor (P) if by his conduct he has caused or materially contributed to the commission of the offence (with the requisite mental element); and a person who knowingly assists or encourages another to commit an offence is taken to have contributed to its commission'.⁴⁷ If cause is read strictly, this approach seems to run contrary to the fundamental principle reiterated in Kennedy (No 2) and does not reflect the practical reality that D might be liable for providing assistance to someone who had already made up his mind to commit the offence. There would be no causal contribution to the offence in such a case.⁴⁸ In Stringer,⁴⁹ Toulson LJ acknowledged that the accessory need not 'cause' the principal to commit the offence in the sense that 'but for' the defendant's conduct, the principal would not have committed the offence. His Lordship suggests instead that the accessory's conduct has to have some relevance to the commission of the principal offence; there had to be a 'connecting link'.⁵⁰ This is far less controversial:⁵¹

The way that the court put it in Mendez and Thompson was that D's conduct must (objectively) have constituted assistance or encouragement, even if P (subjectively) did not need assistance or encouragement. Whereas the provision of assistance need not involve communication between D and P, encouragement by its nature involves some form of transmission of the encouragement by words or conduct, whether directly or via an intermediary. An un-posted letter of encouragement would not be encouragement unless P chanced to discover it and read it. Similarly, it would be unreal to regard P as acting with the assistance or encouragement of D if the only encouragement took the form of words spoken by D out of P's earshot.⁵²

Writing extrajudicially, Sir Roger Toulson elaborated as follows:

It is plainly right and just that there should have to be some 'connecting link'. It would be morally repugnant to find a person guilty of murder for behaving in a way which on a fair view was unconnected with the crime...This analysis involves a concept of causation which is appropriate to the context. I do not see an alternative foundation on which secondary liability can satisfactorily be said to rest.⁵³

Whilst this may seem relatively uncontroversial, the spectre of further case law on causation and secondary liabilities arises because of the disagreement between Lords Clarke and Dyson and Lord Kerr in the case of Gnango.⁵⁴ In that infamous case⁵⁵ D was convicted of murder. He had voluntarily engaged in an exchange of gunfire with an opponent (P) in ⁴⁶ [2010] EWCA Crim 516, criticized by G Virgo [2010] 5 Arch Rev 4 and D Ormerod [2011] Crim LR 151.

⁴⁷ At [18], referring to Foster's Crown Law (3rd edn, 1809) 369. Toulson LJ does add 'contributing to'.

⁴⁸ See, however, the argument advanced by Gardner, Offences and Defences, n 25.

⁴⁹ [2011] EWCA Crim 1396, [2011] Crim LR 886. ⁵⁰ At [48].

⁵¹ Virgo contends, however, that in order to conform with existing doctrine, the connection justification would need to be extended in an artificial fashion. See G Virgo, 'Joint Enterprise Liability is Dead: Long Live Accessorial Liability' [2012] Crim LR 850.

⁵² See also Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [12].

⁵³ R Toulson, 'Complicity in Murder' in DJ Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law: The Legacy of Glanville Williams (2012) 239.

⁵⁴ [2011] UKSC 59. For criticism, see GR Sullivan, 'Accessories and Principals after Gnango' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013) and R Buxton, 'Being an Accessory to One's Own Murder' [2012] Crim LR 275.

⁵⁵ [2010] EWCA Crim 1691.

a public place. One of P's shots, aimed at D, killed a passer-by. P was not prosecuted, but would have been guilty of murder by the law of transferred malice. D was convicted of possessing a firearm with intent to endanger life, attempted murder and, by way of joint enterprise, the murder of the passer-by. Lord Dyson felt that it was not possible to uphold D's liability on the basis that D's act of shooting was a cause of the death. If P's act of shooting at D was a free, deliberate and informed act, it broke the chain of causation between D's shooting at P and P's shooting and killing V.⁵⁶ His lordship agreed with Lord Clarke that the court could not uphold the conviction on the basis that D caused P to fire the fatal shot. But Lord Clarke took the view that the mere fact that the immediate cause of the death was a criminal and deliberate act on the part of P does not as a matter of law break the chain of causation.⁵⁷ It might have been possible to hold D liable for murder on the basis of his shot at P, but that was not left to the jury.⁵⁸ Resurrecting the debate about secondary liability and causation would be undesirable after the House of Lords had so definitively and succinctly clarified the law in Kennedy (No 2).⁵⁹ It is submitted that the statement from Lord Bingham quoted earlier should be faithfully followed.⁶⁰

6.3.1 Innocent agency

The actus reus of a crime may be directly brought about by the conduct of someone who has no mens rea, or who has some defence,⁶¹ for example infancy or insanity. Such a person is usually described as an 'innocent agent'.⁶² The principal offender in such a case is the participant whose act is the most immediate⁶³ cause of the innocent agent's act. Examples are plentiful. If D sends to V through the post a letter-bomb which injures V when it explodes, the postman who delivers the letter being unaware of its contents is an innocent agent. If D, intending to kill V, provides to V's daughter a poison which he says will cure V's cold, and the daughter innocently (ie without knowing the true nature of the drug) administers the poison, causing V's death, then D is guilty of murder as the principal offender and the daughter is an innocent agent.⁶⁴ If in these examples the daughter or the postman had mens rea then he or she would, of course, be a principal offender. Where D, an employee, makes a false statement to his employer's accountant, knowing that the statement will be entered in the accounts, and the innocent accountant does enter it, D is guilty, as a principal offender, of falsifying his employer's accounts.⁶⁵ Where D induces a child, aged nine, to take money from a till and give it to D, D is a principal offender as the child is exempt from criminal ⁵⁶ [2011] UKSC 59, [106].

⁵⁷ The only case his lordship relied upon was Page (1983) 76 Cr App R 279. In that case, however, PP were police officers acting in the execution of a duty and/or in self-defence, which is why it could be said that their acts were no longer voluntary and were caused by D in the strict sense of the term.

⁵⁸ [2011] UKSC 59, [91]. ⁵⁹ [2007] UKHL 37.

⁶⁰ Lord Kerr in dissent in Gnango placed significant reliance upon Lord Bingham's dicta in Kennedy (No 2). His lordship observed that even if it could be said that D's firing at P made it more likely that P would fire again, that is simply insufficient to demonstrate that D caused P to shoot.

⁶¹ Other than duress: Bourne (1952) 36 Cr App R 125.

⁶² See P Alldridge, 'The Doctrine of Innocent Agency' (1990) 2 Crim Law Forum 45; G Williams, 'Innocent Agency and Causation' (1992) 3 Crim Law Forum 289; RD Taylor, 'Complicity and Excuses' [1983] Crim LR 656.

⁶³ This description of relative proximity can be problematical. D1 passes poison to D2, who passes it to D3 who, unaware that it is poison, passes it to V who dies. D3 is the innocent agent. Is D2 the principal offender and D1 a secondary party? Are both D1 and D2 principal offenders? See Smith, A Modern Treatise on Complicity, 98. We are grateful to David Hughes for this example.

⁶⁴ Anon (1634) Kel 53; Michael (1840) 9 C & P 356.

⁶⁵ Butt (1884) 15 Cox CC 564.

liability. If the child is over ten and liable to conviction, then he is the principal offender if he has mens rea and D is an accessory.⁶⁶

There are some crimes to which the doctrine of innocent agency is inapplicable because it is impossible to say that D has personally performed the conduct required by the definition of the actus reus.⁶⁷ Bigamy⁶⁸ is a good example. Compare it with murder. If D causes an innocent person, say the postman E, to kill V by delivering a letter which E does not know contains a bomb, it is right for the law to take the view that D has killed V—the actus reus of murder. In contrast take the case of bigamy, if D knows that F is married, but induces E, an innocent person who has no knowledge of F's marital status, to marry F it is impossible to say that D has married during the lifetime of his wife—the actus reus of bigamy. He has not done so. The innocent agency doctrine seems equally inapplicable, it is submitted, in rape and other crimes involving sexual intercourse.⁶⁹ After Jogee, to be an accessory, D must intend P to have mens rea. Innocent agency therefore appears to be an exception to this rule, although the issue was not discussed in Jogee.

6.3.2 Joint principal offenders

There may be more than one person engaged in perpetrating the conduct element of the actus reus of the principal offence. So there may be two or more principal offenders in the same crime. If D1 and D2 make an attack on V intending to kill or cause him serious injury and the combined effect of their blows is to kill him, both are guilty of murder⁷⁰ as joint principal offenders. A different type of joint responsibility is where each of two or more parties does an act which is an element of, or part of, the actus reus of the principal offence.⁷¹

There is, however, no joint principalship if D induces another person, P (not an innocent agent), by persuasion or otherwise, to commit the offence: that does not amount to D causing the actus reus. P's voluntary intervening act 'breaks the chain of causation'⁷² so that D is not a principal offender. P is the principal offender; D may be an accessory.⁷³

What if the principal offender himself is not present at the moment of the completion of the crime? This can arise in the context of innocent agency. If D1 and D2 agree to employ an innocent agent, E, both D1 and D2 are liable as principal offenders for E's acts when they are committed and it is immaterial that E was instructed by the one in the absence of the other.⁷⁴ The innocent agent's acts are considered the acts of both conspirators.⁷⁵ Where there is no innocent agent, the same considerations cannot apply. D encourages or assists P, who leaves poison to be taken by V, or sets a trap into which V falls. D is liable as a secondary party; P as the principal offender.

⁶⁶ Manley (1844) 1 Cox CC 104 In DPP v K & B [1997] 1 Cr App R 36, DC, it was said, obiter, that if D procured a child under ten to have sexual intercourse without consent, D could not be guilty of rape because there would be no actus reus. That seems wrong: see [1997] Crim LR 121, 122. See also Mazeau (1840) 9 C & P 676.

⁶⁷ cf Woby v AJB and LCO [1986] Crim LR 183, DC (boys under 18 not guilty of buying intoxicating liquor in licensed premises when they sent in an adult to buy it).

⁶⁸ Except in the case of a marriage by proxy.

⁶⁹ There are dicta in Cogan and Leak [1976] QB 217, [1975] Crim LR 584, p 223, that rape may be committed through an innocent agent but these are contrary to principle. The Law Commission propose replacing the innocent agency doctrine with a specific offence; see p 234.

⁷⁰ Macklin and Murphy's Case (1838) 2 Lew CC 225.

⁷¹ Bingley (1821) Russ & Ry 446 (A and B each forged part of a banknote).

⁷² See Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38.

⁷³ Or under ss 44–46 of the SCA 2007 depending on his mens rea.

⁷⁴ This qualifies the idea that generally the principal is the person who is the immediate cause of the conduct element of the actus reus.

⁷⁵ Bull and Schmidt (1845) 1 Cox CC 281. Arguably D1 is liable as an accessory to D2 who causes E to act.

6.3.3 Joint principals or principal and accessory?

The distinction between a joint principal offender and a secondary party is sometimes a fine one. There is a view that all who act together with a common purpose are principal offenders.⁷⁶ That would mean that if D provided assistance to P by providing a gun for him to murder V and P alone fired the shot, D might be liable as a principal for murder if he shared P's purpose to kill V, even though D did not perform the actus reus of murder. This is not the law in England.⁷⁷ As noted, under s 8 of the 1861 Act generally it is immaterial whether D is alleged to have participated in the crime as principal or accessory. Either way, he is equally responsible and liable to conviction. When it is necessary to distinguish, the test would seem to be: did D by his own act (as distinct from anything done by P with D's advice or assistance) contribute to the actus reus? If he did, he is a principal or joint principal offender. The distinction may be important where the jury acquit P and convict D. If D caused the actus reus by his own act, he is a principal offender and there is no problem. But, if he did not, there is a difficulty. If P is innocent, there is no crime which D can have aided or abetted. The difficulty can be overcome (a) if P can be regarded as an innocent agent, or (b) under a somewhat uncertain principle⁷⁸ that it is an offence for D to procure the commission of P's actus reus;⁷⁹ but it is surely wrong to overcome it by a fiction, a pretence that D 'did it', if he did not.

Where the actus reus is a 'state of affairs'⁸⁰—for example, being in the UK illegally—the test for determining who is a principal offender is: ignoring D, does the statutory description of the state of affairs fit P?

6.4 The liability of secondary parties who assist or encourage crime

To be liable as a secondary party, a person who is not the principal offender must be proved to have aided, abetted, counselled⁸¹ or procured, though it is quite sufficient to show that he did one of these things.⁸²

An accessory is liable when and where the principal offence he has aided, abetted, counselled or procured is committed. So an employer, D, who sends P to drive a lorry, which D and P know to be in a dangerous condition, from Scotland to England may be held liable in England for a death caused by P in England because of the lorry's condition.⁸³

⁷⁶ Some jurisdictions adopt such a rule. See in Australia Osland v R (1998) 73 ALJR 173, HC of A. See further JC Smith, 'Joint Enterprise and Secondary Liability' (1999) 50 NILQ 153; cf A Simester, 'The Mental Element in Complicity' (2006) 122 LQR 578.

⁷⁷ See, historically, Stephen's Digest, arts 37 and 38. In Gnango [2011] UKSC 59 the approach adopted by Lords Brown and Clarke comes close to suggesting that D can be the principal even though he has not caused the actus reus of the substantive offence. With respect, this is incorrect for the reasons given above. Cf GR Sullivan, 'Accessories and Principals after Gnango' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013); R Buxton, 'Being an Accessory to One's Own Murder' [2012] Crim LR 275 and G Virgo, 'Joint Enterprise is Dead: Long Live Accessorial Liability' [2012] Crim LR 850.

⁷⁸ See p 223. ⁷⁹ Millward, p 223. ⁸⁰ See p 42.

⁸¹ 'Counselling' must not be taken literally. Mere incitement to commit an offence, not followed by its actual commission, is not 'counselling'—Assistant Recorder of Kingston-upon-Hull, ex p Morgan [1969] 2 QB 58, DC.

⁸² Ferguson v Weaving [1951] KB 814.

⁸³ Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd [1970] 2 QB 54. See Law Commission proposals on jurisdiction: LC 305, Ch 6.

6.4.1 Actus reus of the accessory

The actus reus and mens rea of the principal offender will be prescribed by the relevant statute or common law, so with murder it would be killing a human being with malice aforethought, etc; with assault it will be intentionally or recklessly causing a person to apprehend immediate unlawful personal violence, etc. If D is alleged to be an accessory to any crime, his liability as an accessory comprises the actus reus of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring, with the relevant mens rea of an accessory (intention to assist, intention for P to have mens rea, knowledge of the relevant circumstances rendering P's act criminal). The conduct sufficient to satisfy the elements of being an accessory will often contrast starkly with the requirements of the principal offence. In a case of murder, D can be convicted as an accessory as a result of conduct that consists of no more than acting as a lookout whereas P must be shown to have killed V, but under s 8 of the 1861 Act both D and P will be convicted as murderers, labelled as such and punished as such.

It is important to remember that there is no secondary liability for a person whose participation in the relevant events does not involve him advising or encouraging P to commit the crime, and who does not assist P in the commission of it in any way. Accepting a lift on a motorbike known to have been taken without consent does not amount to aiding and abetting the use of the vehicle without insurance.⁸⁴ It would be different if D had participated in or assisted/encouraged the taking.⁸⁵ Liability as an accessory does not extend to cases where D has not assisted or encouraged in fact, but has merely attempted or conspired to do so.⁸⁶

Once encouragement or assistance is proved to have been given by D, the Supreme Court in *Jogee*⁸⁷ stated that the prosecution does not have to prove that it had a positive effect on either P's conduct or the outcome. The court expressed concern that such a positive effect would, in many cases, be impossible to prove. The example given by the court is where there were many supporters encouraging P. The court stated that it would be difficult to prove that the encouragement of a single one made a difference. According to the court, that does not mean that D will be guilty if he counselled P to commit the offence many years before. The Supreme Court held that it is ultimately a question of fact and degree whether D's act of assistance or encouragement was so distanced in time, place or circumstances from the conduct of P that it would be unrealistic to regard P's offence as having been encouraged or assisted by it.

It is submitted that there is a risk that these comments will be taken out of context. If it is truly the case that there is no requirement for D's act of assistance or encouragement to have had a positive effect on P, then why does it matter whether D's conduct was committed a long time ago, or has faded to the point of mere background? It is respectfully submitted that the Supreme Court in Jogee may have overstated its position. As was discussed earlier, secondary liability is not based upon causation, so the Supreme Court was correct not to resurrect the misleading proposition that D's act of assistance or encouragement must have caused P to commit the offence in question. As Toulson LJ confirmed in Stringer, however, there must be some connecting link between D's act of assistance or encouragement and P's offence. Therefore, whilst it is true that the prosecution does not have to prove that D's act of assistance or encouragement was the cause of D's conduct, there must be some connecting link between the two. In most cases, the presence of this connecting link will be self-evident. In more marginal cases, the sufficiency of the connecting link between D's act

⁸⁴ D (Infant) v Parsons [1960] 1 WLR 797.

⁸⁵ Ross v Rivenall [1959] 1 WLR 713. Cf the Theft Act 1968, s 12(1) and Boldizar v Knight [1980] Crim LR 653, p 914.

⁸⁶ Kenning [2008] EWCA Crim 1534. Liability might arise under the SCA 2007, ss 44–46 or for conspiracy.

⁸⁷ [2016] UKSC 8, [12].

of assistance or encouragement and P's conduct will be a question of fact and degree, taking into consideration all the surrounding circumstances. It is disappointing that the Supreme Court in Jogee chose to 'fudge'⁸⁸ this issue and rely so much upon the jury to decide whether D made a sufficient contribution to be liable as an accessory to P's offence. The decision not to engage with this issue directly perhaps reveals a lack of clarity on the theoretical foundations underpinning secondary liability.

It is also necessary to bear in mind that in Jogee the Supreme Court abolished what had become known as the 'fundamental difference rule', which enabled D to avoid liability if the weapon P used to kill V was more dangerous than any weapon D contemplated he might use.⁸⁹ The Supreme Court did state, however, that 'it is possible for death to be caused by some overwhelming supervening act by the perpetrator which nobody in the defendant's shoes could have contemplated might happen and is of such a character as to relegate his acts to history'.⁹⁰ In such a case, the court stated that D will bear no responsibility for the death. The court's use of the concept of an 'overwhelming supervening event' has replaced the fundamental difference rule and is arguably of broader application.⁹¹ The trial judge is not required, however, to direct the jury in such terms in every case. In Ibrar, for example, Hallett LJ concluded that on the facts of the case, P's use of a knife was not an 'overwhelming supervening act' that D could not have contemplated so as to require the judge to direct the jury more fully on the issue of fundamental departure.⁹² The Supreme Court's reliance upon the concept suggests a degree of incoherence. The court holds that D's conduct need not have a causative impact on P's crime (causation not necessary to inculcate D), but when considering the exculpation, the court's use of the language of supervening event is that associated with a break in the chain of causation (causation is relevant to exculpation).

6.4.1.1 Aid, abet, counsel, procure

In A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) Lord Widgery CJ said:

We approach s 8 of the 1861 Act on the basis that the words should be given their ordinary meaning, if possible. We approach the section on the basis also that if four words are employed here, 'aid, abet, counsel or procure', the probability is that there is a difference between each of those four words and the other three, because, if there were no such difference, then Parliament would be wasting time in using four words where two or three would do.⁹³

The four words had previously been regarded as technical terms and it is clear that they cannot be given their ordinary meaning in all respects.⁹⁴

In the modern law, secondary participation almost invariably consists of 'assisting' or 'encouraging' the commission of the crime. In Jogee, the Supreme Court held that the requisite conduct element is that D has encouraged or assisted the commission of the offence by ⁸⁸ M Dyson, 'Letter to the Editor' [2016] Crim LR 638.

⁸⁹ Powell and Daniels; English [1999] 1 AC 1, 30. Historically, the doctrine also applied if the principal committed the murder in a manner not contemplated by the secondary party. The secondary party's knowledge that the principal was in possession of a weapon is now relevant to the jury's assessment of whether he possessed the requisite intent. See p 201.

⁹⁰ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [97]. The Supreme Court cited Anderson and Morris [1966] 2 QB 110; Wesley [1963] 1 WLR 1200.

⁹¹ cf M Dyson, 'Shorn-Off Complicity' (2016) 75 CLJ 196.

⁹² [2017] EWCA Crim 1841.

⁹³ [1975] 2 All ER 684 at 686.

⁹⁴ Under the old law of felonies, 'aiding and abetting' was used to describe the activity of the principal 'in the second degree' and 'counselling and procuring' that of the accessory before the fact: Ferguson v Weaving, n 82, at 818–819; Stephen, Digest (4th edn) arts 37–39; Bowker v Premier Drug Co Ltd [1928] 1 KB 217 ('aid and abet' implies presence). Aid and abet was, however, sometimes used in relation to acts committed before the actual perpetration of the crime.

P.⁹⁵ As this section will discuss, the terms used in s 8 have historically been interpreted to mean subtly different things.

The only possible exception to the use of the terms ‘assisting’ or ‘encouraging’ may be the procurer who succeeds in causing the principal to commit the crime (as in the A-G’s Reference) without doing anything which could be fairly described as encouragement or assistance. Assisting or encouraging can be by practically any means—supply of weapons, tools, information, support, keeping watch, filming an attack on a mobile phone, etc. It is generally irrelevant whether the accessory is present or absent or whether his assistance or encouragement was given before or at the time of the commission of the offence.

All four words—aid, abet, counsel, procure—may be used together to charge a person, D, who is alleged to have participated in an offence otherwise than as a principal offender.⁹⁶ As long as the evidence establishes that D’s conduct satisfied one of the words, that is enough to prove his actus reus as an accessory. However, where the indictment uses only one term—for example, ‘procures’—it is necessary to prove that D’s conduct fits that term.

Each element of the actus reus of the accessory deserves further brief examination to consider three particular issues: (a) what forms of conduct constitute aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring; (b) whether there need be a causal link between the aiding, etc and the principal offence; and (c) whether there need be a meeting of minds or consensus between the aider, etc and the principal offender.

In short, the law is almost certainly that:

- (1) ‘aiding’ requires actual assistance but neither consensus nor causation;⁹⁷
- (2) ‘abetting’ and ‘counselling’ imply consensus but not causation;
- (3) ‘procuring’ implies causation but not consensus.

Aiding

It has sometimes been said⁹⁸ that ‘aid and abet’ is a single concept, ‘aid’ denoting the actus reus and ‘abet’, the mens rea. The natural meaning of s 8 is, however, that stated in the A-G’s Reference. Moreover, the words aid and abet do connote different kinds of activity. The natural meaning of to ‘aid’ is to ‘give help, support or assistance to’.⁹⁹ The courts have taken a broad view of what suffices for ‘aid’. Although historically the term was commonly used to describe someone present assisting the principal at the time of the offence, there is now no such restriction.

Aiding can be satisfied by any act of assistance before or at the time of the offence.¹⁰⁰ Supplying a weapon or transporting P to the scene of the crime¹⁰¹ are obvious examples.

Aiding does not imply any causal connection between D’s act and P’s. D may assist P and enable him to commit the offence more easily, earlier or with greater safety and, if so, D is surely guilty even if P would have committed the same offence if D had not intervened.¹⁰²

⁹⁵ [2016] UKSC 8, [8].

⁹⁶ Re Smith (1858) 3 H & N 227; Ferguson v Weaving [1951] KB 814.

⁹⁷ cf Stephen, Digest (4th edn) who argued that D who abets or counsels or commands (as well as procures) is liable and, by implication liable only, for an offence ‘which is committed in consequence of such counselling, procuring, or commandment’.

⁹⁸ Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland [1975] 1 All ER 913 at 941, per Lord Simon quoting the 3rd edition of this book and Devlin J in National Coal Board v Gamble [1959] 1 QB 11 at 20.

⁹⁹ Oxford English Dictionary. ¹⁰⁰ Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534.

¹⁰¹ See eg Nedrick-Smith [2006] EWHC 3015 (Admin) where D3 was a party to D2 and D1 attacking V in her home. D3 drove them and stood watching as they attacked. The magistrates were entitled to find her guilty as an accessory.

¹⁰² See WR Le Fave and AW Scott, Criminal Law (1986) 504. See also Luffman [2008] EWCA Crim 1739, n 116. Cf Mendez, n 46.

In Bryce,¹⁰³ however, the court seemed to imply a causal requirement. D was convicted of murder as an accessory. In the course of a drug dealers' dispute D assisted P, who was acting on the orders of the gang leader B. D transported P and a gun to a caravan near V's home. More than 12 hours later, P, acting alone, shot V. D's ground of appeal was that the delay meant that what D did (transporting P) was too remote in time and place to the killing to constitute assistance, particularly since at that stage P had not formed the intention to kill. The Court of Appeal, after a comprehensive survey of the case law, upheld D's conviction concluding that no intervening event occurred hindering the plan, this despite the fact that in the 12-hour delay P's gun barrel was shortened and B visited P to encourage him. The court concluded that there was no 'overwhelming supervening event' sufficient to break the chain of causation, nor had D effected a withdrawal in that time. This implies a causal requirement. More explicit statements to this effect were made in *Mendez*¹⁰⁴ discussed earlier. In light of the explanation given in Stringer,¹⁰⁵ and the powerful statement of Lord Bingham for a unanimous House of Lords in Kennedy (No 2), it is submitted that despite these dicta, it remains the case that there is no need for D's acts to have caused the commission of the actus reus of the principal offence. This is supported by the statements of the Supreme Court in Jogee.¹⁰⁶ Although there must be some link between D and P in the sense that D must have provided assistance or encouragement in fact, that is a far cry from establishing causation.¹⁰⁷

Nor does aiding imply any consensus between D and P. If D sees P committing a crime and comes to his assistance by, for example, restraining the policeman who would have prevented P from committing the crime, D is surely guilty even though his assistance is unforeseen and unwanted by P and unknown to him. The same might apply to aid given beforehand. D, knowing that P is going to meet a blackmailer, V, slips a gun into P's pocket in the hope that he will kill V—which P does.¹⁰⁸

Abetting

The natural meaning of 'abet' is 'to incite, instigate or encourage'.¹⁰⁹ Abetting is usually defined in terms of encouragement. There is little to distinguish abetting from counselling;¹¹⁰ perhaps there is no difference except that historically 'abet' was used to refer to encouragement at the time of the offence and 'counsel' to encouragement at an earlier time.¹¹¹ It is clear that either type of activity is sufficient to found liability as an accessory.

The natural meaning of 'abet' does not imply any causal element, because the word (like counselling¹¹²) does not even imply that the offence has been committed.¹¹³ As a matter of law, however, the principal offence must have been committed before anyone can be convicted as an abettor or counsellor of it.¹¹⁴ But, even when the principal offence has been committed, it is true to say that D 'abetted' or 'counselled' it, in the ordinary ¹⁰³ [2004] EWCA Crim 1231. D would be liable for an offence under s 45 or 46 of the SCA 2007.

¹⁰⁴ [2010] EWCA Crim 516. ¹⁰⁵ See p 181. ¹⁰⁶ At [12].

¹⁰⁷ Virgo suggests that 'association' might provide the link. See G Virgo, 'Joint Enterprise is Dead: Long Live Accessorial Liability' [2012] Crim LR 850.

¹⁰⁸ D would on those facts be liable under s 44 of the SCA 2007. The passage in the text was quoted with approval by the Court of Appeal in Fury [2006] EWCA Crim 1258.

¹⁰⁹ Oxford English Dictionary.

¹¹⁰ Lord Widgery's analysis of the four terms leaves considerable confusion. His lordship suggests that 'abet' and 'counsel' do imply different forms of activity.

¹¹¹ Per Lowry CJ in DPP v Maxwell [1978] 3 All ER 1140, 1158.

¹¹² See eg Wilcox v Jeffery [1951] 1 All ER 464; p 195; Du Cros v Lambourne [1907] KB 40.

¹¹³ As a matter of ordinary language one would say that D had instigated, incited, encouraged, counselled, P even though P did not then commit the principal offence.

¹¹⁴ Liability under the SCA 2007, Part 2 will arise if the anticipated offence does not occur. See p 474.

meaning of the words, even if his encouragement or counsel was ignored by P. Abetting and counselling may be treated alike on causation and, although historically there was scholarly opinion to the contrary,¹¹⁵ the courts have unequivocally confirmed that there need not be any causal link between D's encouragement and P's commission of the offence in a case alleging counselling: Luffman.¹¹⁶ The Supreme Court adopted the same approach in Jogee.¹¹⁷

Where the prosecution relies on counselling as the basis for D's secondary liability it must, however, establish that the commission of the offence was within the scope of the principal's authority.¹¹⁸ Requiring proof of causation in abetting or counselling cases would present problems. To require that before D could be liable as an accessory his abetting/counselling must have caused P to commit the principal offence could, if causation is interpreted strictly, be to insist that, but for D's abetting/counselling, P's offence would not have been committed.¹¹⁹ This would confine abetting and counselling much too narrowly. Moreover, D would then not be liable if, when he encouraged P, he knew that P had already made up his mind to commit the offence.¹²⁰ That is not to deny that D must have counselled in fact:¹²¹ proffered advice or encouragement which has no effect on the mind of P is not counselling.¹²²

As for consensus, there must be some connection between D's abetting (or counselling) and the commission of the principal offence. It is probably not necessary to prove that P was influenced in any way by D, but P must at least be aware that he has the authority, or the encouragement or the approval, of D to do the relevant acts.

For example, if the principal offender happened to be involved in a football riot in the course of which he laid about him with a weapon of some sort and killed someone who, unknown to him, was the person whom he had been counselled to kill, he would not, in our view, have been acting within the scope of his authority; he would have been acting outside it, albeit what he had done was what he had been counselled to do.¹²³

It was suggested in A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) that in the case of abetting and counselling the concepts might require a meeting of minds of secondary party and principal. If counselling and abetting must be, in some degree, operative, as suggested previously, this is clearly right.¹²⁴

¹¹⁵ Stephen argued that if D is charged with abetting or counselling, his acts must have caused P to commit the offence. Stephen, Digest (4th edn) art 39. On his view, D who abets or counsels or commands (as well as procures) P is liable only for an offence by P 'which is committed in consequence of such counselling, procuring, or commandment'.

¹¹⁶ [2008] EWCA Crim 1752. See also the explanation by Toulson LJ in Stringer [2011] EWCA Crim 1396 (p 181).

¹¹⁷ At [12]. ¹¹⁸ Calhaem [1985] QB 808, CA.

¹¹⁹ '... it does not make any difference that the person [sc, the person counselled] would have tried to commit suicide anyway': A-G v Able [1984] 1 All ER 277 at 288, per Woolf J.

¹²⁰ Giannetto [1997] 1 Cr App R 1, [1996] Crim LR 722. Trial judge's example: 'I am going to kill your wife'; husband: 'Oh goody.'

¹²¹ But, it is clearly the law that an attempt to counsel does not amount to counselling. Liability for D's acts capable of encouraging P arises under ss 44–46 of the SCA 2007, and this includes attempts by D to encourage P which fail to do so.

¹²² Clarkson [1971] 1 WLR 1402, C-MAC.

¹²³ Calhaem [1985] QB 808, CA, per Parker LJ; Schriek [1997] 2 NZLR 139, 149. Cf the view taken in W Wilson, Criminal Law Doctrine (2008).

¹²⁴ Consider the case of D, a persistent troublemaker, who comes across P and V in the middle of an argument. D urges P to punch V. Just before doing so, P tells D to 'mind your own business'. See LC 305, Appendix B, para B.63.

Counselling

To 'counsel' means to advise or solicit or encourage. The relevance of causation and consensus has been examined in the discussion of abetting in the previous section.

Procuring

'To procure means to produce by endeavour.'¹²⁵ 'You cannot procure an offence unless there is a causal link between what you do and the commission of the offence.'¹²⁶ In A-G's Reference, D added alcohol to P's drink without P's knowledge or consent. P drove home and thereby committed a strict liability offence of driving with a blood/alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit.¹²⁷ D was held to have procured that offence by P if it was proved that D knew that P was going to drive and that the ordinary and natural result of the added alcohol would be to bring P's blood/alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit. D had caused the actus reus (circumstance element) of the offence by putting P over the limit. This is in accordance with the natural meaning of 'procure'.¹²⁸ It is different if the driver is aware of the 'lacing'. In that situation P has, by his free, informed act of choosing to imbibe the laced drink, caused the actus reus (circumstance element) of the offence.¹²⁹ D might then be convicted as an accessory to P's offence of drink-driving on the basis that, although D has not procured its commission, he has certainly assisted its commission.¹³⁰

What must be proved by way of a causal link in procuring? Glanville Williams cast doubt on the language of the court in A-G's Reference.¹³¹ Williams relied on the facts of the famous case of *Beatty v Gillbanks*¹³² to suggest that causation and procuring are not synonymous. In Beatty, Salvation Army members held a lawful meeting in Weston-super-Mare even though the members knew from experience that this would cause a hostile organization, 'the Skeleton Army', to attack them. The Salvation Army members clearly anticipated that the Skeleton Army would attack them and that the attack would result in damage to others, for example broken shop windows. Williams regarded it as absurd to say that the Salvationists were liable as accessories for the attack on themselves.

There are three responses to Williams' criticism: (a) Lord Widgery did not say that 'procure' means merely 'cause'. He said 'To procure means to produce by endeavour.' The Salvationists may have caused the Skeletons to make the attack (and to break the supposed windows) but these were certainly not results that they were 'endeavouring' to produce. Against this, it might be said that in A-G's Reference, D's awareness that he was causing the commission of the offence also fell short of proof of an endeavour to cause it; and, in Blakely,¹³³ the court thought obiter that D 'procured' a result if he contemplated it as a possible result of his act—which is far removed from endeavouring to produce it. (b) The Skeletons knew exactly what they were doing and in A-G's Reference Lord Widgery made it clear that the decision would not necessarily be the same where a driver knew that his drink was laced. The unaware driver 'in most instances... would have no means of preventing the offence from being committed', whereas the aware driver would. Lord Widgery thus contemplated that the act of the aware driver might break the chain of causation even for the purposes of secondary liability, but it is unclear whether his lordship meant that there would be no secondary liability. (c) The Supreme Court ¹²⁵ A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975) [1975] 2 All ER 684 at 686; Reed [1982] Crim LR 819. See KJM Smith, 'Complicity and Causation' [1986] Crim LR 663; H Beynon, 'Causation, Omissions and Complicity' [1987] Crim LR 539.

¹²⁶ ibid., 687.

¹²⁷ Road Traffic Act 1972, s 6(1), now replaced by Road Traffic Act 1988, s 5.

¹²⁸ cf P Glazebrook, 'Attempting to Procure' [1959] Crim LR 774.

¹²⁹ See Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38.

¹³⁰ LC 300, para 5.25.

¹³¹ 'in so far as [it] purports to decide that merely causing an offence can be said to be a procuring of it, it should be regarded as too incautious a generalisation'.

¹³² (1882) 9 QBD 308; TBCL, 339.

¹³³ See p 190.

in *Gnango*¹³⁴ accepted that D could be liable as an accessory to a crime on himself where he encouraged P in the commission of that crime. That extension, making D liable as a secondary party to crimes on himself, would seem to apply at least if the Salvationists and the Skeletons 'formed a mutual plan or agreement to have a fight'. If this approach were held to apply generally, it would mean that in the context of a street brawl, P would be liable for inflicting GBH on D and D would be liable as an accessory to his own GBH provided he were taken to have encouraged P to hit him, which would be possible even if P threw the first punch. The Supreme Court recognized that this could lead to incongruous results and advised restraint on the part of prosecuting authorities.¹³⁵ Liability is of course subject to D having the requisite mens rea.

If D procures X, an innocent agent, to commit an offence D is taken to have caused the actus reus for all purposes.¹³⁶ If D procures P, a guilty agent, to commit the offence, to be liable as an accessory D must be proved to have in fact 'produced by endeavour' the act of P; but, in law, D is not regarded as having caused the actus reus.

In A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975), D's act of procuring was done without the knowledge or consent, and perhaps against the will, of P. The impact of Jogee on procuring is unclear. As discussed later, D must intend P to have the mens rea for the offence. In cases such as this, D did not have that intent. Whether procuring will be treated as an exception to Jogee remains to be seen.

6.4.1.2 The timing of the accessory's assistance/encouragement

Assistance given by D before P even starts to commit the principal offence may be sufficient to found D's liability as an accessory if P then completes the offence. What is more important is to ascertain whether D has assisted or encouraged P before P has concluded the offence. Assistance given when P is no longer in the course of the commission of the offence—for example, help to enable P to escape or to reap the benefits of the commission of the offence—does not make D an accessory. Where P broke into a warehouse, stole butter and deposited it in the street 30 yards from the warehouse door, D who then came to assist in carrying it off was held not guilty of abetting P's theft.¹³⁷ Assistance given by D to a murderer, after his victim is dead or to a rapist after the act of penetration has concluded, does not render D an accessory.¹³⁸ D who, without any pre-arranged plan, joins P in an attack on V after V has received a fatal injury, is not guilty of homicide (though he may be guilty of an attempt) if his action in no way contributes to V's subsequent death.¹³⁹ If D1 and D2 carry out an armed robbery, and D3 drives past the bank as D1 and D2 flee from the scene of the crime with the proceeds, is D3 a party to the robbery if he allows D1 and D2 to get in the car to make good their escape?¹⁴⁰

6.4.1.3 Omission as a sufficient actus reus of secondary liability?

As discussed in Ch 2, the law does not generally impose criminal liability for a failure to act. In the context of secondary liability, the question that arises is whether D's omission to ¹³⁴ [2011] UKSC 59.

¹³⁵ For criticism, see R Buxton, 'Being an Accessory to One's Own Murder' [2012] Crim LR 275, 280. For similar criticism, see GR Sullivan, 'Accessories and Principals after Gnango' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013).

¹³⁶ The driver whose drink, unknown to him, is 'laced' is not an innocent agent because the offence he is guilty of is a strict liability offence.

¹³⁷ King (1817) Russ & Ry 332; see also Kelly (1820) Russ & Ry 421.

¹³⁸ The act is a continuing one: Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 79.

¹³⁹ S v Thomo 1969 (1) SA 385 (AD); EM Burchell and PMA Hunt, South African Criminal Law and Procedure (1970) 352. Some fine distinctions have begun to be drawn. In Grundy (1989) 89 Cr App R 333, it was held that if D struck a blow to V after P had caused grievous bodily harm, D might still be liable for assisting grievous bodily harm. In Percival [2003] EWCA Crim 1561, D who punched V after P had wounded V could not be liable as an aider and abettor to wounding.

¹⁴⁰ See also Self [1992] Crim LR 574 and commentary.

prevent P committing the crime is sufficient to make D an accessory. Two categories of case need to be distinguished.

First, there are the established categories in which the law imposes a duty on an individual to act. Thus, a husband who stands by and watches his wife drown their children is guilty as an accessory to the homicide, subject to his having the requisite mens rea.¹⁴¹

Secondly, the law extends liability even wider: where D has a power or right to control the actions of P and he deliberately refrains from exercising that control, his inactivity may be a positive encouragement to P to perform an illegal act and, therefore, an aiding and abetting by D subject to D's mens rea. So, for example, if a licensee of a pub stands by and watches his customers drinking after hours, he is guilty of aiding and abetting them in doing so.¹⁴² In Du Cros v Lambourne,¹⁴³ it was proved that D's car had been driven at a dangerous speed but it was not proved whether D or E was driving. It was held, nevertheless, that D could be convicted. If E was driving she was doing so in D's presence, with his consent and approval; for he was in control and could and ought to have prevented her from driving in a dangerous manner. D was equally liable whether he was a principal or an accessory.¹⁴⁴ The result would presumably have been different if it had been E's own car, for D would then have had no right of control, and could only have been convicted if proved to have actively encouraged E to drive at such speed.

In Webster,¹⁴⁵ the Court of Appeal approved Du Cros v Lambourne, holding that 'a defendant might be convicted of aiding and abetting dangerous driving if the driver drives dangerously in the owner's presence and with the owner's consent and approval'.¹⁴⁶ Webster emphasizes that it must be proved that D knew of those features of P's driving which rendered it dangerous and failed to take action within a reasonable time.¹⁴⁷ The court in Webster recognized the:

need to establish not only knowledge of the dangerous driving but knowledge at a time when there was an opportunity to intervene....We conclude that the prosecution had to prove that [D] knew that [P] was, by virtue of the speed the vehicle was travelling, driving dangerously at a time when there was an opportunity to intervene. It was [D's] failure to take that opportunity and, exercise his right as owner of the vehicle, which would lead to the inference that he was associating himself with the dangerous driving.

In Baldessare,¹⁴⁸ P and D unlawfully took X's car and P drove it recklessly and caused V's death. It was held that D was guilty of manslaughter as an accessory. In this case (as prosecuting counsel put it):

The common purpose to drive recklessly was...shown by the fact that both men were driving in a car which did not belong to them and the jury were entitled to infer that the driver was the agent of the passenger. It matters not whose hand was actually controlling the car at the time.

In the more recent case of Martin,¹⁴⁹ D was convicted as an accessory to P's offence of causing death by dangerous driving. P was a learner driver and D was supervising him. P lost ¹⁴¹ Russell [1933] VLR 59.

¹⁴² Tuck v Robson [1970] 1 WLR 741, DC. The principal offence is committed by the drinkers, not the licensee.

¹⁴³ [1907] 1 KB 40; cf also Rubie v Faulkner [1940] 1 KB 571; Harris [1964] Crim LR 54. See D Lanham, 'Drivers, Control and Accomplices' [1982] Crim LR 419; M Wasik, 'A Learner's Careless Driving' [1982] Crim LR 411.

¹⁴⁴ cf Swindall and Osborne (1846) 2 Car & Kir 230; Salmon (1880) 6 QBD 79; Iremonger v Wynne [1957] Crim LR 624; G Williams, CLGP, 137 fn 23.

¹⁴⁵ [2006] EWCA Crim 415.

¹⁴⁶ The court quashed the conviction in that case on the ground that the trial judge had not directed the jury that they had to consider whether there was an opportunity for Webster to intervene.

¹⁴⁷ Dennis v Pight (1968) 11 FLR 458 at 463.

¹⁴⁸ (1930) 22 Cr App R 70.

¹⁴⁹ [2010] EWCA Crim 1450.

control of the vehicle on a bend and crashed, killing himself and a passenger.¹⁵⁰ Unlike Baldessare, there was no evidence that D had shared a common purpose with P to drive in this manner. The Court of Appeal, having considered Webster, tentatively proffered a direction that ought to have been given. D would be liable if: (a) P committed the offence; (b) D knew that P was driving in a manner which D knew fell far below the standard of a competent and careful driver [whether it is necessary for D to have knowledge is debatable]; (c) knowing that he had an opportunity to stop P from driving in that manner, D deliberately did not take that opportunity; and (d) by not taking that opportunity D intended to assist or encourage P to drive in this manner and D did in fact by his presence and failure to intervene encourage P to drive dangerously.¹⁵¹

Whichever category of exception (duty or control) is relied on to prove the actus reus by omission, it is not necessary that the inactive accessory be present at the commission of the offence. For example, a company and its directors may be convicted as accessories to the false making of tachograph records by the company's drivers if they knew that their inactivity was encouraging the practice on the roads miles away.¹⁵²

6.4.1.4 Mere presence at the crime as a sufficient basis for secondary liability?

Can D's mere voluntary presence at P's commission of the principal offence, without anything more, satisfy the actus reus of secondary liability? If there is some conduct on the part of D which goes beyond 'mere' presence, then the principles already discussed will apply. The question will be whether D assisted or encouraged P by his actions or by his failure to act when under a duty/power to control. Where the case involves D's mere presence, several issues will commonly call for consideration including: whether D voluntarily attended the location where an offence is being or is about to be committed; the effect that D's presence has on P; and D's state of mind when present.

Mere presence at the scene of a crime is capable of constituting encouragement or assistance, but D is not necessarily guilty as an accessory merely because he is present and does nothing to prevent P's crime.¹⁵³ In some cases, D's presence will constitute encouragement or assistance because he is present in pursuance of an agreement that the crime be committed. In other cases, D's presence may be sufficient even though there was no prior agreement,¹⁵⁴ and no positive act,¹⁵⁵ provided that by his presence D intentionally provides assistance or encouragement to the principal.¹⁵⁶ In Jogee, the Supreme Court observed that both association and presence are likely to be very relevant evidence on the question of whether assistance or encouragement was provided. The Supreme Court did confirm,

¹⁵⁰ The conviction for being an accessory to P causing his own death by dangerous driving was quashed as there is no such offence: it is an offence to cause the death of another by driving.

¹⁵¹ At [32] per Hooper LJ. A further possible element advanced by the court is not necessary (relating to D's foresight of death). See n 164 for discussion of the question whether liability might arise for D by reason of his participation in dangerous driving by P earlier in the journey, coupled with D's foresight that P might commit the offence of causing death by dangerous driving.

¹⁵² JF Alford Transport Ltd [1997] 2 Cr App R 326, [1997] Crim LR 745, citing the 8th edition of this book, at p 334. See also Gaunt [2003] EWCA Crim 3925, where D, the manager, failed to control P (employees) in racial harassment of V (employee).

¹⁵³ Atkinson (1869) 11 Cox CC 330; but it is an offence to refuse to assist a constable to suppress a breach of the peace when called upon to do so: Brown (1841) Car & M 314. See Ch 7.

¹⁵⁴ Rannath Mohan v R [1967] 2 AC 187.

¹⁵⁵ Wilcox v Jeffery [1951] 1 All ER 464.

¹⁵⁶ It is insufficient to prove that D arrived even only 30 seconds after P has finished attacking V if there is no evidence of D encouraging P: Rose [2004] EWCA Crim 764.

however, that neither association nor presence is necessarily proof of assistance or encouragement; it depends on the facts.¹⁵⁷

There are numerous examples of these principles in operation. D who stands outside a building while his friends commit a burglary inside cannot be convicted of burglary without proof that he was assisting or encouraging by, for example, acting as lookout.¹⁵⁸ Similarly, for D to continue to sit beside the driver of a car, P, until the end of a journey after learning that P is uninsured does not amount to abetting P's uninsured driving.¹⁵⁹ If D continues to share a room with a person known to be in unlawful possession of drugs, D is not an accessory unless encouragement or control is proved.¹⁶⁰ If prohibited drugs, found in a van belonging to a party of tourists, are the property of and under the exclusive control of one of them, the others are not guilty as accessories simply because they are present and know of the existence of the drugs.¹⁶¹

Both assistance or encouragement in fact and an intention to assist or encourage must be proved.¹⁶² When these are proved, it is immaterial that D joined in the offence without any prior agreement.¹⁶³ The same principle applies in the case of omissions as in that of positive acts, and it has been held that where two drivers, without any previous arrangement between them, enter into competitive driving on the highway so as knowingly to encourage each other to drive at a dangerous speed or in a dangerous manner, the one is liable as a secondary party for a death or other criminal result caused by the other.¹⁶⁴

Intention alone without encouragement or assistance in fact is insufficient. In Allan,¹⁶⁵ it was held that D who remains present at an affray, nursing a secret intention to help P if the need arises but doing nothing to evince that intention, does not thereby become an accessory. This was reiterated by the Privy Council in Robinson:¹⁶⁶

The commission of most criminal offences, and certainly most offences of violence, could be assisted by the forbidding presence of another as back-up and support. If D's presence could properly be held to amount to communicating to P (whether expressly or by implication) that he was there to help in any way he could if the opportunity or need arose, that was perfectly capable of amounting to aiding.... It is important to make clear to juries that mere approval of (ie 'assent' to, or 'concurrence' in) the offence by a bystander who gives no assistance, does not without more amount to aiding.¹⁶⁷

If some positive act of assistance or encouragement is voluntarily performed by D, with knowledge of the circumstances constituting the offence, it is irrelevant that it is not done

¹⁵⁷ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [11].

¹⁵⁸ S v DPP [2003] EWHC 2717 (Admin); L v CPS [2013] EWHC 4127 (Admin). See also Rose [2004] EWCA Crim 764 where D's only actions at the scene were to discourage P from his attack on V. Cf Ellis [2008] EWCA Crim 886.

¹⁵⁹ Smith v Baker [1971] RTR 350.

¹⁶⁰ Bland [1988] Crim LR 41; see also Kousar [2009] EWCA Crim 139.

¹⁶¹ Searle [1971] Crim LR 592 and commentary thereon; see also Montague [2013] EWCA Crim 1781, [2014] Crim LR 615 and commentary.

¹⁶² Clarkson [1971] 1 WLR 1402; Jones and Mirrless (1977) 65 Cr App R 250, CA.

¹⁶³ Rannath Mohan v R [1967] 2 AC 187.

¹⁶⁴ Turner [1991] Crim LR 57 and commentary. (Williams, TBCL, 360, thinks otherwise, citing Mastin (1834) 6 C & P 396.) If one of two racing drivers is killed, the other may be convicted of causing death by dangerous driving; and it is immaterial whether his act or that of the deceased was the immediate cause of death: Kimsey [1996] Crim LR 35; Lee [2006] EWCA Crim 240. See also Martin [2010] EWCA Crim 1450, n 149.

¹⁶⁵ [1965] 1 QB 130; see also Tansley v Painter (1968) 112 Sol Jo 1005; Danquah [2004] EWCA Crim 1248 (presence alone insufficient to show that Ds formed part of the gang that robbed V when no evidence of contribution to the intimidation or threats).

¹⁶⁶ [2011] UKPC 3.

¹⁶⁷ At [14] per Sir Anthony Hughes. This passage was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Robinson [2014] EWCA Crim 2385, [15].

with the motive or purpose of encouraging the crime.¹⁶⁸ Nevertheless, the onus on the Crown to prove D's intent can be a heavy one where liability is based solely on D's presence at the scene.¹⁶⁹

In the case of *Coney*¹⁷⁰ it was held that proof of D's mere voluntary presence at a prize-fight (illegal boxing match), without more, was, at the most, only prima facie and not conclusive evidence of abetting the offence of which the contestants were guilty. Presence at such an event is certainly capable of amounting to an actual encouragement. As has already been explained, this point was made by the Supreme Court in Jogee. If there were no spectators there would be no fight and, therefore, each spectator, by his presence, contributes to the incentive to the contestants. In the words of the Supreme Court, 'most people are bolder when supported or fortified by others than they are when they are alone'.¹⁷¹ Voluntary presence at such an event is some evidence on which a jury might find that D was there with the intention of encouraging P's fight. Coney's conviction was quashed because the majority of the court thought that the judge's direction was capable of being understood to mean that voluntary presence was conclusive evidence of an intention to encourage. If the direction had made it clear that presence was only prima facie evidence, no doubt the conviction would have been sustained. So, in Wilcox v Jeffrey,¹⁷² D was found to be an accessory by his presence at a public jazz performance by P. P was the celebrated American saxophonist Coleman Hawkins, who had been given permission to enter the UK only on condition that he would take no employment. D's presence at P's performance was a sufficient aiding and abetting of P in his contravention of the relevant immigration provisions. D's behaviour before and after P's performance supplied further evidence of D's intention to encourage P; he had met P at the airport and D afterwards reported the performance in laudatory terms in his jazz periodical. There was no finding that D applauded the performance. Had there been such a finding then the normal principles described earlier would apply—it would not have been a case of 'mere' voluntary presence but one of active encouragement by D.

Public order offences often raise particular problems in this context since the principal offence will often turn on proof of acts by a specific number of individuals, and in cases of spontaneous violence between groups, it is difficult to identify who is a principal involved in the fight, who is present actively encouraging and who is merely present without more.¹⁷³

Note that there is no requirement that D is present when P commits the offence. As Toulson LJ observed in Stringer: 'for centuries secondary liability has attached to a person who aided or abetted another to commit an offence but was absent at the time of the offence....To require D to be present assisting at the time of the offence is unsupported by authority and would be wrong in principle.' It is one thing to say that D cannot be liable as an aider or abettor unless P acted with D's assistance or encouragement when he committed the offence; it is quite another to suggest that the act or words providing the assistance or encouragement must be performed or spoken at the moment of the commission of the offence. Such a limitation would exclude, for example, a person who supplied a murder weapon in advance of the crime knowing the purpose for which P wanted it. The law would be defective if an aider and abettor could escape liability by saying that there was a gap in time between his conduct and the conduct of P. This makes the Supreme Court's statement in Jogee about an 'overwhelming supervening event' all the more obscure.

¹⁶⁸ National Coal Board v Gamble [1959] 1 QB 11; see p 198.

¹⁶⁹ eg Miah [2004] EWCA Crim 63.

¹⁷⁰ (1882) 8 QBD 534.

¹⁷¹ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [11].

¹⁷² [1951] 1 All ER 464. It is arguable that Art 11 of the ECHR may be engaged where the effect is to restrict D's right to assemble with others, see Holder, APOCL, 439.

¹⁷³ See Blackwood and others [2002] EWCA Crim 3102 and Ellis [2008] EWCA Crim 886.

6.4.1.5 Problems of proving the accessory's actus reus

If all that can be proved is that the principal offence was committed either by P1 or by P2, both must be acquitted.¹⁷⁴ Only if it can be proved that the one who did not commit the crime as principal must have aided, abetted, counselled or procured the other to commit it can both be convicted.¹⁷⁵ Take the case of two nurses, P1 and P2, whose patient V is injured while in their care. The injuries might have been inflicted by P1 alone, P2 alone, by P1 with P2's as accessory or vice versa. It is for the prosecution to prove to the criminal standard that the nurse who did not inflict the injuries must have aided or abetted the infliction either by positive acts or by failure to fulfil the duty owed as a health-care worker.¹⁷⁶ This problem often arises in a domestic situation. It differs from most other cases only because parents owe a duty to intervene to prevent the ill-treatment of their child when a stranger would have no such duty. The case of the parent or carer of the child or vulnerable adult who dies or suffers serious injury in their household is now governed by an exceptional procedure under the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Acts 2004 and 2012,¹⁷⁷ but the general principle remains: if all that can be proved is that the offence was committed by either the first or second defendant, both must be acquitted. The most recent affirmation of that principle is Banfield.¹⁷⁸ S and L were convicted of the murder of V. S was his wife and L his daughter. V had disappeared but no body had ever been found. There were five postulations as to what might have explained the death: (a) S killed V and L encouraged her; (b) L killed him and S encouraged her; (c) S killed him in the absence of L; (d) L killed him in the absence of S; and (e) S and L acted together to kill him.¹⁷⁹ Rafferty LJ concluded:

The first four show how obvious were the tenable alternatives which could have led to [V]'s death. Once the Crown was unable to identify of which of the four options the jury could be sure, the fifth could not on the evidence provide a backstop.¹⁸⁰

6.4.2 Mens rea of the accessory

The mens rea requirements of the accessory were restated in Jogee. They can be summarized as follows:

- (1) the accessory must intend to assist or encourage the principal's conduct, or in the case of procuring, to bring the offence about;
- (2) if the crime requires a particular mens rea, the accessory must intend to assist or encourage the principal to act with that mens rea.¹⁸¹ Innocent agency and procuring an actus reus would appear to be exceptions to this rule;
- (3) the accessory must have knowledge of any existing facts or circumstances necessary for the principal's conduct to be criminal.

We discuss each in detail here noting that this is where the decision of the Supreme Court in Jogee has had the greatest impact.

¹⁷⁴ Richardson (1785) 1 Leach 387; Abbott [1955] 2 QB 497.

¹⁷⁵ Russell and Russell [1987] Crim LR 494; Lane and Lane (1985) 82 Cr App R 5. For a valuable direction where one of two interrogating police officers has caused injury, see Forman [1988] Crim LR 677 (Judge Woods). See generally G Williams, 'Which of You Did It?' (1989) 52 MLR 179; EJ Griew, 'It Must Have Been One of Them' [1989] Crim LR 129. Gibson and Gibson (1984) 80 Cr App R 24 is misleading and should be used with care; see commentary at [1984] Crim LR 615.

¹⁷⁶ See for an extreme case Pinto [2006] EWCA Crim 749 (D aided and abetted torture of V by P believing V to be possessed).

¹⁷⁷ Considered at p 634. For comment see P Glazebrook, 'Insufficient Child Protection' [2003] Crim LR 541.

¹⁷⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 1394, [2014] Crim LR 147.

¹⁷⁹ At [61].

¹⁸⁰ At [62]. The court cited the 13th edition of this work with approval.

¹⁸¹ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [9]–[10].

6.4.2.1 Mens rea (1): an intention to aid, etc

It must be proved that D intended to do the acts which he knew to be capable of assisting or encouraging the commission of the crime. There are two elements: an intention to perform the act capable of encouraging or assisting, and an intention, or a belief, that that act will be of assistance. So, where D supplies a weapon to P, which P uses in a murder, proof of D's intention will turn on whether he meant to hand it over (as opposed to accidentally leaving it and P discovering it) and whether D intended that his supply would assist P; there is no further element that D must intend the consequences of P's conduct—that the murder be committed. As Devlin J said:¹⁸²

If one man deliberately sells to another a gun to be used for murdering a third, he may be indifferent whether the third man lives or dies and interested only in the cash profit to be made out of the sale, but he can still be an aider and abettor.

The Supreme Court confirmed in Jogee that D's intention to assist or encourage P to commit the offence, and to act with whatever mental element is required of P, will often be coextensive on the facts with an intention by D that the offence be committed. The court did confirm, however, that there will be cases where D gives intentional assistance or encouragement to P, but without D having a positive intent that the particular offence be committed. The example given by the court is where, at the time that the encouragement is given, it remains uncertain what P might do.¹⁸³ It has been suggested that the law would have been clearer and better if the court had held that D must intend P to, or believe that P will, commit the crime.¹⁸⁴

Intention to perform the act of assistance

This element of the mens rea is unlikely to give rise to difficulty. D must intend to perform the act that does in fact provide assistance. There is only likely to be a problem in circumstances of potential involuntariness and other rare situations.

Intention thereby to assist

There is no judicial agreement on what the requirement of an intention to assist actually means and unfortunately there was no explicit consideration of this issue in Jogee. It is clearly a requirement of intention,¹⁸⁵ but must it be proved that D acted in order to assist P (direct intent); or is it sufficient to prove only that D knew his acts would be virtually certain to assist P (oblique intent)?¹⁸⁶ It seems to be generally accepted that D's knowledge that his act will assist is sufficient.¹⁸⁷ The weight of authority certainly supports the view that it is not necessary to prove that D had as his purpose or desire to assist and if D had the (oblique) intention, it is no excuse that D's motives in performing the act of assistance were unimpeachable.¹⁸⁸

¹⁸² [1959] 1 QB 11 at 23, applied in JF Alford Transport Ltd [1997] 2 Cr App R 326, 334–335.

¹⁸³ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [11].

¹⁸⁴ M Dyson, 'Letter to the Editor' [2016] Crim LR 638.

¹⁸⁵ The offence is therefore one of specific intent for the purposes of rules on voluntary intoxication: see Ch 9; McNamara [2009] EWCA Crim 2530.

¹⁸⁶ See RA Duff, 'Can I Help You? Accessorial Liability and the Intention to Assist' (1990) LS 165. See generally KJM Smith, A Modern Treatise on Complicity (1991) Ch 5.

¹⁸⁷ cf IH Dennis, 'The Mental Element for Accessories' in Essays in Honour of JC Smith (1987); contra GR Sullivan, 'Intent, Purpose and Complicity' [1988] Crim LR 641; and IH Dennis, 'Intention and Complicity: A Reply' [1988] Crim LR 649; Williams [1990] Crim LR 4, 12.

¹⁸⁸ Woolf J in Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority [1984] QB 581 at 589. Woolf J's discussion of the criminal aspects of this case was adopted by Lords Scarman and Bridge in the House of Lords [1986] AC 112.

Oblique intention to assist sufficient

In National Coal Board v Gamble,¹⁸⁹ P, a lorry driver, had his employer's lorry filled with coal at a colliery belonging to the defendant Board [D1]. When the lorry was driven on to the weighbridge operated by the defendants' employee, D2, it appeared that its load greatly exceeded that permitted by the relevant regulation.¹⁹⁰ D2 informed P of this but P said he would take the risk, D2 gave him a weighbridge ticket and P committed the offence as principal by driving the overloaded lorry on the highway. As a matter of contract law, the property in the coal did not pass until the ticket was handed over and, therefore, P could not properly have left the colliery without the ticket from D2. It was held that the Board, D1, through its employee D2,¹⁹¹ was guilty of the offence as an accessory. The decision was based on the assumption that D2 knew that he had the right to prevent the lorry leaving the colliery with the coal. Had D2 not known this, he should have been acquitted. Presumably D2 was indifferent whether P drove his overloaded lorry on the road or not—he probably thought that it was none of his business—but D2's motive was irrelevant and it was enough that his positive act of assistance had been voluntarily done (ie intentional performance of the act of assistance) with knowledge that by doing so he would be assisting P and knowledge of the circumstances constituting the offence.¹⁹²

Despite the fact that it did not say so explicitly, the Supreme Court's judgment in Jogee confirms that oblique intention will suffice. The court stated that there is a difference between intention and desire and that the jury may have to be reminded of this fact. This echoes what was earlier held in Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland, where D drove P to the place where he knew that P intended to murder a policeman. It was held that the fact that D does not 'want' or 'aim' to assist does not prevent him being liable as an accessory if he has an oblique intent to assist, so D's intentional driving of the car was aiding and abetting, 'even though he regretted the plan or indeed was horrified by it'.¹⁹³

Must D intend that his conduct 'will' or 'might' assist?

There is a potential difficulty where D believes his act is capable of assisting P but does not believe that in fact it will assist P. An example is offered by the Law Commission¹⁹⁴ where D, believing that P is going to murder V, sells P rat poison. If D believes that there is only a 50 per cent chance that P will use it to murder V but D foresees the risk that P might murder V by some other means, it cannot be said that D believes that his act will assist P. The Law Commission suggest that the case law is inconclusive as to whether D is liable.¹⁹⁵ The judgment of the Supreme Court in Jogee has not necessarily clarified matters very much. The court confirmed that D must intend to assist or encourage P. The court also confirmed, however, that D need not intend for P to commit the offence in question.¹⁹⁶ The example of such a scenario given by the court is where, at the time that the encouragement is given, it remains uncertain what P might do. An arms supplier was the example the court gave of such a scenario. This seems to suggest that it is sufficient for D to intend that his conduct might assist, even though he cannot be sure that it necessarily will assist.

¹⁸⁹ [1959] 1 QB 11 DC, Slade J dissenting.

¹⁹⁰ Motor Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1955.

¹⁹¹ See, however, p 199.

¹⁹² D2 would commit an offence under s 45 of the SCA 2007.

¹⁹³ [1975] AC 653 at 678 per Lord Morris, approving the judgment of Lowry LCJ on this point. Fretwell (1862) Le & Ca 161 appears to be a merciful decision and unsound in principle.

¹⁹⁴ Taken from LC 305, Appendix B, para B.75.

¹⁹⁵ See the speech of Lord Simon in Lynch [1975] AC 653, 698h.

¹⁹⁶ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [10].

'Intention' even if D is legally obliged to supply to P?

If P has loaned a weapon to D, and P demands it back, when D hands it over, it is arguable that D aids in the commission of P's subsequent crime committed with that weapon as much as if D had sold or lent the article to P in the first place, but this has never been held to be aiding in law.¹⁹⁷ National Coal Board v Gamble suggests a distinction between the cases:

- (1) where the seller (D) is aware before ownership has passed to the buyer (P) of P's illegal purpose the delivery amounts to abetting, but
- (2) where the seller (D) learns of the illegal purpose for the first time after ownership has passed but before delivery to P the supply does not amount to abetting. The seller is merely complying with his legal duty to give P what is by then P's own property.

This seems to be an unsatisfactory distinction. If D delivers weedkiller to P, knowing that P intends to use it to murder his wife, it would be remarkable if D's guilt as an accessory to murder turned on whether the ownership passed before or after D learned of P's intention.¹⁹⁸ The important thing is that D knows of P's intention when he makes delivery. It should not be an answer that P has a right to possession of the thing in the civil law because the civil law should not afford a right in such a case.¹⁹⁹ In Garrett v Arthur Churchill (Glass) Ltd,²⁰⁰ D, who had bought a goblet as agent of P, was held guilty of being knowingly concerned in the exportation of goods without a licence, when, on P's instructions, he delivered P's own goblet to P's agent who was to take it to the United States:

...albeit there was a legal duty in ordinary circumstances to hand over the goblet to the owners once the agency was determined, I do not think that an action would lie for breach of that duty if the handing over would constitute the offence of being knowingly concerned in its exportation.²⁰¹

It is probably the law that the seller is liable whether or not the ownership has passed before delivery. Williams' view, however, is that the seller ought to be liable in neither case. He argues:²⁰²

The seller of an ordinary marketable commodity is not his buyer's keeper in criminal law unless he is specifically made so by statute. Any other rule would be too wide an extension of criminal responsibility.

A rule based on the nature of the thing as 'an ordinary marketable commodity' is not workable. Weedkiller is an ordinary marketable commodity but it may be acquired and used to commit murder. A more feasible distinction is one based on the seriousness of the offence contemplated:

The gravity of the social harm resulting from the unlawful conduct is used to determine whether mere knowledge of the intended use will be sufficient to carry the taint of illegality.²⁰³

¹⁹⁷ [1959] 1 QB 11 at 20 per Devlin J.

¹⁹⁸ D would be liable under ss 44–46 of the SCA 2007.

¹⁹⁹ See G Williams, CLGP, s 124 and JC Smith, 'Civil Law Concepts in the Criminal Law' (1972) 31 CLJ 197 at 208. In K v National Westminster Bank Plc [2006] EWCA Civ 1039, the court noted that if the criminal law (under POCA 2002) makes it an offence for a bank to honour a customer's instructions to transfer money which it is suspected is criminal property, there can be no breach of contract for the bank to refuse to do so.

²⁰⁰ [1970] 1 QB 92. How far does this go? If X lends a picture to a museum, does the museum really commit an offence if, on demand, it returns the picture to X, knowing that he intends to export it without the licence required by law?

²⁰¹ [1969] 2 All ER 1141 at 1145 per Parker LCJ.

²⁰² CLGP, s 124 at 373. TBCL (1st edn) 293–294.

²⁰³ Perkins and Boyce, Criminal Law, 746. See also G Williams, 'Obedience to Law as a Crime' (1990) 53 MLR 445.

This could operate on the basis of some balance of the respective harms, but would have the disadvantage of being uncertain. No such distinction has been made in English law. Alternatively, a distinction could be drawn between summary and indictable offences. This would create some arbitrary results.²⁰⁴ A third approach would be to restrict the scope of the liability of the seller, D, to cases in which his purpose was to assist P. There would be difficulties in establishing that mens rea in some cases.

At present, English authorities suggest a general rule of liability for sellers subject to mens rea, which after Jogee requires an intention to assist or encourage. This applies, a fortiori, in the case of lenders or those who rent out premises intended for unlawful purposes. In such cases, the owner has a continuing interest in and right to control the property.²⁰⁵

6.4.2.2 Mens rea (2): intention that P commit the crime with the requisite mens rea

In Jogee, the Supreme Court restated the principle that D must intend to assist P to act with the requisite mens rea for the offence. D must intend that P will have the mental element when P is performing the conduct element of the offence. As the court explained:

The second issue is likely to be whether the accessory intended to encourage or assist [P] to commit the crime, acting with whatever mental element the offence requires of [P]. If the crime requires a particular intent, [D] must intend (it may be conditionally) to assist [P] to act with such intent. To take a homely example, if [D] encourages [P] to take another's bicycle without permission of the owner and return it after use, but [P] takes it and keeps it, [P] will be guilty of theft but [D] of the lesser offence of unauthorised taking, since he will not have encouraged [P] to act with intent permanently to deprive. In cases of concerted physical attack there may often be no practical distinction to draw between an intention by [D] to assist [P] to act with the intention of causing grievous bodily harm at least and [D] having the intention himself that such harm be caused. In such cases it may be simpler, and will generally be perfectly safe, to direct the jury . . . that the Crown must prove that [D] intended that the victim should suffer grievous bodily harm at least. However, as a matter of law, it is enough that [D] intended to assist [P] to act with the requisite intent. That may well be the situation if the assistance or encouragement is rendered some time before the crime is committed and at a time when it is not clear what [P] may or may not decide to do. Another example might be where [D] supplies a weapon to [P], who has no lawful purpose in having it, intending to help [P] by giving him the means to commit a crime (or one of a range of crimes), but having no further interest in what he does, or indeed whether he uses it at all.²⁰⁶

The significant shift from the Chan Wing Siu doctrine, which is discussed in full later, is that D must intend that P will intentionally commit the offence (say murder) whereas under the Chan Wing-Siu doctrine it was enough that D foresaw as a possibility that P might intentionally commit the offence.

This begs the question of what 'intention' means in this context. It is clear that it is not limited to purpose, as the court confirmed that:

It will therefore in some cases be important when directing juries to remind them of the difference between intention and desire.²⁰⁷

The question then remains whether intention can be inferred from foresight. In Jogee, the Supreme Court recognized that in the common law foresight of what might happen is evidence from which a jury can infer the presence of the requisite intention.²⁰⁸ The court

²⁰⁴ GR Sullivan [1994] Crim LR 272.

²⁰⁵ eg the hotelier who lets a room to a man accompanied by a 15-year-old girl, knowing that he intends to have sex with her.

²⁰⁶ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [90] (emphasis added).

²⁰⁷ ibid, [91].

²⁰⁸ ibid, [83].

observed that, 'foresight may be good evidence of intention but it is not synonymous with it'.²⁰⁹ Inferring intention from foresight is the hallmark of oblique or indirect intention. Therefore, although foresight cannot be equated with intention as a matter of law, it is evidence the jury can take into account when they are considering whether D intended to assist or encourage P to act with whatever mens rea is necessary for him to commit the full offence. In the subsequent case of Anwar, Sir Brian Leveson P confirmed that, 'the jury will, of course, continue to look at the full picture or factual matrix in order to determine whether the relevant necessary intent can be inferred'.²¹⁰

That the jury may infer intent from foresight begs the following questions: (a) in what circumstances, (b) foresight of what and (c) foresight to what degree?

One of the factors identified by the Supreme Court that may be relevant to the assessment of whether D possessed the requisite intent is whether there was a common purpose between D and P to commit the offence in question.²¹¹ The Supreme Court confirmed, however, that liability as a secondary party does not depend on there being some form of agreement between the parties.²¹² The Supreme Court also clarified that knowledge or ignorance that weapons generally, or a particular weapon, is being carried by P will be evidence going to what the intention of D was, and indeed may be irresistible evidence one way or the other, but it is evidence and no more.²¹³ This was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in the subsequent case of Brown, in which Hallett LJ stated that, 'Post-Jogee, knowledge of a weapon used by a principal to inflict harm is not determinative of secondary party liability. It is evidence that may inform a jury's decision as to whether a defendant who did not himself wield a weapon intended to cause harm to the victim; and if he did, the level of harm'.²¹⁴ Her ladyship therefore rejected the submission that the judge ought to have directed the jury that they could only convict D if they were sure that he knew P had a knife.

What the Supreme Court did not address, however, is whether oblique intention in the context of secondary liability has the same strict meaning it has, for example, in the law of murder. As a result of the judgment of the House of Lords in Woollin,²¹⁵ in a murder trial the jury are only entitled to find that D had the necessary intention if death or GBH was a virtually certain consequence and D appreciated that this was the case. If death or GBH was not virtually certain, then the jury are not entitled to find that D had the requisite intention. In the context of secondary liability, the Supreme Court confirmed that the jury can infer intention from foresight, but did not address the question of whether D's foresight of even the slightest possibility of P intentionally acting in the proscribed way is sufficient for the jury to be entitled to infer that he possessed the requisite intention.

To take an example of why this is not merely a theoretical problem, consider Matthews and Alleyne.²¹⁶ The defendants were convicted of murder after throwing the victim from a bridge and into a river, where he drowned. In light of Woollin, the judge directed the jury that in relation to each defendant they could only convict him of murder as a principal if, when he threw the victim from the bridge and into the river, he appreciated that death or really serious harm was a virtually certain consequence, barring some unforeseen intervention. To amend the facts, rather than being joint principals, if P was the principal and D was the accessory, how should the judge direct the jury in relation to D's liability? What is clear is that the judge should direct the jury that they can only convict D of murder as a secondary party if they are sure that he intended to assist or encourage the principal intentionally to ²⁰⁹ ibid., [73].

²¹⁰ [2016] EWCA Crim 551, [20].

²¹¹ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [87].

²¹² ibid., [95].

²¹³ ibid., [98].

²¹⁴ [2017] EWCA Crim 1870, [28]. See also Ibrar [2017] EWCA Crim 1841.

²¹⁵ [1999] 1 AC 82. For discussion, see p 92.

²¹⁶ [2003] EWCA Crim 192. For discussion, see p 93.

kill or do GBH. If D admits being present when V was murdered by P, but denies having the requisite intent, should the judge direct the jury that they can only infer the requisite intent if D foresaw that the principal might intentionally kill or do GBH, so long as D's foresight of that was more than de minimis? Alternatively, should the jury be directed that they are only entitled to infer the requisite intent if D foresaw intentional GBH or killing by P as a virtually certain consequence of D's act of assistance or encouragement?

The issue becomes particularly striking if the Crown cannot establish the identity of the principal. As discussed earlier, this is not an uncommon scenario. Can the jury be directed that: (a) they can infer the requisite intent if the defendant they are considering foresaw that the other might intentionally kill or cause GBH so long as this foresight was more than de minimis; but (b) to be sure D is guilty as a principal he must have foreseen that death or GBH was a virtually certain consequence barring some unforeseen intervention. The jury would then have to be told that there are two different routes to 'finding' intention, depending upon whether the defendant whose guilt they are considering is the principal or the accessory. Given that the jury would have to be sure that a murder was committed by one of the defendants, there is potentially no avoiding directing the jury as to the applicability of two different routes. This is surely an undesirable state of affairs in directing a jury on the same word in the gravest of crimes.²¹⁷

It is submitted that there are three significant practical issues arising as a result of this uncertainty around foresight and intention. First, it is unclear how judges are to direct juries on the law. Different judges may direct juries in different ways, which makes resolution of this issue a priority. Secondly, as a matter of principle, there is lack of clarity on whether there ought to be parity as to the level of foresight required of the principal and the accessory.²¹⁸ Resolution of this issue is made more complicated by the fact that two different questions are being asked. In relation to the principal, the issue relates to a consequence, whereas for the accessory, the issue is partly about someone else's state of mind. Thirdly, without speedy resolution by the Court of Appeal there is the danger that the debate the House of Lords sought to put an end to in Woollin will be replayed, which would be undesirable as the law would be thrown into a state of confusion.²¹⁹ One solution is for the jury to be directed in the following terms:

You (the jury) are entitled to conclude that the greater the likelihood or chance of X happening that you are sure that the defendant foresaw, the more weight you can place on this conclusion when you come to decide, as a matter of fact, whether the defendant intended X. So if you conclude that the defendant either did not foresee X or thought it a remote possibility only, you may conclude that he did not intend X to happen; if he foresaw that it was virtually certain to happen but carried on assisting, it may not be difficult to conclude that he intended X. How you weigh up that evidence to decide what the defendant intended is a matter for you.

It is important to bear in mind that even if D did not intend to assist or encourage P to kill or cause really serious harm, but the violence escalates and results in death, although D will not be guilty of murder he will be guilty of manslaughter. D will also be guilty of manslaughter if he participates by encouragement or assistance in any other unlawful act which all sober and reasonable people would realize carried the risk of some harm (not necessarily serious) to another and death in fact results.²²⁰ When applied in the context of secondary ²¹⁷ Judicial College, Crown Court Compendium (2017).

²¹⁸ This issue is considered further at p 217.

²¹⁹ For further discussion, see D Ormerod and K Laird, 'Jogee: Not the End of a Legal Saga But the Start of One?' [2016] Crim LR 539.

²²⁰ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [96].

liability, the law of manslaughter may seem particularly harsh, especially since the test of harm is an objective one.

Conditional intent

The Supreme Court confirmed in Jogee that D must intend to assist or encourage P to commit the offence, and to act with whatever mental element is required of P. Importantly, the Supreme Court stated that in some cases arising out of a prior joint criminal venture, it will also often be necessary to draw the jury's attention to the fact that the intention to assist, and perhaps also the intention that the crime should be committed, may be conditional.²²¹ The Supreme Court's discussion of conditional intent was confined to those cases in which D and P are engaged in a joint prior criminal venture, such as a burglary, during the course of which a further offence is committed. Whilst conditional intent may be particularly apposite in scenarios such as these, it can apply with equal force to cases in which there was no prior joint criminal venture.²²²

This aspect of the Supreme Court's judgment could prove controversial in three respects. First, there is the practical question of how the concept of conditional intent ought to be explained to the jury. The court gave the following example of a scenario where it might be necessary to draw to the jury's attention the fact that D's intent can be conditional:

The bank robbers who attack the bank when one or more of them is armed no doubt hope that it will not be necessary to use the guns, but it may be a perfectly proper inference that all were intending that if they met resistance the weapons should be used with the intent to do grievous bodily harm at least.

In this example, the Supreme Court seems to be suggesting that the jury will only be entitled to infer that D had the requisite intent if he foresaw that it might be necessary for the guns to be used in the course of the robbery. If necessity were the test, then it would impose a high threshold. In the next paragraph of the judgment, however, the Supreme Court gives an example which seems to suggest that the test is not as stringent as this:

If the jury is satisfied that there was an agreed common purpose to commit crime A, and if it is satisfied also that [D] must have foreseen that, in the course of committing crime A, [P] might well commit crime B, it may in appropriate cases be justified in drawing the conclusion that [D] had the necessary conditional intent that crime B should be committed, if the occasion arose; or in other words that it was within the scope of the plan to which [D] gave his assent and intentional support.

This paragraph could be interpreted as entitling the jury to find that D had the requisite intent if he foresaw that the further offence might be committed, not out of necessity, but merely if the opportunity arose. In the subsequent case of Anwar Sir Brian Leveson P offered the following formulation: 'What is now required is that [D] intended that [P] cause grievous bodily harm or kill if the circumstances arise.'²²³ There is the danger that the misapplication of conditional intention could lead to the reintroduction of the problems the Supreme Court sought to address in Jogee. For example, the prosecution could invite the jury to infer that merely because D foresaw as a possibility that P might, in the course of their joint venture to burgle V's house, commit murder, that D must have conditionally intended to assist P to commit that crime. Such a formulation bears a striking resemblance to parasitic accessory liability and cannot be what the Supreme Court intended to achieve in Jogee.

²²¹ ibid, [92]. Conditional intention is a concept that is also discussed in Ch 11, in the context of statutory conspiracies. This section deals exclusively with the concept as it relates to accessorial liability.

²²² For discussion, see Horder, APOCL, 451–452.

²²³ Anwar [2016] EWCA Crim 551, [22]. Emphasis added.

What must not be lost sight of is the fact that the requisite mens rea is intention. As Krebs explains, 'intent contingent upon the existence of certain facts still requires proof of full-blown intent',²²⁴ This point ought to be emphasized to the jury, to ensure that they do not labour under the misapprehension that by referring to conditional intention the judge is somehow sanctioning the application of a less demanding form of mens rea. In Chan Kam Shing, Ribeiro PJ stated that the Court of Appeal's analysis of conditional intent in Anwar and Johnson suggests that English law is 'drifting back' to a position resembling parasitic accessory liability.²²⁵ It is submitted that to avoid this the jury ought to be directed that D will be liable if he intended to assist or encourage P to commit the offence if a particular condition was met. For example, where D and P engage in a joint criminal venture to commit robbery, during the course of which P murders the bank clerk, D will be guilty of murder if he intended to assist or encourage P to murder the bank clerk should the bank clerk attempt to raise the alarm during the course of the robbery.

Many factors will be relevant to the jury's assessment of whether D possessed the requisite intention. Of particular relevance will be the jury's assessment of the range of responses D foresaw from P in the event that the bank clerk attempted to raise the alarm during the robbery. Evidence that D, when he embarked on the robbery with P, foresaw that P might murder the bank clerk should he attempt to raise the alarm, but nevertheless continued in the joint venture,²²⁶ would be strong evidence from which the jury could infer that D intended to assist or encourage P to commit murder should that eventuality arise. Foresight is only evidence from which the jury will be entitled to infer the requisite intention, however. Even if D foresaw that P's response to the bank clerk's attempt to raise the alarm might be to commit murder, the jury could conclude that D lacked the requisite intent because, for example, he explicitly told P that he did not want violence to be used. Again, it is crucial to ensure that the jury understands that the requisite mens rea is nothing less than intention.

Secondly, the Supreme Court's discussion of conditional intent was subject to sustained criticism by the Hong Kong Court of Final Appeal in Chan Kam Shing.²²⁷ Ribeiro PJ stated that the Supreme Court relied upon the idea of conditional intent in order to deal with what his lordship characterized as 'situational uncertainties'.²²⁸ The Court of Final Appeal took the view, however, that conditional intent is unsuited to this purpose and criticized the Supreme Court for explaining the concept solely 'in the context of joint criminal enterprise'. The court also stated that, 'The proposition that a finding of foresight is only evidence of conditional intent [was] . . . difficult to follow'.²²⁹ Krebs agrees that the Supreme Court's analysis of conditional intent was 'somewhat opaque' but concludes that the language of joint enterprise is consistent with using the concept to determine the scope of the undertaking that was to be assisted or encouraged.²³⁰ In Miller v The Queen, the High Court of Australia was also critical of the Supreme Court's reliance upon conditional intention.²³¹

The final reason why the Supreme Court's discussion of conditional intention could prove controversial is of a more theoretical nature.²³² The Supreme Court's discussion of conditional intent has been found wanting by a number of commentators. For example, it has been argued ²²⁴ B Krebs, 'Accessory Liability: Persisting in Error' (2017) 76 CLJ 7, 10.

²²⁵ [2016] HKCFA 87, [92]–[93].

²²⁶ The Court of Appeal in Johnson [2016] EWCA Crim 1613 made reference to the fact that the court could safely draw the conclusion that DD had the necessary conditional intent that the knife would be used with intent to kill or cause GBH should the occasion arise, on the basis that use of the knife with intent to kill or cause GBH was within the scope of the plan to which they gave their assent and conditional support. At [82].

²²⁷ [2016] HKCFA 87. ²²⁸ ibid, [72]. ²²⁹ ibid, [78].

²³⁰ B Krebs, 'Hong Kong Court of Final Appeal: Divided by a Common Purpose' (2017) 81 J Crim L 271.

²³¹ [2016] HCA 30, [21] and [38].

²³² For further discussion, see DJ Baker, Reinterpreting Criminal Complicity and Inchoate Participation Offences (2016) Ch 2.

that particularly problematic is the fact the Supreme Court referred to D's conditional intention to assist or encourage by his present conduct. Simester argues that any reference to conditional intention in a scenario where D's act of assistance or encouragement is rendered some time before the crime is committed is a 'red herring'.²³³ He argues that once D renders his act of assistance or encouragement, there can be no question of D having any conditional intention. This is because D's part in the commission of the crime has been fulfilled and that any conditional intention to do something requires that the thing to be done lies in the future. At the time of D's act of assistance or encouragement, he must therefore hold the crystallized, unconditional intention to assist or encourage the very crime that P ultimately commits. Simester makes the point that what lies in the future are P's actions and that as D cannot intend P's actions, nor P's mens rea, he cannot conditionally intend them either.²³⁴ Child argues that conditional intention can never apply in these circumstances on the basis that it is irrational to apply conditional intention to present conduct and results. It is argued that, 'D's intention to aid or abet murder at t1 [time 1] cannot be conditioned by an event that happens later at t2 [time 2]. D's intention may be specific to a certain future view of the world (i.e. to encourage killing on specific terms), but once it has motivated conduct which provides that encouraging effect, it can no longer be conditional.'²³⁵

Despite the compelling nature of these criticisms, the Supreme Court confirmed in unequivocal terms that D's intent can be conditional. For the reasons that have already been given, it is imperative to convey to juries that conditional intent is not a less stringent form of intention and that foresight is merely evidence from which the requisite intention can be inferred.

6.4.2.3 Mens rea (3): knowledge of facts or circumstances

In addition to proof of intention to do the acts and to assist or encourage, there is a further element of the accessory's mens rea: D must 'know' of the facts or circumstances necessary for P's conduct to be criminal.²³⁶ He need not actually know that an offence has been committed, because he may not know that the facts constitute an offence and because ignorance of the criminal law is not a defence.²³⁷ In Jogee, the Supreme Court expressed this element in the following terms: 'knowledge of any existing facts necessary for [P's conduct] to be criminal'.²³⁸

Two questions arise:

- (1) What does 'knowledge' mean in this context?
- (2) As to what must D have knowledge—what are the 'facts or circumstances necessary for P's conduct to be criminal'?

Knowledge/foresight/wilful blindness

A requirement to prove D's knowledge is especially difficult to apply in the context of secondary liability. D's knowledge must relate to P's conduct and the prescribed ²³³ AP Simester, 'Accessory Liability and Common Unlawful Purposes' (2017) 133 LQR 73.

²³⁴ For an alternative view, see DJ Baker, 'Unlawfulness's Doctrinal and Normative Irrelevance to Complicity Liability: A Reply to Simester' (2017) 81 J Crim L 393.

²³⁵ J Child, 'Understanding Ulterior Mens Rea: Future Conduct Intention is Conditional Intention' (2017) 76 CLJ 311.

²³⁶ See generally KJM Smith, A Modern Treatise on Complicity, Ch 6 and LC 305, Appendix B.

²³⁷ Johnson v Youden [1950] 1 KB 544 at 546 per Lord Goddard CJ. See also Ackroyds Air Travel Ltd v DPP [1950] 1 All ER 933 at 936; Thomas v Lindop [1950] 1 All ER 966 at 968; Ferguson v Weaving [1951] 1 KB 814; Bateman v Evans [1964] Crim LR 601; Smith v Jenner [1968] Crim LR 99; Dial Contracts Ltd v Vickers [1971] RTR 386; D Stanton & Sons Ltd v Webber [1973] RTR 87, [1972] Crim LR 544 and commentary thereon.

²³⁸ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [9] and [99].

circumstances. The conduct may or may not be happening contemporaneously with D's act(s) of assistance or encouragement. Frequently, D's acts of assistance or encouragement will have occurred before the commission of the offence by P, and D cannot have 'knowledge' of something that has yet to occur.²³⁹ Where the circumstances have yet to arise or materialize, D cannot know them because they are not yet in existence. The problem of proving knowledge may even arise if the principal offence has materialized contemporaneously with D's assistance.

In the face of practical difficulties in applying a strict test of knowledge, the concept was diluted by the courts to such an extent that this element of mens rea required of D could more accurately be expressed as a realization of a possibility of the essential elements of P's offence.²⁴⁰ Knowledge in this context was the equivalent to D foreseeing (or in some cases turning a blind eye to) the likelihood of the essential matters. As a matter of substance this was more like a test of subjective recklessness. For example, the court adopted a relaxed interpretation of 'knowledge' in *Carter v Richardson*²⁴¹ where D, the supervisor of a learner driver, P, was convicted of abetting P's driving with excess alcohol. The court said, obiter, that it was sufficient that D knew that it was 'probable' that P was 'over the limit'—that D was, in effect, 'reckless' in the Cunningham sense²⁴² to the circumstance element of the crime that P was over the limit. In Carter v Richardson, P's offence comprised two main elements: a conduct element—driving—and a circumstances element—with excess alcohol. D intentionally encouraged the act of driving and was reckless as to the circumstance of the excess alcohol. That was sufficient to render him liable. There were a number of cases in which a similar formulation was adopted. For example, in Bryce it was held that D's foresight of the 'real or substantial risk' of P's crime was sufficient.²⁴³

The correctness of this approach must now be doubted in light of Jogee. Unfortunately, the Supreme Court did not discuss the body of case law that had developed in the years since Johnson v Youden that sanctioned the application of a less stringent test than knowledge. The court did, however, explicitly endorse the approach in Johnson v Youden and stated that the mental element in assisting or encouraging is an intention to assist or encourage the commission of the crime, which requires knowledge of any existing facts necessary for it to be criminal.²⁴⁴ Although the Supreme Court did not do so explicitly, those cases in which knowledge seemed to have been equated with recklessness have been implicitly overturned and should no longer be applied. Knowledge in the context of secondary liability therefore now bears a stricter meaning than the one that had previously been sanctioned. As we discuss later, however, D does not have to intend to assist or encourage a specific offence. It will suffice for D to have intended to assist or encourage P to commit one of a range of offences which might take various forms, such as a terrorism offence or a sexual offence.

²³⁹ For discussion of the philosophical nature of knowledge and its relevance to the criminal law, see S Shute, 'Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law' at 171 and GR Sullivan, 'Knowledge, Belief and Culpability' at 207 both in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory. See also the essay by R Bagshaw, 'Legal Proof of Knowledge' in P Mirfield and R Smith (eds), Essays in Honour of Colin Tapper (2003) on evidential influences of substantive law definitions of knowledge.

²⁴⁰ See LC 305, para 2.65. For a defence of the dilution of mens rea, see A Simester (2006) 122 LQR 578 at 588–592.

²⁴¹ [1974] RTR 314, discussed by G Williams (1975) 34 CLJ 182 and TBCL, 309. But in Giorgianni (1984) 156 CLR 473 the High Court of Australia held that recklessness is not sufficient on a charge of aiding and abetting.

²⁴² It is quite clear that inadvertent Caldwell/Lawrence recklessness was never enough: Blakely and Sutton v DPP [1991] Crim LR 763, DC.

²⁴³ [2004] EWCA Crim 1231, [71].

²⁴⁴ [2016] UKSC 8, [9] and [16].

D must know any 'existing' facts necessary for P's conduct to be criminal

As has already been explained, D must have 'knowledge of any existing facts necessary for [P's conduct] to be criminal'.²⁴⁵ As Horder points out, given that P's conduct will take place in the future, there are as of yet no 'existing facts' necessary to make P's act criminal. Therefore, what the Supreme Court must have meant is that what matters is whether D knows that, when P acts on D's assistance or encouragement, the facts making P's act criminal will exist at that later time.²⁴⁶

Knowledge in abetting an offence of strict liability

Where P's offence is one of strict liability, D must have mens rea, namely 'knowledge' of the essential elements of P's wrongdoing. The principal may, but an accessory may not, be convicted without mens rea. The reason is that secondary participation is a common law notion.²⁴⁷ Application of the normal common law principles of liability requiring mens rea highlights the peculiar nature of offences of strict liability. In a strict liability offence, an accessory who has no mens rea must be acquitted even if he was negligent,²⁴⁸ whereas the principal who has caused the actus reus must be convicted even if he took all proper care and was not even negligent. In Jogee, the Supreme Court, citing National Coal Board v Gamble, held that where the offence charged does not require mens rea, the only mens rea required of the secondary party is that he intended to assist or encourage P to do the prohibited act, with knowledge of any facts or circumstances necessary for it to be a prohibited act.²⁴⁹

The Supreme Court was simply recognizing the application of a longstanding principle. For example, in Callow v Tillstone,²⁵⁰ D, a veterinary surgeon, was charged with abetting the exposure for sale of unsound meat. At the request of a butcher, P, he examined the carcass and gave P a certificate that the meat was sound. The examination had been negligently conducted and the meat was tainted. P, relying on the certificate, exposed the meat for sale and was convicted. The magistrates, holding that D's negligence had caused the exposure, convicted him of abetting. It was held that his conviction must be quashed.²⁵¹

The principle would apply also in a case where, for example, P is charged with taking indecent images of a child under 18. If P had been assisted in his taking of the images by D, who had supplied the camera, it would have been a defence for D (even though not for P) to show that he believed the child to be over 18 or even (at least if he was unaware of the relevance of the age of 18) that he did not know what age she was.

The same principle must apply, a fortiori, to offences where negligence as to circumstances will found liability for the principal. Take the offence of bigamy as an example. If D encourages P to marry, both believing honestly but mistakenly and on unreasonable grounds that P's husband is dead, P may be convicted of bigamy but D cannot be convicted as an accessory. This principle applies only to D's negligence as to circumstances forming part of P's crime. Whether a secondary party may be liable for unforeseen consequences of P's crime is considered later.²⁵²

²⁴⁵ ibid., [9] and [99]. See also LC 305, paras 2.51 et seq.

²⁴⁶ Horder, APOCL, 448.

²⁴⁷ It was never necessary for a statute creating an offence to specify that it should also be an offence to aid, etc, its commission. Cf McCarthy [1964] Crim LR 225.

²⁴⁸ Carter v Mace [1949] 2 All ER 714, DC, is to the contrary, but in Davies, Turner & Co Ltd v Brodie [1954] 1 WLR 1364, DC, that case was said to lay down no principle of law and to be decided on its own particular facts. See J Montgomerie in 'Aiding and Abetting Statutory Offences' (1950) 66 LQR 222.

²⁴⁹ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [99]. See W(P) [2016] EWCA Crim 745.

²⁵⁰ (1900) 83 LT 411, DC. ²⁵¹ See also Bowker v Premier Drug Co Ltd [1928] 1 KB 217 at 227.

²⁵² See p 211.

Knowledge of what type of crime?

Liability for crimes of same type

If D aids, abets, counsels or procures, that is, performs acts of assistance or encouragement to P and D intends that P will commit an offence of a certain 'type' (X), neither party specifying any particular victim, time or place, D may be convicted as a secondary party to any crime of that type which P commits. For example, D intentionally provides P with a knife, knowing that P intends to threaten someone: if P does, D is liable.

The principle applies where, as is common, D and P have a shared common purpose to commit an offence, say burglary, but the act of P alone is the immediate cause of the commission of that offence. D is liable as an accessory for that crime provided he intentionally performed acts of assistance or encouragement (driving P to the scene) intending thereby to assist/encourage.

The principle also applies where D does not have a common purpose with P, but assists/encourages being indifferent whether P commits the crime. A leading case is Bainbridge.²⁵³ D purchased some oxygen-cutting equipment which was used six weeks later for breaking into a bank at Stoke Newington. D's story was that he had bought the equipment for P, that he suspected P wanted it for something illegal—perhaps melting down stolen goods—but that he did not know that it was going to be used for any such purpose as it was in fact used. It was held that it was essential to prove that D knew the type of crime that was going to be committed: it was not enough that he knew that some kind of illegality was contemplated; but that, if D knew breaking and entering and stealing were intended, it was not necessary to prove that D knew the precise details, for example that the Midland Bank, Stoke Newington, was going to be broken into.²⁵⁴ That would be too great a degree of specificity for the prosecution to establish and would narrow the scope of secondary liability unduly.

The principle applies equally whether D has assisted by supplying equipment or assisted or encouraged P in some other way. For example, D is liable as an accessory where he provides P with information on how to commit a crime of a particular type, although neither D nor P has any particular crime in view when the advice is given.²⁵⁵ Where D opened a bank account for P, giving P a false name, D was convicted of aiding and abetting P in the fraudulent use of the particular forged cheque which P subsequently drew upon the account. D had demonstrated an intention that the account be used as a vehicle for presenting forged cheques like the one in fact presented.²⁵⁶ D knew the type of crime. D is liable even though he does not share P's intent that the offence be committed as, for example, with the supplier of the gun in Devlin's example in Gamble. This principle might be regarded as unduly broad. Can it really be said that where D does not even know the precise crime that P will commit he 'knows the essential elements'?

In DPP for Northern Ireland v Maxwell,²⁵⁷ the House of Lords, relying upon the principle enunciated in Bainbridge, held that there was no strict requirement that D knows the precise offence P will commit. D assisted P by intentionally driving him to a pub, realizing that P

²⁵³ [1960] 1 QB 129, CCA. The result would be different under the LC 305 proposals because D can only be liable for those offences by P as to which D intended P commit the conduct element. If D has not intended P to commit the conduct element of burglary (as opposed to handling) he is not liable. He would be liable under the SCA 2007, s 46.

²⁵⁴ cf the narrower interpretation that the Law Commission placed on it in para B85 of Appendix B of LC 305.

²⁵⁵ Baker (1909) 28 NZLR 536. G Williams thinks the case is wrongly decided: CLGP, s 125. But is it distinguishable in principle from Bainbridge? Cf McLeod and Georgia Straight Publishing Co Ltd (1970) 75 WWR 161 (newspaper liable for incitement through article on how to cultivate marijuana).

²⁵⁶ Thambiah v R [1966] AC 37, PC.

²⁵⁷ [1978] 1 WLR 1350, HL.

intended to commit one or more of a number of offences, including: planting a bomb at the pub, shooting people at the pub or committing a robbery at the pub. In fact, P intended to plant, and did plant, a bomb there. D was liable as an accessory to that offence. Lord Scarman held that, 'an accessory who leaves it to his principal to choose is liable, provided always the choice is made from the range of offences from which the accessory contemplates the choice will be made'.²⁵⁸ The principle derived from Maxwell was that if D gives assistance to P, knowing that P intends to commit a crime, foreseeing that it is one or more of crime X, or crime Y, or crime Z, but being uncertain as to which, D was liable as a secondary party to whichever of those crimes P in fact committed. He would not be liable for crime W, even if it was the same (type) as XYZ, unless it was one D contemplated that P might commit with mens rea.²⁵⁹ It is not difficult to understand why the court reached the decision it did. A narrow approach to the mental element might lead to the acquittal of those who are sufficiently culpable.

The approach adopted by the House of Lords did not permit blanket liability, however. On the facts of Maxwell, D would have been liable for murder if P had shot and killed: murder was an offence D had foreseen that P might commit in that manner with mens rea and P carried out that crime. D would not be liable if P had committed a 'type' of offence not in D's contemplation when D performed his acts of assistance.²⁶⁰ So, D would not have been liable if, on arrival at the pub, P had raped V. Nor would it be enough if D had a 'general criminal intention'. So an intention to abet another in the possession of a bag, whatever its contents may be, is insufficient to found an indictment for abetting the possession of cannabis.²⁶¹ If D had guessed that the bag contained either cannabis or some other article, proscribed or not, that should have been enough.

The Supreme Court in Jogee endorsed the approach in Maxwell, but in doing so narrowed it. The court held that the intention to assist or encourage will often be specific to a particular offence. The court recognized, however, that in other cases it may not be. In endorsing Maxwell the court recognized that D may intentionally assist or encourage P to commit one of a range of offences, such as an act of terrorism which might take various forms. In such cases the court held that:

[D] does not have to 'know' (or intend) in advance the specific form which the crime will take. It is enough that the offence committed by [P] is within the range of possible offences which [D] intentionally assisted or encouraged him to commit.²⁶²

The court held that the decision in Maxwell did not derogate from the principle that an intention to assist or encourage the commission of an offence requires knowledge by D of any facts necessary to give P's conduct or intended conduct its criminal character. As has already been explained, the principle in Maxwell had been interpreted to mean that it was sufficient that P committed one of a range of offences that D had in mind as possibilities. In holding that D will be guilty only if he intentionally assists or encourages P to commit one of a range of offences which D intends P will commit, so long as P commits an offence within that range, the Supreme Court has narrowed the approach in Maxwell.

²⁵⁸ ibid, 1363.

²⁵⁹ The prosecution may well now prefer to lay charges under s 46 of the SCA 2007. See p 489.

²⁶⁰ cf Lord Scarman who, unlike Lord Hailsham who refers to the type of offence, relies on the judgment of Lowry LCJ in the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal, upholding the conviction on the basis that D 'knew' that P was going to commit one or more offences and although D did not 'know' which offence he knew that at least one would be committed and the offence P committed was one of those.

²⁶¹ Patel [1970] Crim LR 274 and commentary thereon. Cf Fernandez [1970] Crim LR 277.

²⁶² Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [14]–[15].

Where are the limits to such liability? If D has supplied P with the means of committing, or information on how to commit, a crime of a particular type, is D to be held liable for all the crimes of that type which P may thereafter commit? What if the Midland Bank at Stoke Newington was the second, third or fourth bank which P had burgled with Bainbridge's apparatus? Glanville Williams questioned whether D should be subject to such unforeseeable and perhaps far-reaching liability.²⁶³ If D can be liable for any one crime of the type contemplated even if he need not know the details of any specific crime, should D not also be liable for others of that type?²⁶⁴ In endorsing Maxwell, the Supreme Court in Jogee must be taken to have confirmed the correctness of this approach subject to the narrowing that has already been discussed.

There are further unresolved problems in relation to this principle. None of these were considered by the Supreme Court in Jogee. Whether a crime is of the 'same type' as another may not always be easy to discover. If D lends a jemmy to P, contemplating that P intends to enter a house in order to steal (burglary), is D guilty of any offence if P enters a house intending to commit grievous bodily harm (which is also burglary)? Clearly, D cannot be convicted of grievous bodily harm, because that is an offence of a different type; but he is probably guilty of burglary, because burglary was the crime he had in view—though this particular variety of burglary may be abhorrent to him. If D contemplates theft and P commits robbery, D is not guilty of robbery but might be convicted of the theft which is an essential element of robbery and included in it. Is theft an offence of the same type as removing an article from a place open to the public²⁶⁵ or taking a motor vehicle without authority?²⁶⁶ Is robbery an offence of the same type as blackmail? What of D who provides a stolen credit card to P assuming it will be used in fraud, but P uses it to slip the latch on V's door and commit theft. Is it sufficient that these are both dishonesty offences? This is an aspect of the law desperately in need of clarification, at least from a theoretical perspective; in practice, the principle does not seem to have given rise to problems.

D not liable if P intentionally changes victim/target of crime X

If D aids, abets, counsels or procures, that is, assists or encourages, P to commit a crime of a certain 'type' (X), against a particular person, or in respect of a particular thing, D is not liable if P intentionally commits an offence of the same type against some other person, or in respect of some other thing.

As an example of the principle in operation, consider D who intentionally provides P with a knife, knowing that P intends to use the knife to threaten his ex-wife V and rape her. P deliberately rapes W, a complete stranger, instead. D had not known or intended that. D is not liable for P's act of rape.²⁶⁷ In Reardon,²⁶⁸ it was accepted²⁶⁹ that if D intentionally gives assistance to P to kill an identified person, V, D is not liable if P deliberately kills a different person, W.

This principle is described well by Hawkins:²⁷⁰

But if a man command another to commit a felony on a particular person or thing and he do it on another; as to kill A and he kill B or to burn the house of A and he burn the house of B or to steal an ox and he steal an horse; or to steal such an horse and he steal another; or to commit a felony of one kind and he commit another of a quite different nature; as to rob J S of his plate as he is going to market, and he break open his house in the night and there steal the plate; it is said that the commander is not an accessory because the act done varies in substance from that which was commanded.

²⁶³ CLGP, s 124. ²⁶⁴ On the question of the withdrawal of an accessory, see p 225.

²⁶⁵ Theft Act 1968, s 11. See p 903. ²⁶⁶ ibid, s 12. See p 907.

²⁶⁷ This is different from the case where D gives P a gun to shoot V. P shoots at V and misses killing X. P is liable for murder because his intent is transferred. D is liable as an accessory. See p 212.

²⁶⁸ [1999] Crim LR 392, CA.

²⁶⁹ Referring to the 8th edition of this book, at p 142.

²⁷⁰ II PC, c 29, s 21. See also Foster, Crown Law, 369. Stephen, Digest (4th edn) art 43.

As the second part of that quotation makes clear, the principle applies where there is an intentional substantial variation from the proposed course of conduct, even if the victim and property are the same. Hawkins also stated:²⁷¹

if the felony committed be the same in substance with that which was intended, and variant only in some circumstance, as in respect of the time or place, at which, or the means whereby it was effected, the abettor of the intent is altogether as much an accessory as if there had been no variance at all between it and the execution of it; as where a man advises another to kill such a one in the night, and he kills him in the day, or to kill him in the fields, and he kills him in the town, or to poison him, and he stabs or shoots him.²⁷²

The distinction depends on whether the variation is one 'of substance' and any such distinction must produce difficult borderline cases.

In Dunning and Graham, an unreported case at Preston Crown Court,²⁷³ D had a grievance against V. P offered to set fire to V's house. D accepted the offer and gave P V's address. P went to V's house, changed his mind, and set fire to V's Mercedes instead. D did not know that V owned such a car. Nevertheless, Macpherson J held that it was open to the jury to convict D on the ground that she must have authorized or envisaged the possibility of property such as a car in the driveway being damaged by fire. If the car had been so damaged as a consequence of P's setting fire to the house, D would have been liable for arson of the car on the basis of transferred malice discussed in the following section. The actual case, however, seems to involve a deliberate variation from the plan. The result might be justified on this basis that D had authorized P to take revenge on V by damaging his property and that it did not really matter to her what the property was. Whether the variation is, or is not, one of substance, depends on the purpose of D as expressed to P.

The South African case of *S v Robinson*²⁷⁴ provides a controversial illustration of the difficulties of applying this principle. It is an especially difficult case because there is no change of victim as such, but arguably a fundamental change of substance relating to the proposed offence. D1, D2 and P agreed with V that P should kill V to procure the money for which V's life was insured and to avoid V's prosecution for fraud. At the last moment, V withdrew his consent to die but P nevertheless killed him. It was not proved that D1 and D2 foresaw the possibility that P might kill V even if he withdrew his consent or that they had been reckless whether he did so kill him. It was held that the common purpose was murder with the consent of the victim and that P had acted outside that common purpose. D1 and D2, accordingly, were not guilty of murder—though they were guilty of attempted murder, since P had reached the stage of an attempt before V withdrew his consent. Holmes JA, dissenting, thought 'looking squarely at the whole train of events, the conspiracy was fulfilled in death, and there is no room for exquisite niceties of logic about the exact limits of the mandate in the conspiratorial common purpose'.

The division of judicial opinion in this case highlights the problem. What constitutes a change of 'substance' could be interpreted narrowly, being limited to changes which would alter the nature of the criminal charge that could be prosecuted. A broader view of change of 'substance' seems more desirable, but the problem then arises of how to delimit 'changes of substance'. If P knows that a condition precedent of the agreement has not been performed (whether or not forming part of the definition of the crime), he might naturally be said to be no longer engaged on the joint enterprise. If D agrees with P that P shall murder V if he finds out that V is committing adultery with D's wife and P, having discovered that V is not ²⁷¹ ibid, s 20.

²⁷² This is related to the principle in Bainbridge that D need not know all the details of P's offence.

²⁷³ December 1985, unreported.

²⁷⁴ 1968 (1) SA 666.

committing adultery, nevertheless kills him, D should not be liable for murder, though, if this conditional intention is enough, he may be liable for conspiracy to murder.

D liable if P commits crime X by doctrine of transferred malice

If D intentionally aids, abets, counsels or procures P to commit a crime against a particular person V and P, endeavouring to commit that crime against V, mistakenly commits the crime against another (W), P is liable under the doctrine of transferred malice;²⁷⁵ and so, therefore, is D. To take an example, if D assists P by intentionally supplying a knife intending to assist P, and P kills W mistaking W for V, D is guilty as a secondary party, and P as a principal offender, of murder. It is important to note that in this scenario P has not deliberately departed from the course that D assisted him with; P was attempting to commit the crime which D has assisted him with and D is as responsible for the unintended results of the acts he has assisted.

The old and famous case of Saunders and Archer,²⁷⁶ in its result at least, is reconcilable with this principle. P intended to murder his wife. Following the advice of D, P gave her a poisoned apple to eat. She ate a little of it and gave the rest to their child. P loved the child, yet he stood by and watched it eat the poison, of which it soon died. It was held that P was guilty of murder of the child, but the judges agreed that D who, of course, was not present when the child ate the apple, was not an accessory to this murder. If P had been absent when the child ate the apple it is thought that this would have been a case of transferred malice and D would have been liable; but P's presence and failure to act made the killing of the child, in effect, a deliberate, and not an accidental, departure from the agreed plan. It was—as Kenny explained—‘as if Saunders had changed his mind and on a later occasion had used such poison as Archer had named in order to murder some quite different person of whom Archer had never heard’.²⁷⁷

6.4.2.4 Summary

For liability as a secondary party:

- a criminal offence must have been committed by P (whether P is identified or not);
- D must have intentionally aided, abetted, counselled or procured P, or in other words assisted or encouraged him, to commit an offence of the type that P in fact committed;
- D must have intended to assist or encourage P's conduct, or in the case of procuring, to bring the offence about, it being sufficient that D has oblique intent;
- D must have knowledge of any existing facts or circumstances necessary for P's conduct to be criminal; and
- if the offence is one of mens rea, D must intend to assist or encourage P to act with that mens rea. Procuring and innocent agency appear to be exceptions to this rule although this has yet to be determined.

6.5 The rise and fall of ‘parasitic accessory’ or ‘joint enterprise’ liability

6.5.1 Introduction

Prior to the Supreme Court deciding that it was the consequence of a legal ‘wrong turn’, the problem in identifying the scope of D's liability for P's offences arose most keenly in the context of so-called ‘joint enterprise’ or ‘parasitic accessory’ liability. That doctrine gave rise to a vast number of ²⁷⁵ Hawkins, I PC, c 29, s 22; Foster, Crown Law, 370; Stephen, Digest (4th edn) art 41, illustration (1). See also D Lanham, ‘Accomplices and Transferred Malice’ (1980) 96 LQR 110.

²⁷⁶ (1573) 2 Plowd 473.

²⁷⁷ Outlines at 112. See the perceptive jury questions and clear directions in Gordon-Butt [2004] EWCA Crim 961 on changes of victim.

appeals and to much academic debate.²⁷⁸ To understand why the Supreme Court characterized the doctrine as a legal wrong turn, it is necessary to set out the basis upon which it enabled D to be liable for a crime committed by P. D was liable as a parasitic accessory where:

- (1) D intentionally participated in the commission of crime 'A' with P or Ps (D's role could be either as a principal or accessory); and
- (2) D shared a common purpose with P to commit crime 'A'; and
- (3) P or Ps (whether identified or not) committed crime 'B' with the relevant mens rea for that crime; and
- (4) P's commission of crime B was in the course or furtherance of crime 'A';
- (5) D foresaw as a possibility that P or Ps might commit crime 'B' with the relevant mens rea; and
- (6) P or Ps did commit it in a not fundamentally different manner from that which D foresaw; and
- (7) D was at the time of the commission of crime 'B' still an active participant with P or Ps in crime 'A'.

It was said by the Supreme Court that this form of liability was developed by the Privy Council in Chan Wing-Siu v R,²⁷⁹ as interpreted in Hyde and Hui Chi-ming and approved by the House of Lords in *Powell and Daniels, English*²⁸⁰ and Rahman.²⁸¹ It was also endorsed in numerous Court of Appeal decisions²⁸² and by the Supreme Court in Gnango.²⁸³

The House of Lords in *Powell and Daniels, English*²⁸⁴ confirmed that it was sufficient to found a conviction for murder for D to have realized that P might kill with intent to do so or with intent to cause GBH. It was not necessary that D himself held an intention to kill. The particular difficulties in application in murder stemmed from the breadth of the mens rea of that offence and the fact that it is a constructive crime—it is sufficient that P has intended GBH.

The consequences of the joint enterprise principle were especially significant in cases of murder. Once it had been proved that a murder was committed, even if the principal could not be identified, the fact that the jury could not be sure which of the members of a group delivered the fatal blow did not prevent murder convictions for all or any members of the joint enterprise who foresaw that intentional GBH might occur: Rahman.²⁸⁵

Parasitic accessory liability meant that D could be liable for an offence requiring proof of an intention on the part of the principal offender, P, although D was only reckless about P's likely intentional conduct.²⁸⁶ Recklessness whether death be caused is a sufficient mens ²⁷⁸ See JC Smith, 'Criminal Liability of Accessories: Law and Law Reform' (1997) 113 LQR 453; J Burchell, 'Joint Enterprise and Common Purpose' (1997) 10 SACJ 125; cf A Simester, 'The Mental Element in Complicity' (2006) 122 LQR 578, for a review see LC 305. See B Krebs, 'Joint Criminal Enterprise' (2010) 73 MLR 578; G Virgo, 'Joint Enterprise is Dead: Long Live Accessorial Liability' [2012] Crim LR 850; W Wilson and D Ormerod, 'Simply Harsh to Fairly Simple: Joint Enterprise Reform' [2015] Crim LR 3.

²⁷⁹ (1985) 80 Cr App R 117. See the 7th edition of this book, at pp 143–145, for an account of the cases ending in Chan Wing-Siu in Hyde (1991) 92 Cr App R 131 and the decision in Hui Chi-ming (1992) 94 Cr App R 236, PC.

²⁸⁰ [1999] AC 1, [1997] 4 All ER 545, HL. See also the comment by G Virgo (1998) 33 CLJ 3. See also Neary [2002] EWCA Crim 1736.

²⁸¹ [2008] UKHL 45.

²⁸² See eg Smith [2008] EWCA Crim 1342; ABCD [2010] EWCA Crim 1622; Mendez [2010] EWCA Crim 516; Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 496; Badza [2010] EWCA Crim 1363; Montague [2013] EWCA Crim 1781; Bristow [2013] EWCA Crim 1540; Ali [2014] EWCA Crim 2169.

²⁸³ [2011] UKSC 59.

²⁸⁴ [1999] 1 AC 1.

²⁸⁵ [2008] UKHL 45.

²⁸⁶ For extensive analysis of why parasitic accessory liability was controversial, see W Wilson and D Ormerod, 'Simply Harsh to Fairly Simple: Joint Enterprise Reform' [2015] Crim LR 3; B Crewe, A Liebling, N Padfield and G Virgo, 'Joint Enterprise: The Implications of an Unfair and Unclear Law' [2015] Crim LR 252; M Dyson, 'Might Alone Does Not Make Right: Justifying Secondary Liability' [2015] Crim LR 967.

rea for manslaughter but not for murder; yet in a joint enterprise case D could be convicted if D was reckless as to whether P might intentionally perpetrate the conduct element of the actus reus of murder. In Powell and Daniels, English, Lord Steyn rejected the argument that joint enterprise imposed a form of constructive liability for murder. His lordship held that if this were the case it would be contrary to principle and would be a defect of the criminal law. It was accepted that the liability of the secondary party is 'undoubtedly' predicated upon a lesser form of mens rea, but his lordship went on to state that it was unrealistic to say that joint enterprise as such imposed constructive criminal liability. What D must have foreseen was P's intentional act: recklessness whether the conduct element of the offence of murder be committed is a different and more culpable state of mind than recklessness whether death be caused—a point which was regarded as persuasive by Lord Steyn.²⁸⁷

An example will illustrate how this form of secondary liability applied. Where D intentionally performed acts of assistance or encouragement to P, intending for P to have the mens rea for the offence in question: he gave P a gun to assist in his robbery, for example. D is liable as an accessory to the robbery even though P was the one who completed the offence. That is orthodox accessorial liability as we have discussed it so far in this chapter. But, if in the course of the robbery P shot and murdered V, D was also liable as an accessory for murder which he did not intend or assist or encourage P to commit, provided: (a) D intentionally encouraged or assisted P to commit robbery; (b) D foresaw that in the course of²⁸⁸ committing robbery, P might perform the conduct element of murder in the prescribed circumstances making that an offence; (c) D foresaw that P might do so with the mens rea of murder; and (d) the manner of P committing the murder was not fundamentally different from what D foresaw might occur.

Consider a second example. D, the accessory, intentionally assisted or encouraged P to commit theft by shoplifting from a major electrical retailer, contemplating that in the course of committing that offence P 'might well' do an act with intent to cause grievous bodily harm if challenged by the security staff. If P did an act of the kind D foresaw/contemplated and punched V in order to make off with the goods he was stealing, P was guilty of robbery. D was guilty as accessory to both the theft and to the robbery.

These principles applied: whether D was present with P or not;²⁸⁹ irrespective of whether D caused any conduct by P; irrespective of whether D agreed with P that P might do so; and irrespective of whether D shared a common intent with P to commit crime B (eg murder).²⁹⁰

6.5.1.1 The judgment in Jogee

Extensive reference has already been made to the joint judgment of the Supreme Court and Privy Council in Jogee; Ruddock. This section will consider why the Supreme Court concluded that the doctrine of 'parasitic accessory' or 'joint enterprise' liability constituted a legal wrong turn. As has already been explained, the Supreme Court attributed the development of parasitic accessory liability to the opinion of the Board in Chan Wing-Siu, in which Sir Robin Cooke stated:

In the typical case [of aiding and abetting] the same or the same type of offence is actually intended by all the parties acting in concert. In view of the terms of the directions to the jury here, the Crown does not seek to support the present convictions on that ground. The case must depend rather on the wider principle whereby a secondary party is criminally liable for acts by the primary offender of a type ²⁸⁷ [1999] 1 AC 1, 13–16.

²⁸⁸ Irrespective of whether it is completed. Simester argued that it was a fiction to say that D aids and abets crime B: see n 76. But the actus reus of aiding is D's participation in crime A despite D foreseeing that B might occur.

²⁸⁹ Rook [1993] Crim LR 698.

²⁹⁰ cf Gnango [2011] UKSC 59.

which the former foresees but does not necessarily intend. That there is such a principle is not in doubt. It turns on contemplation or, putting the same idea in other words, authorisation, which may be express but is more usually implied. It meets the case of a crime foreseen as a possible incident of the common unlawful enterprise. The criminal liability lies in participating in the venture with that foresight.

After an extensive review of the relevant authorities, the Supreme Court in Jogee concluded that the Privy Council in Chan Wing-Siu and the House of Lords in Powell and Daniels, English had in fact laid down a new principle. The authorities relied upon by the Privy Council and accepted by the House of Lords did not support the proposition that if two people set out to commit an offence (crime A), and in the course of it one of them commits another offence (crime B), the second person is guilty as an accessory to crime B if he foresaw it as a possibility, but did not necessarily intend it. The Supreme Court also stated that the Privy Council had made the error of eliding foresight with intention.

Although it confirmed that it was open to the courts to alter the common law in a way that made it more severe, the Supreme Court stated that judges must be cautious before doing so. Although the policy arguments relied upon in subsequent cases to justify the imposition of liability, specifically the problems of escalation associated with group violence, were important, the Supreme Court ultimately concluded that they were insufficient to justify making D guilty of murder as opposed to manslaughter. Of particular relevance to this issue was the fact there was no consideration in Chan Wing-Siu or in Powell and Daniels, English of the fundamental policy question of whether and why it was necessary and appropriate to reclassify such conduct as murder rather than manslaughter. It was held that such a discussion would necessarily have to entail the consideration of questions about fair labelling and fair discrimination in sentencing. The Supreme Court concluded that the principle enunciated in Chan Wing-Siu was based upon an incomplete, and in some respects, erroneous, reading of previous case law, coupled with generalized and questionable policy arguments. The court gave the following reasons for why it was right to correct the error and reverse a statement of principle despite it having been made and followed by the Privy Council and the House of Lords on a number of occasions:

- the court had the benefit of a much fuller analysis than on previous occasions when the topic had been considered;
- it could not be said that the law was now well established and working satisfactorily. Rather, it was highly controversial and a continuing source of difficulty for trial judges, leading to a large number of appeals;
- secondary liability is an important part of the common law, and if a wrong turn has been taken, it should be corrected;
- in the common law, foresight of what might happen is ordinarily no more than evidence from which a jury can infer the presence of the requisite intention. The court recognized that it may be strong evidence, but its adoption as a test for the mental element for murder in the case of a secondary party was a serious and anomalous departure from the basic rule, which resulted in over-extension of the law of murder and reduction of the law of manslaughter. The court noted that murder already has a relatively low mens rea threshold, because it is sufficient that D has an intention to cause serious injury, without intent to kill or to cause risk to life. The Chan Wing-Siu principle extended liability for murder to a secondary party on the basis of a still lesser degree of culpability, namely foresight only of the possibility that the principal may commit murder but without there being any need for there to exist an intention to assist him to do so;
- the rule brings what was characterized as 'the striking anomaly' of requiring a lower mental threshold for guilt in the case of the accessory than in the case of the principal.

The Supreme Court restated the principles that govern secondary liability and emphasized that nothing less than an intention to assist or encourage will suffice for D to be guilty as a secondary party. The mens rea for secondary liability was considered earlier in this chapter.

6.5.1.2 Evaluating Jogee

In correcting the ‘wrong turn’ that led to the development of parasitic accessory liability, the Supreme Court’s judgment in Jogee simplifies the law.²⁹¹ The court also clarified that, in agreement with the previous editions of this work, ‘there is no reason why ordinary principles of secondary liability should not be of general application’.²⁹² In concluding that nothing less than intention will suffice for D to be guilty as an accessory, the judgment also ensures that the threshold for imposing liability upon the accessory is no longer significantly lower than that of the principal. The judgment has, however, proved to be controversial for a number of reasons. First, it has been cogently argued that the Supreme Court’s conclusion that Chan Wing-Siu introduced a ‘new principle’ that changed the common law in a way which made it more severe is highly suspect.²⁹³ Stark argues that the Supreme Court cited selectively from the relevant case law, giving the most sympathetic view of history that it could. On his analysis of the case law relied upon by the Supreme Court, Stark argues that Chan Wing-Siu confirmed was what already beginning to become clear, namely that there was a ‘wider principle’ beyond standard aiding and abetting, ‘whereby a secondary party is criminally liable for acts by the primary offender of a type which the former foresees but does not necessarily intend’.²⁹⁴ Stark’s analysis leads him to conclude, convincingly it is submitted, that the Supreme Court in Jogee engaged in substantive law reform. As he notes, there are clear constitutional issues that arise from the court undertaking such a significant change to the common law.

Secondly, the practical impact of Jogee is contestable. Whilst the Supreme Court held in emphatic terms that nothing less than intention will suffice for D to be guilty as an accessory, it confirmed that foresight is evidence of intention and that conditional intention will suffice for D to be guilty. Sir Brian Leveson P confirmed subsequently in Anwar that the same facts which would previously have been used to support the inference of mens rea before the decision in Jogee will equally be used post the judgment. His lordship stated that the evidential requirements justifying a decision that there is a case to answer are likely to be the same even if, applying the facts to the different directions in law, the jury might reach a different conclusion.²⁹⁵ It could transpire, however, that juries are just as likely to convict after Jogee as they were before. Indeed, in Chan Kam Shing the Hong Kong Court of Final Appeal stated that the concept of conditional intent was interpreted in Johnson and Anwar in much the same way as the foresight requirement in Chan Wing-Siu. This ‘drift back to joint criminal enterprise’ led Ribeiro PJ to question the true extent of the changes effected by the Supreme Court’s decision.²⁹⁶

Finally, the judgment has been subject to sustained criticism by courts in other common law jurisdictions. In Chan Kam Shing, the Hong Kong Court of Final Appeal declined to follow Jogee and held that parasitic accessory liability should continue to be applied in Hong Kong. Ribeiro PJ gave three reasons for this conclusion. First, that secondary parties

²⁹¹ cf R Buxton, ‘Jogee: Upheaval in Secondary Liability for Murder’ [2016] Crim LR 324; M Dyson, ‘Shorn-Off Complicity’ (2016) 75 CLJ 196.

²⁹² Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [76].

²⁹³ F Stark, ‘The Demise of “Parasitic Accessorial Liability”: Substantive Judicial Law Reform, not Common Law Housekeeping’ (2016) 75 CLJ 550.

²⁹⁴ Chan Wing-Siu [1985] AC 168, 175.

²⁹⁵ Anwar [2016] EWCA Crim 551, [22].

²⁹⁶ [2016] HKCFA 87, [92]–[93].

to a joint criminal enterprise deserve 'to be regarded as gravely culpable'. Secondly, that the abolition of joint enterprise would 'deprive the law of a valuable principle for dealing with dynamic situations involving evidential and situational uncertainties which traditional accessory liability rules are ill-adapted to addressing'. Finally, the court expressed concern about the introduction of the concept of conditional intent, on the basis that it 'gives rise to significant conceptual and practical problems'. Key to the court's decision to retain parasitic accessory liability was its conclusion that there are two distinct doctrines: basic joint enterprise or 'common purpose' liability, and parasitic accessory liability or 'extended joint criminal enterprise'. In reaching this conclusion, the court disagreed with Jogee in which the Supreme Court, citing with approval the previous edition of this work,²⁹⁷ held that there is no reason why ordinary principles of secondary liability should not be of general application. Krebs argues that this difference in taxonomy means that the two judgments are at cross-purposes.²⁹⁸

The judgment in Jogee was also criticized by the High Court of Australia in Miller v The Queen. A majority of the High Court were not persuaded by the arguments of policy and principle that led the Supreme Court in Jogee to declare that Chan Wing-Siu constituted a 'legal wrong turn'. The High Court identified six broad reasons for retaining the doctrine of parasitic accessory liability. First, it rejected claims of over-criminalization as being unfounded. Secondly, it held that parasitic accessory liability is an independent type of secondary liability rather than a sub-species of accessory liability, so the differences between the two are not unprincipled. Thirdly, the court expressed concern about the practical difficulties in proving individual contributions in multi-handed situations. Fourthly, it expressed disagreement with the proposition that parasitic accessory liability makes trials unduly complex. Fifthly, it was considered 'undesirable' to alter parasitic accessory liability without reviewing the law of homicide and secondary liability generally. Finally, the court regarded judicial reform as being inappropriate against a background of legislative reform efforts in various Australian states. Krebs argues that the majority judgment in Miller does little more than reassert the well-rehearsed arguments in favour of parasitic accessory liability without engaging with the relevant counter-arguments.²⁹⁹ Gageler J dissented and agreed with the view expressed by the Supreme Court in Jogee that escalating group violence does not, without more, provide support for parasitic accessory liability. In Miller, the majority were concerned that requiring intent on the part of the secondary party set the threshold of liability too high. Whilst foresight sets the threshold of liability too low, Krebs suggests that the decision in Miller could indicate that requiring full-blown intention is 'beginning to look a step too far in the opposite direction'.³⁰⁰ She states that it may be necessary to find a middle ground between foresight and full-blown intention to deal with the phenomenon of incidental crimes.

The judgment in Jogee is clearly not a panacea.³⁰¹ As this section has demonstrated, the juridical foundation of the Supreme Court's decision is controversial and there are a number of matters that the courts still need to resolve. Not least of which is what to do about those defendants who were convicted on the basis of parasitic accessory liability. In Jogee, the Supreme Court stated that, 'the effect of putting the law right is not to render invalid all convictions which were arrived at over many years by faithfully applying the law as laid down in the Chan Wing-Siu case and in R v Powell; R v English'.³⁰² Where a conviction

²⁹⁷ Jogee [2016] UKSC 8, [76].

²⁹⁸ B Krebs, 'Hong Kong Court of Final Appeal: Divided by a Common Purpose' (2017) 81 J Crim L 271.

²⁹⁹ B Krebs, 'Accessory Liability: Persisting in Error' (2017) 76 CLJ 7. ³⁰⁰ ibid, 10.

³⁰¹ Judges still slip in directing juries, as demonstrated by Noble and Johnson [2016] EWCA Crim 2219.

³⁰² [2016] UKSC 8, [100].

has been arrived at by faithfully applying the law as it stood at the time, the court held that it can be set aside only by seeking exceptional leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal out of time. In the subsequent case of Johnson the Court of Appeal confirmed that it will be for the applicant for exceptional leave to appeal out of time to demonstrate that a substantial injustice would be done.³⁰³ In determining whether that high threshold has been met, the court stated that it will primarily and ordinarily have regard to the strength of the case advanced that the change in the law would, in fact, have made a difference.³⁰⁴ If the particular crime is a crime of violence which the jury concluded must have involved the use of a weapon, so that the inference of participation with an intention to cause really serious harm is strong, the court concluded that is likely to be very difficult. If, however, the crime did not involve intended violence or use of force, the court stated that it may well be easier to demonstrate substantial injustice. It is submitted that the approach adopted by the Court of Appeal will preclude most of those whose convictions are based upon the 'wrong turn' taken in Chan Wing-Siu from appealing their convictions. The impact of Jogee may therefore only be felt prospectively.³⁰⁵ Many will feel disappointed by this state of affairs. This issue is compounded by the fact that the Court of Appeal confirmed in the subsequent case of Garwood that it has no jurisdiction to certify a point of law of general public importance in cases where leave to appeal has been refused. This means that an individual in such a case will be unable to challenge the Court of Appeal's conclusion that there was no substantial injustice before the Supreme Court.³⁰⁶

6.6 Secondary participation must be in 'an offence'

6.6.1 Can there be secondary liability in an inchoate offence?

It is an offence to do acts capable of assisting or encouraging,³⁰⁷ or to conspire, or to attempt, to commit an offence.³⁰⁸ It is not an offence to attempt³⁰⁹ or, it is submitted, to conspire³¹⁰ to do an act which would involve no more than secondary liability for the offence if it were committed.

Secondary liability is triggered by the commission of the substantive principal offence. To demonstrate the operation of the rules, consider the following example. Knowing that P intends to drive his car, D2 urges D1 to 'lace' P's drink with so much alcohol that if P drives after consuming the drink he will inevitably commit an offence under s 5(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1988.³¹¹ D1 agrees to do so and attempts to, or does, lace the drink. If P consumes ³⁰³ [2016] EWCA Crim 1613.

³⁰⁴ The same approach was adopted by the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal in Skinner [2016] NICA 40.

³⁰⁵ For further discussion, see K Laird [2017] Crim LR 216. At the time of writing, the Court of Appeal has quashed a conviction and ordered a retrial in only one case. See Crilly [2018] EWCA Crim 168.

³⁰⁶ There are now numerous cases on which the Court of Appeal has rejected the submission of substantial injustice. See Grant-Murray [2017] EWCA Crim 1228; Agera [2017] EWCA Crim 740; Varley [2017] EWCA Crim 268. In all these cases, the court concluded that even if the jury had been directed in accordance with Jogee, it would have 'made no difference'.

³⁰⁷ The SCA 2007 replaced common law incitement with three statutory inchoate offences of assisting or encouraging in ss 44–46.

³⁰⁸ See Ch 11.

³⁰⁹ Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 1(4)(b); Dunnington [1984] QB 472, [1984] Crim LR 98, CA. Cf Chief Constable of Hampshire v Mace (1986) 84 Cr App R 40, [1986] Crim LR 752. See the debate between M Bohlander and J Child in [2009] Crim LR, discussed in Ch 11, p 432.

³¹⁰ Kenning [2008] EWCA Crim 1534; Hollinshead [1985] 1 All ER 850 at 857–858, CA. The House of Lords left the question open: [1985] AC 975. See JC Smith, 'Secondary Participation and Inchoate Offences' in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 21.

³¹¹ Driving or being in charge of a motor vehicle with an alcohol concentration above a prescribed limit.

the drink, drives his car and thus commits the offence under the Road Traffic Act 1988, D2 and D1 will be guilty as secondary parties;³¹² but if P declines the drink, or does not drive the car, D2 is not guilty of conspiracy and D1 is guilty neither of conspiracy nor of attempt to commit the offence. The act encouraged, agreed upon, attempted and indeed done, lacing the drink, is not the offence.³¹³ D may be liable under s 44 of the SCA 2007.³¹⁴

Assuming that P consumes the laced drink and drives, P could be guilty as the principal offender, notwithstanding his lack of mens rea, on the ground that the offence is one of strict liability. Where the offence is one requiring mens rea, which the actual perpetrator of the actus reus lacks, then those who procured him to act will be liable because they, or one of them, will be principal offenders.

In the case of conspiracy, one who abets or counsels the commission of the crime appears to be a principal offender in the conspiracy. It is also possible to abet or counsel an attempt.³¹⁵

For the scope of D's liability for assisting or encouraging P to assist or encourage P2, see Ch 11.

6.7 The relationship between the liability of the principal and secondary party

6.7.1 Procedural issues

Even if the alleged principal offender has been acquitted, a conviction of another person as an accessory may be logical. This is so even if it is assumed³¹⁶ that an accessory may be convicted only when the principal offender himself is guilty. The acquittal of the alleged principal offender, far from being conclusive that no crime was committed, is not generally admissible in evidence at a subsequent trial of the secondary parties.³¹⁷ A second jury may be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the crime was committed upon evidence which the first jury found unconvincing; evidence may be admissible against D which was not admissible against P, or fresh evidence may have come to light or P may have been acquitted because the prosecution offered no evidence against him.

The position would seem to be the same where D is tried first and convicted and P is subsequently acquitted³¹⁸ and when the parties are jointly indicted.³¹⁹ In Hughes,³²⁰ after the prosecution had offered no evidence against P, he was acquitted and called as a witness for the Crown, with the result that D was convicted by the same jury as an accessory to P's alleged crime. Where principal and secondary parties are tried separately, this result is supported by the analogous rule laid down in *DPP v Shannon*³²¹ that the acquittal of one ³¹² A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1975), p 186.

³¹³ The adulteration of the drink might possibly amount to the administration of a noxious thing, contrary to the OAPA 1861, s 24, see Ch 16.

³¹⁴ Virgo argues that the inchoate offences could in future be deployed to avoid the Supreme Court's restrictive interpretation of accessorial liability in Jogee. See G Virgo, 'The Relationship Between Inchoate and Accessorial Liability after Jogee' [2016] 9 Arch Rev 6. Given the complexity of the offences in the SCA 2007, this seems unlikely.

³¹⁵ Hapgood and Wyatt (1870) LR 1 CCR 221, CCR; S v Robinson 1968 (1) SA 666.

³¹⁶ Contrary to the view expressed, see p 222.

³¹⁷ Hui Chi-ming v R [1991] 3 All ER 897, PC. Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s 74, a conviction is now admissible to prove the commission of the offence by the principal: Turner [1991] Crim LR 57.

³¹⁸ In Rowley [1948] 1 All ER 570, D's conviction was quashed when, after he had pleaded guilty as an accessory, the alleged principals were acquitted by the jury. But the decision is criticized in Shannon [1974] 2 All ER 1009 at 1020 and 1049. Cf Zaman [2010] EWCA Crim, on which see Ch 7, p 237.

³¹⁹ See also Petch [2005] 2 Cr App R 657. ³²⁰ (1860) Bell CC 242.

³²¹ [1975] AC 717 HL; Ch 12.

party to a conspiracy does not invalidate the conviction of the only other party on an earlier or later occasion. Shannon left open the question whether one party may be convicted of conspiracy when the other is acquitted at the same trial;³²² and in *Anthony*³²³ it was said, obiter, that a jury cannot acquit P and at the same time find D guilty of counselling him to commit the crime.

If P and D are tried together and the evidence tending to show that P committed the crime is the same against both, then it would be inconsistent to acquit P and convict D.³²⁴ Where, however, there is evidence admissible against D but not against P that P committed the crime (eg a confession by D that he counselled P to commit the crime and saw him commit it), it would be perfectly logical to acquit P and convict D of counselling him (and of conspiring with him). In Humphreys and Turner,³²⁵ which was just such a case, Chapman J held that D might be convicted as an accessory, distinguishing the dicta in Anthony as applicable only to felonies. It is submitted that, ever since the Criminal Law Act 1967 came into force, the rule stated in Humphreys and Turner is applicable to all offences.

It is one thing for a court which is trying D alone to reject or ignore the holding of another court that P was not a principal offender and to hold that he was; and that, therefore, D might be convicted as an accessory to P's crime. It is quite another thing for a court to hold at one and the same time: (a) that P was, in law, not guilty³²⁶ and (b) that D was guilty, as a secondary party, of P's crime. These propositions seem, at first sight, to be inconsistent with the derivative nature of secondary liability.³²⁷

6.7.2 Secondary party guilty of a greater offence than the principal

Since secondary liability is said to derive from that of the principal, it may seem hard to see how the liability of the secondary party can properly be held to be greater than that of the principal offender. Historically,³²⁸ distinctions were drawn based on the presence at the crime and it was thought that the liability of the accessory who was absent could never 'rise higher' than that of the principal offender. The distinctions depending on whether the accessory is present at, or absent from, the commission of the crime are no longer applicable.³²⁹

There are some cases where it seems obvious that a person who, at least, appears to be an accessory ought to be convicted of a greater offence than the immediate perpetrator of the actus reus. We have already noticed that offences may be committed through innocent agents and that if D, with intent to kill, sends a letter-bomb through the post to V who is killed by the explosion, D is guilty of murder as a principal offender and E, the postman, is an innocent agent. Suppose, however, that E notices some wires sticking out of the parcel and that he is aware that a number of letter-bombs have been sent by terrorists lately with fatal results. He thinks, 'This could be a letter-bomb—but it's not likely and I'm in a hurry, I'll risk it' and pushes the letter through V's letter box where it explodes and kills V. If these facts are proved, E behaved recklessly and is guilty of manslaughter. He is no longer an ³²² The point is now settled by the Criminal Law Act 1977, and Longman and Cribben (1981) 72 Cr App R 121, p 460; but Shannon is relevant to the common law governing secondary participation.

³²³ [1965] 2 QB 189. Cf Surujpaul v R [1958] 1 WLR 1050.

³²⁴ Surujpaul v R [1958] 1 WLR 1050.

³²⁵ [1965] 3 All ER 689 (Liverpool Crown Court). Followed in Sweetman v Industries and Commerce Department [1970] NZLR 139. Cf Davis [1977] Crim LR 542, CA and commentary and Fuller [1998] Crim LR 61.

³²⁶ Not merely that there was not enough evidence to convict him, but that there was evidence which established his innocence.

³²⁷ See p 222. ³²⁸ Hawkins, II PC, c 29, s 15.

³²⁹ It depended on the distinction in the law of felonies between a principal in the second degree and an accessory which has been abolished.

innocent agent. But it would be absurd if D who sent the letter with intent to kill should escape liability for murder.

Alternative approaches have been advanced by academics. Glanville Williams suggests that a person like our postman should be regarded as a semi-innocent agent.³³⁰ Professor Kadish³³¹ prefers to say that D can properly be said to have caused V's death. Because P's actions are not 'fully voluntary' they do not break the chain of causation.³³² His approach explains the following difficult example:

[D] hands a gun to [P] informing him that it is loaded with blank ammunition only and telling him to go and scare [V] by discharging it. The ammunition is in fact live (as [D] knows) and [V] is killed. [P] is convicted only of manslaughter. ...It would seem absurd that [D] should thereby escape conviction for murder.³³³

P's act would be regarded by Kadish as not 'fully voluntary' because, through his ignorance of material facts, he was not fully aware of what he was doing or its consequences; so D has caused the death, intending to kill and is a principal murderer.³³⁴

For many years English law seemed to accept that D could not be liable for a more serious offence than P. This flowed from Richards,³³⁵ which the Court of Appeal and Lord Mackay (in Howe) considered to be wrongly decided. D, a woman, hired P1 and P2 to beat up her husband 'bad enough to put him in hospital for a month'. She signalled to P1 and P2 when V left the house. They inflicted a wound upon V, not amounting to a serious injury. D was convicted of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm but P1 and P2 were acquitted of that offence and convicted of the lesser offence of unlawful wounding. D's conviction was quashed and a conviction for unlawful wounding substituted.³³⁶

Richards was heavily criticized and, in view of the disapproval expressed in Burke (conjoined with Howe on appeal), though only obiter, may not be followed in future. It has some academic supporters.³³⁷

The anomaly of holding D liable for the greater offence is emphasized if it is supposed that V, by some unforeseeable mischance, had died of the slight injury inflicted by P1 and P2. This would have been manslaughter by P1 and P2. If D was guilty of the s 18 offence, it would follow logically that she was guilty of murder. It may be argued that this would be wrong (though she had the necessary mens rea), because no act was ever done with intent thereby to kill or cause serious bodily harm—there was no 'murderous act'. If, however, P1 and P2 had acted with intent to do serious bodily harm but succeeded in inflicting only a slight injury it would have been murder by all three if V had died of that. But then the act would have been done in pursuance of a joint enterprise to cause serious bodily harm. In fact, there was no

³³⁰ TBCL, 373. ³³¹ Blame and Punishment (1987) 183.

³³² eg P shoots at V, intending to kill but only wounds. D treats the wound recklessly and V dies of the maltreated wound. P and D have both caused V's death. P is guilty of murder and D of manslaughter. Both are principals.

³³³ Burke and Howe [1986] QB 626 at 641–642, CA. Lord Mackay agreed with the Court of Appeal who found this example convincing: [1987] AC 417, HL.

³³⁴ It is not so clear that the causation theory is a satisfactory explanation of the case where D intends the result and E is reckless whether he causes it—eg the postman case discussed earlier. It seems to be straining rather to say that the postman's act is not 'fully voluntary'.

³³⁵ [1974] QB 776, CA.

³³⁶ This followed Hawkins' view, n 328. It was assumed that under the old law of felonies, D would have been an accessory and not a principal in the second degree.

³³⁷ Kadish ('Complicity and Causation' (1985) 73 Cal L Rev 323 at 329) supports the Richards view arguing (a) that D did not cause the actions of P1 and P2 because they were not her unwitting instruments but chose to act freely as they did and (b) she could not be held liable 'for an aggravated assault [ie an assault with intent to cause grievous bodily harm] that did not take place'.

GBH committed and no charges of such. For that reason, though not for the reasons given, it may be that the decision in Richards was right after all.

The position is more straightforward where D and P both have the mens rea for the greater offence but P's liability is reduced for some reason to that of a lesser offence. If P causes the actus reus in carrying out the agreed plan but his liability is reduced 'for some reason special to himself',³³⁸ such as loss of self-control or diminished responsibility,³³⁹ it seems clearly right that D should not be able to shelter behind P's personal exemption from liability for the greater offence.

In the case considered in Burke (conjoined with Howe on appeal), however, the reduction in P's liability did not depend on a personal consideration of this kind. P's defence was that he had agreed to shoot V out of fear of D, but that, when it came to the event, the gun went off accidentally. The killing was therefore unintentional and amounted to no more than manslaughter. The judge, following Richards, directed that if the jury found P guilty only of manslaughter, then D could at most be guilty of manslaughter. The implication of the decision of the House is that this was wrong. It is submitted that the true position is that if P has gone beyond a merely preparatory act and is attempting to commit the crime when he 'accidentally' kills, both D and P are guilty of murder; but, if P is doing only a preparatory act when he happens to kill—he is driving to V's house with intent to blow it up when the bomb in his car goes off and kills V who has unexpectedly gone out for a walk—P is liable only for manslaughter and so is D. The killing which occurs is not the killing he intended, though the victim happens to be the same.³⁴⁰

6.7.3 Where the 'principal' is not guilty

Here we are concerned with cases where the immediate perpetrator of the actus reus is not guilty of the offence alleged and the offence is one which is incapable of being committed by a person as a principal offender acting through an innocent agent. Examples include rape and other offences involving sexual intercourse, driving offences and bigamy (except where the bigamous marriage is by proxy). There are three possible situations:

- (1) P has committed the actus reus of the offence with mens rea but has a defence;
- (2) P has committed the actus reus but has no mens rea;
- (3) P has not committed the actus reus.

The approach to these is best examined by analysis of a series of cases in which the issues have arisen.

6.7.3.1 P performs actus reus and mens rea but has a defence

In Bourne,³⁴¹ D by duress compelled his wife (P) to have sex with a dog. His conviction of abetting her to commit buggery was upheld although it was assumed that the wife, if she had been charged, would have been acquitted on the ground of coercion.³⁴² Sir Rupert Cross³⁴³ argued that this was in accordance with principle because 'The wife committed the "actus reus" with the "mens rea" required by the definition of the crime in question and ³³⁸ The phrase used by Lord Mackay in Burke, n 333.

³³⁹ This case is covered by s 2(4) of the Homicide Act 1957. D's liability for murder is not affected by E's diminished responsibility. The Coroners and Justice Act 2009, s 54(8) applies the same rule to loss of self-control.

³⁴⁰ See commentary [1987] Crim LR 481 at 484.

³⁴¹ (1952) 36 Cr App R 125. See JL Edwards, 'Duress and Aiding and Abetting' (1953) 69 LQR 297; R Cross, 'Duress and Aiding and Abetting (A Reply)' (1953) 69 LQR 354.

³⁴² See p 379.

³⁴³ (1953) 68 LQR 354.

the husband participated in that “mens rea.” The wife had mens rea in the sense that she knew exactly what she was doing, though she was to be excused for doing it. According to some theorists, where the defence relied upon by the principal is excusatory, that does not preclude the accessory from being convicted.

6.7.3.2 P performs the actus reus but lacks mens rea

In Cogan and Leak,³⁴⁴ D terrorized his wife, V, into submitting to sexual intercourse with P. P was convicted of rape and D of abetting him but, on appeal, P’s conviction had to be quashed because the jury had not been directed correctly, and it may have been that P lacked the mens rea as to V’s consent. D’s conviction was upheld but primarily on the ground that D was the principal offender acting through an innocent agent. The agency theory is misconceived. If it were right, a woman could be convicted of rape as the principal offender and it is plain that she cannot commit that offence; she does not have a penis. To suggest that D raped his wife V using P’s penis is nonsense. The court’s second reason was that D was rightly convicted as a procurer because V had been raped (‘no one outside a court of law would say she had not been’) and ‘therefore the particulars of offence accurately stated what [D] had done, namely that he procured [P] to commit the offence’. But if P believed V was consenting, V had not, as a matter of law, been raped. If X’s bike is taken from the place he left it by Y who owns an exactly similar model and thinks this is his, X, who has lost his bike forever, reasonably believes it has been stolen, but he is wrong. Y has not committed theft. The court’s distinguishing of *Walters v Lunt*³⁴⁵ (trike not stolen goods because taken by a seven-year-old) was erroneous. If the hypothetical bike and trike were not stolen, and plainly they were not, V was not raped by P in Cogan. The court’s opinion that D had procured not merely the actus reus but the offence of rape is wrong.

If a conviction is to be upheld in such a case, and policy and justice seem to require it,³⁴⁶ this could be on the ground that it is an offence to procure the commission of an actus reus; and the courts took this step in Millward.³⁴⁷ D instructed his employee, P, to drive on a road a vehicle which D knew, but P did not know, was in a dangerous condition. It was assumed that the actus reus of reckless driving was committed simply by the driving of the vehicle on the road. The condition of the vehicle resulted in a collision causing death. P was charged with causing death by reckless driving and D of abetting him. P was acquitted, D was convicted and his conviction upheld on the ground that he had procured the actus reus. This approach was advocated in the first seven editions of this book and it seems the best available to the courts; but there is force in the opinion of Kadish³⁴⁸ that it ‘at least technically... amounts to creating a new crime’. As there is no principal offender, there is no question of participation in the guilt of another or of ‘secondary liability’ and it becomes, in effect, a substantive offence to procure the commission of the actus reus of any crime.

Bourne, Cogan and Leak and Millward were all cases of alleged procuring and it is not certain whether the principle of Millward extends to other modes of secondary participation.

³⁴⁴ [1976] QB 217, [1975] Crim LR 584 and commentary. Discussed in Watkins [2010] EWCA Crim 2349.

³⁴⁵ [1951] 2 All ER 645, p 1035.

³⁴⁶ The conduct may well be caught by the offences in the SCA 2007, ss 44–46.

³⁴⁷ [1994] Crim LR 527. See RD Taylor, ‘Complicity, Legal Scholarship and the Law of Unintended Consequences’ (2009) 29 LS 1. In DPP v K and B [1997] 1 Cr App R 36, [1997] Crim LR 121, DC, some teenage girls procured a boy to ‘rape’ V. He may have been doli incapax (ie at that time incapable of committing the crime). They were held guilty of rape. It was said that it would have been different if the unidentified boy had been, or may have been, under ten because then there would have been no actus reus of rape. It is submitted that that is wrong. The actus reus was the voluntary penetration of the vagina by the penis, whatever the age of the boy.

³⁴⁸ Essays in Criminal Law, 180.

Procuring is narrower than the other modes in that (a) it must be the cause of the conduct or circumstance element of the actus reus and, perhaps, (b) it must be the procurer's purpose to bring about the result—'To procure means to produce by endeavour'³⁴⁹—but that may be too restrictive. Bourne and Leak were endeavouring to bring about the whole actus reus; but Millward, while he was 'endeavouring' to have the dangerous vehicle driven on the road, which was assumed to amount to reckless driving, was certainly not endeavouring to have anyone killed. If the driver had been guilty of reckless driving, then both he and Millward would have been guilty of causing death by reckless driving; but it does not necessarily follow that Millward should be guilty of that offence when the driver is not guilty. If 'procure' does imply purpose and if the principle is limited to procuring, then he ought to have been convicted only of reckless driving and not of causing death. The cases may also be approached in terms of justification and excuse, although it is doubtful that this assists greatly—the principal offender in each case was acquitted on the basis of an excusing factor (duress or lack of mens rea), and according to the theory this does not preclude secondary liability.³⁵⁰ It is unclear what impact Jogee will have on these cases. Are they an exception to the rule that D must intend P to act with mens rea, or does Jogee implicitly overturn them? It is submitted that the former is the preferable approach.

6.7.3.3 No actus reus by P

In Morris v Tolman,³⁵¹ D was charged with abetting the owner of a vehicle in using that vehicle for a purpose for which the vehicle had not been licensed. The statute (the Roads Act 1920) was so phrased that the offence could be committed only by the licence-holder. It was held that, there being no evidence that the licence-holder, P, had used the vehicle for a purpose other than that for which it was licensed, D must be acquitted. Though he, in fact, had so used the vehicle, that was not an actus reus. Again, in Thornton v Mitchell,³⁵² D, a bus conductor, negligently signalled to the driver of his bus, P, to reverse. Two pedestrians, whom it was not possible for the driver to see, were knocked down and one of them killed. The driver having been acquitted of careless driving, it was held that the conductor must be acquitted of abetting. Again, there was no actus reus. The driver's acquittal shows that he committed no actus reus, for careless driving is a crime which requires no mens rea beyond an intention to drive and D could not be said to have driven the bus. There would have been no such obstacle in the way of convicting D for manslaughter. That would, at that time, simply have raised the question whether D's negligence was sufficiently great.³⁵³

Thornton and Mitchell was distinguished in Millward on the ground that there was no actus reus of careless driving in the former case. And in *Loukes*³⁵⁴ where the facts were similar to those in Millward, D's conviction for procuring the offence of causing death by dangerous driving was quashed. The actus reus of dangerous driving³⁵⁵ is more precisely defined and a condition of the liability of the driver, P, in this situation is that 'it would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving the vehicle in its current state would be dangerous'. The judge directed an acquittal of the driver on the ground that there was no evidence that the dangerous condition of the vehicle would have been obvious to a competent and careful driver. The conviction of Loukes, who was responsible for the maintenance ³⁴⁹ See p 190.

³⁵⁰ See JC Smith, Justification and Excuse; G Williams, 'Theory of Excuses' [1982] Crim LR 722, especially 735–738; Taylor [1983] Crim LR 656.

³⁵¹ [1923] 1 KB 166.

³⁵² [1940] 1 All ER 339. See Taylor [1983] Crim LR 656, and (2009) 29 LS 1.

³⁵³ See Ch 14.

³⁵⁴ [1996] Crim LR 341. See commentary doubting whether there was an actus reus in Millward. And cf Roberts and George [1997] Crim LR 209.

³⁵⁵ See Ch 32. It seems that there is no room for procuring the actus reus as distinct from the offence because there is no actus reus unless the fault element is present—ie the full offence is committed: Roberts and George [1997] Crim LR 209 and commentary.

of the vehicle, for procuring the commission of the offence, was quashed. There being no actus reus, he could not be held to have procured one.³⁵⁶

6.8 Withdrawal by a secondary party

Where D has counselled P to commit a crime, or is present, aiding P in the commission of it, it may still be possible for him to escape liability by withdrawal before P goes on to commit the crime.³⁵⁷ An effective withdrawal will not, however, affect any liability he may have already incurred for conspiracy, or, if the withdrawal took place after P had done a more than merely preparatory act,³⁵⁸ attempting to commit the crime.³⁵⁹ It is important also to note that the Serious Crime Act offences in ss 44 to 46 allow for D to be prosecuted where he has done acts capable of assisting or encouraging P, irrespective of whether P commits any offence. Liability arises once D performs the acts capable of assisting or encouraging, irrespective of whether the acts do in fact assist or encourage. There is no withdrawal defence.

Although the principle that 'a person who unequivocally withdraws before the moment of the actual commission of the crime by the principal offender should not be liable for that crime',³⁶⁰ is clear, it is less easy to identify not only what is meant by 'unequivocal withdrawal' but also on what basis the defence operates. It is unclear whether it is designed primarily to serve as an incentive to D to withdraw or to reflect his diminished degree of blameworthiness.³⁶¹

There are at least three bases on which a withdrawal defence might be constructed.

- (1) The defence operates only where D brings to an end the actus reus of assisting or encouraging P. On this interpretation the defence would be relatively narrowly constructed.
- (2) The defence may operate because D's withdrawal negates his mens rea of intention to assist or encourage. Such an approach would create an extremely broad defence, potentially D's unannounced unilateral decision to take no part would suffice. That would seem unworkable. It also seems to be unprincipled. If D does acts assisting or encouraging with the requisite mens rea, his subsequent withdrawal cannot negate his mens rea in relation to his completed actus reus.
- (3) It is possible to construe the defence as a 'true' defence operating despite the presence of D's continuing actus reus and mens rea as a secondary party.³⁶²

³⁵⁶ In Pickford [1995] 1 Cr App R 420, 429–430 it was held that it was not an offence to aid and abet a boy under the age of 14 (at that time presumed to be incapable of sexual intercourse) to commit incest with his mother. The act would not be an actus reus.

³⁵⁷ See A Reed, 'Repentance and Forgiveness: Withdrawal from Participation and the Proportionality Test' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013); KJM Smith, 'Withdrawal and Complicity' [2001] Crim LR 769; D Lanham, 'Accomplices and Withdrawal' (1981) 97 LQR 575; Williams, TBCL, 310–311.

³⁵⁸ See p 422. ³⁵⁹ Withdrawal does not affect liability for an attempt; see p 434.

³⁶⁰ O'Flaherty [2004] EWCA Crim 526, [2004] Crim LR 751; applied in Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 2552; Campbell [2009] EWCA Crim 50; and Rajakumar [2013] EWCA Crim 1512.

³⁶¹ For a comprehensive discussion of these approaches, see KJM Smith [2001] Crim LR 769.

³⁶² This is the approach favoured by Reed, see n 357. He argues that withdrawal is not predicated upon the neutralization of actus reus or mens rea, but rather is a true defence that represents D's reduced level of culpable dangerousness. Unlike other defences, Reed suggests that withdrawal does not fit into the excuse/justification dichotomy, but is more analogous to consent.

English law has yet to address these issues in detail and they were not considered by the Supreme Court in Jogee. The Law Commission identifies the basis of the defence as 'negating the effect of the assistance, encouragement or agreement'³⁶³ with the ultimate decision whether D has so managed being one for the jury.³⁶⁴

6.8.1 An effective withdrawal?

For any withdrawal to be effective, it must be voluntary, real and effective and communicated in some form in good time.³⁶⁵ If D is arrested, he can hardly be said to have 'withdrawn'. His arrest does not necessarily demonstrate any repentance on his part, nor undo any aid, advice or encouragement he may have already given.³⁶⁶ Of course, it usually precludes any future secondary participation by him;³⁶⁷ but in this section we are concerned with absolution from the potential liability arising from D's past acts. Withdrawal has no part to play if D denies that he was involved in the offence in any way.³⁶⁸

In addition to a general voluntary awareness on D's part, a clear precondition for the defence to operate is an unequivocal communication of withdrawal.³⁶⁹ This can be communication to the principal offender, and if more than one to all principal offenders, or by communication with the law enforcement agency.³⁷⁰

Mere repentance, without any action, is not a sufficient or necessary condition for the defence.³⁷¹ D's 'innocent' state of mind at the time of the commission of the crime is no answer if he had mens rea when he did the act of counselling or aiding. English courts are generally reluctant to inquire into questions of motive. D may have seen the error of his ways, or he may be acting out of malice against his accomplices or because of fear of detection or because he has decided that the risks outweigh the possible rewards. It is submitted that it should make no difference. It has been recognized, for example, that if D neutralizes the effect of any assistance or encouragement he has given, he is not liable, even if he did not intend to neutralize its effect.³⁷²

6.8.1.1 Preventing or attempting to prevent the crime

To be effective must D's withdrawal involve his taking all reasonable steps to prevent the crime? It is submitted that this is not a necessary, although clearly it should be a sufficient, basis for the defence. Where D gives timely warning to the police, the effect ought in most cases to be that the crime will be prevented; but this may not always be so and, even where it is, there remains D's potential liability for abetting P's attempt, if P has gone beyond mere preparation. Surely, however, efforts to prevent the commission of the crime by informing the police ought to be an effective withdrawal, whether D has or has not attempted to persuade P to desist. Apart from being the best evidence of repentance, it is conduct which the law should and does encourage.³⁷³

³⁶³ LC 305, para 3.60.

³⁶⁴ ibid, para 3.65.

³⁶⁵ Otway [2011] EWCA Crim 3.

³⁶⁶ Johnson and Jones (1841) Car & M 218. Jackson (1673) 1 Hale PC 464 at 465 appears contra but is an obscure and unsatisfactory case. See Lanham (1981) 97 LQR 575 at 577.

³⁶⁷ For an infamous example where it did not, see Craig and Bentley (1952) The Times, 10–13 Dec.

³⁶⁸ Gallant [2008] EWCA Crim 111.

³⁶⁹ O'Flaherty [2004] EWCA Crim 526.

³⁷⁰ cf the Law Commission's view that D ought not to be automatically denied the defence if he has not informed all parties: LC 305, para 3.65.

³⁷¹ Hale, 1 PC, 618; Stephen, Digest (4th edn) art 42; Williams, CLGP, s 127; Croft [1944] 1 KB 295; Becerra, n 379.

³⁷² Rook [1993] 2 All ER at 963. See the discussion in LC 305, para 3.126.

³⁷³ cf the large 'discounts' on sentence which may be earned for information given after D has become liable for and been convicted of the offence.

6.8.1.2 Withdrawal by cancelling assistance provided

The question of withdrawal is usually approached by ascertaining whether D has ‘neutralized’ any input his assistance or encouragement might have had irrespective of whether that will in fact prevent the crime being committed. However, this is a difficult test to apply.³⁷⁴ For example, where D has supplied information it may be impossible in any meaningful sense to cancel the effect of that assistance by merely communicating withdrawal to P and suggesting that D will have no further part to play. In such cases, D’s communicated countermand must go further if it is to be effective in neutralizing the effect of the assistance. It may be that D in such cases would be obliged to inform the police or do some act to prevent the crime, but the courts have not insisted on this.

Although no clear test has evolved, what seems to be involved in these cases is an unarticulated proportionality test, assessing the exculpatory conduct (what was done or said, to whom, at what stage of the criminal conduct), and the mode of D’s participation in the contemplated offence (supply of weapons or advice, mere encouragement, presence at the crime, having been the instigator³⁷⁵). In O’Flaherty, the court suggested that in evaluating the effectiveness of the withdrawal, account will be taken of ‘the nature of the assistance and encouragement already given and how imminent the [principal offence] is, as well as the nature of the action said to constitute the withdrawal’.³⁷⁶ The court emphasized that it is not necessary for D to have taken reasonable steps to prevent the crime in order to have successfully withdrawn.

If D’s assistance consisted only in advising or encouraging P to commit the crime, it may be enough for him to tell P to desist.³⁷⁷ If P then commits the crime he does so against D’s advice and without his encouragement. It may be that P would never have committed the crime if D had not put it into his head in the first place; but then D may be properly and adequately dealt with by conviction under ss 44 to 46 of the SCA 2007. If D has counselled more than one person, then it seems that he must communicate his countermand to all of those who perpetrate the offence, for otherwise his counselling remains operative.³⁷⁸ To be effective, the communication must be such as ‘will serve unequivocal notice upon the other party to the common unlawful cause that if he proceeds upon it he does so without the further aid and assistance of those who withdraw’.³⁷⁹ The position might be different where D has supplied P with the means of committing the crime. Aid may be no less easily neutralized than advice.

In Grundy,³⁸⁰ D had supplied P, a burglar, with information which was presumably valuable to P in committing the crime; but, for two weeks before P did so, D had been trying to stop him breaking in. It was held that there was evidence of an effective withdrawal which should have been left to the jury. In Whitefield,³⁸¹ there was evidence that D had served unequivocal notice on P that if he proceeded with the burglary they had planned together, ³⁷⁴ The Supreme Court of Canada, by a majority, held in Gauthier [2013] SCC 32 that an effective withdrawal requires D, in a manner proportional to his participation in the commission of the planned offence, to take reasonable steps in the circumstances either to neutralize or otherwise cancel out the effects of his participation or to prevent the commission of the offence. Dissenting, Fish J held that Canadian law had never required D to have taken steps to neutralize his participation and that such steps would strengthen the defence, but that they were not necessary.

³⁷⁵ Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 2552 (D started fight, paused for short period while some others fetched weapons including a mace, and violence recommenced with D present. V killed. D guilty of murder).

³⁷⁶ [2004] EWCA Crim 526, [60].

³⁷⁷ Saunders and Archer (1573) 2 Plowd 473.

³⁷⁸ State v Kinchen (1910) 52 So 185, quoted by Lanham, n 357.

³⁷⁹ Whitehouse [1941] 1 WWR 112, per Sloan JA (Court of Appeal of British Columbia) approved in Becerra (1975) 62 Cr App R 212, CA. Cf Fletcher [1962] Crim LR 551; Grundy [1977] Crim LR 543, CA.

³⁸⁰ [1977] Crim LR 543.

³⁸¹ (1984) 79 Cr App R 36.

he would do so without D's aid or assistance. The jury should have been told that if they accepted the evidence, that was a defence. D would now be liable for an offence under ss 44 to 46 of the SCA 2007.

If a rejected countermand may be an effective withdrawal, as in Grundy, it is arguable that an attempt to countermand should be the same. D has done all in his power to communicate his countermand to P but failed. In all these cases, the countermand has, ex hypothesi, failed; and, if the question is whether D has done his best to neutralize his input, the answer does not depend on the reasons for the failure.³⁸² It could be argued that where D has failed to communicate, he can escape only by going to the police; but this was not insisted on in Grundy when persuasion failed. This suggests that the basis for the defence lies not in neutralizing the actus reus of assisting so far performed by D, but on some broader principle operating to exculpate D despite his continuing actus reus.

An effective withdrawal may often be made more easily at the preparatory stage than where the crime is in the course of commission. Thus, in Beccara where D handed P a knife so that he could use it on anyone interfering in a burglary, D did not make a sufficient communication of withdrawal when, on the appearance of V, he said 'Come on, let's go', and got out through a window. Something 'vastly different and vastly more effective' was required and, possibly, nothing less than physical intervention to stop P committing the crime would be required.³⁸³ In that case, the 'withdrawal' occurred at a very late stage. When the knife is about to descend, the only effective withdrawal may be physical intervention to prevent it reaching its target. This reasoning has been echoed in numerous cases.³⁸⁴

6.8.1.3 Spontaneous violence

In all the cases discussed above the offence was pre-planned. It was held in Mitchell and King that cases of spontaneous violence are different.³⁸⁵ On this view, if A and B spontaneously attack V, they are aiding and abetting one another, so long as each is aware that he is being assisted and encouraged by the other; but, if B simply withdraws, his participation in the offence apparently ceases without the need for any express communication to A, so that he will not be liable for acts done by A thereafter. This was reiterated in *Rajakumar*³⁸⁶ in which Davis LJ stated that:

Classically, as the authorities make clear, issues of withdrawal are a matter of fact and degree (and the authorities also make clear there can be some quite tight requirements if withdrawal is to be satisfied—albeit the burden of proving continuation of participation, and lack of withdrawal, remains on the Crown). Moreover, what may suffice to constitute withdrawal in spontaneous and unplanned group violence may not necessarily so suffice in pre-planned group violence.

The appropriateness of this test depends on which basis the defence rests. If it is regarded as a defence which operates by D neutralizing his actus reus, it can be seriously doubted: if P was encouraged by D's participation and was unaware that D had withdrawn, P continues to be encouraged. There is still an effective actus reus. As noted earlier, there are cases in which the defence has been successful where D has failed to neutralize the effect of his acts of assistance.

In the case of Robinson,³⁸⁷ the Court of Appeal explained Mitchell and King as an exceptional case. Referring to the criticisms outlined earlier, the court stated that:

³⁸² Lanham, n 357. ³⁸³ Becerra, n 379. Cf Baker [1994] Crim LR 444.

³⁸⁴ See Campbell [2009] EWCA Crim 50; Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 2552.

³⁸⁵ Mitchell and King (1998) 163 JP 75, [1999] Crim LR 496, DC. Reed is extremely critical of this distinction, characterizing it as 'nebulous'. See n 362.

³⁸⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 1512, [42].

³⁸⁷ [2000] 5 Arch News 2, CA. See also Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 2552.

it can only be in exceptional circumstances that a person can withdraw from a crime he has initiated. Similarly in those rare circumstances communication of withdrawal must be given in order to give the principal offenders the opportunity to desist rather than complete the crime. This must be so even in situations of spontaneous violence unless it is not practicable or reasonable so to communicate as in the exceptional circumstances pertaining in Mitchell where the accused threw down his weapon and moved away before the final and fatal blows were inflicted.

More recently, however, in O'Flaherty, the court again followed the distinction between 'planned' and 'spontaneous' violence drawn in Mitchell and King. The Court of Appeal concluded that 'in a case of spontaneous violence such as this where there has been no prior agreement, the jury will usually have to make inferences as to the scope of the joint enterprise from the knowledge and actions of individual participants'.³⁸⁸ The courts seem to avoid a more precise definition, favouring regarding the matter as one of fact and degree to be left to the jury.

The ambiguity surrounding the availability of the defence and its elements renders it all too easy for the courts to apply it in a confusing fashion. A good illustration of the confusion is the case of Rafferty.³⁸⁹ D and his co-defendants, P1 and P2, attacked V. D punched V twice. He then left the scene with V's cash card heading for an ATM. Meanwhile, P1 and P2 continued the attack on V escalating the violence by kicking him in the head and, finally, drowning him in the sea. D returned to find V dead. The trial judge left to the jury the question whether D had withdrawn from the enterprise (and, if so, whether he was then liable for causing the death as a principal). The Court of Appeal concluded, rightly it is submitted, that D could not be guilty as a principal—he was not a cause of death. Nor, applying the joint enterprise doctrine then in place, was D necessarily a secondary party: the acts of P1 and P2 could have constituted what was then a 'fundamentally different act' and could now, post-Jogee, be seen as an overwhelming supervening event. It is submitted that there was no issue of withdrawal.

6.9 Victims as parties to crime

It has been noted³⁹⁰ that when a statute creates a crime it does not generally provide that it shall be an offence to aid, abet, counsel or procure it. Such a provision is unnecessary, for it follows by implication of law. There is, however, one exception to this rule. Where the statute is designed for the protection of a certain class of persons it may be construed as excluding by implication the liability of any member of that class who is the victim of the offence, even though that member does in fact aid, abet, counsel or procure the offence.³⁹¹

In Tyrrell,³⁹² D, a girl between the ages of 13 and 16, abetted P to have unlawful sexual intercourse with her. This was an offence by P under s 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885.³⁹³ It was held, however, that D could not be convicted of abetting because the Act 'was passed for the purpose of protecting women and girls against themselves'.³⁹⁴ In ³⁸⁸ [2004] EWCA Crim 526, [65].

³⁸⁹ [2007] EWCA Crim 1846.

³⁹⁰ See p 178.

³⁹¹ See LC 305, para 5.24. See also: B Hogan, 'Victims as Parties to Crime' [1962] Crim LR 683; G Williams, 'Victims as Parties to Crimes—A Further Comment' [1964] Crim LR 686; G Williams, 'Victims and Other Exempt Parties in Crime' (1990) 10 LS 245; Criminal Law Revision Committee, Fifteenth Report, Sexual Offences (1984) Cmnd 9213, Appendix B.

³⁹² [1894] 1 QB 710.

³⁹³ See now Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 9; see p 805.

³⁹⁴ Per Lord Coleridge CJ at 712. Both the Chief Justice and Mathew J pointed out that there was nothing in the Act to say that the girl should be guilty of aiding and abetting; but, it is submitted, no importance could be attached to that, for statutes hardly ever do.

Pickford,³⁹⁵ the court held (though it was probably not necessary for the decision) that Tyrrell was applicable to the case of a woman committing incest with her 13-year-old son, but it is not obvious that s 11 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 (which made it an offence for the woman to permit 'her grandfather, father, brother or son' to have intercourse with her) was intended for the protection of anyone. Under the Sexual Offences Act 2003, there is nothing to prevent the boy being treated as a principal offender.

It has been held that a woman who is not pregnant can be convicted of abetting the use upon herself by another of an instrument with intent to procure her miscarriage, although the clear implication of the statute³⁹⁶ is that such a woman cannot be convicted of using an instrument on herself with that intent.³⁹⁷ However, a pregnant woman can be convicted (under the same section) of using an instrument on herself so it cannot be argued that this section was passed for the protection of women and it would be curious that Parliament should have intended to protect non-pregnant women from themselves, but not pregnant women. How far the rule in Tyrrell extends has not been settled. The court referred to 'women' as well as girls and it may well be that it extends to the offences of procuration of women to be prostitutes and of brothel-keeping which were in the 1885 Act and then in the Sexual Offences Act 1956.³⁹⁸ It was held that it applied to the prostitute who abets a man who is living off her earnings.³⁹⁹

In all these cases, it seems clear that the protection of the law extended only to a person of the class who is a victim. Thus, a child under 16 could be convicted of abetting P in having intercourse with another child under 16; a boy under 14 could be convicted, even before the Sexual Offences Act 1993, of abetting P in intercourse with another boy under 14; a prostitute could abet P in keeping a brothel in which she was not a participant, or of living on the earnings of another prostitute. There are many instances other than sexual offences where laws are passed for the protection of a particular class of persons.

The Supreme Court stated in *Gnango*⁴⁰⁰ that the principle should only apply if the offence is one that is intended to protect a specified class. This means, for example, that it does not apply to murder or offences against the person. By way of example, Lord Phillips suggested that the sadomasochists in *Brown*⁴⁰¹ would not only be guilty of GBH for inflicting that harm on each other, but could also be guilty of aiding and abetting the infliction of those injuries upon themselves.⁴⁰²

The Law Commission propose to preserve the Tyrell principle. There will be no liability where the principal offence is for the protection of a particular category of persons and both (a) D falls within that category and (b) he is the victim.⁴⁰³

³⁹⁵ [1995] 1 Cr App R 420, 428.

³⁹⁶ OAPA 1861, s 58; see Ch 15.

³⁹⁷ Sockett (1908) 72 JP 428; see p 646.

³⁹⁸ Sections 22–24, 28 and 29. Repealed, see now Sexual Offences Act 2003, ss 52–55.

³⁹⁹ Congdon [1990] NLJR 1221 (Judge Addison); Hogan [1962] Crim LR 683 at 692–693; Williams (1990) 10 LS 245 at 248–249. The offence is repealed by the Sexual Offences Act 2003, under which children are a protected class, but liable to conviction for participating in the sexual activity. Tyrell seems to be largely ignored in the 2003 Act. See the article developing this point and cataloguing the instances in which the Act deviates from the principle: M Bohlander, 'The Sexual Offences Act 2003—The Tyrell Principle—Criminalising the Victims' [2005] Crim LR 701.

⁴⁰⁰ [2011] UKSC 59, [44]–[53].

⁴⁰¹ [1994] 1 AC 212. See Ch 16.

⁴⁰² For criticism, see J Herring, 'Victims as Defendants: When Victims Participate in Crimes Against Themselves' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime: Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013).

⁴⁰³ LC 305, cl 16 of the Draft Bill.

6.10 Instigation for the purpose of entrapment

Police or other law enforcement officers or their agents sometimes do acts for the purpose of entrapping, or getting evidence against offenders, which would certainly amount to counselling or abetting an offence if they were not done for that purpose.⁴⁰⁴ The difficult question is how far an officer may go without himself incurring liability for the offence. Law enforcement officers have no general licence to aid and abet crime.

Two separate questions are involved: (a) in what circumstances will the law enforcement agency official have committed a crime by his encouragement and (b) in what circumstances will the person encouraged by the officer be entitled to rely on such entrapment to excuse his conduct? We are concerned here only with the first of those questions, the second being a matter only of a procedural defence in terms of stay of proceedings.⁴⁰⁵

It should be noted that where charges are brought in these circumstances for offences under ss 44 to 46 of the SCA 2007, a defence is available under s 50 where D proves (a) that he knew⁴⁰⁶ certain circumstances existed; and (b) that it was reasonable for him to act as he did in those circumstances.

6.10.1 Secondary liability for the agent provocateur

As long ago as 1929, the Royal Commission on Police Powers stated:⁴⁰⁷

As a general rule, the police should observe only, without participating in an offence, except in cases where an offence is habitually committed in circumstances in which observation by a third party is ex hypothesi impossible. Where participation is essential it should only be resorted to on the express and written authority of the Chief Constable.

In Sang,⁴⁰⁸ Lord Salmon said:

I would now refer to what is, I believe and hope, the unusual case, in which a dishonest policeman, anxious to improve his detection record, tries very hard with the help of an agent provocateur to induce a young man with no criminal record to commit a serious crime; and ultimately the young man reluctantly succumbs to the inducement...The policeman and the informer who had acted together in inciting him to commit the crime should...both be prosecuted and suitably punished.

It is not clear that the word 'dishonest' adds anything to the postulated facts and it should make no difference that the policeman's motive is hatred of crime. It can hardly be necessary that the person induced to act should be 'young'; and it might be even more serious to induce a person with a bad record who was 'going straight', for the consequences for him would be worse. These matters go to sentence, not liability.

The essence of the dictum seems to be that a person who would not otherwise have committed a particular crime is induced to do so,⁴⁰⁹ and the House of Lords in Looseley confirmed that this is the essential basis of the concept of entrapment in English law:

Whether the police conduct preceding the commission of the offence was no more than might be expected from others in the circumstances?⁴¹⁰

⁴⁰⁴ Williams, CLGP, s 256.

⁴⁰⁵ See, generally, the decision of the House of Lords in Looseley [2001] UKHL 53, [2002] 1 Cr App R 360 and Moore [2013] EWCA Crim 85. A Ashworth, 'Redrawing the Boundaries of Entrapment' [2002] Crim LR 161; D Ormerod and A Roberts, 'The Trouble with Teixeira: Developing a Principled Approach to Entrapment' (2002) Int J E & P 38; A Ashworth, 'Testing Fidelity to Legal Values: Official Involvement in Criminal Justice' (2000) 63 MLR 633, 642–652.

⁴⁰⁶ Note that it is not enough that D believed they existed. ⁴⁰⁷ (1929) Cmd 3297, 116.

⁴⁰⁸ (1979) 69 Cr App R 282 at 296.

⁴⁰⁹ cf Birtles [1969] 1 WLR 1047.

⁴¹⁰ Lord Nicholls, [23].

An officer who agrees, and intends, to participate in such an offence is guilty of conspiracy.⁴¹¹ Merely to provide the opportunity for and temptation to commit an offence will be lawful,⁴¹² as is participation in an offence which has already been ‘laid on’ and is going to be committed in any event, in order to trap the offenders.⁴¹³ In such a case it makes no difference that the police intervention may have affected the time or other circumstances of the commission of the offence.⁴¹⁴

Where there is a continuing general conspiracy—for example, to supply drugs to anyone asking for them—it seems that a law enforcement officer commits no offence by inducing the general conspirators to enter into a particular conspiracy within the ambit of the general conspiracy, for example to supply him with specified drugs.

It cannot be the law that the police may properly participate in a crime to the point at which irreparable damage is done. A policeman who assists P to commit murder in order to entrap him must be guilty of murder. It is submitted that the same must be true of any injury to the person, unless it is trivial and V consents to it; and probably to any damage to property, unless the owner consents.

The Law Commission propose a new defence where D shows (on the balance of probabilities) that he was acting in order to prevent the commission of an offence or occurrence of harm and it was reasonable to act as he did.⁴¹⁵

6.11 Reform of secondary liability

The recommendations in Law Commission Report No 305 would, if implemented, transform the scope of accessory liability. Taken together with Part 2 of the SCA 2007, there will, in effect, be eight types of liability for conduct that assists or encourages crime or is capable of doing so. Only a very short overview can be offered here. The likelihood of them being enacted is very low particularly since the decision in Jogee has sought to deal with one of the most troubling issues—that of joint enterprise.

- (1) First, D may be liable for an inchoate offence where he intentionally does acts capable of assisting or encouraging the commission of a crime by P. D must believe or be reckless as to whether P will act with the mens rea of the offence and D must intend or believe that any relevant consequences or circumstances of P’s offence will be satisfied (SCA 2007, s 44). This offence can be charged whether or not P commits the full offence.
- (2) Second, D may be liable for an inchoate offence where he does acts capable of assisting or encouraging the commission of a crime by P, and believes that the conduct element of the actus reus of the crime will be committed by P, believing or being reckless as to whether P will have the mens rea for the offence, and believing or being reckless as to whether any relevant consequences or circumstances of P’s offence will be satisfied (SCA 2007, s 45). The offence can be charged whether or not P commits the full offence.

⁴¹¹ Yip Chiu-Cheung v R, see p 459. See the Law Commission proposals on Conspiracy discussed at p 673.

⁴¹² Williams v DPP (1993) 98 Cr App R 209, DC where the ‘bait’ was cartons of cigarettes left in a vulnerable position. The court said that the police had not aided, abetted, etc: but had they not procured the commission of the offence? They would have regarded the operation as a failure if no one had stolen the cartons.

⁴¹³ McCann (1971) 56 Cr App R 359.

⁴¹⁴ McEvilly (1973) 60 Cr App R 150.

⁴¹⁵ cf s 50 of the SCA 2007, discussed at p 483 in which Parliament corrupted the Law Commission’s similar proposals in relation to incitement.

- (3) Third, D may be liable for an inchoate offence where he does acts capable of assisting or encouraging the commission of one of a number of specified crimes by P, and believes that one of those crimes will be committed by P, believing or being reckless as to whether P will possess any mens rea required for one of the offences, and believing or being reckless as to whether any relevant consequences or circumstances of one of those offences will be satisfied (SCA 2007, s 46). This offence can be charged whether or not P commits the full offence.

In each of these offences under the SCA 2007, liability is inchoate. It is arguable that the scope of criminal liability has extended too far by allowing for conviction and sentence for serious offences where D's conduct is so remote from the harm of the full offence—P need not even have attempted the principal crime.

- (4) Fourth,⁴¹⁶ D may be liable as an accessory⁴¹⁷ if D's conduct assists or encourages P in fact, whether directly or not, and whether the assistance or encouragement is substantial or not. The assistance or encouragement may be by acts (words or conduct), or omission if D is under a relevant duty (eg by contract or relationship), but not by failure to control P where D has a specific entitlement to do so. D must have a direct or oblique intent⁴¹⁸ that P commit the conduct element of the offence. This mens rea element is central to the Commission's proposals reflecting the need for parity of culpability between D and P⁴¹⁹ if D is to be prosecuted, labelled and sentenced in the same manner as P. It is not necessary that D intends P to commit the full offence. D must believe that the circumstances and consequences of P's offence will be satisfied, or D must himself have the mens rea for the full offence of which P commits the conduct element.⁴²⁰
- (5) Fifth, D will be liable for a joint venture⁴²¹ where he agrees with P to commit an offence or shares a common intention with P and D intended (directly or obliquely) that P or another party to the venture should commit the conduct element of the principal offence or believed that P or another would or might commit the conduct element of the offence. D would not be liable if P's act is outside the scope⁴²² of the joint venture.⁴²³ This would take the law back to the approach before Jogee in most respects.

It is significant that these fourth and fifth forms of liability replace aiding and abetting, counselling and procuring. They are considerably narrower than the present secondary liability presumably because there is no need to extend liability in view of the offences under ss 44 to 46 of the SCA 2007.

- (6) Sixth, in the case of homicide,⁴²⁴ a joint venture will be caught by the fifth category—D will be liable for murder⁴²⁵ if D intended to assist or encourage P to commit the relevant offence or D engaged in a joint criminal venture with P and realized that P or another party to the venture might commit the relevant offence. D would be liable for ⁴¹⁶ LC 305, Part III, especially at paras 3.15 et seq.

⁴¹⁷ Neither term is defined.

⁴¹⁸ LC 305, para 3.88. Cf Wilson arguing that it should be purposive intent—[2008] Crim LR 16.

⁴¹⁹ LC 305, para 3.80.

⁴²⁰ ibid, para 3.109.

⁴²¹ Which is undefined.

⁴²² Not defined.

⁴²³ For criticism, see Sullivan [2008] Crim LR 19, commenting on the absence of definition, heavy reliance on the existing law and the undue complexity resulting, and Buxton [2009] Crim LR 230, n 14 who regards them as 'unreasonably and unnecessarily' extending the scope of criminal liability and being 'very burdensome' to apply, at 243.

⁴²⁴ Special proposals for joint venture were made in LC 304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006) Part 4.

⁴²⁵ As defined in the LC Report, see Ch 12.

manslaughter if D and P were parties to a joint venture, P committed murder in relation to the fulfilment of that venture and D intended or foresaw that non-serious harm or the fear of harm might be caused by a party to the venture and a reasonable person in D's position and with D's knowledge of the relevant facts would have foreseen an obvious risk of death or serious injury being caused by a party to the venture.⁴²⁶ Again this would take the law back to the position before Jogee.

- (7) Seventh, D may be liable under a new statutory form of innocent agency.⁴²⁷ D will be liable if he intentionally caused P to commit the conduct element of the offence, but, although P does commit the conduct element, P is not guilty of the full offence because he is under ten, insane or lacks mens rea.⁴²⁸ D must also be proved to have the mens rea element of the offence he intended to cause. In the case of strict liability offences, D must know or believe that P would commit the offence (which he would even if he lacked mens rea) in the circumstances and with the consequences it requires.⁴²⁹ The new offence will extend to cases where the offence committed by P is only capable of being committed by a person of a particular description (eg a licensee), even if D is not such a person. There is no requirement that D needs to believe that the full offence will be committed or that it will be committed by P himself.⁴³⁰
- (8) Eighth, D may be liable where he intentionally causes a 'no fault' offence⁴³¹ to be committed by P and D knew or believed that his conduct would cause the offence to be committed.⁴³² It will be sufficient that D causes the circumstances of the no fault offence to be committed, for example with drink-driving, it is enough that D laces P's drinks causing the circumstance element (that P is over the limit) without causing the conduct element (the driving of a motor vehicle).

The Law Commission also propose to preserve the Tyrell principle, and create a defence for those acting in order to prevent the commission of an offence or occurrence of harm where it was reasonable to act in that way.

The Law Commission's proposals for secondary liability as set out in its Report No 305⁴³³ were designed to represent a coherent scheme complementing the inchoate offences recommended by the Commission in Report No 300. However, the coherence has been lost. First, Parliament enacted the inchoate liability provisions in the SCA 2007, but in doing so made fundamental changes to the scope of those provisions. Secondly, although the SCA 2007 is in force, the proposals in relation to secondary liability are not likely to be enacted. Finally, and more worryingly, the government's amendment of the scheme for incitement proposed in Report No 300 and enacted in the SCA 2007 led to wider offences and a change to the scope of the defences available. To maintain coherence, it seems that the Law Commission proposals on secondary parties will have to be similarly expanded. The logical conclusion is that in its future proposals in this area the Commission is now forced to offer wider offences to maintain consistency and coherence with the SCA 2007 provisions.⁴³⁴

⁴²⁶ The proposal was supported by the government in its paper Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2008), 19/08 at paras 89–90. The proposals were not taken forward into the Coroners and Justice Act 2009.

⁴²⁷ See LC 305, Part IV.

⁴²⁸ It is not enough that P was under duress, etc.

⁴²⁹ D aged ten tells P aged nine to have sex with V aged nine. D must know or believe that V will be under 13 (circumstances as to age being strict under s 5 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003).

⁴³⁰ For critical comment, see RD Taylor [2008] Crim LR 19.

⁴³¹ ie a strict liability offence—where no proof of mens rea is required as to one or more elements of the actus reus.

⁴³² LC 305, para 4.31.

⁴³³ (2007) on which see Wilson [2008] Crim LR 3; Taylor [2008] Crim LR 32; Sullivan [2008] Crim LR 19; J Horder, 'Joint Criminal Ventures and Murder' in J Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (2012).

⁴³⁴ See the proposals on conspiracy and attempts discussed in Ch 11.

Assistance after the offence

7.1 Impeding the apprehension or prosecution of offenders

Someone who assists or encourages another to commit a crime may be liable as a secondary party under the common law and s 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 as discussed in the previous chapter. In addition, there are specific offences for those who offer assistance to an offender after the commission of his offence.¹ The general offence is found in s 4 of the Criminal Law Act 1967:²

- (1) Where a person has committed a relevant offence,^[3] any other person who, knowing or believing him to be guilty of the offence or of some other relevant offence, does without lawful authority or reasonable excuse any act with intent to impede his apprehension or prosecution shall be guilty of an offence.
- (1A) In this section and section 5 below, ‘relevant offence’ means—
 - (a) an offence for which the sentence is fixed by law,
 - (b) an offence for which a person of 18 years or over (not previously convicted) may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of five years (or might be so sentenced but for the restrictions imposed by section 33 of the Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980).
- (2) If on the trial of an indictment for a relevant offence the jury are satisfied that the offence charged (or some other offence of which the accused might on that charge be found guilty) was committed, but find the accused not guilty of it, they may find him guilty of any offence under subsection (1) above of which they are satisfied that he is guilty in relation to the offence charged (or that other offence).
- (3) A person committing an offence under subsection (1) above with intent to impede another person’s apprehension or prosecution shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment according to the gravity of the other person’s offence, as follows:—
 - (a) if that offence is one for which the sentence is fixed by law, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than ten years;

¹ G Williams, ‘Evading Justice’ [1975] Crim LR 430; KJM Smith, A Modern Treatise on Complicity (1991) Ch 1.

² Similar offences are provided for in specific contexts, including the wide offences of failing to disclose information related to terrorism: s 38B(1)(B) and s 38B(2) of the Terrorism Act 2000. See C Walker, ‘Conscripting the Public in Terrorism Policing: Towards Safer Communities or a Police State?’ [2010] Crim LR 441, and on the relationship with s 4 see Girma [2009] EWCA Crim 912; Sherif [2008] EWCA Crim 2653.

³ The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 abolished the concept of ‘arrestable offence’; and in this context replaced it with the term ‘relevant offence’.

- (b) if it is one for which a person (not previously convicted) may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of fourteen years, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than seven years;
 - (c) if it is not one included above but is one for which a person (not previously convicted) may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of ten years, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than five years;
 - (d) in any other case, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than three years.
- (4) No proceedings shall be instituted for an offence under subsection (1) above except by or with the consent of the Director of Public Prosecutions.⁴

The effect of *Courtie*⁵ is that the section creates four offences, punishable with ten, seven, five and three years' imprisonment respectively.

The CPS suggests that examples of the type of conduct appropriate for a charge of assisting an offender (the 'principal offender', 'O' in this chapter) include: hiding a principal offender; otherwise assisting a principal offender to avoid arrest; assisting a principal offender to abscond from bail; lying to the police to protect principal offenders from investigation and prosecution; hiding the weapon used in an assault/robbery; and washing clothes worn by a principal offender to obstruct any potential scientific examination.⁶ In some instances, those who have assisted offenders are charged with perverting the course of justice rather than s 4.⁷

7.1.1 Actus reus

There are two elements in the actus reus where D is charged with impeding the apprehension or prosecution of an offender, O: (a) a relevant offence must have been committed by the offender, and (b) D must have done 'any act' with the appropriate intent. No one may be convicted of an attempt to commit this offence.⁸

7.1.1.1 Proof of a relevant offence

The relevant offence alleged to have been committed by O must be specified in the indictment.⁹ If, however, it turns out that O was not guilty of the specified offence, D may still be convicted if O was guilty of another relevant offence for which O might have been convicted

⁴ Consent may be granted after charge but must be before proceedings commence. Consent must be obtained before proceedings are started by way of summons. In Walker [2016] EWCA Crim 751, [2016] Crim LR 848, Treacy LJ held that s 4(4) is satisfied if proceedings are instituted by the DPP or if the proceedings are instituted with her consent. His lordship concluded that as matter of statutory construction, if the DPP institutes the proceedings the requirements of the subsection are satisfied and there is no need for a separate consent to be given. Consent is only required if some person other than the DPP, such as the police, institutes the criminal proceedings.

⁵ See p 31. That is, if the maximum sentence differs depending on how the crime is committed, each form of offence with a different maximum is a separate offence.

⁶ Charging Standard for Public Justice Offences: www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/public-justice-offences-incorporating-charging-standard/.

⁷ On which see SM Edwards, 'Perjury and Perverting the Course of Justice Considered' [2003] Crim LR 525. The CPS suggests that perverting the course of justice should be considered when: the assisting is aimed at preventing or hindering the trial process (as opposed to the arrest or apprehension of an accused); the facts are so serious that the court's sentencing powers for the statutory offence are considered inadequate; admissible evidence of the principal offence is lacking; Charging Standard for Public Justice Offences. Cf R v T [2011] EWCA Crim 729.

⁸ Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 1(4)(c).

⁹ Presumably this can include O's liability for secondary or inchoate offences.

on an indictment for the original specified offence.¹⁰ So, for example, if it is alleged that O committed murder and it transpires at D's trial that O was not guilty of murder but was guilty of manslaughter or attempted murder, because O could, at his trial for murder, have been convicted of those offences, D may be convicted of assisting under s 4. It is not necessary to direct the jury to find what offence D thought O had committed, though this may be a material factor in the imposition of sentence.¹¹

It is only necessary to prove that the offence was committed, not that O was guilty.¹² If O is tried first, it is immaterial that O is acquitted if it can be proved at D's later trial that O was guilty. Even where O and D are tried together, O's acquittal should not, in principle, be conclusive if it can be proved, as against D, that O committed the offence.¹³ However, O's conviction is presumptive evidence that he did commit the offence: PACE 1984, s 74. If D is tried first, it is not necessary to prove O's guilt, merely that the offence was committed. In Zaman,¹⁴ D pleaded guilty before O was even tried. O was subsequently acquitted. D appealed claiming that there could be no offence under s 4. The Court of Appeal rightly rejected that argument. The court held that it was immaterial whether D 'knew' or merely 'believed' O had committed the offence. With respect, it is submitted that a distinction may need to be drawn in practice between cases of belief and knowledge. In a case where D merely believes O has committed the offence, D's plea does not establish that O has committed the offence. Whereas, in a case where D *knows*¹⁵ that O has committed the offence, the plea can fulfil the prosecution's obligation to establish that the offence was committed. Perhaps D ought not to have pleaded at all unless he knew (and not merely believed) that O had committed the offence.

7.1.1.2 An act of assistance

Once O's relevant offence has been proved, the remaining element in D's actus reus—'any act'—is almost unlimited.¹⁶ There must be an act—an omission will not suffice!¹⁷—but it need not be an act having a natural tendency to impede the apprehension or prosecution of an offender. Where the act does not have such a tendency, however, it will be difficult to prove the intent, in the absence of an admission. Common examples of sufficient 'acts' will be concealing the offender, providing him with transport, food or money to enable him to escape, or destroying evidence against him. The mere making of an oral offer of accommodation

¹⁰ Criminal Law Act 1967, s 6(3); Morgan [1972] 1 QB 436. Quaere whether the same principle is applicable to other provisions allowing conviction of offences other than that charged. NB: n 5.

¹¹ ibid.

¹² In Saunders [2011] EWCA Crim 1571, D's conviction was quashed because the judge had failed to direct the jury as to the elements of the relevant offences.

¹³ cf Shannon [1975] AC 717, [1975] Crim LR 703; Donald (1986) 83 Cr App R 49, [1986] Crim LR 535; G Williams [1975] Crim LR 430 at 432. On the use of an offender's incriminating statements at a joint trial, see Hayter [2005] UKHL 6, [2005] Crim LR 720 and Y [2008] EWCA Crim 10, [2008] Crim LR 466; cf Girma, n 2.

¹⁴ [2010] EWCA Crim 209, citing with approval this paragraph in the 12th edition. See further commentary at [2010] Crim LR 574; see also Saunders [2011] EWCA Crim 1571.

¹⁵ ie had belief of a true fact: Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2007] 1 AC 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

¹⁶ For discussion of the broader question of when citizens should have a duty to report offences, see A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 60–65 and A Ashworth and L Zedner, Preventative Justice (2014) 100–101. For discussion of a citizen's general duty to disclose, see S Wallerstein, 'On the Legitimacy of Imposing Direct and Indirect Obligations to Disclose Information on Non-Suspects' in GR Sullivan and IH Dennis (eds), Seeking Security, Pre-Emptying the Commission of Criminal Harms (2012) 37.

¹⁷ cf the offence under s 38B of the Terrorism Act 2000 whereby a person may commit the offence through total inactivity, eg by not answering police questions or by not volunteering information.

may be a sufficient act for these purposes.¹⁸ It does not matter that D regrets his acts and persuades O to turn himself in; the offence is committed.¹⁹

According to the Criminal Law Revision Committee (CLRC),²⁰ when drafting this offence, ‘The requirement that there should be an attempt to “impede” a prosecution will exclude mere persuasion not to prosecute.’ Yet words are no doubt a sufficient act; so that the offence would be committed by intentionally misdirecting police who were pursuing an offender, or by making a false statement to the police.²¹

An act done through an agent would be sufficient. Indeed, when done with intent to impede, the mere authorization of the agent would be a sufficient act to constitute the offence, though the agent never acted on it.

7.1.1.3 Relationship to escape

It is clearly not an offence under s 4 to enable a convicted offender (as opposed to one awaiting trial) to escape from gaol; but this is not important as such acts will amount to other offences.²² Whether it is an offence to assist an offender who has escaped to remain at large depends on the interpretation of ‘apprehension’ in s 4. Does it extend beyond its obvious meaning of apprehension with a view to prosecution and include the re-arrest of the escaped convicted prisoner? There seems to be no reason why it should not be so interpreted.

7.1.2 Mens rea

There are two elements in the mens rea: (a) D must know or believe the offender to be guilty of the relevant offence which he had actually committed, or some other relevant offence; and (b) D must intend to impede the apprehension or prosecution of the offender.

7.1.2.1 Know or believe

‘Know’ presumably means hold a true belief.²³ Belief is, presumably, to be construed as elsewhere, for example as in handling stolen goods; if so it adds little to ‘knowing’.²⁴ If the mens rea was limited to knowledge alone, it would be difficult to prove. Is wilful blindness sufficient? If D has a mere suspicion that O is an offender and, shutting his eyes to an obvious means of knowledge, assists O, he can hardly be said to ‘believe’ in O’s guilt. Arguably, the subsection is unduly narrow in this respect.²⁵ In Sherif,²⁶ dealing with the offence under the Terrorism Act 2000, S was held, under s 38B, to have known or believed that the London bombings of 21 July 2005 were to take place and failed to give information. The judge was entitled in his direction to make it plain ‘that it was not sufficient for the prosecution to establish that a defendant had closed his eyes, but that the jury was entitled to conclude, if satisfied that he had deliberately closed his eyes to the obvious because he did not wish to be told the truth, that that fact was capable of being evidence to support a conclusion that that defendant either knew or believed the fact in question’.

¹⁸ Sherif [2008] EWCA Crim 2693.

¹⁹ That is a matter of mitigation in sentence: Roberts [2008] EWCA Crim 59; Robinson [2007] EWCA Crim 3120, [2008] 2 Cr App R (S) 201, CA.

²⁰ Cmnd 2659, para 28.

²¹ This would amount to other offences as well. See Law Commission, Offences Relating to Interference with the Course of Justice (1979), Law Com No 96, HC Paper No 213 (Session 1979/80) Pt III.

²² Prison breaking, escape and rescue are offences at common law. See the 6th edition of this book, at Ch 19.3.

²³ Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

²⁴ Ismail [1977] Crim LR 557, CA; Grainge [1974] 1 All ER 928, [1974] Crim LR 180, CA; Griffiths (1974) 60 Cr App R 14, CA; see p 1050.

²⁵ See p 116. ²⁶ [2008] EWCA Crim 2653, [27].

Where the allegation is that D knew or believed of ‘... the offence’—the relevant offence which has actually been committed—the mens rea is probably governed both by ‘knowing’ and ‘believing’. Where the allegation is that the knowledge or belief relates to some ‘other relevant offence’, the issue must be governed only by ‘believing’ since, ex hypothesi, the offence has not been committed and, therefore, D cannot ‘know’ it has.

7.1.2.2 Knowledge or belief as to what?

In order to know or believe that a relevant offence has been committed, D need not know the law. It will be enough that he believes in the existence of facts which, whether D knows it or not, amount in law to a relevant offence.²⁷ His ignorance of the law cannot afford a defence.

It is immaterial that D is unaware of O’s identity.²⁸ What if he makes a mistake of identity? If D thinks he sees R committing a relevant offence and acts, intending to impede his apprehension or prosecution, is D guilty under s 4 if he was in fact witnessing O commit the crime?

Perhaps the question should be answered by making a distinction. If D does an act which he intends to assist the person whom he in fact observed, his mistake of identity should be immaterial. For example, D sends a police officer, who is pursuing the offender, in the wrong direction. Here D knows that the person he is assisting has committed a relevant offence, and that person has in fact done so. Suppose, on the other hand, that D fabricates evidence the following day so as to provide an alibi for R and this evidence could not, and was of course not, intended to assist O, of whom D has never heard. Here he does not intend to assist the person whom he in fact observed. An indictment in these circumstances charging D with doing an act, knowing O to be guilty of a relevant offence and with intent to impede his prosecution, is plainly bad. If R has never committed a relevant offence, it would seem that D is not guilty under the section;²⁹ if R once did commit a relevant offence, then D is guilty unless the limitation tentatively suggested in the previous paragraph be imposed.

7.1.2.3 Some other relevant offence

‘Some other relevant offence’ must refer to an offence which O has not committed, for otherwise the words are redundant.³⁰ If D thinks he has seen O commit a robbery and acts with intent to conceal this, he will be guilty, though O had in fact committed a murder and not a robbery. This is obviously correct, where, as in this example, D’s belief relates to the transaction which constituted the actual offence. Suppose, however, that unknown to D, O committed murder last week. D believes, wrongly, that O committed bigamy two years ago. If D does an act with intent to impede O’s prosecution for bigamy—such as burning O’s letters—it would seem very odd indeed that D should be liable only because O committed murder last week—the murder has nothing to do with the case. This suggests that the offence D supposes O to have committed must arise from the same transaction as the actual offence (and, undoubtedly, this will normally be the case) but to so hold would require the imposition of some limitation on the express words of the section.³¹

7.1.2.4 With intent

D’s act must be done with intent to impede the offender’s apprehension or prosecution. It does not matter that D’s act done with intent proves to be of no assistance to O whatsoever. It must be proved that D’s purpose was to impede; it is not enough that D knew his act would ²⁷ cf Sykes v DPP [1962] AC 528 at 563.

²⁸ Brindley [1971] 2 QB 300.

²⁹ Nor could D be convicted of an attempt to commit the offence. See Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 1(4)(c), n 8; for discussion of the offence as a specific form of preparatory offence, see Duff, Answering for Crime, 160.

³⁰ NB: p 237.

³¹ cf the discussion of s 5, p 241.

certainly impede if that was not his object or one of his objects; that is, a 'direct' and not merely an 'oblique' intention is required.³² This, at least, seems to be the CLRC's view of the clause which became s 4. Discussing the case of harbouring, they wrote:

If the harbouring is done with the object of impeding apprehension or prosecution . . . it will be within the offence; if it is done merely by way of providing or continuing to provide the criminal with accommodation in the ordinary way, it will not; and juries will be able to tell the difference.³³

If this is the correct interpretation of the section, then a handler of stolen goods will not be guilty of an offence under s 4, even where he knows that his conduct has the effect of impeding the apprehension or prosecution of the thief, if that is not his object or purpose.³⁴ Nor is D guilty if, by acts done with the object of avoiding his own arrest or prosecution, he knowingly impedes the arrest or prosecution of another.³⁵ Where there is prima facie evidence of the necessary intent, it is for D to lay a foundation for a defence by introducing evidence that his sole purpose was of a different character. In the absence of such evidence, there is no duty to direct a jury to consider whether D might have had a different intent.³⁶ If D has the dual object of saving himself and the other from arrest or prosecution then, no doubt, he is guilty.

7.1.2.5 Lawful authority

Even though the act is done with intent to impede, it is not an offence if there is 'lawful authority or reasonable excuse' for it. According to the CLRC:³⁷

The exception for 'lawful authority' will cover an executive decision against a prosecution, and that for 'reasonable excuse' will avoid extending the offence to acts such as destroying the evidence of an offence (for example a worthless cheque) in pursuance of a legitimate agreement to refrain from prosecuting in consideration of the making good of loss caused by that offence.

It is possible that the exception may have some application outside this situation.³⁸ As with the Prevention of Crime Act 1953,³⁹ it enables the courts to afford a defence in circumstances in which they think it reasonable to do so.

7.1.3 The sentence

Section 4(3)⁴⁰ provides for a sliding scale of sentences which is related to the relevant offence which has actually been committed. Where D believes that some other relevant offence has been committed, the punishment to which he is liable is fixed according to the actus reus, not according to the mens rea. If D acts with intent to impede the apprehension of O whom he believes to have committed malicious wounding⁴¹ (maximum, five years), he is liable to three years' imprisonment if his belief is correct; but if O has in fact committed murder, he is liable to ten years.

It is clear that the relevant offence by O which fixes the maximum sentence for D under s 4 must have been committed when the act of impeding by D takes place. D, rightly believing O to be guilty of malicious wounding, acts to impede his arrest. Subsequently, O's victim, V, dies, and O becomes guilty of murder. D is liable to only three and not ten years' imprisonment.

³² See pp 91, 98.

³³ Cmnd 2659, para 30.

³⁴ Andrews and Craig [1962] 3 All ER 961n.

³⁵ Jones [1949] 1 KB 194.

³⁶ Brindley [1971] 2 QB 300 at 304.

³⁷ Cmnd 2659, para 28.

³⁸ Would a spouse have a reasonable excuse for assisting their spouse? See P Pace, "Impeding Arrest": A Wife's Right as a Spouse? [1978] Crim LR 82. According to Lee Shek Ching v R [1986] LRC (Crim) 718 (Hong Kong, CA), 1985, No 53, being O's wife is not, as such, a reasonable excuse. See T [2011] EWCA Crim 729.

³⁹ See p 747.

⁴⁰ See p 235.

⁴¹ See p 689.

7.2 Compounding an offence

Section 5(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 enacts an offence, triable either way, as follows:

Where a person has committed a relevant offence,^[42] any other person who, knowing or believing that the offence or some other relevant offence has been committed, and that he has information which might be of material assistance in securing the prosecution or conviction of an offender for it, accepts or agrees to accept for not disclosing that information any consideration other than the making good of loss or injury caused by the offence, or the making of reasonable compensation for that loss or injury, shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for not more than two years.

Proceedings may not be instituted without the consent of the DPP.⁴³ Section 5 replaced two much wider common law misdemeanours: ‘compounding a felony’⁴⁴ and ‘misprision of felony’.⁴⁵ The former consisted in an agreement for consideration not to prosecute, or to impede a prosecution for, a felony. The latter consisted simply in an omission to report a felony to the police. Section 5 is narrower than misprision in that the offence is committed only if D accepts or agrees to accept a consideration for not disclosing the information relating to the relevant offence. It is narrower than compounding in that it is not now criminal to accept or agree to accept consideration for not disclosing information relating to the relevant offence, if the consideration is no more than the making good of the loss or injury caused by the offence or the making of reasonable compensation for that loss or injury. No one may be convicted of attempting to commit an offence under s 5(1).⁴⁶

7.2.1 Actus reus

There are two elements in the actus reus: (a) a relevant offence must actually have been committed; and (b) D must accept or agree to accept consideration for not disclosing information which he knows or believes to be material.

The offence extends to all relevant offences. The limit on the scope of s 5 is provided by s 5(5): ‘The compounding of an offence other than treason shall not be an offence otherwise than under this section.’ D commits no offence by agreeing to accept any consideration for not prosecuting a non-relevant offence, though whether as a matter of public policy the resulting contract is enforceable is another matter.

The offence is committed only where D ‘accepts or agrees to accept’ the consideration. The section envisages an offer being made to D; if the offer comes from D, then he might also be guilty of the more serious offence of blackmail.⁴⁷ Consideration presumably bears much the same meaning as in the law of contract and extends to money, goods, services or any act or forbearance.

7.2.2 Mens rea

There are two elements in the mens rea. It must be proved that: (a) D knew or believed that a relevant offence had been committed; and (b) D intended to accept or to agree to accept consideration other than the making good of loss or the making of reasonable compensation.

⁴² The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, Sch 7, replaced ‘arrestable offence’ with ‘relevant offence’.

⁴³ Section 5(3). ⁴⁴ G Williams [1975] Crim LR 430.

⁴⁵ See the 1st edition of this book, at pp 539–544.

⁴⁶ Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 1(4)(c), n 8. ⁴⁷ See Ch 24.

7.2.2.1 Knowledge or belief

These terms should be construed in the same manner as in s 4.

7.2.2.2 Knowledge or belief as to what?

Where D's knowledge or belief relates to the relevant offence (A) which has actually been committed, the application of the section seems quite straightforward. But D's belief may relate to some other relevant offence (B) which, ex hypothesi, has not been committed. Here D's acceptance, or agreement to accept consideration, must relate to the offence B which D believes to have been committed and thus not to the offence which has actually been committed since they are different. Under this section, D's belief need not—as, under s 4, it probably must⁴⁸—be that a relevant offence has been committed by the same person who has in fact committed such an offence. If D wrongly supposes that he has seen a relevant offence committed by R and accepts consideration for not disclosing what he saw, he will be guilty if, in fact, he saw O committing a relevant offence.

The argument advanced in connection with s 4, that D's belief must relate to the transaction which resulted in the actual offence, is much stronger in relation to s 5. If D wrongly supposes that R has committed a relevant offence and accepts consideration for not disclosing that fact, his guilt can hardly be established by proving that some time, somewhere, someone committed a relevant offence—for example, that Harold Shipman committed murder. The offence which D supposes to have been committed must have something to do with the offence which has actually been committed. The most obvious point of connection is that the real and the supposed offence must both arise out of the same transaction. An alternative view might be that it is sufficient if either (a) the two offences arise out of the same transaction or (b) they both relate to the same person. Unknown to D, O committed murder last week. D believes, wrongly, that O committed bigamy two years ago. O offers money to D 'to keep his mouth shut'. D, believing that O is talking about the bigamy, accepts. According to the first view put above, D is not guilty; according to the alternative view, he is. It is submitted that the first view is better; according to the second, D's liability depends entirely on chance.

If D's acceptance of consideration relates to the transaction in question, then it seems that it will be immaterial that he is mistaken as to both (a) the nature of the relevant offence and (b) the identity of the perpetrator. He supposes he saw R perpetrating a robbery. Actually, he saw O committing murder. If he accepts consideration for not disclosing what he saw he should be guilty.

The CLRC stated:⁴⁹

the offence will not apply to a person who refrains from giving information because he does not think it right that the offender should be prosecuted or because of a promise of reparation by the offender. It would be difficult to justify making the offence apply to those cases.

It is difficult to see, however, how it can be a defence for D simply to say that he did not 'think it right that the offender should be prosecuted', if he has accepted consideration for not disclosing information. Even if the court believes D's views as to the impropriety of the contemplated prosecution, he still falls within the express words of the section. He could be acquitted only if the section were interpreted so as to require that D's object or motive be the acquisition of the consideration. As we have seen,⁵⁰ on a charge under s 4 it is probable that a purpose of impeding must be proved, but this may be justified by giving a narrow meaning ⁴⁸ See p 239.

⁴⁹ Cmnd 2659, para 41.

⁵⁰ See p 239.

to the ulterior intent specified in that section. No ulterior intent is specified in s 5 and, consequently, it is difficult to see how the section can be limited in the same way.

7.2.2.3 Relationship with advertising for return of stolen goods

It may seem a little surprising that a specific offence of advertising rewards for the return of goods stolen or lost has been retained.⁵¹ Section 23 of the Theft Act provides:

Where any public advertisement of a reward for the return of any goods which have been stolen or lost uses any words to the effect that no questions will be asked, or that the person producing the goods will be safe from apprehension or inquiry, or that any money paid for the purchase of the goods or advanced by way of loan on them will be repaid, the person advertising the reward and any person who prints or publishes the advertisement shall on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

Insofar as an advertisement states that 'no questions will be asked' this is only proposing what is perfectly lawful under s 5(1) of the Criminal Law Act.⁵² It is not clear why this should be an offence because it is done through a public advertisement. Nor is it clear why it should be an offence to offer a reward for the return of stolen goods, even their return by the thief. The promise to pay the reward might be unenforceable for lack of consideration but, if it were actually paid, there would be nothing unlawful about that. Possibly the theory is that, if such advertisements were common, theft might be encouraged in that thieves would have an easy and safe way of disposing of the stolen goods for reward. This cannot apply to an advertisement addressed to the bona fide purchaser offering to recompense him if he will return the stolen goods; this seems quite a reasonable thing to do, especially since the bona fide purchaser commits no offence by retaining the goods for himself.⁵³

The section creates what the courts are pleased to call a 'quasi-criminal' offence, not requiring mens rea, so the advertising manager of a company was liable for the publication of an advertisement which he had not read.⁵⁴ 'Stolen' bears the wide meaning given to that word by s 24(4) of the Theft Act so the bona fide purchaser may indeed have become the absolute owner of the goods where, for example, they have been obtained by fraud and the property in the goods passed.

7.3 Refusal to aid a constable

It is a common law offence for D to refuse to go to the aid of a constable who, on seeing a breach of the peace, calls on D to assist him in restoring the peace.⁵⁵ A ticket collector was held to be guilty of the offence when he failed to come to the assistance of a police officer struggling with a thief. His defence that he had obeyed instructions not to leave his post was not accepted.⁵⁶ There must be a reasonable necessity for the constable to request assistance. It is no defence that D's aid would have been ineffective. So where a constable requested D to assist him in suppressing a breach of the peace among four or five hundred people at a prize-fight, Alderson B directed that D's refusal was an offence.⁵⁷ It seems that it was no answer ⁵¹ The section replaced the Larceny Act 1861, s 102 which provided for a penalty of £50 recoverable by a common informer. The fine was increased to £100 by the Common Informers Act 1951. The CLRC hesitantly recommended retention 'as advertisements of this kind may encourage dishonesty': Eighth Report, para 144.

⁵² See p 241. ⁵³ See p 1033.

⁵⁴ Denham v Scott (1983) 77 Cr App R 210, [1983] Crim LR 558, DC.

⁵⁵ See the valuable article by D Nicholson, 'The Citizen's Legal Duty to Assist the Police' [1992] Crim LR 611.

⁵⁶ Wagh (1976) The Times, 1 Oct (Knightsbridge Crown Court).

⁵⁷ Brown (1841) Car & M 314. Cf Sherlock (1866) LR 1 CCR 20.

that he had his horses to take care of. Alderson B⁵⁸ recognized that physical impossibility or a lawful excuse would be an answer; but it is not clear what would constitute 'lawful excuse'. Is the citizen required to act where there would be a grave risk of death or serious injury? Surely the State cannot criminalize D for a failure to put his life on the line?

By s 65(3) of the Serious Crime Act 2007 a person does not perform an act capable of assisting or encouraging crime by the offender merely because he fails to respond to a constable's request for assistance in preventing a breach of the peace.

7.4 Reform

In the wake of scandals involving the failure by schools and other bodies to report systemic child abuse, there were calls from a number of quarters to introduce into English law a duty to report child abuse and criminal offences for failing to do so.⁵⁹ Sir Keir Starmer QC, the former DPP, stated: 'If you're in a position of authority or responsibility in relation to children, and you have cause to believe that a child has been abused, or is about to be abused, you really ought to do something about it.'⁶⁰ Such an offence exists in all the jurisdictions in the United States⁶¹ and applies to those who may come into professional contact with children.⁶² In his analysis of such offences,⁶³ Andrew Ashworth states that their justification is to improve the protection afforded to victims. As Ashworth also points out, however, the problem with offences such as these is that, at least in the familial context, it may be the case that the individual who has failed to discharge the duty is herself a victim of abuse. Ashworth states that this does not necessarily militate against enacting offences such as these, but does serve to emphasize the importance of sensitivity in the familial context, especially given the possibility for potential gendered unfairness. The most intractable problem with offences of failure to report generally, according to Ashworth, is definition. How far should the duty extend? This difficulty would, however, be overcome if the duty to report was limited to sexual abuse against children and, perhaps, only extended to those who occupy a duty of care. It remains to be seen whether such offences will be enacted in England and Wales. Note that s 5B of the Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003 imposes duties on health-care professionals and teachers (and social workers in Wales) to notify the police of acts of female genital mutilation that they discover to have been carried out.⁶⁴ Failure to make the required notification is not, however, an offence.

⁵⁸ In Brown, ibid.

⁵⁹ See the editorial at [2014] Crim LR 1. As Ashworth points out, if such an offence were to be created, it would need to be widely publicized so that citizens were aware they were under such a duty.

⁶⁰ www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-24772777.

⁶¹ The Australian state of Victoria has now enacted such an offence. See www.theguardian.com/world/2014/may/08/child-abuse-non-reporting-will-be-an-offence-in-victoria.

⁶² SG Thompson, 'The White-Collar Police Force: "Duty to Report" Statutes in Criminal Law Theory' (2002) 11 William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 3.

⁶³ A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2nd edn, 2015) 62–66.

⁶⁴ For further discussion, see K Cook, 'Female Genital Mutilation in the UK Population: A Serious Crime' (2016) 80 J Crim L 88.

8

Corporate and vicarious liability

8.1 Liability of corporations

8.1.1 Introduction

This chapter deals with the potential criminal liability of organizations, focusing predominantly on corporations.¹ It is common to speak of the criminal liability of companies, but of course a company is only one type of incorporated business. Corporations include public limited companies (plc) and private limited companies (Ltd) as well as limited liability partnerships (LLP) and other organizations such as local authorities. The formality of incorporation and its extensive legal ramifications need not detain us.² What is important for present purposes is that corporations have a separate legal identity. They are treated in law as having a legal personality distinct from the natural persons—members, directors, employees, etc—who make up the corporation. That presents the opportunity, in theory, of imposing criminal liability on the corporation separately from any liability which might be imposed on the individual members for any criminal wrongdoing.

The number of corporations and the involvement they have in diverse aspects of daily life has expanded dramatically over the last century. In more recent years, it appears that the public perception of corporations has moved towards the true legal position: that the corporation is a free-standing entity, distinct from the people who manage and control it.³ With this perception has come an expectation that a corporation might properly be regarded as ¹ For detailed study, see C Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility (2nd edn, 2001); D Bergman, The Case for Corporate Responsibility (2000); J Gobert and M Punch, Rethinking Corporate Crime (2003); A Pinto QC and M Evans, Corporate Criminal Liability (2003); C Harding, Criminal Enterprise: Individuals Organisation and Criminal Responsibility (2007); J Gobert, 'Corporate Criminality: New Crimes for the Times' [1994] Crim LR 722; GR Sullivan, 'Expressing Corporate Guilt' (1995) 15 OJLS 281. For reviews of more recent developments, see C Wells, 'Corporate Criminal Liability: A Ten Year Review' [2014] Crim LR 847 and 'Corporate Failure to Prevent Economic Crime—A Proposal' [2017] Crim LR 426. The meaning of the corporation for the purposes of the criminal law was also reviewed in a valuable appendix to LCCP 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010) by Professor Wells. See also Wells, 'Corporate Crime: Opening the Eyes of the Sentry' (2010) 30 LS 370 at 380–382.

² See the Companies Act 2006, ss 1 et seq.

³ See Wells, n 1 and N Lacey, 'Philosophical Foundations of the Common Law' in J Horder (ed), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (2000), 33. See also P Alldridge, Relocating Criminal Law (2000) considering how corporate liability challenges our perceptions of personhood, at 76–82.

culpable in criminal law separately from, although in addition to, its directors for deaths, breaches of health and safety, etc.⁴

Historically, the pressure for the imposition of criminal liability focused specifically on the issue of punishing companies for manslaughter. The various disasters, each with large loss of life—in particular the Herald of Free Enterprise ferry disaster and various rail crashes (Southall, Ladbroke Grove, Paddington, Hatfield)—all prompted calls for new legislation fixing the corporation with liability. The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 (hereafter in this chapter ‘the 2007 Act’) seeks to meet these demands, and is examined in detail in Ch 14 along with other manslaughter offences. The 2007 Act imposes liability for manslaughter on ‘organizations’. This concept is much wider than corporations.⁵ The special policy considerations that flow from the unique harm of causing a death make it desirable for the corporate manslaughter provisions to apply to a wide range of organizations. This chapter deals with the potential criminal liability of associations—including corporations—other than for manslaughter. In recent years, there has been greater pressure to hold companies liable for various financial and economic crimes, such as fraud, money laundering and tax evasion.

As the expectation that corporations will be held criminally liable has grown, so too has the concern that English law’s approach to corporate criminal liability is unsatisfactory at a fundamental level. At the time of writing, there is renewed political interest in reforming corporate criminal liability.⁶ This chapter considers the different methods by which corporations may be held liable in English law and examines the problems each poses.

Historically, it was thought that a corporation could not be indicted for a crime at all.⁷ As a matter of procedure, personal appearance was necessary at court in the assizes and quarter-sessions. Since the corporation has no physical person, it could not appear. In the Court of King’s Bench, however, appearance by attorney was allowed and the difficulty was circumvented by removing the indictment into that court by writ of certiorari;⁸ but now this is unnecessary and, by statute,⁹ a corporation may appear and plead through a representative. Further objections which have been raised to imposing criminal liability are that, since a corporation is a creature of the law, it can only do such acts as it is legally empowered to do, so that any crime is necessarily ultra vires (outside its powers); and that the corporation, having neither body nor mind, cannot perform the acts or form the intents which are a prerequisite of criminal liability. The ultra vires doctrine, however, seems to have been ignored in both the law of tort and crime and appears to apply only in the law of contract and property.¹⁰

Although a corporation is in law a separate legal entity, in relation to most serious offences English law still relies on the culpability of the individual directors in fixing liability on the ⁴ As this perception develops, there is a stronger argument that the appropriate basis for imposing criminal liability should be on culture within the corporation towards risk and harm. See p 263. See also Wells, n 1. There is now growing pressure for corporations to be accountable for their contribution to offences in international law (eg by supplying arms to dictators): see W Kalick, ‘Corporate Accountability for Human Rights Violations Amounting to International Crimes’ (2010) 30 LS 370.

⁵ By s 25, ‘corporation’ does not include a corporation sole but includes any body corporate wherever incorporated. This includes companies incorporated under companies legislation, as well as bodies incorporated under statute (as is the case with many non-Departmental Public Bodies and other bodies in the public sector) or by Royal Charter.

⁶ In 2017 the Ministry of Justice conducted a call for evidence surveying the options for reform of the law. See Ministry of Justice, Corporate Liability for Economic Crime: Call for Evidence (2017) Cm 9370. At the time of writing, the response has yet to be published.

⁷ Anon (1701) 12 Mod Rep 560, per Holt CJ.

⁸ Birmingham and Gloucester Rly Co (1842) 3 QB 223.

⁹ Criminal Justice Act 1925, s 33.

¹⁰ cf E Peel and J Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) Ch 21.

corporation. To take an example, if a company is alleged to have committed fraud by making false representations in order to secure lucrative contracts, the criminal culpability of the company will depend on the actions and fault of the directors and managers of the company. The traditional concepts of actus reus and mens rea can be applied to the company via its human controllers. A controller of the company must be proved to have had the relevant mens rea of the offence (acting dishonestly) and to have fulfilled the conduct element of the offence—making a false representation, etc. At one level this seems logical, since although the company is in law a separate legal entity, it can only operate through the medium of its human actors. There are, however, difficulties. At a practical level, as we will see, there are problems in fixing blame on the company through relevant controllers. Moreover, at a principled level some argue that the criminal law ought to be capable of attributing blame to a corporation on account of wrongs done and harms caused by its corporate culture or policies. With larger corporations an ethos or culture can develop quite independently of the controlling officers. That culture might itself form the basis for proof of the criminal wrongdoing. These arguments are keenly contested socio-legal and economic issues which lie beyond the scope of this work.¹¹ Some of the language of the courts in modern times has also emphasized systemic failings—in the Hatfield rail prosecution, the failings of Balfour Beatty were described in such terms,¹² and the judge castigated the ‘total vacuum of management’ in the relevant area.¹³ Such comments do suggest a failure of the corporation rather than any individual.

Many recent reform proposals urge the use of innovative enforcement and civil law methods of dealing with corporate wrongdoing where the conduct involves breaches of regulations as opposed to commission of ‘real’ crimes such as those leading to injury or loss of property.¹⁴ These civil law proposals lie beyond the scope of this work. The focus here is on the use of the criminal law.¹⁵

8.1.2 Bases of criminal liability

There are currently six ways in which a prosecution may be brought against a corporation or its directors.

8.1.2.1 Personal liability of corporate directors, etc

First, individuals within a corporation can be prosecuted for their personal wrongdoing just as any other human being can. For example, a managing director of a company who bribes an agent of a company with whom he is making a contract will be at risk of personal prosecution. So too will a manager who commits offences of driving carelessly or committing frauds while on company business, etc. No more need be said about such criminal liability since it is discussed throughout the rest of the book. If a corporation has been found to be criminally liable, the individual employee or director, etc can also be liable as a secondary party to the corporation’s wrongdoing under s 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861

¹¹ See GR Sullivan, ‘The Attribution of Culpability to a Limited Company’ (1996) 55 CLJ 515, and Lacey, n 3.

¹² Note also the oft-quoted description in the P&O prosecution of corporate ‘sloppiness’ (1990) 93 Cr App R 72. See on the Balfour decision and others, C Wells (2010) 30 LS 370.

¹³ At [14].

¹⁴ In LCCP 195 the Commission seeks to apply the principles espoused in the Macrory Report, Regulatory Justice: Making Sanctions Effective (2006) in trying to reduce the volume of criminal offences that exist in relation to regulatory behaviour.

¹⁵ See the valuable discussion in Appendix A to LCCP 195 by Julia Black, examining the merits of these alternatives such as public civil sanctions, administrative sanctions, private civil law, warning notices, restorative justice initiatives, etc.

(see Ch 6). A director can also in some cases be liable for conspiring with the company. A company can conspire with its directors as long as there are at least two directors involved in the conspiracy (not both of whom need to be on trial)¹⁶ (see Ch 11). Occasionally, Parliament excludes personal liability when creating corporate offences as, for example, with the corporate manslaughter offence discussed in Ch 14.¹⁷

8.1.2.2 For offences of strict liability

Secondly, in some instances offences of strict or absolute liability can be committed by a corporation. If no mens rea needs to be proved there is no difficulty in establishing any fault on the part of the corporation. Depending on which element of the actus reus attracts strict liability, establishing liability for a corporation will be no different from a human actor. It is, of course, important in the application of strict liability to corporations to consider the availability of due diligence defences, allowing the corporation an opportunity to prove that it took all reasonable steps to avoid the commission of the offence. No more need be said about this form of liability and the due diligence defence.¹⁸ They are considered in full in Ch 5.

8.1.2.3 Statutory offences imposing duties on corporations

Thirdly, the corporation, as distinct from its employees or managers, can be criminally liable for any offences laid down by Parliament as applying specifically to corporations performing the relevant activity. A corporation is a legal person but it has no physical existence. As a legal entity, a corporation may be placed under a duty by Parliament to conduct itself in a particular way on pain of criminal sanction for non-compliance. For example, Parliament may create an offence for a corporation to fail to keep records, or to label itself in a particular way.

The type of case where it is most obviously proper that a corporation should be held liable arises where a statute imposes a duty upon a corporation to act and the corporation breaches that duty by failing to act.

It was in such cases that the earliest developments in corporate liability took place. In 1842, in Birmingham and Gloucester Rly Co,¹⁹ a corporation was convicted for failing to fulfil a statutory duty. Four years later, in Great North of England Rly Co,²⁰ it was argued that the effect of that decision was limited to cases of non-feasance where there was no agent who could be indicted. It was argued that, in the case of misfeasance, only the agents who had done the wrongful acts were liable. The court held that the distinction was unfounded. Even if it were possible to discover which had occurred, it was incongruous that the corporation should be liable for the one type of wrong and not the other.

A more recent example of an offence specifically created for corporations is that in s 7 of the Bribery Act 2010, creating an offence for a commercial organization to fail to prevent bribery by a person associated with it, intending to obtain or retain a business advantage. This is a very widely defined offence. The due diligence defence in s 7(2) will be crucial as will be the guidance published by the Justice Secretary under s 9.²¹ Similar offences are contained in Part 3 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017. These offences criminalize commercial organizations which ¹⁶ See A Ltd [2016] EWCA Crim 1469. This aspect of the judgment is discussed in Ch 11.

¹⁷ 2007 Act, s 18(1).

¹⁸ For a discussion of the difference types of due diligence defences and their merits, see LCCP 195, Part 6. See also the valuable appendix by Professor Cartwright examining the use of due diligence defences in consumer regulation in particular.

¹⁹ (1842) 3 QB 223. Cf British Steel plc [1995] 1 WLR 1356, [1995] Crim LR 654.

²⁰ (1846) 9 QB 315.

²¹ See S Gentle, 'The Bribery Act 2010: (2) The Corporate Offence' [2011] Crim LR 101.

fail to prevent the facilitation of domestic and foreign tax evasion. There are some suggestions that this is the model, or more accurately range of models, of criminal liability that might be imposed more widely on corporations in future reform. See below, p 263.

8.1.2.4 Vicarious liability

It was not a great step forward from holding that a corporation could be liable for breach of statutory duty, as in Birmingham and Gloucester Railway, to the courts imposing liability vicariously in these circumstances.²² Fourthly, then, a corporation can be vicariously liable for the acts of its employees and agents where a natural person would similarly be liable for such acts; for example, when a statute imposes vicarious responsibility.²³ Vicarious liability will be considered in more detail later in this chapter.²⁴

8.1.2.5 The identification doctrine

Aside from these four categories, prosecuting the corporation within the orthodox model of criminal law creates difficulties. The fact that the corporation has a legal identity does not alter the fact that the corporation has no body and mind. The criminal law's solution to the lack of a corporate body to perform the actus reus and a corporate mind capable of forming mens rea has been to treat the minds and bodies of the officers and servants of the corporation as supplying its mental and physical faculties. The fifth way that the corporation can be liable for offences is therefore on the basis that the controlling officers of the corporation performed the proscribed conduct with the relevant fault element. This is the so-called 'identification' doctrine.²⁵

Within every corporation there are certain persons (conveniently labelled in the Draft Criminal Code as 'controlling officers')²⁶ who are the 'directing mind and will'²⁷ of the corporation and who, when acting in the company's business, are considered to be the 'embodiment of the company'.²⁸ Their acts and states of mind are the company's acts and states of mind and the company is held liable, not for the acts of others, but for what are deemed to be its own acts. In a corporate prosecution, the court looks to which person within the organization performed the proscribed conduct and then whether that person is sufficiently senior to be treated as a person who is a directing mind and will of the company.

The courts' willingness to attribute the blameworthy acts and mens rea of the controlling officers to the company developed rapidly in criminal law in the mid-1940s.²⁹ In DPP v Kent and Sussex Contractors Ltd,³⁰ the fraud alleged required an intention to deceive and it was held that the transport manager's intent was the intent of the company. Kent was approved in *ICR Haulage Ltd*³¹ and applied to common law offences. The company

²² Mousell Bros Ltd v London and North-Western Rly Co [1917] 2 KB 836; Griffiths v Studebakers Ltd [1924] 1 KB 102.

²³ Griffiths v Studebakers Ltd, ibid; Mousell Bros Ltd v London and North-Western Rly Co [1917] 2 KB 836.

²⁴ See p 266.

²⁵ See LCCP 195, Part 5 and Appendix C by Professor Wells. For criticism, see N Cavanagh, 'Corporate Criminal Liability: An Assessment of the Models of Fault' (2011) 75 J Crim L 414. For a review from a European perspective, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2012) 459 (comparing Germany) and 463 (comparing the EU).

²⁶ LC 143, para 11.6, and cl 34. Ministry of Justice, Corporate Liability for Economic Crime: Call for Evidence (2017) Cm 9370.

²⁷ Lennard's Carrying Co Ltd v Asiatic Petroleum Co Ltd [1915] AC 705, 713 per Viscount Haldane LC. Applied in JF Alford Transport Ltd [1997] 2 Cr App R 326 at 331, [1997] Crim LR 745.

²⁸ Essendon Engineering Co Ltd v Maile [1982] RTR 260, [1982] Crim LR 510.

²⁹ See for discussion of the development of the doctrine, LCCP 195, paras 5.14–5.86.

³⁰ [1944] KB 146. ³¹ [1944] KB 551, cf McDonnell [1966] 1 QB 233, p 440.

was convicted of a conspiracy to defraud, with the act and intent of the managing director being the act and intent of the company. The doctrine was memorably described by Denning LJ:³²

A company may in many ways be likened to a human body. It has a brain and a nerve centre which controls what it does. It also has hands which hold the tools and act in accordance with directions from the centre. Some of the people in the company are mere servants and agents who are nothing more than hands to do the work and cannot be said to represent the mind or will. Others are directors and managers who represent the directing mind and will of the company and control what it does. The state of mind of these managers is the state of mind of the company and is treated by the law as such.³³

A person is not a 'controlling officer' simply because his work is 'brain' work (as opposed to physical work) and he exercises some managerial discretion, since not all such persons 'represent the directing mind and will of the company and control what it does'.³⁴ Nor is someone occupying a position entitled 'manager' necessarily a controlling mind. The manager of a supermarket belonging to a company owning hundreds of supermarkets is not the company's 'brains' and does not act as the company.³⁵ Companies have been held not to be criminally liable for the acts of a depot engineer³⁶ or a weighbridge operator³⁷ or the European Sales Manager of the company.³⁸ Only the very senior managers or those explicitly authorized by the Board to act on the company's behalf in relation to specific matters³⁹ will be likely to fit the description as the directing mind and will of the company. This illustrates one of the major shortcomings of the identification doctrine—that it fails to reflect the reality of the internal structure of modern-day large multinational corporations.⁴⁰ Although there are instances of a wide application, in general it produces what many regard as an unsatisfactorily narrow scope for criminal liability. It also renders it disproportionately easy to prosecute smaller companies in which the controllers are more readily identifiable and allows larger corporations to avoid liability by disguising their true organizational structure.⁴¹ There are further difficulties because the test remains so ambiguous—it is unclear which individuals will qualify, and whether the same approach is applicable in all contexts. It is difficult to apply the test to companies of all sizes and structures working in different sectors.

How are the courts to determine which individuals are controllers? In the leading case of Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass,⁴² it was said that the company may be criminally liable only for the acts of:

³² HL Bolton (Engineering) Co Ltd v TJ Graham & Sons Ltd [1957] 1 QB 159 at 172. Though this dictum has been frequently followed, the Privy Council has said in the Meridian case, see p 251, that the anthropomorphism distracts attention from what the Board regarded as the true principle determining whether acts should be attributed to the corporation—ie the interpretation of the particular statute.

³³ Thus, it is thought that a company could be guilty of abetting an offence through its managing director—though there is no vicarious liability in abetting, p 275. See Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd [1970] 2 QB 54.

³⁴ Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass [1972] AC 153 at 171, HL, per Lord Reid, at 187 per Lord Dilhorne and at 200 per Lord Diplock. See Gobert and Punch, Rethinking Corporate Crime (2003) 59–70.

³⁵ ibid.

³⁶ Magna Plant Ltd v Mitchell [1966] Crim LR 394.

³⁷ John Henshall (Quarries) Ltd v Harvey [1965] 2 QB 233.

³⁸ Redfern and Dunlop Ltd (Aircraft Division) (1992) 13 Cr App R (S) 709, [1993] Crim LR 43.

³⁹ cf VOSA v FM Conway Ltd [2012] EWHC 2930 (Admin) where the court held that even though the plant manager had been given a written authorization to that effect he was not the 'brains' of the company.

⁴⁰ For criticism see LCCP 195, Part 5 and Appendices B and C; Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility.

⁴¹ According to the Law Commission in 2010, 96 per cent of UK businesses have between 0–9 employees. See LCCP 185, para 7.6.

⁴² See n 34.

the board of directors, the managing director and perhaps other superior officers of a company [who] carry out the functions of management and speak and act as the company . . . ⁴³ or of a person:

who is in actual control of the operations of a company or of part of them and who is not responsible to another person in the company for the manner in which he discharges his duties in the sense of being under his orders . . . ⁴⁴

Lord Diplock⁴⁵ thought that the question is to be answered by:

identifying those natural persons who by the memorandum and articles of association [of the company] or as a result of action taken by the directors or by the company in general meeting pursuant to the articles are entrusted with the exercise of the powers of the company.

Lord Pearson too thought that the constitution of the company concerned must be taken into account; and Lords Dilhorne, Pearson and Diplock thought that the terms used frequently by Parliament⁴⁶—‘any director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate’—afford a useful indication. If the persons who are responsible for the general management of the company delegate their duties to another, then the acts of that other will be the acts of the company.⁴⁷

Once the facts have been ascertained, it is a question of law whether a person, in doing particular things, is to be regarded as the company or merely as the company’s employee or agent.⁴⁸ Accordingly, the judge should direct the jury that if they find certain facts proved then they must find that the act and intention of the agent is the act and the intention of the company. It is not sufficient to direct that the company is liable for its ‘responsible agents’ or ‘high executives’, for such persons are not necessarily the company.⁴⁹ The test is the same whether the offence be serious or trivial.

The decision in Tesco failed to provide the clarity of definition that is needed in fixing the scope of criminal liability, and was heavily criticized.⁵⁰

Meridian: all a matter of statutory construction?

In the more recent Meridian case,⁵¹ the Privy Council, in a valuable review of the nature of corporate liability, held that where the criminal liability alleged is under a statutory offence, whether conduct is to be attributed to a corporation is a question of the construction of the particular statute under which proceedings are brought. Thus, the statute may impose corporate liability in respect of an agent who could not be said to be the ‘directing mind and will’ of the corporation under the primary rules of attribution.⁵² This is a controversial extension of the potential scope of corporate liability. For many it represents a welcome relaxation of the identification doctrine, with the potential to impose corporate liability more flexibly in a broader range of circumstances, but in ⁴³ Per Lord Reid at 171. ⁴⁴ Per Viscount Dilhorne at 187.

⁴⁵ At 200, followed in Seaboard Offshore Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1994] 2 All ER 99, 104, HL.

⁴⁶ This is a form of words used in many criminal statutes as discussed later: see p 256.

⁴⁷ [1972] AC 153 at 193. ⁴⁸ ibid at 170, 173, per Lord Reid. ⁴⁹ Sporle [1971] Crim LR 706.

⁵⁰ See LCCP 195 and references in Part 5; RJ Wickins, ‘Confusion Worse Confounded: The End of the Directing Mind Theory’ [1997] J Bus Law 524.

⁵¹ Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission [1995] 2 AC 500. See E Ferran (2011) 127 LQR 239; E Lim, ‘A Critique of Corporate Attribution: “Directing Mind and Will” and Corporate Objectives’ [2013] JBL 333.

⁵² This passage in the 12th edition was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in St Regis Paper Co Ltd [2011] EWCA Crim 2527, [20].

doing so it reduces the degree of certainty in the law. Indeed, Buxton LJ, in a powerful dissent in a subsequent case in the Court of Appeal (Civil Division), commented that Meridian represents an 'imperfect guide to the approach to the rule for attribution of a crime',⁵³

The Privy Council in Meridian contrasted the Tesco case with the case of Re Supply of Ready Mixed Concrete (No 2).⁵⁴ In Tesco, a narrow approach to liability was adopted. In the Concrete case, the House of Lords held a company liable for contempt of court for the act of a regional employee who made an arrangement in breach of an undertaking given by the company to the Restrictive Practices Court. The board of directors knew nothing of the arrangement and had given instructions that no such arrangements were to be made. But the arrangement made by the regional employee was an agreement binding on the company.⁵⁵ The company had given an undertaking that no such arrangement would be made and it had made such an arrangement. Should it not have been exactly the same if the undertaking had been given by an individual employer and the arrangement made by an employee with ostensible authority?⁵⁶ Ready Mixed Concrete (No 2) was a case of civil contempt of court and the result would not necessarily have been the same if it had been a criminal offence requiring mens rea. In Meridian itself, it was held that the acts of the company's investment manager were properly attributed to the company for the purposes of the New Zealand Securities Act 1988. Perhaps all that these cases demonstrate is that a statute imposes liability if that appears to be the intention of the legislature. The Court of Appeal has subsequently emphasized that the Meridian approach is only applicable to offences of statutory origin.⁵⁷ The Meridian approach was endorsed by the Law Commission in LCCP 195, which recommended that courts should look at the underlying purposes of the statutory scheme for guidance on the bases for holding a company liable.⁵⁸

It still remains to be seen how far in practice the Meridian approach displaces Tesco by allowing corporate liability when the acts are those of individuals who would not be seen as a controller applying Tesco. For example, Moore v I Bresler Ltd,⁵⁹ which has been criticized for going too far down the scale of seniority in identifying a controlling officer,⁶⁰ was approved in Meridian by the Privy Council as an example of its 'construction' principle. The company was convicted of making false returns with intent to deceive, contrary to the Finance (No 2) Act 1940, when the returns were made by the company secretary and a branch sales manager.⁶¹

More recent cases suggest that Meridian may not have made such a radical change after all.

In *St Regis Paper Co Ltd*⁶² the company was held not to be liable as the individual involved was not a directing mind and will of the company. S was the technical manager of one of the company's five plants and falsified environmental records, committing an offence under the ⁵³ Re Odyssey (London) Ltd v OIC Run Off Ltd (2000) The Times, 17 Mar, Court of Appeal (Civ Div).

⁵⁴ [1995] 1 AC 456. See C Wells, 'A Quiet Revolution in Corporate Liability for Crime' (1995) 145 NLJ 1326.

⁵⁵ Lord Nolan [1995] 1 All ER 135 at 150–151.

⁵⁶ 'In my opinion . . . the act [in breach of an injunction] need not be done by the person himself': Warrington J in Stancomb v Trowbridge UDC [1910] 2 Ch 190 at 193–194, a decision which Lord Nolan said should have been followed in Ready-Mixed Concrete (No 2).

⁵⁷ A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999) [2000] QB 796, [2000] Crim LR 475.

⁵⁸ See in particular Part 5 and recommendation at para 5.110. ⁵⁹ [1944] 2 All ER 515, DC.

⁶⁰ By R Welsh, 'The Criminal Liability of Corporations' (1946) 62 LQR 345 at 358, Williams, TBCL, 973.

⁶¹ But the company secretary might perhaps be regarded, when acting within the scope of his authority, as the company's 'directing mind and will' for this purpose. Kent and Sussex Contractors Co [1944] KB 146 seems more doubtful in this respect, as only the transport manager was involved.

⁶² [2011] EWCA Crim 2527.

relevant pollution regulations.⁶³ The offence required proof of mens rea. In a preliminary ruling, it was held that the regulation created criminal liability for the acts of an employee although he could not be said to be the directing mind and will of the company. It was held to be sufficient that the employee in question carried out management functions and was therefore in control of the operations of the company in the relevant area. The company appealed. The Court of Appeal acknowledged that several cases had rejected the idea that Meridian expressed a new approach which departed from *Tesco*⁶⁴ and that Rose LJ in A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999) stated that Meridian represented a restatement of the law rather than a departure from existing principles. Moses LJ cited with approval a passage from the 12th edition of this book (p 262) recognizing that the significance of Meridian is that it emphasizes the importance of construing the statute which creates the offence in order to determine the applicable rules of attribution.

The Court of Appeal held that having regard to the terms of the regulations, it was not possible to impose criminal liability on the company as S, a technical manager, was not the directing mind and will of the company. The court noted the numerous strict liability offences in the regulations, but that the offence charged against the company required proof of mens rea. The scheme was described as being devised in a 'carefully graduated way', creating some offences requiring proof of mens rea and some that do not. The court concluded that it would be respecting the structure of the regulations to hold that the mens rea offences were ones that could only be attributed to the company if committed by someone who was the directing mind and will.⁶⁵

In the most recent case to consider this issue, Sir Brian Leveson P stated that 'save in those cases where consideration of the legislation creating the offence in question leads to a different and perhaps broader approach, as discussed in Meridian Global Funds Management Asia Ltd v Securities Commission, the test for determining those individuals whose actions and state of mind are to be attributed to a corporate body remains that established in Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass'.⁶⁶ In this case it was accepted that BK, a director of the company, was properly regarded as the directing mind and will of A Ltd and that the prosecution could use his diary entries to prove both his guilty mind and that of the company.

Acting 'as' and yet 'against' the corporation

The *Moore v I Bresler Ltd*⁶⁷ decision is subject to criticism because the two officers had as their objective to conceal their fraudulent sale of the company's property.⁶⁸ The Draft Code, cl 30(6), would reverse it by providing that a corporation is not liable for the act of a controlling officer when it is done with the intention of doing harm, or concealing harm done, to the corporation.

Acting within the scope of corporate duty

The controlling officer must be acting within the scope of his authority as a corporate officer at the time that he performs the necessary elements of the offence in terms of actus reus and mens rea before these can be treated as the criminal acts of the corporation itself under the identification doctrine.

⁶³ The Pollution Prevention and Control (England and Wales) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/1973, reg 32(1)(g).

⁶⁴ Buxton LJ in his dissent in Re Odyssey (London) Ltd v OIC Run-Off Ltd regarded the principle expressed in Tesco Supermarkets as the authoritative statement of the law.

⁶⁵ The Court of Appeal's reasoning has been heavily criticized. The Court of Appeal refused to certify a point of law: St Regis Paper Co Ltd [2012] EWCA Crim 1847.

⁶⁶ R v A Ltd [2016] EWCA Crim 1469, [27]. ⁶⁷ [1944] 2 All ER 515, DC.

⁶⁸ Williams, TBCL, 973, refers to Belmont Finance Corp'n Ltd v Williams Furniture Ltd [1979] Ch 250 as 'a much more sensible decision of a civil court'.

A corporation's 'state of mind'

Having located the relevant controlling individual with whom the corporation may be identified, it is necessary to prove that he performed the relevant actus reus with the accompanying mens rea. Where the offence is one of strict liability, the corporation may be held liable for the acts of any of its employees or agents where those acts are, in law, the company's acts, under the attribution principle discussed later (p 272).⁶⁹ Wherever the offence requires mens rea, it must be proved that a controlling officer had the mens rea.⁷⁰ Similarly, where a defence requires evidence of a belief or other state of mind, this must usually be the belief or state of mind of a controlling officer;⁷¹ but the belief of one officer, A, will not suffice if another, B (especially if he is superior to A) knows that A's belief is ill-founded.⁷² Probably, each controlling officer who is concerned in the offence must have the required state of mind. If, however, no controlling officer is involved and all the employees or agents who are involved do have the required state of mind, the defence ought clearly to be available. For example, if a branch manager, not being a controlling officer, finds a controlled drug in supplies delivered to his branch and takes control of it, intending to hand it to the police, the company may surely rely on this intention to establish the defence provided by s 5(4) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, if it is charged with unlawful possession of the drug.⁷³

Many of the offences for which corporate liability can arise turn on proof of knowledge, but other familiar forms of mens rea can be relevant. For example, in *R v X Ltd*⁷⁴ the Court of Appeal dealt with proof of recklessness against a company through the state of mind of its sales force. X Ltd was charged with four counts involving engaging in an unfair commercial practice in contravention of different provisions of the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008.⁷⁵ The Crown had to establish knowledge or recklessness on the part of the company as to the way in which its commercial practices failed (in fact) to meet its obligations to consumers. The Court of Appeal, in construing the offence, held that at least one of the controlling minds had to be proved to be at least reckless, confirming the view in Airtours v Shipley.⁷⁶ With offences of this technicality, care will be needed to identify precisely what result or circumstance that recklessness must relate to.

No aggregation of several controlling individuals' culpability

A question that was raised by many critics of the identification doctrine was whether it must be proved that an individual controlling officer (whether identifiable or not) was guilty of the crime alleged against the company or whether it is permissible to 'aggregate' the conduct of a number of officers, none of whom would individually be guilty, so as to constitute in sum the elements of the offence.⁷⁷ It is submitted that it is not possible artificially to construct the mens rea in this way.⁷⁸ Two (semi) innocent states of mind cannot be added

⁶⁹ Agent's acts are the principal's act in law.

⁷⁰ Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass [1972] AC 153. Draft Criminal Code, cl 34(2).

⁷¹ GJ Coles & Co Ltd v Goldsworthy [1985] WAR 183. See G Orchard in Criminal Law Essays, 114, 117, 118–119.

⁷² Brambles Holdings Ltd v Carey (1976) 15 SASR 270 at 280.

⁷³ See LC 177, Draft Criminal Code, Appendix B, Example 30(vi).

⁷⁴ [2013] EWCA Crim 818, [2014] Crim LR 73. ⁷⁵ SI 2008/1277.

⁷⁶ (1994) 58 JP 835. See also MFI Warehouses v Natrass [1973] 1 WLR 307, [1973] Crim LR 196.

⁷⁷ See especially C Wells, 'Culture, Risk and Criminal Liability' [1993] Crim LR 551, 563.

⁷⁸ cf Armstrong v Strain [1952] 1 KB 232, Devlin J: 'You cannot add an innocent state of mind to an innocent state of mind and get as a result a dishonest state of mind.'

together to produce a guilty state of mind.⁷⁹ Any such doctrine could certainly have no application in offences requiring knowledge, intention or recklessness.

It is in relation to offences of negligence (particularly gross negligence) that the aggregation principle has been most forcefully advocated. The argument proceeds as follows: a company owes a duty of care and if its operation falls far below the standard required it is guilty of gross negligence. A series of minor failures by officers of the company might add up to a gross breach by the company of its duty of care. There is authority for such a doctrine in the law of tort⁸⁰ and the concept of negligence is the same in the criminal law, the difference being one of degree—criminal negligence must be ‘gross’. It is immaterial that the doctrine of vicarious liability in tort does not apply in criminal law, because this is a case not of vicarious, but of personal, liability and that is a proper concern of the criminal law. It was argued that a corporation ought to be open to prosecution for manslaughter by gross negligence on the aggregation principle.⁸¹ This argument was rejected by the Court of Appeal in A-G’s Reference (No 2 of 1999).⁸² The prosecution arose from the Southall train crash in which seven passengers died. The trial judge ruled that the gross negligence manslaughter offence required negligence to be proved under the identification doctrine. The Court of Appeal approved that ruling, holding that unless an identified individual’s conduct, characterized as gross criminal negligence, could be attributed to the company, the company was not, in the state of the common law, liable for manslaughter.⁸³ The specific statutory offence under the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 will now apply, but the general principle in corporate liability that the identification doctrine cannot be satisfied by an aggregation of several officers’ states of mind remains good law for all other offences.

Several interesting issues remain in relation to the aggregation argument, including to what extent it is necessary for a conviction that an individual controlling mind be identifiable. Can a company waive the need to establish that fact by pleading guilty on the basis that, although no controller was identifiable, the corporation is prepared to accept liability? There would seem no reason in principle why not. The bar on aggregation is to protect the company and if it chooses it may waive that protection. It would not be akin to a company pleading guilty to an offence that was not known to law. Consider the case where the company accepts that it must have been director A or B who performed the criminal acts, but it cannot be established beyond reasonable doubt which of them did. Surely the company should be capable of accepting guilt? Indeed, it is arguable that in such a case the law ought to allow the Crown to establish corporate liability in a contested trial.

Impact of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007

The 2007 Act is discussed in full in Ch 14. It imposes liability for manslaughter on the basis of a breach of a relevant duty by the organization as a result of the way the activities are managed or organized. The italicized words are designed to ensure that the focus is on a ⁷⁹ Wells argues to the contrary that ‘aggregation needs to be seen as a recognition that individuals within a company contribute to the whole machine; it is the whole that is judged not the parts’: Corporations and Criminal Responsibility, 155. See also LCCP 195, Appendix C.

⁸⁰ WB Anderson & Sons Ltd v Rhodes (Liverpool) Ltd [1967] 2 All ER 850, Cairns J, discussed by M Dean, ‘Hedley Byrne and the Eager Business Man’ (1968) 31 MLR 322; Salmond on Torts (21st edn, 1996) 406–409; Fleming on Torts (8th edn, 1992) 376–385.

⁸¹ In the P&O case, Turner J seems to have proceeded on the basis that recklessness must be proved.

⁸² [2000] QB 796, [2000] Crim LR 475; considering Great Western Trains Co (1999) 3 June, CCC. It was also rejected in Scotland in Transco PLC v HM Advocate (No 1) 2004 SLT 41.

⁸³ The court’s conclusion that there can in general be no corporate liability in the absence of an identified human offender ignores the principle discussed earlier of corporate liability where a duty is specifically imposed on the corporation as a legal person: Birmingham & Gloucester Railway (1842) 3 QB 223.

'management failure'; at least for manslaughter, the limitations of the identification doctrine are removed.⁸⁴ Some commentators suggest that this would be a better approach to adopt in determining corporate liability for all offences.⁸⁵

The Act does, however, place a restriction on the test. Under s 1(3), the offence is committed by an organization only if 'the way in which its activities are managed and organised by its senior management is a substantial element in the breach referred to in subsection 1'. Who are the senior managers? By s 1(4)(c):

'senior management', in relation to an organisation, means the persons who play significant roles in—

- (i) the making of decisions about how the whole or a substantial part of its activities are to be managed or organised, or
- (ii) the actual managing or organising of the whole or a substantial part of those activities.

This extends beyond the narrow category of senior individuals who would be caught at common law as the directing mind and will under the identification doctrine. The merits of this test in the context of the offence are considered in Ch 14. The test is linked to a senior level of management but also considers how an activity was managed within the organization as a whole. It will now be possible in manslaughter to aggregate the shortcomings of a wide variety of individuals within the organization to prove a failure of management by the organization. The language is designed to reflect the concentration of things done consistently within the organization's culture and policies more generally.⁸⁶

The courts or law reformers could draw upon this definition of 'senior managers' from the 2007 Act in consideration of the scope of the 'relevant controlling minds' in application of the identification doctrine more generally.⁸⁷

8.1.2.6 Statutory liability of corporate officers

The sixth form of liability which, for the sake of completeness, deserves to be mentioned is the statutory liability of a corporate officer as a secondary party to the company's principal offending. The following provision commonly appears in statutes creating offences likely to be committed by corporations:⁸⁸

Where an offence committed by a body corporate is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of, or to be attributable to neglect on the part of, a director, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or a person purporting to act in any such capacity, he as well as the body corporate is guilty of the offence and liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

⁸⁴ Norrie argues that the Act represents a return to an identification approach, given that it focuses upon senior managers. See A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 124–127. This is discussed further in Ch 14.

⁸⁵ See the discussion in LCCP 195, Part 5 and Appendices B and C.

⁸⁶ For discussion of the advantages of basing liability on corporate organizational models, see LCCP 195 and Appendix C in particular, considering the Australian experience.

⁸⁷ See the discussion by Cartwright in LCCP 195, Appendix B.

⁸⁸ eg Outer Space Act 1986, s 12(3). Other versions of this provision refer also to the 'manager' of a body corporate. The provision in the Fraud Act 2006, s 12 is even wider: '(1) Subsection (2) applies if an offence under this Act is committed by a body corporate. (2) If the offence is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of—(a) a director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or (b) a person who was purporting to act in any such capacity, he (as well as the body corporate) is guilty of the offence and liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly. (3) If the affairs of a body corporate are managed by its members, subsection (2) applies in relation to the acts and defaults of a member in connection with his functions of management as if he were a director of the body corporate.'

Whether a director or other officer is under a duty is a question which can be answered only by looking at the facts of each case; and the onus of proving that there was a duty which has been neglected is on the prosecution.⁸⁹

As far as 'consent' and 'connivance' are concerned, these provisions probably effect only a slight extension of the law; because the officer who expressly consents or connives in the commission of the offence will be liable as a secondary party under the principles considered in Ch 6. There may, however, be a case of consent which does not amount to counselling or abetting; and the words 'attributable to any neglect on the part of'⁹⁰ clearly impose a wider liability in making the officer liable for his negligence in failing to prevent the offence. As the Court of Appeal noted:

the nature of these regulatory statutes with their provisions for secondary liability by directors and managers in accordance with their consent, connivance or neglect is to ensure that they are held to proper standards of supervision and that the size of the company and the distance of directors and managers from the coal face of individual acts should not, where there is consent, connivance or neglect, afford directors or managers with the necessary knowledge a defence.⁹¹

Note that this common form of provision⁹² does not create an offence. It creates an extended form of secondary liability for an offence committed by a body corporate under some other provision of the relevant Act.⁹³ It is submitted that, like the general law of secondary liability, it applies automatically and does not have to be, and indeed is incapable of being, charged as an offence.⁹⁴

In a House of Lords case dealing with such sections, Chargot Ltd,⁹⁵ a case under s 37 of the Health and Safety Act 1974, Lord Hope (with whom the other Lords agreed) said:

No fixed rule can be laid down as to what the prosecution must identify and prove in order to establish that the officer's state of mind was such as to amount to consent, connivance or neglect. In some cases, as where the officer's place of activity was remote from the work place or what was done there was not under his immediate direction and control, this may require the leading of quite detailed evidence of which fair notice may have to be given. In others, where the officer was in day to day contact with what was done there, very little more may be needed . . . the question, in the end of the day, will always be whether the officer in question should have been put on inquiry so as to have taken steps to determine whether or not the appropriate safety procedures were in place.

The Law Commission examined the use of this type of provision,⁹⁶ and concluded that in principle there cannot be consent and connivance without at least a subjective awareness that wrongdoing is or will be taking place, and that a requirement for proof of at least that level of fault is desirable. On this proposal it would not be possible to establish individual directors' liability for an offence committed by the company, unless there was true, subjective consent or connivance at the offence by the director in question. This would be:

in keeping with an understanding of the doctrine of consent and connivance as an extension of the complicity doctrine, to fit the reality of corporate decision-making. Moreover, where crimes

⁸⁹ Huckerby v Elliott [1970] 1 All ER 189. 'Manager' means someone managing the affairs of the company and not, eg, the manager of a store: Tesco Supermarkets Ltd v Natrass [1972] AC 153 at 178.

⁹⁰ These words are omitted from the Theft Act 1968, s 18.

⁹¹ Hutchins [2011] EWCA Crim 1056, [25].

⁹² Commonly used examples are discussed in LCCP 195, Part 7 including the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, s 20 and the Food Safety Act 1990, s 14.

⁹³ See Wilson [2013] EWCA Crim 1780, [2014] Crim LR 368.

⁹⁴ Contra, Wilson [1997] 1 All ER 119, [1997] Crim LR 53 and commentary.

⁹⁵ [2008] UKHL 73. See also Knowles v Department for Business, Enterprise and Regulatory Reform [2009] EWHC 3899 (Admin) and Tangerine Confectionery Ltd and Veolia ES (UK) Ltd (2011) 176 JP 349.

⁹⁶ LCCP 195, Part 7.

requiring proof of fault or involving stigma are in issue, a requirement of at least subjective awareness on a director's part would appear to be essential, in point of justice, given that a finding of consent and connivance makes a director (or equivalent person) guilty of the offence itself.⁹⁷

The Commission's provisional proposal is that rather than these connivance provisions being extended to include instances where the company's offence is attributable to mere neglect, instead, where appropriate, new offences should be created based on liability for the conduct of an individual whom the company has negligently failed to prevent from committing the offence.⁹⁸

8.1.3 Limits of corporate liability

When any statute makes it an offence for 'a person' to do or omit to do something, that offence is capable of commission by a corporation, unless the contrary appears: the Interpretation Act 1889 (and now the Interpretation Act 1978) defined 'person' to include 'a body of persons corporate or unincorporate' and provided that the definition, so far as it includes bodies corporate, applies to any provision of an Act whenever passed, relating to an offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction.⁹⁹ The fact that the offence requires mens rea does not preclude corporate liability since, as discussed earlier, the state of mind of the corporation's controlling officers, as well as their acts, may be attributed to the corporation. However, the nature of the offence may be such that a corporation is physically incapable of committing it even through its controlling officers.

There are numerous other limitations on the liability of a corporation.

8.1.3.1 Categories of offence

There are offences which it is extremely unlikely that an official of a corporation could commit within the scope of his employment; for example, bigamy,¹⁰⁰ rape, some other sexual offences and, possibly, perjury.¹⁰¹

8.1.3.2 Penalty and punishment

A corporation cannot be sentenced to a physical punishment such as imprisonment. A corporation cannot therefore be guilty of murder. The lack of imagination in the law's response to sentencing corporations when they are found liable has been cogently criticized.¹⁰² One of the most welcome aspects of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007 lies in the innovative sentencing and disposal powers available to the courts. The court may, if the prosecution apply, impose a remedial order. A remedial order under s 9 is one 'requiring the organisation to take specified steps' to remedy the breach or anything resulting from it which caused death, or any deficiency as to health and safety matters of which the breach appears to be an indication.¹⁰³ Under s 10 a publicity order may be made 'requiring ⁹⁷ ibid, para 7.34.

⁹⁸ ibid.

⁹⁹ See the Interpretation Act 1978, s 5 and Sch 1.

¹⁰⁰ Even in some of these cases it is not inconceivable that a corporation might be held liable as a secondary party. Eg the managing director of an incorporated marriage advisory bureau negotiates a marriage which he knows to be bigamous. Or a pornographic film company liable as an accessory to rape.

¹⁰¹ In Re Odyssey (London) Ltd v OIC Run Off Ltd (2000) The Times, 17 Mar, CA (Civ Div), the majority considered, obiter, that a company could be liable for perjury through acts of director and managing director, if he had the 'status' of the company when testifying.

¹⁰² See generally on the sentencing of corporations: Gobert and Punch, Rethinking Corporate Crime, Ch 7; and for a review of the punishments that might be available, see M Jefferson, 'Corporate Criminal Liability: The Problems of Sanctions' (2001) 65 J Crim L 235.

¹⁰³ Failure to comply is an offence punishable with a fine.

the organisation to publicise in a specified manner' its conviction, specified particulars, the amount of any fine and the terms of any remedial order. This provision, added during the Bill's passage in the Lords, is clearly intended to deter by impact of adverse publicity.¹⁰⁴

8.1.4 Unincorporated bodies

An unincorporated association, such as a partnership or trade union, is not a legal person at common law and therefore could not incur criminal liability, though its members could. This is still the position for common law offences. Statutory offences are different.

8.1.4.1 Liability for what offences?

In short, an unincorporated association can be liable for a statutory offences enacted after 1889 subject to the terms of the Act evidencing a contrary intention of Parliament.

The effect of the Interpretation Act 1889 was that in all enactments relating to offences, whenever passed, the word 'person' includes bodies corporate (s 2) and, in enactments passed after 1889, both bodies corporate and unincorporate (s 19). The Interpretation Act 1978 preserves this position.¹⁰⁵ Since 1889 unincorporated bodies have been able to commit any offence under an enactment passed after 1889 which makes it an offence for a 'person' to do or omit to do anything which an unincorporated body is capable of doing. The potential liability of unincorporated bodies seems to have been little noticed. In A-G v Able, Woolf J, dealing with an alleged offence under the Suicide Act 1961 said, 'It must be remembered that the [Voluntary Euthanasia Society] is an unincorporated body and there can be no question of the society committing an offence';¹⁰⁶ but since that offence may be committed by 'a person' it seems that it may be committed by an unincorporated body. An unincorporated body, being the registered keeper of a vehicle, was held capable of liability as a 'person' to fixed penalties for illegal parking under the Transport Act 1982.¹⁰⁷

Schedule 1 to the Interpretation Act 1978 provides that "person" includes a body of persons corporate or unincorporate', and by s 5 of the Act 'in any Act, unless the contrary intention appears, words and expressions listed in Schedule 1 to this Act are to be construed according to that Schedule'. The statutes do not adopt a set form of words to help to determine whether 'a contrary intention appears'. The Court of Appeal in *L*¹⁰⁸ accepted that although several statutes do make specific provision for the criminal liability of unincorporated associations, the provisions are so varied that no settled policy can be discerned from them. The court found it impossible to derive any general proposition that:

there is a form of enactment which is to be expected if an unincorporated association is to be criminally liable, and of which the absence signals a contrary intention for the purposes of section 5 of the Interpretation Act.¹⁰⁹

The court accepted that the absence of procedural provisions to govern such prosecutions is not determinative of whether they were intended to apply to unincorporated associations. Different considerations may apply in mens rea offences and those at common law than from strict liability statutory offences.

¹⁰⁴ See the Sentencing Council definitive guidance on these powers: www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/HS-offences-definitive-guideline-FINAL-web.pdf.

¹⁰⁵ Sch 2, para 4(5) maintains the existing application of 'person' to corporate bodies (and, implicitly, its non-application to unincorporated bodies) in pre-1889 statutes creating offences. The definition of 'person' in Sch 1 applies to all statutes passed after the commencement of the 1889 Act, so that they continue to be capable of commission by unincorporated bodies.

¹⁰⁶ [1984] QB 795.

¹⁰⁷ Clerk to Croydon Justices, ex p Chief Constable of Kent [1989] Crim LR 910, DC.

¹⁰⁸ [2008] EWCA Crim 1970, [2009] Crim LR 381. ¹⁰⁹ At [22].

According to the Court of Appeal in W Stevenson & Sons (A Partnership),¹¹⁰ in relation to partnerships one consideration may be whether there is some restriction upon the assets that will properly be available to meet any penalty imposed. It is submitted that this is a doubtful interpretation. The court does not address in detail the impact of s 10 of the Partnership Act 1890.¹¹¹ It is arguable that once a partnership (or indeed a partner) has been convicted, if s 10 applies all the partners are liable to pay the fine as a matter of partnership law.¹¹²

It is disappointing that the law offers no clearer definition on these matters.

8.1.4.2 Which members of the unincorporated association can be liable?

It was thought that when an unincorporated association is prosecuted the courts would normally proceed by analogy to the law relating to corporations and that only officials corresponding to the controlling officers of corporations would bear some liability. The Court of Appeal has rejected that narrow approach, adopting an interpretation with the potential to impose liability on many thousands of individuals. In L,¹¹³ the chairman and treasurer of a golf club with 900 members were prosecuted for the strict liability offence of polluting a watercourse by an escape of heating oil from the premises caused directly by an independent contractor. The question arose as to whether it was correct to prosecute the individuals rather than the association. The trial judge ruled that the individuals could not be prosecuted. The Court of Appeal disagreed. Irrespective of the lack of personal fault, liability arose as a result of membership. Criminal liability of unincorporated associations was said to involve quite separate principles from those relating to corporations:

A corporation has, for all legal purposes, independent legal personality. It is also regulated, often heavily. It must have a registered address and registered directors and secretary. An unincorporated association may indeed look very like a corporation in some cases, and it may have standing and de facto independence, but equally it may not. A prosecution which could only be brought against an informal grouping of building workers, or sportsmen, or campaigners would be likely to be wholly ineffective. It is a necessary consequence of the different nature of an unincorporated association that all its members remain jointly and severally liable for its actions done within their authority.¹¹⁴

The court's conclusion is that liability can be imposed on the individual members irrespective of the lack of personal fault of any individual member. It appears to be heavily influenced by the potential ineffectiveness of a prosecution against a body which might be as informal as some unincorporated ones no doubt are.¹¹⁵ This has very serious potential ramifications for the presumably tens of thousands of members of unincorporated bodies

¹¹⁰ [2008] EWCA Crim 273. W was convicted under an offence for failing 'to submit a sales note which accurately indicated the quantities and price at first sale of each fish species'. The question for the Court of Appeal was whether it was possible for legislation to render a partnership criminally liable as a separate entity from the individual partners.

¹¹¹ 'Where, by any wrongful act or omission of any partner acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm, or with the authority of his co-partners, loss or injury is caused to any person not being a partner in the firm, or any penalty is incurred, the firm is liable therefor to the same extent as the partner so acting or omitting to act.'

¹¹² Even if only the partnership is liable to pay, as the Court of Appeal thought, then if the partnership assets are insufficient to pay the fine, s 10 would require an additional contribution from the partners' own assets in any event since it is by definition a partnership liability. If that is right, the court's careful attempts to avoid unjust imposition of penalties on individuals are thwarted.

¹¹³ [2008] EWCA Crim 1970, [2009] Crim LR 381.

¹¹⁴ At [33] per Hughes LJ.

¹¹⁵ It should be noted that this has not prevented the imposition of injunctions against such bodies albeit with necessary elaboration, eg Huntingdon Life Sciences v Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty [2003] EWHC 1967 (QB).

that exist in England and Wales. Personal criminal liability might result simply by virtue of a person's voluntary membership of a lawful association. Liability is not dependent on any personal fault. Where individual members of an unincorporated association are prosecuted, it is not on the basis of some form of vicarious liability. Nor, unlike corporations, does liability turn on the person holding a position of responsibility or office so that he might be regarded as a controlling officer. Given the enormous number of strict liability offences that such organizations might commit in the course of performing their usual businesses, the prospect of personal liability of all members seems astounding. Of course, there is the potential for prosecution agencies to select individuals within a club since it is for the CPS to determine the defendants in any given case and the courts will interfere only if there is an abuse of process. As Hughes LJ commented in L, relevant considerations will no doubt include 'the extent of the association's stability and assets and the nature of the act or omission said to constitute an offence'. Exceptionally, the Crown might choose to prosecute both the association and its members.

If the decision is correct, it is submitted that the potential criminal liability of members of unincorporated associations deserves parliamentary consideration. Provisions akin to those dealing with the criminal liability of company officers discussed earlier at p 256 would produce fairer results.

In *Riley v CPS*¹¹⁶ the prosecution, relying upon the Partnership Act 1890, argued that even where the terms of the statutory offence do not render all of the partners liable as joint principal offenders, all the partners are so liable simply by virtue of their status as co-partners. The Divisional Court rejected that analysis on the basis that the Act is concerned with satisfying debts and liabilities for which a partnership has become liable and not with criminal liability.

8.1.5 Rationale and reform of corporate criminal liability

The English courts have created the identification principle through which corporate liability might be imposed without addressing the broader social purposes of imposing such liability,¹¹⁷ or (leaving aside the 2007 Act) the effectiveness of the punishments administered. The fines imposed are ultimately borne by the shareholders who, in most cases, are not responsible in any sense for the offence. If they really had control over the directors and so over the management of the company, this might afford some justification; but it is generally recognized that they have little control over large public companies.¹¹⁸ Moreover, fines may be inflicted on the boards of nationalized industries, where there are no shareholders and the consumers of the product, who ultimately pay the fine, have no rights whatever to appoint or dismiss the officials concerned. Since the persons actually responsible for the offence may, in the great majority of cases, be convicted, it has been questioned whether there is any need to impose this additional penalty.

Arguments in favour of wider corporate liability include that there may be difficulty in fixing individuals with liability where someone among the 'brains' of the corporation has undoubtedly authorized the offence. Since, moreover, the names of the officers will mean nothing to the public, only the conviction of the corporation itself will serve to warn the public of the wrongful acts—operating buses with faulty brakes, trains on defective tracks or selling mouldy pies—which are committed in its name. Corporate liability, of course, also ensures that the offence will not go unpunished and that a fine proportionate to the gravity of the offence may be imposed, when it might be out of proportion to the means of the individuals concerned. Further, the imposition of liability on the organization gives all of those directing it an interest in the prevention of illegalities—and they are in a position to prevent them, though the shareholders are not. In the case of Balfour Beatty Rail Infrastructure Ltd,¹¹⁹ the company appealed against a sentence of £10m imposed on the company for a conviction under s 3 of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974 arising from the Hatfield train crash where several people died and many were injured. The Lord Chief Justice noted that the knowledge that a breach can result in a fine of sufficient size to impact on the shareholders ‘will provide a powerful incentive for management to comply with the duty’ while accepting that the fine need not always be so high as to affect dividends or share prices.¹²⁰

¹¹⁶ [2016] EWHC 2531 (Admin).

¹¹⁷ cf other jurisdictions, and, eg, J Gobert and E Mugnai, 'Coping with Corporate Criminality—Some Lessons from Italy' [2002] Crim LR 617; S Adam, N Cosette-Basecqz and M Nihoul (eds), Corporate Criminal Liability in Europe (2008).

¹¹⁸ R Pennington, Company Law (8th edn, 2001) Part III.

More recently, in R v Sellafield; R v Network Rail Infrastructure Ltd,¹²¹ the Lord Chief Justice examined in detail the principles applicable in imposing fines for breaches of safety and environmental protection legislation on very large companies—Sellafield Ltd with a turnover of £1.6bn and Network Rail with a turnover of £6.2bn. The court upheld the fines (Sellafield Ltd was fined £700,000 for offences arising out of the disposal of radioactive waste and Network Rail was fined £500,000 for an offence arising out of a collision at an unmanned level crossing, causing very serious injuries to a child).¹²² The Sentencing Council has since issued a definitive sentencing guideline.¹²³

As noted earlier, the courts have taken a relatively simplistic approach to imposing criminal liability on corporations by shoehorning them into the orthodox model of criminal liability via the identification doctrine.¹²⁴ This has pre-empted discussion of the more fundamental question, namely whether an entirely separate model of criminal responsibility ought to be created to reflect corporate structures and activities.¹²⁵ For some, the company is no more than the collection of individuals which make it up, while for others the company has a distinct personality which should be reflected in the law’s treatment. Whether a company as a non-human entity can properly be found to be morally culpable in its own right raises issues extending well beyond the scope of this work, but four options for distinctly corporate criminal liability deserve mention.¹²⁶

8.1.5.1 Aggregation

This approach has been noted previously and involves aggregating the mens rea of various individuals within the corporation to combine as a sufficient blameworthy ‘state of mind’

¹¹⁹ [2006] EWCA Crim 1586.

¹²⁰ At [42].

¹²¹ [2014] EWCA Crim 49.

¹²² Relying upon Southern Water Services Ltd [2014] EWCA Crim 120 in which a fine of £200,000 was upheld.

¹²³ Environmental Offences Definitive Guideline (2015). It has effect from 1 July 2014. It is available in full at https://www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/wp-content/uploads/Final_Environmental_Offences_Definitive_Guideline_web1.pdf.

¹²⁴ See A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) Ch 5.

¹²⁵ See further the discussion in LCCP 195, particularly the appendices.

¹²⁶ J Gobert, ‘Corporate Criminality: Four Models of Fault’ (1994) 14 LS 393; J Gobert, ‘Corporate Criminality: New Crimes for the Times’ [1994] Crim LR 722; R Grantham, ‘Corporate Knowledge: Identification or Attribution?’ (1996) 59 MLR 732. For a review of approaches in Europe, particularly in the Netherlands and Germany, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2012) Ch 5. Different models of liability are considered at p 247.

of the company. This approach has been considered and rejected by the Court of Appeal.¹²⁷ This approach would, however, be practically attainable and would not require radical deviation from the orthodox model of criminal responsibility. But for this reason some commentators would regard it as an inadequate solution. It would serve only to maintain the fiction of attributing liability through the acts of the company controllers rather than looking deeper for a culpable corporate culture or ethos. As Fisse and Braithwaite argue 'organisations are systems . . . not just aggregations of individuals'.¹²⁸

8.1.5.2 Culpable corporate culture

Professor Wells has also criticized the narrow understanding of the aggregation approach, arguing that it is not simply the sum of the parts—addition of director A's mens rea and director B's knowledge—to comprise the relevant mens rea for the offence. Wells rejects the identification doctrine as too narrow and advocates an extension of the availability of direct corporate liability.¹²⁹ Having regard to the organizational structures of corporations and their corporate policies and practices, she argues that the law should recognize that 'responsibility can . . . be found in the corporation's structures themselves'.¹³⁰ Wells concludes that there should be a form of corporate mens rea. Under this proposal a corporation can be responsible for the corporation's conduct. The difficulty with such a proposal lies in determining how errant the policy and/or practice of the company must be to be treated in law as being equally deserving of blame as the mens rea of an individual offender.

Some jurisdictions have introduced a corporate culture-based approach to liability.¹³¹ In the Australian Capital Territory, for example, the statutory equivalent to the corporate manslaughter offence¹³² turns on proof of a culpable corporate culture, with corporate culture defined as an: 'attitude, policy, rule, course of conduct or practice existing within the corporation generally or in that part of the corporation where the relevant conduct happens'.

English law has not adopted anything quite so radical, even in the 2007 Act. Under the corporate manslaughter offence, the jury's duty in relation to determining the breach of duty is provided in s 8 and includes an obligation to consider whether the evidence shows that the organization failed to comply with any health and safety legislation¹³³ that relates to the alleged breach and, if so, how serious that failure was and how much of a risk of death it posed. The jury may also:

consider the extent to which the evidence shows that there were attitudes, policies, systems or accepted practices within the organisation that were likely to have encouraged any such [health and safety] failure . . . or to have produced tolerance of it; [and] have regard to any health and safety guidance that relates to the alleged breach.

¹²⁷ A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999) [2000] QB 796, [2000] Crim LR 475. See also Bingham LJ in R v HM Coroner for East Kent, ex p Spooner (1989) 88 Cr App R 10.

¹²⁸ B Fisse and J Braithwaite, 'The Allocation of Responsibility for Corporate Crime: Individualism, Collectivism and Accountability' (1988) 11 Sydney LR 468, 479.

¹²⁹ See also the summary in LCCP 195, Appendix C.

¹³⁰ Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility, 157.

¹³¹ For criticism, see N Cavanagh, 'Corporate Criminal Liability: An Assessment of the Models of Fault' (2011) 75 J Crim L 414. Although Cavanagh argues that this model is preferable to the other options, he suggests that it nevertheless poses issues of evidential uncertainty and that it might not act as an effective deterrent.

¹³² Crimes (Industrial Manslaughter) Amendment Act 2003, s 51, ACT Criminal Code, s 51.

¹³³ Defined in s 8(5): "'health and safety guidance" means any code, guidance, manual or similar publication that is concerned with health and safety matters and is made or issued (under a statutory provision or otherwise) by an authority responsible for the enforcement of any health and safety legislation'. See, generally, on Health and Safety legislation: www.hse.gov.uk/legislation.

This section does not prevent the jury from having regard to any other matters they consider relevant. Section 8(3) emphasizes that the jury may have reference to general organizational and systems failures. One difficulty with this provision, as with establishing something as vague as a 'corporate culture',¹³⁴ is how the 'attitudes, etc' are proved. There is the potential for lengthy arguments and evidence comparing practices across the particular sector or industry. Imagine a prosecution of a rail company and the potential for the defence to adduce evidence of safety procedures and policies across the rail sector to demonstrate the quality of their own. No doubt the jury will have regard to the organization's overall objectives, published policy statements on safety, monitoring and compliance policies, attitudes to development of safety and to training and awareness, approaches to remedying previous health and safety infringements, etc.

There have been suggestions that English law could adopt a model of general corporate liability based on the 2007 Act approach.¹³⁵

8.1.5.3 Reactive corporate fault

A yet more radical approach derives from the work of Australian academics Fisse and Braithwaite.¹³⁶ In short, they propose a model under which the company can become liable to court orders to investigate and remedy its conduct where there is an alleged criminal wrongdoing. Criminal liability would follow where the company subsequently failed to take adequate remedial measures.

8.1.5.4 Specific statutory offences

Another alternative is to create specific corporate forms of offences. An example is s 7 of the Bribery Act 2010. The s 7 offence provides:

- (1) A relevant commercial organisation ('C') is guilty of an offence under this section if a person ('A') associated with C bribes another person intending—
 - (a) to obtain or retain business for C, or
 - (b) to obtain or retain an advantage in the conduct of business for C.

There is a due diligence defence in s 7(2) for C to prove that C had in place adequate procedures designed to prevent persons associated with C from undertaking such conduct.

The difficulties of the identification doctrine are avoided by specifically providing which individuals associated with a company will trigger liability for the company by their actions. In the case of s 7, it is a very wide range of individuals indeed. A person associated with a commercial organization is defined by s 8 as a person who performs services for or on behalf of the organization including employees, agents or subsidiaries. Employees are presumed to be performing services for their employer but otherwise the question is to be determined by reference to all the relevant circumstances. A person 'bribes' another for the purposes of this section if he commits an offence under ss 1 and 6 of the Act or aids and abets such an offence. It is irrelevant whether there has been a prosecution for it (s 7(3)), provided the prosecution show that the person would be guilty of the offence were that person prosecuted ¹³⁴ Arguably it is no more difficult than proving a subjective state of mind such as recklessness of a human defendant. See Wells, Corporations and Criminal Responsibility, 155.

¹³⁵ See LCCP 195, Part 5 and Appendices B and C. Note s 21 of the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, creating offences for corporate bodies or unincorporated associations based on breaches of duties owed to those whose care they manage where an individual carer neglects or ill-treats such a person. For discussion, see K Laird, 'Filling a Lacuna: The Care Worker and Care Provider Offences in the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015' (2016) 37 Stat LR 1.

¹³⁶ Corporations, Crime and Accountability (1993).

under this Act. There is no need for A to have a close connection to the UK as defined in s 12, provided C is a 'relevant commercial organisation'. 'Relevant commercial organisation' is defined (at s 7(5)) as: a body which is incorporated under the law of any part of the UK and which carries on business whether there or elsewhere; a partnership that is formed under the law of any part of the UK and which carries on business there or elsewhere; or any other body corporate or partnership wherever incorporated or formed which carries on business in any part of the UK.

Other safeguards can be built into such offences. For example, s 7 is triable only on indictment (s 11(3)). No prosecution may be instituted in England and Wales except by or with the consent of the DPP or the Director of the Serious Fraud Office (s 10(1)). In the case of a partnership, proceedings must be brought in the name of the partnership (not in that of any of the partners) (s 15).¹³⁷

Sections 45 and 46 of the Criminal Finances Act 2017 create two new corporate offences. Section 45 criminalizes corporates for failing to prevent the facilitation of domestic tax evasion, while s 46 criminalizes corporates for failing to prevent the facilitation of foreign tax evasion.¹³⁸ These offences are to a large extent modelled upon the offence found in s 7 of the Bribery Act 2010.¹³⁹ There is an important difference, however. Commission of the offence in s 7 of the Bribery Act 2010 is contingent upon the prosecution proving that the bribe was paid with the intention of obtaining or retaining business for the corporate. Insofar as the corporate is concerned, the s 7 offence is one of strict liability, but the prosecution must be able to prove the intention of the payer of the bribe. Neither of the new failure to prevent offences contained in the Criminal Finances Act require the prosecution to prove that the intention of the associated person in facilitating the tax evasion offence was to benefit the corporate. The corporate is liable for failing to prevent its associates committing crimes that potentially benefit someone else—not to prevent them committing crimes that benefit the corporate. This is significant, as the Law Commission, in drafting the Bribery Act, concluded that proof of fault would be a qualitative way of distinguishing the s 7 offence from a purely regulatory or administrative penalty.¹⁴⁰ The new offences lack this distinguishing feature.

These models of offence are different from the other approaches discussed earlier, since what is being criminalized is the organizational culture per se; it is only very indirectly if at all that the company is being held responsible for the wrongs done by its agents. Ashworth has convincingly argued that these offences represent a new generation of omissions-based liability that takes criminal responsibility to a new level. The question he poses is whether the wrong of failing to carry out the duty imposed by these new corporate offences is serious enough to justify criminalization or whether a regulatory response would be sufficient.¹⁴¹

In 2017 the Ministry of Justice conducted a consultation exercise which sought views on whether the failure to prevent model ought to apply to other financial crimes, such as fraud and money laundering.¹⁴² In formulating any recommendations, it will be necessary to consider whether the corporate's liability should be dependent upon whether the associated person, when he committed the substantive offence, intended to benefit the corporate.¹⁴³

¹³⁷ The maximum sentence is an unlimited fine. A fine imposed on a partnership is to be paid out of partnership assets (s 15(3)). See S Gentle [2011] Crim LR 101.

¹³⁸ For discussion, see K Laird, 'The Criminal Finances Act 2017—An Introduction' [2017] Crim LR 915.

¹³⁹ For discussion of this model, see A Ashworth, 'Positive Duties, Regulation and the Criminal Sanction' (2017) 133 LQR 606, 626–628.

¹⁴⁰ LC 313, Reforming Bribery (2008), para 6.100.

¹⁴¹ A Ashworth, 'A New Generation of Omissions Offences?' [2018] Crim LR 354.

¹⁴² Ministry of Justice, Corporate Liability for Economic Crime: Call for Evidence (2017) Cm 9370.

¹⁴³ For discussion, see C Wells, 'Corporate Failure to Prevent Economic Crime—A Proposal' [2017] Crim LR 426.

8.1.5.5 Extended vicarious liability

An alternative model would be to extend the approach to vicarious liability, as in some other jurisdictions such as some states in the United States, and introduce broader due diligence defences available to corporations.¹⁴⁴ The application of due diligence defences is considered in full in Ch 5. Again, this may not involve a drastic change from the present position. We turn now to consider the scope of vicarious liability.

8.2 Vicarious liability

8.2.1 Nature and scope of doctrine

The doctrine of ‘vicarious liability’¹⁴⁵ is a mechanism by which the law attributes blame for the acts of another. Common examples include retail companies being responsible for the sale of items by managers and shop assistants in their stores, and of licensees being responsible for the acts of their employees. Unfortunately, English law’s approach has the potential to operate very harshly. As the Law Commission commented, the doctrine can operate wholly unfairly and disproportionately by imposing liability on D for an offence committed by someone even though D had no reason to think that the delegated person would do as he did.¹⁴⁶ The doctrine ought therefore to be kept within strict limits; disappointingly, it remains of uncertain scope.

8.2.1.1 Vicarious liability distinguished from personal duty

It is important to distinguish vicarious liability from liability for breach of a personal duty. Many statutes, particularly dealing with regulatory offences, create specific offences that can be committed by the specified person (eg the employer) in person. If the specified person is in breach of that duty, he commits the actus reus of the offence and, if it imposes strict liability, he is personally, not vicariously, guilty of the offence, though he may say with truth that he would not have been in breach but for the fault of his employees or agents. A good example is the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. By s 3(1), the Act imposes on every employer a duty ‘to conduct his undertaking in such a way as to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable’ that persons not in his employment are not exposed to risk. In British Steel Plc,¹⁴⁷ D’s subcontractor, negligently conducting D’s undertaking, caused V’s death. D had not ensured so far as was, in the opinion of the court, reasonably practicable, that persons were not exposed to risk and D was therefore guilty. D was liable, not vicariously for the acts of the subcontractor which caused death, but for his own failure to ensure that there was no risk of such a thing happening. This was a case of personal liability being imposed by the statute.¹⁴⁸

¹⁴⁴ See GR Sullivan (1996) 55 CLJ 515.

¹⁴⁵ Williams, CLGP, Ch 7, and ‘Mens Rea and Vicarious Responsibility’ (1956) 9 CLP 57; P Glazebrook, ‘Situational Liability’ in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 108; PJ Pace, ‘Delegation—A Doctrine in Search of a Definition’ [1982] Crim LR 627; LH Leigh, Strict and Vicarious Liability (1982); FB Sayer, ‘Criminal Responsibility for the Acts of Another’ (1930) 43 Harv LR 689; T Baty, Vicarious Liability (1916) especially Ch X. For proposals for the reform of the law, see Law Com WP No 43; LCCP 195.

¹⁴⁶ See LCCP 195, para 1.89.

¹⁴⁷ [1995] 1 WLR 1356, [1995] Crim LR 654. If work is part of D’s undertaking—a question of fact—D is in breach of his duty if independent contractors whom he engages to perform it unreasonably expose others to risk: Associated Octel Ltd [1996] 4 All ER 846, [1997] Crim LR 355, HL. See also Environment Agency v Biffa Waste Ltd [2006] EWHC 1102 (Admin). Alphacell Ltd (p 165) was, it is submitted, a case of personal liability and wrongly treated as a precedent for vicarious liability in National Rivers Authority v Alfred McAlpine Homes (East) Ltd [1994] 4 All ER 286, DC, [1994] Crim LR 960 and commentary.

¹⁴⁸ See for an example: Hatton Traffic Management Ltd [2006] EWCA Crim 1156.

8.2.1.2 Strict liability and vicarious liability distinguished

It is also important to distinguish strict liability and vicarious liability;¹⁴⁹ they are by no means the same thing.¹⁵⁰ The point requires emphasis for there is an unhappy judicial tendency to confuse the two concepts. A statute may require mens rea and yet also impose vicarious responsibility under the delegation principle (discussed later). It has already been noted that supplying liquor to a constable on duty was an offence requiring mens rea,¹⁵¹ yet a licensee may be vicariously liable for his agent/employee's act in so doing.¹⁵² Conversely, it is clearly possible for a statute to create strict liability without imposing vicarious responsibility. Once a statute has been held to impose a duty with strict liability on a particular person, it is likely to be held that that person is liable for the acts of anyone through whom he performs that duty.¹⁵³ Where, however, the duty with strict liability is not imposed on particular persons but on the public generally, vicarious liability is inappropriate. For example, the offence of causing death by dangerous driving (in its previous form) was held to be an offence of strict liability, but it is surely inconceivable that vicarious liability would have been imposed.

8.2.1.3 Relationship with tortious doctrine

True vicarious liability is the general rule in the law of tort. An employer is held liable for all acts of his employee performed in the course of his employee's employment, or, as the courts now prefer to say, performed in close connection with it.¹⁵⁴ In the criminal law, an employer is generally not so liable. In one of the leading civil cases, Lloyd v Grace, Smith & Co,¹⁵⁵ a solicitor's managing clerk, without the knowledge of his employer, induced a widow to give him instructions to sell certain property, to hand over the title deeds and to sign two documents which were neither read over nor explained to her, but which she believed were necessary for the sale. The documents were, in fact, a conveyance to the clerk of the property, which he then dishonestly disposed of for his own benefit. It was held that, since the clerk was acting within the scope of his authority, his employer was liable. Today it is very likely that the clerk would be guilty of certain criminal offences; but it is perfectly clear that his employer could never have been made criminally liable for those acts even though the employer bore civil liability.

¹⁴⁹ The Court of Appeal in St Regis Paper Co Ltd [2011] EWCA Crim 2527 cited with approval the distinction drawn in the 12th edition of this work between questions of delegation and questions of strict liability.

¹⁵⁰ Seaboard Offshore Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1993] 1 WLR 1025, [1993] Crim LR 611; affd [1994] 2 All ER 99, HL.

¹⁵¹ Sherras v De Rutzen [1895] 1 QB 918, p 158.

¹⁵² Mullins v Collins (1874) LR 9 QB 292.

¹⁵³ Dicta to the effect that an offence of strict liability necessarily imposes vicarious responsibility are not difficult to find: see eg Barker v Levinson [1951] 1 KB 342 at 345, [1950] 2 All ER 825 at 827; James & Son Ltd v Smee [1955] 1 QB 78 at 95, per Slade J; Bradshaw v Ewart-James [1983] 1 All ER 12 at 14.

¹⁵⁴ The doctrine has undergone a radical change in the law of tort, with a much wider scope of liability being imposed by the courts. Examples include Dubai Aluminium v Salaam [2003] 2 AC 366, where their lordships held that it is not a condition of vicarious liability that all the wrongful acts for which an employee was responsible had to have been committed in the course of employment, rather vicarious liability would not be imposed unless all the acts or omissions which were necessary to make him personally liable had taken place in the course of employment. See also Lister v Hesley Hall Ltd [2002] 1 AC 215; Mattis v Pollock [2003] EWCA Civ 887 (nightclub owner liable for bouncer stabbing V when club encouraged bouncer to be aggressive); Various Claimants v Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools [2012] UKSC 56 (a religious order was vicariously liable for the sexual abuse perpetrated by brother teachers at a residential school even though the order did not manage the school); and Cox v Ministry of Justice [2016] UKSC 10. See generally on tortious liability, Peel and Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) Ch 21; P Atiyah, Vicarious Liability in the English Law of Torts (1967) and C McIvor, 'The Use and Abuse of the Doctrine of Vicarious Liability' (2006) 35 CLWR 268; Lord Hope of Craighead, 'Tailoring the Law on Vicarious Liability' (2013) 129 LQR 514.

¹⁵⁵ [1912] AC 716, HL. As approved by the House of Lords in Lister v Hesley Hall Ltd [2001] UKHL 22.

An employer is similarly liable in tort where the employee acting in the course of his employment commits a fraud involving a forgery,¹⁵⁶ and for acts which amount to fraud, assault and battery, manslaughter, and so on; but in none of these cases would the employer be criminally liable solely on the ground that his employee was acting in the course of his employment.

The doctrine of vicarious liability in tort developed in the early part of the eighteenth century, but there was to be no parallel development in the criminal law, as was made clear by the leading case of Huggins.¹⁵⁷ Huggins, the warden of the Fleet (equivalent to a prison governor), was charged with the murder of a prisoner whose death had been caused by the servant of Huggins' deputy. It was held that, though the servant was guilty, Huggins was not, since the acts were done without his knowledge. Raymond CJ said:¹⁵⁸

It is a point not to be disputed, but that in criminal cases the principal is not answerable for the act of the deputy as he is in civil cases: they must each answer for their own acts, and stand or fall by their own behaviour. All the authors that treat of criminal proceedings proceed on the foundation of this distinction; that to affect the superior by the act of his deputy, there must be the command of the superior which is not found in this case.

This has been confirmed more recently in R (Chief Constable of Northumbria) v Newcastle Magistrates' Court,¹⁵⁹ where the court, referring to the 12th edition of this work, concluded that there is no doctrine of criminal vicarious liability at common law (except in relation to public nuisance, criminal libel (since abolished) and some forms of contempt of court).

8.2.2 Identifying criminal vicarious liability

An employer can be held liable for his employee's crimes, as a general rule, only where he is a participant in them within the rules governing secondary liability as discussed in Ch 6. Exceptions to the general rule have already been noted:¹⁶⁰ in public nuisance,¹⁶¹ criminal libel (prior to its abolition—see Ch 30) and contempt of court, an employer has been held liable for his employee's acts although he, personally, played no part in the conduct and was unaware of it. These were the only exceptions at common law; but now, by statute, there are many such offences because Parliament is, of course, always at liberty to impose vicarious criminal liability.

As in the case of strict liability, in truth it appears that the imposition of vicarious liability is the work of the courts rather than of Parliament. Statutes do occasionally say, in terms, that one person is to be liable for another's crimes.¹⁶² It is more common, however, for the courts to 'detect' such an intention in construing statutory offences. This judicial willingness to impose vicarious liability arises particularly in summary offences. The reason most commonly advanced by the judges for holding a person (usually an employer, but ¹⁵⁶ Uxbridge Permanent Building Society v Pickard [1939] 2 KB 248.

¹⁵⁷ (1730) 2 Stra 883. ¹⁵⁸ ibid, 885.

¹⁵⁹ [2010] EWHC 935 (Admin). The court offered an interesting analysis of the history of the principle.

¹⁶⁰ See p 222.

¹⁶¹ Although in Rimmington [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153 Lord Bingham commented that this is hard to reconcile with the modern approach to that subject in cases potentially involving the severest penalties, and may well be explained, as Mellor J did in R v Stephens (1866) LR 1 QB 702 at 708–709, [1861–73] All ER Rep Ext 2059 at 2060–2061, by the civil colour of the proceedings, at [39].

¹⁶² A striking example is the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, s 64(5), which provides that the owner of a vehicle (even if a corporation) shall be conclusively presumed to have been the driver at the time of the commission of certain offences and, 'accordingly, that acts or omissions of the driver of the vehicle at the time were his acts or omissions'.

independent contractors may also be caught)¹⁶³ liable is that the statute would be ‘rendered nugatory’¹⁶⁴—and the will of Parliament thereby defeated—if he were not. It may seem rather odd for the courts to be willing to impose liability for the acts of another on grounds of expediency when the foundation of the criminal law is that a person should be liable only for his personal wrongdoing. This would be particularly unsatisfactory in the absence of clear evidence that the prosecution of an employer will render the legislation more effective by deterring that and other employers from similar breaches.

Atkin J in *Mousell Brothers Ltd v London and North-Western Railway Co*¹⁶⁵ provided guidance on the identification of statutory vicarious liability:

while prima facie a principal is not to be made criminally responsible for the acts of his servants, yet the legislature may prohibit an act or enforce a duty in such words as to make the prohibition or the duty absolute; in which case the principal is liable if the act is in fact done by his servants. To ascertain whether a particular Act of Parliament has that effect or not regard must be had to the object of the statute, the words used, the nature of the duty laid down, the person upon whom it is imposed, the person by whom it would in ordinary circumstances be performed, and the person upon whom the penalty is imposed.

The decision of the House of Lords in *Environment Agency v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd*¹⁶⁶ also has an impact in this area. As noted earlier, their lordships took an unorthodox approach to the issue of causation in the strict liability offences of ‘causing’ pollution under the Water Resources Act 1991. The House held that the conduct of a third party unknown to the defendants that released the pollutant from the defendant’s storage tanks did not break the chain of causation. Hence, the defendants remained liable.¹⁶⁷

8.2.3 The application of vicarious liability

Two quite distinct principles, differing somewhat in their effect, underlie the various decisions on vicarious liability. In the first place, a person may be held liable for the acts of another where he has delegated to that other the performance of certain duties cast on him by Act of Parliament. In the second place, an employer may be held liable because acts which are done physically by his employee may, in law, be the employer’s acts. These two types of case require separate consideration.

8.2.3.1 The delegation principle

A good illustration of the application of this principle¹⁶⁸ may be found in the case of Allen v Whitehead.¹⁶⁹ Section 44 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 provides an offence for a keeper of a refreshment house to ‘knowingly permit or suffer prostitutes or persons of notoriously bad character to meet together and remain’ there. D, the occupier of a cafe, although receiving the profits of the business, did not himself manage it, instead employing a manager. Having had a warning from the police, D instructed his manager that no prostitutes were to be allowed to congregate on the premises and had a notice to that effect displayed on the walls. He visited the premises once or twice a week and there was no evidence that ¹⁶³ See eg Quality Dairies (York) Ltd v Pedley [1952] 1 KB 275.

¹⁶⁴ Mullins v Collins (1874) LR 9 QB 292 at 295, per Blackburn and Quain JJ; Coppen v Moore (No 2) [1898] 2 QB 306 at 314, per Lord Russell CJ; Allen v Whitehead, later.

¹⁶⁵ [1917] 2 KB 836 at 845. ¹⁶⁶ [1999] 2 AC 22.

¹⁶⁷ See Milford Haven Port Authority [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 423. See also Environment Agency v Biffa Waste Ltd [2006] EWHC 1102 (Admin) which may appear to cast doubt on this, but is, it is submitted, a case turning on the facts of the subcontractual arrangement.

¹⁶⁸ See Pace [1982] Crim LR 627. ¹⁶⁹ [1930] 1 KB 211.

any misconduct took place in his presence. Then, on eight consecutive days, a number of women, known to the manager to be prostitutes, met together and remained there between the hours of 8 pm and 4 am. It was held by the Divisional Court, reversing the Metropolitan Magistrate, that D's ignorance of those facts was no defence. The acts of the manager and his mens rea (knowing that the women present were prostitutes) were both to be imputed to his employer, not simply because he was an employee, but because the management of the house had been delegated to him.

So in *Linnett v Metropolitan Police Comr*¹⁷⁰ it was held, following Allen v Whitehead,¹⁷¹ that one of two co-licensees was liable for the acts of the other in knowingly permitting disorderly conduct in the licensed premises, contrary to s 44 of the same Act, although the other was neither his servant nor his partner,¹⁷² but simply his delegate in 'keeping' the premises.

The argument that vicarious responsibility is necessary if the statute is to be effective applies with special force to cases of this type. Where the statute is phrased in such a way that the offence can be committed only by the delegator, there would indeed be a real difficulty in making the statute effective without vicarious liability. For example, under s 44 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 (discussed earlier in this section), the offence may be committed only by a person 'who shall have or keep any house . . .' Presumably the mere manager in Allen v Whitehead was not such a person and if, therefore, the absentee 'keeper' were not liable for his manager's acts, the statute could be ignored with impunity. The position is the same in many of the offences under the Licensing Acts;¹⁷³ only the licensee can commit the offences. The difficulty has been well put by Lord Russell CJ:¹⁷⁴

We may take as an illustration the case of a sporting publican who attends race-meetings all over the country, and leaves a manager in charge of his public-house; is it to be said that there is no remedy under this section^[175] if drink is sold by the manager in charge to any number of drunken persons?

It is clear that there is no machinery by which the person actually selling can be convicted; a penalty can only be inflicted on the licensee.

Sub-delegation

It has been recognized that vicarious liability might be extended to cover the case where A delegates his responsibilities to B who sub-delegates them to C. Thus, if the licensee's delegate sub-delegates his responsibilities, the licensee is liable for the sub-delegate's acts,¹⁷⁶ but he is not liable for the acts of an inferior servant to whom control of the premises has not been delegated.¹⁷⁷

¹⁷⁰ [1946] KB 290.

¹⁷¹ See n 169.

¹⁷² Both were, in fact, the employees of a limited company. The company was not charged, no doubt for the good reason that it was not the licensee.

¹⁷³ See generally S Mehigan, D Wilson, G Gouriet, J Phillips and J Saunders (eds), Paterson's Licensing Acts 2018 (126th edn, 2017) and S Mehigan, J Phillips and J Saunders (eds), The Licensing Act 2003 (2004) paras 8.11–8.12.

¹⁷⁴ In Commissioners of Police v Cartman [1896] 1 QB 655 at 658. Yet when Parliament adds 'or his servant', the court holds that the delegation still applies to the licensee: Howker v Robinson, later. In Boucher v DPP (1996) 160 JP 650, it was held that where D is the licensee and owns a shop with P who is not a licensee, D cannot be vicariously liable for P's sales to a minor since P is not a servant but a co-owner.

¹⁷⁵ Licensing Act 1872, s 13. Cf Cundy v Le Cocq (1884) 13 QBD 207, p 145, which establishes that the offence is also one of strict liability.

¹⁷⁶ Crabtree v Hole (1879) 43 JP 799; Sopp v Long [1970] 1 QB 518, [1969] 1 All ER 855.

¹⁷⁷ Allchorn v Hopkins (1905) 69 JP 355.

What constitutes effective delegation?

There is some doubt as to the degree of delegation which is necessary to bring the principle into operation. In a leading case, Vane v Yiannopoulos, in the Divisional Court, whose view the House later affirmed,¹⁷⁸ Parker LCJ said that: 'It must be shown that the licensee is not managing the business himself but has delegated the management to someone else . . .'¹⁷⁹

Lord Evershed¹⁸⁰ agreed with that and Lord Hodson said that the principle 'has never so far been extended so as to cover the case where the whole of the authority of the licensee has not been transferred to another'.¹⁸¹ Lord Reid appears to have confined the principle to cases where the licensee is absent from the premises but leaves another in charge.¹⁸² It was held that the principle was inapplicable in that case where the licensee was on the premises, but not on the same floor as a waitress whom he had instructed as to her rights to sell intoxicating liquor, at the time she made an illegal sale. However, in Howker v Robinson,¹⁸³ a licensee who was serving in one room of the pub (the public bar) was held liable for an illegal sale made by his barman in another room (the lounge). This does not seem to be a case where the whole authority of the licensee had been transferred or where he was not managing the business himself. The court regarded the question of whether there had been delegation as one of fact, which had been properly decided by the magistrates. Winson,¹⁸⁴ which the court followed, was entirely different, for there the licensee visited the premises only occasionally and had a manager who was in control.

In Howker v Robinson, the degree of delegation was no greater than is essential in any public house with more than one bar and it is submitted that not only does it go too far but it leaves the law in an uncertain state. It is apparently open to the magistrates to find as 'a fact' that there has or has not been delegation where the licensee is on the premises. The principle ought to be confined to the case where the licensee is not 'doing his job', but has handed it over to another. Where a licensee who is employed by a brewery is suspended, the brewery has the right, under an implied term in the contract of employment, to delegate the rights and duties of the licensee to another employee. Thus, sales of liquor on the licensed premises continue to be lawful and, presumably, the suspended licensee is liable for offences committed by the delegate.¹⁸⁵

No delegation principle in strict liability offences?

According to Lord Parker, the delegation principle comes into play only in the case of offences requiring mens rea.¹⁸⁶ Where liability is strict, 'the person on whom liability is thrown is responsible whether he has delegated or whether he has acted through a servant'. According to this view, if D, the licensee, not having delegated his duties, is serving in the bar with E, the barmaid: (a) D will not be liable if E, without his knowledge, sells liquor to a constable on duty because that offence requires mens rea, but (b) D will be liable if E, without his knowledge, sells liquor to a drunken person because that offence does not require mens rea. If this is right, strict liability offences must be dealt with under the 'attributed act' principle (see the following section). The Court of Appeal stated, obiter, in St Regis Paper Co Ltd that in the context of the regulations under consideration in that case, the contrast between strict liability offences and those requiring mens rea was too striking to permit the application of the delegation principle.¹⁸⁷

¹⁷⁸ [1965] AC 486, [1965] Crim LR 401, HL. ¹⁷⁹ -[1964] 2 QB 739 at 745.

¹⁸⁰ [1965] AC 486 at 505. ¹⁸¹ ibid, 510.

¹⁸² At 497; cf Pace [1982] Crim LR 627 at 629, 636.

¹⁸³ [1973] QB 178, [1972] Crim LR 377, DC. Contrast McKenna v Harding (1905) 69 JP 354.

¹⁸⁴ [1969] 1 QB 371. ¹⁸⁵ DPP v Rogers [1992] Crim LR 51, DC.

¹⁸⁶ Winson [1969] 1 QB 371 at 382. ¹⁸⁷ [2011] EWCA Crim 2527.

Legitimacy of the delegation principle

Some doubt was cast on the validity of the delegation principle by the House of Lords in Vane v Yiannopoulos.¹⁸⁸ Since there was no delegation in that case, their lordships' remarks were obiter. Lords Morris and Donovan could find no statutory authority for the doctrine and, though they did not find it necessary to pronounce on its validity, Lord Donovan thought that 'If a decision that "knowingly" means "knowingly" will make the provision difficult to enforce, the remedy lies with the legislature.' Lord Reid found the delegation principle hard to justify; but while it may have been unwarranted in the first instance, it was now too late to upset such a long-standing practice. Lord Evershed thought that a licensee may 'fairly and sensibly' be held liable where he has delegated his powers and Lord Hodson expressed no opinion. Subsequent cases¹⁸⁹ show that the doctrine continues unimpaired. Such a long-standing principle is perhaps unlikely now to be overruled by the Supreme Court. It should not, however, be readily extended.¹⁹⁰ In Bradshaw v Ewart-James,¹⁹¹ the court declined to apply it to the case where the master of a ship delegated the performance of his statutory duty to his chief officer. That, however, was not a case of the full delegation which the doctrine seems to require, for the master remained on board and in command. As the master cannot personally direct the ship for 24 hours a day, some delegation is inevitable. In St Regis Paper Co Ltd, the Court of Appeal stated that the delegation principle is unlikely to be extended beyond its current boundaries.¹⁹²

8.2.3.2 The 'attributed act' principle

This second vicarious liability principle occurs in cases of strict liability where the actus reus of the employee, etc is attributed to D. It arises in statutory offences involving acts of selling, possessing, using, etc.

Many of the reported cases are those in which 'selling' or 'supplying' is the central feature of the actus reus, under statutes like the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, the Food and Drugs Acts, etc. A 'sale' consists in the transfer of property in goods from A to B¹⁹³ and the seller, in law, is necessarily the person in whom the property is vested at the commencement of the transaction. It is not a great step and no surprise, therefore, for the court to say that the employer has committed the actus reus of 'selling' even though he was nowhere near when the incident took place. In Coppen v Moore (No 2),¹⁹⁴ D owned six shops, in which he sold 'American hams'. He gave strict instructions that these hams were to be described as 'break-fast hams' and were not to be sold under any specific name of place of origin. In the absence of D, and without the knowledge of the manager of the branch, one of the assistants sold a ham as a 'Scotch ham'. D was convicted¹⁹⁵ of selling goods 'to which any . . . false trade description is applied'. Lord Russell CJ said:¹⁹⁶

It cannot be doubted that the appellant [the owner] sold the ham in question, although the transaction was carried out by his servants. In other words he was the seller, although not the actual salesman. It is clear also, as already stated, that the ham was sold with a 'false trade description' which was material. If so, there is evidence establishing a prima facie case of an offence against the Act having been committed by the appellant.

¹⁸⁸ [1965] AC 486, [1965] Crim LR 401, HL.

¹⁸⁹ Ross v Moss [1965] 2 QB 396; Winson [1969] 1 QB 371.

¹⁹⁰ cf Howker v Robinson, n 183. Yet Bristow J, while considering himself bound by the authorities to apply the delegation principle, hoped that it might be overturned by the House of Lords: [1972] 2 All ER 786 at 791.

¹⁹¹ [1983] QB 671, DC.

¹⁹² [2011] EWCA Crim 2527, [28].

¹⁹³ This is so in the criminal as well as the civil law: Watson v Coupland [1945] 1 All ER 217.

¹⁹⁴ [1898] 2 QB 306. One partner may similarly be liable for the acts of another: Davies v Harvey (1874) LR 9 QB 433. Cf Parsons v Barnes [1973] Crim LR 537.

¹⁹⁵ Under the Merchandise Marks Act 1887, s 2(2).

¹⁹⁶ [1898] 2 QB 306 at 313. Emphasis added.

The court was clearly influenced by the fact that D (like many other employers) carried on his business in a number of branches and could not possibly be in direct control of each one so that, if actual knowledge of the particular transaction had to be proved, he could hardly ever be made liable. The court did not, however, apply the principle of delegation which is to be found in the licensing cases. By construing the Act in accordance with the principles of the civil law and so holding that D had himself committed an actus reus, the court introduced a more far-reaching principle. Comparison with *Allchorn v Hopkins*¹⁹⁷ shows that, under the delegation principle, D would not have been liable for the act of the assistant to whom control of the premises had not been delegated.¹⁹⁸ D is not liable under that principle unless the delegate is acting within the scope of the delegation. So, for example, D was not liable where an employee, who had no authority to sell anything, supplied his employer's whisky to a customer out of hours.¹⁹⁹

A modern instance of the application of the attributed act principle is Harrow London Borough Council v Shah and Shah.²⁰⁰ The Shahs, newsagents, were convicted of selling a national lottery ticket to a boy under 16, contrary to s 13(1)(c) of the National Lottery Act 1993, although they had taken all reasonable steps²⁰¹ to ensure that the regulations were complied with and, though one of them was on the premises, neither was present in the shop when the ticket was sold by their employee, H, who reasonably believed the boy was at least 16 years old.

The limits of the attribution principle

There are many cases not involving a sale where a similar principle has been invoked. Just as it is the employer who, in law, 'sells' goods with which his employee is actually dealing, so too is he 'in possession' of goods which are actually in his employee's hands²⁰² and so can be made liable for offences of 'being in possession' (of which there are many)²⁰³ through his employees. A producer of plays was held under s 15 of the Theatres Act 1843 (now repealed),²⁰⁴ to have 'presented' a play even though he was miles away when it was performed, and when words were introduced into the performance, without his knowledge, which had not been allowed by the Lord Chamberlain.²⁰⁵

More controversially, it has been held that the owners of a van which was supplied by them to a bailiff of their farm, nevertheless commit the offence of 'keeping' a van which is not 'used solely for the conveyance of goods or burden in the course of trade' without a licence²⁰⁶ if the bailiff uses it, without their knowledge or authority, to take his wife for a day out at Clacton.²⁰⁷ An employer 'uses' his vehicle in contravention of the Motor Vehicles

¹⁹⁷ See n 177.

¹⁹⁸ It was within the scope of the employee's authority in Coppen v Moore (see earlier in this section) to sell hams.

¹⁹⁹ Adams v Camfoni [1929] 1 KB 95.

²⁰⁰ [1999] 3 All ER 302, [2000] Crim LR 992, DC. It is submitted that the court attributed excessive authority to Moussell Bros Ltd v London and North-Western Rly Co Ltd [1917] 2 KB 836, DC in holding that the offence imposed vicarious liability. The ruling of strict liability is also questionable, in the light both of the terms of the section and the subsequent decisions in B (A Minor) v DPP [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] Crim LR 403, and K [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] Crim LR 993, Ch 5. See [2000] Crim LR 694–696.

²⁰¹ This is a common defence in such statutory offences. See, for a discussion in the context of vicarious liability: R (Keam) v DEFRA [2005] EWHC 1582 (Admin) (D's independent contractor allowing cow to go lame and not calling a vet—whether D taken all reasonable steps), and see Ch 5.

²⁰² See n 220.

²⁰³ For examples, see p 151.

²⁰⁴ See Theatres Act 1968; see Ch 30.

²⁰⁵ Grade v DPP [1942] 2 All ER 118. The defendant had in fact been called up for service in the RAF. The result would have been different if D had been charged with 'causing' the play to be presented: Lovelace v DPP [1954] 1 WLR 1468.

²⁰⁶ Contrary to the Revenue Act 1869, s 27 (repealed).

²⁰⁷ Strutt v Clift [1911] 1 KB 1.

(Construction and Use) Regulations if his employee so uses it.²⁰⁸ It is quite understandable that a court should hold that an employer 'presents' a play or 'keeps' a vehicle, for these verbs are apt to describe his function and inapt to describe that of his employees. It is less clear that this is so in the case of 'uses'.²⁰⁹ This could very well refer to the employee's use.

Another case serves to illustrate the proper limits of the doctrine and the need for the statute to be considered in its context. In A-G's Reference (No 2 of 2003),²¹⁰ D was held not to be vicariously liable for 'keeping' an embryo contrary to s 3(1)(b)²¹¹ and s 41(2)(a) of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 ('keeping or using' an embryo, except in pursuance of a licence) where he was the consultant responsible for the supervision of two clinics licensed under the 1990 Act. The embryologist working within one of the clinics was convicted of offences, but D, the supervisor, was unaware of those activities and had not participated in them. In approving the trial judge's decision to acquit D, Judge LJ commented that the offence is committed by the person who contravenes s 3(1), and regarded it as difficult to see how the language could extend to create criminal liability for 'keeping' to D, who 'notwithstanding his statutory responsibilities, does not in fact keep the embryo at all'.²¹²

Sales by a licensee

A new principle seemed to have emerged in Goodfellow v Johnson:²¹³ a licensee is liable for the act of another which can lawfully be performed only by virtue of the licence, even though the other is not his employee. A brewery employed D, a licensee, and P, a barmaid. The barmaid sold watered-down gin. The gin was at all times owned by the brewery. D, the licensee, who had no knowledge of the sale, was prosecuted.²¹⁴ Coppen v Moore (the hams case) did not apply since D (the licensee) was not the owner of the gin; the brewery was. The delegation principle did not apply because there was no delegation.

Some confusion arose as to the application of the case and the significance of the ownership of the property being sold.²¹⁵ It is important to note that the offence in question was not a licensing offence. Consider the position if the barmaid had sold adulterated lemonade (a sale for which no licence is required). It would be absurd to say that the brewery (and the barmaid) could be guilty of selling adulterated lemonade but not adulterated gin. In Nottingham City Council v Wolverhampton and Dudley Breweries Plc,²¹⁶ clarification was provided. It was acknowledged that the owner (brewery) could be convicted of an offence of selling intoxicating liquor below the tolerance allowed in the Food Labelling Regulations under the Food Safety Act 1990. Kennedy LJ accepted that in Goodfellow, Lord Parker had misunderstood the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act 1955 by treating them as absolute offences, and had misunderstood Hotchin v Hindmarsh. Kennedy LJ observed that the owner (the brewery) through the barmaid could make an effective sale regardless of the licensee (D) and that such a sale could involve the owner (the brewery) and not just the ²⁰⁸ Green v Burnett [1955] 1 QB 78; but not where a partner, or person authorized ad hoc, uses the vehicle, if there is also an offence of permitting: Crawford v Houghton [1973] QB 1, DC; Garrett v Hooper [1973] Crim LR 61; Cobb v Williams [1973] Crim LR 243.

²⁰⁹ See especially the disagreement in the Divisional Court in Cambridgeshire CC v Associated Lead Mills Ltd [2005] EWHC 1627 (Admin).

²¹⁰ [2004] EWCA Crim 785.

²¹¹ Now s 3(1A)(a).

²¹² At [20].

²¹³ [1966] 1 QB 83, [1965] Crim LR 304 and commentary.

²¹⁴ Contrary to the Food and Drugs Act 1955.

²¹⁵ It was thought that this case meant that there could be no prosecution of, eg, a brewery whose defective beer was sold by a licensee. Allied Domecq Leisure Ltd v Paul Graham Cooper [1999] Crim LR 230 and commentary.

²¹⁶ [2003] EWHC 2847 (Admin), [2004] 2 WLR 820.

licensee, D, in criminal liability.²¹⁷ Therefore, the responsibility of the licensee, D, under licensing legislation does not relieve the owner (the brewery) of responsibility for conduct relating to all other products.

8.2.4 Mode of participation of employer and employee

Where a statute creates an offence specifically for designated people (eg licensees) to do the act in question, the principal offender is that designated person who is held vicariously liable for the acts of his employee. He alone possesses the personal characteristic which is an essential part of the actus reus and no one else is qualified to fill that role. The employee who actually performs the act is plainly incapable of being a principal, since he is not a licensee, etc, but he may be convicted as an accessory.²¹⁸ This seems strange since the employee is the only participant in the crime who is present and doing anything.

The position is different where the actus reus of the offence can be committed by someone who does not have to possess a personal characteristic, such as being a licensee. In such a case, if the employee is capable of being a principal, then it seems that he may be held to be a joint principal with his employer (the licensee). In crimes of 'selling' and being 'in possession', the court allows the prosecution the best of both worlds by having regard to the legal act when dealing with the employer and the physical act when dealing with the employee. So it is held that the employee, as well as the employer, 'sells'²¹⁹ or is 'in possession';²²⁰ and the employee whose 'use' of a vehicle was held to be use by his employer was convicted in Green v Burnett (see earlier) as a principal. It is submitted that when the employee is capable of being a principal it is logical to hold him liable as such (for he is the real offender) and not as an accessory.

Determining whether the employee is a principal or accessory, etc is of more than academic interest for two reasons. First, if the crime is one of strict liability, mens rea must nevertheless be proved if he is to be convicted as an accessory but not if he is a principal.²²¹ Secondly, where there is a statutory defence enabling someone held vicariously liable to escape if he can bring the 'actual offender' before the court, it is difficult to suppose that the production of an accessory (even though he is the real offender) will suffice. However, a joint principal certainly will suffice in this scenario.²²²

8.2.5 No vicarious liability for abetting or attempting crimes

Abetting is a common law notion and therefore, as we have seen,²²³ requires mens rea even where the principal offence is one of strict liability. For the same reasons D cannot be vicariously liable for E abetting an offence by P, even though the offence itself may be one imposing vicarious liability. In Ferguson v Weaving,²²⁴ D, a licensee, was charged with abetting several of her customers in consuming liquor on the licensed premises outside the permitted hours.²²⁵ It appeared that she had taken all proper means to ensure that drinking ceased when 'Time' was called. But the waiters in the concert room, contrary to their instructions, ²¹⁷ At [18]. ²¹⁸ Griffiths v Studebakers Ltd [1924] 1 KB 102; Ross v Moss [1965] 2 QB 396.

²¹⁹ Hotchin v Hindmarsh [1891] 2 QB 181. Cf Goodfellow v Johnson [1966] 1 QB 83, but note the Nottingham case discussed in the previous section.

²²⁰ Melias Ltd v Preston [1957] 2 QB 380. ²²¹ See p 196.

²²² Melias Ltd v Preston [1957] 2 QB 380. ²²³ See Ch 6.

²²⁴ [1951] 1 KB 814. See also Thomas v Lindop [1950] 1 All ER 966; John Henshall (Quarries) Ltd v Harvey [1965] 2 QB 233. Provincial Motor Club Co Ltd v Dunning [1909] 2 KB 599 overlooks this principle and is a doubtful decision.

²²⁵ Contrary to the Licensing Act 1921, s 4.

made no attempt to collect the customers' drinks and, while D was visiting the several other rooms in the premises, the offence was committed. It was assumed that control of the concert room had been delegated. The principal offence was committed by the customers (P). While accepting that the waiters (E) might have been guilty of abetting the customers who were the principal offenders, the court was emphatic that D could not be. Lord Goddard CJ said:²²⁶

She can aid and abet the customers if she knows that the customers are committing an offence, but we are not prepared to hold that their knowledge can be imputed to her so as to make her, not a principal offender, but an aider and abettor. So to hold would be to establish a new principle in criminal law and one for which there is no authority.

Had there been a substantive offence of permitting drinking on licensed premises after hours, it is fairly clear that the court could have held D guilty; for in that case the acts, and the mens rea, of the servant would have been attributed to her. Likewise, it has been said that there can be no vicarious liability for attempting to commit a crime, even though the crime attempted imposes vicarious liability.²²⁷

8.2.6 Reform of vicarious liability

Clause 29 of the Law Commission Draft Criminal Code would have imposed a welcome restriction on the application of vicarious liability to those circumstances in which Parliament expressly imposed such. Far greater clarity and certainty would have followed from the adoption of this restriction.

The Law Commission has provisionally proposed that a preferable method of imposing criminal liability in place of vicarious liability and delegation would be to create offences drafted in specific terms of 'failing to prevent someone to whom a duty of care has been delegated' from committing the offence.²²⁸

²²⁶ [1951] 1 KB 814 at 821.

²²⁷ Gardner v Akeroyd [1952] 2 QB 743.

²²⁸ See LCCP 195.

Mental conditions, intoxication and mistake

9.1 Introduction

In this and the next chapter the most commonly occurring ‘defences’ are considered. There is no accepted hierarchy of defences in English law and none is adopted in this book.¹ It should also be noted that considerable disagreement persists over the precise theoretical lines between elements which ought properly to be regarded as part of the offence and those comprising defences.²

In this chapter, the pleas of insanity, intoxication and mistake are examined. It would be misleading to treat all of these as ‘defences’ in the true sense of the word since some involve a plea which simply puts the Crown to proof of the relevant issue. The ‘defences’ or ‘pleas’ of insanity, and intoxication, are based on a denial of sufficient capacity to deserve the imposition of a criminal sanction.³ At the core of these topics—insanity, automatism, intoxication, mistake—is the basic principle of English criminal law that the defendant should be held liable only where he is of sufficient capacity to be blameworthy for his actions.⁴ As Professor Hart famously explained, a person should only be blamed if he has the ‘capacity and fair opportunity to change or adjust his behaviour to the law’.⁵

¹ See, however, the theoretical approach in P Robinson, ‘Criminal Law Defences: A Systematic Analysis’ (1982) 82 Col LR 199; and for a ladder of defences see J Horder, Excusing Crime (2004) 103.

² See generally G Williams, ‘Offences and Defences’ (1982) 2 LS 233; K Campbell, ‘Offence and Defence’ in IH Dennis (ed), Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (1987). Tadros, Criminal Responsibility emphasizes the significance of the distinction. Defences, he argues, describe the conditions of criminal responsibility, but do ‘not constitute essential features of D’s conduct which express why he is deserving of conviction, where the defence is unavailable’ (at 109). Thus, lack of consent is an element of the offence in rape.

³ Loughnan seeks to move away from talking about defences and instead conceptualizes what are discussed in this chapter as doctrines. Her excellent account seeks to focus on the way mental condition doctrines relate to other aspects of the criminal law, rather than focusing on the moral evaluation that they might entail. See A Loughnan, Manifest Madness: Mental Incapacity in Criminal Law (2012). For a critique, see T Ward (2014) 77 MLR 527.

⁴ Numerous theories abound as to whether criminal responsibility and defences are properly explained on the bases of D’s capacity, choice or character. These philosophical arguments lie beyond the scope of this work. See, inter alia, Horder, Excusing Crime and Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 2.

⁵ HLA Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (1968) 181. For discussion on the relationship of the insanity defence to questions of responsibility, see the Law Commission, Criminal Liability: Insanity and Automatism, A Discussion Paper (2013) (hereafter in this chapter LCDP), Appendix A. See also the supplementary material to the earlier Scoping Paper (2012) (hereafter in this chapter LCSP) available at https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/insanity-and-automatism/user_uploads/insanity_scoping_supplementary.pdf.

Chapter 10 deals with substantive defences in the true sense—where D has caused an actus reus with the appropriate mens rea but, despite both these elements of the offence being proved by the Crown, D is entitled to an acquittal owing to some justifying or excusing circumstance or condition. There are also special defences which apply to particular crimes (eg loss of self-control and diminished responsibility in murder). They are dealt with separately throughout the book where appropriate and their interrelationship with general defences is considered.

9.1.1 Defences and theories of justification and excuse

Historically, the common law distinguished between justification and excuse, at least in relation to homicide. Some homicides, like that done by the public hangman in carrying out the sentence of the court, were justifiable. Others, like killing by misadventure and without culpable negligence, were merely excusable. In both cases the accused who successfully raised the defence was acquitted of felony but, if the homicide was merely excusable, his goods were forfeited. In 1828, forfeiture was abolished and, ever since, there has been no difference, so far as the defendant is concerned, between the various general defences. If successfully raised, they result in a verdict of not guilty. Insanity is distinct in this respect because it results in a ‘special’ verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity.

There has been a revival of academic interest in a distinction between justification and excuse.⁶ On one simple version of the theory, an act is justified when society does not disapprove of it or where it is permitted.⁷ An act is merely excused when society disapproves of it but thinks it is nevertheless not right to punish D. The distinction is often described in simple terms: whereas the justification speaks to the rightness of the act, the excuse relates to the circumstances of the individual actor.⁸ Clearly, some such distinction exists in fact. There are examples which obviously fall into one category or the other. The nine-year-old child who deliberately kills his playmate is excused but no one would say his act of killing is justified. In contrast, nearly everyone would approve of the conduct of a man who in self-defence wounds an aggressor when that is the only way he can save the lives of his family.

However, these systems of classification into justifications and excuses suffer from a number of drawbacks. First, there is no agreement on the precise hierarchy,⁹ nature or definition of either classification. Duff suggests that they have ‘bred needless confusion’.¹⁰ A number of sophisticated models of justification and excuse have been developed by legal philosophers.¹¹

⁶ G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) Ch 10; S Yeo, Compulsion in the Criminal Law (1990); Smith, Justification and Excuse; G Williams, ‘The Theory of Excuses’ [1982] Crim LR 732; PH Robinson (1982) 82 Col LR 199; J Gardner, ‘The Gist of Excuses’ (1998) Buffalo Crim LR 575; Horder, Excusing Crime; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility; Duff, Answering for Crime, Ch 11; A Simester, ‘On Justifications and Excuses’ in L Zedner and JV Roberts (eds), Principles and Values in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2012); PH Robinson, ‘Four Distinctions that Glanville Williams Did Not Make: The Practical Benefit of Examining the Interrelation Among Criminal Law Doctrine’ in DJ Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law: The Legacy of Glanville Williams (2013).

⁷ It is problematic to suggest that the question is whether society ‘approves’ of the conduct. A better basis for the classification is that it is ‘permitted’. See generally the account in Duff, Answering for Crime, Ch 11. Cf P Westen (2008) 28 OJLS 563.

⁸ For criticism, see J Gardner, ‘Wrongs and Faults’ in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, 61–67.

⁹ See D Husak, ‘On the Supposed Priority of Justification to Excuse’ (2005) 24 L & Phil 557.

¹⁰ Answering for Crime, 263.

¹¹ Debate continues as to whether D who relies on a justification should be seen as having done no wrong, or as having done wrong but being justified in doing it (see G Fletcher, ‘The Nature of Justifications’ in S Shute, S Gardner and J Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) 175). As for excuses, there is debate over whether D is excused because he has acted ‘out of character’ or because he lacked capacity (ie he has not lived up to the standards we can reasonably expect of someone in his circumstances). See generally J Gardner (1998) Buffalo Crim LR 575; V Tadros, ‘The Characters of Excuses’ (2001) 21 OJLS 495; and Horder, Excusing Crime, Ch 3.

Recent suggestions propose a fourfold system of classification with justifications,¹² warranted acts,¹³ excuses¹⁴ and exemptions.¹⁵ Secondly, there is no consensus as to which classification applies to which defence—for example, many see duress as excusatory but some treat it as justificatory. Thirdly, there seems to be little agreement as to what practical difference, if any, would result from classification of a particular defence into one category or another.

Few suggest that there is any difference so far as the acquittal of the person relying on the defence is concerned,¹⁶ but it has been argued more widely that the distinction affects third parties in that (a) it is lawful to resist an aggressor whose aggression is merely excused but not one whose aggression is justified; and (b) there may be a conviction for aiding and abetting one who is merely excused¹⁷ but not one who is justified. Some would also argue that particular judicial decisions on excuses are not to be regarded as being of any wider significance in precedent terms.¹⁸ As Fletcher (whose work inspired the current interest) acknowledges,¹⁹ Anglo-American criminal law has never expressly recognized these (as he thinks) fundamental distinctions.

Applying the version of the theory as expounded by Fletcher, a citizen using force in arresting 'anyone who is in the act of committing an offence' would be justified but a person arresting 'anyone whom he has reasonable grounds for suspecting to be [but who is not in fact] committing an offence' is merely excused. But both acts are equally sanctioned by English law—the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s 24A, provides that a person other than a constable may arrest without warrant anyone who is in the act of committing an indictable offence and anyone whom he reasonably suspects to be doing so.²⁰ The citizen incurs no criminal liability if he arrests in these circumstances. It is true, however, that the first 'arrestee' would not be entitled to use force in self-defence (if the arrestor was using only reasonable force) whereas the second might be.²¹ The law does recognize that a person's act may be excused in the criminal law, while incurring civil liability. A person who makes an unreasonable mistake of fact which, if it were true, would amount to reasonable grounds for suspecting another to be in the act of committing an offence, has a defence to a criminal prosecution for false imprisonment or assault (because he lacks mens rea) but remains liable for the corresponding torts: the act done is not the act which the 1984 Act says he may do. Here the terminology of justification and excuse seems appropriate. The act is 'unlawful', but the actor is excused from criminal liability.

¹² There are many theories of justification ranging from those based on whether the outcome of D's act was a good one; whether he acted for good reasons; etc. See Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 10; J Dressler, 'New Thoughts About the Concept of Justification in the Criminal Law' (1984) 32 UCLA L Rev 61; J Gardner (1998) Buffalo Crim LR 575.

¹³ See Duff, Answering for Crime, 277 et seq. These arise where D had sufficient reason to believe he acted for a good reason.

¹⁴ The theories of excuse are also numerous, with many accepting that there is no single definition. In short, it might be said that an excuse arises where D admits that his act was wrong, but claims not to deserve punishment because of the circumstances pertaining. See fully: Horder, Excusing Crime, especially Ch 6, Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 11; C Finkelstein, 'Excuses and Dispositions in Criminal Law' (2002) 6 Buffalo Crim LR 317. See for comparative review of approaches across Europe, J Blomsma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) Chs VIII–X.

¹⁵ Advocated by Horder, Excusing Crime, 103–106; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Chs 4, 10 and 11. D is exempted where his lack of capacity is a general continuing one whereas he will be excused if his lack of capacity relates to the particular incident alleged.

¹⁶ cf Robinson (1982) 82 Col LR 199 considering special verdicts for those who are excused and also the distinctions he draws attention to in fn 6.

¹⁷ As in Bourne (1952) 36 Cr App R 125 and Cogan and Leak [1976] QB 217, [1975] Crim LR 584. See p 223.

¹⁸ Robinson, n 16. ¹⁹ Rethinking Criminal Law, n 6.

²⁰ Subject to the conditions in s 24A(3). See Blackstone's Criminal Practice (2018) D1.29.

²¹ See p 396.

Any attempt to rely on the theories of justifications or excuses as the guiding principle by which to structure an analysis of defences would, in the present state of the law, be premature, and no such attempt is made in either this or the subsequent chapter.

9.1.2 Relationship between mental condition defences

Some of the pleas discussed in this chapter may overlap since they are concerned with D's denial that he was a responsible actor at the time of the commission of the offence. Their inter-relationship may be usefully summarized at the outset.²² In short, there are three categories.

- (1) Situations where D suffers some malfunctioning of his body or mind owing to some disease or internal cause. These factors are treated in law as 'diseases of the mind' which render D liable to a special verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. The category includes such unremarkable conditions as sleepwalking, epilepsy and diabetes. The label 'insanity' is profoundly misleading.
- (2) Situations where, because of some external factor that has affected D's mind or body in such a way that he acts involuntarily, he is entitled to an acquittal. Examples include concussion, taking a medically prescribed drug or anaesthetic in accordance with instructions, and other 'external' factors. These may give rise to a defence of sane²³ automatism, but that defence is hedged with qualification and approached by the courts with considerable scepticism. A defence of sane automatism is available only where D suffers a complete loss of control over the functioning of his limbs. In addition, where the automatism is self-induced by taking alcohol or drugs, it may be a defence to crimes of specific intent (as explained later) but not generally to basic intent offences (explained later).
- (3) Situations where the factors affecting D's capacity do not negate liability at all. Examples include the voluntary taking of drink or drugs (discussed at p 311), which will provide no excuse in crimes other than those of specific intent where D has become so intoxicated as to lack mens rea.

9.2 Insanity

Some form of defence akin to the current defence of insanity²⁴ is crucial to the criminal justice system.²⁵ It recognizes that the imposition of criminal punishment should be reserved for those who are rational and responsible beings.²⁶ There are two ways in which an accused ²² See LCDP, Ch 6 for a thorough analysis of the relationship between insanity, automatism and intoxication.

²³ Sometimes called non-insane automatism.

²⁴ See generally the excellent, though now dated, discussion in RD Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in Criminal Law (1995). Proposals for the reform of the law are made in the Report of the Committee on Mentally Abnormal Offenders (The Butler Report, 1975) Cmnd 6244, 1975. See also the philosophical discussion in Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Chs 11 and 12. For the Law Commission's review of this area and its provisional conclusions on reform, see LCDP. The present law is described in Ch 2. This paper was preceded by the LCSP in which the Commission sought evidence that the defences were causing problems in practice. See J Peay, 'Insanity and Automatism: Questions from and About the Law Commission's Scoping Paper' [2012] Crim LR 927. The supplementary materials to LCSP, Ch 2–4 (available via the online resources) set out the present law and problems in considerable detail.

²⁵ Some have suggested that the defence could be abolished and the absence of mens rea would serve as a determinant of D's liability. See n 217 and C Slobogin, 'An End to Insanity: Recasting the Role of Mental Illness in Criminal Cases' (2000) 86 Virg LR 1199. See also LCDP, Ch 2 and references therein, and the supplementary material to LCSP, Appendix A.

²⁶ See the valuable analysis of the relationship between the defences and responsibility in Appendix A of LCDP.

person's mental condition or illness may be relevant in a criminal trial. First, the accused may claim that he lacked mental capacity at the time of the commission of the conduct alleged to constitute the criminal offence. Secondly, the accused may be claiming that at the time of trial he lacks mental capacity to be tried. It is convenient to deal with this second category here because of its very close relationship with the defence of insanity, although technically it is a matter not of substantive criminal law but of procedure.

9.2.1 Mental illness and trial

9.2.1.1 Mental condition rendering trial impracticable

In some cases, where D is held in custody awaiting trial, his mental condition will be so serious that he is transferred to hospital. If the Secretary of State is satisfied by reports from at least two medical practitioners that D is suffering from mental disorder,²⁷ she may order that D be detained in a hospital, if he is suffering from mental disorder of a nature or degree which makes it appropriate for him to be detained in a hospital for medical treatment; and he is in urgent need of such treatment; and appropriate medical treatment is available for him.²⁸ The defendant is normally brought to trial²⁹ when he is well enough. The basis for this practice is:

that the issue of insanity should be determined by the jury whenever possible and the power should be exercised only when there is likely to be a scandal [ie serious concern about the propriety] if the prisoner is brought up for trial . . .³⁰

Clearly, in order to maintain compatibility with Art 5(1) (deprivation of liberty only in accordance with law) and Art 6 (fair trial) of the ECHR, it is essential that this power to detain is exercised in accordance with law and sparingly.³¹

9.2.1.2 Unfitness to be tried

Introduction

It is an important principle that an accused should, wherever possible, have an opportunity to contest his guilt in a normal criminal trial.³² Finding someone to be 'unfit' results in him being denied a full criminal trial and ought therefore to be an exceptional approach.³³

²⁷ For definitions, see Mental Health Act 2007. The 2007 Act amends the Mental Health Act 1983, redefining 'mental disorder' as 'any disorder or disability of the mind'.

²⁸ Mental Health Act 1983, s 48 (as amended).

²⁹ See the Law Commission's description of the pathways through the criminal justice system for the mentally ill in Appendix A of supplementary material to LCSP. See also LC 364, Unfitness to Plead (2016) Ch 2.

³⁰ Report of the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment (1953) Cmd 8932. See eg Ghanbary [2006] EWCA Crim 2374.

³¹ cf the statistics revealed by RD Mackay and D Machin, Transfers from Prison to Hospital—The Operation of s48 of the Mental Health Act 1983 (Home Office Research Directorate, 1998) No 84. See also P Bean, Madness and Crime (2008) Ch 3.

³² R (Hasani) v Blackfriars CC [2005] EWHC 3016 (Admin). See the Law Commission's recommendation to allow for adjournment where there is a prospect of recovery so as to enable D to have a full trial: see LC 364, para 4.97.

³³ See LC 364, Unfitness to Plead (2016) especially Ch 2. On fitness to plead more generally, see Mackay, Mental Condition Defences, Ch 5; for trends in the use of the plea see RD Mackay and G Kearns, 'An Upturn in Unfitness to Plead?' [2000] Crim LR 532; RD Mackay, B Mitchell and L Howe, 'A Continued Upturn in Unfitness to Plead—More Disability in Relation to the Trial under the 1991 Act' [2007] Crim LR 530. Research appended to the LC Report reveals that the number of unfitness cases increased and has levelled off at around 100 per year. Legal guidance for the conduct of such cases is provided by the CPS: www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/mentally-disordered-offenders.

Someone who is seriously mentally ill may nevertheless be 'fit to plead to the indictment and follow the proceedings at the trial and . . . if he is, he should ordinarily be allowed to do so, because it is in principle desirable that a person charged with a criminal offence should, whenever possible, be tried, so that the question whether he committed the crime may be determined by a jury.'³⁴

At any trial in the Crown Court it might be alleged by the defence or the prosecution that D is 'unfit to plead' or 'unfit to stand trial'. If D is found by the judge to be unfit, the normal trial process is not applied to him. Instead, a jury determines the narrow question whether D did the act complained of (without considering his mens rea)—this is called a trial of the facts. At that hearing D might be acquitted (having been found not to have done the act) or be found to have done the act, and thereby be subjected to a range of disposal powers which are not 'sentences' since he has not been convicted.³⁵

The issue of unfitness can be raised at any time. If raised at the start of the trial on arraignment, the Crown Court follows the procedure to determine D's fitness under ss 4 and 4A of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964.³⁶ The issue may also arise where D has been found unfit, he has been hospitalized and his condition has improved so that he is brought back to court to determine whether he remains unfit.³⁷ If, having decided D is unfit, D appears to have recovered before the court has begun to decide the trial of the facts alleged, the court should revisit the question of whether he is fit to be tried.

What constitutes unfitness?

At the first stage—inquiring whether D is unfit—the question is whether D has sufficient understanding to be tried. Astonishingly, the law is based on a test derived from a case decided in 1836 when any concern for and understanding of mental illness and the impact that might have on the ability of an individual to participate in the trial was limited.³⁸ The modern-day incarnation of the test was set out in the case of M.³⁹ The trial judge directed that the defendant had to have sufficient ability in relation to all of the following six things: (a) to understand the charges; (b) to understand the plea; (c) to challenge jurors; (d) to instruct counsel and his solicitor; (e) to understand the course of the trial; and (f) to give evidence if he chooses. If he is able to do all these things, he has a right to be tried, even if he is not capable of acting in his best interests.⁴⁰ The same principle must, theoretically, be ³⁴ As expressed by witnesses before the Royal Commission on Capital Punishment, Report (1953) Cmd 8932, at 78. See generally LC 364, Ch 2, recommending greater availability of measures to assist defendants to participate in a full trial where possible. The judge must generally exercise this discretion to postpone where there is a reasonable chance that the prosecution case will be successfully challenged: Webb [1969] 2 QB 278. On the other hand, 'the case for the prosecution may appear so strong and the suggested condition of the prisoner so disabling that postponement of the trial of the issue would be wholly inexpedient': Burles [1970] 2 QB 191, per Parker LCJ.

³⁵ See LC 364, Ch 6. See Wells et al [2015] EWCA Crim 2, [2015] Crim LR 359; Chinegwundoh [2015] EWCA Crim 109.

³⁶ As substituted by the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 and amended by the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, discussed by S White, 'The Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991' [1992] Crim LR 4; P Fennell, 'The Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991' (1992) 55 MLR 547. The 1964 Act replaced the Criminal Lunatics Act 1800. See LCCP 197, Part 2 for a history of the developments.

³⁷ Section 4A is mandatory and must be complied with in full in such cases: Ferris [2004] EWHC 1221 (Admin). See LC 364, Ch 5 and the discussion generally in Sultan [2014] EWCA Crim 2648. On the possibility for resumption see LC 364, Ch 9 recommending opportunities for defence and prosecution to apply for leave to resume a trial.

³⁸ Pritchard (1836) 7 C & P 303. See LC 364, Ch 3.

³⁹ [2003] EWCA Crim 3452.

⁴⁰ Robertson [1968] 3 All ER 557, [1968] 1 WLR 1767, CA. See also R (Kenneally) v Snaresbrook Crown Court [2002] QB 1169. For insights into how psychiatrists view these, see T Rogers et al, 'Fitness to Plead and Competence to Stand Trial' (2008) 19 J Forensic Psychiatry & Psychology 576.

applicable where the prosecution contend that D is fit to plead and he denies it; but it might be more leniently applied in such a case.

More recently the courts have sought to adopt more flexible and enlightened approaches.⁴¹ The Law Commission Report recommends a shift in focus to whether a defendant can participate effectively given the particular allegations and likely nature of the trial, and the assistance that might be made available to him in the trial.⁴² These imperatives were echoed by the Court of Appeal in Marcantonio and Chitolie:

In applying the Pritchard criteria the court is required to undertake an assessment of the defendant's capabilities in the context of the particular proceedings. An assessment of whether a defendant has the capacity to participate effectively in legal proceedings should require the court to have regard to what that legal process will involve and what demands it will make on the defendant. It should be addressed not in the abstract but in the context of the particular case. The degree of complexity of different legal proceedings may vary considerably. Thus the court should consider, for example, the nature and complexity of the issues arising in the particular proceedings, the likely duration of the proceedings and the number of parties. There can be no legitimate reason for depriving a defendant of the right to stand trial on the basis that he lacks capacity to participate in some theoretical proceedings when he does not lack capacity to participate in the proceedings which he faces. It is in the interests of all concerned that the criminal process should proceed in the normal way where this is possible without injustice to the defendant. Moreover, it seems to us that such an approach is essential, given the emphasis which is now placed on the necessity of considering the special measures that may assist an accused at trial. (See, for example, Walls [2011] EWCA Crim 443; [2011] 2 Cr App R 6.) The effectiveness of such measures can only be assessed in the context of the particular proceedings.⁴³

It was held in *Podola*⁴⁴ that a person is fit to plead where an hysterical amnesia prevents him from remembering events during the whole of the period material to the question whether he committed the crime alleged, but whose mind is otherwise completely normal. The court was prepared to concede that a deaf mute⁴⁵ is 'unfit' but declined:

to extend the meaning of the word to include persons who are mentally normal at the time of the hearing of the proceedings against them and are perfectly capable of instructing their solicitors as to what submission their counsel is to put forward with regard to the commission of the crime.⁴⁶

But is a person suffering from hysterical amnesia capable in that sense? If the facts justify a defence of accident or alibi but D is unable to remember them, the defence cannot be raised unless there are witnesses who come forward. On the other hand, it would be unsatisfactory if, for example, there could be no trial of a motorist who had suffered concussion in an accident, alleged to have been caused by his dangerous driving, and who could not remember what he did. It would be still less satisfactory in the case of one whose failure to recall the relevant events arose from voluntary drunkenness.⁴⁷

⁴¹ See also Walls [2011] EWCA Crim 443 suggesting use of special measures.

⁴² See LC 364, Ch 3.

⁴³ [2016] EWCA Crim 14, [7] per Lloyd Jones LJ. Cited with approval by Simon LJ in the subsequent case of Ehi-Palmer [2016] EWCA Crim 1844.

⁴⁴ [1960] 1 QB 325. The jury had found that Podola was not suffering from hysterical amnesia and the question before the Court of Criminal Appeal concerned the onus of proof of that issue; but the court held that this question could only arise if the alleged amnesia could in law bring Podola within the scope of s 2 of the Criminal Lunatics Act 1800. The court's decision on this point thus appears to be part of the ratio decidendi of the case.

⁴⁵ See also Sharif [2010] EWCA Crim 1709.

⁴⁶ [1960] 1 QB at 356. The word 'insane' was the one under consideration as that was the word used in the Criminal Lunatics Act 1800, and is not used in s 4 of the 1964 Act; but the law is unchanged. Cf CLRC, Third Report, Criminal Procedure (Insanity) (1963) Cmd 2149, at 7.

⁴⁷ Broadhurst v R [1964] AC 441 at 451, PC. Butler (by majority) recommended the retention of the Podola rule.

The procedure for determining unfitness

The issue of unfitness may be raised by the judge on his own initiative or at the request of the prosecution or the defence. It is usually at the request of the defence at the start of the trial. Where neither party raises the issue, the judge should do so if he has doubts about the accused's fitness.⁴⁸ The Law Commission examined in detail the problems in practice with the need for expert evidence and the difficulties in identifying the likely unfitness of the accused.⁴⁹

The issue of whether the accused is fit used to be tried by a jury.⁵⁰ Following s 22 of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, however, the issue is now to be determined by a court without a jury. Such proceedings do not constitute 'criminal proceedings' since they cannot result in a conviction; the procedure is to ensure the protection of the defendant and the public. Accordingly, Art 6 of the ECHR does not apply.⁵¹

The defendant may not be found unfit to plead unless there is written or oral evidence to that effect by two or more registered medical practitioners, at least one of whom is approved by the Home Secretary as having special experience in the field of mental disorder.⁵² This goes some way to ensuring that the criminal process is in step with medical practice.⁵³ The medical evidence is required to prove unfitness (not fitness).⁵⁴

In Lederman,⁵⁵ the judge had rightly ruled that D was fit to stand trial where the medical evidence was divergent on that issue. D had attempted to commit suicide prior to his trial for causing death by dangerous driving. These suicidal intentions and mental fragility were not relevant to the Pritchard criteria for consideration of unfitness to plead.

When should the question of fitness to be tried be determined?

The general rule is that a defendant is presumed to be fit to be tried, and any challenge to fitness is to be determined as soon as it arises. If the accused is found by the judge to be fit and the trial proceeds, the case will be tried by a jury in the normal way.

If the defendant is found unfit, the determination of the trial of the facts occurs before a jury. The case against a person who is undoubtedly unfit to stand trial may be weak and capable of demolition by cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses by his lawyers. It would be wrong if he were to be found unfit and subjected to the disposals (including ⁴⁸ See LC 364, para 4.16. MacCarthy [1967] 1 QB 68, discussed by AR Poole, 'Standing Mute and Fitness to Plead' [1966] Crim LR 6. Janaway [2014] EWCA Crim 1073 demonstrates how difficult it can be to assess whether D is fit to stand trial if he refuses to cooperate. The Court of Appeal held that the trial judge's decision to continue the trial could not be criticized.

⁴⁹ See LC 364, Chs 3 and 4.

⁵⁰ Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, s 4(5). See now B [2008] EWCA Crim 1997, [2009] Crim LR 608 on the position where D1 is unfit and D2 fit at the same trial. See also MB [2010] EWCA Crim 1684; on difficulties this creates see LCCP 197, para 7.27.

⁵¹ H [2003] UKHL 1, [2003] Crim LR 817, affirming M, K and H [2001] EWCA Crim 2024, [2002] Crim LR 57. On ECHR concerns with the operation of the procedure, see E Baker, 'Human Rights and McNaughten and the 1991 Act' [1994] Crim LR 84; Mackay, 'On Being Insane in Jersey Part Two' [2002] Crim LR 728, 'On Being Insane in Jersey Part Three—The Case of the Attorney General v O'Driscoll' [2004] Crim LR 219. It is important to note, however, that the Court of Appeal has in some instances interpreted 'criminal proceedings' in a broader fashion. In Chal [2007] EWCA Crim 2647 the Court of Appeal held that the hearsay provisions in the Criminal Justice Act 2003 applied to proceedings under s 4A of the 1964 Act. The same approach was adopted in Creed [2011] EWCA Crim 144, [2011] Crim LR 644 to the bad character provisions.

⁵² The 1964 Act as amended, s 4(6). See also Borkan [2004] EWCA Crim 1642.

⁵³ But see LC 364, Ch 4 on the difficulties this can generate. It recognized that other health-care professionals or support workers are better qualified to give an assessment of the accused's ability to participate in his trial. See para 4.67.

⁵⁴ See Ghulam [2009] EWCA Crim 2285, [2010] Crim LR 796 and commentary.

⁵⁵ [2015] EWCA Crim 1308.

detention) which may follow from that finding without having an opportunity to test the prosecution's case. If the judge, having regard to the nature of D's supposed disability, thinks that it is expedient and in the interests of the accused to do so, he may postpone consideration of the question of fitness to be tried until any time up to the opening of the case for the defence.⁵⁶ This gives the defence the opportunity to test the prosecution's case. If at that point the judge takes the view that the prosecution case is insufficient to justify a conviction, the jury will be directed to acquit and the question of fitness to plead will not arise. If the judge finds that there is a case to answer, that question will then be determined by the jury by whom D is being tried. The matter is regulated by statute.⁵⁷ In these exceptional cases the issue is to be determined by the same jury by which the accused is being tried.⁵⁸

As the Court of Appeal emphasized in Orr,⁵⁹ s 4A is a:

mandatory statutory requirement which cannot be avoided by the court's general discretion to order proceedings otherwise however beneficial to the defendant they appear.⁶⁰

Once it was determined that the defendant was no longer fit to fully participate, the procedure in s 4A(1) of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 had to be followed.

The trial of the facts

Where D is found to be unfit, either on arraignment or at the end of the prosecution case, the trial shall not proceed, or proceed further.⁶¹ If the matter rested there, D might again be subject to a loss of liberty on the grounds of his mental illness or condition even though he has not been proved to have committed an offence. Even if the prosecution's evidence has been heard and amounts to a case to answer, the defence may have an answer to it in the shape of evidence—for example, of alibi. Section 4A (introduced by the 1991 Act, and amended by the 2004 Act) therefore provides for a further hearing.⁶² The court (ie the jury) then decides on the evidence (if any) already given and such evidence as is adduced by the prosecution or the defence. The jury determines the question whether D 'did the act or made ⁵⁶ See LC 364, para 4.97.

⁵⁷ Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, as amended by the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991 and the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004.

⁵⁸ Section 22 of the 2004 Act, amending the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, s 4(5) as substituted by the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991, s 2.

⁵⁹ [2016] EWCA Crim 889, [2016] Crim LR 865. For comment, see A Owusu-Bempah and N Wortley, 'Unfit to Plead or Unfit to Testify?' (2016) 80 J Crim L 391.

⁶⁰ At [30] per Macur LJ.

⁶¹ See generally LC 364, Ch 5. The judge in O'Donnell [1996] 1 Cr App R 286 went wrong at this point by allowing the trial to proceed, by failing to appoint someone to put the case for the defence and by not directing the trial jury that, now, the only question for them was whether D did the act. Conviction annulled and venire de novo ordered. See also Norman [2008] EWCA Crim 1810, [2009] Crim LR 346—the duty on the court is to appoint the best person to represent D. Difficulties can arise where the accused refuses to be represented. As the Law Commission notes in Unfitness to Plead: Issues Paper (2014) (para 2.82), questions arise as to the UK's obligations under the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities to respect the rights, will and preferences of disabled people.

⁶² Controversy has arisen as to whether previous admissions made by D ought to be admissible in a trial of the facts. In B [2012] EWCA Crim 1799, the Court of Appeal held that it was difficult to see how, if D was unfit to plead, he was capable of understanding the right to caution, the caution itself and the significance of a police interview. This issue was also considered in Swinbourne [2013] EWCA Crim 2329, although perhaps surprisingly, the Court declined to set aside the finding of fact in that case. In B, the court was critical of the fact that it lacked the power to order a retrial in these circumstances and urged Parliament to address this lacuna. Such sentiments echoed those in McKenzie [2011] EWCA Crim 1550, [2011] Crim LR 884 where it was recognized that there is no power to order a retrial where the Court of Appeal quashes findings made under the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964, s 4A.

the omission charged against him as the offence'.⁶³ The aim of such a hearing is to test the evidence rather than to hold D to account.⁶⁴ The judge should not direct the jury as to what disposal powers might then be used against D if the jury were to find that he did the act.⁶⁵

In relation to this s 4A hearing, it was held in *Antoine*⁶⁶ that the words 'act' and 'omission' mean the actus reus of the offence and that, accordingly, D could not rely on the defence of diminished responsibility.⁶⁷ The decision creates problems by its presumption that all offences divide neatly into elements only of actus reus and mens rea that can be readily identified. On the Antoine approach, at a s 4A hearing, the defence can deny actus reus elements but not mens rea elements.⁶⁸ The confusion is exemplified in the judgment itself. For example, Lord Hutton, with whom all their lordships agreed, said that the jury should take into account any objective evidence of mistake, accident or self-defence and should not find that D did the act unless it is sure that the prosecution has negated the defence. But the 'defences' of mistake and accident are simply denials of mens rea, not of the actus reus, and self-defence has a vital mental element.⁶⁹ If this dictum is right, it is hard to see why any other evidence, other than of a defect of reason from disease of the mind, suggesting the absence of mens rea,⁷⁰ should not be admissible, thus undermining the whole decision. Subsequently, it was held that D could not invoke the defence of provocation.⁷¹ That defence also applied only where all the elements of murder are proved so 'the act' of murder and of manslaughter by reason of provocation seem to be identical. Presumably the same approach would be taken to the new defence of loss of control. It appears that his lordship was anticipating that the s 4A inquiry is directed not merely to the actus reus, not to the full offence of actus reus and mens rea, but to an 'unlawful act'. The difficulty lies in what constitutes 'objective' evidence. In Wells (at [17]), it was held to include 'the background to the incident, the antecedents of the complainants and the circumstances of the [incident] as evidenced, for example by the injuries [and any] evidence of [a] co-defendant' at [17].

It is possible to envisage some relatively straightforward cases where 'objective defences' ought to be capable of being pleaded. Difficult examples to test the precise limits of Lord Hutton's 'objective defences' might include a case in which the defence of sane automatism ⁶³ Problems arise where D has been found unfit to plead and his condition improves so that by the time of the trial of the facts he is potentially fit to stand trial. See Omara [2004] EWCA Crim 431. See LC 364, Ch 5.

⁶⁴ The hearing is not a trial and D cannot be convicted: Wells [2015] EWCA Crim 2, [9], [2015] Crim LR 359.

⁶⁵ Moore [2009] EWCA Crim 1672.

⁶⁶ [2001] 1 AC 340, HL, [2000] Crim LR 621, overruling Egan [1998] 1 Cr App R 121, [1997] Crim LR 225 which had 'held' that the words meant all the ingredients of the offence as intended by the Butler Committee (1975, Cmnd 6244, para 10.24) on whose recommendations these provisions are based. RD Mackay and G Kearns, 'The Trial of the Facts and Unfitness to Plead' [1997] Crim LR 644, however, demonstrated that this was not the meaning intended by ministers who introduced the Bill in Parliament. The same words used in the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883, s 2, refer only to the actus reus: Felstead [1914] AC 534, HL. An application to Strasbourg was rejected as manifestly ill-founded: Antoine v UK (App no 62960/00). See also Mackay [2002] Crim LR 728. For discussion see LC 364, Ch 5. The Law Commission recommends that the prosecution should have to establish all elements of the offence: para 5.85.

⁶⁷ That defence applies only when the actus reus (and, indeed, the mens rea) of murder has been established.

⁶⁸ See Norman [2008] EWCA Crim 1810, [2009] Crim LR 346 as a good illustration of the problems—D was charged with child abduction and suffered from Huntingdon's Disease.

⁶⁹ This passage in the 13th edition was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in B [2012] EWCA Crim 770, [2013] Crim LR 90.

⁷⁰ Clearly, the finding of an act or omission may include some elements of mens rea where they are a composite element of the actus reus: R (Young) v Central Criminal Court [2002] 2 Cr App R 12, [2002] Crim LR 588 and commentary. See the discussion in Wells [2015] EWCA Crim 2, [2015] Crim LR 359.

⁷¹ Grant (Heather) [2002] QB 1030, [2002] Crim LR 403.

would have been advanced at trial. Consider, for example, a case where D has been hit on the head and in a state of concussion hit and killed V, and D has by trial become so traumatized by the event that he is unfit to be tried. At the trial of the facts under s 4A, is the automatism plea a denial of mens rea and forbidden? Or is it a denial of a 'voluntary act' and expressly recognized by Lord Hutton? Or is it in some third category of 'not unlawful act'? The Court of Appeal acknowledged the problem in *M*⁷² where it was accepted that the actus reus/mens rea distinction was not one that could be rigidly adhered to in every case given the diverse nature of crimes. It also poses special problems in cases of secondary liability.

The practical difficulty posed by Antoine arose acutely in B, in which D was charged with voyeurism, contrary to s 67(1) of the Sexual Offences Act 2003.⁷³ The Court of Appeal accepted that the requirement in s 67(1) that D did an act 'for the purpose of sexual gratification' was pre-eminently an example of a mental element. It was therefore understandable why the judge had ruled that this element ought therefore to be excluded from the jury's consideration on a trial of the facts. However, the Court of Appeal disagreed with the judge's approach. In a voyeurism case, if that element was ignored all the Crown would have to prove was that D observed V doing a private act. Simply observing someone naked or in their underwear, even if done deliberately, is not a criminal offence. Having regard to the mischief at which the offence of voyeurism was designed to address, it was held that the link between deliberate observation and the purpose of sexual gratification of the observer is central to the offence. Relying upon Lord Hutton's phraseology in Antoine, it is that purpose which turns the deliberate observation of another doing an intimate act in private, into an 'injurious act'. The 'relevant act charged as the offence' was held to be the deliberate observation of another doing a private act where the observer does so for the specific purpose of the observer obtaining sexual gratification. Although this decision is an important one for the analysis and application of the principles espoused in Antoine, it only serves to highlight the problems.

Under the present law, the broader problem lies in defining with sufficient precision the level of inquiry that is appropriate at a trial of the facts under s 4A so as to (a) avoid assessment of the accused's mental state at the time of the offence, because although he is the person best able to know that, by definition, he is now unfit to provide such evidence, or rebut allegations, and (b) prevent the hospitalization of those who would for reasons other than those of mental illness have secured a complete acquittal at a normal trial. The irony is that by seeking to protect defendants from (i) the rigours of a full trial which they would not be able to participate in effectively, and (ii) inquiry into their mental state at the time of the offence which it is supposed they are unable to defend at the trial of the facts, the system might place them in a worse position by subjecting them to a s 4A hearing.⁷⁴

Where D has been found to be unfit and found at the s 4A hearing to have committed the actus reus, but his condition then improves and the question arises whether he is fit to be tried, the determination of his fitness and of whether he performed the actus reus must both be re-litigated. The prior determination of the actus reus being satisfied cannot be relied upon.⁷⁵

⁷² [2003] EWCA Crim 357, [2003] 2 Cr App R 21. See also Wells [2015] EWCA Crim 2. On the difficulties involved see RD Mackay and W Brookbanks, 'Protecting the Unfit to Plead' [2005] Juridical Review 173. See also the LCCP on provisional proposals to include all elements of the offence in the s 4A hearing as reformed.

⁷³ [2012] EWCA Crim 770, [2013] Crim LR 90. See p 820.

⁷⁴ This paragraph in the 13th edition was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in B [2012] EWCA Crim 770, [2013] Crim LR 90. See LC 364, Ch 5.

⁷⁵ Ferris [2004] EWHC 1221 (Admin); cf Omara, n 63. See the Law Com Issues Paper, Ch 7.

Onus of proof

Podola's case decided, overruling earlier authorities, that where D raises the issue of fitness to plead the onus of proving that he is unfit is on him. By analogy to the rule prevailing when a defence of insanity is raised at the trial,⁷⁶ D is required to prove his case not beyond reasonable doubt but on a balance of probabilities. If the issue is raised by the prosecution and disputed by the defence then the burden is on the prosecution and the matter must be proved beyond reasonable doubt.⁷⁷ If the issue is raised by the judge and disputed by D, presumably the onus is again on the prosecution.⁷⁸

The effect of Podola's case is that a person may be convicted although a court was not satisfied that he was capable of making out a proper defence at his trial. Moreover, the reasoning of the court has been criticized on the ground, inter alia, that the prosecution, in bringing the charge at all, is implicitly alleging that D is fit to stand his trial; and that he, in denying that he is so fit, is merely denying that the prosecution have established all the elements in their case.

Disposal powers in relation to a person unfit to plead who 'did the act'

Until the reforms made by the 1991 Act took effect, the court was required to order that any person found unfit had to be admitted to the hospital specified by the Home Secretary where he might be detained without limitation of time, the power to discharge him being exercisable only with the Home Secretary's consent. Since the 1991 Act, a person who is found unfit but, following a s 4A hearing, not to have done the act or made the omission charged simply goes free. Where he is found to be unfit and to have done the act or made the omission, a wider range of disposals is now generally available, although these are frequently criticized as being inadequate.⁷⁹ Under s 24 of the 2004 Act inserting a new s 5 into the 1964 Act, in any case other than one of a fixed sentence, the court may make:⁸⁰

- (1) a hospital order (with or without a restriction order);⁸¹
- (2) a supervision order; or
- (3) an order for absolute discharge.

Magistrates' and youth courts

In magistrates' courts and youth courts⁸² the procedure for dealing with defendants who may have mental illness or other difficulties preventing them participating in the trial effectively is quite different.⁸³ It is contained in s 37 of the Mental Health Act 1983.⁸⁴ In cases of ⁷⁶ Per Edmund Davies J at first instance, [1960] 1 QB 325 at 329; Robertson [1968] 1 WLR 1767, CA.

⁷⁷ Antoine [2001] AC 340, [2000] Crim LR 621. According to Podola's counsel, Mr FH Lawton, later Lawton LJ, it had been the normal practice in recent years for the prosecution to call the evidence.

⁷⁸ M Dean, 'Fitness to Plead' [1960] Crim LR 79 at 82.

⁷⁹ See LC 364, Ch 6 on disposals including a revised supervision order: para 6.48. The Court of Appeal in R [2013] EWCA Crim 591 expressed uncertainty about whether an individual who has been found unfit to be tried and has 'done the act' has been acquitted. A finding that D did the acts was not a conviction because there had been no finding that D acted with mens rea. Similarly, a finding of unfitness and that D had done the act did not amount to an acquittal. There is thus no power to make a restraining order under s 5A of the Protection from Harassment Act, 1997: Chinegwundo [2014] EWCA Crim 2649, [2015] EWCA Crim 109.

⁸⁰ For discussion, see A Ashworth and L Zedner, Preventive Justice (2014) 209–214.

⁸¹ See Narey v Customs and Excise [2005] EWHC 784 (Admin).

⁸² P v Barking Youth Court [2002] EWHC 734 (Admin), [2002] Crim LR 637.

⁸³ The Law Commission Consultation Paper and Issues Paper examine the many defects in the procedure in the magistrates' and youth courts. LC 364 recommends the application of a statutory procedure in the magistrates' and youth courts for defendants who are unable to participate effectively in their trial: Ch 7.

⁸⁴ See A Samuels, 'Hospital Orders without Conviction' [1995] Crim LR 220. On the need to consider the suitability of such disposal, see IA [2005] EWCA Crim 2077, [2006] Crim LR 79. Note that the Mental Health Act 2007, Sch 1 amended s 37, so that the s 37 powers are available if D is suffering from any disorder or disability of the mind (the limitation to cases of mental illness or severe mental impairment is removed). See LCCP 197, Ch 8.

alleged unfitness, if there exists medical evidence to justify making a hospital or guardianship order under s 37, the court has the power to make such an order in all cases. Ordinarily the court should first address whether the act alleged was done or the omission made by D. If it is not proved that D did the act or omission he will be acquitted. If the court finds that he did the act or omission it can make an order under s 37. However, if appropriate, where the court finds that D performed the act it can, instead of making an order under s 37, conduct a trial of the insanity plea.⁸⁵ At the conclusion of that trial the court's powers of disposal under s 37 remain available.

Reform

Numerous problems with the present law have been identified. It is based on an historic test and, as Toulson LJ stated in 2008, there is a 'mismatch between the legal test and the psychiatric understanding'.⁸⁶ The procedure has been cogently criticized for its focus on D's communicative ability and its failure to address the true problem—whether D is capable of providing a rational account of the incident to instruct his lawyer and of participating effectively in the trial process.⁸⁷ As the Law Commission's work has emphasized, the present test creates difficulties in practice. It fails to protect mentally ill defendants who, despite the unfitness procedure, are often tried in the normal way⁸⁸ although in some cases displaying bizarre behaviour.⁸⁹ It fails to protect enough defendants. Estimates are that 10 per cent of men on remand display signs of psychosis, but only a very small number of unfitness pleas are made each year.⁹⁰ Moreover, the test is not always well suited to cases involving those with communication or learning difficulties rather than mental illness. The s 4A hearing is also defective since it fails to provide a fair opportunity for the accused to be acquitted.

The Law Commission recommendations seek to maximize the opportunity for the defendant to continue to participate in a full trial with assistance and support.⁹¹ An adjournment would be available if D was likely to recover sufficiently for a full trial.⁹² The defendant's ability to participate effectively would be tested against a modern statutory test drafted with the modern psychological and psychiatric understanding in mind.⁹³ The test is based on effective participation of the accused given the context of the trial.⁹⁴ There would be the opportunity for D to plead guilty if he wished and had the capacity to do so even if he lacked the capacity for a full trial.⁹⁵ The judge would have the power to divert an unfit defendant out of the criminal justice process where it was in the interests of justice.⁹⁶

The Law Commission recommended amendment to the trial of the facts regime to require the prosecution to prove all elements of the offence.⁹⁷ The jury would be able to return three ⁸⁵ R (Singh) v Stratford MC [2007] EWHC 1582 (Admin).

⁸⁶ Murray [2008] EWCA Crim 1792, [6].

⁸⁷ See also the psychiatrist's view—D Grubin, 'What Constitutes Unfitness to Plead' [1993] Crim LR 748, cf RA Duff, 'Fitness to Plead and Fair Trials' [1994] Crim LR 419.

⁸⁸ Examples include Erskine [2009] EWCA Crim 1425, [2010] Crim LR 48; Moyle [2008] EWCA Crim 3059, [2009] Crim LR 586.

⁸⁹ See Shulman [2010] EWCA Crim 1034; Grant [2008] EWCA Crim 1870.

⁹⁰ See LCCP 197, para 2.61.

⁹¹ See LC 364, Ch 2. For comment, see A Loughnan, 'Between Fairness and "Dangerousness": Reforming the Law on Unfitness to Plead' [2016] Crim LR 451 and H Howard, 'Lack of Capacity: Reforming the Law on Unfitness to Plead' (2016) 80 J Crim L 428.

⁹² LC 364, para 4.97

⁹³ Ch 3. Recommendations are made for more efficient use of a wider pool of relevant expertise.

⁹⁴ See para 3.136. See RD Mackay [2004] Crim LR 219. See also the Scottish Law Commission Report No 195 (2004) Ch 4 and cl 4. See LCCP 197, provisionally proposing a test of decisional competence, but awaiting a test being devised by psychiatrists. For critical comment see RD Mackay [2011] Crim LR 433.

⁹⁵ Para 3.156. ⁹⁶ Para 5.61.

⁹⁷ Para 5.85. See LCCP 197, Part 6.

possible verdicts: an acquittal, that D did the acts complained of, or that D is not guilty by reason of insanity.⁹⁸ The disposals available to a judge would be hospital order, supervision or absolute discharge.⁹⁹ Resumption of the full trial would be possible where D has recovered and it was in the interests of justice subject to other safeguards where the Crown was seeking to resume the trial. The Commission also recommends the new scheme applies to trials in the magistrates' and youth courts.¹⁰⁰

9.2.2 A plea of insanity

Whereas the plea of unfitness is concerned with the accused's mental state at the time of the trial, insanity is concerned with the accused's mental state at the time when he is alleged to have committed the crime.¹⁰¹

Although rarely raised in a magistrates' court, it applies in a summary trial as well as a trial on indictment.¹⁰² The rules governing the plea of insanity derive from the common law, but in trials on indictment the procedure for dealing with the plea has been regulated by statute; the unamended common law operates in magistrates' courts.¹⁰³ A successful plea of insanity at a trial on indictment formerly resulted in a mandatory order that D be admitted to a special hospital where he might be detained indefinitely. That was a significant deterrent to raising the plea. Since the 1991 Act,¹⁰⁴ a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity means that the judge has more discretion in the disposal and can order hospitalization, a supervision order or an absolute discharge. Statistics suggest that this may be leading to more frequent reliance on the defence.¹⁰⁵

9.2.2.1 Operation of the insanity defence

As a preliminary point it is worth emphasizing that legal and psychiatric understandings of 'insanity' are completely different.¹⁰⁶ Strangely, the fact that D suffers an extreme mental illness recognized by psychiatrists will not necessarily be sufficient to afford a defence in law. Conversely, the fact that D suffers an illness that no psychiatrist would normally regard as a form of 'insanity' (eg diabetes) may qualify him for the defence.¹⁰⁷ It seems astonishing ⁹⁸ Para 5.132. ⁹⁹ Ch 6. ¹⁰⁰ See Ch 7.

¹⁰¹ See generally Mackay, Mental Condition Defences in Criminal Law, Ch 2; A Loughnan, Manifest Madness: Mental Incapacity in Criminal Law (2012), and for a more philosophical account see Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 12. A comparative analysis of some European States is found in J Blosma, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 483. For the Law Commission's review of this area, see the LCDP and the preceding LCSP, in particular, the supplementary materials available at https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/insanity-and-automatism/user_uploads/insanity_scoping_supplementary.pdf-1. The CPS provides guidance on prosecuting people with a mental disorder: www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/mentally-disordered-offenders/.

¹⁰² See R (Singh) v Stratford MC [2007] EWHC 1582 (Admin).

¹⁰³ Horseferry Road Magistrates' Court, ex pK [1996] 2 Cr App R 574, [1997] Crim LR 129. See T Ward, 'Magistrates, Insanity and the Common Law' [1997] Crim LR 796.

¹⁰⁴ As amended by the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004.

¹⁰⁵ See RD Mackay, 'Ten More Years of the Insanity Defence' [2012] Crim LR 946, noting that there has been a gradual increase in the number of special verdicts returned but that it may now be plateauing; RD Mackay, 'Fact and Fiction About the Insanity Defence' [1990] Crim LR 247; RD Mackay and G Kearns, 'The Continued Under use of Unfitness to Plead and the Insanity Defence' [1994] Crim LR 546; RD Mackay and G Kearns, 'More Fact(s) about the Insanity Defence' [1999] Crim LR 714; Mackay, Mitchell and Howe [2006] Crim LR 399; A Ashworth and L Zedner, Preventive Justice (2014) 209–214.

¹⁰⁶ For an analysis of the historical interaction between the two, see A Loughnan and T Ward, 'Emergent Authority and Expert Knowledge: Psychiatry and Criminal Responsibility in the UK' (2014) 37 Int'l J L & Psychiatry 25.

¹⁰⁷ See Ch 3 of the Law Commission supplementary materials to LCSP.

that in the twenty-first century the law remains based not on any medical understanding of mental illness but on a distinct legal criterion of responsibility defined by the common law and set out in authoritative form in the 'M'Naghten Rules', formulated by judges as long ago as 1843.¹⁰⁸ Daniel M'Naghten, intending to murder Sir Robert Peel, killed Peel's secretary by mistake. His acquittal of murder¹⁰⁹ on the ground of insanity provoked controversy and was debated in the legislative chamber of the House of Lords, which sought the advice of the judges and submitted to them a number of questions. The answers to those questions became the famous 'Rules'. Answers to hypothetical questions, even by all the judges, are not, strictly speaking, a source of law; but in *Sullivan*¹¹⁰ it was accepted by the judicial committee of the House of Lords that the Rules have provided a comprehensive definition since 1843.¹¹¹ The M'Naghten Rules are binding law.

The importance of the Rules reduced greatly on the introduction of the defence of diminished responsibility and the abolition of the death penalty. Diminished responsibility is a (partial) defence only to murder. Insanity pleas remain rare, even on charges for murder (see Ch 13). Defendants seemingly prefer to risk conviction rather than incur the stigma of a verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. This remains true even though, since 1991, the disposal powers are not limited to automatic indefinite detention. But the stigma of the label 'insanity' remains: it is strikingly inappropriate when so much progress has been made regarding public attitudes to mental illness.

In some cases defendants will even prefer to plead guilty rather than risk a special verdict on grounds of insanity. The propriety of accepting a plea of guilty by a person who, on the evidence, is not guilty is open to question, but it has not been challenged in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords left the matter open. It is unsatisfactory that the state of the law is such that people suffering from a mental condition feel compelled to plead guilty. One undesirable consequence is the disproportionately high number of inmates in prison with mental disorders, at least some of whom might satisfy a suitably reformed modern insanity defence.¹¹²

9.2.2.2 The test of insanity

Whatever the effect of the recent changes on procedure and disposal, the M'Naghten Rules remain of great importance symbolically and practically both because they provide the legal test of responsibility of the mentally abnormal and because they set a limit to the defences of automatism and, in theory, of diminished responsibility. The basic propositions of the law are to be found in the answers to Questions 2 and 3 of the M'Naghten Rules:¹¹³ the jurors ought to be told in all cases that every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to their satisfaction; and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing of the act, the party accused was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.

¹⁰⁸ (1843) 4 St Tr NS 847. For an engaging historical analysis of the case, see A Loughnan, 'M'Naghten's Case' in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017).

¹⁰⁹ (1843) 10 Cl & Fin 200. ¹¹⁰ Sullivan [1983] 2 All ER 673 at 676.

¹¹¹ In Johnson [2007] EWCA Crim 1978 the Court of Appeal referred enigmatically to the fact that the Rules must, given their provenance, be treated with 'some caution'.

¹¹² See in particular Lord Bradley's report, People with Mental Health Problems or Learning Disabilities in the Criminal Justice System (2009).

¹¹³ 10 Cl & Fin at 210, per Lord Tindal CJ. R Moran, Knowing Right From Wrong: The Insanity Defence of Daniel McNaghten (1981).

It will be seen that there are two lines of defence open to an accused person (often called the ‘two limbs’):

- (1) he must be found not guilty by reason of insanity if, because of a disease of the mind, he did not know the nature and quality of his act (effectively a denial of mens rea); or
- (2) even if he did know the nature and quality of his act, he must be acquitted if, because of a disease of the mind, he did not know it was ‘wrong’.

The Rules have been heavily criticized for being over-inclusive; ‘disease of the mind’ has been widely construed to include within the scope of insanity such commonplace illnesses as diabetes.¹¹⁴ In addition, in some instances D qualifies for the defence even though he was responsible for his inability to appreciate the nature or wrongness of his actions. As Mackay has pointed out, some commentators have argued that the first limb is superfluous as anyone who did not know the nature and quality of the act must also not have known it was wrong. Others, including Glanville Williams, argued that the second limb was superfluous since anyone who did not know the nature and quality of his act must also have lacked awareness that it was wrong.¹¹⁵ The Rules are also criticized for focus on the cognitive state of D (has he appreciated the nature or wrongness) rather than on whether D had the capacity to be held responsible or to conform with criminal regulation.¹¹⁶

Disease of the mind

The two limbs of the Rule require separate consideration but the prior question, under either limb, is whether D was suffering from ‘a defect of reason from a disease of the mind’. If D was unaware of the nature and quality of his act for some reason other than a defect of reason from a disease of the mind (eg mistake), he will usually be entitled to a straightforward acquittal on the ground that he lacked the necessary mens rea. Moreover, in such a case the onus of proof remains on the Crown, whereas it rests on D if he tenders evidence of a defect of reason arising from disease of the mind.¹¹⁷ If D was unaware that his act was ‘wrong’ for some reason other than from a defect of reason from a disease of the mind, this will generally not amount to a defence at all. It is a cardinal principle that neither ignorance of the law¹¹⁸ nor good motive will normally afford a defence.

The question whether D has raised the defence of insanity is one of law for the judge.¹¹⁹ Whether D, or indeed his medical witnesses, would call the condition on which he relies ‘insanity’ is immaterial. The expert witnesses may testify as to the factual nature of the condition but it is for the judge to say whether that is evidence of ‘a defect of reason, from disease of the mind’, because, as will become apparent, these are legal, not medical, concepts.

¹¹⁴ See LCSP, Chs 2–4 and LCDP, Ch 2.

¹¹⁵ See RD Mackay, ‘Righting the Wrong? Some Observations on the Second Limb of the M’Naghten Rules’ [2009] Crim LR 80.

¹¹⁶ See Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 12; A Brudner, Punishment and Freedom: A Liberal Theory of Penal Justice (2009). See also LCDP, Ch 2 and the supplementary materials to the LCSP available at https://consult.justice.gov.uk/law-commission/insanity-and-automatism/user_uploads/insanity_scoping_supplementary.pdf-1.

¹¹⁷ The application of the burden of proof in these cases is critically explored by T Jones, ‘Insanity, Automatism and the Burden of Proof on the Accused’ (1995) 111 LQR 475; A Loughnan, ‘Manifest Madness’ (2007) 70 MLR 379, 398. It is surprising that there has not been a direct ECtHR challenge on this basis other than in 1990 in H v UK (App no 15023/89) in which the Commission dismissed the application. That decision has been very heavily criticized: see Jones, ibid. See also the discussion in LCDP, Ch 8 for a full discussion of the issues and a proposal to place the ultimate burden for the reformed defence on the Crown.

¹¹⁸ cf the challenge to that made by A Ashworth, ‘Ignorance of the Law, and Duties to Avoid It’ (2011) 74 MLR 1.

¹¹⁹ See Roach [2001] EWCA Crim 2698.

In the leading case of Sullivan,¹²⁰ the defence to a charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm was that D attacked V while recovering from a minor epileptic seizure and did not know what he was doing. The House of Lords held that the judge had rightly ruled that this raised the defence of insanity. D had then changed his plea to guilty, notwithstanding that he was thereby pleading guilty to an offence for which he was manifestly not responsible. However, his conviction was upheld.

It seems that any disease which produces a malfunctioning of the mind is a disease of the mind.¹²¹ Commonly the insanity plea will involve mental illness (schizophrenia being the most common basis)¹²² but it is not restricted to diseases of the brain. Arteriosclerosis, a tumour on the brain, epilepsy, diabetes, sleepwalking, pre-menstrual syndrome and all physical diseases, may amount in law to a disease of the mind if they produce the relevant malfunction. The lack of correlation with medical definitions of mental illness renders this aspect of the test potentially incompatible with the ECHR (see later) where it results in D's loss of liberty or loss of private life.

Although the courts have adopted a very wide definition of disease of the mind, it is not without limit, as has been illustrated. In Coley,¹²³ D had probably suffered a psychotic episode following consumption of strong cannabis. D attacked his neighbour with a hunting knife (D had dressed in combat gear and wore a balaclava). It was suggested that he might have been acting out the role of a character in a computer game. He claimed to have 'blacked out'. The trial judge refused to leave the defence of insanity to the jury and that view was endorsed by the Court of Appeal. This was a case of voluntary intoxication and not a disease of the mind amounting to insanity. Hughes LJ said:

The precise line between the law of voluntary intoxication and the law of insanity may...be difficult to identify in some borderline cases. But the present case falls comfortably on the side of the line covered by voluntary intoxication....If the doctors were right about his state of mind, his mind was to an extent detached from reality by the direct and acute effects on it of the ingestion of cannabis. Every intoxicated person has his mind affected, and to an extent disordered, by the direct and acute effects of the ingestion of intoxicants; all intoxication operates through the brain. Not infrequently it would be perfectly legitimate to say of a very drunken man that his mind had become detached from reality by the intoxication...In order to engage the law of insanity, it is not enough that there is an effect on the mind, or, in the language of the M'Naghten rules, a 'defect of reason'. There must also be what the law classifies as a disease of the mind.¹²⁴

In contrast, in Harris, conjoined with Coley on appeal, D was in the habit of binge drinking for several days at a time. Following a period of a week doing so, he took time to sober up before returning to work. After several days he then set fire to his home and was charged with aggravated arson. His defence was not one of intoxication—he was sober at the time of the fire-setting and his plea, if at all,¹²⁵ was one of insanity based on the disease of his mind caused by repeated chronic alcohol abuse. His past intoxication had produced a mental disorder—alcoholic psychosis amounting to a disease of the mind.

It is important to reiterate the distinction between pleas of insanity and pleas of sane automatism. A transitory malfunctioning of the mind is not a disease of the mind when it is ¹²⁰ [1984] AC 156, HL.

¹²¹ Kemp [1957] 1 QB 399 at 406, per Devlin J, approved by Lord Denning in Bratty, n 133.

¹²² See Mackay, Mitchell and Howe [2006] Crim LR 399.

¹²³ [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923. Also discussed in A Loughnan and N Wake, 'Of Blurred Boundaries and Prior Fault: Insanity, Automatism and Intoxication' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2014) 118–119 and 124.

¹²⁴ At [18].

¹²⁵ Not on the facts as D clearly knew what he was doing and that it was wrong.

caused by some external factor—a blow on the head causing concussion, the consumption of alcohol or drugs, or the administration of an anaesthetic. In such cases where there is a total loss of capacity sane automatism may be pleaded (discussed later in the chapter). That ‘defence’ imposes no burden of proof on D and, if successful, results in a complete acquittal. Insanity, on the other hand, must be proved by D (on the balance of probabilities) and results in a special verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity. In terms of process and outcome, much turns on this distinction between internal and external causes of the malfunction of the mind, yet the basis for the distinction is unsatisfactory.¹²⁶

In determining whether D suffers from a disease of the mind, it is clear that the law considers not only D’s state of mind at the time the alleged offence was committed, but how it came about.¹²⁷ Devlin J thought that the object of the inclusion of the words ‘disease of the mind’ was to exclude ‘defects of reason caused simply by brutish stupidity without rational power’; but it seems the words exclude more than that. In Quick,¹²⁸ D who had caused actual bodily harm called medical evidence to show that he was a diabetic and that he was suffering from a hypoglycaemic attack at the time of the alleged offence and was unaware of what he was doing. Bridge J ruled that he had thereby raised a defence of insanity, whereupon D pleaded guilty. On appeal it was held that D’s mental condition at the time of the offence was caused not by D’s diabetes (an internal factor) but by his use of insulin prescribed by the doctor coupled with his failure to follow that prescription by eating after injecting insulin (an external factor). This use of the prescribed drug was an external factor and the plea of sane automatism should have been left to the jury. If D’s mental condition had been caused by his diabetes the plea would have been insanity, being based on that internal factor of disease. The case illustrates the fine line between the two pleas although the consequence of pleading them successfully is markedly different.¹²⁹ The unsatisfactory nature of this distinction is further discussed in the next section.

Disease of the mind includes physical illnesses that manifest themselves by affecting reasoning. In Kemp,¹³⁰ D made an entirely motiveless and irrational attack on his wife with a hammer. He was charged with causing grievous bodily harm to her with intent. D suffered from arteriosclerosis which caused a congestion of blood in his brain, leading to a temporary lapse of consciousness during which he made the attack. It was conceded that D did not know the nature and quality of his act and that he suffered from a defect of reason but it was argued on his behalf that this arose, not from any mental disease, but from a purely physical one. It was argued that if a physical disease caused the brain cells to degenerate (as in time, it might), then it would be a disease of the mind; but until it did so, it was said, this temporary interference with the working of the brain was like a concussion or something of that sort and not a disease of the mind. Devlin J rejected this argument and held that D was suffering from a disease of the mind. He said:

The law is not concerned with the brain but with the mind, in the sense that ‘mind’ is ordinarily used, the mental faculties of reason, memory and understanding. If one reads for ‘disease of the mind’ ‘disease of the brain,’ it would follow that in many cases pleas of insanity would not be established because it could not be proved that the brain had been affected in any way, either by degeneration of the cells or in any other way. In my judgment the condition of the brain is irrelevant and so is the question of whether the condition of the mind is curable or incurable, transitory or permanent.

¹²⁶ See LCDP, Ch 6.

¹²⁷ Contrary to the dictum of Devlin J in Kemp [1957] 1 QB 399 at 407.

¹²⁸ [1973] QB 910, [1973] Crim LR 434 and commentary; cf Hennessy. See p 311 and Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923. See also LC 314, Intoxication and Criminal Liability (2009) para 2.88.

¹²⁹ See Bingham [1991] Crim LR 433.

¹³⁰ [1957] 1 QB 399 at 407.

In the earlier case of Charlson,¹³¹ where the evidence was that D was 'acting as an automaton without any real knowledge of that he was doing' as a result of a cerebral tumour, Barry J directed the jury to acquit if the defence might reasonably be true. Devlin J distinguished Charlson on the ground that there the doctors were agreed that D was not suffering from a mental disease.¹³² As this is a question of law, the distinction seems unsound and in *Bratty*¹³³ Lord Denning approved Kemp and disagreed with Charlson. Lord Denning put forward his own view of a disease of the mind:

it seems to me that any mental disorder which has manifested itself in violence and is prone to recur is a disease of the mind. At any rate it is the sort of disease for which a person should be detained in hospital rather than be given an unqualified acquittal.

Quick casts some doubt on this dictum, and it is surely right to do so. The definition might fit a diabetic, but 'no mental hospital would admit a diabetic merely because he had a low blood sugar reaction', and it might be felt to be 'an affront to common sense' to regard such a person as insane; yet the court saw the weakness of the argument, agreeing with Devlin J that the disease might be 'curable or incurable ... transitory or permanent'; and the fact that the Home Secretary might have had a difficult problem of disposal did not affect the matter. Lord Denning's dictum has also been rightly criticized on the ground that it is tautologous and that a disease of the mind may manifest itself in wrongful acts other than violence, such as theft.¹³⁴

'External' and 'internal' factors

The distinction between external causes, which may give rise to a defence of sane automatism, and internal factors which can only give rise to a defence of insanity, has been subjected to sustained and cogent criticism.¹³⁵ The supposed justification is that the internal factor will usually be a continuing condition which may cause a recurrence of the prohibited conduct, whereas the external factor—the blow on the head, the injection, the inhalation of toxic fumes,¹³⁶ etc—will usually have a transitory effect which will not recur. However, it is surely wrong to assume such a precise correlation between the source of the defect in D's 'mind' and likelihood of recurrence. The blow on the head may inflict permanent damage, which would be viewed thereafter as an internal factor giving rise to a defence of insanity. In cases of diabetes, it can hardly be suggested that there is a greater risk of recurrence from the diabetes itself causing a hyperglycaemic state (insanity) than from D forgetting to eat after taking insulin and going into a hypoglycaemic state (sane automatism). Distinguishing between external and internal causes is an unsatisfactory and deficient way of addressing the true mischief—the likelihood of danger posed by uncontrolled recurrence of the mental condition leading to a lack of capacity. The deficiency is exposed in Lord Lane's judgment in Burgess:

if there is a danger of recurrence that may be an added reason for categorising the condition as a disease of the mind. On the other hand, the absence of the danger of recurrence is not a reason for saying that it cannot be a disease of the mind.¹³⁷

¹³¹ [1955] 1 WLR 317.

¹³² A similar argument was rejected in Sullivan [1983] 2 All ER 673 at 677, [1983] Crim LR 740. The nomenclature adopted by the medical profession may change but the meaning of 'disease of the mind' in the M'Naghten Rules remains unchanged.

¹³³ Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386 at 410–412, HL.

¹³⁴ N Walker, Crime and Insanity in England (1963) 117.

¹³⁵ See the dissent by Dickson J in Rabey (1981) 114 DLR (3d) 193; RD Mackay, 'Non-Organic Automatism' [1980] Crim LR 350; Williams, TBCL, 671. See LCSP, Chs 2–4 and LCDP, Chs 2 and 6.

¹³⁶ Oakley (1986) 24 CCC (3d) 351 at 362, per Martin JA.

¹³⁷ [1991] WLR 1206 at 1212.

The passage serves to emphasize that the underlying bases for the courts' approach are pragmatism and policy rather than principle.

Range of conditions treated in law as 'a disease of the mind'

The reach of the M'Naghten Rules in extending to epileptics,¹³⁸ diabetics,¹³⁹ pre-menstrual syndrome sufferers,¹⁴⁰ sleepwalkers,¹⁴¹ etc is astonishingly wide. Its application to sleepwalking has prompted interest¹⁴² following first instance decisions taking a generous approach and allowing a defence of sane automatism to be run.¹⁴³ Even if sleepwalking is classified as insanity, a more liberal approach is evident in some cases. For example, in one case D had killed V in the course of his sleepwalking/night terror, and pleaded insanity. The CPS discontinued the case since the result of an insanity verdict would have been hospitalization for D and that was not in the public interest.¹⁴⁴ Pressure has also been mounting for the reclassification of epilepsy to avoid the stigma of being labelled insane.¹⁴⁵

Most if not all of the reported cases involve apparently purposive conduct. In Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland,¹⁴⁶ D took off a girl's stocking and strangled her with it. There was medical evidence that he was suffering from psychomotor epilepsy which might have prevented him from knowing the nature and quality of his act. It was held to be evidence of insanity. This seems very far removed from a convulsive movement of the body of an epilepsy sufferer. It is a complex operation which has every appearance of being controlled by the brain. Whether or not D could have prevented himself from acting in this way, he appears to be a dangerous person and, in the absence of some other form of protection for the public, a simple verdict of acquittal seems inappropriate. Sullivan's conduct, like that of Kemp, Charlson, Quick and Rabey (see later) also seems to have been apparently purposive and, though he was less obviously a danger to the public than Bratty, his case may be indistinguishable in principle. Even the examples of epilepsy referred to in recent research into insanity suggest that commonly the actions are complex purposive ones. Of course, a convulsive movement of a person in an epileptic fit may result in injury to person or property but it would seem absurd either to convict the epileptic or hold him to be insane. If insanity is available as a defence for seemingly purposive action, it is not fanciful to suggest, bearing in mind the now increased flexibility of the courts' powers of disposal, that some unscrupulous pleas of insanity will be advanced, and the courts need to be alert to that fact.

It remains deeply unsatisfactory for this crucial 'disease of the mind' element to remain so ill-defined. First, a person with a mental condition of a non-severe nature and who poses no

¹³⁸ Sullivan [1984] AC 156. RD Mackay and M Reuber, 'Epilepsy and the Defence of Insanity—Time for a Change' [2007] Crim LR 782.

¹³⁹ Hennessy [1989] 2 All ER 9; Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923. See on diabetes and driving cases in particular, J Rumbold, 'Diabetes and Criminal Responsibility' (2010) 174 CLJW 21.

¹⁴⁰ Smith [1982] Crim LR 531 and see V John, 'Premenstrual Syndrome in the Criminal Law' [1997] Auckland Uni LR 331; SM Edwards, 'Mad, Bad or Pre-Menstrual' (1988) 138 NLJ 456.

¹⁴¹ Burgess [1991] 2 All ER 769. I Mackay, 'The Sleepwalker is Not Insane' (1992) 55 MLR 714. Cf the Canadian Supreme Court in Parks (1990) 95 DLR (4th) 27.

¹⁴² See W Wilson et al, 'Violence, Sleepwalking and the Criminal Law' [2005] Crim LR 601 and 614; RD Mackay and B Mitchell, 'Sleepwalking, Automatism and Insanity' [2006] Crim LR 901 reviewing Canadian law which adopts a more holistic approach to the question rather than relying solely on the internal/external bifurcation. See also LCDP, p 110.

¹⁴³ See Lowe (2005) unreported, discussed in Wilson et al, n 142, and Pooley (2007) unreported, discussed in Mackay and Mitchell, n 142. This has prompted CPS guidance: www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/defences-sleepwalking-defence-sexual-offence-cases. See also I Ibrahim and P Fenwick, 'Sleep Related Automatism and the Law' (2008) 48 Med Sci Law 124.

¹⁴⁴ See <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/wales/8370363.stm>.

¹⁴⁵ See Mackay and Reuber [2007] Crim LR 782. ¹⁴⁶ [1963] AC 386.

real future risk to society might end up labelled and treated as insane. Secondly, a challenge to the overbroad definition of disease of the mind may arise under the ECHR. Article 5(1)(e), in guaranteeing protection against arbitrary detention, allows for the detention of those suffering from mental illness where it is necessary for the protection of the public. The European Court of Human Rights has accepted that the State's power to detain in these circumstances is limited to cases where the mental illness is one recognized by objective medical expertise, and where the medical and legal definitions of mental illness have a close correlation.¹⁴⁷ If a defendant were ever to be detained as a result of a special verdict of insanity when the 'disease' he was suffering from was one which medical professionals would not normally classify as insanity, there might be an incompatibility. That may be unlikely as detention is regulated by the Mental Health Act. Although medical professionals are now required to be involved in the trial of insanity,¹⁴⁸ it is debatable whether this ensures compatibility.¹⁴⁹ Medical professionals might well, in the course of providing expert evidence, be obliged to state that the disease is one that satisfies the legal test of insanity, but that is quite different from a medical professional recognizing the disease as a matter of psychiatry as one of mental illness.

Borderline cases: disease of mind (insanity) or external factor (sane automatism)?

Some of the most controversial problems on classification arise in relation to 'psychological blows'. Cases in other jurisdictions have addressed directly the question of whether a 'dissociative state' resulting from a 'psychological blow' amounts to insane or sane automatism. In the Canadian case of Rabey,¹⁵⁰ D, a student who had become infatuated by a girl, V, discovered that V did not regard him particularly highly and reacted to that news by hitting her on the head with a rock that he had taken from a geology laboratory. He was acquitted of causing bodily harm with intent on the ground of automatism. The trial judge accepted that D was in a dissociative state caused by the psychological blow of his rejection, which, it was held, was an external factor analogous to a blow to the skull where the skull is thin, causing concussion. The Ontario Court of Appeal allowed the prosecution's appeal and ordered a new trial. A further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed. That court approved the judgment of Martin J, who took the view that 'the ordinary stresses and disappointments of life which are the common lot of mankind do not constitute an external cause...'¹⁵¹ The exceptional effect which this ordinary event had on D 'must be considered as having its source primarily in the [D's] psychological or emotional make-up'. Notwithstanding the powerful dissent by Dickson J, it is submitted that this is right and that in such a case if the evidence as to D's dissociative state is accepted at all,¹⁵² it should ¹⁴⁷ Winterwerp v Netherlands [1979] 2 EHRR 387, [1994] Crim LR 84; Luberti v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 440; Reid v UK (2003) 37 EHRR 9. See P Sutherland and C Gearty, 'Insanity and the ECHR' [1992] Crim LR 418; Baker, n 51; Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 18.23 et seq. On the success of challenges in Jersey, see Mackay [2002] Crim LR 728. The Law Commission examines the ECHR dimension to the defence in LCSP, Ch 5.

¹⁴⁸ By s 1 of the 1991 Act, a jury shall not return a special verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity (NGRI) except on the written or oral evidence of two or more registered medical practitioners of whom at least one is approved by the Home Secretary as having special experience in the field of mental disorder.

¹⁴⁹ In addition, Mackay, Mitchell and Howe [2006] Crim LR 399 identify cases in which NGRI verdicts have been returned without medical evidence.

¹⁵⁰ (1977) 37 CCC (2d) 461; affd [1980] SCR 513, 54 CCC (2d) 1. See also Parnerkar [1974] SCR 449, 10 CCC (2d) 253 and cases discussed by Mackay [1980] Crim LR 350.

¹⁵¹ (1980) 54 CCC (2d) at 7.

¹⁵² cf the scepticism of Williams about the acceptance of the evidence of 'over enthusiastic psychiatrists' in relation to the similar case of Parnerkar [1974] SCR 449, 10 CCC (2d) 253; Williams, TBCL (1st edn) 612–613. See LCDP, pp 107 et seq suggesting that the concern is really whether a person of reasonable fortitude might have withstood the trauma.

be treated as evidence of insanity. Once the judge has so categorized the defence, D has the burden of proving on a balance of probabilities that he was in a dissociative state. If he and his medical witnesses are to be believed, he was not guilty, but he is a highly dangerous person.¹⁵³ Who is to say that the next ordinary stress of life will not lead him unconsciously to wield a deadly weapon? Policy clearly has a significant part to play here.

Martin J left open the question of the effect of an extraordinary event of such severity that it might reasonably be expected to cause a dissociative state in the average person. This would, it is submitted, be a case of sane automatism because D has done nothing to show that he is any more dangerous to others than anyone else; and he should be simply acquitted. It is, of course, difficult to identify what should constitute such a degree of extraordinariness. In T,¹⁵⁴ where the defendant had committed a robbery when suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of being raped, the trial judge ruled that the rape was to be treated as an external factor. It would be uncontroversial to regard the rape as an extraordinary event, but it is unclear which if any other traumatic events will suffice. Further judicial clarification of the scope of this exceptional category of sane automatism would be welcome.

In Coley, Hughes LJ remarked that the distinction between 'external factors inducing a condition of the mind and internal factors which can properly be described as a disease can give rise to apparently strange results at the margin'.¹⁵⁵ Despite the recognition that the distinction may be difficult to draw in some cases, it was ultimately confirmed that it is crucial given the different outcomes it dictates.

Defect of reason

For the insanity defence to apply, the disease of the mind must have given rise to a 'defect of reason'. It seems that D's powers of reasoning must be impaired and that D's mere failure to use powers of reasoning which he possesses does not bring him within the M'Naghten Rules. When D claimed that she had taken articles from a supermarket without paying for them because of absent-mindedness resulting from depression, it was held that even if she was suffering from a disease of the mind (which is arguable), she had not raised the defence of insanity but was simply denying that she had mens rea.¹⁵⁶ Tadros has suggested that this element of the defence warrants closer attention, since it could help to identify those who are morally responsible for failing to recognize either the nature and quality or wrongness of their act. This element should cause the courts to focus on whether there was a diminution of D's reasoning powers.

The nature and quality of his act: the 'first limb'

The phrase 'nature and quality of his act' refers to the physical nature and quality of the act and not to its moral or legal quality.¹⁵⁷ In modern terms, it means simply that D 'did not know what he was doing'.¹⁵⁸ It is of narrow application; illustrations given by leading writers are:

A kills B under an insane delusion that he is breaking a jar.¹⁵⁹ and

the madman who cut a woman's throat under the idea that he was cutting a loaf of bread.¹⁶⁰

¹⁵³ In fact, D's expert witness said D had no predisposition to dissociate; but the court, while bound to take account of medical evidence, may also take account of the facts of the case and apply its common sense to all the evidence.

¹⁵⁴ [1990] Crim LR 256. And see Huckerby [2004] EWCA Crim 3251.

¹⁵⁵ [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923, [20].

¹⁵⁶ Clarke [1972] 1 All ER 219. For discussion see Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 333.

¹⁵⁷ Codère (1916) 12 Cr App R 21; see Johnson [2007] EWCA Crim 1978, [2008] Crim LR 132. For cogent criticism see Mackay [2009] Crim LR 80.

¹⁵⁸ Sullivan [1983] 2 All ER 673 at 678, [1983] Crim LR 740.

¹⁵⁹ Stephen, Digest (8th edn) 6.

¹⁶⁰ Kenny, Outlines, 76.

Of course, a person who was under a delusion such as these, apart altogether from insanity, could never be convicted of murder, simply because he had no mens rea. The important practical difference, however, is that if the delusion arose from a disease of the mind, he will be liable to be indefinitely detained in a hospital,¹⁶¹ whereas if it arose from some other cause, he will go entirely free. A person whose acts are involuntary because he is unconscious does not 'know the nature and quality of his act'.¹⁶²

Those who advocate abolition¹⁶³ of the defence of insanity suggest that the ability to plead absence of mens rea can deal with those lacking mental responsibility. The approach has been adopted in some US states, but has been criticized. The Law Commission rejected such an approach after careful examination.¹⁶⁴ Such an approach distorts the mens rea test to accommodate 'cases where the accused suffered from a mental disorder but could still form a mental element for specific offences'.¹⁶⁵ Abolishing insanity and relying on the question of mens rea also fails to accommodate the cases where D's mental illness led him to believe that he had a defence, and those for whom mens rea is present because of the mental illness.

Insanity may be pleaded in respect of an offence irrespective of whether it is an offence of mens rea. This was confirmed by the Divisional Court in Loake v CPS, which is discussed below.¹⁶⁶

Knowledge that the act is 'wrong': the 'second limb'

This second, alternative limb is not concerned with whether the accused is able to distinguish between right and wrong in general, but whether he was able to appreciate the wrongness of the particular act he was doing at the particular time alleged to constitute a crime. It has always been clear that if D knew his act was contrary to law, he knew it was 'wrong' for this purpose. Thus, in their first answer the judges in M'Naghten's case said:¹⁶⁷ notwithstanding the party accused did the act complained of with a view, under the influence of insane delusion, of redressing or revenging some supposed grievance or injury, or of producing some public benefit, he is nevertheless punishable, according to the nature of the crime committed, if he knew at the time of committing such crime that he was acting contrary to law; by which expression we understand your lordships to mean the law of the land.

Even if D did not know his act was contrary to law, he was still liable if he knew that it was wrong 'according to the ordinary standard adopted by reasonable men'.¹⁶⁸ The fact that D thought his act was right was irrelevant if he knew that people generally considered it wrong. This again seems to be supported by the M'Naghten Rules:¹⁶⁹

If the question were to be put as to the knowledge of the accused solely and exclusively with reference to the law of the land, it might tend to confound the jury, by inducing them to believe that an actual knowledge of the law of the land was essential to lead to a conviction: whereas the law is administered upon the principle that everyone must be taken conclusively to know it, without proof that he does know it. If the accused was conscious that the act was one which he ought not to do, and if that act was at the same time contrary to the law of the land, he is punishable.

Modern cases, however, suggest that the courts are concerned only with D's knowledge of legal, not moral, wrongness. In Windle,¹⁷⁰ D was unhappily married to a woman, V, who ¹⁶¹ The disposal powers for those found not guilty by reason of insanity in cases of murder are limited.

¹⁶² Sullivan [1983] 2 All ER 673 at 678, [1983] Crim LR 740, HL.

¹⁶³ eg N Morris, 'The Criminal Responsibility of the Mentally Ill' (1982) 33 Syracuse LR 477.

¹⁶⁴ See LCDP, Ch 2 and Appendix A. ¹⁶⁵ Scottish Law Commission Report, para 2.16.

¹⁶⁶ [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin). ¹⁶⁷ (1843) 10 Cl & Fin 200 at 209.

¹⁶⁸ Codère (1916) 12 Cr App R 21 at 27. ¹⁶⁹ (1843) 10 Cl & Fin 200 at 210.

¹⁷⁰ [1952] 2 QB 826.

was always speaking of committing suicide and who, according to medical evidence at the trial, was certifiably insane. D killed V by the administration of 100 aspirins. He then gave himself up to the police, saying, 'I suppose they will hang me for this'. A medical witness for the defence said that D was suffering from a form of communicated insanity known as folie à deux. Rebutting medical evidence was called, but the doctors on both sides agreed that he knew he was doing an act which the law forbade. Devlin J thereupon withdrew the issue from the jury. So far the decision accords perfectly with the law as stated previously but, in the Court of Criminal Appeal, Lord Goddard CJ, in upholding the conviction, said:¹⁷¹

Courts of law can only distinguish between that which is in accordance with the law and that which is contrary to law The law cannot embark on the question and it would be an unfortunate thing if it were left to juries to consider whether some particular act was morally right or wrong. The test must be whether it is contrary to law

In the opinion of the court there is no doubt that in the M'Naghten Rules 'wrong' means contrary to law and not 'wrong' according to the opinion of one man or of a number of people on the question whether a particular act might or might not be justified.

Windle is in accordance with authority in rejecting the arguments of the defence that D should be acquitted if, knowing his act to be against the law, he also believed it to be morally right. In the Court of Appeal in Johnson,¹⁷² it was confirmed that 'wrong' means only 'wrong' according to law. If D appreciates that his conduct is wrong according to law, he cannot rely on insanity. In practice it seems that juries commonly accept the defence in such cases.¹⁷³

The High Court of Australia has refused to follow Windle. In Stapleton v R,¹⁷⁴ it made a detailed examination of the English law before and after M'Naghten and came to the conclusion that Windle was wrongly decided. The court's view was that if D believed his act to be right according to the ordinary standard of reasonable people, he was entitled to be acquitted even if he knew it to be legally wrong. This would extend the scope of the defence, not only beyond what was laid down in Windle, but beyond what the law was believed to be before that case. While such an extension of the law may be desirable, it is difficult to reconcile with the M'Naghten Rules and to justify on the authorities.¹⁷⁵ In Johnson, the court discussed Stapleton and rejected that approach.¹⁷⁶ It is not followed by the courts in England.¹⁷⁷ Should the defence be available where D kills a prostitute, knowing that to do so is murder, but believing that 'it is morally right to rid the streets of such women'?¹⁷⁸ The New Zealand Law Commission has questioned why this limb is needed or justified at all. It commented, in its 2010 report, 'it is still not clear why incapacity to reason morally is necessarily the right test for determining when it is not proper to hold the person responsible'.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷¹ ibid at 833, 834.

¹⁷² [2007] EWCA Crim 1978, [2008] Crim LR 132. See RD Mackay [2009] Crim LR 79, for a valuable review.

¹⁷³ See Mackay and Kearns [1999] Crim LR 714 at 722.

¹⁷⁴ (1953) 86 CLR 358; see also Weise [1969] VR 953, especially at 960 et seq, per Barry J. See also Chaulk [1990] 3 SCR 1303; Oomen [2004] 2 SCR 507. See generally for a comparative review S Yeo, 'The Insanity Defence in the Criminal Law of the Commonwealth Nations' [2008] Sing JLS 241.

¹⁷⁵ Stapleton v R is discussed in a note by N Morris, "'Wrong" in the M'Naghten Rules' (1953) 16 MLR 435, which is criticized by J Montrose, 'The M'Naghten Rules' (1954) 17 MLR 383.

¹⁷⁶ Referring with approval to this para in the 11th edition.

¹⁷⁷ See LCSP, paras 4.67–4.74. For criticism of Stapleton see also the New Zealand Law Commission in Mental Impairment Decision-Making and the Insanity Defence, R120 (2010) para 5.6.

¹⁷⁸ cf Peter Sutcliffe (1981) 30 Apr, CCC. See A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 267–268; cf Tados, Criminal Responsibility, 326.

¹⁷⁹ Mental Impairment Decision-Making and the Insanity Defence, R120 (2010) para 5.8 (emphasis in original).

Insane delusions and insanity

Whereas the defence of insanity is excessively broad in defining diseases of the mind, it is unsatisfactorily narrow in respect of what constitutes a sufficient awareness of wrongdoing. The judges were asked in M'Naghten's case:

If a person under an insane delusion as to existing facts commits an offence in consequence thereof, is he thereby excused?

They replied:¹⁸⁰

the answer must, of course, depend on the nature of the delusion: but making the same assumption as we did before, namely, that he labours under such partial delusion only, and is not in other respects insane, we think he must be considered in the same situation as to responsibility as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real. For example, if under the influence of his delusion he supposes another man to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he kills that man, as he supposes, in self-defence, he would be exempt from punishment. If his delusion was that the deceased had inflicted a serious injury to his character and fortune, and he killed him in revenge for such supposed injury, he would be liable to punishment.

This seems to add nothing to the earlier answers. The insane delusions that the judges had in mind seem to have been factual errors of the kind which prevent a person from knowing the nature and quality of his act or knowing it is wrong. The example given seems to fall within those Rules.

Some caution is necessary with the proposition that the responsibility of the insane person 'must be considered in the same situation ... as if the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real'. It should always be remembered that there must be an actus reus, accompanied by the appropriate mens rea, for a conviction. Suppose that D strangles his wife's poodle under the insane delusion that it is her illegitimate child. If the supposed facts were real he would be guilty of murder—but that is plainly impossible as there is no actus reus.¹⁸¹ In respect of the dog there is no crime because there was no mens rea (for a cruelty to animals or criminal damage offence). The Rule seems merely to emphasize that delusions which do not prevent D from having mens rea will afford no defence. As Lord Hewart CJ rather crudely put it, 'the mere fact that a man thinks he is John the Baptist does not entitle him to shoot his mother'. A case often discussed is that of a man who is under the insane delusion that he is obeying a divine command. Some US courts have held that such a belief affords a defence. Yet if the accused knows that his act is forbidden by law, it seems clear he is liable. Stephen certainly thought that this was so:

My own opinion is that if a special divine order were given to a man to commit murder, I should certainly hang him for it, unless I got a special divine order not to hang him.¹⁸²

Irresistible impulse

It is recognized by psychiatrists that a person may know the nature and quality of an act, may even know that it is wrong and yet perform it under an impulse that is almost or quite uncontrollable. Such a person has no defence under the M'Naghten Rules. The ¹⁸⁰ (1843) 10 Cl & Fin 200 at 211.

¹⁸¹ Nor, notwithstanding Shivpuri, p 497 should an insane delusion entail liability for an attempt.

¹⁸² II HCL, 160 fn 1. In some jurisdictions statutory reformulations have expanded the defence to accommodate decisions. See eg Phillip v The Queen [2007] UKPC 31.

matter was considered in Kopsch:¹⁸³ D, according to his own admission, killed his uncle's wife. He said that he strangled her with his tie at her own request. (If this was an insane delusion, it would not, of course, afford a defence under the Rules stated earlier.) There was evidence that he had acted under the direction of his subconscious mind. Counsel argued that the judge should have directed the jury that a person under an impulse which he cannot control is not criminally responsible. This was described by Lord Hewart CJ as a 'fantastic theory ... which if it were to become part of our criminal law, would be merely subversive'.¹⁸⁴

The judges have steadily opposed acknowledging such a defence on the ground of the difficulty—or impossibility—of distinguishing between an impulse which proves irresistible because of insanity and one which is irresistible because of ordinary motives of greed, jealousy or revenge. The view has also been expressed that the harder an impulse is to resist, the greater is the need for a deterrent.¹⁸⁵

English law does not recognize irresistible impulse even as a symptom from which a jury might deduce insanity within the meaning of the Rules.¹⁸⁶ If, however, medical evidence were tendered in a particular case that the uncontrollable impulse, to which the accused in that case had allegedly been subject, was a symptom that he did not know his act was wrong, it would be open to the jury to act on that evidence.¹⁸⁷ But it is not permissible for a judge to make use in one case of medical knowledge which he may have acquired from the evidence in another, in his direction to the jury.¹⁸⁸

Although the M'Naghten Rules remain unaltered, a partial defence of irresistible impulse has now been admitted into the law of murder through the defence of diminished responsibility.¹⁸⁹

9.2.2.3 Burden of proof

The M'Naghten Rules laid down that:

every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crimes, until the contrary be proved to [the jury's] satisfaction; and that to establish a defence on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved, etc.¹⁹⁰

It seems from these words that the judges were intending to put the burden of proof squarely on the accused, and so it has always been subsequently assumed.¹⁹¹ Insanity is stated to be the one exception at common law to the rule that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the accused's guilt in all particulars.¹⁹² He does not have to satisfy that heavy onus of proof beyond reasonable doubt which rests on the prosecution but is entitled to a verdict in his favour if he proves his case on a balance of probabilities, the standard which rests on the claimant in a civil action. If the jury think it is more likely than not that he is insane within the meaning of the Rules, then he is entitled to their verdict.

When, however, consideration is given to what has to be proved to establish insanity under the first limb of the Rules, there is an apparent conflict with the general rule requiring ¹⁸³ (1925) 19 Cr App R 50, CCA. See also True (1922) 16 Cr App R 164; Sodeman [1936] 2 All ER 1138, PC.

¹⁸⁴ (1925) 19 Cr App R 50 at 51. See LCDP, paras 4.37 et seq.

¹⁸⁵ As a Canadian judge, Riddell J, put it: 'If you cannot resist an impulse in any other way, we will hang a rope in front of your eyes, and perhaps that will help': Creighton (1909) 14 CCC 349.

¹⁸⁶ A-G for State of South Australia v Brown [1960] AC 432, [1960] 1 All ER 734, PC.

¹⁸⁷ ibid. See also Sodeman (1936) 55 CLR 192 at 203.

¹⁸⁸ [1960] AC 432 at 449.

¹⁸⁹ See Ch 13.

¹⁹⁰ (1843) 10 Cl & Fin 200 at 210.

¹⁹¹ Stokes (1848) 3 Car & Kir 185; Layton (1849) 4 Cox CC 149; Smith (1910) 6 Cr App R 19; Coelho (1914) 10 Cr App R 210; Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386.

¹⁹² Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462, per Viscount Sankey LC at 481.

the prosecution to prove mens rea.¹⁹³ This requires proof that the accused had the required mens rea with respect to all those consequences and circumstances of his conduct which constitute the actus reus of the crime with which he is charged. But, this is a requirement to prove that the accused did know the nature and quality of his act—at least in cases where the mens rea of the offence is intention or knowledge. The general rule, therefore, says that the prosecution must prove these facts; the special rule relating to insanity says that the defence must disprove them!¹⁹⁴ Williams argued¹⁹⁵ that the only burden on the accused is the ‘evidential’ one of introducing sufficient evidence to raise a reasonable doubt in the jurors’ minds; and that the burden of proof is on the prosecution.¹⁹⁶ This solution appears to be the best way of resolving the inconsistency.¹⁹⁷

This problem does not arise when D’s defence takes the form that he did not know that his act was wrong. Here he is setting up the existence of facts which are quite outside the prosecution’s case and there is no inconsistency in putting the onus on him. It is very strange that the onus of proof should be on the Crown if the defence is based on the first limb of the Rules and on D if it should be on the second. Yet the authorities¹⁹⁸ seem clearly to establish that the onus in the case of the second limb is on the accused. It is not possible to argue that the courts really meant the evidential burden for they have said very clearly that the burden is one of proof ‘on balance of probabilities’, the same standard that the claimant in a civil action must satisfy. Whatever may be the position regarding the first limb of the defence then it seems clear that, under the second, the onus is on the accused.

The anomaly is emphasized by the decision of the House of Lords in *Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland*¹⁹⁹ that, where the defence is sane automatism (ie arising otherwise than through a disease of the mind), the burden of proof is on the prosecution. It is difficult to see why a person whose alleged disability arises from a disease of the mind should be convicted whereas one whose alleged disability arises from some other cause, would, in exactly the same circumstances, be acquitted.²⁰⁰

9.2.2.4 The scope of the defence

Hale²⁰¹ thought insanity was a defence only to capital charges but that opinion is no longer tenable. In Horseferry Road Magistrates’ Court, ex p K,²⁰² the court accepted the misleading proposition in Archbold,²⁰³ relied on by the applicant, that the defence of insanity ‘is based on the absence of mens rea’.²⁰⁴ This may be true where D asserts that he did not know the nature and quality of his act, but it is not true where he asserts that he did not know the act was wrong.²⁰⁵ Awareness of ‘wrongness’ is not an element in mens rea. It seems that Ex p K

¹⁹³ For an explanation see Foye [2013] EWCA Crim 475, [2013] Crim LR 839 in which Lord Hughes stated at [35]: ‘In the case of both insanity and diminished responsibility, the issue depends on the inner workings of the defendant’s mind at the time of the offence. It would be a practical impossibility in many cases for the Crown to disprove (beyond reasonable doubt) an assertion that he was insane or suffering from diminished responsibility.’ See also Wilcocks [2016] EWCA Crim 2043, [2017] Crim LR 706, Ch 13.

¹⁹⁴ See further Jones (1995) 111 LQR 475 for a compelling critique. ¹⁹⁵ CLGP, 165.

¹⁹⁶ See LCDP, Ch 8 for full discussion. In coroners’ proceedings insanity has to be disproved to the criminal standard to sustain a verdict of unlawful killing—R (O’Connor) v HM Coroner for Avon [2009] EWHC 854 (Admin).

¹⁹⁷ cf, however, Cottle [1958] NZLR 999 at 1019, per North J.

¹⁹⁸ Sodeman v R [1936] 2 All ER 1138; Carr-Briant [1943] KB 607.

¹⁹⁹ [1963] AC 386. ²⁰⁰ The Butler proposals on onus of proof appear later, see p 305.

²⁰¹ 1 PC, c 4, and Walker, Crime and Insanity in England, I, 80; S White (1984) 148 JPN 412 at 419.

²⁰² See n 103. ²⁰³ 1996 edn, at 17.109.

²⁰⁴ In Foye [2013] EWCA Crim 475, [2013] Crim LR 839, Lord Hughes expressed doubt as to whether insanity is essentially a denial of mens rea. At [31]. See now Loake v CPS [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin).

²⁰⁵ See also Moore v The State [2001] UKPC 4.

misled the court in *DPP v H*²⁰⁶ into holding that the defence does not apply to an offence of strict liability—in that case driving with excess alcohol.

In a welcome decision, Loake v CPS,²⁰⁷ the Administrative Court, after a detailed examination of the law, held that the defence of insanity is not limited to denials of mens rea. L appealed against a decision of the Crown Court upholding her conviction in a magistrates' court for harassment contrary to s 2(1) of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. L had been accused of sending a very large number of text messages to her husband, from whom she was separated. Before the magistrates and the Crown Court, she relied on the defence of insanity. However, the Crown Court ruled that the defence was not available for the offence of harassment. The prosecution argued that by creating the offence of harassment in the form that it did, and in particular by providing an objective standard in s 1(2) by specifying that the defendant 'ought to know' his conduct amounted to harassment 'if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct amounted to harassment of the other', Parliament had to be taken to have excluded the defence of insanity for the s 2(1) offence. The Administrative Court held that to establish the defence of insanity, it had to be clearly proved that, when committing the act, the defendant was labouring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or that, if he did know it, he did not know what he was doing was wrong. The M'Naghten Rules applied to the offence of harassment under s 2(1) of the 1997 Act just as they did to all other criminal offences. Accordingly, the defence of insanity was available to a defendant charged with harassment under s 2(1).²⁰⁸ As the court noted, if the sole question on which criminal liability turned was whether a reasonable person in possession of the same information as the defendant would think his course of conduct amounted to harassment, that would lead to the conclusion that D would be guilty even if he did not know the nature and quality of his act, and thus was insane under the first limb of the M'Naghten Rules. That would produce startling results. The example given was a person suffering from severe dementia who repeatedly telephoned or texted the same individual, on each occasion believing he was doing so for the first time. Such an individual would not know the nature of his act in that he would not know of the sustained nature of the calls or texts. If the prosecution were right, such a person would be guilty because, viewed objectively, his conduct amounted to harassment. Furthermore, if the prosecution were right, the court observed that the defence of insanity would not apply to any offence with an objective form of mens rea. The court held that the decisions in DPP v H and Ex p K should not be followed. Both were founded on the inaccurate proposition that the defence of insanity is based on the absence of mens rea. The court confirmed that insanity in fact rests on a broader base than the mere absence of mens rea.²⁰⁹ We examine the relationship between insanity and other mental condition defences later in this chapter and its relationship with other defences such as self-defence in Ch 10.²¹⁰

9.2.2.5 The special verdict of insanity and the right of appeal

The Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 as amended provides that if it appears to the jury that the defendant 'did the act or made the omission charged but was insane as aforesaid at the time the jury shall return a special verdict that the accused is not guilty by reason of insanity'.²¹¹

²⁰⁶ [1997] 1 WLR 1406.

²⁰⁷ [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin).

²⁰⁸ See [18], [61], [63].

²⁰⁹ At [54]. In doing so, the court agreed with the view expressed in successive editions of this work.

²¹⁰ See p 386 and Oye [2013] EWCA Crim 1725, [2014] Crim LR 544 in particular.

²¹¹ In R [2013] EWCA Crim 591, the Court of Appeal held that the special verdict constitutes a true acquittal, rather than something lying in between a conviction and an acquittal. This seems to have been assumed in the earlier case of Smith [2012] EWCA Crim 2566, [2013] Crim LR 250. Cf Chinegwundoh [2015] EWCA Crim 109.

In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1998),²¹² it was held that the words 'act' and 'omission' mean the actus reus of the offence.²¹³ The prosecution do not have to prove mens rea. To require them to do so would be inconsistent with the rule that the onus is on D to prove that he did not know the nature and quality of his act.

A right of appeal to the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court is provided by s 12 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, subject to the same conditions as apply in criminal appeals generally.

9.2.2.6 Function of the jury

It has been laid down for defences of both insanity and diminished responsibility that:²¹⁴

it is for the jury and not for medical men [sic] of whatever eminence to determine the issue. Unless and until Parliament ordains that this question is to be determined by a panel of medical men [sic], it is to a jury, after a proper direction by a judge, that by the law of this country the decision is to be entrusted.

The law regarding insanity, however, is now modified by s 1 of the 1991 Act which provides that a jury shall not return a special verdict of not guilty by reason of insanity except on the written or oral evidence of two or more registered medical practitioners of whom at least one is approved by the Home Secretary as having special experience in the field of mental disorder.²¹⁵ The jury may still have to decide between conflicting medical evidence; but if the medical evidence is wholly in favour of a special verdict (or of diminished responsibility) and there is nothing in the facts or surrounding circumstances which could lead to a contrary conclusion, then a verdict of guilty (or guilty of murder as the case may be) will be upset.²¹⁶ If there are facts which, in the opinion of the court, justify the jury in coming to a conclusion different from that of the experts, their verdict will be upheld.

9.2.3 Proposals for reform of the insanity defence

Almost from the moment of their formulation the Rules have been subjected to vigorous criticism, primarily by doctors, but also by lawyers.²¹⁷ The Rules, being based on outdated psychiatric views, are too narrow, it is said, and exclude many persons who ought not to be held responsible. They are concerned only with defects of reason and take no account of emotional or volitional factors whereas modern medical science is unwilling to divide the mind into separate compartments and to consider the intellect apart from the emotions and the will.

There have been numerous attempts to reform the law including a 1923 review by Lord Atkin;²¹⁸ the 1953 Royal Commission on Capital Punishment;²¹⁹ and the 1978 Butler Committee review with a proposed verdict of 'not guilty on evidence of mental disorder'—a ²¹² [1999] 3 All ER 40, [1993] Crim LR 986.

²¹³ As defined in the 8th edition of this book, at p 28. See p 57.

²¹⁴ Matheson (1958) 42 Cr App R 145; Bailey (1961) 66 Cr App R 31n, [1961] Crim LR 828; Sanders (1991) 93 Cr App R 245, [1991] Crim LR 781—all cases concerning diminished responsibility—but the same principle surely applies to insanity.

²¹⁵ On the true input of the jury in practice, see Mackay, Mitchell and Howe [2006] Crim LR 399.

²¹⁶ See Golds [2016] UKSC 61, [2017] Crim LR 316 considering Brennan [2014] EWCA Crim 2387, [2015] Crim LR 290. See Ch 13, p 565.

²¹⁷ S Dell, 'Wanted; An Insanity Defence that Can be Used' [1983] Crim LR 431. For a reappraisal of the defence seeking to explain its operation by reference to lay conceptions of abnormality, see A Loughnan, Manifest Madness: Mental Incapacity in Criminal Law (2012). See Mackay [2009] Crim LR 80, and calls for a more fundamental review made by M Hathaway, 'The Moral Significance of the Insanity Defence' (2009) 73 J Crim L 310.

²¹⁸ Cmd 2005.

²¹⁹ Cmd 8932.

mental disorder verdict'. The Draft Criminal Code endorsed that approach²²⁰ subject to including a presumption that the commission of the offence was attributable to the disorder but is rebuttable by proof beyond reasonable doubt. The Code would produce substantial improvements on the present position. It has been suggested, however, that it would still be incompatible with Art 5 of the ECHR.²²¹

9.2.3.1 The Law Commission's latest proposals

In 2012 the Law Commission published a Scoping Paper on Insanity and Automatism designed to elicit some evidence of the scale of the problem the defences pose in practice. The Scoping Paper was supplemented by material exploring the statistics around the use of the defences, the comparative approaches to mental disorder defences and a summary of the previous proposals. The responses to the Scoping Paper suggested that while the academic criticisms of the offence are justified, the defences caused few problems in practice. The Commission has since produced a Discussion Paper with provisional conclusions and proposals on reform of the insanity and automatism defences.

The principal proposal is that the common law insanity defence should be abolished and replaced with a new statutory defence where someone is not criminally responsible by reason of a qualifying recognized medical condition.²²² The party seeking to raise the defence would have to adduce expert evidence that at the time of the offence D wholly lacked one of the following capacities in relation to what they are charged with having done: (a) to make a judgement rationally; (b) to understand that they are doing something wrong; or (c) to control their actions. The lack of capacity would have to be due to a qualifying recognized medical condition. Not all recognized medical conditions would qualify for the defence and it would be a matter of law, not medicine, whether the condition qualified.²²³ The Commission takes the view that as a matter of policy, not all medical conditions should qualify as 'recognized medical conditions', adopting the view of Hughes LJ that 'there will inevitably be considerations of legal policy which are irrelevant to the business of medical description, classification, and statistical analysis'.²²⁴ Acute intoxication, for example, would not qualify, nor would anti-social personality disorders. The Commission sets out in detail how the new defence would operate with the rules on intoxication.²²⁵

The Commission proposes that there should be an elevated evidential burden on the accused—to call evidence from two experts—but that once that burden is satisfied, then it should fall to the Crown to disprove that defence.²²⁶ The Commission proposes to retain the requirement for evidence from two experts, but proposes that only one of them need be a medical practitioner.²²⁷

The new defence would be available in relation to any kind of offence and would result in a new special verdict—'not criminally responsible by reason of a recognised medical condition'. Following this verdict, both the Crown Court and the magistrates' courts would be ²²⁰ For an alternative approach to reform, see the recent Scottish reform: Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, ss 168–171. For comment see: J Chalmers, 'Section 117 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Bill: A Dangerous Loophole?' [2009] SCL 1240; E Shaw, 'Psychopaths and Criminal Responsibility' (2009) 13 Edin LR 497; G Maher, 'The New Mental Disorder Defences: Some Comments' [2013] SLT 1. The new Act implements recommendations contained in the Scottish Law Commission's Report No 195, Insanity and Diminished Responsibility (2004).

²²¹ See Horder, APOCL, 163.

²²² Para 4.159.

²²³ Para 4.161.

²²⁴ See para 4.162 and Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281, [2012] 1 WLR 2576, [30].

²²⁵ See Ch 7. For criticism, see A Loughnan and N Wake, 'Of Blurred Boundaries and Prior Fault: Insanity, Automatism and Intoxication' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2014). As the authors acknowledge, however, the Law Commission's terms of reference precluded it from reconsidering the law on intoxication.

²²⁶ Para 4.164.

²²⁷ Paras 4.165 and 7.53.

able to make a hospital order, a supervision order or an absolute discharge, and the Crown Court would be able to make a restriction order.²²⁸ The Commission also recommends a new ‘non-penal Youth Supervision Order’ for under 18s following a special verdict.²²⁹ Unlike the present law, under the proposals the jury verdict can be dispensed with if the accused is legally represented, no jury could reasonably reach any other verdict and the judge records the reasons for the verdict.²³⁰

Under the Commission’s proposals, the breadth of the new recognized medical condition defence means that the defence of automatism becomes practically redundant. Physical and mental conditions can be dealt with under the new insanity defence. A new statutory defence of automatism (discussed later) would cover the situation where D had been unable to control his actions for reasons other than a recognized medical condition, for example in a reflex action case where D swerved to avoid a swarm of bees. The recognized medical condition defence and the automatism defence would be mutually exclusive. If successful, that plea would lead to an acquittal, as now. It is anticipated that very few such cases would come before the courts.²³¹

The Commission also calls for a wider review of developmental immaturity as a defence. We consider that aspect of the Report in the next chapter.

9.3 Automatism

A claim by D that his consciousness was so impaired that he was acting in a state of physical involuntariness is a claim of automatism. Someone is an automaton or in a state of automatism where his conscious mind is dissociated from that part of the mind which controls action.²³² This concept—a denial of a voluntary act—has been discussed in Ch 2 in the context of the actus reus.²³³

9.3.1 Distinguishing types of automatism

The approach to automatism can be rather confusing. In reading what follows it is worth having in mind the two basic categories:

- automatism arising from an internal cause from a disease of the mind. This is a plea of insanity (insane automatism), D bears the burden of proof to show he did not know the nature and quality of his act;
- an external cause leading to total loss of control (sane automatism)—D is not guilty on any charge unless D was at fault in inducing that state of automatism.

A person who at the time he is alleged to have committed the offence was in a state of automatism (other than one induced by voluntary intoxication) cannot be guilty of it and the only question is whether he is to be found simply ‘not guilty’ or ‘not guilty by reason of insanity’. The outcome (which is of great importance) depends on how the automatism arose. If it was caused by ‘a disease of the mind’, the proper verdict is not guilty by reason of insanity subject to the other elements of that defence being met. If it arose from any other cause, the ²²⁸ Para 4.167.

²²⁹ Para 4.168.

²³⁰ Para 7.87.

²³¹ Para 5.123.

²³² Wilson et al [2005] Crim LR 614, 615.

²³³ See the discussion in LCSP, Chs 2–4 and LCDP, Ch 5. See also the discussion in Scots law as to whether the defence is one of a denial of mens rea or actus reus (PR Ferguson, ‘The Limits of the Automatism Defence’ (1991) 36 J Law Soc Scotland 446; I MacDougall ‘Automatism—Negation of Mens Rea’ (1992) 37 J Law Soc Scotland 57; JM Ross, ‘A Long Motor Run on a Dark Night: Reconstructing HMA v Ritchie’ [2010] Edin LR 193).

verdict is simply not guilty. But as we have discussed earlier, whether a cause is a 'disease of the mind' is a question of law and that phrase has a wide meaning. Any 'internal factor', mental or physical, causing a malfunctioning of the mind is, in law, a disease of the mind.

So automatism caused by a cerebral tumour or arteriosclerosis, epilepsy or diabetes arises from a disease of the mind. These are all 'internal' to the accused. External factors include concussion, the administration of an anaesthetic or other drug, or hypnosis.²³⁴ In a number of cases, acts done while sleeping have been treated as sane automatism²³⁵ but it has now been held²³⁶ that they are the product of a disease of the mind and thus insanity.²³⁷

It will be recalled that the one exception at common law to the rule that the burden of proof is on the prosecution is the defence of insanity. So if D claims that he was in a state of automatism because of an internal factor, he is raising the insanity defence and it will be for him to satisfy the jury on the balance of probabilities that this was so; but if he relies on an external factor and lays a proper foundation for the automatism defence, the onus is on the prosecution to satisfy the jury beyond reasonable doubt that it was not so.²³⁸ If he alleges²³⁹ that his condition was due to the administration of insulin (an external factor) inducing hypoglycaemia (too little blood sugar), he will be acquitted unless the prosecution can disprove his claim;²⁴⁰ but if he alleges that it was due to diabetes (an internal factor) causing hyperglycaemia (excessive blood sugar), the onus will be on him to prove the defence on the balance of probabilities;²⁴¹ it must be supported by the evidence of two or more registered medical practitioners;²⁴² and, if he succeeds, he will be found not guilty by reason of insanity.²⁴³

A proper foundation for a defence of sane automatism (external cause) may be laid by introducing evidence from which it may reasonably be inferred that the act was involuntary. Whether such a foundation has been laid is a question of law. Lord Denning has said that D's own word will rarely be sufficient,²⁴⁴ unless it is supported by medical evidence. The ²³⁴ Lord Hughes in Foye [2013] EWCA Crim 475 observed that automatism may involve no abnormality of mind at all.

²³⁵ Boshears (1961) The Times, 8 Feb; Kemp (1986) The Times, 3 May: D strangled his wife while experiencing a condition known as 'night terror'. Note that parasomnia caused by self-induced intoxication will not provide a defence of automatism.

²³⁶ Burgess [1991] 2 QB 92, [1991] Crim LR 548, and see news reports for 21 March 2005 of a killing when sleepwalking which led to an acquittal.

²³⁷ The Court of Appeal in Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223 accepted that the distinction between external and internal factors can 'give rise to apparently strange results at the margin' but held that it was nevertheless binding upon the court.

²³⁸ See Roach [2001] EWCA Crim 2698, p 292.

²³⁹ In De Boise [2014] EWCA Crim 121, D sought to challenge the safety of his convictions on the basis that he was hypoglycaemic at the time he committed the relevant offences. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument on the basis that the expert instructed by D could only state that there was a possibility he was suffering from hypoglycaemia. Elias LJ affirmed that whilst the court does not look for certainty, there must be more than a mere possibility.

²⁴⁰ Assuming he has not acted recklessly as to becoming automaton by failing to follow his prescription, etc.

²⁴¹ The Court of Appeal in Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223 accepted that the distinction the law draws between these two scenarios is 'arguably unsatisfactory'.

²⁴² Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1991, p 566.

²⁴³ Hennessy [1989] 1 WLR 287, CA (this case was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223); Bingham [1991] Crim LR 433. Cf Pull (1998) The Times, 20–21 Mar, discussed later. The distinction in terms of result highlights the unsatisfactorily incoherent nature of the law's categorization of automatism as sane or insane on the basis of its internal/external cause. See the cogent criticism of Wilson et al [2005] Crim LR 614.

²⁴⁴ In Dervish [1968] Crim LR 37, Cook v Atchison [1968] Crim LR 266 and Stripp (1978) 69 Cr App R 318, CA, it was held that D's evidence that he had a 'blackout' was insufficient to raise the defence (see also C [2007] EWCA Crim 1862).

difficult questions that arise where there is evidence that the automatism was caused partly by a disease of the mind and partly by other factors are considered later.²⁴⁵

This basic distinction between internal and external factors has recently been subdivided further by the Law Commission.

- (1) Insane automatism arising from a 'disease of the mind' (eg epilepsy). If successful, this results in a special verdict of insanity. This is a plea of insanity and is discussed in full earlier. The other elements of the defence of insanity must also be present.²⁴⁶
- (2) Automatism arising from an internal malfunctioning of the body which does not constitute a disease of the mind. This should give rise to a defence of sane, not insane, automatism. An example given by the Law Commission is of D, who is driving, who experiences a sudden cramp in his leg, causing him to press the accelerator and crash the car. This is not insane automatism because there is no impairment of D's mental functioning and therefore no disease of the mind in the sense adopted in *Sullivan*²⁴⁷ which could found a defence of insane automatism. This should result in a complete acquittal unless D was at fault in inducing or failing to avoid the loss of control. There do not appear to be any reported cases of such automatism.²⁴⁸
- (3) Automatism arising from voluntary taking of substances (eg the accused who, having taken insulin, suffers a hypoglycaemic episode). This results in a complete acquittal unless the accused was at fault in inducing or failing to avoid the loss of control (as discussed earlier). If D was at fault, either because he foresaw the likelihood of a loss of control and unreasonably failed to avert it or because he took a drug commonly known to create loss of control, he will be liable for any offences of basic intent charged.²⁴⁹
- (4) Sane automatism arising from some external physical factor other than D taking substances. A classic example is the accused being stung by a wasp while driving.²⁵⁰ If successful, this leads to a not guilty verdict for any offence charged.

We have examined the plea of insanity in full earlier and that discussion is relevant to insane automatism. That leaves us to consider the approach the law takes to sane automatism and self-induced automatism.

9.3.2 Sane automatism

It should be noted that where D makes a plea of sane automatism the defence will only succeed if his loss of control was complete; an impaired consciousness is not automatism.²⁵¹ This was reiterated by the Court of Appeal in McGhee, a case conjoined on appeal with Coley in which Hughes LJ stated that there must be a 'complete destruction of voluntary control'.²⁵² It is not sufficient that D is disinhibited. It was accepted that it is not necessary for D to be unconscious ²⁴⁵ See p 330. ²⁴⁶ There must also be a 'disease of the mind', see Sullivan [1984] AC 156.

²⁴⁷ [1984] AC 156. ²⁴⁸ Quick [1973] QB 910, 922.

²⁴⁹ Basic intent offences are discussed in detail at p 318. For present purposes, it can be equated with those offences for which the predominant mens rea is not intention, knowledge or dishonesty (this includes offences of recklessness, belief, negligence and strict liability).

²⁵⁰ See Pearson J in Hill v Baxter [1958] 1 QB 277, 286; Kay v Butterworth (1945) 61 TLR 452, per Humphreys J. These examples are frequently used in the academic literature. See eg HLA Hart, Punishment and Responsibility (1968) 96.

²⁵¹ A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1992) [1994] QB 91. This is not always easy to establish, see Nelson [2004] EWCA Crim 333 (reliance on hearsay). The Draft Code would permit the defence in circumstances of impaired consciousness (cl 33).

²⁵² [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923, [22].

in the sense of being comatose. This is arguably an unduly strict approach.²⁵³ In an indication of how strictly the courts regulate this defence, particularly in relation to diabetic drivers, the Court of Appeal has held, in an interlocutory prosecution appeal, that if D wants to advance a plea of sane automatism, he must provide evidence that:²⁵⁴ he was totally unable to control his actions (driving) owing to an unforeseen hypoglycaemic attack; he could not reasonably have avoided the attack; and there were no advance warnings of its onset.²⁵⁵ The narrow approach results in a further distinction from insanity: D may have some control over his actions and yet not know the nature and quality of his act or that it was wrong. He would qualify for insane automatism but not sane automatism subject to the other elements of the defences.

The plea of sane automatism can be made in relation to all offences (subject to what is said in the following section regarding self-induced automatism).

9.3.3 Self-induced sane automatism

Where D's state of automatism arises from his voluntary conduct (usually, ingesting substances), the following rules apply. The automatism plea is, of course, only available if D had a total loss of control.

- (1) Where the automatism arises from D's taking a substance in bona fide compliance with his²⁵⁶ medical prescription, the defence is a complete one to all crimes. For example, D has an adverse reaction to an anaesthetic and hits V. D will be acquitted on charges, whatever they may be, if he had totally lost control.
- (2) Where the automatism arises otherwise than from D taking a substance in accordance with a medical prescription, if the crime with which D is charged is one of specific intent (discussed at p 318) the defence will result in acquittal. For example, D, a diabetic, takes insulin but ignores his prescription and takes too much, going into a coma. He punches V causing GBH. D will be acquitted on a s 18 charge.
- (3) Where the automatism arises from D voluntarily taking a substance otherwise than in accordance with his medical prescription and the crime with which D is charged is one of basic intent (p 323), the automatism plea will fail if the substance ingested was one commonly known to create states of unpredictability or aggression (alcohol, alcohol combined with a drug that normally has soporific effects,²⁵⁷ heroin, cannabis, cocaine, etc). Thus, D charged with reckless criminal damage will have no success with a defence based on his claim that he was 'completely out of it' and acting involuntarily when he swung his leg out and damaged V's property.
- (4) Where the automatism arises from D's taking a substance otherwise than in accordance with his medical prescription and the crime with which D is charged is one of basic intent, and where the substance is not commonly known to create a state of unpredictability or aggression, the defence will result in an acquittal only if in taking the substance D was not subjectively reckless as to the effect it would have.²⁵⁸ Thus, D

²⁵³ See Mackay [2013] Crim LR 923.

²⁵⁴ The mere possibility that D might have been experiencing a hypoglycaemic attack at the time he committed the actus reus of the offence will be insufficient, as the court confirmed in De Boise [2014] EWCA Crim 1121. See J Rumbold and M Wasik, 'Diabetic Drivers, Hypoglycaemic Unawareness and Automatism' [2011] Crim LR 863.

²⁵⁵ C [2007] EWCA Crim 1862. See also JG [2006] EWCA Crim 1812.

²⁵⁶ See the odd acceptance of the defence where D took his friend's 'pills' and mixed them with alcohol: Buck (2002), discussed by K Roberts (2002) 99 Law SocGaz 40.

²⁵⁷ See Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923.

²⁵⁸ On the possible interpretations of the recklessness required, see LCDP, pp 127–131.

who is charged with reckless criminal damage after taking a soporific drug will not succeed in his plea of automatism if he was aware when taking the drug that it posed the risk for him of a state of unpredictability of aggression.

Although the defence of automatism operates to deny the actus reus of the offence, in cases of self-induced automatism the approach is founded on the same policy concerns that underpin the rules relating to the plea of intoxication which, if accepted at all, operates as a denial of mens rea—there is no voluntary conduct element. The court in Coley, rejecting D's plea of sane automatism, referred to Quick and held that automatism is not available where a defendant has induced an acute state of involuntary behaviour by his own prior fault. Hughes LJ commented:

We do not, however, think it safe to say that in every case in which automatism is indeed a possible and legitimate conclusion, it should be removed from the jury if they have a decision to make about specific intent. That may particularly be so if the jury is invited to infer intent from the action, which may be a very short-lived action; if the action might indeed have been involuntary, such inference would not be safe and the jury ought in such a case to confront the issue of involuntary automatism before it goes on to intent.²⁵⁹

This is a recognition that, having ascertained that D had a total loss of control, it is important next to identify whether the external factor was involuntary or self-induced.

9.3.3.1 Reform of automatism

The Law Commission's provisional proposals for the reform of the automatism defence are to abolish the common law defence and replace it with a statutory defence available in respect of all offences. It would be available where D had a total loss of control other than one arising from a recognized medical condition. If D's loss of capacity to control his actions is due to something he culpably did or failed to do (as provided for by the common law), then the defence of automatism should not be available. The reformed automatism defence would not lead to a special verdict. If successful, this defence would result in a simple acquittal. It would be available in a much narrower set of circumstances than the present law.

9.4 Intoxication

It will come as no surprise to read that the law in this area is heavily policy-based. There is often little by way of principle underpinning the operation of the law. The relationship between intoxication and crime, particularly violent crime and public disorder, needs no elucidation here.²⁶⁰ The following discussion analyses the three key distinctions drawn by the courts in their application of the plea of intoxication.²⁶¹

- (1) Is D's intoxication voluntary or involuntary?
- (2) If voluntary, is the crime charged one of specific 'intent' or 'basic' intent?
- (3) If basic intent, is the drug involved one of a dangerous nature (is it one known to create states of unpredictability or aggression)?

²⁵⁹ At [25]. ²⁶⁰ See generally G Dingwall, Alcohol and Crime (2005); LC 314, para 1.1.

²⁶¹ The focus in this chapter is exclusively on D's intoxication. V's intoxication may affect the substantive law, eg in relation to sexual offences discussed at p 764. See LC 314, Intoxication and Criminal Liability (2009). The report provides a useful summary of the current law in Part 2. See for critical comment on the proposals, J Child, 'Drink, Drugs and Law Reform: A Review of Law Commission Report No 314' [2009] Crim LR 488.

Before analysing these three issues, it is important to emphasize the general limits on the plea of intoxication. Intoxication is not, and never has been, a ‘defence’ in itself.²⁶² It is never a defence for D to say, however convincingly, that but for the drink he would not have behaved as he did.²⁶³ Because alcohol and other drugs weaken the restraints and inhibitions which normally govern our conduct, a person may do things when drunk that he would never dream of doing when sober. This is echoed in the controversial judgment of the Court of Appeal in *Heard*²⁶⁴ discussed in full later.

9.4.1 Intoxication as a denial of criminal responsibility

Before we examine the three key steps in detail, it is worth considering why intoxication might be relevant to criminal liability. Intoxication impairs a person’s perception and judgement so that he may fail to be aware of facts, or to foresee results of his conduct, of which he would certainly have been aware, or have foreseen, if he had been sober.²⁶⁵ So intoxication may be the reason why the defendant lacked the mens rea of the crime charged. When D relies on evidence of intoxication he does so for the purpose of disputing mens rea. This is its only relevance so far as liability to conviction (as opposed to sentence) is concerned.

It must always be borne in mind when considering intoxication that if D has the mens rea for the crime charged he is guilty. A drunken or drugged intent suffices for a crime of intention; a drunken or drugged awareness of a risk of the prohibited harm will suffice for a crime of recklessness. This is so even though drink or drugs impaired or negated D’s ability to judge between right and wrong or to resist temptation or provocation. It is so even though, in his drunken state, D found the impulse to act as he did irresistible. It is so if the state of intoxication was not self-induced by the accused—as where his drinks are laced. A drunken mens rea is still mens rea.

In many of the cases where intoxication is relevant, the plea, in substance, is one of mistake and the evidence of intoxication is circumstantial evidence that the mistake was made. Two examples quoted by Lord Denning²⁶⁶ are: (a) where a nurse got so drunk at a christening that she put the baby on the fire in mistake for a log of wood;²⁶⁷ and (b) where a drunken man thought his friend, lying in bed, was a theatrical dummy and stabbed him to death.²⁶⁸ Lord Denning said there would be a defence to murder in each of these cases. These mistakes were highly unreasonable and, in the case of a sober person, it would be unlikely that a jury would believe that they might have been made. The relevance of the evidence of intoxication is simply that it makes these mistakes much more credible. Similarly where D denies that he foresaw some obvious consequence of his action, his intoxicated state makes that more plausible. A denial which would be quite incredible in the case of a sober person may be readily accepted when there is evidence that D was intoxicated.

In Beard, it was said that intoxication was a ‘defence’ only if it rendered D incapable of forming the mens rea.²⁶⁹ This goes too far. Proof of a lack of capacity to form mens rea is ²⁶² See the review by A Simester, ‘Intoxication is Never a Defence’ [2009] Crim LR 3; LC 314, para 1.15.

²⁶³ DPP v Beard [1920] AC 479 at 502–504. This was emphasized in emphatic terms more recently in Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281.

²⁶⁴ [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2007] Crim LR 654.

²⁶⁵ For an analysis of how the modern approach to intoxication emerged at the end of the nineteenth century, see P Handler, ‘Intoxication and Criminal Responsibility in England, 1819–1920’ (2013) 33 OJLS 243.

²⁶⁶ In A-G for Northern Ireland v Gallagher [1963] AC 349 at 381m.

²⁶⁷ (1748) 18 Gentleman’s Magazine 570; quoted in Kenny, Outlines, 29.

²⁶⁸ (1951) The Times, 13 Jan.

²⁶⁹ [1920] AC 479 at 501–502, HL. For further discussion, see P Handler, ‘DPP v Beard’ in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017).

of course conclusive that mens rea was not present; but it is now established that it is not necessary to go so far. It is sufficient that D lacked mens rea on that occasion even though he was capable of forming the necessary intent. Equally, an intoxicated person may be capable, notwithstanding his intoxication, of forming the intent to kill and yet not do so. The nurse at the christening was capable of forming the intent to tend the fire, so she was probably capable of forming an intention to kill. The important thing is that she did not do so—and the intoxication was highly relevant to rebut the inference which might otherwise have arisen from her conduct. When, considering the three steps to be discussed, D's mens rea may be relevant, the correct question is, taking D's intoxicated state into account, did he in fact form the necessary mens rea?²⁷⁰ The onus of proof—again contrary to certain dicta in *Beard*²⁷¹—is clearly on the Crown to establish that, notwithstanding the alleged intoxication, D formed the mens rea.²⁷²

In some modern cases, the courts have taken the unwelcome and, it is submitted, unduly restrictive approach to the question of when an intoxication plea gets off the ground. In Soolkaland another v The State,²⁷³ McKnight,²⁷⁴ and Porceddu,²⁷⁵ the courts have suggested that D is required to provide specific evidence to show that he was intoxicated and that he lacked mens rea. This burden is not satisfied by evidence that he had consumed so much drink/drugs that he was intoxicated or by a loss of memory owing to intoxication. The courts are surely imposing too onerous a duty on D, who is not raising a defence in the true sense but rather denying the element of mens rea which it is always incumbent on the Crown to prove.

It is also necessary to emphasize that if the principles analysed in this section are to apply then D must be relying on his intoxication at the time of committing the offence as opposed to reliance on his suffering from some form of mental disorder. In Harris, conjoined on appeal with Coley,²⁷⁶ the judge ruled that D's mental confusion at the time he started the fire (leading to his being charged with arson) was brought about by his previous binge drinking from which he had sobered up at the time of the act. The judge held that the rules on voluntary intoxication applied. The Court of Appeal rejected this argument, because it would represent a major expansion of the law if a mental disorder caused by D's prior fault were to be treated in the same way as drunkenness at the time of the offence.

9.4.1.1 Intoxicated mens rea

If D had the mens rea for the crime charged, it makes no difference whether his intoxication was voluntary or involuntary, nor whether the crime was one of specific or basic intent, nor whether the drug was of a dangerous or non-dangerous variety. In Kingston,²⁷⁷ D may ²⁷⁰ Pordage [1975] Crim LR 575, CA, following dicta in Sheehan [1975] 2 All ER 960, [1975] Crim LR 339 and commentary, CA, Cole [1993] Crim LR 300. To the same effect are Menniss [1973] 2 NSWLR 113 and Kamipeli [1975] 2 NZLR 610. But cf Groark [1999] Crim LR 669.

²⁷¹ [1920] AC 479 at 502.

²⁷² Sheehan, n 270. Bowden [1993] Crim LR 379. When evidence emerges, whatever its source, of such intoxication as might have prevented D's forming a specific intent the judge must direct the jury on it: Bennett [1995] Crim LR 877. Cf McKinley [1994] Crim LR 944, where the point was left open. The absence of a Sheehan direction seems to be a fertile ground of appeal: see Golding [2004] EWCA Crim 858. See LC 314, paras 2.27–2.33. In White [2017] NICA 49, Morgan LCJ held that the absence of a Sheehan direction in that case did not render D's conviction unsafe. His lordship did emphasize, however, that 'where the evidence does raise an issue about the effect of alcohol on the specific intention necessary for a criminal offence there is an obligation on the court, whether or not the matter is raised by counsel, to ensure that the jury is properly directed in relation to it'. At [22].

²⁷³ [1999] 1 WLR 2011, PC. ²⁷⁴ (2000) The Times, 5 May. ²⁷⁵ [2004] EWCA Crim 1043.

²⁷⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923.

²⁷⁷ [1994] 3 All ER 353, [1994] Crim LR 846, HL. See J Horder, 'Pleading Involuntary Lack of Capacity' (1993) 52 CLJ 298; R Smith and L Clements, 'Involuntary Intoxication, The Threshold of Inhibition and the Instigation of Crime' (1995) 46 NILQ 210. See LC 314, para 2.75.

have given way to his paedophilic inclinations only because E had surreptitiously laced his drink with intent that he should do so. D, however, knew what he was doing; he intended to commit a sexual assault on a 15-year-old boy. That was the mens rea of the offence. The judge had rightly directed the jury that a drugged intention is still an intention. The fact that, but for the secretly administered drug, he would not have formed the intent was a matter going only to mitigation of the penalty.²⁷⁸

9.4.2 Involuntary intoxication

Where, as a result of involuntary intoxication, D lacks the mens rea of the offence, it is submitted that he must be acquitted. This is so whether the crime charged is one of specific or basic intent. The offence has not been committed and there is absolutely no reason why the law should pretend that it has.²⁷⁹ On a charge involving an offence of strict liability, the involuntary intoxication will not avail D if he claimed to lack mens rea as to that strict element since there is no mens rea for it to displace. In cases of alleged negligence, in principle, D ought only to be liable if the reasonable person would have acted in the same way had he suffered the effects of the involuntary intoxication.

In Kingston, Lord Mustill referred to a number of Scottish decisions to the effect that intoxication negates liability if it is 'based ... on an inability to form mens rea as a result of some external factor which was outwith the accused's control and which he was not bound to foresee'. The dicta quoted all required an inability to form the intent. Inability is certainly a conclusive answer; but it is submitted that, whatever the position in Scotland, in England the ultimate question is whether D did form the mens rea and, if he did not—perhaps because he made a drunken mistake of fact—he must be acquitted, even though he was capable of forming the intent. This is the law in those cases where voluntary intoxication may be the basis of a defence to an offence of specific intent, and it ought to apply, a fortiori, to involuntary intoxication.

Involuntary intoxication is narrowly defined. If D knew he was drinking alcohol, he cannot claim that the resulting intoxication was involuntary merely because he underestimated the amount he was consuming²⁸⁰ or the effect it would have on him. Intoxication is 'involuntary' if D was unaware that he was taking an intoxicant. So where D's lemonade is laced with vodka and he is unaware that he has consumed any alcohol, he can rely on evidence of his drunken condition.²⁸¹

Similarly, perhaps, where D has taken drink under duress.²⁸² It also covers the special case where a person becomes intoxicated through taking drugs (presumably including alcohol) voluntarily in bona fide pursuance of medical treatment or prescription. This will rarely, if ever, be applicable to drink but it might apply where, for example, brandy is administered to D after an accident.

²⁷⁸ The case prompted interesting calls for a new defence applicable where D acted out of character. See GR Sullivan, 'Involuntary Intoxication and Beyond' [1994] Crim LR 272 and 'Making Excuses' in S Shute and A Simester (eds), Harm and Culpability (1996) 131; Tadros (2001) 21 OJLS 495; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 11; and for a more recent review see C Crosby, 'Culpability, Kingston and the Law Commission' (2010) 74 J Crim L 434.

²⁷⁹ See LC 314, para 1.22. See also the discussion in LC 314, Part 4.

²⁸⁰ Allen [1988] Crim LR 698; cf the definition of voluntary intoxication proposed by the Butler Committee at para 18.56 and that in the Home Office Bill (see later) cl 19(3). LC 314, Part 3 proposes a non-exhaustive list of situations amounting to involuntary intoxication.

²⁸¹ See n 277. In Majewski, n 288, the Lord Chancellor pointed out that the drugs taken were not medically prescribed.

²⁸² cf Kingston, n 277. But what of the much more common case where D has voluntarily taken some drink and his companions surreptitiously add more? Probably, the jury should be told to convict only if satisfied that the drink voluntarily taken contributed to his lack of awareness. Cf LC 314, para 3.125.

As intoxication is nearly always voluntary, it is probably for D to raise the issue if he wishes to contend that it is involuntary. The onus of proof will then generally be on the Crown;²⁸³ but s 6(5) of the Public Order Act 1986, for the purposes of offences under that Act, requires D to 'show' that his intoxication was not self-induced or caused by medical treatment. As the Divisional Court stated in DPP v Smith, under the 1986 Act: 'a drunken defendant is treated for the purposes of the issue of awareness as if he had been sober'.²⁸⁴ This was presumably intended to put the onus of proof on D; but 'show', in contrast with 'prove' which is used in other sections of the Act, might be taken to impose no more than an evidential burden. This is more especially so given the impact of the HRA 1998, which gives force to Art 6(2) of the ECHR.²⁸⁵

9.4.3 Voluntary intoxication

9.4.3.1 Basic and specific intent crimes

D is entitled to an acquittal where his voluntary intoxication is such that he did not form the mens rea for the offence of specific intent.²⁸⁶ It must be emphasized, once again, that this applies where there is a lack of mens rea, not merely a reduction of inhibition; a drunken intention is nevertheless an intention. The prosecution must prove mens rea.

In the case of a crime of basic intent, D may be convicted if he was voluntarily intoxicated at the time of committing the offence by a drug known to create unpredictability or aggression, though he did not have the mens rea required in all other circumstances for that offence and even though he was in a state of automatism at the time of doing the act; if he would have had mens rea if sober.

The problem lies in identifying a way of distinguishing between crimes of basic and specific intent. Until very recently, it appeared to be settled that the distinction was between whether the predominant mens rea element of the crime was one of intention, knowledge or dishonesty which would lead to classification as a specific intent crime, or of something less (recklessness, negligence or strict liability) in which case the crime was one of basic intent. This was a largely pragmatic, but not unprincipled, method of classification. The decision of the Court of Appeal in *Heard*²⁸⁷ casts doubt on this simple and established method of classification, although technically the comments of the court on the basic/specific distinction are obiter.

The rule in Majewski

In DPP v Majewski,²⁸⁸ the House of Lords confirmed the rule, obscurely stated in Beard,²⁸⁹ that evidence of self-induced intoxication negating mens rea excuses a defendant on a charge of a crime requiring a specific intent but not to a charge of any other crime. In ²⁸³ Stripp (1978) 69 Cr App R 318 at 323; Bailey [1983] 2 All ER 503 at 507, [1983] Crim LR 533.

²⁸⁴ [2017] EWHC 3193 (Admin), at [12] per Bean LJ.

²⁸⁵ cf Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] Crim LR 806; A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2002) [2004] UKHL 40, [2005] Crim LR 200, p 23.

²⁸⁶ See J Horder, 'The Classification of Crimes and the General Part' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes. For extended analysis of the problems with the current law on voluntary intoxication, see R Williams, 'Voluntary Intoxication—A Lost Cause?' (2013) 129 LQR 264.

²⁸⁷ [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2007] Crim LR 654. See LC 314, paras 2.2–2.28.

²⁸⁸ [1977] AC 443, [1976] Crim LR 374 and commentary; G Williams, 'Intoxication and Specific Intent' (1976) 126 NLJ 658; AD Gold, 'An Untrimmed Beard' (1976) 19 Crim LQ 34; A Dashwood, 'Logic and the Lords in Majewski' [1977] Crim LR 532 and 591. Discussed in LC 314, paras 2.35–2.70.

²⁸⁹ [1920] AC 479. Cf P Handler, 'Intoxication and Criminal Responsibility in England, 1819–1920' (2013) 33 OJLS 243.

Majewski, D had assaulted a number of police officers when he was being restrained and arrested. He had taken a combination of drink and drugs and was very heavily intoxicated. He claimed that his self-induced intoxication had prevented him forming the mens rea, and that the evidence of the intoxication ought to be admissible to support that plea, relying on s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967. He was convicted and this result was upheld by the House of Lords. He was charged with a crime of basic intent and it has long been recognized that voluntary intoxication was no defence to such a charge even if it did cause D to lack mens rea. Unfortunately, the House did not offer a unanimous basis for the distinction between crimes of specific intent and basic intent.

Rule of substantive law

On one interpretation, Majewski imposes a rule of substantive law that, where D relies on voluntary intoxication to a charge of a crime not requiring 'specific intent', the prosecution need not prove any intention or foresight, whatever the definition of the crime may say, nor indeed any voluntary act. D's prior fault in becoming voluntarily intoxicated supplies the mens rea. It follows that s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967²⁹⁰ has no application. There is, it appears, an implied qualification to every statute creating an offence and specifying a mens rea other than a specific intent. The mens rea must be proved—except, we must infer, where the accused was intoxicated through the voluntary taking of drink or drugs. It is assumed that D has the mens rea if he would have had it if sober. In Richardson and Irwin,²⁹¹ where DD dropped a fellow student from a balcony when drunk causing him grievous bodily harm, they were charged under s 20 of the 1861 Act. Their convictions were quashed by the Court of Appeal holding that the trial judge should have directed that the jury had to be sure that DD would have foreseen the risk of injury had they been sober.

On this first interpretation of Majewski it is fatal for a person charged with a crime not requiring specific intent who claims that he did not have mens rea to support his defence with evidence that he had taken drink and drugs. By so doing he dispenses the Crown from the duty, which until that moment lay upon them, of proving beyond reasonable doubt that he had mens rea. Could the Crown escape from this duty by leading evidence that D had taken drink so as to diminish his capacity to foresee the consequences of his acts? According to Lord Salmon²⁹² in Majewski, the question the House was deciding was whether the accused could rely by way of defence on the fact that he had voluntarily taken drink. But there are other dicta which suggest that D is held liable without the usual mens rea because he has taken the drink—the taking of the drink is the foundation of his liability²⁹³—a variety of mens rea—though not in the sense in which that term is used in this book. It is a form of 'prior fault', with D's liability for the crime based on his conduct at that time coupled with his fault in becoming intoxicated. If that is right, there is no reason why the Crown should not set out to prove it, instead of seeking to prove mens rea in the sense of intention or recklessness.

In principled terms, this first interpretation of Majewski is problematical. It deems the defendant's negligence or recklessness in becoming voluntarily intoxicated—his 'prior fault'—to be ²⁹⁰ See p 131. See Simester, n 262, p 6.

²⁹¹ [1999] 1 Cr App R 192, [1999] Crim LR 494, see Simester, n 262.

²⁹² [1977] AC 443, [1976] Crim LR 374.

²⁹³ 'His course of conduct in reducing himself by drugs and drink to that condition in my view supplies the evidence of mens rea, of guilty mind, certainly sufficient for crimes of basic intent': per Lord Elwyn-Jones LC [1976] 2 All ER 142 at 150. 'There is no juristic reason why mental incapacity (short of M'Naghten insanity) brought about by self-induced intoxication to realize what one is doing or its probable consequences should not be such a state of mind stigmatized as wrongful by the criminal law; and there is every practical reason why it should be': per Lord Simon at 153. For critical comment see LC 314, Part 2.

sufficient mens rea for the crime.²⁹⁴ This is despite the fact that there is no contemporaneity between the fault in becoming intoxicated and the commission of the actus reus of the crime. And, more importantly, that prior fault is deemed to be sufficient mens rea despite the fact that the degree of fault in becoming intoxicated (foresight or awareness of becoming intoxicated) bears no correlation to the mens rea that would normally be required—foresight or awareness of a risk of a prohibited harm specified in the offence. It is, with respect, not enough to say as Hughes LJ suggests in Heard (discussed later) that there is ‘broadly equivalent culpability’.²⁹⁵

It seems that this rule applies whatever the degree of intoxication; if D claimed that it prevented him from foreseeing or knowing what he would have foreseen or known had he been sober he is guilty of the basic intent offence. It is true that Lord Elwyn-Jones at one point²⁹⁶ posed the question before the House much more narrowly. His lordship spoke of a person who ‘consciously and deliberately takes alcohol and drugs not on medical prescription, but in order to escape from reality, to go “on a trip,” to become hallucinated...’ Such a person is readily distinguishable from the ordinary ‘social drinker’ who becomes intoxicated in the course of a convivial evening. The former, intending to reduce himself to a state in which he will have no control over his actions, might well be said to be in some sense reckless as to what he will do while in that state. The same cannot be said of the latter. But the general tenor of the speeches, as well as earlier and subsequent cases, is against any such distinction.²⁹⁷

Professor Duff has suggested that we can make moral sense of Majewski if we accept that: recklessness can be constituted either by awareness of a relevant risk [as elsewhere in criminal law] or by unawareness that results from voluntary intoxication: recklessness must be presumed given proof of such unawareness not because it can be inferred but because it is constituted by such.²⁹⁸

A rule of evidence?

An alternative view is that Majewski does not create a rule of substantive law, but one of evidence. On this second interpretation, once D has been shown to be voluntarily intoxicated in a basic intent crime, the evidence of intoxication is irrelevant to the question whether D held the mens rea, but the prosecution is still obliged to prove that D had the relevant mens rea. There is some authority that a jury must be directed to decide whether D was reckless, disregarding the evidence that he was intoxicated. In Woods,²⁹⁹ D, charged with rape under the old sexual offences law, claimed that he was so drunk that he did not realize V was not consenting. He relied on s 1(2) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976³⁰⁰ which required the jury to have regard to the presence or absence of reasonable grounds for a belief that the woman was consenting, ‘in conjunction with any other relevant matters’. He said his intoxication was a relevant matter. The court said that self-induced intoxication is not ‘a legally relevant matter’ but ‘the subsection directs the jury to look carefully at all the other relevant evidence before making up their minds on this issue’. The evidence of intoxication is undoubtedly logically ²⁹⁴ For a theoretical analysis of the role played by prior fault, see A Loughnan and N Wake, ‘Of Blurred Boundaries and Prior Fault: Sanity, Automatism and Intoxication’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2014) and J Child, ‘Prior Fault: Blocking Defences or Constructing Crimes’ in the same volume.

²⁹⁵ For further analysis, see R Williams, ‘Voluntary Intoxication—A Lost Cause?’ (2013) 129 LQR 264, 268–269.

²⁹⁶ [1977] AC 443 at 471, [1976] Crim LR 374.

²⁹⁷ ACE Lynch, ‘The Scope of Intoxication’ [1982] Crim LR 139 makes a quite different distinction between ‘complete intoxication’ (to which Majewski would apply) and ‘partial intoxication’ (to which it would not); but there are many degrees of intoxication and the suggested distinction seems unworkable.

²⁹⁸ Answering for Crime, 240–241.

²⁹⁹ (1981) 74 Cr App R 312, [1982] Crim LR 42.

³⁰⁰ Now repealed. See now Ch 17, p 787 and the discussion of the case of Grewal [2010] EWCA Crim 2448.

relevant and may be the most cogent evidence. To ignore it in coming to a conclusion is to answer a hypothetical question. It is no longer, 'did he believe she was consenting?' and must become, 'would he have known she was consenting if he had not been drunk?' This is most obviously so in the case where D's intoxication has rendered him unconscious.

This second interpretation of Majewski as a rule of evidence also poses problems. Take Lipman, where D strangled V after taking LSD and believing that he was fighting off a serpent at the centre of the earth.³⁰¹ How can a judge seriously tell a jury to decide whether D did intend to do an unlawful and dangerous act to V—ignoring the undisputed evidence that he was unconscious at the time? Without this 'legally irrelevant' evidence, the only question the jury can sensibly answer is, 'would he have known that such an act was dangerous if he had not been intoxicated'? On facts like those in Lipman, there is only one possible answer. It is most regrettable that juries should be faced with questions which are, with all respect, nonsensical, even if their common sense will lead them to consider the only matter really in issue.

Distinguishing specific and basic intent crimes

In view of the rule in Majewski, the nature of 'specific intent' is a matter of great importance but a careful scrutiny of the authorities, particularly Majewski itself, fails to reveal any consistent principle by which specific and basic are to be distinguished.³⁰² A number of interpretations are possible. It is regrettable that the distinction is so obscure that the Law Commission recently felt unable confidently to state what the law was.³⁰³

Ulterior intent

One interpretation is that specific intent crimes are those in which there is an element of mens rea going beyond the immediate actus reus. There is, as it is often described, an 'ulterior intent'. For example, in the crime of indecent exposure it is necessary for D to have intentionally exposed his genitals with intent that someone will see them and be caused alarm or distress. There is a 'bolt on element of mens rea' (intent to cause alarm) beyond that relating to the immediate conduct of exposing his genitals. The crime would therefore on this analysis be treated as one of specific intent. This approach derives some support from Majewski and from the decision in Heard. Lord Justice Hughes suggested, obiter, that if an offence requires 'proof of a state of mind addressing something beyond the prohibited act itself, namely its consequences', it is one of specific intent. The court 'regard[ed] this as the best explanation of the sometimes elusive distinction between specific and basic intent in the sense used in Majewski'.³⁰⁴ It is submitted that it is an unsatisfactory basis for distinguishing between offences. The most compelling basis for rejecting this approach is that some crimes requiring no ulterior intent—conspicuously murder—have been consistently and unequivocally treated as crimes of 'specific intent' by all levels of court including the House of Lords. If the 'ulterior intent' approach is incapable of providing the correct classification for such an obvious example as murder, it cannot be worth serious

³⁰¹ [1970] 1 QB 152.

³⁰² cf Gardner (1994) 14 OJLS 279 and J Horder, 'Intention in the Criminal Law—A Rejoinder' (1995) 58 MLR 678, who views the specific intent crimes as those in which the intent is integrally bound up with the nature and definition of the wrong involved. See the recommendation in LC 314. See also A Ward, 'Making Some Sense of Self-Induced Intoxication' (1986) 45 CLJ 247 and, for an historical account, A Loughnan, Manifest Madness: Mental Incapacity in Criminal Law (2012). Loughnan argues that the distinction between crimes of basic and specific intent has deep historical roots and is the reflection of a persistent lay understanding of the effects of alcohol. See LC 314, paras 2.29 et seq.

³⁰³ See LC 229, para 3.27. In LC 314, Part 2, it was accepted again that the law was in a confused state.

³⁰⁴ At [31].

consideration.³⁰⁵ In addition, this approach produces some very odd results. For example, an offence can be one of specific intent even if it contains no element of intent at all—provided there is an ulterior mens rea: reckless criminal damage being reckless as to whether life is endangered thereby would be a crime of specific intention. What of intentionally causing grievous bodily harm under s 18? On the simple form of the charge, there is no bolt on mens rea to be added. It looks then like a crime of basic intent, but every precedent confirms that it is one of specific intent.

Purposive intent

An alternative method of distinguishing between specific and basic intent is to ask whether the mens rea of the crime requires a direct or purposive intention (specific) or some other form of mens rea or strict liability (basic). This also derives some support from the speech of Lord Simon in Majewski who suggested that the distinguishing factor is that ‘the mens rea in a crime of specific intent requires proof of a purposive element’. Lord Simon put it in this way:³⁰⁶

The best description of ‘specific intent’ in this sense that I know is contained in the judgment of Fauteux J in Reg v George (1960) 128 Can CC 289, 301—‘In considering the question of mens rea, a distinction is to be made between (i) intention as applied to acts considered in relation to their purposes and (ii) intention as applied to acts apart from their purposes. A general intent attending the commission of an act is, in some cases, the only intent required to constitute the crime while, in others, there must be, in addition to that general intent, a specific intent attending the purpose for the commission of the act.’

In Heard, Lord Justice Hughes also endorsed the distinction between basic and specific intent found in the speech of Lord Simon in Majewski,³⁰⁷ and put it this way at [31]: ‘crimes of specific intent are those where the offence requires proof of purpose or consequence, which are not confined to, but amongst which are included, those where the purpose goes beyond the actus reus (sometimes referred to as cases of “ulterior intent”)’. It is submitted that it is also an unsatisfactory basis on which to distinguish crimes of specific and basic intent. The crime of murder, for example, has been consistently and unequivocally accepted by the Court of Appeal and House of Lords as a crime of specific intent, yet there need be no purposive element in the mens rea.³⁰⁸

Predominant mens rea

A third approach to distinguishing between crimes of basic and specific intent is based on whether the crime in question is one for which the predominant mens rea is (a) intention, knowledge or dishonesty (specific) or (b) some lesser mens rea of recklessness negligence or strict liability (basic). In Majewski, Lord Elwyn-Jones LC suggested that the test is that crimes not requiring specific intent are crimes that may be committed recklessly.³⁰⁹ In Heard, in an obiter dictum, the Court of Appeal rejected this simple practical approach.

The decision in Heard

The decision in Heard is a controversial one and a number of points are worth emphasizing. First, on its facts, it should never have given rise to problems. The accused had, while drunk, exposed his penis and rubbed it against the thigh of a police officer. D’s plea was that he had no recollection of the incident. That is never a basis for a plea of intoxication and that should ³⁰⁵ Indeed this was one of the principal bases on which Majewski was criticized. See Williams, TBCL, 429.

³⁰⁶ At 478H. ³⁰⁷ At 478B–479B. ³⁰⁸ See LC 314, paras 2.8 et seq.

³⁰⁹ Lord Edmund-Davies, a party to Majewski, was dismayed to think that, as a result of Caldwell, this opinion prevailed [1982] AC 341 at 361, [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 972.

have been the end of the matter. However, D relied on his voluntary intoxication as negating his mens rea of an intention to touch for the purposes of s 3(1)(a) of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. The trial judge ruled that the intentional touching element of the offence required proof of a basic intent, and that it followed that voluntary intoxication was not a defence. Applying the predominant mens rea interpretation of Majewski, on a charge such as that under s 3 with the requirement of an 'intentional' touching, it was arguable at least that the crime was one of specific intent.³¹⁰ The court rejected that approach.

Secondly, we can assume that sexual offences under the 2003 Act in which the conduct is 'intended'³¹¹ will be treated as basic intent crimes unless there is a clear ulterior purpose, as in indecent exposure, and offences in which D is acting 'for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification'.³¹² On policy grounds the court was clearly entitled to assume that Parliament had not intended to change the law, although it should be noted that under the pre-2003 law, the offence of indecent assault was not always a basic intent crime. The court could have adopted the predominant mens rea and created an exception for sex offences.

Thirdly, the court's radical reinterpretation of Majewski aligning specific intent with an ulterior or purposive mens rea produces difficulties, even within the scope of the s 3 offence. Someone like Lipman³¹³ who becomes so intoxicated that he thinks he is stroking an animal at the centre of the earth when in fact he is stroking a woman's breast will, on the court's approach, be guilty under s 3. But it is submitted that in such a case it would be difficult in any ordinary sense of the word to say that D 'intended' to touch V sexually as s 3 requires.

Fourthly, the court makes some very broad qualifications to the approach in s 3 (and other sexual offences and beyond, one assumes) in respect of accidents. Lord Justice Hughes stated that:

To flail about, stumble or barge around in an unco-ordinated manner which results in an unintended touching, objectively sexual, is not this offence. If to do so when sober is not this offence, then nor is it this offence to do so when intoxicated. It is also possible that such an action would not be judged by the jury to be objectively sexual, on the basis that it was clearly accidental, but whether that is so or not, we are satisfied that in such a case this offence is not committed. The intoxication, in such a situation, has not impacted on intention. Intention is simply not in question. What is in question is impairment of control of the limbs.... '[A] drunken intent is still an intent', the corollary [is] that 'a drunken accident is still an accident'.

In respect of someone who simply trips on the dance floor and grabs at the nearest thing to steady himself this makes perfect sense. But consider someone who, ³¹⁴ fooling around when heavily intoxicated, pretends to strike the bottom of a woman who is bending and who misjudges the distance and strikes her bottom. He will be acquitted on the basis that his conduct is 'accidental'.³¹⁵ It is submitted that it would be a misuse of the word 'intention' to say that he had intended to touch her sexually. He intends to move his arm and intends to come close to touching her, but not to do so. It is also misleading to say it is accidental: D is reckless about that consequence, he has seen the risk and unjustifiably gone on to take it. There is a risk that the category of 'drunken accident' endorsed by Heard will be misunderstood and applied in cases of what are plainly recklessness.

Finally, there are several reasons why, it is submitted, the court's obiter dicta rejecting the predominant mens rea interpretation of Majewski in favour of a purposive approach should ³¹⁰ R Card, Sexual Offences: The New Law (2004) para 1.31; P Rook and R Ward, Sexual Offences Law and Practice (5th edn, 2016) paras 2.81–2.82.

³¹¹ See Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299. ³¹² Section 12.

³¹³ Lipman (1969) 55 Cr App R 600, CA.

³¹⁴ cf Shimmen (1987) 84 Cr App Rep 7, [1986] Crim LR 800, (1987) 84 Cr App Rep 7.

³¹⁵ At [23].

not be applied throughout the criminal law: it is more difficult to look for the 'bolt-on' element of additional mens rea in a crime in order to categorize it appropriately; the approach creates no fewer anomalies than the established interpretation of Majewski; and it creates confusion because specific intent might encompass crimes with no element of intent at all, such as reckless criminal damage being reckless as to whether life is endangered thereby.

9.4.3.2 The current law on basic and specific intent

Despite its obscure exposition in the House of Lords, and its unsatisfactory theoretical underpinnings, the Majewski approach had subsequently been knocked into pragmatic shape: the predominant mens rea approach was familiar and generally applied. Those virtues ought not to be undervalued. Despite dicta in Heard, it is submitted that any offence which may be committed recklessly ought to be held an offence of 'basic' and not 'specific' intent.

The safest approach seems to be that 'crime requiring specific intent' means a crime where evidence of voluntary intoxication negating mens rea is a 'defence'. It may be easier to accept that the designation of crimes as requiring, or not requiring, specific intent is based on no principle but on policy. In order to know how a crime should be classified for this purpose, we can look only to the decisions of the courts. The following are crimes requiring specific intent: murder,³¹⁶ wounding or causing grievous bodily harm with intent,³¹⁷ theft,³¹⁸ robbery,³¹⁹ burglary with intent to steal,³²⁰ handling stolen goods,³²¹ endeavouring to obtain money on a forged cheque,³²² causing criminal damage contrary to s 1(1) or (2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 where only intention to cause damage or, in the case of s 1(2), only intention to endanger life, is alleged,³²³ an attempt to commit any offence requiring specific intent and possibly, post-Jogee, secondary participation in any offence.³²⁴

The following crimes do not require specific intent: manslaughter (apparently in all its forms),³²⁵ rape,³²⁶ sexual assault,³²⁷ maliciously wounding or inflicting grievous bodily harm,³²⁸ kidnapping and false imprisonment,³²⁹ assault occasioning actual bodily harm,³³⁰

³¹⁶ Beard, n 289; Gallagher [1963] AC 349; Sheehan [1975] 1 WLR 739, [1975] Crim LR 339, CA.

³¹⁷ Bratty v A-G for Northern Ireland [1963] AC 386, per Lord Denning; Pordage [1975] Crim LR 575; Davies [1991] Crim LR 469.

³¹⁸ Ruse v Read [1949] 1 KB 377, [1949] 1 All ER 398 and Majewski per Lord Simon at 152.

³¹⁹ As a corollary of theft.

³²⁰ Durante [1972] 3 All ER 962, [1972] 1 WLR 1612, [1972] Crim LR 656. ³²¹ ibid.

³²² Majewski, per Lord Salmon at 158.

³²³ Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 964. The Court of Appeal in Harris [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [2013] Crim LR 923 declined to address the issue of whether causing criminal damage being reckless to whether life would be endangered is a crime of specific intent. Hughes LJ did, however, state that there was some force in the argument that voluntary intoxication ought not to be a 'defence' to crimes involving subjective recklessness.

³²⁴ Clarkson [1971] 3 All ER 344 at 347. But in Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland [1975] 1 All ER 913 at 942, [1975] Crim LR 707 Lord Simon said, approving the decision of the Northern Irish Court of Criminal Appeal, that they held that the mens rea of aiding and abetting did not involve a 'specific intent'. But (a) he may have used the term in a different sense; and (b) there may be a difference depending on the nature of the alleged secondary liability—an intent to procure is different from an intent to aid; see p 198.

³²⁵ Beard, Gallagher and Bratty v A-G Northern Ireland [1961] 3 All ER at 533, per Lord Denning; Lipman [1970] 1 QB 152.

³²⁶ Grewal [2010] EWCA Crim 2448; Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299, [2011] Crim LR 584. Majewski, per Lords Simon and Russell and Leary v R (1977) 74 DLR (3d) 103, SCC, discussed 55 Can Bar Rev 691. But if this is right, and it seems almost certain that it is, Cogan and Leak (p 223) is wrongly decided; and Morgan (p 332) might have been decided simply on this ground. Cf Fotheringham (1988) 88 Cr App R 206, [1988] Crim LR 846 and commentary.

³²⁷ Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2007] Crim LR 654.

³²⁸ Bratty at 533, per Lord Denning; Majewski, per Lords Simon and Salmon.

³²⁹ Hutchins [1988] Crim LR 379. Nor child abduction: Hunter [2015] All ER (D) 196 (Jan).

³³⁰ Bolton v Crawley [1972] Crim LR 222; Majewski.

assault on a constable in the execution of his duty,³³¹ common assault,³³² taking a conveyance without the consent of the owner,³³³ criminal damage where intention or recklessness, or only recklessness, is alleged³³⁴ and possibly an attempt to commit an offence where recklessness is a sufficient element in the mens rea,³³⁵ as in attempted rape.³³⁶

It will be noted that for most specific intent offences there exists a basic intent offence that can be charged in the alternative (murder and manslaughter, ss 18 and 20 of the OAPA 1861, etc). The prosecution are usually therefore able to avoid an acquittal in cases of self-induced intoxication. Two problems arise in this regard, however. First, the jury will face confusing directions on charges such as ss 18 and 20 as to what use they may make of the evidence of intoxication. Secondly, there are some specific intent offences for which there is no basic intent equivalent: theft is an obvious example.

Specific and basic: a legitimate basis of distinction?

A classification of all crimes as offences of either specific or basic intent is oversimplified. The Court of Appeal in Heard even hints at rejecting the two-fold classification by suggesting that it is not to be assumed that every offence is one of basic or specific intent.³³⁷ It is submitted that this aspect of the Court of Appeal's decision should be taken as emphasizing that an offence is likely to have more than one element of mens rea. The question is what is the predominant mens rea.

Consider the offence under s 18 of the OAPA 1861 of unlawfully and maliciously wounding with intent to resist lawful apprehension. There is abundant authority to the effect that the words 'unlawfully and maliciously' when used in s 20 import only a basic intent; that is, Cunningham recklessness. Presumably they have the same effect in s 18. So as far as wounding goes, s 18 is an offence of basic intent. But the intent to resist lawful apprehension seems a clear case of specific intent. So it seems that a drunken person who intends to resist lawful arrest but, because of his drunkenness, does not foresee the risk of wounding, might be convicted, notwithstanding his lack of Cunningham recklessness. If, on the other hand, because of drunkenness, he does not realize that he is resisting lawful arrest, he must be acquitted.³³⁸

Intoxication and Caldwell recklessness

Where the offence is one of Caldwell recklessness, assuming that any such offences still exist, the impact of Majewski is reduced. Where, because he was intoxicated, D gave no thought to the existence of the risk, he was reckless and is liable to conviction without the invocation of the rule in Majewski.³³⁹ This was the position in Caldwell itself. But Majewski may still have a significant sphere of operation.³⁴⁰ D might say that he did consider whether there was a risk and decided there was none. He was then not Caldwell-reckless. But, if he would have appreciated the existence of the risk had he been sober, he will still be liable because of Majewski.

³³¹ Majewski. ³³² A fortiori.

³³³ MacPherson [1973] RTR 157; Gannon (1987) 87 Cr App R 254. Diggin (1980) 72 Cr App R 204 is not, as it first appeared: [1980] Crim LR 656, an authority on intoxicated taking: [1981] Crim LR 563; but see S White, 'Taking the Joy Out of Joyriding' [1980] Crim LR 609.

³³⁴ See Ch 27.

³³⁵ Commentary on Pullen [1991] Crim LR 457 at 458.

³³⁶ This possibility will depend upon whether the interpretation of attempts adopted in Pace [2014] EWCA Crim 186 prevails. The implication of the judgment is that, on a charge of attempted rape, the Crown would have to prove that D intended that V was not consenting. For discussion, see Ch 11.

³³⁷ At [14]. But what is this other category that now exists? And what offences might fall into it? See the Law Commission's rejection in LC 314, Part 2.

³³⁸ Davies [1991] Crim LR 469.

³³⁹ This point was overlooked in Cullen [1993] Crim LR 936.

³⁴⁰ This is overlooked by Lord Diplock at [1981] 1 All ER 968a.

9.4.4 Dangerous or non-dangerous drugs in basic intent crime

In the case where D has become voluntarily intoxicated and the offence with which he is charged is one of basic intent, there remains one important issue to consider—whether the substance voluntarily ingested is ‘dangerous’; that is, commonly known to create states of unpredictability or aggression.

The law in this area has developed principally in cases where D was intoxicated by alcohol. In Lipman,³⁴¹ it was held that the same principles apply to intoxication by other drugs but two later cases, *Bailey*³⁴² and Hardie,³⁴³ suggest that drugs must be divided into two categories. Where it is common knowledge that a drug is liable to cause the taker to become aggressive or do dangerous or unpredictable things, that drug is to be classed alongside alcohol. Where there is no such common knowledge, as in the case of a merely soporific or sedative drug, different rules apply. There are obvious difficulties about classifying drugs in this way and it is surprising that it has not generated more case law.

In Bailey,³⁴⁴ a diabetic failed to take sufficient food after insulin. He caused grievous bodily harm and his defence to charges under ss 18 and 20 of the OAPA was that, because of this failure, he was in a state of sane automatism. The recorder’s direction to the jury that this was no defence was obviously wrong so far as s 18 was concerned for that is an offence of specific intent. The Court of Appeal held that it was also wrong for s 20 because ‘self-induced automatism, other than that due to intoxication from alcohol or drugs, may provide a defence to crimes of basic intent’.³⁴⁵ The court went on:

The question in each case will be whether the prosecution has proved the necessary element of recklessness. In cases of assault, if the accused knows that his actions or inaction are likely to make him aggressive, unpredictable or uncontrolled with the result that he may cause some injury to others and he persists in the action or takes no remedial action when he knows it is required, it will be open to the jury to find that he was reckless.

The automatism seems to have been treated as arising from the failure to take food, rather than from the taking of the insulin, but the court hinted at a distinction between two types of drug:

It is common knowledge that those who take alcohol to excess or certain sorts of drugs may become aggressive or do dangerous or unpredictable things....But the same cannot be said, without more, of a man who fails to take food after an insulin injection.

In Hardie,³⁴⁶ the court developed this further. D’s defence to a charge of damaging property with intent to endanger the life of another or being reckless whether another’s life be endangered, was that he had taken valium, a sedative drug, to calm his nerves and that this had resulted in intoxication precluding the mens rea for the offence. The judge, following Majewski and Caldwell, directed that this could be no defence. The Court of Appeal quashed the conviction. Majewski was not applicable because valium:

is wholly different in kind from drugs which are liable to cause unpredictability or aggressiveness....if the effect of a drug is merely soporific or sedative the taking of it, even in some excessive quantity, cannot in the ordinary way raise a conclusive presumption against the admission of proof of intoxication for the purpose of disproving mens rea in ordinary crimes, such as would be the case with alcoholic intoxication or incapacity or automatism resulting from the self-administration of dangerous drugs.³⁴⁷

³⁴¹ [1970] 1 QB 152; p 318.

³⁴² [1983] 1 WLR 760.

³⁴³ [1985] 1 WLR 64.

³⁴⁴ [1983] 1 WLR 760, CA.

³⁴⁵ See p 315.

³⁴⁶ [1985] 1 WLR 64.

³⁴⁷ This overlooks the fact that the Majewski principle is stated by the House of Lords to be a rule of substantive law and that the Criminal Justice Act 1967, s 8, precludes conclusive presumptions of intention or foresight. See p 316. For further discussion, see R Williams, ‘Voluntary Intoxication—A Lost Cause?’ (2013) 129 LQR 264, 266–269. The distinction is also unsatisfactory in pharmacological terms: M Weller and W Somers, ‘Differences in the Medical and Legal Viewpoint Illustrated by Hardie’ (1991) 31 Med Sci Law 152.

This qualification to the normal rule for basic intent crimes applies where intoxication is self-induced otherwise than by alcohol or dangerous drugs. In these cases the test of liability is stated to be one of recklessness: 'If [D] does appreciate the risk that [failure to take food/taking the non-dangerous drug] may lead to aggressive, unpredictable and uncontrollable conduct and he nevertheless deliberately runs the risk or otherwise disregards it, this will amount to recklessness.'³⁴⁸

It is clear that the recklessness which must be proved is:

- (1) subjective—an actual awareness of the risk of becoming aggressive; but
- (2) 'general'—not requiring foresight of the actus reus of any particular crime, such as is required in the case of a sober person charged with an offence of Cunningham recklessness. D will be liable for any crime of recklessness the actus reus of which he happens to commit under the influence of the self-induced intoxication. This flows from the rule in Majewski.³⁴⁹

Further:

- (3) being aware that one may lose consciousness may be sufficient where a failure to exercise control may result in the actus reus of a crime, as in the case of careless or dangerous driving.

D's fault in voluntarily consuming the dangerous drugs with the awareness of their likely effect provides sufficient prior fault to warrant his conviction for basic intent crimes even though at the time of the commission of the offence D lacks the mens rea for that crime.

9.4.5 Intoxication and defences

9.4.5.1 Statutory defences prescribing a belief in circumstances

The Majewski rule has been held inapplicable where statute expressly provides that a particular belief shall be a defence to the charge. If D held that belief, he is not guilty, even though it arose from a drunken mistake that he would not have made when sober. In Jaggard v Dickinson,³⁵⁰ D had a friend, H, who had invited her to treat his house as if it were her own. When drunk, D went to a house which she thought was H's but which in fact belonged to R, who barred her way. D gained entry by breaking windows and damaging the curtains. Charged with criminal damage, contrary to s 1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971, she relied on s 5(2) of that Act³⁵¹ which provides that a person has a lawful excuse if D believed that the person entitled to consent to the damage would have done so had he known of the circumstances. D said that she believed that H would, in the circumstances, have consented to her damaging his property. Since s 1(1) creates an offence of basic intent, D could not have relied on her drunkenness to negative her recklessness as to whether she damaged the property of another. However, it was held, she could rely on her voluntary intoxication to explain what would otherwise have been inexplicable and give colour to her evidence about the state of her belief. The court thought that this was different from using drunkenness to rebut an inference of intention or recklessness. It seems, however, to be exactly the same thing.³⁵²

³⁴⁸ Bailey [1983] 2 All ER 503 at 507, [1983] Crim LR 533.

³⁴⁹ Williams cogently argues that as a result of the current law intoxicated people can be convicted when they are inadvertent, provided they could have foreseen the risk when sober. By contrast, it is no longer permissible to convict sober people when they are inadvertent. See R Williams, 'Voluntary Intoxication—A Lost Cause?' (2013) 129 LQR 264, 270.

³⁵⁰ [1981] QB 527, [1980] Crim LR 717. Cf the unsatisfactory case of Gannon (1987) 87 Cr App R 254, criticized by G Williams, 'Two Nocturnal Blunders' (1990) 140 NLJ 1564.

³⁵¹ See p 1077.

³⁵² See p 1080.

Moreover, the court thought that s 5(2) of the 1971 Act provides that it is immaterial whether a belief is justified or not if it is honestly held, and it was not open to the court to add the words 'and the honesty of the belief is not attributable only to self-induced intoxication'. Yet the courts have not hesitated to add similar words to qualify Parliament's express requirement of 'malice', that is, Cunningham recklessness.

The result is anomalous. Where the defendant did not intend any damage to property but was reckless about damage he may be held liable because he was drunk; but where he did intend damage to property but thought the owner would consent he is not liable, however drunk he may have been. Suppose that D, because he is drunk, believes that certain property belonging to V is his own and damages it. His belief is not a matter of defence under s 5(2)³⁵³ but negatives recklessness as to whether property belonging to another be damaged.³⁵⁴ If D, being drunk, destroys X's property believing that it is the property of Y who would consent to his doing so, this is a defence; but if he destroys X's property believing that it is his own, it is not. The latest Law Commission recommendation to reverse the approach in Jaggard,³⁵⁵ is a welcome one.

In the absence of parliamentary intervention, Elias LJ in *Magee v CPS*³⁵⁶ stated that the principle enunciated in Jaggard ought to be construed narrowly. In Magee, D was found guilty of failing to stop after an accident, contrary to s 170(4) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. At the time the accident occurred, D was intoxicated and as a result of her intoxicated state the magistrates found that she had a genuine belief that there had been no accident. D was nevertheless convicted. Relying upon Jaggard, D argued that a mistaken view of the circumstances, even if induced by drink, could constitute a defence as long as the defendant genuinely did not believe an accident had occurred. Rejecting this proposition, Elias LJ held that the continuing validity of Jaggard is questionable, given subsequent developments in the case law.³⁵⁷ His lordship further held that the onus was on D to negate the natural inference that once the accident had occurred she would have been aware of it. It was observed that there was no reason why the common law should be construed so as to allow D to pray in aid her own state of drunkenness as the reason for the mistake, and there was every reason of policy why it should not be extended in that way. This case demonstrates that even though the Law Commission's recommendations have not been acted upon, the courts will actively work to confine the scope of Jaggard, which, for the reasons already given, is welcome.

9.4.5.2 Self-defence

In relation to self-defence, the law has gone quite the other way from Jaggard. It is now settled that when D sets up self-defence, he is to be judged on the facts as he believed them to be, whether reasonably or not.³⁵⁸ However, a mistake arising from voluntary intoxication cannot be relied upon, according to *O'Grady*³⁵⁹ and Hatton, even on a charge of murder or other crime requiring specific intent. This has now been endorsed by Parliament in s 76(5) of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008.

In O'Grady, this conclusion was plainly obiter because the appellant had been acquitted of murder and was appealing only against his conviction for manslaughter; but in O'Connor,³⁶⁰ the court, inexplicably, treated it as binding, while quashing the conviction of murder on ³⁵³ Smith (DR) [1974] QB 354, [1974] 1 All ER 632, [1974] Crim LR 101.

³⁵⁴ ibid.

³⁵⁵ LC 314, para 2.94.

³⁵⁶ [2014] EWHC 4089 (Admin), [34].

³⁵⁷ At [33]–[36].

³⁵⁸ Gladstone Williams [1987] 3 All ER 411, 78 Cr App R 276, [1984] Crim LR 163, p 383.

³⁵⁹ [1987] QB 995, [1987] 3 All ER 420, [1987] Crim LR 706 criticized by the Law Commission, LC 177, para 8.42, by H Milgate (1987) 46 CLJ 381 and JC Smith [1987] Crim LR 706. Relied upon in Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281, [2012] Crim LR 612 as an example of the 'general approach' that English law takes to intoxication.

³⁶⁰ [1991] Crim LR 135; cf Hatton [2005] EWCA Crim 2951, [2006] Crim LR 353.

another ground. This was followed in Hatton. H who had drunk more than 20 pints of beer killed V with at least seven blows from a sledgehammer. H stated that he could not recall V's death but that he had a vague recollection that a stick fashioned in the shape of a samurai sword had been involved. H said that he believed that V had hit him with the stick and that he must have believed that V was attacking him. H wished to raise self-defence based on his own mistaken belief that he thought he was being attacked by an SAS officer (as V had earlier pretended to be) with a sword. The Court of Appeal, upholding his conviction, confirmed that the decision in O'Grady applied equally to cases of manslaughter and murder: a defendant seeking to rely on self-defence could not rely on a mistake induced by voluntary intoxication.³⁶¹ The case is controversial in extending the scope of O'Grady to murder, and in accepting unequivocally that the decisions in O'Connor and O'Grady were binding (but not, implicitly, feeling bound by Gladstone Williams). It is now beyond doubt by s 76(5).

As a matter of principle, this approach is flawed in a number of ways. First, it contradicts the approach taken in relation to mistakes in self-defence. If D has made a genuine but unreasonable mistake as to the need for force, he will be judged on the facts as he unreasonably believed them to be. If this is so when D is sober, logically it ought to be so when he is intoxicated since his intoxication explains the basis for the unreasonableness of his mistake. (The Law Commission rejects this argument in its report (at para 3.59).) Secondly, it is inconsistent with the application of the rules relating to specific and basic intent for offences. If D is charged with murder and pleads that he was so intoxicated that he did not form an intent, he is, if believed, entitled to an acquittal on that specific intent charge. In short, a killing in a state of voluntary intoxication is manslaughter. However, when D's intoxicated mistake to self-defence is pleaded it results in a murder conviction.

In cases of householder self-defence, Sir Brian Leveson P questioned, obiter, whether the same approach to intoxication should apply.³⁶² His lordship said this because the common law (preserved by s 76 of the 2008 Act) requires an approach which it is at least arguable is unduly restrictive for householders. There is much to be said for the proposition that those who go about in public (or anywhere outside their own homes) must take responsibility for their level of intoxication: thus by s 76(5) of the 2008 Act, a defendant cannot rely on any mistaken belief attributable to intoxication that was voluntarily induced. Why that should be so in the defendant's own home in circumstances where he is not anticipating any interaction with a trespasser is, perhaps, a more open question but that remains part of the test even in a householder case.

The law could have taken a different approach and said that D could be convicted of manslaughter by gross negligence if the jury judge his unreasonable mistake as to the need for force as a grossly negligent mistake (which a drunken mistake almost certainly is).³⁶³ If self-defence is a defence to murder it does not necessarily follow that it needs to be a defence to manslaughter.

The Court of Appeal, in a purely policy-driven series of decisions, has created inconsistencies in an attempt to ensure that D cannot plead intoxicated self-defence: the basis for this seems to be a fear that jurors would acquit of all offences.³⁶⁴ These decisions are difficult to defend. The court's attention does not appear to have been drawn to the recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee, which complements those which the court ³⁶¹ See Hatton [2005] EWCA Crim 2951. Note also the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, s 76(5) which precludes D relying on a mistake in such circumstances which was attributable to him being voluntarily intoxicated. See also LC 314, paras 2.54–2.61.

³⁶² See Collins [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin), discussed in full in the next chapter.

³⁶³ By Smith [1987] Crim LR 706. Cf the rejection arguments in LC 314, paras 3.59–3.64.

³⁶⁴ See the critical comments by A Ashworth [2006] Crim LR 353; JR Spencer (2006) 65 CLJ 267; G Dingwall (2007) 70 MLR 127.

followed in Gladstone Williams.³⁶⁵ The more logical view, it is submitted, is that a mistake arising from voluntary intoxication by alcohol or dangerous drugs ought to found a defence to crime requiring specific intent but not to one of basic intent if the prosecution prove that but for the intoxication the defendant would not have made the mistake.

9.4.5.3 Intoxication and partial defences to murder

The relevance of voluntary intoxication and alcohol dependence syndrome for the partial defences to murder (loss of control and diminished responsibility) is considered in Ch 13, p 545 and p 554.

9.4.6 Intoxication induced with the intention of committing crime

We now turn to consider the rare situation where D, intending to commit a crime, takes drink or drugs in order to give himself ‘Dutch courage’ and then commits the crime, having, at the time of the act, induced a state of drunkenness as to negative a ‘specific intent’. The problem was raised by A-G for Northern Ireland v Gallagher.³⁶⁶ D, having decided to kill his wife, bought a knife and a bottle of whisky. He drank much of the whisky and then killed his wife with the knife. The defence was that he was either insane or so drunk that he did not form the necessary intent at the time he did the act. The Court of Criminal Appeal in Northern Ireland reversed his conviction for murder on the ground that the judge had misdirected the jury in telling them to apply the M’Naghten Rules to D’s state of mind at the time before he took the alcohol and not at the time of committing the act. The majority of the House of Lords apparently did not dissent from the view of the Court of Criminal Appeal that such a direction would be ‘at variance with the specific terms of the M’Naghten Rules which definitely fix the crucial time as the time of committing the act’.³⁶⁷ They differed, however, in their interpretation of the summing up and held that it did direct the jury’s attention to the time of committing the act. In that case, of course, it was not necessary to decide the problem because the jury, by their verdict, had found that D had mens rea and was not insane. Lord Denning, however, seems to have taken the view that the Court of Criminal Appeal’s interpretation of the summing up was correct and that the direction, so interpreted, was right in law. He said:³⁶⁸

My Lords, I think the law on this point should take a clear stand. If a man, whilst sane and sober, forms an intention to kill and makes preparation for it knowing it is a wrong thing to do, and then gets himself drunk so as to give himself Dutch courage to do the killing, and whilst drunk carries out his intention, he cannot rely on this self-induced drunkenness as a defence to a charge of murder, nor even as reducing it to manslaughter. He cannot say he got himself into such a stupid state that he was incapable of an intent to kill. So also, when he is a psychopath, he cannot by drinking rely on his self-induced defect of reason as a defence of insanity. The wickedness of his mind before he got drunk is enough to condemn him, coupled with the act which he intended to do and did do.

The difficulty about this is that an intention to do an act some time in the future is not mens rea.³⁶⁹ The mens rea must generally coincide with the conduct which causes the actus reus. If D, being sober, resolves to murder his wife at midnight, drops off to sleep and, while still asleep, strangles her at midnight, it is thought that he is not guilty of murder. The case of deliberately induced drunkenness, however, is probably different. The true analogy, it is thought, is the case where a man D uses an innocent agent as an instrument with which to commit crime. It has been seen³⁷⁰ that if D induces X to kill, D is guilty of murder if X is ³⁶⁵ See n 358.

³⁶⁶ [1963] AC 349.

³⁶⁷ See [1963] AC 349 at 376.

³⁶⁸ [1963] AC 349 at 382.

³⁶⁹ See p 125.

³⁷⁰ See p 182.

an innocent agent. Is not the position substantially the same where D induces in himself a state of irresponsibility with the intention that he shall kill while in that state?³⁷¹ Should not the responsible D be liable for the foreseen and intended acts of the irresponsible D? Regarded in this way, a conviction would not be incompatible with the wording of the M'Naghten Rules. The result, certainly, seems to be one required by policy and it is thought the courts will achieve it if the problem should be squarely raised before them.

9.4.7 Reform of intoxication

England is becoming isolated in clinging to the Majewski principle.³⁷² Its abolition elsewhere does not seem to have led, as some anticipated, to increased crime or a collapse in respect for the law.³⁷³ The Law Commission in a Consultation Paper published in 1993 reached a provisional conclusion that Majewski should be abolished.³⁷⁴ The radical proposal was to introduce a new offence of criminal intoxication which would reflect more appropriately, in terms of label, the responsibility of the individual who commits a crime in a state of voluntary intoxication.³⁷⁵ The consultation, however, persuaded the Commission to change its mind. In LC 229 it was recommended³⁷⁶ that the rule be codified with minor amendment and attempted clarification, but in a draft Bill so complex that it is impossible to commend it.³⁷⁷ That has not been taken forward. The Home Office then proposed a simplified model which it intended to enact in relation to offences against the person. That too has not been taken forward.³⁷⁸

The Law Commission's latest proposals in LC 314 would have provided a statutory framework, replacing the specific/basic intent distinction. The replacement for the 'specific intent' rule is to create a statutory list of 'integral fault elements' (intention, knowledge, belief, fraud and dishonesty), and if D is charged with an offence with such an 'integral fault element' D will only be liable if the prosecution proves he had the relevant fault element despite being voluntarily intoxicated (para 3.42). The general rule for all other offences (eg those requiring recklessness) is that if D was voluntarily intoxicated he will be treated 'as having been aware at the material time of anything which D would then have been aware of but for the intoxication' (para 3.35). This effectively replaces the basic intent rule. In relation to D's mistakes induced by voluntary intoxication, D's mistaken belief should be taken into account only if D would have held the same belief if D had not been intoxicated (para 3.53). If D's intoxication is involuntary (administered without consent or under duress or under proper medical instruction or without knowledge that it was an intoxicant) or 'almost entirely involuntary', that can be considered in all cases where D is charged with a crime of subjective fault (paras 3.105–3.126). Separate complex rules are proposed in relation to secondary and inchoate liability (paras 3.85–3.104).³⁷⁹ The then-government rejected the Law Commission's recommendations and stated that it would not be taking them forward.

³⁷¹ See the discussion in Ch 2, p 37.

³⁷² For extended discussion of the options for reform, see R Williams, 'Voluntary Intoxication—A Lost Cause?' (2013) 129 LQR 264. She suggests a new offence of 'committing the actus reus of offence X while intoxicated'. For critique see J Child, 'Prior Fault: Blocking Defences or Constructing Crimes' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2014).

³⁷³ G Orchard, 'Surviving without Majewski' [1993] Crim LR 426.

³⁷⁴ LCCP 127 (1993).

³⁷⁵ For a defence, see G Virgo, 'Reconciling Principle and Policy' [1993] Crim LR 415; for criticism, see S Gardner, 'The Importance of Majewski' (1994) 14 OJLS 279.

³⁷⁶ LC 229 (1995). See J Horder, 'Sobering Up' (1995) 58 MLR 534; E Paton, 'Reformulating the Intoxication Rule' [1995] Crim LR 382.

³⁷⁷ See S Gough, 'Intoxication and Criminal Liability' (1996) 112 LQR 335.

³⁷⁸ See JC Smith, 'Offences Against the Person: The Home Office Consultation Paper' [1998] Crim LR 317.

³⁷⁹ For critical comment see J Child, 'Drink, Drugs and Law Reform' [2009] Crim LR 488.

The Code Team's report³⁸⁰ to the Commission offered a simpler scheme. Other proposals for a via media have been made³⁸¹ but have not attracted support and are not pursued here.

The Law Commission's latest reform proposals for insanity and automatism do have one impact on intoxication. Under the Commission's proposed scheme, a defendant would be treated as pleading the new recognized medical condition defence if: he suffered from a recognized medical condition; took properly authorized medication for that condition and in accordance with the prescription (or in circumstances in which it was reasonable to take it); had no reason to believe he would suffer an adverse reaction; but suffered a total lack of a relevant capacity (see earlier).

9.5 Combined, consecutive and concurrent causes of loss of capacity

The internal and external factors which cause an individual defendant to lack capacity may operate consecutively or concurrently.³⁸² There is little authority on the complex questions which may arise and such as there is does not seem well thought out. From a theoretical perspective, Loughnan and Wake argue that co-morbidity poses two main issues.³⁸³ The first relates to defendants who might have committed an offence whilst both mentally ill and intoxicated: D's mental illness might have been diagnosed prior to his committing the offence, or it may only have been stimulated by his intoxicated state. The second issue relates to defendants whose ingestion of an intoxicating substance has led them to develop some mental impairment. Their thesis is that the law currently places too much emphasis upon the cause of D's incapacity and does so in an inconsistent fashion. This part of the chapter will demonstrate that this issue poses practical problems in addition to theoretical ones. Some answers to the questions which may arise are suggested here.

9.5.1 Consecutive operation

9.5.1.1 Intoxication causes automatism

D, because he is drunk, sustains concussion and does the allegedly criminal act in a state of automatism resulting from the concussion. In Stripp,³⁸⁴ the Court of Appeal thought, obiter, that D should be acquitted on the ground of automatism. That seems right—the intoxication is too remote from the act. The Law Commission concluded that the case suggests 'obiter, the possibility that where there is a course of automatism clearly separable in time or effect from the intoxication and supported by a foundation of evidence, then a defence of automatism may be available, but when the causal factors are less easily separable it would seem that the presence of the intoxication will on policy grounds adopted in Majewski exclude reliance on automatism'.³⁸⁵ Distinguishing the degree of separateness of the factors will not always be easy.

³⁸⁰ LC 143 (1985) cl 26. ³⁸¹ See the 7th edition of this book, at p 230.

³⁸² For a discussion of the relationship between these defences see LCDP, Ch 6.

³⁸³ A Loughnan and N Wake, 'Of Blurred Boundaries and Prior Fault: Insanity, Automatism and Intoxication' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2014).

³⁸⁴ (1979) 69 Cr App R 318, 323, CA. No foundation for automatism was laid.

³⁸⁵ LCCP 127, para 2.33, Report (LC 143), para 6.44.LC 314, para 2.90.

9.5.1.2 Automatism causes intoxication

D having sustained concussion, drinks a bottle of vodka under the impression that it is water and does the allegedly criminal act, not knowing what he is doing because he is intoxicated. Since the intoxication is involuntary, both causes lead to an acquittal and D must be acquitted.

9.5.1.3 Intoxication causes insanity

Beard settles that insanity caused by drink operates in the same manner as insanity arising from any other cause. If excessive drinking causes actual insanity, such as delirium tremens, then the M'Naghten Rules will be applied in exactly the same way as where insanity arises from any other causes: 'drunkenness is one thing and the diseases to which drunkenness leads are different things; and if a man by drunkenness brings on a state of disease which causes such a degree of madness, even for a time, which would have relieved him from responsibility if it had been caused in any other way, then he would not be criminally responsible.'³⁸⁶

It has already been seen³⁸⁷ that there are serious difficulties in defining a 'disease of the mind' and the distinction between temporary insanity induced by drink and simple drunkenness is far from clear-cut. The distinction becomes important in the case of a person who does not know that his act is wrong because of excessive drinking. If he is suffering from temporary insanity he is entitled to a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity; but if he is merely drunk he should be convicted.³⁸⁸

9.5.1.4 Insanity causes intoxication or automatism

'Insanity' in the M'Naghten sense can strictly have no application here because it applies only in relation to a particular criminal act, whereas getting drunk or causing oneself concussion is probably not a criminal act at all and certainly not the criminal act with which we are concerned. However, D may not know the nature and quality of the act which causes the condition. The resulting intoxication is involuntary, so D should be acquitted. Insofar as automatism is caused by insanity, it is the result of an internal cause which looks as if the net result should be not guilty on the ground of insanity; but it would seem odd that, if D's insanity leads him to drink excessively, he should be acquitted absolutely whereas if it causes him to bang his head against a wall until he does not know what he is doing he should be subject to restraint. Policy may be best served by a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity in both cases.

9.5.1.5 Automatism causes insanity

Such cases will surely be rare, but, if one should arise, probably the answer should be as in the case where automatism and insanity are concurrent causes and for the same reason.³⁸⁹

9.5.2 Concurrent operation

9.5.2.1 Intoxication and automatism

The circumstances of non-insane automatism being pleaded where D's level of intoxication renders him an automaton are discussed earlier (p 329).

³⁸⁶ Davis (1881) 14 Cox CC 563 at 564, per Stephen J approved by the House of Lords in DPP v Beard [1920] AC 479 at 501. For discussion, see P Handler, 'Intoxication and Criminal Responsibility in England, 1819–1920' (2013) 33 OJLS 243. See also Coley [2013] EWCA Crim 223, [15].

³⁸⁷ See p 292.

³⁸⁸ 'In a case of simple drunkenness the judge should not introduce the question whether the prisoner knew he was doing wrong—for it is a dangerous and confusing question'—per Lord Birkenhead in DPP v Beard [1920] AC 479 at 506. Note that in the Scottish case of Finegan v Heywood 2000 JC 444, (2000) The Times, 10 May, a defence of sleepwalking triggered by intoxication was treated as not being one of 'automatism'.

³⁸⁹ See p 331.

9.5.2.2 Intoxication and insanity

D does not know what he is doing, partly because of a disease of the mind and partly because he is drunk. The choice is (or should be) between a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity and, in a crime not requiring specific intent, one of guilty. Two difficult cases cast doubt on this and illustrate the difficulty in dealing with combined causes in practice.

In Burns,³⁹⁰ D was charged with indecent assault, a crime not requiring specific intent. He may not have been aware of what he was doing, partly because of brain damage and partly because of drink and drugs. It is unclear whether the drugs were prescribed to D.³⁹¹ The court accepted that if D did not know what he was doing, he was entitled to an absolute acquittal. If the only causes are alcohol and insanity it is difficult to see how this can be right, since neither of the concurrent causes entitled D to be absolutely acquitted. If the causes are alcohol, prescribed drugs and insanity the position is more complex. Since the crime is one of basic intent, it is arguable that the fact that D was taking non-dangerous drugs requires the prosecution to establish that D was not reckless in becoming aggressive and unpredictable.³⁹² Williams took the view that in such a case insanity was the correct verdict,³⁹³ and analogy with Beard might suggest that this is the right verdict, but the House of Lords in *A-G for Northern Ireland v Gallagher*³⁹⁴ thought otherwise, unless the alcohol caused some quite different type of disease, such as delirium tremens.³⁹⁵

9.5.2.3 Automatism and insanity

In Roach,³⁹⁶ the Court of Appeal adopted a more pragmatic approach, focusing on which of the multiple concurrent causes of the lack of control was dominant. D was convicted of wounding with intent to cause grievous bodily harm having attacked V with a knife after a minor dispute. D claimed to have no knowledge or memory of the incident. D claimed that his voluntary intoxication by alcohol, coupled with his prescribed drugs might have had some causative effect on his latent mental illness being triggered leading to his lack of awareness. The expert evidence described a 'disease of the mind' and not surprisingly that was treated by the prosecution as the basis of a plea of insanity. Defence counsel argued that the 'disease of the mind' should lead to a defence of automatism, but the judge did not leave that defence to the jury.³⁹⁷ The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. It was accepted that automatism was sufficiently widely defined that if external factors were operative on an 'underlying condition which would not otherwise produce a state of automatism', then a defence of non-insane automatism ought to be left to the jury.³⁹⁸ The court considered this to be a borderline case as identified in Quick, where the 'transitory effect caused by the application to the body of some external factor such as violence, drugs etc cannot fairly be said to be due to disease'. With respect, it is not clear that this is a faithful application of that principle. In Quick, the lack of control was due to hypoglycaemia, caused by taking insulin (an external event) on an underlying internal condition (diabetes). Is it true to say (as the Court of Appeal would) that the underlying condition in Quick would not otherwise have produced a state of automatism if the insulin had not been administered? Surely it would. D would have gone into a hyperglycaemic state if he had not taken the insulin. The state ³⁹⁰ (1973) 58 Cr App R 364, [1975] Crim LR 155 and commentary.

³⁹¹ In early editions of this work, it was suggested that the combination of the causes was intoxication and insanity alone. Mackay, Mental Condition Defences, at 158 criticizes that narrow view of the facts.

³⁹² See Mackay, ibid, 159.

³⁹³ TBCL, 681. ³⁹⁴ [1963] AC 349, [1961] 3 All ER 299, p 327 (effect of drink on a psychopath).

³⁹⁵ See p 554 for discussion of intoxication and the new diminished responsibility defence and Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281 in which the Court of Appeal held that acute intoxication is not a 'recognized medical condition' for the purposes of the defence.

³⁹⁶ [2001] EWCA Crim 2698.

³⁹⁷ At [17].

³⁹⁸ At [28].

of automatism which would have resulted if the underlying condition had been left to its own devices would be hyperglycaemia, which is different from the state of automatism that resulted from the insulin—hypoglycaemia—but does that matter?

The court seems to accord precedence to the prescribed drugs rather than the internal cause and the voluntary intoxication. The lack of control seems to have been a combination of: (a) the ‘psychogenic’ personality (which would alone result in a special verdict); (b) prescribed drugs (which alone if taken as per the prescription would have resulted in acquittal); and (c) the voluntary intoxication (which on a specific intent charge such as this could have resulted in acquittal). It is submitted that the decision in Roach should be approached with considerable caution. It may be regarded as correctly decided on its facts since the judge gave confusing directions as to the relevant burdens of proof.³⁹⁹

9.6 Mistake

The rules relating to mistake are simply an application of the general principle that the prosecution must prove its case, including the mens rea or negligence which the definition of the crime requires and rebuttal of excuses raised. The so-called ‘defence’ is simply a denial that the prosecution has proved its case. Accordingly, only mistakes which relate to an issue which the prosecution have to prove will have any bearing on D’s liability.

9.6.1 Mistakes as denials of mens rea

The ‘landmark decision’⁴⁰⁰ in DPP v Morgan endorsed by the House of Lords in DPP v B,⁴⁰¹ holds that D’s mistake of fact will result in acquittal in all crimes of mens rea where it prevents D from possessing the relevant mens rea which the law requires for the crime with which he is charged. It is not a question of defence, but of denial of mens rea. As Lord Hailsham explains in Morgan:

Once one has accepted...that the prohibited act is [x], and that the guilty state of mind is an intention to commit [x], it seems to me to follow as a matter of inexorable logic that there is no room either for a defence of honest belief or mistake, or of a defence of honest and reasonable belief or mistake. Either the prosecution proves that the accused had the requisite intention, or it does not. In the former case it succeeds, and in the latter it fails.⁴⁰²

Historically, mistake had been treated as a special defence and there were many dicta by eminent judges that only reasonable mistakes would excuse.⁴⁰³ Lord Lane CJ⁴⁰⁴ and the House of Lords,⁴⁰⁵ in the light of Morgan, doubted these pronouncements and the House in *B v DPP*⁴⁰⁶ made it very clear that they are wrong.

³⁹⁹ The Law Commission considers the effect of its proposals on insanity and automatism on intoxication and successive and concurrent causes in LCDP, pp 145–148.

⁴⁰⁰ [1976] AC 182. It has been described by Professor Farmer as a ‘curious form of landmark case’. See L Farmer, ‘DPP v Morgan’ in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017).

⁴⁰¹ And subsequently by its ringing endorsement in K [2002] 1 AC 462 and G [2003] UKHL 50.

⁴⁰² Per Lord Hailsham at 214. For a powerful critique see J Horder, ‘Cognition, Emotion and Criminal Culpability’ (1990) 106 LQR 469.

⁴⁰³ See, for historical accounts, E Keedy, ‘Ignorance and Mistake in the Criminal Law’ (1908) 22 Harv LR 75; Williams, CLGP, Ch 5; Hall, General Principles, Ch XI; G Williams, ‘Homicide and the Supernatural’ (1949) 65 LQR 491; C Howard, ‘The Reasonableness of Mistake in the Criminal Law’ (1961) 4 Univ QJL 45.

⁴⁰⁴ Taaffe [1983] 2 All ER 625, 628.

⁴⁰⁵ Westminster City Council v Croyalgrange Ltd [1986] 2 All ER 353 at 399.

⁴⁰⁶ See particularly Lord Nicholls at [2000] 1 All ER 836–839.

9.6.1.1 Evidence and proof

It should not be imagined that all D has to do is say 'I made a genuine mistake' to be acquitted. The reasonableness of his conduct will be important in evidential terms. Where the natural inference from D's conduct in the particular circumstances is that he intended or foresaw a particular result, the jury are very likely to convict him if he introduces no testimony that he did not in fact foresee; but the onus of proof remains throughout on the Crown and, technically, D does not bear even an evidential burden.⁴⁰⁷ Although D's belief need not be reasonable to excuse him, as a matter of practice, the more unreasonable it is, the less likely the jury is to accept that it was genuinely held.

9.6.1.2 Mistakes in crimes of subjective mens rea

Where the law requires intention, knowledge, belief or subjective recklessness with respect to some element in the actus reus, a mistake, whether reasonable or not, which precludes that state of mind will excuse D. The fact that a genuine though unreasonable mistake will negate D's mens rea or provide an excuse stems from the courts' endorsement of subjectivism in mens rea. Obviously, if a particular crime requires D's mens rea as to the proscribed conduct, circumstance or result to be based on his subjective intentions or beliefs, and because of a mistake of fact the intentions or beliefs D holds do not relate to the proscribed conduct, circumstance or result, D cannot be liable. Thus, where D genuinely though unreasonably believes that the thing he is shooting at is a scarecrow and not a human, he will lack the mens rea for murder—an intention to kill or do grievous bodily harm to a person in being.

Many commentators have suggested that the wholesale application of the subjectivist principles in the context of mistake is too simplistic an approach.⁴⁰⁸ For example, in the context of sexual offences and consent, the ease with which D can ascertain the consent of his partner and the gravity of the harm done if the sexual act is non-consensual suggest that D's mistakes as to consent should be assessed objectively. This is in fact what Parliament has required in the Sexual Offences Act 2003. Beyond sexual cases, it can be argued that where D's mistake is unreasonable, in the sense that 'holding it or acting on it in a particular situation displays an unreasonable lack of the kind of respect and concern for others that the law demands' it should not lead to acquittal.⁴⁰⁹ However, the present law generally adopts the subjectivist stance as stated in Morgan and DPP v B. As Lord Nicholls observed in B v DPP, 'considered as a matter of principle, the honest belief approach must be preferable. By definition the mental element in crime is concerned with a subjective state of mind such as intent or belief.'⁴¹⁰

9.6.1.3 Mistakes and crimes of negligence

Where the law requires only negligence in respect of an element of the actus reus, then only a reasonable mistake can afford a defence; for an unreasonable mistake, by definition, is one which a reasonable person would not make and is, therefore, a negligent one.⁴¹¹ In cases

⁴⁰⁷ G Williams, 'The Evidential Burden' (1977) 127 NLJ 156 at 158. But there is an evidential burden on D to get a particular mistake before the jury. 'Mistake is a defence in the sense that it is raised as an issue by the accused. The Crown is rarely possessed of knowledge of the subjective factors which may have caused an accused to entertain a belief in a fallacious set of facts': Pappajohn v R (1980) 52 CCC (2d) 481 at 494, per Dickson J. The judge does not have to direct the jury in every case of murder: 'You must be satisfied that D did not believe V was a turkey'; but he must give such a direction if D has testified that, when he fired, he thought V was a turkey.

⁴⁰⁸ See Horder (1990) 106 LQR 469; Horder, APOCL, 237–240; R Tur, 'Subjectivism and Objectivism: Towards Synthesis' in S Shute, J Gardner and J Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) 213; P Alldridge, Relocating Criminal Law (2000) 88.

⁴⁰⁹ Duff, Answering for Crime, 294.

⁴¹⁰ For criticism see J Horder, 'How Culpability Can and Cannot be Denied in Under-Age Sex Crimes' [2001] Crim LR 15, arguing that D's mistake should be relevant if it relates to his 'guiding moral reason'.

⁴¹¹ See Ch 4.

of gross negligence manslaughter, D's unreasonable mistake may excuse provided it is not regarded by the jury as a grossly unreasonable mistake. Parliament may, of course, specify in relation to any crime that only reasonable beliefs will excuse. An example of this is the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (see Ch 17).

9.6.1.4 Mistakes in crimes of strict liability

Where a crime is interpreted as imposing strict liability, then even a reasonable mistake as to that element of the actus reus for which liability is strict will not excuse. It is an oversimplification to say that mistakes are irrelevant in strict liability crimes since there are few such crimes in which every element of actus reus is regarded as strict.⁴¹² Thus, in a sexual offence such as sexual assault on a child under 13 where liability as to the age of the victim is strict, D will still have to be proved to have intentionally touched V. Where he claims that because of a mistake he had not meant intentionally to touch a person, he will be denying mens rea, and an honest mistake will excuse. If he claims to have made a mistake about age, that is irrelevant because liability as to age is strict.

Bigamy: a special case?

On the explanation so far, the application of the principles of mistake would seem to be straightforward. However, there are skeletons lurking in the common law cupboard which suggest that in some cases D's mistake as to an element of actus reus must always be reasonable to provide an excuse. One particular problem relates to the cases on bigamy. In Morgan, the House of Lords showed no inclination to interfere with the line of authority⁴¹³ which asserted that D's mistaken belief in the death of his first spouse, or the dissolution or nullity of his first marriage, was a defence only where that mistake was reasonable. But in B v DPP, Lord Nicholls expressly disapproved of the requirement of reasonableness of belief in the leading bigamy case of Tolson.⁴¹⁴ It is submitted that a genuine though unreasonable belief ought now to be a sufficient excuse on a charge of bigamy.

In general terms the Tolson approach may be tolerable where we are concerned with so-called 'quasi-criminal', 'regulatory' or 'welfare' offences; but it should have no place in serious crimes—and, after B v DPP, K and G it seems less likely to do so, as discussed in Ch 5.

9.6.1.5 Identifying the relevant mistake

What the discussion on bigamy exposes is the broader problem in many crimes of identifying which elements of actus reus require a corresponding mens rea requirement. In many serious offences there will usually be a strong if not complete correspondence; that is, that elements of the actus reus will each have corresponding elements of mens rea to be proved. For example, in Westminster City Council v Croyalgrange Ltd,⁴¹⁵ Robert Goff LJ referred to 'the ordinary principle that, where it is required that an offence should have been knowingly committed, the requisite knowledge must embrace all the elements of the offence'. On orthodox subjective principles intention, knowledge, belief or recklessness is required as to all the elements of the actus reus unless that is excluded expressly or by implication; and the more serious the crime, the more reluctant should the court be to find an implied exclusion.⁴¹⁶

⁴¹² See SP Green, 'Six Senses of Strict Liability' in Simester, Appraising Strict Liability, Ch 1.

⁴¹³ Tolson (1889) 23 QBD 168, CCR; King [1964] 1 QB 285; Gould [1968] 2 QB 65. As the opinions in Morgan relating to defences have been reconsidered so too may the opinions regarding bigamy, if the matter ever arises. The House also accepted the requirement of reasonable grounds for believing the use of force to be necessary in self-defence, but see Beckford and Williams.

⁴¹⁴ (1889) 23 QB 168 CCR. ⁴¹⁵ [1986] 83 Cr App R 155, [1986] Crim LR 693.

⁴¹⁶ There are, admittedly, many exceptions to this principle. LCCP 195, Criminal Liability in Regulatory Contexts (2010) also contains discussion of the significance of this principle and of the hierarchy of mens rea, see the discussion in Ch 5.

9.6.1.6 Summary

The most logical approach to mistakes is, it is submitted: (a) to identify the relevant mistake D claims to have made; (b) identify to which element of the actus reus of the offence it relates; (c) ascertain what mens rea, if any, attaches to that element of the actus reus in dispute; (d) apply the relevant rule as stated in the previous paragraphs: if the mens rea element is subjective D is entitled to acquittal on a genuine mistake; if it is objective/negligence, D's mistake must be a reasonable one to lead to acquittal; if liability on that element of actus reus is strict, D's mistake is irrelevant.

9.6.2 Mistakes and defences

The House of Lords in Morgan also left untouched the traditional requirement that mistakes as to the elements of defences had to be reasonable if they were to operate to excuse the accused. Morgan, although a case on the mens rea for rape and for that purpose no longer good law, was a landmark case in relation to mistake generally, for which it remains an authority for offences with subjective elements. In Beckford v R, the Privy Council recognized this:

Looking back, Morgan can now be seen as a landmark decision in the development of the common law, returning the law to the path upon which it might have developed but for the inability of an accused to give evidence on his own behalf.⁴¹⁷

Beckford v R is itself of great importance in that it takes the principle of Morgan even further than the majority of the House were, at that time, prepared to go. In Morgan, the plea was a simple denial of the prosecution's case relating to the elements of the offence. By charging rape, the prosecution alleged that D had intercourse with a woman who did not consent and that he either knew that she did not consent or was reckless (at that time subjective recklessness was the prescribed mens rea for rape) whether she did so. D denied that he knew or was reckless, as alleged.

Where on the other hand D pleads a true defence, D admits the allegations made by the prosecution about actus reus and mens rea but asserts further facts which, in law, justify or excuse his action. Self-defence is an example. D admits that he intentionally killed or wounded V but asserts that he did so because V was making a deadly attack on him and this was the only way he could save his own life. It may transpire that D was mistaken. V was not in fact making a deadly attack. The courts, until the 1980s, were consistent in asserting that the defence failed if there were no reasonable grounds for his belief. The majority of the House of Lords in Morgan did not intend to interfere with defences. They were concerned with a mistake as to an element of the offence. Beckford related to a mistake as to an element of a defence. The Privy Council rejected any distinction. The Board followed Morgan and approved the ruling of Lord Lane CJ in Gladstone Williams.⁴¹⁸ Discussing the offence of assault, he said:

The mental element necessary to constitute guilt is the intent to apply unlawful force to the victim. We do not believe that the mental element can be substantiated by simply showing an intent to apply force and no more.⁴¹⁹

If D believed, reasonably or not, in the existence of facts which would justify the force used in self-defence, he did not intend to use unlawful force. Beckford clearly applies to all ⁴¹⁷ [1987] 3 All ER 425 at 431.

⁴¹⁸ [1987] 3 All ER 411, 78 Cr App R 276, CA.

⁴¹⁹ The HRA 1998, Art 2 (right to life), was thought by some to set a more demanding standard than 'honest belief', see Ch 10. See now Duggan [2014] EWHC 3343 (Admin) and Da Silva (2016) 63 EHRR 12.

instances of private defence.⁴²⁰ However, in duress, for example, the courts continue to state that D's belief in the alleged compelling facts must be based on reasonable grounds.⁴²¹ If, however, D is to be judged on the facts as he believed them to be when he sets up self-defence it is difficult to see why it is different in principle when he sets up duress. In both cases D is saying that, on the facts as he believed them to be, his act was not an offence. It is submitted that the principle of Beckford should be applicable to defences generally.

Since Beckford, *Albert v Lavin*⁴²² must be taken to be wrong in making a distinction in relation to assault between the definitional elements of an offence and the definitional elements of a defence. The same subjective test applies to both.

9.6.2.1 Summary

Whether the law recognizes the mistake made by D as to facts which if they existed would provide a valid defence, and whether in order to be recognized the mistake must be one of a reasonable or merely genuine nature, must be considered in the context of each defence (see the next chapter). Intoxicated mistake has been discussed previously (p 325).

The courts have adopted the subjective principle in some categories (eg self-defence),⁴²³ but not others (eg duress).⁴²⁴ Some commentators seek to distinguish the categories on the basis of whether the defence is one of a justificatory or excusatory kind, or whether the defence relates to a 'definitional element' of the offence. Since the law does not adopt such classifications, and they cannot be universally applied, it seems that these may confuse rather than illuminate matters.⁴²⁵

The correct approach to mistakes and defences is, it is submitted: (a) to identify the relevant mistake of fact the defendant claims to have made; (b) identify to which element of the defence it relates; (c) ascertain whether that element of the defence is one in which the courts have imposed an objective interpretation; (d) if the defence is one assessed objectively (eg the requirement of a reasonable belief in a threat of death or serious injury in duress) D will only be able to rely on the mistake if it is reasonable; if the element of the defence is subjective (eg the requirement that D believes in the need for force in private defence) he will be entitled to rely on the mistaken belief as to the facts even if unreasonable.

9.6.3 Irrelevant mistakes

A mistake which does not preclude mens rea (or negligence where that is in issue) is irrelevant and no defence. Suppose D believes he is smuggling a crate of Irish whiskey. In fact the crate contains Scotch whisky. Duty is, of course, chargeable on both. D believes he is importing a dutiable item and he is importing a dutiable item. The actus reus is the same whether the crate contains Irish or Scotch. He knows, because his belief and the facts coincide in this respect, that he is evading the duty chargeable on the goods in the crate. If D had believed the crate to contain only some non-dutiable item, for example foreign currency (even if he had mistakenly believed it was dutiable), he would have lacked the mens rea for the offence.⁴²⁶

⁴²⁰ See Ch 10.

⁴²¹ Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, see Ch 10.

⁴²² [1982] AC 546, DC.

⁴²³ Williams [1987] 3 All ER 441.

⁴²⁴ Graham [1982] 1 All ER 801; Hasan [2005] UKHL 22.

⁴²⁵ See TBCL, 138; Tur, 'Subjectivism and Objectivism: Towards Synthesis' in Shute, Gardner and Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law, 213.

⁴²⁶ See commentary on Taaffe [1983] Crim LR 536 at 537, CA; affd [1984] AC 539. See Forbes [2001] UKHL 40 where D believed he was importing prohibited goods (adult pornography) and he was importing prohibited goods (child pornography). D evaded the prohibition on imports and intended to do so. See also Matrix [1997] 8 Arch News.

A much misunderstood case is that of Taaffe.⁴²⁷ T imported 3.7 kilos of cannabis believing that he was importing large sums of money and that currency was subject to an import prohibition. The House of Lords upholding the decision of the Court of Appeal⁴²⁸ concluded that an accused is to be judged upon the facts as he believed them to be. Taaffe held two mistaken states of mind. His mistake of fact was that he was importing currency when he was in fact importing cannabis. His mistake of law was that he thought currency was subject to a prohibition. T's belief as to the fact meant that he was not knowingly importing prohibited goods at all. If the jury accepted as genuine his mistaken belief as to the facts, there would be no knowing importation of prohibited goods. This is analogous to the example used earlier of D shooting the scarecrow. On that basis his mistaken belief negated the mens rea. He could not be convicted of the substantive offence under s 170 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979.

T's mistaken belief as to the scope of criminal law is quite different. That belief could not, even if the jury accepted that he held it, have rendered him liable for importing the currency: there would be no criminal offence with which he could be charged either as a substantive offence under s 170 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 or an attempt under s 1 of the Criminal Attempt Act 1981. The criminal law, even when inchoate forms of offending are involved, cannot extend that far: if D visits England and believes that adultery is an offence, he cannot be liable for any crime by committing adultery while here, nor for attempting to do so (see Ch 11).

The case of Taaffe provides for a defence only where D's belief is that he is importing goods of a particular description which, if it were true, would mean that as a matter of law he was not in fact importing goods which were subject to any prohibition. This should be contrasted with a second category of case of mistake: that in which D believes that he is importing or attempting to import prohibited goods, but in fact he is importing something not subject to a prohibition or restriction. This is illustrated by the decision in Shivpuri discussed at p 497. Shivpuri believed he was importing one type of prohibited goods when he was importing harmless material. The House of Lords concluded that there was no difficulty in convicting him of an attempt to import the prohibited goods. The case is, in one sense, the converse of Taaffe. Where D makes a mistake of fact that, if believed, would mean that he was not knowingly importing prohibited goods, he is to be acquitted: Taaffe. Where D makes a mistake of fact that, if believed, would mean that he was importing goods subject to a prohibition, he can be convicted of an attempt to import those goods.

9.6.4 Mistakes of law

If D makes a mistake by thinking that some form of conduct is criminal when it is not, he cannot be guilty of an offence—there is no offence with which he can be charged, as in the example of the tourist who believes adultery is a crime in England.⁴²⁹ These are exceptional and unlikely ever to come to light. It does not apply where D refuses, however honestly, to accept the judgment of a court,⁴³⁰ just as it would be hopeless for him to argue that he did not accept the validity of an Act of Parliament.

Suppose that X obtains goods from V by fraud and gives them to D, who knows all the facts. We have already seen that it will not avail D to say he does not know handling stolen goods is a crime. Equally, it is thought it will not avail him to say that he did not know that it is against the criminal law to obtain goods by fraud and that goods so obtained are 'stolen' for this purpose. 'Stolen' is a concept of the criminal, not the civil, law and ignorance of it is no defence.

⁴²⁷ [1984] AC 539, HL. ⁴²⁸ (1983) 77 Cr App R 82, CA.

⁴²⁹ See DN Husak and A von Hirsch, 'Culpability in Mistake of Law' in Shute, Gardner and Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law.

⁴³⁰ ibid.

On the other hand, the 'leave' granted to a visitor to remain in the UK looks like a civil law concept, but the House of Lords has held that a mistake of law is no answer to a charge of knowingly remaining without leave.⁴³¹

9.6.4.1 Mistake of criminal law

If D mistakenly believes that conduct which is a crime in England is not criminal he will, generally, have no defence.⁴³² This is because usually knowledge that the act is forbidden by law is no part of mens rea.⁴³³ Where, for example, D, a visitor to England believes that his conduct is lawful because it does not constitute a crime in his homeland,⁴³⁴ he will have no defence if that conduct is an offence in England. The harshness of the rule is tempered somewhat by the fact that most serious criminal offences are also well recognized as moral 'wrongs'. However, it is no defence even where the crime is not one commonly known to be criminal. Thus, ignorance of any of the thousands of regulatory offences is no defence. This position is ameliorated only slightly by s 3(2) of the Statutory Instruments Act 1946 providing a defence for D charged with an offence created by Statutory Instrument to prove that, at the time of the offence, the instrument had not been published nor reasonable steps taken to bring its contents to the notice of the public or the accused.⁴³⁵ By analogy, where an offence in English law involves an issue of foreign law, it is arguable that D should only be liable if it is reasonable for him to discover that law.⁴³⁶ Andrew Ashworth has advanced a powerful argument against the present position. He suggests that the rule is based on shaky foundations, examines many circumstances in which the rule gives rise to unfairness and identifies government obligations to provide clearer criminal law.⁴³⁷

The arguments that every citizen should have access to a clear statement of the law is a constitutional principle supported by Art 7 of the ECHR. As Lord Bingham observed in Rimmington,⁴³⁸ 'Article 7 sustains [the] contention that a criminal offence must be clearly defined in law, and represents the operation of "the principle of legal certainty"'.⁴³⁹ The principle enables each community to regulate itself:

with reference to the norms prevailing in the society in which they live. That generally entails that the law must be adequately accessible—an individual must have an indication of the legal rules applicable in a given case—and he must be able to foresee the consequences of his actions, in particular to be able to avoid incurring the sanction of the criminal law.⁴⁴⁰

⁴³¹ Grant v Borg [1982] 1 WLR 638. ⁴³² See 127.

⁴³³ cf the comments of Lord Woolf in the appeal in the Privy Council in the Pitcairn case discussed later in this section: Christian v The Queen [2006] UKPC 47. His lordship stated that '[A]s in this case the appellants suffered no prejudice in view of their state of knowledge an argument based on abuse of process would not be established. It may be the case that the argument under this head could be freestanding and not based on abuse of process. However if this be so the need for prejudice would still be a requirement. The great majority of criminal offences require mens rea. If you do not know and are not put on notice that the conduct with which you are charged was criminal at the time you are alleged to have committed the offence, it can be the case that you do not have the necessary criminal intent' (emphasis added). For discussion, see D Oliver (ed), Justice, Legality and the Rule of Law: Lessons from the Pitcairn Prosecutions (2009) in which it is argued that the Crown lacked jurisdiction to bring the prosecutions and that they amounted to an abuse of process.

⁴³⁴ See Esop (1836) 7 C & P 456.

⁴³⁵ cf A Ashworth, 'Excusable Mistake of Law' [1974] Crim LR 652 and p 130. See for a comparison with some other European States taking a less strict approach, J Blomsa, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 466.

⁴³⁶ See eg the argument in relation to sex tourism where D in England might mistakenly believe that to have sex with a 15-year-old in the host country is not criminal in that country. See Alldridge, Relocating Criminal Law, 149, discussing the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Act 1996.

⁴³⁷ See p 127. ⁴³⁸ [2005] UKHL 63.

⁴³⁹ See eg Brumarescu v Romania (2001) 33 EHRR 35 at para 61 and Kokkinakis v Greece (1993) 17 EHRR 397 at para 52.

⁴⁴⁰ SW v UK; CR v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 363 (emphasis added).

The ease with which a defendant could discover the law, and whether he might rely on a mistake as to the scope of the law where it was not readily discoverable, were in issue in the prosecution of a number of men in the Pitcairn Islands for sexual abuse of young women on the islands. In Christian & others v The Queen (The Pitcairn Islands),⁴⁴¹ the defendants argued that the case should have been stayed as an abuse of process on the grounds, inter alia, that they did not know that English law applied and that they had no access on their remote Pacific island to English legal texts. Lord Woolf⁴⁴² accepted that:

it is a requirement of almost every modern system of criminal law, that persons who are intended to be bound by a criminal statute must first be given either actual or at least constructive notice of what the law requires. This is a requirement of the rule of law, which in relation to the criminal law reflects the need for legal certainty.

He had no difficulty with the principle of such an argument but found it had no application on the facts: it was clear that DD, although probably unaware of the terms of the Sexual Offences Act or even that there was legislation of that name or the sentences that could be imposed for those offences, were aware that their conduct was contrary to the criminal law. The moral wrong of rape and sexual abuse were so obvious that the claim of a lack of awareness of specific offences was irrelevant. Similarly, the Privy Council rejected the argument that the defendants could not have discovered the law had they tried⁴⁴³ because the precise terms of the Sexual Offences Act had not been published on the island. This was because the fact that there were offences such as rape and possibly indecent assault was generally known because they had to be dealt with by the Pitcairn Supreme Court, requiring as they did greater punishment than was otherwise possible.

Interestingly, Lord Woolf acknowledged that:

The sheer volume of the law in England, much of which would be inapplicable..., creates real problems of access even to lawyers unless they are experts in the particular field of law in question. The criminal law can only operate...if the onus is firmly placed on a person, who is or ought to be on notice that conduct he is intending to embark on may contravene the criminal law, to take the action that is open to him to find out what are the provisions of that law.⁴⁴⁴

This places the emphasis on the duty of the citizen to ascertain the law rather than on the State to bring the law to every citizen's attention.⁴⁴⁵

9.6.4.2 Erroneous advice given to D

Where D has relied on erroneous advice provided by the relevant State authority he may in some circumstances be successful in an application to stay proceedings as an abuse of process.⁴⁴⁶

⁴⁴¹ [2006] UKPC 47. See H Power, 'Pitcairn Island' [2007] Crim LR 609.

⁴⁴² At [40].

⁴⁴³ cf Lord Hope at [83] who had he not concluded that they were aware of the wrongs which were criminal at common law, would have granted a stay.

⁴⁴⁴ At [44], emphasis added.

⁴⁴⁵ See for discussion of some European States' approaches, J Blomsa, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 473.

⁴⁴⁶ See A Ashworth, 'Testing Fidelity to Legal Values' (2000) 63 MLR 633, 635–642 identifying the importance of Art 7 of the ECHR. One of the strongest examples is Postermobile v LBC (1997) 8 Dec, unreported, DC and the Editorial at [1998] Crim LR 435 (D receiving erroneous information from planning agency). See also G Williams, 'The Draft Code and Relevance of Official Statements' (1989) 9 LS 177. See for discussion of some European States' approaches, J Blomsa, Mens Rea and Defences in European Criminal Law (2012) 471.

9.6.5 Mistake of fact or law?

Identifying whether a mistake allegedly made by D is one of criminal law or fact is not always easy. For example, if D mistakenly believes that the person grabbing hold of him is a thug about to rob him and he resists, he has made a mistake of fact and cannot be guilty of assaulting with intent to resist arrest by what was in fact a police officer. Where, however, D is aware that the person who is grabbing him is a police officer, but mistakenly believes that the officer has no power of arrest on the facts as they exist, D has made a mistake of criminal law. But what of D who makes a mistake as to antecedent facts which, if they were as he believed them to be, would indeed preclude the officer's power of arrest?⁴⁴⁷

Where the mens rea involves some legal concept⁴⁴⁸ or the absence of a claim of right then mistake may negative mens rea and be a defence.

An honest though unreasonable mistake as to the civil law may lead to acquittal where it prevents D from holding the mens rea of the criminal offence. For example, in Smith (David),⁴⁴⁹ D damaged property in his rented flat believing it was his own property—he made a mistake as to the ownership of the property. His conviction for criminal damage was quashed since D had no intent to damage property belonging to another. His mistake as to ownership prevented him having the relevant mens rea. As James LJ explained:

Applying the ordinary principles of mens rea, the intention and recklessness and the absence of lawful excuse required to constitute the offence have reference to property belonging to another. It follows that in our judgment no offence is committed under this section if a person destroys or causes damage to property belonging to another if he does so in the honest though mistaken belief that the property is his own, and provided that the belief is honestly held it is irrelevant to consider whether or not it is a justifiable belief.⁴⁵⁰

⁴⁴⁷ See Lee [2001] Cr App R 293.

⁴⁴⁸ See 1076.

⁴⁴⁹ [1974] QB 354.

⁴⁵⁰ ibid, 360.

10

General defences

This chapter deals with defences in the broader sense, not just those focused on the mental condition of the accused. In the cases in this chapter, D will usually have performed the actus reus with the appropriate mens rea, but despite both these elements of the offence being proved by the Crown, the question arises whether D is entitled to an acquittal owing to some justifying, excusing or exempting circumstance or condition. There are special or partial defences which apply to particular crimes (eg loss of self control and diminished responsibility in murder) which are dealt with separately although where appropriate their interrelationship is considered. Some reference back to the general discussion of defences at the beginning of Ch 9 may be necessary, particularly to the introductory comments on the theoretical underpinnings of defences and the theories of justifications and excuse.

10.1 Infancy

Infants or, in more modern terminology, minors, are persons under 18 years of age.¹ Although the civil law places restrictions on certain activities (eg writing a will) the criminal law imposes no such limitations on their ability to commit crimes, for, as Kenny put it, a child knows right from wrong long before he knows how to make a prudent speculation or a wise will.² At common law the criminal law applied different rules to minors in three categories, but under the present law only two categories remain.

10.1.1 Children under 10 years

At common law a child was entirely exempt from criminal responsibility until the day before his seventh birthday.³ By statute, criminal responsibility now begins on the child's tenth birthday.⁴ The common law rule was stated as a conclusive presumption that the child is doli incapax, and the statute uses the same language: 'It shall be conclusively presumed that no child under the age of ten years can be guilty of any offence.' Even though there may be the clearest evidence that the child caused an actus reus with mens rea, he cannot be convicted

¹ See H Keating, 'The Responsibility of Children in the Criminal Law' (2007) 19 CFLQ 183, and 'Reckless Children' [2007] Crim LR 546 and for an historical account see G Williams, 'The Criminal Responsibility of Children' [1954] Crim LR 493. Broader issues of youth justice are discussed in C Ball, 'Youth Justice: Half A Century of Responses to Youth Offending' [2004] Crim LR 167; J Fionda, Devils and Angels: Youth, Policy and Crime (2005); I. Hoyano and C. Keenan, Child Abuse: Law and Policy (2007).

² Kenny, Outlines, 80.

³ A person attains a particular age at the commencement of the relevant anniversary of the date of his birth: Family Law Reform Act 1969, s 9(1).

⁴ Children and Young Persons Act 1933, s 50, as amended by the Children and Young Persons Act 1963, s 16, which raised the age from eight. The Ingleby Committee had recommended that the age be raised to 12. Cmnd 1911 (1960). That is the age to be adopted in Scotland.

once it appears that he had not, at the time he did the act, attained the age of ten. This is not a mere procedural bar; no crime is committed by the child with the result that the one who instigated him to do the act is a principal and not a secondary party.⁵ And where a husband and wife were charged with handling stolen goods in the form of a child's tricycle, knowing it to have been taken by their seven-year-old son, it was held that they must be acquitted on the ground that, since the child being only seven could not steal, the tricycle was not stolen.⁶ Ten is a comparatively low age for the beginning of criminal responsibility, it is certainly much lower than many other European States; but, as the Ingleby Committee pointed out:⁷

In many countries the 'age of criminal responsibility' is used to signify the age at which a person becomes liable to the 'ordinary' or 'full' penalties of the law. In this sense, the age of criminal responsibility in England is difficult to state: it is certainly much higher than [ten].⁸

Numerous organizations including the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child (2002) and the European Committee on Social Rights (2005), have urged reform of English law. There is, of course, no international agreement on what the age should be.⁹ As the Beijing Rules, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1985 observe in their commentary on the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Administration of Juvenile Justice (Beijing Rules), Art 4(1):¹⁰

The minimum age of criminal responsibility differs widely owing to history and culture. The modern approach would be to consider whether a child can live up to the moral and psychological components of criminal responsibility; that is, whether a child, by virtue of her or his individual discernment and understanding, can be held responsible for essentially antisocial behaviour. If the age of criminal responsibility is fixed too low or if there is no lower age limit at all, the notion of criminal responsibility would become meaningless.

10.1.2 Children aged 10 and above

At common law, there was a rebuttable presumption that a child aged not less than ten but under 14 years ('a young person') was doli incapax: incapable of committing crime. The presumption was rebutted only if the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt, not only that the child caused an actus reus with mens rea, but also that he knew that the particular act was not merely naughty or mischievous, but 'seriously wrong'. If there was no evidence of such knowledge, other than that implicit in the act itself, the child had no case to answer. In C v DPP,¹¹ the Divisional Court held that this ancient rule of the common law was outdated and no longer law; but the House of Lords reversed this, ruling that it was not open to the courts so to hold. That decision was followed by a series of acquittals which caused disquiet.

⁵ See p 182. ⁶ Walters v Lunt [1951] 2 All ER 645; and cf Marsh v Loader (1863) 14 CBNS 535.

⁷ Cmnd 1191, at 30.

⁸ The age then was eight. See n 4.

⁹ See generally D Cipriani, Children's Rights and the Minimum Age of Criminal Responsibility: A Global Perspective (2009). The age in Scotland has now increased to 12—Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010, s 52.

¹⁰ See further the helpful discussion in Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 11.01–11.05 concluding that it is 'difficult to see how the [current] age of criminal responsibility is in the child's best interests'. See also J Gillen, 'Age of Criminal Responsibility: The Frontier Between Crime and Justice' [2007] Int Fam LJ 7 and A Ashworth, 'Child Defendants and the Doctrines of the Criminal Law' in J Chalmers, L Farmer and F Leverick (eds), Essays in Criminal Law in Honour of Sir Gerald Gordon (2010).

¹¹ [1996] AC 1, HL. See the 8th edition of this book for detail, at p 195.

In the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, Parliament responded by abolishing the rebuttable presumption.¹² This was intended to put children aged ten and above on an equal footing with adults, so far as liability (but not sentencing or mode of trial and procedure) is concerned. The Act is not well drafted. Section 34 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provides:

The rebuttable presumption of criminal law that a child aged 10 or over is incapable of committing an offence is abolished.

Despite cogent arguments by Professor Walker that the section¹³ left it open to a child under 14 to introduce evidence that he did not know that what he did was seriously wrong, the House of Lords finally decided the defence rather than the mere presumption had been abolished. In T,¹⁴ the House of Lords concluded that there was no authority for the existence of the defence separate from the presumption and that Parliament's intention was clearly to abolish the concept of doli incapax as having any effect in law. There is no separate defence of doli incapax after s 34 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.¹⁵ This is a disappointing though predictable outcome. The statute is clear that it is abolishing the presumption. The House of Lords' interpretation of the parliamentary debates is strained to achieve the pragmatic result desired.¹⁶

In the last twenty years, the law governing the procedure for trials of child defendants has developed¹⁷ somewhat and this may assist some children. It has been recognized explicitly that a child defendant must be able to participate effectively in proceedings.¹⁸ One of the criteria for determining whether a child has a sufficient understanding to be tried is whether he understands the seriousness of the consequences of his actions. In some cases, the child's lack of understanding of the wrongness of his conduct will be so great that it might preclude a trial.¹⁹ In its Discussion Paper on insanity and automatism, the Law Commission observed that it is a matter of medical fact that children are neurologically immature as compared with adults.²⁰ Evidence suggests that developmental delay can be relevant to the question of capacity and criminal responsibility and that it impacts upon a number of specific competencies.²¹

¹² Crime and Disorder Act 1998, s 34. See in particular: N Walker, 'The End of an Old Song' (1999) 149 NLJ 64; L Gelsthorpe and A Morris, 'Much Ado about Nothing—A Critical Comment on Key Provisions Relating to Children in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998' (1999) 11 CFLQ 209; J Fionda, 'New Labour, Old Hat: Youth Justice and the Crime and Disorder Act 1998' [1999] Crim LR 36; C Webb, 'Irrational Presumptions of Rationality and Comprehension' [1998] 3 Web JCLI.

¹³ See Walker (1999) 149 NLJ 64.

¹⁴ T [2009] UKHL 20, [2009] 1 AC 1310, HL. For critical comment see F Bennion, 'Mens Rea and Defendants Below the Age of Discretion' [2009] Crim LR 757.

¹⁵ T, aged 12 at the time of offending, pleaded guilty to 12 counts of causing or inciting a child under 13 to engage in sexual activity. Depending on the particular activity, this may be the sort of behaviour where a child might know that what he is doing is wrong or naughty, without seeing it as being seriously wrong resulting in his being on the sexual offender's 'register'.

¹⁶ It has been argued that a new defence should be available for children up to the age of 14 that places emphasis on their relative lack of autonomy. See C Elliott, 'Criminal Responsibility and Children: A New Defence Required to Acknowledge the Absence of Capacity and Choice' (2011) 75 J Crim L 289.

¹⁷ See references at n 1.

¹⁸ T & V v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 121.

¹⁹ Where there is evidence that D cannot understand, at the judge's discretion the process should switch to determining as a matter of fact whether the child performed the act alleged. There may be a sufficient delay between the act and the trial for D to have matured sufficiently to now understand the seriousness. See LCCP 197, Unfitness to Plead (2010); and LC 364, Unfitness to Plead (2016).

²⁰ Ch 9.

²¹ P Kambam and C Thompson, 'The Development of Decision-Making Capacities in Children and Adolescents: Psychological and Neurological Perspectives and Their Implications for Juvenile Defendants' (2009) 27 Behavioral Sciences and the Law 173.

The presumption of doli incapax still poses problems in prosecutions for historic sexual abuse where the conduct alleged to have been carried out by the defendant occurred when he was between the ages of 10 and 14.²²

10.2 Duress

10.2.1 Duress by threats and circumstances

For centuries the law has recognized a defence of duress by threats.²³ The typical case is where D is told, 'Do this [an act which would be a crime if there were no defence of duress]—or you will be killed', and, fearing for his life, D does the required act. Relatively recently, the law has recognized another form of duress—duress of circumstances. Again, D does the act alleged to constitute the crime, feeling compelled to do so out of fear, but this time no human being is demanding that he do it.²⁴ D does it because he reasonably believes himself to be threatened with death or serious injury and that his only reasonable way of escaping the threat is to perform the conduct element of the offence. The defences are clearly closely related. For example, D is told he will be killed unless he acts as a getaway driver for a robbery. The compulsion on D to do the act is exactly the same whether the threat comes from someone demanding that he do it, or from an aggressor, or other circumstances. His moral culpability, or lack of it, seems exactly the same.²⁵ The discussion of the relationship of duress, duress of circumstances and necessity is postponed until each has been examined in detail (p 378).

The law relating to duress by threats is now well developed. Duress of circumstances is still relatively new, but it has developed by analogy to duress by threats so that there is a ready-made set of principles to govern it. By a strange coincidence, all the early cases on duress of circumstances concerned road traffic offences but there is no reason why it should be limited to such offences. Pommell,²⁶ Safi,²⁷ *Shayler*²⁸ and a host of other cases decide that it has the same range and is governed by the same principles as duress by threats. The result is that either form of duress is a general defence, except that neither applies to some forms of treason, or to murder or attempted murder, whether the defendant is a principal or a secondary party. There are only a few differences between the two defences in application.

10.2.1.1 Duress and voluntariness

It has often been said that the duress must be such that D's act is not 'voluntary'.²⁹ We are not, however, concerned here with the case where a person is compelled by physical force to ²² Andrew N [2004] EWCA Crim 1236; H [2010] EWCA Crim 312; PF [2017] EWCA Crim 983 noting that independent evidence of naughtiness beyond the mere fact of the commission of the relevant acts was required.

²³ Although somewhat dated, there is a valuable discussion of the defences in LCCP 122, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences Against the Person and General Principles (1992); LCCP 218, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences Against the Person and General Principles (1993); LCCP 177, A New Homicide Act for England? (2005) Ch 7; LC 304, Murder Manslaughter and Infanticide (2007) Ch 6. On the Commission's proposals, see A Ashworth, 'Principles, Pragmatism and the Law Commission Recommendations on Homicide Reform' [2007] Crim LR 333 at 340. The Law Reform Commission of Ireland has also produced a valuable analysis in its Consultation Paper, Duress and Necessity (2006): www.lawreform.ie; see also the review in the Victorian Law Reform Commission Report, Defences to Homicide (2006): www.lawreform.vic.gov.au.

²⁴ Cole [1994] Crim LR 582; Ali [1995] Crim LR 303.

²⁵ See the judicial affirmation that the defences are this closely linked: Safi [2003] EWCA Crim 1809, [2003] Crim LR 721; Shayler [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [2001] Crim LR 986 but note p 378 later in this book.

²⁶ [1995] 2 Cr App R 607. The case was subsequently analysed as one of necessity rather than duress of circumstances because there is no immediate threat of death to D: see Quayle [2005] EWCA Crim 1415, [2006] Crim LR 148.

²⁷ [2003] EWCA Crim 1809, [2003] Crim LR 721.

²⁸ [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [2001] Crim LR 986.

²⁹ See M Wasik, 'Duress and Criminal Responsibility' [1977] Crim LR 453; A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 218–229; ATH Smith, 'On Actus Reus and Mens Rea' in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 104–106.

go through the motions of an actus reus without any choice on his part. In such cases he will almost invariably³⁰ be guilty of no offence on the fundamental ground that he did no act.

If there be an actual forcing of a man, as if A by force takes the arm of B and the weapon in his hand and therewith stabs C whereof he dies, this is murder in A but B is not guilty.³¹

Nor are we concerned with the kind of involuntariness which arises from automatism where D is unable to control the movement of his body. When D pleads duress (or necessity) he admits that he was able to control his actions and chose to do the act with which he is charged, but denies responsibility for doing so.³² He may say, 'I had no choice' but that is not strictly true.³³ The alternative to committing the crime may have been so exceedingly unattractive that no reasonable person would have chosen it; but there was a choice. It is clear that the courts recognize this because for some crimes, no matter how serious the threat D faced, he cannot rely on duress. If D is threatened with harm or even death unless he kills V, he should, according to the English courts, withstand the pressure and suffer death himself. He will not have a defence to murder if he kills: his acts were voluntary.

In Canada, the Supreme Court (holding that necessity may be an excuse, but not a justification) described the act of a person under duress as 'morally involuntary', the 'involuntariness' being 'measured on the basis of society's expectation of appropriate and normal resistance to pressure'.³⁴ This seems to mean only that even a person of goodwill and reasonable fortitude might have chosen to do the 'criminal' act. Duress in English law cannot be said to be a form of involuntariness. A person who kills when acting under duress cannot rely on that plea as a defence. If he succeeded only in wounding V he could rely on duress. Surely D's act is voluntary in both cases. It would be illogical to say his act was involuntary if he only succeeded in wounding V.³⁵ D intends to do the act which, but for the duress, would be a crime.

It has been recognized by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords that the defence is not a denial of mens rea, but a true defence operating despite the existence of the actus reus and mens rea of the offence.³⁶

In short, duress is a defence because 'threats of immediate death or serious personal violence so great as to overbear the ordinary powers of human resistance should be accepted as a justification for acts which would otherwise be criminal'.³⁷

10.2.1.2 The onus of proof

The onus of disproving duress is on the Crown.³⁸ If no facts from which duress might reasonably be inferred appear in the prosecution's case, then D has the 'evidential burden' of ³⁰ cf Larsonneur, p 43. ³¹ Hale, II PC, 534.

³² In Southward [2012] EWCA Crim 2779 D sought to plead duress yet at the same time deny he had committed the offence. The trial judge refused to leave duress to the jury on the basis that it would be very confusing. The Court of Appeal rightly agreed with this assessment.

³³ Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, per Baroness Hale at [73]. See also Duff, Answering for Crime, 287.

³⁴ Perka (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 1.

³⁵ Howe [1987] AC 417, HL, per Lord Hailsham LC, citing Lords Kilbrandon and Edmund-Davies in DPP for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] AC 653 at 703 and 709–710.

³⁶ Fisher [2004] EWCA Crim 1190, [2004] Crim LR 938; see also Hasan [2005] UKHL 22 per Lord Bingham at [18].

³⁷ A-G v Whelan [1934] IR 518, per Murnaghan J (Irish CCA). The judge probably did not have in mind any distinction between justification and excuse. If there is a material distinction, duress seems to be an excuse. Cf RA Duff, 'Rule Violations and Wrongdoing' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 63.

³⁸ Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, [37]; Gill [1963] 1 WLR 841, CCA; Giaquinto [2001] EWCA Crim 2696; Bianco [2001] EWCA Crim 2156, endorsed in Bloomfield [2007] EWCA Crim 1873 and Brandford [2016] EWCA Crim 1794, [2017] Crim LR 554.

laying a foundation for the defence by introducing evidence of such facts.³⁹ There is considerable judicial scepticism regarding defences of duress and the defendant's burden to get the defence on its feet will not always be straightforward.⁴⁰ Indeed, it has been confirmed that the judge is only obliged to leave the issue to the jury if there is evidence of facts which if believed could cause a reasonable jury properly directed to accept the defence. In Bianco, Laws LJ stated that, 'if the case is one where no reasonable jury properly directed as to the law could fail to find the defence disproved, no legitimate purpose is served by leaving it to the jury.'⁴¹ In Batchelor,⁴² Elias LJ affirmed that there could be no purpose leaving a verdict to the jury that they, on considering the evidence, could not properly reach. His lordship stated that 'evidence' in this context means evidence that would, in principle, be sufficient to justify a jury concluding that the defence is established.⁴³ These sentiments were reaffirmed in unequivocal terms by the Court of Appeal in Brandford, although the court did state that the power to withdraw the defence should be exercised with caution.⁴⁴ There is a particular judicial anxiety when the defence is raised late in the trial process.

The Law Commission's recommendation in relation to the availability of the duress defence in murder is to reverse the burden, so that the accused would be obliged to prove on the balance of probabilities that the elements of the defence were made out.⁴⁵ This is a controversial approach.⁴⁶ It is a clear compromise, with the Commission being keen to see the defence of duress available to murder (which at present it is not), but prepared to reverse the burden to deter spurious and unmeritorious defences being run. The Commission acknowledges the difficulty the Crown may face in duress cases where D is often the sole source of evidence supporting the defence.⁴⁷

10.2.1.3 The elements of the defence

Lord Bingham, in the leading modern authority from the House of Lords, Hasan, summarized the elements of the defence:⁴⁸

- (1) D reasonably believes there is a threat of death or serious injury;
- (2) that threat must have been made to D or his immediate family or someone close to him or, someone for whom D would reasonably regard himself as responsible;
- (3) D's perception of the threat and his conduct in response are to be assessed objectively—his belief that he is under such a threat must be reasonable and his decision to commit the crime in response must be reasonable;
- (4) the conduct it is sought to excuse must have been directly caused by the threats D relies on;

³⁹ Radically, the Law Commission recommended reversing the burden of proof on this defence, LC 218 (1993) para 33.16. It is doubtful whether this would be compatible with the ECHR (Art 6(2)). See the doubts expressed by Lord Bingham in Hasan at [20]. The Law Commission has subsequently recommended that the burden be reversed should the defence become available to a charge of murder: LC 304, Ch 6.

⁴⁰ See Hasan at [20].

⁴¹ [2001] EWCA Crim 2516, [15].

⁴² [2013] EWCA Crim 2638.

⁴³ The Court of Appeal recognized in Hammond [2013] EWCA Crim 2709 that there is a fine line between the judge making a ruling as to the law and coming to an impermissible resolution of a case on the facts. Moses LJ stated that this problem is especially acute when duress is pleaded but that it should not deter judges from taking a robust and reasoned approach where fanciful cases of duress are raised.

⁴⁴ [2016] EWCA Crim 1794, [2017] Crim LR 554.

⁴⁵ LC 304, para 6.115.

⁴⁶ For analysis of the potential ECHR implications, see LC 304, paras 6.116 et seq.

⁴⁷ cf LCCP 177, para 7.66 where it is suggested that the days when it was easy to raise and difficult to rebut are 'long gone'!

⁴⁸ Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, [21]. On the decision see, inter alia, D Ibbetson (2005) 64 CLJ 530; R Ryan and D Ryan (2005) 56 NILQ 421.

- (5) there must have been no evasive action D could reasonably take;
- (6) D cannot rely on threats to which he has voluntarily laid himself open;
- (7) the defence is unavailable to murder, attempted murder or treason.

(1) Threat of death or serious injury

The type of qualifying threat or danger

As a matter of policy the law places strict limits on the type of threat sufficient to trigger the defence. It is not simply a question of balancing in each case the gravity of the threat D faced against the gravity of the offence D committed in response. The threats must reach a threshold before the defence is triggered. That threshold is set at a deliberately high level. The only threat or danger which will found a defence in either type of duress is one of death or serious⁴⁹ personal injury.⁵⁰

The House of Lords in Hasan, Lord Lane CJ in *Graham*⁵¹ and Woolf LJ in Conway,⁵² all required a threat of death or serious personal injury. This is in keeping with most modern codes in other jurisdictions.⁵³

The Court of Appeal confirmed in Brandford that mere pressure based on the exploitation of a relationship but without a relevant threat of death or really serious harm will not be sufficient to enable D to plead duress.⁵⁴ Pressure of this nature is not entirely irrelevant, however, as the court observed that it may operate in a cumulative manner alongside a threat of death or really serious harm.

It has been held that serious psychiatric injury can be grievous bodily harm for the purposes of the OAPA 1861 and it is probable that a threat to cause such injury could amount to duress.⁵⁵ A threat to make a person a nervous wreck could be just as terrifying as a threat to cause serious physical injury. The high threshold imposed by the common law stands in contrast to the statutory offence contained in s 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015.⁵⁶ The statutory defence, which can only be pleaded by defendants who are victims of slavery or relevant exploitation, does not require a threat of death or really serious harm, but requires D to have been compelled to commit the criminal offence in question.⁵⁷ This compulsion must be attributable to slavery or relevant exploitation.⁵⁸

This threshold of serious injury in duress is narrowly construed by the courts.⁵⁹ In some circumstances the high threshold can lead to harsh results. For example, in Joseph, a case

⁴⁹ In Aikens [2003] EWCA Crim 1573, it was doubted that a threat to punch V in the face would suffice.

⁵⁰ Radford [2004] EWCA Crim 2878. Cf the Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 5(2)(b).

⁵¹ [1982] 1 WLR 294, [1982] Crim LR 365. ⁵² [1989] QB 290, [1989] Crim LR 74.

⁵³ LC 218, para 29.1: 'the overwhelming tendency of the authorities as of modern codes, is to limit the defence to cases where death or serious injury is threatened. . . Consultation strongly supported that limitation on the defence of duress, which is imposed by clause 25(2)(a) of the Criminal Law Bill.'

⁵⁴ [2016] EWCA Crim 1794, [2017] Crim LR 554. ⁵⁵ Baker and Wilkins [1997] Crim LR 497.

⁵⁶ For detailed analysis, see K Laird, 'Evaluating the Relationship Between Section 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 and the Defence of Duress: An Opportunity Missed?' [2016] Crim LR 395.

⁵⁷ For an interesting analysis of how the concept of compulsion is relevant to English criminal law, see S Edwards, 'Coercion and Compulsion—Re-Imagining Crimes and Defences' [2016] Crim LR 876.

⁵⁸ If D is under 18, then by virtue of s 45(4)(b) it suffices if he commits the offence as a direct consequence of being, or having been, a victim of slavery or relevant exploitation.

⁵⁹ In Hammond [2013] EWCA Crim 2709, D's plea of duress to the charge of breaking prison based on D's fears of being touched sexually by another inmate was rejected. The sexual advances were 'miles away' from any threat to kill or cause really serious injury; the outcome could have been different had D feared he would be raped by the other inmate. The Court of Appeal did not cite the earlier case of A (RJ) [2012] EWCA Crim 434, [2013] Crim LR 240 in which Lord Judge CJ observed that although duress should not be confused with pressure, the requirement that there be a threat of death or serious injury would 'no doubt' be satisfied by a threat to rape, at [63].

involving victims of human trafficking, the Court of Appeal rejected the argument that duress ought to be broadened to encompass a threat of false imprisonment.⁶⁰ As the defence in s 45 of the Modern Slavery Act 2015 does not apply retrospectively, some victims of slavery and relevant exploitation will still have to rely upon the common law defence of duress. Unless there was a threat of death or really serious harm, such individuals will be unable to plead duress successfully.⁶¹

What constitutes a threat of 'serious injury' for the defence has created difficulties. In Brown,⁶² the court refused leave to appeal a conviction for possession of drugs when D, suffering from a degenerative disease, was cultivating cannabis for personal use to alleviate his pain. The court regarded the threat of 'injury' he faced as being only that additional pain he would suffer by having to rely on prescribed medication rather than the lower level of pain suffered with his condition if he used cannabis. The difference between the two levels of pain was not sufficient to constitute 'serious' injury.⁶³ In Quayle,⁶⁴ the Court of Appeal went further and rejected the pain experienced by a multiple sclerosis sufferer as sufficient to qualify as 'harm' as the defence of duress of circumstances requires.

While a threat of serious personal injury is the minimum which is acceptable to found the defence for offences to which it is available, a higher minimum may be required for crimes of great gravity. Thus, Hale required threats of death and so did the judges in *M'Growther*⁶⁵ and *Purdy*⁶⁶ but those were cases of treason. The Law Commission recommends that in a case of murder, duress will require proof that D was under a threat of death or 'life threatening injury'.⁶⁷

The following dictum of Lords Wilberforce and Edmund-Davies no longer applies to killing but remains true for other acts:

the realistic view is that, the more dreadful the circumstances of the killing, the heavier the evidential burden of an accused advancing such a plea, and the stronger and more irresistible the duress needed before it could be regarded as affording any defence.⁶⁸

Threats of blackmail, no matter how effective, are not sufficient.⁶⁹ There is no modern⁷⁰ case in which a threat of injury to property has been admitted.⁷¹ In M'Growther,⁷² it was held there was no defence where the Duke of Perth had threatened to burn the houses and drive off the cattle of any of his tenants who refused to follow him. But that was a case of treason and there is now clear authority that such a threat would not be enough even on some lesser charge.

If the evil D would perpetrate by submitting to the threat (eg stealing a chocolate bar) was clearly less than that which would have been inflicted had he defied it (eg burning down his house), there are cogent reasons for allowing a defence; even if the threat was not of death or even grievous bodily harm. Williams argued strongly in favour of such a principle, which ⁶⁰ [2017] EWCA Crim 36, [2017] Crim LR 817. The court followed what had earlier been held in van Dao [2012] EWCA Crim 1717 in which Gross LJ stated that 'we would in this area place the requirements of practical policy ahead of those of strict logic'. At [44]–[49]. See the commentary by Ormerod at [2013] Crim LR 234.

⁶¹ Sch 4 to the Modern Slavery Act 2015 lists a number of offences that have been excluded from the ambit of the new defences. Therefore, depending upon the offences they are alleged to have committed, some victims of slavery and trafficking will still have to rely upon the common law even after the implementation of s 45.

⁶² [2003] EWCA Crim 2637.

⁶³ A duress of circumstances case.

⁶⁴ [2005] EWCA Crim 1415, [2006] Crim LR 148 and commentary.

⁶⁵ (1746) Fost 13.

⁶⁶ (1946) 10 J Crim L 182.

⁶⁷ LC 304, para 6.75.

⁶⁸ Abbott v R [1976] 3 All ER at 152.

⁶⁹ Singh [1973] 1 WLR 1600.

⁷⁰ cf Crutchley (1831) 5 C & P 133.

⁷¹ 'Well, the law must draw a line somewhere; and, as a result of experience and human valuation, the law draws it between threats to property and threats to the person', per Lord Simon [1975] AC 653, [1975] Crim LR 707.

⁷² See n 65.

is, of course, closely analogous to that adopted in the American Model Penal Code in relation to necessity.⁷³ But this would in some cases still deny a defence to D even though the injury threatened was one which no ordinary person could be expected to endure; and there would be grave difficulty in balancing the two evils against one another when they are of a completely different character.⁷⁴ 'Proportionality' may be a prerequisite for necessity⁷⁵ but it seems inappropriate for duress. Duress requires a threat of death or serious injury.

From whom/what must the threat emanate

The threat must have some source extraneous to the defendant himself. In Rodger and Rose,⁷⁶ D who was serving a life sentence was informed that his tariff had been substantially increased. He broke out of prison and raised duress as a defence at his trial for prison-breaking. It was conceded for the purpose of the appeal that he broke out because he had become suicidal and would have committed suicide had he not done so. So there was a threat to his life, but since the threat did not come from an extraneous source, it was no defence. To allow it, said the court, 'could amount to a licence to commit crime dependent on the personal characteristics and vulnerability of the offender'. The Court of Appeal in Quayle relied upon this limitation to the defence to reject the defence of duress of circumstances where D cultivated cannabis for personal use to alleviate pain for his multiple sclerosis.⁷⁷

No threat of death or GBH need exist in fact

There is no requirement for there to be a threat of death or serious injury in fact. It is sufficient that D reasonably believes that there is a threat of the relevant gravity. If the defence was only available where there was a threat in fact, D could not plead duress where threatened with an unloaded gun, nor where D escaped from prison erroneously believing it to be on fire. This would be unduly restrictive.

In Safi and others,⁷⁸ Afghan hijackers who had landed at Stansted airport claimed that their fear of persecution at the hands of the Taliban constituted a defence of duress of circumstances. The trial judge directed that the defence failed unless there was evidence that there was in fact, or might in fact have been, an imminent peril to the defendants or their families. S appealed on the basis that the defence should be available if he reasonably believed that if he had not acted in the way he had, he (and/or the family) would have been killed or seriously injured. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. Duress (or duress of circumstances) does not depend on there being an actual risk of death or serious injury to the accused; the defence can be made out if the accused was impelled to act as he did because, as a result of what he reasonably believed to be the situation, he had good cause to fear that otherwise death or serious injury would result.

In Brandford, the Court of Appeal confirmed that the threat does not have to be relayed directly to the defendant.⁷⁹ The fact that the threat was relayed to the defendant indirectly is not fatal to the defence being pleaded. The court held that the focus of the inquiry should be on immediacy, imminence and the possibility of taking evasion action. For this reason, the more indirectly the threat is relayed, then all other things being equal, the more the defendant will struggle to satisfy the elements of the defence. Therefore, although in theory a threat can be relayed indirectly, in practice it will make it very difficult for D to plead the defence successfully.

⁷³ See p 377. ⁷⁴ Law Com Working Paper No.55, paras 14–17.

⁷⁵ Shayler [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [2001] Crim LR 986, see p 378. ⁷⁶ [1998] 1 Cr App R 143.

⁷⁷ [2005] EWCA Crim 415. See M Watson, 'Cannabis and the Defence of Necessity' (1998) 148 NLJ 1260. See, for a philosophical consideration of such matters, SJ Morse, 'Diminished Capacity' in S Shute, S Gardner and J Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) 250–263.

⁷⁸ [2003] EWCA Crim 1809, [2003] Crim LR 721.

⁷⁹ [2016] EWCA Crim 1794, [2017] Crim LR 554.

(2) Threats against whom?

Most of the cases naturally involve a threat or danger to the life or safety of D himself, but the defences are not limited to that situation. In Hurley and Murray,⁸⁰ the Supreme Court of Victoria held that threats to kill or seriously injure D's de facto wife amounted to duress. In Wright,⁸¹ threats against D's boyfriend sufficed. In Conway,⁸² the threat was to the passenger in D's car; and in Martin,⁸³ D's wife's threat to commit suicide if he did not drive while disqualified was held capable of founding a defence of duress of circumstances—though in fact it seems to have been one of duress by threats—'Drive or else...'.⁸⁴ So threats against the life or safety of D's family certainly suffice. In Shayler,⁸⁵ the Lord Chief Justice, approving a statement of Rose LJ in Hussain, stated that:

the evil must be directed towards the defendant or a person or persons for whom he has responsibility or, we would add, persons for whom the situation makes him responsible;...[this extends], by way of example, [to] the situation where the threat is made to set off a bomb unless the defendant performs the unlawful act. The defendant may have not have had any previous connection with those who would be injured by the bomb but the threat itself creates the defendant's responsibility for those who will be at risk if he does not give way to the threat.

Lord Bingham in Hasan also suggested that the threat must be 'directed against the defendant or his immediate family or someone close to him or for whom he is responsible'. So, threats to D, his family and others to whom he owes a 'duty' will qualify, but arguably this is too narrow. If a bank robber threatens to shoot a customer in the bank unless D, the clerk, hands him the keys, D surely has a defence to a charge of assisting the robbery. The concept of those for whom D is 'responsible' is ill-defined, and ought to be given a liberal construction. It is submitted that the defence is so heavily qualified by the requirement of a threat of death or serious injury and the other objective elements, that there is little need to impose restrictions on the categories of individual to whom the threat must be made.

(3) Evaluating D's response to the threat

Several difficult issues arise in determining whether by committing the crime in response to the threats D's conduct should be excused. In particular, the courts have struggled with questions of whether it is sufficient that the individual defendant regarded it as a reasonable response to the threat he believed that he faced, or whether the defence is only available if the reasonable person would have responded in the same way if faced with the threat D genuinely believed he faced.

In Howe, the House of Lords held that the defence fails if:

the prosecution prove that a person of reasonable firmness sharing the characteristics of the defendant would not have given way to the threats as did the defendant.

The House held that the correct direction was that stated by Lane LCJ in Graham:⁸⁶

(1) Was [D], or may he have been, impelled to act as he did because, as a result of what he reasonably believed [E] had said or done, he had good cause to fear that if he did not so act [E]

⁸⁰ [1967] VR 526. ⁸¹ [2000] Crim LR 510. ⁸² [1989] QB 290, [1989] Crim LR 74, CA.

⁸³ [1989] 1 All ER 652, [1989] Crim LR 284. See also Wright [2000] Crim LR 510.

⁸⁴ See also M [2007] EWCA Crim 3228, where M sought to smuggle drugs into prison being threatened with violence by E, and hearing threats from Y in prison that if he did not get the drugs he would commit suicide.

⁸⁵ [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [49]. This was accepted in Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, [2006] Crim LR 142, per Lord Bingham.

⁸⁶ [1982] 1 All ER 801 at 806, 74 Cr App R 235 at 241, [1982] Crim LR 365. Cf Lawrence [1980] 1 NSWLR 122.

would kill him or...cause him serious physical injury? (2) If so, have the prosecution made the jury sure that a sober person of reasonable firmness, sharing the characteristics of [D], would not have responded to whatever he reasonably believed [E] said or did by taking part in the killing?

The direction contains three objective elements:

- (1) D must have reasonably believed in the circumstances of the threat;⁸⁷
- (2) D's belief must have amounted to good cause for his fear;
- (3) D's response must be one which might have been expected of a sober person of reasonable firmness.

A fourth element is usually considered although not deriving from the Graham judgment:

- (4) D must have had no reasonable opportunity to escape the threat.

In imposing this objective regime on the defence, Lord Lane in Graham equated duress with self-defence which, it was then generally accepted, imposed an objective test. But less than two years later in Gladstone Williams,⁸⁸ Lord Lane, influenced by the judgment of Lawton LJ in Kimber,⁸⁹ held that an unreasonable belief, if honestly held, might found self-defence. Lawton LJ appreciated and applied the general effect of *DPP v Morgan*⁹⁰ which was not cited in Graham. Logically, if Morgan applies to self-defence, it ought equally to apply to duress.⁹¹ It is arguable, however, that the defences are distinguishable since duress is generally regarded as excusatory and self-defence as justificatory in nature.⁹² The decision in Graham may thus have been an unfortunate accident—but subsequently it has been approved by the House of Lords in Howe and more recently still the House of Lords in Hasan certainly did not seem to be inclined to depart from it.⁹³

It is submitted that, in the first two respects, the direction in Graham lays down too strict a rule. D should surely be judged on the basis of what he honestly believed and what he genuinely feared.⁹⁴ If his genuine fear was such that the jury conclude that no person of reasonable firmness could have been expected to resist it, he should be excused. He may have been unduly credulous or stupid, but he is no more blameworthy than a person whose ⁸⁷ The element of reasonableness was firmly endorsed in Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, [23] per Lord Bingham. See also LC 304, para 6.77. In LCCC 177, para 7.46 fn 54 the Commission suggested that in an unpublished codification project, the reasonableness test would be endorsed, reversing an earlier Law Commission Report recommendation.

⁸⁸ See p 383.

⁸⁹ [1983] 3 All ER 316, [1983] Crim LR 630 (an honest belief that V was consenting was a defence to indecent (now sexual) assault).

⁹⁰ See p 332. See JC Smith, 'The Triumph of Inexorable Logic' in Leading Cases of the Twentieth Century (2000).

⁹¹ In Martin (DP) [2000] 2 Cr App R 42, [2000] Crim LR 615, CA (discussed in [2000] 7 Arch News 6), Mantell LJ said at 49—apparently in error—that the subjective test in self-defence had been applied to duress in Cairns [1999] 2 Cr App R 137 where Mantell LJ also gave the judgment. See generally on the merits of the subjective and objective approaches, P Allridge, 'Developing the Defence of Duress' [1986] Crim LR 433.

⁹² See S Yeo, Compulsion in the Criminal Law (1990).

⁹³ Lord Bingham rejected comparison with other defences in Hasan. Cf LCCC 177, para 7.32. It is dangerous to place too much emphasis on comparisons with other defences when seeking to interpret the scope of duress. These common law defences evolved over centuries to meet the needs of individual cases and were not the product of a coherent structured scheme as one might expect from Parliament.

⁹⁴ See W Wilson, 'The Structure of Defences' [2005] Crim LR 108, 115–116. Courts occasionally lapse into such a formula, see Mullally v DPP [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin).

fear is based on reasonable grounds.⁹⁵ The Court of Appeal in *Martin (DP)*⁹⁶ held that D's characteristics—in that case a schizoid affective disorder, making him more likely to regard things said as threatening and to believe that threats would be carried out—must be taken into account. This seems to be a substantial mitigation of the objective test. It is doubtful whether that decision can stand in the light of the emphasis on the objective nature of the defence in Hasan.

As with mistake generally, lack of faith in the jury to detect the 'bogus defence' and the additional hardship for the prosecution probably lies at the root of the objective requirements. Also as with mistake generally, the more tenuous the grounds for his claim, the less likely is D to be believed.

The confusion and tension in this area is illustrated by the case of Safi (the Afghan hijack case discussed earlier). At the first trial the judge directed the jury that D's genuine belief in the threat of death was sufficient, on a retrial the second judge adopted an objective formulation. The Court of Appeal failed to clarify the position but seemed implicitly to be adopting an objective test.⁹⁷ Similarly in the case of M,⁹⁸ the Court of Appeal adopted an apparently subjective approach to the first question

In two subsequent cases, the Court of Appeal again endorsed the objective approach in the first limb.⁹⁹ Further clarification from the House of Lords was not forthcoming in Hasan, but the tenor of the speech of Lord Bingham leaves little doubt that the objective formulation would be preferred. That would follow the decision in Graham which was approved in Howe.

The person of reasonable steadfastness

Since duress is (according to Lord Hailsham in Howe and Lord Bingham in Hasan) a concession to human frailty¹⁰⁰ and some people are frailer than others, it is arguable that the standard of fortitude required should also vary,¹⁰¹ and that a subjective test should apply.¹⁰² That is not the approach adopted in English law. Graham is consistent with a common approach of the law in deciding that the standard is an objective one. It is for the law to lay down standards of conduct. When attacked, D may use only a reasonable degree of force in self-defence. Under the loss of self-control defence, D must display a reasonable degree of tolerance and self-restraint. Similarly, Graham decides that a person under duress is required to display 'the steadfastness reasonably to be expected of the ordinary citizen in his situation'.¹⁰³ The court relied particularly on the analogy with the law of provocation as ⁹⁵ In DPP v Rogers [1998] Crim LR 202, DC, Brooke LJ seems wrongly to have assumed that this is now the law, apparently anticipating a reform proposed by the Law Commission. Cf Abdul-Hussain [1999] Crim LR 570. If D reasonably believes there is a threat, it is immaterial that there is no threat in fact: Cairns [1999] 2 Cr App R 137, CA. For a criticism of the Commission's 'slavish adherence to subjectivism', see J Horder, 'Occupying the Moral High Ground' [1994] Crim LR 334 at 341 and comments by JC Smith, 'Individual Incapacities and Criminal Liability' (1998) 6 Med L Rev 138 at 155–157.

⁹⁶ [2002] 2 Cr App R 42, CA. ⁹⁷ At [25].

⁹⁸ [2003] EWCA Crim 1170. See also Sewell [2004] EWCA Crim 2322.

⁹⁹ Blake [2004] EWCA Crim 1238, [18]; Bronson [2004] EWCA Crim 903, [23].

¹⁰⁰ Howe [1987] 1 All ER 771 at 779–780; Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, [18].

¹⁰¹ See KJM Smith, 'Duress and Steadfastness: In Pursuit of the Unintelligible' [1999] Crim LR 363. See also Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 13, on the need for defences including duress to take account of D's characteristics and RL Lippke, 'Chronic Temptation, Reasonable Firmness and the Criminal Law' (2014) 34 OJLS 75, for the argument that the law ought to make a concession for those who face chronic temptation to violate the law through no fault of their own.

¹⁰² 'It is arguable that the standard should be purely subjective and that it is contrary to principle to require the fear to be a reasonable one': per Lord Simon [1975] 1 All ER at 931. Cf Law Com Working Paper No 55, paras 11–13 and LC 83, paras 2.27–2.28; and Hudson [1965] 1 All ER 721 at 724.

¹⁰³ (1982) 74 Cr App R 235 at 241.

was then in force and the decision in Camplin.¹⁰⁴ That case suggests that account should be taken of not only the gravity of the threat to D but also the sex and age of D and such of D's characteristics¹⁰⁵ as would affect the gravity of the threat to him. The leading case on this issue in duress is Bowen.¹⁰⁶

In Bowen, it was held that for a duress plea D's age¹⁰⁷ and sex may be relevant, depending on the circumstances, as may pregnancy¹⁰⁸ and serious physical disability. These might affect the gravity of the threat and D's ability to seek evasive action. In Bowen,¹⁰⁹ the court also accepted that a 'recognized mental illness or psychiatric condition, such as post-traumatic stress disorder leading to learned helplessness'¹¹⁰ would be relevant. But, D's low IQ, short of mental impairment or mental illness, is not relevant: a person of low IQ may be expected to be as courageous and able to withstand threats as anyone else. That does not necessarily answer the argument—belatedly advanced on appeal—that D's ability to seek the protection of the police might have been impaired.

Cases of 'learned helplessness' are particularly difficult.¹¹¹ In Emery,¹¹² a case of cruelty to a child, it was said, obiter, that it would be right to admit 'an expert account of the causes of the condition of dependent helplessness, the circumstances in which it might arise and what level of abuse would be required to produce it'. 'A woman of reasonable firmness suffering from a condition of dependent helplessness' may seem a contradiction in terms; but the point appears to be that the alleged history of violence by D's partner, said to have produced that condition, was part of the duress.¹¹³ That explanation did not seem attractive to the court in Bowen.

This matter is a question for the jury and expert evidence has been held inadmissible to show that D was 'emotionally unstable' or in 'a grossly elevated neurotic state',¹¹⁴ or that he is unusually pliable or vulnerable to pressure;¹¹⁵ nor is evidence admissible of sexual abuse as a child, resulting in lack of firmness, not amounting to psychiatric disorder: Hurst,¹¹⁶ where Beldam LJ said, 'we find it hard to see how the person of reasonable firmness can be invested with the characteristics of a personality which lacks reasonable firmness...'. The Court of Appeal considered this issue directly in GAC.¹¹⁷ D unsuccessfully relied upon learned helplessness to avoid a conviction for importing Class A drugs. The Court of Appeal, dismissing D's appeal, ¹⁰⁴ [1978] AC 705, [1978] 2 All ER 168, see p 543.

¹⁰⁵ Such as the schizoid affective disorder afflicting Martin (DP), n 91.

¹⁰⁶ [1996] 2 Cr App R 157, [1996] Crim LR 577. In Flatt [1996] Crim LR 576, it was held that drug addiction was a self-induced condition, not a characteristic. For criticism of the approach in general for its failure to reflect psychiatric understanding, see A Buchanan and G Virgo, 'Duress and Mental Abnormality' [1999] Crim LR 517.

¹⁰⁷ cf Ali [1989] Crim LR 736.

¹⁰⁸ In GAC [2013] EWCA Crim 1472, Hallett LJ stated that: 'A threat of physical violence to a pregnant woman therefore might be more serious because of the risk to the unborn child' at [33].

¹⁰⁹ [1996] 2 Cr App R 157.

¹¹⁰ This was held to be insufficient in Moseley [1999] 7 Arch News 2.

¹¹¹ For extensive analysis, see J Loveless, 'R v GAC: Battered Woman "Syndromization"' [2014] Crim LR 655.

¹¹² (1992) 14 Cr App R (S) 394. See also J Loveless, 'Domestic Violence, Coercion and Duress' [2010] Crim LR 93 analysing how the defence is formulated in such a way as to exclude battered women. The Court of Appeal took cognizance of the criticisms made in this article without expressing a view of them in A (RJ) [2012] EWCA Crim 434, [2013] Crim LR 240. In this case, D's conviction was upheld. She has since alleged a violation of Art 8 of the ECHR. See RA v UK [2014] ECHR 1288. In 2016, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that her case was inadmissible. See RA v UK (App no 75321/12), 2016.

¹¹³ Arguably, in such a case D is still a person of reasonable firmness, just one with greater sensitivities.

¹¹⁴ Hegarty [1994] Crim LR 353.

¹¹⁵ Horne [1994] Crim LR 584: 'not a hero nor a coward'.

¹¹⁶ [1995] 1 Cr App R 82 at 90.

¹¹⁷ [2013] EWCA Crim 1472. For extensive analysis, see J Loveless 'R v GAC: Battered Woman "Syndromization"' [2014] Crim LR 655.

rejected her claim that she had exhibited battered women syndrome at the time she committed the offence or that the violence against her was of sufficient severity to make out the first element of duress. Hallett LJ held that a person who has suffered domestic abuse would not be able to plead duress unless they have been 'subjected to serious physical violence so bad' that they have lost their free will.

It is no less difficult when the condition is a 'recognized mental illness'. The acceptance of such an illness as a relevant characteristic suggests that this element of the objective test has broken down and that we are moving closer to the test once proposed by the Law Commission: 'the threat is one which in all the circumstances (including any of [the defendant's] characteristics that affect its gravity) he cannot reasonably be expected to resist'.¹¹⁸ Under the present law the court will be faced with drawing some fine distinctions between unusual vulnerability and recognized psychiatric conditions affecting the ability to withstand pressure.¹¹⁹ This is demonstrated by GAC. The increasing shift towards subjectivity in this limb of the defence stands in contrast to the increased objectivity in the first limb. It highlights the incoherence of the defence as it has evolved at common law, underlining the need for a legislative response.

(4) The conduct it is sought to excuse must have been directly caused by the threats D relies on

Threats as a concurrent cause of the crime

It is said that D's will must have been 'overborne' by the threat.¹²⁰ Presumably this means only that he would not have committed the offence 'but for' the threat and that the threat was one which might cause a person of reasonable fortitude to do as he did. If the prosecution can prove that he would have done the same act even if the threat had not been made, it seems that the defence will fail.¹²¹ But the threat need not be the only motive for D's action. In Valderrama-Vega,¹²² D was under financial pressure and had been threatened with disclosure of his homosexual behaviour—neither matter being capable of amounting to duress—but it was wrong to direct the jury that the threats of death or serious injury also alleged to have been made must have been the sole reason for his committing the offence. If D would not have committed the offence but for the latter threats the defence was available even if he acted because of the cumulative effect of all the pressure on him. It is probably going too far to say that it is enough that the threats of death were 'the last straw' because the law will look for something more substantial than 'a straw' for an excuse; but threats of death or serious bodily harm can never be trivial, so it is probably sufficient to tell the jury that D has the defence if he would not have acted but for the threats of violence. A jury direction that the defence was available only if D acted solely because of the relevant threats was upheld where it was suggested that he might also have been influenced by greed but the court thought it inadvisable to use the word 'solely' in a summing up.¹²³

¹¹⁸ Draft Criminal Law Bill, cl 25, LC 218. The Commission's recommendation in relation to murder is that the jury should be permitted to take account of all the circumstances except D's capacity to withstand the duress.

¹¹⁹ See Antar [2004] EWCA Crim 2708.

¹²⁰ cf the discussion of Steane [1947] KB 997, [1947] 1 All ER 813. See also GR Rubin, 'New Light on Steane's Case' (2003) 24 Legal History 143. See eg the continued use of such statements which shed little light on the defence: Rahman [2010] EWCA Crim 235.

¹²¹ In DPP v Bell (Derek) [1992] Crim LR 176, DC, D, in terror of an aggressor, began to drive with excess alcohol. Although he admitted that, before the threat, he intended to drive, it was found as a fact (a finding with which the Divisional Court could not interfere) that he drove because of terror and so had a defence of duress of circumstances. But for the threat he might have changed his mind or been persuaded by his passengers not to drive.

¹²² [1985] Crim LR 220 and commentary.

¹²³ Ortiz (1986) 83 Cr App R 173.

A nominated crime demanded?

In the paradigmatic case of duress by threats, the defendant will have been told 'perform this crime or else'. The question has arisen how specific the nomination of the crime must be for D to be able to rely on the threats.¹²⁴ In Cole,¹²⁵ D was convicted of robbing two building societies and pleaded duress on the basis that he had been threatened by money lenders to whom he was in debt. The Court of Appeal held that a plea of duress was not available as the money lenders had not stipulated that he commit robbery to meet their demands. This would place a very strict limitation on the defence. The Court of Appeal held, in addition, in Cole that there was not the degree of immediacy and directness required between the peril threatened and the offence charged. That is a better basis for the decision.

Subsequently, in Ali,¹²⁶ D, a heroin addict, was convicted of robbing a building society and D claimed that his supplier, X, who had a reputation for violence, had demanded repayment of the monies D owed him. Further, D claimed that X had provided D with a gun and told D to get the money by the following day from a bank or a building society. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction but appeared to accept that a threat is capable of amounting to duress when D is charged with robbing a particular building society not specified by the person threatening him.

In a case of duress of circumstances there can be no nominated crime: D faced with an approaching tidal wave or tornado is not 'told' to 'steal that car to drive away', but he is entitled to the defence should he do so.

(5) There is no evasive action D can take

This element of the defence is more properly seen as part of a broader question which is whether the threat is still effective at the time D performs the conduct element of the offence. Historically it was recognized that:

The only force that doth excuse, is a force upon the person, and present fear of death; and his force and fear must continue all the time the party remains with the rebels. It is incumbent on every man, who makes force his defence to show an actual force, and that he quitted the service as soon as he could.¹²⁷

The Court of Appeal has reiterated the 'requirement that the accused must know or believe that the threat is one which will be carried out immediately or before the accused or the other person threatened, can obtain official protection'.¹²⁸ But in Abdul-Hussain,¹²⁹ where Iraqis hijacked an aircraft because they reasonably feared they would be killed if they were returned to Iraq, the court reinterpreted the requirement of immediacy, holding that the question was whether D's response to the 'imminent' threat was proportionate and reasonable.¹³⁰ This relaxation of the defence was controversial. In Hasan, Lord Bingham was at pains to reassert the primacy of the requirement of the 'immediacy of the threat' and D's inability to avoid it, which he described as the 'cardinal feature' of the ¹²⁴ This issue was confronted directly by the Supreme Court of Canada in Ryan [2013] SCC 3. The court held that the defence is available only when D has been compelled to commit a specific offence under threats of death or bodily harm. See recently Khan [2018] EWCA Crim 78.

¹²⁵ [1994] Crim LR 582. In Hasan, Lord Bingham approved the decision regarding the threat as lacking immediacy. See recently Khan [2018] EWCA Crim 78.

¹²⁶ (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 692, [1995] Crim LR 303.

¹²⁷ M'Growther (1746) Fost 13 at 14, per Lee CJ.

¹²⁸ Hurst [1995] 1 Cr App R 82 at 93; Flatt [1996] Crim LR 576.

¹²⁹ [1999] Crim LR 570.

¹³⁰ See Abdul-Hussain [1999] Crim LR 570, where the court added 'if Anne Frank had stolen a car to escape from Amsterdam and been charged with theft, the tenets of English law would not, in our judgment, have denied her a defence of duress of circumstances, on the ground that she should have waited for the Gestapo's knock on the door'.

defence.¹³¹ His lordship was of the view that the defence would not be available if there was a delay of a day between D being threatened with being shot and his commission of the crime.¹³² Surely this must depend on the circumstances, however. There may be instances where, despite the delay of a day, the defence ought to be available.

Duress where D has an opportunity to inform the police

If D is able reasonably to resort to the protection of the law, he must do so or the defence will be lost. In Hasan, Lord Bingham observed that it should be made clear to juries that unless D reasonably expects the threats to be carried out ‘immediately or almost immediately’ the defence may be lost because there may be little room for doubt that D could take evasive action. The question whether D had a reasonable opportunity to take evasive action ought not in Lord Bingham’s view to be subsumed within the question whether D had a reasonable belief in the existence of the threat and whether a reasonable person in D’s circumstances would have responded as D did.¹³³

When the threat is withdrawn or becomes ineffective, D must desist from committing the crime as soon as he reasonably can. If, for example, having consumed excess alcohol, D is threatened and drives off in fear of his life, he commits a drink-driving offence only if the prosecution can prove that he continued to drive after the terror ceased.¹³⁴

Where the threats operate, or D reasonably perceives them as operating on someone other than himself, the question whether the threat is still operative may be more difficult to determine. For example, in Hurley, D had ample opportunity to place himself under the protection of the police but the court held that the defence of duress might still be available because his de facto wife was held as a hostage by his oppressors. Though he himself was physically out of range, the threats against her were presently operative on his mind.

*Hudson and Taylor*¹³⁵ went further. Two young women, called as witnesses for the prosecution, gave false evidence because they had been threatened by a gang with serious physical injury if they told the truth, and they saw one of the gang in the public gallery of the court. The young women were charged with perjury. Duress was accepted as a defence even though they could have put themselves under the protection of the law by informing the court; and there were no threats to third parties. The court thought it immaterial that the threatened injury could not follow at once since (in its opinion) there was no opportunity for delaying tactics and they had to make up their minds whether to commit the offence while the threat was operating. The threat was no less compelling because it could not be carried out there if it could be carried out in the streets of Salford the same night. The case turns on the point that police protection could not be effective. It was recognized to extend the possible ambit of the defence widely for there would be few cases where the police can offer effective and permanent protection against such threats.¹³⁶ However, in Hasan, Lord Bingham regarded ¹³¹ At [25]–[26].

¹³² The Supreme Court of Canada in Ryan [2013] SCC 3 affirmed that in Canadian law it must be demonstrated that any course of action other than inflicting the injury (or committing the crime) was ‘demonstrably impossible’ or that there was ‘no other legal way out’.

¹³³ At [24].

¹³⁴ DPP v Bell (Derek), n 121. See the reiteration of this in Malcolm v DPP [2007] EWHC 363 (Admin), [2007] Crim LR 894; Mullaley [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin) and in Brown v CPS [2007] EWHC 3274 (Admin).

¹³⁵ [1971] 2 All ER 244; followed by Lewis (1992) 96 Cr App R 412 at 415. Described by Ryan and Ryan (2005) 56 NILQ 421, commenting on Hasan as a ‘historical anomaly’, at 427.

¹³⁶ See comment in [1971] Crim LR 359 and (by Goodhart) in 87 LQR 299 and 121 NLJ 909 and (by Zellick) in 121 NLJ 845. In K (1983) 78 Cr App R 82, CA, it was held that duress might be available as a defence to contempt of court committed in the witness box by a prisoner who had been threatened with reprisals against himself and his family, by the accused, a fellow prisoner. The Law Commission originally proposed: ‘The threat must be, or the defendant must believe that it is, one that will be carried out immediately, or before he (or the person under threat) can obtain official protection: Criminal Law Bill, clause 25(2)(b). This provision, by allowing the defence if the defendant believes that official protection will be ineffective, differs from previous treatments of the point’—Report, para 29.2. In LC 304, the Law Commission now recommends an objective test.

Hudson and Taylor as having had 'the unfortunate effect of weakening the requirement that execution of a threat must be reasonably believed to be imminent and immediate'.¹³⁷ Such a strict standard may be supported by the need to prevent the defence being misused and pleaded in spurious cases, but is it right that a defendant who reasonably fears he will be shot tomorrow after perjuring himself today ought not to be allowed a defence of duress? His lordship seems to be focusing the question on whether D could avoid compliance with the threat, which is in one sense practically always possible. The real question is whether D could take action which would negative the threat itself. If D genuinely, and perhaps reasonably, believes that the police or others cannot protect him from the threat, should he be denied the defence?¹³⁸ What if those under threat are held overseas beyond the protection of the British police? The Court of Appeal in Batchelor went even further in expressing disapproval of Hudson and Taylor.¹³⁹ Elias LJ, after citing Lord Bingham's reasoning in Hasan, stated that the Court of Appeal in Hudson had allowed its sympathy for the defendants to distort legal principles.¹⁴⁰ Even more recently, in Brandford,¹⁴¹ one of the reasons why the Court of Appeal rejected the defendant's reliance upon duress was the fact that the relevant threats lacked the immediacy that would have precluded her from taking evasive action, such as by going to the police. As a result of this case law, it is submitted that Hudson and Taylor should no longer be followed. As noted earlier, however, the difficult question remains: should D be denied the threat if he genuinely, and perhaps reasonably, believes the police cannot prevent the threat being carried out?

As with the question whether the reasonable person would have withstood the pressure, similar principles apply to the rule requiring D to escape from duress if possible. His defence will fail if an ordinary person of his sex, age and other relevant characteristics would have taken an opportunity to escape. Obviously, physical disabilities, for example that he had difficulties in walking, would be taken into account.¹⁴² Following Graham, however, he must presumably be taken to have been aware of opportunities of which he ought reasonably to have been aware at the time the opportunity arose.¹⁴³ A better view, it is submitted, is that if he was not in fact aware of the opportunity to escape, he should not be penalized for his stupidity or slow-wittedness. In view of recent judicial pronouncements in this area such an approach would probably be seen as too generous to the accused.

If the defence of duress is left to the jury and D seeks to explain his decision not to seek assistance from the authorities rather than commit the crime, it is not necessarily incumbent on the judge to spell out each of the risks to D if he had taken such a route.¹⁴⁴

(6) D cannot rely on threats to which he has voluntarily laid himself open

A further important limitation on the defence is that the threat cannot be one that arises from D having voluntarily exposed himself to threats of violence. This has become an increasingly problematic area and the courts have sought to prevent the defence being too

¹³⁷ At [27]. Lord Bingham at one point suggests that the defence in Hudson should fail because there was no question that DD had 'no opportunity to avoid'. That is surely too strict a view. The question is whether they had a reasonable chance to avoid the threats. For examples of the strictness of Hasan being applied, see N [2007] EWCA Crim 3479 and see Hussain [2008] EWCA Crim 1117. and Khan [2018] EWCA Crim 78

¹³⁸ Consider the High Court of Australia case of Taiapa [2009] HCA 53 in which D was denied the opportunity to rely on the compulsion defence where, having been threatened at gun point that he, his pregnant girlfriend and his mother would be shot unless he couriered drugs, D drove to collect the drugs and did not report to the police. His asserted belief that the police would not protect him and his family was found not to give rise to the defence.

¹³⁹ [2013] EWCA Crim 2638.

¹⁴⁰ At [15].

¹⁴¹ [2016] EWCA Crim 1794.

¹⁴² But the fact that he was voluntarily drunk or drugged might be considered irrelevant.

¹⁴³ Aikens, n 49.

¹⁴⁴ See Aldridge [2006] EWCA Crim 1970 where D had been threatened that his children would be beheaded with a samurai sword if he did not participate in a robbery.

readily available to those involved in drug-related and terrorist crime, in particular where their involvement demonstrates a degree of prior culpability. The restriction is hedged in with qualifications. In Hasan,¹⁴⁵ the House of Lords expressed concern at the way in which the defence was being relied on more readily by defendants in more cases and that there was a danger that the restrictive elements of the offence were not being applied rigorously enough.¹⁴⁶

Voluntary exposure to threats

D will be denied the defence if he voluntarily exposed himself to a risk of threats. An example is *Sharp*¹⁴⁷ where D, who was a party to a conspiracy to commit robberies, said that he wanted to withdraw when he saw his confederates equipped with guns, whereupon E threatened to blow his head off if he did not carry on with the plan. In the course of the robbery, E killed V. D's conviction for manslaughter was upheld after a jury had rejected his defence of duress. This had been the approach adopted in Northern Ireland in Fitzpatrick (duress no defence to a charge of robbery committed as a result of threats by the IRA because D had voluntarily joined that organization)¹⁴⁸ and the dicta of Lords Morris, Wilberforce and Simon in Lynch.¹⁴⁹ It would be different of course if D was compelled to join the violent organization by threats of death or serious bodily harm; then, in principle, he should not be deprived of the defence. Whether any lesser threat should suffice at this stage has not been decided. As Baroness Hale persuasively put the matter in Hasan, the question ought to be whether D by his joining exposed himself to the risk 'without reasonable excuse'.¹⁵⁰

The types of organization

Most cases in this category involve D joining a criminal gang. In Sharp, the gang were armed robbers; in Fitzpatrick, a paramilitary organization. In Lewis,¹⁵¹ the court construed this limitation on the defence strictly to be limited to associations such as 'a para-military or gangster-tyrant style of organization'. It has been applied so as to deny defendants a duress defence in wider circumstances. For example, in Shepherd,¹⁵² D voluntarily joined a gang of burglars but wanted to give up after his first outing and raised the defence of duress by the gang to a charge of a later burglary, it was held that it should have been left to the jury to decide whether he was taking a risk of being subjected to such a threat of violence when he joined the gang.

In Ali,¹⁵³ the Court of Appeal held that if D has joined with others whom he ought to have realized might subject him to threats of violence, he is denied the defence of duress. The defence is lost irrespective of whether he has joined an existing criminal gang. D was convicted of the robbery at knife point of a vehicle owner. His plea of duress had been rejected at trial on the basis that D had voluntarily joined with the alleged duressor, BH, a co-accused in the robbery. D knew that BH carried a knife and had been warned not to associate with BH. The trial judge directed the jury that duress does not apply if:

the defendant chooses voluntarily to associate with others where he ought to foresee that he might be subjected to compulsion by threats of violence...If you choose to join very bad company, such bad company that you can foresee that you are going to be liable to threats of some kind to do things, then you cannot complain and say I was forced to do them when you had voluntarily associated with those people.

¹⁴⁵ [2005] UKHL 22, [2006] Crim LR 142.

¹⁴⁶ See especially Lord Bingham's speech at [22].

¹⁴⁷ [1987] QB 853, [1987] Crim LR 566.

¹⁴⁸ [1977] NI 20, CA. ¹⁴⁹ [1975] AC 653.

¹⁵⁰ At [78].

¹⁵¹ (1993) 96 Cr App R 412; Kleijn [2001] All ER (D) 143 (May).

¹⁵² (1987) 86 Cr App R 47.

¹⁵³ [2008] EWCA Crim 716.

The judge elaborated on what was meant by 'bad company' explaining that joining bad company:

doesn't just mean people who are going about doing bad things, it means people who you should have realised could would be likely to, or may, subject you to compulsion by threats of violence.

The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction. In Hasan,¹⁵⁴ Lord Bingham had answered the certified question by saying that:

the defence of duress is excluded when as a result of the accused's voluntary association with others engaged in criminal activity he foresaw or ought reasonably to have foreseen the risk of being subjected to any compulsion by threats of violence.¹⁵⁵

The italicized words might suggest that the defence is only lost where D joins an existing criminal gang. Ali rejects any such limitation.

Active membership

It is too late if D attempts to withdraw from the organization when the particular enterprise which resulted in the charge is in contemplation. No defence of duress is available. But a person who joined a paramilitary organization in his youth can hardly be held to have forfeited his right to plead duress by that organization for life. If he has done all he can to sever his connection with it before the particular incident was in contemplation, should he not be able to rely on the defence?

The risk to which D was exposing himself

In Lewis, D, who was serving a sentence for armed robbery, was savagely attacked in the prison yard by E, who was serving a sentence for the same robbery. D refused to testify against E because he was terrified of reprisals and was charged with contempt of court. It was held that duress ought to have been available as a defence to that charge. There was no evidence that D knew that he was exposing himself to the risk of this sort of threat when he participated in the armed robbery with E much earlier in time.

Initially the courts held that D would be denied the defence only where he voluntarily put himself in a position where he was aware of the risk of being subjected to pressure by way of violence to commit offences of the type alleged (*Baker and Ward*¹⁵⁶). Subsequently a harsher view has been adopted. D will be denied the defence if he exposed himself to unlawful threats more generally: Heath,¹⁵⁷ Harmer.¹⁵⁸ Despite the cogent academic criticism of this approach,¹⁵⁹ the House of Lords in Hasan confirmed this harsh view. Lord Bingham explained that:

The defendant is, ex hypothesi, a person who has voluntarily surrendered his will to the domination of another. Nothing should turn on foresight of the manner in which, in the event, the dominant party chooses to exploit the defendant's subservience. There need not be foresight of coercion to commit crimes, although it is not easy to envisage circumstances in which a party might be coerced to act lawfully.¹⁶⁰

¹⁵⁴ [2005] UKHL 22, [39].

¹⁵⁵ Emphasis added.

¹⁵⁶ [1999] 2 Cr App R 355.

¹⁵⁷ Heath [2000] Crim LR 109 (indebted drug user, aware that he might be subjected to threats, required to transport £300K of cannabis), distinguishing Baker and Ward (ibid) (inadequate direction).

¹⁵⁸ [2001] EWCA Crim 2930, [2002] Crim LR 401.

¹⁵⁹ As JC Smith noted in commenting on Heath [2000] Crim LR 109, 'it is one thing to be aware that you are likely to be beaten up if you do not pay your debts, it is another that you may be aware that you may be required under threat of violence to commit other, though unspecified crimes, if you do not'.

¹⁶⁰ At [37]. Cf Baroness Hale's example of the battered woman compelled to perform lawful tasks of ironing, at [77].

In Ali,¹⁶¹ the court suggested a very harsh approach whereby D could not rely on the defence if he foresaw/ought to have foreseen that he was likely to be subjected to compulsion by threats. The court drew on the approval by Lord Bingham of the trial judge's direction in Hasan.¹⁶² The approach in Ali and in Hasan is to deny the defence not only on the basis of D's association with a criminal gang, but on associating with anyone he ought to have foreseen might put him under compulsion by threats.

D's awareness of the risk to which he is exposing himself

Hasan confirms that the duress defence is unavailable where the risk to which D exposes himself is pressure to commit any crime. A further question arises whether the defence can only be denied to D where he is proved to have been aware of that risk (subjectively), or whether it is sufficient that he ought to have been aware of that risk (objectively). As a matter of policy the House of Lords in Hasan suggests that the test is whether D ought to have known. Again, this restricts the availability of the defence.¹⁶³

In Ali, the Court of Appeal took the objective approach, holding that duress is not available if D ought to have foreseen that the others might threaten him. The interpretation will operate very harshly for those involved in, inter alia, drug misuse. Many users of drugs will associate themselves with drug dealers and in many, if not most, cases the users ought to realize that the dealer might be likely to threaten them with violence. If the dealer does threaten the user with violence unless the user commits crimes (usually to pay the dealer), the user will be denied the defence of duress.¹⁶⁴ Baroness Hale's minority speech in Hasan adopts a more subjective approach, suggesting that the defence is denied only where D has himself foreseen a risk that he will be compelled by threats of violence to commit crime. It is submitted this is preferable approach, but it is not the law.

The policy of the law is clearly to discourage association with known criminals, and to be slow to excuse the criminal conduct of those who do so. If a person voluntarily becomes or remains associated with others engaged in criminal activity in a situation where he knows or ought reasonably to know that he may be the subject of compulsion by them or their associates, he cannot rely on the defence to excuse any act which he is thereafter compelled to do by them. It is not necessary in this case to decide whether or to what extent that principle applies if an undercover agent penetrates a criminal gang for bona fide law enforcement purposes and is compelled by the gang to commit criminal acts.¹⁶⁵

(7) Offences to which duress/duress of circumstances available

Duress by threats has been accepted as a defence to manslaughter,¹⁶⁶ criminal damage,¹⁶⁷ arson,¹⁶⁸ theft,¹⁶⁹ handling,¹⁷⁰ perjury and contempt of court,¹⁷¹ perverting the course of ¹⁶¹ [2008] EWCA Crim 716.

¹⁶² 'Did the defendant voluntarily put himself in the position, in which he knew he was likely to be subjected to threats? You look to judge that in all the circumstances ... if someone voluntarily associates with the sort of people who he knows are likely to put pressure on him, then he cannot really complain, if he finds himself under pressure. If you are sure that he did voluntarily put himself in such a position, the defence fails and he was guilty. If you are not sure and you have not been sure about all of the other questions, then you would find him not guilty.' At [14].

¹⁶³ cf Baroness Hale commenting on the attractions of the subjectivist approach advanced by the Law Commission, at [75].

¹⁶⁴ cf Heath [2000] Crim LR 109. See also Lal [2009] EWCA Crim 2393 and Mullally [2012] EWCA Crim 687.

¹⁶⁵ Lord Bingham at [38].

¹⁶⁶ Evans and Gardiner [1976] VR 517 and (No 2) 523.

¹⁶⁷ Crutchley (1831) 5 C & P 133.

¹⁶⁸ Shiartos (Lawton J, 29 Sept 1961, CCA), unreported but referred to in Gill, n 169.

¹⁶⁹ Gill [1963] 2 All ER 688, [1963] 1 WLR 841, CCA.

¹⁷⁰ A-G v Whelan [1934] IR 518.

¹⁷¹ K (1983) 78 Cr App R 82, [1983] Crim LR 736, CA; Lewis (1992) 96 Cr App R 412.

justice,¹⁷² offences under the Official Secrets Acts¹⁷³ and drug offences.¹⁷⁴ The courts have also assumed that it would apply to buggery¹⁷⁵ (presumably therefore also to sex offences under the 2003 Act) and conspiracy¹⁷⁶ to defraud. It is available to strict liability crimes,¹⁷⁷ but, depending on the terms of the offence, not always to status crimes.¹⁷⁸

Duress of circumstances has been held to be a defence to various road traffic offences, to hijacking, contrary to s 1(1) of the Aviation Security Act 1982¹⁷⁹ and to unlawful possession of a firearm. It now seems safe to say that either kind of duress may be a defence to any crime,¹⁸⁰ except some forms of treason, murder and attempted murder.¹⁸¹

Duress and treason

Although typically it is said that treason is a crime where duress is not a defence, it is quite clear that it may be a defence to at least some forms of treason.¹⁸² As long ago as 1419 in Oldcastle's case,¹⁸³ the accused, who were charged with treason in supplying victuals (food) to Sir John Oldcastle and his fellow rebels, were acquitted on the grounds that they acted through fear of death and desisted as soon as they could. The existence of the defence was admitted, obiter, by Lee CJ in M'Growther,¹⁸⁴ a trial for treason committed in the 1745 rebellion and by Lord Mansfield in Stratton.¹⁸⁵ if a man is forced to commit acts of high treason, if it appears really force, and such as human nature could not be expected to resist and the jury are of that opinion, the man is not guilty of high treason.

Much more recently, in Purdy,¹⁸⁶ Oliver J directed a jury that fear of death would be a defence to a British prisoner of war who was charged with treason in having assisted with German propaganda in the Second World War. Against this, Lord Goddard CJ said in *Steane*¹⁸⁷ that the defence did not apply to treason, but this remark appears to have been made per incuriam. Treason is an offence which may take many forms varying widely in seriousness and it would be wrong to suppose that threats, even of death, will necessarily be a defence to every act of treason. In Oldcastle's case,¹⁸⁸ Hale emphasizes that the accuseds' act was only furnishing of victuals and he appears to question whether, if they had taken a more active part in the rebellion, they would have been excused. Stephen thought the defence only applied where the offender took a subordinate part.

Duress and murder

It was stated in the books from Hale onwards that duress could not be a defence to a charge of murder. As Blackstone put it, a man under duress 'ought rather to die himself than escape

¹⁷² Hudson v Taylor [1971] 2 QB 202. ¹⁷³ Shayler [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [2001] Crim LR 986.

¹⁷⁴ Valderrama-Vega [1985] Crim LR 220; Ortiz (1986) 83 Cr App R 173.

¹⁷⁵ Bourne (1952) 36 Cr App R 125.

¹⁷⁶ Verrier [1965] Crim LR 732. In Abdul-Hussain [1999] Crim LR 570, the court doubted whether duress can be a defence to conspiracy; but if it is a defence to doing the act, it must surely be a defence to agreeing to do it.

¹⁷⁷ Eden DC v Braid [1998] COD 259.

¹⁷⁸ See New Forest Local Education Authority v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin), n 180.

¹⁷⁹ Abdul-Hussain [1999] Crim LR 570.

¹⁸⁰ Its use in relation to a charge under s 444 of the Education Act 1996, where a parent was charged with failing to secure the attendance of a child was doubted; New Forest Local Education Authority v E [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin).

¹⁸¹ It is not available to civil tax penalties: Mu v Customs and Excise [2001] VTD 17504.

¹⁸² [1975] AC 653, [1975] 1 All ER at 920, per Lord Morris; 940, per Lord Simon; 944, per Lord Kilbrandon. In Gotts [1992] 2 AC 412, [1992] 2 WLR 284 at 300, Lord Lowry excepts 'most forms of treason'. This passage was cited by Lord Bingham in Hasan.

¹⁸³ (1419) Hale, I PC, 50, East, I PC, 70.

¹⁸⁴ (1746) Fost 13, 18 State Tr 391.

¹⁸⁵ (1779) 21 State Tr 1045.

¹⁸⁶ (1946) 10 J Crim L 182.

¹⁸⁷ [1947] KB 997 at 1005, [1947] 1 All ER 813 at 817.

¹⁸⁸ (1419) Hale, I PC, 50.

by the murder of an innocent'.¹⁸⁹ There was, however, no clear judicial authority in point and in 1969 in *Kray*¹⁹⁰ an inroad was made into the supposed rule when Widgery LJ said that a person charged as an accessory before the fact to murder might rely on duress. In 1975, in Lynch v DPP for Northern Ireland,¹⁹¹ the House of Lords, by a majority of three to two, held that a person charged with aiding and abetting murder¹⁹² could have a defence of duress. The position of the actual killer was left open and in *Abbott*¹⁹³ in 1976, again by three to two, the Privy Council distinguished Lynch and held that the defence was not available to the principal offender, the actual killer. This was an illogical and unsatisfactory position because it is by no means always the case that the actual killer is the most dominant or culpable member of a number of accomplices, but under the law as it then stood he alone was excluded from the defence. The distinctions involved were technical and absurd.¹⁹⁴ Accordingly, when the matter came before the House of Lords in Howe,¹⁹⁵ there was a strong case for either going forward and allowing the defence to all alleged parties to murder, or backward, and allowing it to none. The House chose the latter course, overruling its own decision in Lynch. The speeches emphasize different aspects, but the following reasons for the decision appear among them.

- (1) The ordinary person of reasonable fortitude, if asked to take an innocent life, might be expected to sacrifice his own.¹⁹⁶ Lord Hailsham would not 'regard a law as either "just;" or "humane" which withdraws the protection of the criminal law from the innocent victim and casts the cloak of its protection on the coward and the poltroon in the name^[197] of a 'concession to human frailty'.
- (2) One who takes the life of an innocent person cannot claim that he is choosing the lesser of two evils.¹⁹⁸
- (3) The Law Commission had recommended¹⁹⁹ ten years previously that duress should be a defence to the alleged principal offender, but Parliament had not acted on that recommendation.²⁰⁰
- (4) Hard cases could be dealt with by not prosecuting—in some cases the person under duress might be expected to be the principal witness for the prosecution²⁰¹—or by the action of the Parole Board in ordering the early release of a person who would have had a defence if duress had been an available defence.²⁰²

¹⁸⁹ Blackstone, Commentaries, iv, 30.

¹⁹⁰ [1970] 1 QB 125, [1969] 3 All ER 941.

¹⁹¹ [1975] AC 653, [1975] Crim LR 707.

¹⁹² One who would have been a principal in the second degree under the law of felonies.

¹⁹³ [1977] AC 755, [1976] 3 All ER 140.

¹⁹⁴ Graham [1982] 1 All ER 801 at 804 per Lane LCJ. See also IH Dennis, 'Duress, Murder and Criminal Responsibility' (1980) 106 LQR 208.

¹⁹⁵ [1987] AC 417, [1987] 1 All ER 771, [1987] Crim LR 480 (sub nom Burke) and commentary. See also F Stark, 'R v Howe' in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017); H Milgate, 'Duress and the Criminal Law: Another About Turn by the House of Lords' (1988) 47 CLJ 61; L Walters, 'Murder under Duress and Judicial Decision Making in the House of Lords' (1988) 18 LS 61; Horder, Excusing Crime, 133–137.

¹⁹⁶ Howe [1987] 1 All ER 771 at 779–780.

¹⁹⁷ Referring to the 5th edition of this book, at p 215.

¹⁹⁸ Lord Hailsham, Howe (n 195) at 780. Art 2 of the ECHR will be engaged in cases of intentional killing.

¹⁹⁹ Lord Bridge, ibid, at 784 and Lord Griffiths at 788.

²⁰⁰ LC 83, Report on Defences of General Application (1977).

²⁰¹ Lord Griffiths, Howe (n 195) at 790.

²⁰² Lord Griffiths, ibid, at 791 and Lord Hailsham at 780–781. In non-murder cases the suggestion that the defence should be kept within strict limits and that no injustice will result because of the availability of sentencing discretion met with approval from Lord Bingham in Hasan, at [22], but cf Baroness Hale for convincing arguments against.

It is submitted that none of these reasons is at all convincing.²⁰³

- (a) If the defence were available, it would apply only when a jury thought a person of reasonable fortitude would have yielded to the threat. The criminal law should not require heroism, for, as Reed argues 'it is inapt to demand heroism as a pre-requisite for exculpation'.²⁰⁴ Moreover, there are circumstances in which the good citizen of reasonable fortitude not only would, but probably should, yield to the threat because—
- (b) to do so might clearly be to choose the lesser of two evils, as where the threat is to kill D and all his family if he does not do, or assist in, an act which he knows will cause grievous harm but not death (though, ex hypothesi, it has resulted in death and so constitutes murder).
- (c) Parliament's failure to act on the Law Commission recommendation proves nothing. The government has not given Parliament the opportunity to consider the matter. By parity of reason, Parliament might be taken to have approved of Lynch's case, because there has been no move to overrule it.
- (d) Even if he were not prosecuted, the 'duressee' would be, in law, a murderer and, if he were called as a prosecution witness, the judge would, at the time of the decision in Howe, have been required to tell the jury that he was an accomplice in murder on whose evidence it would be dangerous to act in the absence of corroboration. A morally innocent person should not be left at the mercy of administrative discretion on a murder charge.

There is clearly a strong argument for reversing Howe.²⁰⁵ Lord Bingham suggested that the logic of the argument is 'irresistible'.²⁰⁶ *Wilson*²⁰⁷ illustrates the difficulties when duress cannot be a defence to a charge of murder, even if the person seeking to rely on that defence is a child and even if his alleged role in the murder was that of a secondary party acting out of fear of an adult perpetrator. The 13-year-old defendant was not able to plead duress, but argued instead that he had 'not known what he was doing in that his mind did not go with his actions'.²⁰⁸ The Court of Appeal observed in Wilson that there 'might be grounds for ²⁰³ This opinion was endorsed by Judge Stephen who, with Judge Cassese, was, however, dissenting in Prosecutor v Drazen Erdemovic (Case No IT-96-22-A) in the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law in the Former Yugoslavia. For an interesting discussion of whether the defence of duress ought to have been available to someone charged with war crimes for killing innocent civilians when he was threatened with death if he did not comply, see L Chiesa, 'Duress, Demanding Heroism, and Proportionality' (2008) 41 Vanderbilt J Transn'l Crime 741.

²⁰⁴ A Reed, 'Duress and Normative Moral Excuse: Comparative Standardisations and the Ambit of Affirmative Defences' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014) 100.

²⁰⁵ On the need for reform see A Reed, 'The Need for a New Anglo American Approach to Duress' (1996) 61 J Crim L 209. See KJ Arenson, 'The Paradox of Disallowing Duress as a Defence to Murder' (2014) 78 J Crim L 65. Arenson argues that it is paradoxical that provocation operates as a partial defence to murder but duress does not.

²⁰⁶ Hasan at [21]. It is unlikely that the Supreme Court would change the position. Cf Dunne v DPP [2016] IESC 24 in which the Supreme Court in Ireland declined to do so. See also R v Ryan (2013) 290 CCC (3d) 477, Supreme Court of Canada declining to address this issue. In Aravena [2015] ONCA 250, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that duress is a defence to persons charged as parties to a murder. Although the constitutionality of the murder exemption as it applies to principals was not before the court, it stated that, 'subject to any argument the Crown might advance justifying the exception as it applies to perpetrators under s. 1 of the Charter, the exception must be found unconstitutional'.

²⁰⁷ [2007] EWCA Crim 1251, [2008] Crim LR 138.

²⁰⁸ His police interview did not support this defence, but suggested that he acted under duress from his father—the very defence he was precluded from running.

criticising' a rule that denied a child any defence to a charge of murder on the grounds of adult or parental duress, but had no choice but to apply the law as it stood.²⁰⁹

The Law Commission in its Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide Report recommended allowing the defence to the charge of murder, but controversially, recommended reversing the burden of proof.²¹⁰ The Commission²¹¹ report addresses a range of options and concludes, rightly it is submitted, that if the jury find that D acted under duress within all the stringent requirements of the defence, he ought to be acquitted rather than guilty of manslaughter.²¹²

Attempted murder and other related offences

In Howe, only Lord Griffiths²¹³ expressed a clear view that duress is not a defence to attempted murder and the House of Lords subsequently agreed with that view by a majority of three to two in Gotts.²¹⁴ This is logical, otherwise the effect would be that D's act would be excusable when done, and only become inexcusable if death resulted.

Logic would also require the exclusion of the defence on a charge under s 18 of the OAPA 1861 of causing grievous bodily harm with intent because here also, the offence becomes murder if death results from it. A distinction might be made between murder committed with intent to kill, where duress would not be a defence, and murder committed with intent to cause serious bodily harm, where it would. This would be reconcilable with the traditional statement of the law—a person 'ought rather to die himself than escape by the murder of an innocent'—which seems to postulate a decision to kill; but Howe seems too emphatic and uncompromising a decision to allow of any such refinement. Gotts indicates that the line is to be drawn below attempted murder, leaving the defence applicable to conspiracy to murder and assisting or encouraging murder. Indeed, in *Ness*²¹⁵ the judge ruled that duress is a defence to a charge of conspiracy to murder. Given that there exists no appellate decision directly on point, the judge chose to follow the 'closest authoritative statement' of Lord Lane in Gotts and endorsed the widely accepted view that duress is only excluded on a charge of murder, attempted murder and treason.

There is no point in raising the defence of duress to a murder charge; but suppose, as is frequently the case, that the evidence is such that the jury might properly acquit of murder and convict of manslaughter. If there is evidence that D may have been acting under duress²¹⁶ it is submitted that the judge should direct the jury that they must not convict of manslaughter either, unless they are sure that D was not acting under duress.

10.2.2 Duress of circumstances

10.2.2.1 The emergence of the defence

The recognition of this defence occurred, more or less by accident, in Willer.²¹⁷ D was charged with reckless driving after he had driven very slowly on a pavement in order to ²⁰⁹ See commentary by A Ashworth [2008] Crim LR 138.

²¹⁰ LC 304, para 6.116. See also LCCP 177 in which the Commission took a different view. Cf O Quick and C Wells, 'Getting Tough with Defences' [2006] Crim LR 514.

²¹¹ LCCP 177, paras 7.18–7.19.

²¹² LC 304, para 6.53.

²¹³ Howe (n 195) at 780 and 790.

²¹⁴ [1992] 2 AC 412, HL. Lord Lowry, dissenting, thought it is 'the stark fact of death' which distinguishes murder from all other offences. See S Gardner, 'Duress in Attempted Murder' (1991) 107 LQR 389. The issues are discussed in LCCP 177, para 7.60.

²¹⁵ [2011] Crim LR 645 and commentary.

²¹⁶ cf Gilmour [2000] 2 Cr App R 407 where D was roused from his bed and, unwillingly, drove the terrorist murderers to and from the scene of the crime.

²¹⁷ (1986) 83 Cr App R 225. On the emergence of the defence more generally see S Gardner, 'Necessity's Newest Invention' (1991) 11 OJLS 125.

escape from a gang of youths who were obviously intent on doing violence to him and his passengers. The trial judge declined to leave the defence of necessity to the jury. The Court of Appeal quashed D's conviction. They said that there was no need to decide on any defence of necessity that might have existed because 'the defence of duress^[218] arose but was not pursued', as it ought to have been. It should have been left to the jury to say whether D drove 'under that form of compulsion, ie, under duress'. But this was not an instance of the previously recognized defence of duress by threats—the youths were not saying, 'Drive on the pavement—or else...' There is a closer analogy with self-defence.²¹⁹ But in substance the court was simply allowing the defence of necessity which it purported to dismiss as unnecessary to the decision. It should surely make no difference whether D drove on the pavement to escape from the youths, or a herd of charging bulls, a runaway lorry or a flood, if he did so in order to escape what he reasonably believed to be a threat of death or serious bodily harm.

Subsequent cases have not dismissed Willer as a case decided per incuriam. They have treated it as rightly decided but have recognized that it is not the long-established defence of duress but an extension of it—'duress of circumstances'—the relationship of which to necessity has not been settled (see later). In Conway,²²⁰ another case of reckless driving, D's passenger, Tonna, had been the target of an attack on another vehicle a few weeks earlier when another man was shot and Tonna had a narrow escape. According to D, when two young men in civilian clothes came running towards D's parked car, Tonna shouted hysterically, 'Drive off'. D drove off because he feared a deadly attack on Tonna. Being pursued by the two men in an unmarked vehicle, he drove in a manner which the jury adjudged to be reckless. The two men were police officers who wished to interview Tonna. D's conviction was quashed because the defence of duress of circumstances had not been left to the jury.

Willer and Conway were followed in Martin (Colin).²²¹ D, while disqualified, drove his stepson, who had overslept, to work. He said that he did so because his wife feared that the boy would lose his job if he were late and she threatened to commit suicide if D did not drive him. The wife had suicidal tendencies and a doctor stated that it was likely that she would have carried out her threat. The defence ought to have been left to the jury. According to the Court of Appeal, the defence:

can arise from other objective dangers threatening the accused or others...the defence is available only if, from an objective standpoint, the accused can be said to be acting reasonably and proportionately in order to avoid a threat of death or serious injury...[The] jury should be directed to determine these two questions: First, was the accused, or may he have been impelled to act as he did as a result of what he reasonably believed to be the situation he had good cause to fear that otherwise death or serious physical injury would result; Second, if so, would a sober person of reasonable firmness, sharing the characteristics of the accused, have responded to that situation by acting as the accused acted?²²²

On the facts, the case seems to be strictly a case of duress by threats, where D is told, 'Commit the crime or else...' The defence, as with duress by threats, is available only so long as the 'circumstances' continue to threaten. It may have been available (though the court did not decide the point) to a driver who drove off with excess alcohol in his blood to escape assailants; but it was not necessary for him to drive the two and a half miles to his home.²²³ But where it was found that D, having consumed excess alcohol, drove off in fear of his life, ²¹⁸ The 'very different' defence of duress according to the court in Denton (1987) 85 Cr App R 246 at 248.

²¹⁹ See p 383. ²²⁰ [1989] QB 290, [1989] Crim LR 74.

²²¹ [1989] 1 All ER 652, [1989] Crim LR 284. ²²² Per Simon Brown J at 653.

²²³ DPP v Jones [1990] RTR 34, DC. Nor to drive 72 miles when intoxicated to escape a threat, DPP v Tomkinson [2001] EWHC Admin 182.

he was guilty of an offence only if the prosecution could prove that he continued to drive after the terror ceased.²²⁴ Similarly, in Arnaot,²²⁵ where the court doubted there was any evidence that D was compelled by fear for her safety to drive dangerously following a road traffic incident.

In S and L,²²⁶ S was charged with an offence of using unlicensed guards and sought to plead 'necessity' in that he had to deploy unlicensed guards in an emergency. The Court of Appeal referred to the trial judge's 'immaculate judgment' containing a clear and correct statement of the law of 'necessity'. For such a defence there had to be material on which a reasonable jury might conclude that:

- (1) it had not been possible for S and L to obtain a licence before the threat to the premises became so acute as to compel them to deploy unlicensed guards. Although no specific threat must be identified as a matter of law, in the absence of such, it may be very difficult to identify material fit to go to a jury;²²⁷
- (2) the deployment of the guards was directly caused by an immediate or imminent threat of death or serious injury;
- (3) no other means could reasonably have been taken to avoid the risk. The judge found that the material relied on by the defence did not support the ingredients of the defence.

With respect, this sounds very much like a defence of duress of circumstances rather than one of necessity.

The Court of Appeal is clearly anxious to keep a tight degree of control over the defence of duress of circumstances (as with duress by threats).²²⁸

In Quayle,²²⁹ the court heard a number of appeals and a related reference by the Attorney General. The issue in each case was whether the defence of necessity or 'necessity of circumstances' as it preferred to say, should be left to the jury in respect of offences of: possession, cultivation or production of cannabis where D genuinely and reasonably believed that such activities were necessary to avoid him suffering pain arising from a pre-existing medical condition or from conventional medicine to which he would otherwise resort to reduce the pain. Some of the appeals related to importation or possession with intent to supply cannabis for the purpose of alleviating pain suffered by others in similar circumstances. The defence argument was, in short, that the 'evil' of non-compliance with the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 was relatively minor compared with the risk of serious injury or pain to an individual defendant. It was argued that in any particular case it should be for the jury to weigh such potential ill-effects against the potential benefits to the particular defendant. This argument was supported by reference to the right to private life under Art 8 of the ECHR. The Crown argued, on policy grounds, that since Parliament had clearly and precisely regulated the medicinal use of drugs and had not provided for the use of cannabis, there were strong public policy grounds against allowing the defence of necessity. Alternatively, if the policy argument was rejected, the defence of necessity was not made out: an accused who was seeking to avoid his own pain was unable to show that there was an extraneous circumstance allegedly causing the commission of ²²⁴ DPP v Bell (Derek), n 121. See also CPS v Brown [2007] EWHC 3274 (Admin).

²²⁵ [2008] EWCA Crim 121. ²²⁶ [2009] EWCA Crim 85, [2009] Crim LR 723.

²²⁷ That is a rather ambiguous but potentially wide opportunity for a defence to be run.

²²⁸ See eg statements in Patel [2010] EWCA Crim 976, [47]. Imminent danger that prevents a person from acting lawfully is a necessary ingredient of the defences; Gregory [2011] EWCA Crim 1712 in which Lord Judge CJ stated that 'The defence of duress of circumstances is of strictly limited ambit' at [12].

²²⁹ [2005] EWCA Crim 1415; see further the commentary at [2006] Crim LR 148.

the offence. Similarly, in the case of those who were seeking to provide the means by which others could avoid pain, they could not reasonably be said to have a responsibility towards those for whose benefit they claimed to be acting. The Attorney General submitted further that the defence of necessity did not include the avoidance of serious pain, and should not be extended (in the present context at least) to do so.

The Court of Appeal held that there was no overarching principle applicable in all cases of 'necessity' to be derived from individual authorities. 'Necessity' should be developed on a case-by-case basis. The court made more general comments about the defence including that the defence required extraneous circumstances capable of objective scrutiny by judge and jury, capable of being checked and, where appropriate, met by other evidence. Otherwise abusive defences might arise.²³⁰ It was emphasized also that there had to be an imminent danger of physical injury; otherwise, where pain was concerned (which required a large element of subjectivity in its assessment), there would be no clear, objective basis by reference to which to test or determine the defence. Perhaps predictably, the court rejected the Art 8 argument, concluding that Parliament had sanctioned interference with the private life of the sufferer in its legislative policy.

In Altham,²³¹ the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal in similar circumstances where the drug user who was convicted of possession sought to rely on Art 3 of the ECHR to support his defence. The Court of Appeal concluded that the condition of the appellant was made no worse by the State and that there was no Art 3 claim.

One further restriction which the Court of Appeal has sought to impose on the duress of circumstances defence is, it is submitted, unwarranted. In Jones,²³² involving intentional criminal damage to an air force base in an attempt to prevent the USAF and UK services continuing their bombardment of Iraq, the defendants sought to rely, inter alia, on defences of duress of circumstances to the charges. In particular, the defendants argued that the war on Iraq was illegal in international law and that their actions were therefore necessary to avert that crime being committed on civilians in Iraq. On an interlocutory appeal, the Court of Appeal held that the defence was not available, declaring that it is limited to a case of D being faced with a crime in national law. With respect, that cannot be right. The defence was available to Martin when his wife was threatening suicide (not a crime), moreover one can envisage many circumstances in which D, or those for whom he is responsible, face a threat of death or serious injury by non-criminal means (eg a rapidly engulfing forest fire leads D to steal a car to escape to safety). The House of Lords subsequently dealt with the appeal on the basis of the defence under s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967, and did not deal with the issues of duress of circumstances or necessity.²³³

10.3 Necessity

As with duress, we are again concerned with situations in which a person is faced with a choice between two unpleasant alternatives, one involving his committing a breach of the criminal law and the other some evil to himself or others. If the latter evil outweighs any ²³⁰ At [73].

²³¹ [2006] EWCA Crim 7, discussed with commentary by Ashworth [2006] Crim LR 633.

²³² [2004] EWCA Crim 1981, [2005] Crim LR 122. Discussed in Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 212 and S Gardner, 'Direct Action and the Defence of Necessity' [2005] Crim LR 371, although not on this point. For an analysis of the international law dimension to the case, see R Cryer, 'Aggression at the Court of Appeal' (2005) 10 J Conflict Law & Soc 209.

²³³ [2006] UKHL 16, [2007] Crim LR 66.

evil involved in the breach of the letter of the law, it is arguable that the actor should have a defence of necessity. The courts have never recognized a defence in these broad terms and to what extent a defence of necessity prevails in English law is uncertain.²³⁴ As early as 1552, Sergeant Pollard in an argument which apparently found favour with the judges of the Exchequer Chamber said that breaking the letter of laws might be justified 'where the words of them are broken to avoid greater inconveniences, or through necessity, or by compulsion...'.²³⁵ More than 300 years later, Stephen thought the law so vague that it was open to the judges to lay down any rule they thought expedient; and that the expediency of breaking the law in some cases might be so great that a defence should be allowed—but these cases could not be defined in advance.²³⁶

In spite of these doubts, Glanville Williams in 1953 submitted 'with some assurance' that the defence of necessity is recognized by English law²³⁷ and, particularly, by the criminal law,²³⁸ arguing that the 'peculiarity of necessity as a doctrine of law is the difficulty or impossibility of formulating it with any approach to precision'.

Williams' confidence was entirely justified. Lord Goff has, on several occasions, recognized the existence of the defence and it was applied by the House of Lords in the Bournewood Trust case²³⁹ to justify the detention of a person suffering from mental disorder where there was no statutory authority on point.²⁴⁰ From an early period, other particular instances of necessity were recognized. It was justifiable (in the conditions of those days) to pull down a house to prevent a fire from spreading,²⁴¹ for a prisoner to leave a burning gaol contrary to the express words of a statute and for the crew of a ship or a passenger²⁴² to jettison the cargo in order to save the lives of the passengers. It was once held that prison officials may—indeed, must—forcibly feed prisoners if that is necessary to preserve their health and, a fortiori, their lives.²⁴³ It was a defence to the offence of procuring an abortion to show that the act was done in good faith for the purpose only of preserving the life of the mother,²⁴⁴ although at that time there was no provision for such a defence in any statute.²⁴⁵ More recently it has been recognized that a police officer may direct other persons to disobey traffic regulations if that is reasonably necessary for the protection of life and property.²⁴⁶

²³⁴ The Court of Appeal (Civ Div) has stated that there is no general defence of necessity. See R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2013] EWCA Civ 961, [25]. This case examined whether necessity could be a defence to murder in the context of voluntary euthanasia and the court held that 'it is simply not appropriate for the court to fashion a defence of necessity in such a complex and controversial field; this is a matter for Parliament.' At [56].

²³⁵ Reniger v Forgossa (1552) 1 Plowd 1 at 18.

²³⁶ II HCL, 108.

²³⁷ CLGP (1st edn) 216.

²³⁸ ibid, 724 et seq.

²³⁹ [1998] 3 All ER 289, HL, at 297–298, 301–302.

²⁴⁰ Note that the ECtHR in HL v UK (App no 45508/99) held that his being kept at Bournewood Hospital by doctors against the wishes of his carers under the common law of necessity amounted to a breach of Art 5(1) of the ECHR (deprivation of liberty) and of Art 5(4) (right to have lawfulness of detention reviewed by a court). Section 50 of the Mental Health Act 2007 amends the Mental Capacity Act 2005 so that it is unlawful to deprive a person of his liberty in a hospital or care home unless a standard or urgent authorization under Sch A1 to the 2005 Act is in force, or under an order of the Court of Protection. For discussion see LC 372, Mental Capacity and Deprivation of Liberty (2017).

²⁴¹ See now the Criminal Damage Act 1971, on which see Ch 27.

²⁴² Mouse's Case (1608) 12 Co Rep 63.

²⁴³ Leigh v Gladstone (1909) 26 TLR 139 (Alverstone LCJ), not followed by Thorpe J in Secretary of State for the Home Department v Robb [1995] 1 All ER 677. The decision is heavily criticized—see G Zellick, 'The Forcible Feeding of Prisoners: An Examination of the Legality of Enforced Therapy' [1976] PL 153 at 159—and no longer applied in practice.

²⁴⁴ Bourne [1939] 1 KB 687. Cf Morgentaler (1975) 20 CCC (2d) 449 (SCC), discussed by L Leigh, 'Necessity and the Case of Dr Morgentaler' [1978] Crim LR 151.

²⁴⁵ See now Abortion Act 1967, on which see Ch 15 and T v T [1988] 1 All ER 613, Fam Div.

²⁴⁶ Johnson v Phillips [1976] 1 WLR 65, [1975] Crim LR 580, DC. Cf Wood v Richards [1977] RTR 201, [1977] Crim LR 295, DC.

An important case law development is the emergence of duress of circumstances discussed earlier, which in many cases is treated simply as an instance of necessity. On some occasions the court has even merged the terms, as in Quayle where the reference is to 'necessity of circumstance'. The relationship of the defences is discussed later. Despite the explicit recognition of the defence the courts persistently adopt a restrictive approach to its application.²⁴⁷ There is an underlying anxiety that the defence must be kept within strict limits to prevent defendants claiming generally that they thought their actions in breaking the law were reasonable and represented the lesser of two evils. This would be a Trojan horse for anarchy.²⁴⁸ The speech of Lord Bingham in Hasan underlined these judicial anxieties with defences of circumstantial pressure. Norrie cogently explains why the courts have exhibited reluctance to incorporate necessity into English law in the following terms:

necessity operates to permit alternative political, ethical, economic and moral arguments to confront the formal logic of the law. Resting on a concept of moral involuntariness, it opens up the grounds upon which a defendant can say 'I could do no other'. For this reason, the law has fought shy of the defence, yet there remains at the same time a cogent reason for accepting it. It introduces broader ideas of justice, either in terms of social or environmental justice, or the requirements of a properly democratic polity. It requires the criminal law to be mindful of such ideas and the underlying social and political reasons which represent the only means of sustaining its legitimacy.²⁴⁹

10.3.1 Nature of threat

The traditional examples of necessity—escaping from the burning gaol, etc—do, like duress and duress of circumstances, involve danger to life. In relation to lesser threats, writers from Hale²⁵⁰ onwards have denied that necessity can be defence to, for example, a charge of theft of food or clothing. In modern times, Lord Denning has justified that limit on the ground that 'if hunger were once allowed to be an excuse for stealing, it would open a door through which all kinds of lawlessness and disorder would pass'.²⁵¹

In that case, a civil action, it was held that homelessness did not justify even an orderly entry into empty houses owned by the local authority: 'If homelessness were once admitted as a defence to trespass, no one's house could be safe. Necessity would open a door which no man could shut'.²⁵² Probably, it is now the law that if the taking or the entry was necessary to prevent death or serious injury through starvation or cold there would be a defence of duress of circumstances; but if it were merely to prevent hunger, or the discomforts of cold or homelessness, there would be no defence.

There are some cases where what was in substance a defence of necessity was allowed without identifying a threat to life or serious injury. In Gillick's case, one of the conditions stated of the lawfulness of the contraceptive advice or treatment given to a girl under 16 was that unless she receives it 'her physical or mental health or both are likely to suffer'.²⁵³ In F v West Berkshire Health Authority,²⁵⁴ it was held that it was lawful to carry out a sterilization operation on a woman who lacked the mental capacity to consent because otherwise there would be a grave risk of her becoming pregnant which would be disastrous from a psychiatric point of view.²⁵⁵ Lord Goff founded his judgment on necessity. These cases would, however, involve at most a ²⁴⁷ For criticism, see S Edwards, 'Good and Harm, Excuses and Justifications, and the Moral Narratives of Necessity' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014).

²⁴⁸ cf Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 207. ²⁴⁹ ibid., 218.

²⁵⁰ 1 PC, 54, and see Blackstone, Commentaries, iv, 31.

²⁵¹ Southwark London Borough v Williams [1971] 2 All ER 175 at 179. ²⁵² ibid.

²⁵³ Per Lord Fraser [1986] AC 112 at 174. ²⁵⁴ [1989] 2 All ER 545, HL.

²⁵⁵ See now the Mental Capacity Act 2005.

slight extension of duress of circumstances—comparable to MacNaghten J's interpretation of 'preserving the life of the mother' to include preserving her from becoming 'a physical or mental wreck' in Bourne,²⁵⁶ a case which must now be regarded as one of duress of circumstances. Lord Goff has also said, 'That there exists a defence of necessity at common law, which may in some circumstances be invoked to justify what would otherwise be a trespass to land, is not in doubt. But the scope of the defence is by no means clear.' He found it unnecessary to decide the important question raised in that case, whether the defence could justify forcible entry (which would otherwise be a crime) into the private premises of another in the bona fide, but mistaken, belief that there exists an emergency on the premises by reason of the presence there of a person who has suffered injury and who may require urgent attention.²⁵⁷ In Pipe v DPP,²⁵⁸ Owen J ruled that magistrates had been wrong to conclude that D could not plead necessity when he drove over the speed limit in order to get a young boy with a suspected fractured leg to hospital. Despite the fact that the boy's life was not in danger, he was in severe pain and the court ruled that necessity ought to have been considered. This case, again, could be seen as being a slight extension of duress of circumstances. Indeed, Owen J cited Conway in his judgment.

10.3.1.1 Statutory implication or exclusion of necessity defence

In England it has been argued that there is a principle of statutory interpretation:

that it requires clear and unambiguous language before the courts will hold that a statutory provision was intended to apply to cases in which more harm will, in all probability, be caused by complying with it than by contravening it.²⁵⁹

This principle, if it exists, seems to be little noticed in modern times. In Buckoke v Greater London Council,²⁶⁰ Lord Denning MR said, obiter:

A driver of a fire engine with ladders approaches the traffic lights. He sees 200 yards down the road a blazing house with a man at an upstairs window in extreme peril. The road is clear in all directions. At that moment the lights turn red. Is the driver to wait for 60 seconds or more, for the lights to turn green? If the driver waits for that time, the man's life will be lost.

Lord Denning accepted the opinion of both counsel that the driver would (at that time) commit an offence against the Road Traffic Regulations if he crossed the red light. But the threat to the fictitious man at the upstairs window seems to be no less than the threat to Willer, to the passenger in Conway's car or to Martin. Lord Denning was stating the effect of the law as he then believed it to be; but he added that the hypothetical driver 'should not be prosecuted. He should be congratulated'—so Denning would welcome the defence of duress of circumstances. As Professor Packer says:

it seems foolish to make rules (or to fail to make exceptions to rules) that discourage people from behaving as we would like them to behave. To the extent that the threat of punishment has deterrent efficacy, rules such as these would condition people confronted with dilemmas to make the wrong choice, either through action or inaction. And the actual imposition of punishment would serve no useful purpose since we assume these people are not in need of either restraint or reform.²⁶¹

²⁵⁶ [1939] 1 KB 687, see p 653.

²⁵⁷ Richards and Leeming (on appeal from 81 Cr App R 125) (10 July 1986, unreported), HL. The House agreed with Lord Goff's speech (thanks to Sir Anthony Hooper for this material). By s 17(5) of PACE 'all the rules of common law under which a constable has power to enter premises without a warrant are hereby abolished'. But does this abolish a justification which (if it exists at all) is available, not only to constables, but to persons generally?

²⁵⁸ [2012] EWHC 1821 (Admin).

²⁵⁹ P Glazebrook, 'The Necessity Plea in English Criminal Law' (1972A) 31 CLJ 87 at 93.

²⁶⁰ [1971] 1 Ch 655, [1971] 2 All ER 254 at 258. Statutory regulations now exempt the driver of the fire engine; but a contractor with a ladder on his lorry might find himself in the same position.

²⁶¹ H Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1969) 114.

The terms of a statute may, in effect, ‘build in’ a defence of necessity or, on the other hand, positively exclude one; and in either of these situations there is no room for the application of a general, common law defence. *Quayle*²⁶² is a good example of the courts rejecting a possible defence on the basis of the conflict it would create with a statutory scheme in which no such defence for possession or supply of drugs was included. A defence of duress by threats or of ‘necessity by circumstances’ might be available where the general scheme and policy of the legislation was not in question, but the use of cannabis on an individual basis conflicted with the purposes and effect of the legislation. Norrie makes the valuable point that in cases such as Quayle the main problem the courts face is in not being seen to sanction a systematic policy of self-help that would undermine the law.²⁶³

The Court of Appeal addressed this issue again in S (C).²⁶⁴ D and her husband were divorced and together had a daughter. When the husband applied for contact and residence orders, D alleged that he had sexually abused the daughter but a judge found that these allegations were unfounded. D continued to believe that her daughter was being sexually abused and took her out of the jurisdiction, without the consent of either the father or the court. D was then charged with child abduction. D sought to plead necessity but the judge, referring to Quayle, ruled that the defence was unavailable and she pleaded guilty. Sir John Thomas P, after referring to the Child Abduction Act 1984, concluded that given the legislative policy of the Act it was impossible to see how Parliament could have intended for necessity to operate when a parent removes a child who is subject to the court’s protection from England and Wales.

These cases demonstrate that if D is charged with a statutory offence and seeks to plead necessity, the judge must determine whether the defence is implicitly excluded by the terms of the legislation. This will require the judge to examine the policy objectives underpinning the legislative scheme.

10.3.1.2 Necessity and responses to non-criminal threats

As noted earlier in the case of Jones, the Court of Appeal sought to limit the defence to cases where D faced a criminal threat (in fact it was stipulated that the crime must be one under national law not international law). It is submitted that no such restriction applies. D may rely on the defence where he is faced with naturally occurring disasters, accidents caused by human actors or criminal threats.

10.3.1.3 Necessity and negligence?

In DPP v Harris,²⁶⁵ McCowan LJ was inclined to think that necessity can never be a defence to what would otherwise be the offence of driving without due care because the term ‘due’ in the section allows for consideration of all the circumstances that would be taken into account if the general defence applied. In Backshall,²⁶⁶ the court preferred the opinion of Curtis J who thought it contrary to common sense to allow the defence in relation to the graver offence of reckless (now dangerous) driving and not to the lesser offence of careless driving; but the court recognized that it may make no difference. A person driving as a necessity, as required, is not failing to exercise ‘due’ care. The reasoning of McCowan LJ might be applicable to any crime where the prosecution must prove that an act was done

²⁶² [2005] EWCA Crim 1415, [2006] Crim LR 148.

²⁶³ Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 209–210.

²⁶⁴ [2012] EWCA Crim 389, [2012] Crim LR 624, (2012) 76 J Crim L 202, applied in Ab [2014] EWCA Crim 1642.

²⁶⁵ [1995] 1 Cr App R 170, [1995] Crim LR 73, DC. Curtis J thought that if necessity (in effect, duress of circumstances) applied to reckless driving, it must apply to the lesser offence of careless driving. Cf Symonds [1998] Crim LR 280.

²⁶⁶ [1999] 1 Cr App R 35 at 41, [1999] Crim LR 662.

unreasonably; if it was necessary so to act, it could hardly be unreasonable to do so. In Harris, the court was concerned with a statutory regulation which prescribes the circumstances in which a fire, police or ambulance vehicle may cross a red light; and as we have seen, such a specific provision may well be taken to exclude a defence of necessity when such a vehicle crosses in other circumstances. In Harris, all this was obiter because the court found that there was no necessity for D to drive as he did.

10.3.1.4 Necessity in strict liability and situational liability offences

In Cichon v DPP,²⁶⁷ the court held that prohibition against allowing a pit bull terrier to be unmuzzled in a public place was ‘absolute’ and said that it followed that Parliament had excluded any defence of necessity; but if a general defence such as self-defence or duress—or necessity—is available even in offences requiring mens rea, it should a fortiori be available to an offence of strict liability. If the owner had removed the dog’s muzzle on the orders of an animal rights fanatic armed with a sawn-off shotgun, he would surely have had a defence of duress. So too with necessity—though the fact that the dog in Cichon was afflicted with kennel cough might well be held insufficient to ground any such defence.

In Santos v CPS,²⁶⁸ the CPS conceded that the magistrates were wrong to exclude the defence of necessity on the basis that D was charged with a strict liability offence. Foskett J held that there is clear authority that establishes that the defence of necessity is available for strict liability offences, citing Martin and DPP v Mullally.²⁶⁹ This echoes what was said by Lord Judge in Gregory.²⁷⁰ Lord Judge CJ stated that while duress of circumstances/necessity is of strictly limited ambit, it is possible to envisage circumstances in which, in the context of possession of a firearm, it might arise. His lordship gave the example of a bank robber who drops his gun, which is then seized by a member of the public who runs away with it to a safe place until the police arrive. Although Lord Judge did not state emphatically that the defence would be applicable in such circumstances, he did observe that although prosecution would be unlikely that does not mean that the possible duress of circumstances/necessity defence would be bound to fail. It is submitted that despite the obiter nature of these observations, they have the benefit of according with common sense.

In Hampshire County Council v E,²⁷¹ the court held that the mother of a truanting child could not plead duress to a charge of ‘being a parent of a child of compulsory school age’ who was truanting.²⁷² The offence required no act by the mother, and thus the threats (from the child) could not affect her liability. Presumably no defence of necessity would be available to her either, which is a harsh result indeed, and seems wrong in principle.

10.3.1.5 Necessity and murder

One of the reasons given by the House of Lords in *Howe*²⁷³ for refusing to allow a defence of duress to murder was that it had been decided in the famous case of *Dudley and Stephens*²⁷⁴ that necessity was not a defence to murder. Whether that was the ratio decidendi of the case has been debated. One interpretation of the judgment is that the court found that no

²⁶⁷ [1994] Crim LR 918, DC. ²⁶⁸ [2013] EWHC 550 (Admin).

²⁶⁹ [2006] EWHC 3448 (Admin). It was accepted in this case that duress could be a defence to a charge of drink-driving, although there was no evidence that D in fact was acting under duress.

²⁷⁰ [2011] EWCA Crim 1712. ²⁷¹ [2007] EWHC 2584 (Admin).

²⁷² Education Act 1996, s 444.

²⁷³ [1987] AC 417 at 429, 453, n 195, see J Donoghue (2011) 74 MLR 216, 235 et seq.

²⁷⁴ (1884) 14 QBD 273. On the instructions of Huddleston B the jury found the facts in a special verdict and the judge then adjourned the assizes to the Royal Courts of Justice where the case was argued before a court of five judges (Lord Coleridge CJ, Grove and Denman JJ, Pollock and Huddleston BB).

necessity existed²⁷⁵ and the House of Lords later held that the case does decide that point. The facts are well known: three men and a boy of the crew of a yacht were shipwrecked. After 18 days in an open boat, having been without food and water for several days, the two accused suggested to the third man that they should kill and eat the boy. He declined but, two days later, Dudley killed the boy who was now very weak. The three men then fed on the boy's body and, four days later, they were rescued. The accused were indicted for murder. The jury, by a special verdict, found that the men would probably have died within the four days had they not fed on the boy's body, that the boy would probably have died before them and that, at the time of the killing, there was no appreciable chance of saving life, except by killing one for the others to eat. The accused were convicted of murder, but the sentence was commuted to six months' imprisonment.

In Dudley and Stephens,²⁷⁶ Lord Coleridge CJ examined the pronouncements of writers of authority and found nothing in them to justify²⁷⁷ the extension of a defence to such a case as this. Killing by the use of force necessary to preserve one's own life in self-defence was a well-recognized, but entirely different, case from the killing of an innocent person. Moreover, 'If ... Lord Hale is clear—as he is—that extreme necessity of hunger does not justify larceny, what would he have said to the doctrine that it justified murder?'²⁷⁸

Apart from authority, the court clearly thought that the law ought not to afford a defence in such a case. They thought, first, that it would be too great a departure from morality; and, secondly, that the principle would be dangerous because of the difficulty of measuring necessity and of selecting the victim. The second reason is more convincing:

Who is to be the judge of this sort of necessity? By what measure is the comparative value of lives to be measured? Is it to be strength or intellect, or what? It is plain that the principle leaves to him who is to profit by it to determine the necessity which will justify him in deliberately taking another's life to save his own.²⁷⁹

Williams finds as the 'one satisfying reason' in the judgment that it was no more necessary to kill the boy than one of the grown men and adds: 'To hinge guilt on this would indicate that lots should have been cast...'²⁸⁰ If the boy had agreed to be bound by the casting of lots, he would have been consenting to die; and, arguably, consent in such a situation may be a defence. Captain Oates took his life when he left Scott and his companions; yet he was regarded not as a criminal but as a hero.²⁸¹ If the boy had not consented, the drawing of lots would be hardly more rational than trial by ordeal—yet more civilized than a free-for-all. In fact, the court disapproved, obiter, of a ruling in an American case, United States v Holmes,²⁸² that the drawing of lots in similar circumstances would legalize a killing. Holmes, a member of the crew of a wrecked ship, was cast adrift in an overcrowded boat. In order to prevent the boat sinking, the mate gave orders to throw the male passengers overboard and Holmes assisted in throwing over 16 men. No doubt, if his act was criminal at all, it was murder; but a grand jury refused to indict him for murder and ²⁷⁵ Arguably this case is one of duress of circumstances as there is a threat of death or serious injury posed by the circumstances.

²⁷⁶ On the case generally, see AWB Simpson, Cannibalism and the Common Law (1984).

²⁷⁷ It has been argued that the problem with the judgment is that Lord Coleridge failed to draw a distinction between whether extreme circumstances can justify the taking of innocent life, and the separate question of whether such conduct, although unjustifiable, might nevertheless be excusable. See J Dressler, 'Reflections on Dudley and Stephens and Killing the Innocent: Taking the Wrong Conceptual Path' in D Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013).

²⁷⁸ (1884) 14 QBD at 283.

²⁷⁹ ibid, 287.

²⁸⁰ CLGP, 744.

²⁸¹ Should it matter that Oates killed himself?

²⁸² (1841) 26 Fed Cas 360.

so he was charged with manslaughter. The judge directed that the law was that passengers must be preferred to seamen; only enough seamen to navigate the boat ought to have been saved; and the passengers whom necessity requires to be cast over must be chosen by lot. As this had not been done (none of the officers or crew went down with the ship) the jury found him guilty.

Stephen thought the method of selection 'over refined'²⁸³ and Lord Coleridge thought this 'somewhat strange ground... can hardly... be an authority satisfactory to a court in this country'.²⁸⁴

The English judges offered no alternative solution and, presumably, their view was that, in the absence of a self-sacrificing volunteer, it was the duty of all to die. This was also the view of the distinguished American judge, Cardozo J:

Where two or more are overtaken by a common disaster, there is no right on the part of one to save the lives of some, by the killing of another. There is no rule of human jettison.²⁸⁵

The principle in Dudley and Stephens is distinguishable if there is no problem of selection.²⁸⁶ D, a mountaineer who cuts the rope seconds before he would be dragged over a precipice by E, his falling companion, surely commits no offence. There is no question of choosing between D and E. E is going to die in a matter of seconds anyway. The question is whether he alone should die a few seconds earlier, or whether they should both die seconds later. At the inquest following the Zeebrugge ferry disaster a witness, an army corporal, gave evidence that he and numerous other passengers were trapped in the stricken ferry and in grave danger of drowning. A possible way of escape up a rope ladder was barred by a man, petrified by cold or fear, who could move neither up nor down. After fruitless attempts to persuade him to move, the corporal ordered those nearer to push him off the ladder. They did so, he fell into the water and was not seen again. The trapped passengers were then able to climb up the ladder to safety. The coroner expressed the opinion that a reasonable act of self-preservation, or the preservation of others, is 'not necessarily murder'. So far as is known, no legal proceedings against the corporal were ever contemplated. Unlike the cabin boy, but like the falling mountaineer, the man frozen on the ladder was chosen by fate as the potential victim by his immobility there. He was preventing the passengers from going where they had a right and a most urgent need to go. He was, unwittingly, imperilling their lives.²⁸⁷

Similarly, the commander of an Australian naval ship 'took the decision to save the rest of his crew by sealing four sailors in the blazing engine room, consigning them to certain death, after rescuers were beaten back by the flames'.²⁸⁸ It seems likely that the decision taken by the officer is that which any prudent officer of sound judgement would have taken. If so, it is inconceivable that he would ever be charged with, much less convicted of, murder. Surely the law should recognize this. In these examples the evil avoided outweighs that caused—one dies instead of two, or instead of many—not only is there extreme duress, but the conduct is justified. Indeed, the Australian officer would probably have been in breach of his duty if he had allowed his ship and most of her crew to be lost.

²⁸³ II HCL, 108.

²⁸⁴ (1884) 14 QBD 273 at 285.

²⁸⁵ Selected Writings, 390.

²⁸⁶ On a more theoretical level, Dressler argues that Lord Coleridge CJ conflated justifiable with excusable conduct and that the circumstances the sailors found themselves in should have been seen as involving the latter. See n 277.

²⁸⁷ See further JC Smith, Justification and Excuse, Ch 3. And cf self-defence against a nine-year-old or insane person.

²⁸⁸ (1998) The Times, 5 May.

Re A: the conjoined twins

In the case of the conjoined twins,²⁸⁹ the court held that, in the special circumstances of that case, it was lawful to kill the weaker twin, B, in order to save the life of the stronger, A. But this was not a simple choice between A and B, which the court would have been unwilling to make. The situation presented to the court was that if the operation was performed B would be killed but A would probably live—as indeed occurred—but, if the operation was not performed, both would die. Brooke LJ based his decision on necessity. The three requirements for the defence were stated to be:

- (1) the act is needed to avoid inevitable and irreparable evil;
- (2) no more should be done than is reasonably necessary for the purpose to be achieved; and
- (3) the evil inflicted must not be disproportionate to the evil avoided.²⁹⁰

His lordship distinguished Dudley and Stephens. There was no problem of who was to be selected to be killed in this case. Like the man on the rope ladder in the Zeebrugge case and the falling mountaineer dragging his companion to his death, A was selected by the circumstances. Brooke LJ preferred necessity to private defence (discussed later) because here there was no ‘unjust’ aggression by A. But A was imperilling B’s life and the private defence solution avoids the argument, valid or not, that necessity can never justify killing. Whatever its basis, the principle appears to be that it is lawful for D to kill A where, as D knows, A is doomed to imminent death but even the short continuation of his life will kill B as well. It remains important to appreciate the limited scope of this judgment. In rejecting the argument that this case is authority for the proposition that necessity is a defence to murder, the Court of Appeal has stated that, ‘This case is too slender a thread on which to hang such a far-reaching development of the common law.’²⁹¹

The most recent analysis of the issue arose in R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice.²⁹² N sought to argue that voluntary euthanasia could be a defence to murder by relying upon the defence of necessity.²⁹³ N relied upon Re A to demonstrate that the courts have evinced a willingness to extend the scope of the defence. Toulson LJ in the Divisional Court rejected the analogy with Re A and held that:

In a system governed by the rule of law, any such dispensing power requires great caution. It should not be used as a means of introducing major and controversial policy change. In re A was a case of highly exceptional facts, where an immediate decision was required.²⁹⁴

²⁸⁹ Re A (Children) [2000] 4 All ER 961, [2001] Crim LR 400 and commentary. See also J Rogers, ‘Necessity, Private-Defence and the Killing of Mary’ [2001] Crim LR 515. Cf the approach of the Canadian Supreme Court in Latimer [2001] 1 SCR 3, denying D a defence where he killed his severely disabled daughter. The court pronounced a defence based on three criteria: (a) imminent peril; (b) no reasonable legal alternative being available; (c) D’s reaction being proportionate. See S Ost, ‘Euthanasia and the Defence of Necessity’ in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007). For criticism of Ost, see F Stark, ‘Necessity and Nicklinson’ [2013] Crim LR 949.

²⁹⁰ Re A (Children), n 289, 1051. For discussion see W Wilson, ‘How Criminal Defences Work’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014) 21. This passage in the 13th edition was cited with approval by Lord Dyson MR in R (on the application of Nicklinson) v Ministry of Justice [2013] EWCA Civ 466.

²⁹¹ Nicklinson [2013] EWCA Civ 466, [63]. The Supreme Court also confirmed that Re A was an exceptional case.

²⁹² [2012] EWHC 2381 (Admin), [2013] EWCA Civ 466, [2014] UKSC 38.

²⁹³ It has been argued that Nicklinson should not have been argued on the basis of necessity at all, but that consent would have made for a more viable argument, although one that would nevertheless have failed. See F Stark, ‘Necessity and Nicklinson’ [2013] Crim LR 949. Although not writing about Nicklinson, Professor Lewis has made the not dissimilar point that necessity is not a viable route towards the legalisation of euthanasia. See P Lewis, ‘The Failure of the Defence of Necessity’ in D Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013).

²⁹⁴ [2012] EWHC 2381 (Admin), [74].

His lordship held that the common law develops incrementally, whilst major changes involving matters of controversial social policy are for Parliament: this issue falls into the latter category.²⁹⁵ This passage also demonstrates that his lordship believes that Re A contains an element of immediacy that the facts of the instant case lacked. The same view was taken in the Court of Appeal. In the Supreme Court Lord Neuberger observed:²⁹⁶

As Lord Dyson MR and Elias LJ explained in para 25 of their judgment in the Court of Appeal, to extend the defence of necessity to a charge of assisted suicide would be a revolutionary step, which would be wholly inconsistent with both recent judicial dicta of high authority, and the legislature's intentions. As to judicial dicta, see R v Howe [1987] 1 AC 417, 429B–D and 453B–F, per Lord Hailsham and Lord Mackay respectively, Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] AC 789, 892E–893A, per Lord Mustill, and R v Inglis [2011] 1 WLR 1110, para 37, per Lord Judge CJ. So far as legislative intention is concerned, in 1961, Parliament decided, through section 2(1), to create a statutory offence of assisting a suicide in a provision which admitted of no exceptions, and it confirmed that decision as recently as 2009 (when section 2(1) was repealed and re-enacted in more detailed terms) following a debate in which the possibility of relaxing the law on the topic was specifically debated.

Shooting down hijacked aircraft

Following the destruction of the World Trade Center in New York by hijacked aircraft, it now appears to be recognized that it would be lawful to shoot down a plane, killing all the innocent passengers and crew if this were the only way to prevent a much greater impending disaster. This is doubted by Bohlander,²⁹⁷ but without reference to the explicit statements in the Select Committee on Defence,²⁹⁸ making it clear that government policy is to permit shooting down of civilian aircraft in such circumstances and that the basis for such action would be by application of a necessity principle:

In the last resort, it might be necessary to shoot down the civilian aircraft. MoD officials assured us...that they had properly examined the legal aspects of any such decision...we have satisfied ourselves with lawyers that there is a proper basis for doing this.

The MoD and Committee took the view that the test to be applied is that the act will be necessary and proportionate if:

- (1) the act is needed to avoid inevitable and irreparable evil;
- (2) no more should be done than is reasonably necessary for the purpose to be achieved; and
- (3) the evil inflicted must not be disproportionate to the evil avoided.²⁹⁹

²⁹⁵ The Court of Appeal agreed with this analysis. See [2013] EWCA Civ 961. The Supreme Court ([2014] UKSC 38), in a complex judgment, also refused the relief sought. For discussion see J Rogers, 'Assisted Suicide Saga—The Nicklinson Episode' [2014] 7 Arch Rev 7.

²⁹⁶ [2014] UKSC 38, [130].

²⁹⁷ 'In Extremis? Hijacked Airplanes, Collateral Damage and the Limits of Criminal Law' [2006] Crim LR 579. See for detailed analysis Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 213–214 and T Hörnle, 'Hijacked Planes: May They Be Shot Down?' (2007) 10 New Crim LR 582.

²⁹⁸ Sixth Report, Defence and Security in the UK 2001–2002, HC 518-I, para 8.

²⁹⁹ ibid, para 9.

10.3.1.6 A doctor's defence of necessity

Without expressly acknowledging it, the courts appear to have recognized a special defence to murder by doctors.³⁰⁰ Although a doctor knows that treatment will significantly accelerate the death of his patient—that is, kill him—he is not guilty of murder if his purpose is to give what, in the circumstances as he understands them, is proper treatment to relieve pain.³⁰¹ Even if this is right, there remains the possibility, where the doctor has made a grossly negligent assessment of the circumstances, of a conviction for manslaughter.

10.3.1.7 Necessity and a duty to act

Where D owes a duty of care to E it seems that necessity may impose on him a duty to act to the detriment of—even to kill—others. The Australian naval officer referred to earlier probably had a duty to kill the four sailors. While the doctors in the conjoined twins case remained in control, they apparently had a duty to kill the weaker twin. When the 'conflict of duties'³⁰² is resolved, D must fulfil the prevailing duty. If A, B and C are members of a mountaineering party and A sees that B is dragging C to the deaths of both, is he not bound to cut the rope, accelerating B's death but saving the life of C, if he can do so without risk? But what about a passerby, D, who found himself in the same position as A? Presumably he would be justified in cutting the rope but probably not bound to do so.³⁰³

10.3.1.8 Necessity in other jurisdictions

In some other parts of the common law world a general defence of necessity is now recognized.³⁰⁴

In Australia the courts of Victoria recognized the existence of a general, if limited, defence in *Loughnan*³⁰⁵ where D's defence to a charge of escaping from prison was that he feared he would otherwise be killed by other prisoners—but the defence was not made out on the facts. In Perka,³⁰⁶ the Supreme Court of Canada held that necessity may be an 'excuse' but not a 'justification' (there seems to be no practical difference except that it perhaps made the court feel better) for an act which is 'inevitable, unavoidable and afford(s) no reasonable opportunity for an alternative course of action that does not involve a breach of the law'.

The American Model Penal Code, which has been adopted in many States of the United States, contains a general defence of necessity as follows:

Conduct which the actor believes to be necessary to avoid a harm or evil to him or to another is justifiable, provided that:

- (a) the harm or evil sought to be avoided by such conduct is greater than that sought to be prevented by the law defining the offence charged . . .³⁰⁷

³⁰⁰ See S Ost, 'Euthanasia and the Defence of Necessity' [2005] Crim LR 255, arguing that necessity would provide a better basis for a defence of euthanasia for doctors. For rejection of this argument, see P Lewis, 'The Failure of the Defence of Necessity' in D Baker and J Horder (eds), The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013).

³⁰¹ Dr Moor's case, discussed by A Arlidge QC, 'The Trial of Dr David Moor' [2000] Crim LR 31 and a comment by JC Smith, 'A Comment on Dr Moor's Case' [2000] Crim LR 41. See also A Ashworth, 'Criminal Liability in a Medical Context: The Treatment of Good Intentions' in A Simester and ATH Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (1996).

³⁰² See the discussion of the judgment of Wilson J in Perka v R (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 1 at 36 by Ward LJ in Re A (Children) at [2000] 4 All ER 961 at 1015–1016, by Brooke LJ at 1048–1050 and by Walker LJ at 1065–1066.

³⁰³ On the 'duty' to assist in such cases, see Ch 2.

³⁰⁴ See for a review of the position in Oceanic countries, M Forsyth, 'The Divorce or the Marriage of Morality and Law?: The Defence of Necessity in Pacific Island Countries' (2010) 21 Crim Law Forum 121.

³⁰⁵ [1981] VR 443. ³⁰⁶ (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 1.

³⁰⁷ §3.02. It is subject to qualifications not necessary to be noted here. See the fascinating discussions in L Alexander, 'Lesser Evils: A Closer Look at the Paradigmatic Justification' (2005) 24 L & Phil 611; M Berman, 'Lesser Evils: A Less Close Look' (2005) 24 L & Phil 681.

No such general principle exists or is likely to be developed by English courts. Edmund-Davies LJ clearly formulated the judicial attitude:

the law regards with the deepest suspicion any remedies of self-help, and permits these remedies to be resorted to only in very special circumstances. The reason for such circumspection is clear—necessity can very easily become simply a mask for anarchy.³⁰⁸

Until relatively recently, it seemed that, except in cases where necessity had already been recognized as a defence, the courts were likely to be satisfied by their power to grant an absolute discharge in hard cases.³⁰⁹

10.3.2 The relationship between duress, duress of circumstances and necessity

It seems now to be generally accepted that duress and duress of circumstances will be treated as identical by the courts as regards all elements other than the obvious one of the source of the threat.³¹⁰ This seems unobjectionable.

However, in Shayler,³¹¹ it was stated that Abdul-Hussain ‘reflects other decisions which have treated the defences of duress and necessity as being part of the same defence and the extended form of the defence [ie duress of circumstances] as being different labels for essentially the same thing’.³¹² But there are strong objections to this view.

- (1) It is established that duress cannot be a defence to murder or attempted murder but, following Re A (the case of the conjoined twins) it is now clear that necessity may be. This statement must be treated with due caution, however, given the Supreme Court’s judgment in Nicklinson.³¹³
- (2) Imminent threats of death or grievous bodily harm are the only occasions for a defence of duress but not for necessity. It is surely a defence to a charge of battery that D was pushing a child to save him from some quite minor injury or even damage to his clothing. Suppose that in Martin (Colin) D’s wife’s threat had been not to kill herself but to leave D; and suppose further that the consequences of her doing so would have been disastrous for D and his family. Duress of circumstances is not open. Should it be a defence for D to demonstrate that the break-up of his marriage would be a social disaster beside which any effect of his driving a short distance while disqualified would pale into insignificance?
- (3) Necessity is a defence only if the evil D seeks to avoid would be greater than that which he knows he is causing, whereas if D yields to torture which no ordinary person could be expected to resist, he should be excused however grave the consequences.

³⁰⁸ Southwark London Borough v Williams [1971] Ch 734, [1971] 2 All ER 175 at 181.

³⁰⁹ Glazebrook (1972A) 31 CLJ 87 at 118–119.

³¹⁰ See Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 10, pp 303 et seq; I Dennis, ‘On Necessity as a Defence to Crime: Possibilities, Problems and the Limits of Justifications and Excuses’ (2009) 3 Crim L & Phil 29 examining the theoretical bases for the defence. See also P Westen and J Mangiafico, ‘The Criminal Defense of Duress as Justification not Excuse and Why it Matters’ (2003) 6 Buffalo Crim LR 833.

³¹¹ [2001] EWCA Crim 1977, [2001] Crim LR 986.

³¹² C Clarkson, ‘Necessary Action: A New Defence’ [2004] Crim LR 81, made a more radical suggestion that the defences of duress, necessity, duress of circumstances and self-defence should be collapsed into one defence of ‘necessary action’. This would succeed in achieving its aim of avoiding the inconsistencies of the present law, but only by adopting a lowest common denominator for the defences which seems to be simply that the jury scrutinizes D’s conduct to ascertain whether he faced a crisis and responded proportionately. It would be most unlikely to be adopted by the courts since they would be concerned that it opens the floodgates for spurious claims and perverse verdicts. For criticism see AP Simester, ‘On Justifications and Excuses’ in L Zedner and JV Roberts, Principles and Values in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2012).

³¹³ [2014] UKSC 38.

- (4) Recent cases allowing evidence of the vulnerability to duress of the particular defendant have nothing to do with the proportionality of evils which is said to be required for necessity but are highly relevant to whether he should be excused for giving way to threats.
- (5) Necessity may create a duty to act but mere duress can hardly do so.
- (6) Duress is (generally accepted to be) an excuse, and necessity a justification.³¹⁴ It is quite inappropriate to talk of a surgeon's will being 'overborne' when he decides that it is necessary to carry out a sterilization or other operation, as in the West Berkshire case,³¹⁵ on a person who is unable to consent. The surgeon is making a reasoned and reasonable decision. Lord Brandon thought that not only would it be lawful, but that it would be the doctor's duty to operate. There is no question of excusing 'human frailty'. All this is true, a fortiori, of the decision of the court when it authorizes such an operation as in Re A (the conjoined twins).

It is disappointing that the appellate courts have been prepared to state that 'the distinction between duress of circumstances and necessity has, correctly, been by and large ignored or blurred by the courts'.³¹⁶ More recently, the Court of Appeal in S, taking cognizance of the criticisms made in this section in the 13th edition, ultimately held that, 'we can leave open the question as to whether there is a distinction between necessity and duress of circumstances'.³¹⁷

10.4 Marital coercion

The defence of marital coercion was abolished by s 177 of the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014.³¹⁸

10.5 Superior orders

It is not a defence for D merely to claim that the act was done by him in obedience to the orders of a superior, whether military or civil.³¹⁹ Where a security officer caused an obstruction of the highway by checking all the vehicles entering his employer's premises, it was no defence that he was obeying his employer's instructions.³²⁰ Both the House of Lords and the Privy Council have asserted, probably obiter, that there is no defence of superior orders in English law.³²¹ Both approved the statement of the High Court of Australia³²² that 'It is ³¹⁴ See on this S Gardner, 'Direct Action and the Defence of Necessity' [2005] Crim LR 371.

³¹⁵ See p 369.

³¹⁶ Shayler (n 85) para 55; in Hasan [2005] UKHL 22, Lord Bingham seems to use the term necessity interchangeably with duress, eg at [22].

³¹⁷ [2012] EWCA Crim 389, [15], [2012] Crim LR 62.

³¹⁸ By virtue of s 177(3) the defence may still be pleaded in respect of an offence alleged to have been committed before the date when the provision came into force, 13 May 2014. For discussion of the defence, see the 13th edition, at p 375.

³¹⁹ See S Wallerstein, 'Why English Law Should Not Incorporate the Defence of Superior Orders' [2010] Crim LR 109 considering the influence of international law. See also P Rowe, 'The Criminal Liability of a British Soldier Merely for Participating in the Iraq War 2003' [2010] Crim LR 752 at 757.

³²⁰ Lewis v Dickson [1976] RTR 431, [1976] Crim LR 442, DC.

³²¹ Clegg [1995] 1 All ER 334 at 344, [1995] Crim LR 418, HL, 407; Yip Chiu-Cheung [1994] 2 All ER 924 at 928, PC, p 407. The implications of Clegg for firearms officers and servicemen are considered in S Skinner, 'Citizens in Uniform: Public Defence, Reasonableness and Human Rights' [2000] PL 266; J Rogers, 'Justifying the Use of Firearms by Policemen and Soldiers: A Response to the Home Office's Review of the Law on the Use of Lethal Force' (1998) 18 LS 486.

³²² A v Hayden (No 2) (1984) 156 CLR 532 at 540.

fundamental to our legal system that the executive has no power to authorize a breach of the law and that it is no excuse for an offender to say that he acted under the authority of a superior officer.³²³

The fact that D was acting under orders may, nevertheless, be very relevant. It may negate mens rea by, for example, showing that D was acting under a mistake of fact or that he had a claim of right³²³ to do as he did, where that is a defence; or, where the charge is one of negligence,³²⁴ it may show that he was acting reasonably.

10.6 Public and private defence

Force causing personal injury, damage to property or even death may be justified or excused because the force was reasonably used in the defence of certain public or private interests.³²⁵ Public and private defence is therefore a general defence to any crime of which the use of force is an element or which is alleged to have been committed by the use of force.³²⁶ In Riddell, the Court of Appeal held that private defence is available as a defence to a charge of dangerous driving.³²⁷ The court held that whilst being charged with this offence does not of itself convey that force has been used, the alleged facts relating to the driving charge may nevertheless be such that force has indeed been applied in response to threatened or actual force.³²⁸ Private defence will therefore be available as a defence to some driving offences, dangerous driving and careless driving being the most obvious examples, but it will not be available to most other driving offences, since they necessarily do not involve the use of force.

The use of the word 'unlawfully' in a statutory definition of an offence is a reminder of the existence of the general defences but they apply whether or not the statute uses that word³²⁹ unless expressly or impliedly excluded. It is clear that the burden of disproving claims of public or private defence rests on the prosecution.³³⁰

The law is to be found in a variety of sources. Defence of the person, whether oneself or another, is still regulated by the common law (a defence of private defence as it is called in this chapter) as 'clarified' in s 76 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008; defence of property by the Criminal Damage Act 1971; and arrest and the prevention of crime by s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 to be read in light of s 76.

Because of its haphazard growth, the law contains some inconsistencies and anomalies. In many cases the common law plea of private defence overlaps with the plea under s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967. It is important to bear in mind that s 3 is only available where D uses force in the prevention of a crime. Otherwise D must fall back on private defence at common law as now largely restated in s 76 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (CJIA). Although the principles are very similar, technically they are different defences. One similarity that was confirmed only relatively recently is that both defences

³²³ James (1837) 8 C & P 131.

³²⁴ Trainer (1864) 4 F & F 105.

³²⁵ See, inter alia, Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, Ch 10; F Leverick, Killing in Self-Defence (2006); B Sangero, Self Defence in Criminal Law (2006).

³²⁶ Renouf [1986] 2 All ER 449, [1986] Crim LR 408 (reckless driving). Force was not an element of the offence of reckless driving (now abolished) but the use of force was alleged to constitute the recklessness in that case. The Court of Appeal distinguished Renouf in Bailey [2013] EWCA Crim 378.

³²⁷ [2017] EWCA Crim 413.

³²⁸ For criticism, see S Kyd [2017] Crim LR 637.

³²⁹ Renouf (n 326); Rothwell [1993] Crim LR 626.

³³⁰ The judge must give clear direction on the issue: O'Brien [2004] EWCA Crim 2900.

can be pleaded by D who uses force on B in order to prevent C from committing a crime. In Hichens, Gross LJ stated that both defences, 'are capable of extending to the use of force against an innocent third party to prevent a crime being committed by someone else'.³³¹ His lordship did, however, recognize that circumstances giving rise to such a defence will be rare and placed a great deal of emphasis on the requirement of immediacy. This perhaps indicates that pleas of public or private defence in circumstances such as this will only be left to the jury in exceptional cases.

Section 76 provides in part:³³²

Reasonable force for purposes of self-defence etc.

- (1) This section applies where in proceedings for an offence—
 - (a) an issue arises as to whether a person charged with the offence ('D') is entitled to rely on a defence within subsection (2), and
 - (b) the question arises whether the degree of force used by D against a person ('V') was reasonable in the circumstances.
- (2) The defences are—
 - (a) the common law defence of self-defence; and
 - (aa) the common law defence of defence of property; and
 - (b) the defences provided by section 3(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 . . .
- (9) This section is intended to clarify the operation of the existing defences mentioned in subsection (2).
- (10) In this section—
 - (a) 'legitimate purpose' means—
 - (i) the purpose of self-defence under the common law,
 - (ia) the purpose of defence of property under the common law; or
 - (ii) the prevention of crime or effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of persons mentioned in the provisions referred to in subsection (2)(b);
 - (b) references to self-defence include acting in defence of another person; and
 - (c) references to the degree of force used are to the type and amount of force used.

In a case in which D is in a dwelling and uses violence on a trespasser (a householder case), different considerations apply.

10.6.1 General principle

The defences at common law and under s 3, as now both also regulated by s 76, can be conveniently described³³³ in terms of trigger and response:

- the trigger being D's belief that the circumstances as he understands them render it reasonable or necessary for him to use force;³³⁴ and ³³¹ [2011] EWCA Crim 1626, [30], [2011] Crim LR 873.

³³² Section 76 fails to clarify the law (cf s 76(9)), seeking merely to put some common law on a statutory footing.

³³³ Despite the simplicity with which private defence can be described, it is a difficult area of law and a careful direction to the jury will often be necessary. Indeed in Hayes [2011] EWCA Crim 2680, Moore-Bick LJ described this area of law as being 'notoriously difficult'.

³³⁴ It is important not to lose sight of the fact that what D must have a genuine belief in is the necessity of using force. In Yaman [2012] EWCA Crim 1075 the judge directed the jury to evaluate whether D believed the men he attacked were burglars. It was rightly held that this was not what the jury ought to have been considering.

- the response being the use of a proportionate or reasonable amount of force to the threat that D believes he faces.³³⁵

The general principle is that the law allows such force to be used as is objectively reasonable in the circumstances as D genuinely believed them to be. The trigger is assessed subjectively (what did D genuinely believe);³³⁶ the response objectively (would a reasonable person have used that much force in the circumstances as D believed them to be). For example, if D believed that he was being attacked with a deadly weapon and he used only such force as was reasonable to repel such an attack, he has a defence to any charge of an offence arising out of his use of that force. It is immaterial that he was mistaken. Indeed, it is immaterial that he was unreasonably mistaken. Section 76 of the 2008 Act confirms this established common law principle.

In terms of the force D uses in ‘response’ to the threat as he genuinely perceives it to be, the question, ‘Was the force used reasonable in the circumstances as D supposed them to be?’³³⁷ is a question to be answered by the jury or magistrates having regard to s 76. If D’s use of force was reasonable on the threat he believed he faced, he is not liable for any harm that arises, even if the reasonable force he uses results in some greater harm which he had not foreseen. For example, D wrestles with V who is trying to steal D’s wallet. V dies of a heart attack. If it was reasonable to use the amount of force to wrestle with V, D commits no offence even though it would not have been reasonable to kill V. In the important case of *Keane*³³⁸ Hughes LJ summarized the law on these general principles set out in this paragraph. The judge need only leave private defence to the jury if there is prima facie evidence from which it could be inferred that the defence applies: Mula.³³⁹

10.6.1.1 D’s belief in need for force—the trigger—is subjectively assessed

Section 76(3) of the CJIA 2008 provides:

- (3) The question whether the degree of force used by D was reasonable in the circumstances is to be decided by reference to the circumstances as D believed them to be, and subsections (4) to (8) also apply in connection with deciding that question.³⁴⁰

By s 76(4) of the 2008 Act:

If D claims to have held a particular belief as regards the existence of any circumstances—

- (a) the reasonableness or otherwise of that belief is relevant to the question whether D genuinely held it; but ³³⁵ See Wilson [2005] Crim LR 108 and W Wilson, ‘How Criminal Defences Work’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014). Wilson argues that the requirement of proportionality in private defence is, in contrast to other defences, problematic on the basis that if the defence is constituted so as to vindicate the right to personal autonomy, it is unclear why D has to do anything other than that which is necessary to vindicate that right.

³³⁶ This element of the defence has been criticized on the basis that it focuses too much on D’s subjective belief. It has been suggested that the law should require an examination of why D was mistaken. See J Rogers, ‘Culpability in Self-Defence and Crime Prevention’ in GR Sullivan and I Dennis, Seeking Security: Pre-Emptying the Commission of Criminal Harms (2012).

³³⁷ But not in relation to s 5 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971, p 1084.

³³⁸ [2010] EWCA Crim 2514, [2011] Crim LR 393. See also Noye [2011] EWCA Crim 650 at [9] and [55].

³³⁹ [2013] EWCA Crim 1293. The Court of Appeal relied upon DPP (Jamaica) v Bailey [1995] 1 Cr App R 257, [1995] Crim LR 313 and Bonnick (1978) 66 Cr App R 266, [1978] Crim LR 246.

³⁴⁰ Emphasis added.

- (b) if it is determined that D did genuinely hold it, D is entitled to rely on it for the purposes of subsection (3), whether or not—
- (i) it was mistaken, or
 - (ii) (if it was mistaken) the mistake was a reasonable one to have made.

Section 76(4) makes clear that the reasonableness of the force D uses is to be assessed on the facts and circumstances as D genuinely believed them to be, even if his belief as to the circumstances was mistaken and unreasonable.³⁴¹

The common law authority for the proposition that D is to be judged on the facts as he believed them to be is Gladstone Williams,³⁴² repeatedly applied in the Court of Appeal³⁴³ and by the Privy Council in Beckford v R. Williams was charged with an assault occasioning actual bodily harm to V. D's defence was that he was preventing V from committing an assault on X. But V may have been lawfully arresting X. The jury was directed that if V was acting lawfully, D had a defence only if he believed on reasonable grounds that V was acting unlawfully. It was held that this was a misdirection.³⁴⁴ D had a defence if he honestly held the belief that there was a need to use force against V, whether his belief was reasonable or not.³⁴⁵ The court referred to the recommendation of the Criminal Law Revision Committee (CLRC) that the common law of self-defence should be replaced by a statutory defence providing:

a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he believes them to be in the defence of himself or any other person.³⁴⁶

The court declared that this proposition represented the common law, as stated in *Morgan*³⁴⁷ and Kimber.³⁴⁸

If D is voluntarily intoxicated he cannot rely on any mistaken belief attributable to that intoxication: s 76(5).³⁴⁹

³⁴¹ Subject to what is said later in relation to insane belief in the need for force. An unreasonable belief can be honestly held, but it is not a misdirection to omit this from jury directions: Chuong [2013] EWCA Crim 1716. On self-defence generally, see Leverick, Killing in Self Defence, Chs 5 and 9. On the admissibility of expert medical evidence to show why D may have been likely to perceive a threat, see Ibrahim [2014] EWCA Crim 121, [27] and Press and Thompson [2013] EWCA Crim 1849. See p 386.

³⁴² (1984) 78 Cr App R 276, [1984] Crim LR 163, CA. But, where D is drunk, see O'Grady [1987] QB 995, [1987] Crim LR 706 and Hatton [2005] EWCA Crim 2951, [2006] Crim LR 353, discussed at p 326. See also Robinson [2017] EWCA Crim 923 where D's evidence was that he panicked when he picked up a knife and stabbed V to death.

³⁴³ Jackson [1985] RTR 257, [1985] Crim LR 674; Asbury [1986] Crim LR 258, CA; Fisher [1987] Crim LR 334, CA; Beckford v R [1988] AC 130, [1988] Crim LR 116, PC. Failure to follow this closely will render the conviction unsafe, see Duffy v Cleveland [2007] EWHC 3169 (Admin).

³⁴⁴ It has been argued that this takes subjectivism too far for two reasons. First, that the more predisposed D is to assume unreasonably that he needs to use force, the more likely it is he will be acquitted, which puts the public at risk. Secondly, that permitting D to avoid liability altogether on the basis of an unreasonable belief could violate Art 2 and/or 3 of the ECHR. See C de Than and J Elvin, 'Mistaken Private Defence: The Case for Reform' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014) 135–136. Merely because the first limb of private defence is made out does not, however, mean that D will invariably be acquitted. On the ECHR point, see later.

³⁴⁵ For further discussion, see Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 287–291 and Horder, APOCL, 136–143.

³⁴⁶ Fourteenth Report, para 72(a). The phrase 'may use' is inappropriate. The CLRC was concerned only with establishing a defence in criminal proceedings. The act should not be regarded as justified in the civil law; and, if the mistake was grossly negligent and caused death, it might be manslaughter.

³⁴⁷ [1976] AC 182, [1975] Crim LR 717.

³⁴⁸ [1983] 3 All ER 316, [1983] Crim LR 630, CA (D guilty of indecent assault only if he did not believe V was consenting and 'couldn't care less').

³⁴⁹ See Ch 9, p 314. Cf Goode [2014] EWCA Crim 90, in which the Court of Appeal upheld the judge's direction to the jury that D was not entitled to rely upon a mistaken belief induced by the effects of alcohol. Section 76(5) was not cited by the Court of Appeal, it instead relied upon Soames [2001] EWCA Crim 2964.

10.6.1.2 Reasonableness of force—the response—is to be assessed objectively

The reasonableness of D's response and the amount of force used are to be assessed objectively on the facts as D believes them to be, by s 76(6) of the 2008 Act. Any possibility that D could have retreated is to be considered (so far as relevant) as a factor to be taken into account, rather than giving rise to a formal legal duty to retreat.³⁵⁰

The degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was disproportionate in those circumstances³⁵¹ (although in a householder case see the discussion below).

At common law, in Shaw (Norman) v R,³⁵² the Privy Council accepted the proposition that in determining whether D's response by using force is proportionate, D is to be judged on the circumstances and danger as he believed them to be. This is, it is submitted, a preferable approach. It was endorsed by the Court of Appeal in Harvey.³⁵³

D's belief that he is doing only what is reasonable may be evidence, but no more, that it was reasonable.³⁵⁴ Lord Morris has said:³⁵⁵

If there has been an attack so that defence is reasonably necessary it will be recognized that a person defending himself cannot weigh to a nicety the exact measure of his necessary defensive action. If a jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary that would be most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken. A jury will be told that the defence of self-defence, where the evidence makes its raising possible, will only fail if the prosecution show beyond doubt that what the accused did was not by way of self-defence.

This principle relates to self-defence but similar considerations apply to force used to prevent crime or to effect an arrest, etc.

10.6.1.3 Evidence of D's beliefs

There may be an issue as to what circumstances D genuinely believed to exist, especially where his claimed belief is, viewed objectively, an unreasonable one. In such a case, evidence of D's personal characteristics must, in principle, be admissible insofar as they bear upon his ability to be aware of, or to perceive, the circumstances.³⁵⁶ Section 76(4)–(8) of the CJA seeks to explain, based on the common law, what may be relevant to the question of D's beliefs. In particular, under s 76(7) in deciding whether D had a genuine belief in the need to use force:

the following considerations are to be taken into account (so far as relevant in the circumstances of the case)—

³⁵⁰ By virtue of s 148 of the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, which inserts a new subs 76(6)(A).

³⁵¹ This was an issue in Yaman [2012] EWCA Crim 1075 in which the Court of Appeal identified a number of failings in the judge's summing up, but nevertheless upheld D's conviction. For commentary, see Ormerod [2012] Crim LR 896.

³⁵² [2002] 1 Cr App R 10, [2002] Crim LR 140, PC.

³⁵³ [2009] EWCA Crim 469.

³⁵⁴ Scarlett [1993] 4 All ER 629, [1994] Crim LR 288, appeared to have significantly modified this rule but Owino [1996] 2 Cr App R 128, [1995] Crim LR 743, CA and DPP v Armstrong-Braun [1999] Crim LR 416, DC, decide that Scarlett in no way qualifies the law as stated in Gladstone Williams (1984) 78 Cr App R 276, [1984] Crim LR 163.

³⁵⁵ Palmer v R [1971] 1 All ER 1077 at 1078, PC, applied in Shannon (1980) 71 Cr App R 192, [1980] Crim LR 438 and Whyte [1987] 3 All ER 416.

³⁵⁶ Remorse is not necessarily evidence of D's reasonableness: Dewar v DPP [2010] EWHC 1050 (Admin).

- (a) that a person acting for a legitimate purpose may not be able to weigh to a nicety the exact measure of any necessary action; and
- (b) that evidence of a person's having only done what the person honestly and instinctively thought was necessary for a legitimate purpose constitutes strong evidence that only reasonable action was taken by that person for that purpose.

By s 76(8):

Subsection (7) is not to be read as preventing other matters from being taken into account where they are relevant to deciding the question mentioned in subsection (3).

At common law, *Martin (Anthony)*³⁵⁷ held that evidence of D's physical characteristics may be admissible. Circumstances which would not be seen as threatening by a robust young man may appear so to a frail elderly woman. However, on policy grounds, the court held that psychiatric evidence that D would have perceived the supposed circumstances as being a greater threat than would a normal person is not admissible. The court rejected an analogy with provocation³⁵⁸ where such evidence would have been admissible because provocation applied only to murder and was not a complete defence. Unfortunately, the court did not consider duress, where such evidence is admissible for a defence which applies to virtually all crimes except murder and is a complete defence. In the duress case of Martin (DP),³⁵⁹ psychiatric evidence was admitted that D was suffering from a schizoid affective disorder which made him more likely than a 'normal' person to regard things said as threatening, and to believe that threats would be carried out.

In Oye, the Court of Appeal considered the extent to which the plea of private defence could be founded on insane delusions.³⁶⁰ D was charged with affray and inflicting GBH on a number of police officers. There was expert evidence that D was suffering from an insane delusion at the relevant time and believed that the police officers were evil spirits. At trial there was uncontradicted psychiatric evidence that supported the insanity plea. The judge allowed private defence and insanity to be left to the jury. The jury rejected both defences and D was convicted. On appeal the court held that although there is a subjective element to the question of whether the force used was reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be, the standard of reasonableness makes it overwhelmingly objective. Davis LJ stated that:

An insane person cannot set the standards of reasonableness as to the degree of force used by reference to his own insanity. In truth, it makes as little sense to talk of the reasonable lunatic as it did, in the context of cases on provocation, to talk of the reasonable glue-sniffer.³⁶¹

Support for this conclusion was derived from Martin (Anthony) and Canns,³⁶² in which the Court of Appeal rejected the argument that the jury ought to have been directed to consider D's delusional state in private defence. In Oye, Davis LJ held that the enactment of s 76 did not undermine the validity of these authorities, given that the statute merely 'clarifies' the common law defence. His lordship held that the argument advanced on behalf of D would constitute a change in the law, rather than a clarification of it.³⁶³ The Court of Appeal

³⁵⁷ [2001] EWCA Crim 2245, [2002] Crim LR 136. Child and Sullivan characterize this as a 'problematic authority'. See J Child and GR Sullivan, 'When Does the Insanity Defence Apply? Some Recent Cases' [2014] Crim LR 788.

³⁵⁸ See p 543. ³⁵⁹ [2000] 2 Cr App R 42, [2000] Crim LR 615, CA.

³⁶⁰ [2013] EWCA Crim 1725, [2014] Crim LR 544, (2014) 78 J Crim L 12. ³⁶¹ At [47].

³⁶² [2005] EWCA Crim 2264.

³⁶³ Since the Crown accepted the psychiatric evidence, the Court of Appeal quashed D's conviction and substituted it for one of not guilty by reason of insanity.

concluded that while D's physical condition may be taken into account in private defence, his psychiatric condition generally cannot. This outcome is unsurprising, as the argument that s 76 altered the common law in this respect was not one the Court of Appeal was ever likely to find convincing.

The decision serves to highlight the difficult interaction between private defence and insanity. As the court observed in Oye, ensuring that mentally ill defendants receive the treatment they require complies with policy concerns about public safety.³⁶⁴ This supports the idea that once D relies on insane beliefs he should be treated as though he is pleading insanity, which ought to 'trump'³⁶⁵ private defence to preclude it from being left to the jury. To permit otherwise, it is argued, undermines the rationale for the existence of the insanity plea.³⁶⁶ The counter-argument is that by withdrawing private defence D is denied an opportunity to advance a defence that might lead to a full acquittal;³⁶⁷ by being forced to plead insanity D is at best going to receive the special verdict. The court did not state that private defence must be withdrawn when D relies on insane beliefs, but rather that in considering private defence the jury should ignore those beliefs when considering the second limb of the defence. But that approach also poses problems in practice for a judge trying to direct a jury coherently: when will it be appropriate to take into consideration D's psychiatric condition short of outright legal insanity if he pleads private defence?

If D uses force and relies on insane beliefs to explain why he did so but a reasonable person in his position would have had legitimate grounds to use the amount of force D actually used, why should D be precluded from pleading private defence and the possibility of securing a complete acquittal? It is different if a reasonable person would not have used any, or such, force in the circumstances but the reason D did so is because of his insanity. It is submitted that the Court of Appeal needs to provide clarity on exactly when insanity will 'trump' private defence.

Although the courts have generally demonstrated a reluctance to permit D's psychiatric condition to be considered as relevant to the belief he held, there are some cases in which it has been admitted. For example, in Press D pleaded private defence to the charge of causing GBH with intent and relied on psychiatric evidence that he suffered from PTSD to substantiate his claim that he had a mistaken belief in the need to use force.³⁶⁸ D was convicted and appealed. One of the issues was the extent to which expert evidence was relevant to his plea of private defence. The court distinguished Oye on the basis that the expert evidence did not suggest that D was acting under an insane delusion; rather, the evidence was that his PTSD could have caused D mistakenly to judge the need to use force and then exceed what was reasonable in the circumstances as he understood them to be.

³⁶⁴ It has been argued that the policy considerations the court relies upon can apply to any unreasonable mistake made by D and not just one induced by an insane delusion, at least where D's characteristics predispose him to make unreasonable mistakes about the circumstances. See C de Than and J Elvin, 'Mistaken Private Defence: The Case for Reform' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014) 135.

³⁶⁵ Cf R Mackay [2014] Crim LR 544.

³⁶⁶ J Child and GR Sullivan, 'When Does the Insanity Defence Apply? Some Recent Cases' [2014] Crim LR 788, arguing that the same approach ought to have been adopted in B [2013] EWCA Crim 3, [2014] Crim LR 312.

³⁶⁷ In Oye, the Court of Appeal observed that the order in which the jury ought to be directed to consider the defences is important, but preferred not to express a view on the matter. At [58]–[59]. As the court pointed out, s 2(1) of the Trial of Lunatics Act 1883 precludes the judge from giving a judicial direction to the jury to find D insane.

³⁶⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 1849. See also Ibrahim [2014] EWCA Crim 121. Jackson LJ contrasted this case with Oye, which was characterized as one in which D suffered from a psychiatric condition that caused him to believe in a state of affairs which did not exist, whereas in the instant case it was D's contention that his ADHD caused him to return to the fray after having initially been struck by V.

Oye and Press demonstrate that there is no coherence of approach as to the extent to which the personal characteristics of the defendant are relevant when pleading private defence. This issue is not confined to private defence but has also arisen in the context of duress and loss of control. There may be good reasons for this lack of coherence if each of the defences has a separate theoretical foundation. The problem is that the courts continue to make occasional comparisons between each of the defences without exploring these theoretical distinctions. They also fail to explain why an approach that has been adopted in relation to one defence is not taken in relation to another.³⁶⁹

Within private defence, the balancing of the characteristics of the relevant individuals can give rise to difficult issues. What of the relatively slight woman who uses lethal force against a physically stronger male whom she believes is about to attack her?³⁷⁰ The Law Commission in its 2004 consideration of the partial defence to murder recognized the difficulty that this posed in many trials and recommended a new Judicial Studies Board Direction:

It is insufficient to weigh the weapons used on each side; sometimes there is an imbalance in size and strength. You must also consider the relationship between the defendant and [the other party]. A defendant who has experienced previous violence in a relationship may have an elevated view of the danger that they are in. They may honestly sense they are in greater danger than might appear to someone who has not lived through their experiences. All these matters should be taken into account when considering the reasonableness of the force used.³⁷¹

10.6.1.4 Householder cases

Section 43 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013 amends s 76 by inserting the following provisions.³⁷²

Use of force in self-defence at place of residence

- (1) Section 76 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (use of reasonable force for purposes of self-defence etc) is amended as follows.
- (2) Before subsection (6) (force not regarded as reasonable if it was disproportionate) insert—
 ‘(5A) In a householder case, the degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as having been reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was grossly disproportionate in those circumstances.’
- (3) In subsection (6) at the beginning insert ‘In a case other than a householder case,’.
- (4) After subsection (8) insert—
 ‘(8A) For the purposes of this section ‘a householder case’ is a case where—

³⁶⁹ The Court of Appeal recognized this issue in Oye and declined to draw comparisons between duress and loss of control. At [43].

³⁷⁰ She might now rely on s 54 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 if she had lost self-control. If she had not lost self-control, she must rely on the defence of self-defence.

³⁷¹ LC 290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004) para 4.14 (adapted from suggested formulation by Justice For Women). Cf s 76(7). See Judicial College, Crown Court Compendium (2017).

³⁷² For the background to the enactment of the provision, see S Lipscombe, Householders and the Criminal Law of Self-Defence (2013). Available at <http://researchbriefings.parliament.uk/ResearchBriefing/Summary/SN02959>. See also Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 285–286 and 300; C de Than and J Elvin, ‘Mistaken Private Defence: The Case for Reform’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), General Defences in Criminal Law (2014) 138–141.

- (a) the defence concerned is the common law defence of self-defence,
- (b) the force concerned is force used by D while in or partly in a building, or part of a building, that is a dwelling or is forces accommodation (or is both),
- (c) D is not a trespasser at the time the force is used, and
- (d) at that time D believed V to be in, or entering, the building or part as a trespasser.⁷

For a number of years, there had been calls to reform the law to provide greater legal protection for householders who use force to defend themselves in their homes.³⁷³ These calls went unanswered until 2010, when the Coalition Government committed to ‘ensuring that people have the protection they need when they defend themselves against intruders’. The government achieved this commitment through the enactment of s 43 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013 which inserts a new s 76(5A) into the 2008 Act. The policy underlying this provision is controversial. For example, Norrie has questioned whether, if a different threshold is deemed appropriate in the context of householder cases, then perhaps there are other private defence situations where a context-specific standard could be justified.³⁷⁴

Section 76(5A) provides that in a ‘householder case’ the degree of force used by D is not to be regarded as reasonable in the circumstances as D believed them to be if it was grossly disproportionate in those circumstances. In non-householder cases it will be recalled that if D uses merely disproportionate force, then that is not to be regarded as reasonable.

On one interpretation, the impact of this change seemed to be that in a householder case if D used grossly disproportionate force he was guilty and if not he was entitled to an acquittal. That is not the way the courts have construed the householder provision in the two leading cases, however.

In R (on the application of Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice, the Divisional Court rejected the argument that the statute dictates that the defendant is to be treated as having acted reasonably if the force he used was not grossly disproportionate.³⁷⁵ Sir Brian Leveson P held that under s 76(5A) a householder who uses grossly disproportionate force will be guilty. Moreover, a householder can be regarded as having acted unreasonably where the degree of force used was merely disproportionate. If D has not acted grossly disproportionately the question will be whether his use of force was unreasonable. If it was, then D will be guilty.³⁷⁶

This aspect of the judgment in Collins has now been effectively superseded by Ray, in which a special Court of Appeal of five judges was convened.³⁷⁷ Lord Thomas CJ, delivering the judgment of the court, endorsed the interpretation given to the legislation by Sir Brian Leveson P in Collins. His lordship agreed that if the degree of force used by the householder was grossly disproportionate then D will be liable. If it was not grossly disproportionate, then the question for the jury is whether that degree of force was reasonable, taking into ³⁷³ See S Miller, ‘“Grossly Disproportionate”: Home Owners’ Legal Licence to Kill’ (2013) 77 J Crim L 299. A number of high-profile cases acted as a catalyst for reform, in particular the case of Munir and Tokeer Hussain. For criticism of some of the earlier private members’ bills that had sought to amend the law, see S Skinner, ‘Populist Politics and Shooting Burglars’ [2005] Crim LR 275.

³⁷⁴ Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 285. See also L Bleasdale-Hill, ‘Householders, Self-Defence and the Right to Life’ [2015] Crim LR 407.

³⁷⁵ [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin), [2016] Crim LR 438.

³⁷⁶ The Divisional Court’s judgment generated a great deal of academic commentary. For example, see J Collins and A Ashworth, ‘Householders, Self-Defence and the Right to Life’ (2016) 132 LQR 377; M Dsouza, ‘Understanding the “Householder Defence”: Proportionality and Reasonableness in Defensive Force’ (2016) 75 CLJ 192; JR Spencer, ‘Using Force on Burglars’ [2016] Arch Rev 6; MP Thomas, ‘Defenceless Castles: The Use of Grossly Disproportionate Force by Householders in Light of R (Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice’ (2016) 80 J Crim L 407.

³⁷⁷ [2017] EWCA Crim 1391.

account all the circumstances as D believed them to be. The current state of the law is therefore as follows:

- In a householder case, D is liable if, in the circumstances as he believed them to be, the jury find he used grossly disproportionate force. He is also liable if the degree of force he used was disproportionate if and only if it was also unreasonable.
- In a non-householder case, D is liable if the amount of force used was in the jury's view unreasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be.

In a householder case, if the jury conclude that the degree of force used by D was not grossly disproportionate, it was held that their focus should be on whether that degree of force was reasonable. In assessing the reasonableness of the degree of force used by D, the Court of Appeal held that the judge should specify the kind of circumstances that are relevant to this inquiry. Examples given by the court include the shock of coming upon an intruder, the time of day, the presence of other help, the desire to protect the home and its occupants, the vulnerability of the occupants and the conduct of the intruder.

The Court of Appeal's approach to proportionality and reasonableness

In Keane the Court of Appeal had treated the concepts of reasonableness and proportionality as synonymous, in a non-householder case at least. In Ray, the court's approach creates a more complex picture. First, the court distinguishes between reasonableness and proportionality. The use of disproportionate force which is short of being grossly disproportionate is not, on the wording of the section, necessarily the use of reasonable force. Householder cases are, on a strict matter of statutory language, focused on proportionality. Non-householder cases are focused on the reasonableness of the force used by the defendant.

When it comes to the use of force which is disproportionate, the position is now as follows:

- In a householder case, the jury are entitled to form the view, taking into account all the circumstances, that the degree of force used was either reasonable or not reasonable. Therefore, the use of disproportionate force can be reasonable, but this will not necessarily be so in every case.
- In a non-householder case the position is different, as the degree of force cannot be regarded as reasonable if it was disproportionate.

As a result of Ray, the difference between the two types of case is that in non-householder cases the focus is exclusively on reasonableness. The householder cases can involve a distinction between what is disproportionate and what is unreasonable. That fine distinction cuts across the earlier decision in Keane.

The second problem with the decision in Ray is that having interpreted the provision to recognize the distinction between the tests based on reasonableness alone and those tests which are based on reasonableness and proportionality, the Court of Appeal stated that juries should not be presented with 'esoteric and conceptual distinctions' between what is disproportionate on the one hand and what is unreasonable on the other.

Thirdly, this distinction is difficult when set against the historical common law position which required consideration to be given to the role of necessity and proportionality in assessing the overall reasonableness of the defendant's use of force. The Court of Appeal in Keane held that the enactment of s 76 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 did not alter the common law position. This is exactly what the Court of Appeal appears to have done in Ray, however.

Fourthly, there is an impact on the likely ability of a jury to apply the test. The reason why the common law required consideration to be given to the necessity and proportionality of the defendant's use of force is that, without reference to these concepts, the jury has no criteria against which to assess the reasonableness of the force used by the defendant. That the force used by the defendant must be reasonable is required by the legislation, but the legislation does not state that reasonableness ought to be divorced from the concepts that have historically been relied upon to assist juries in their assessment of whether the force used was reasonable in the circumstances. To mitigate this difficulty, the court suggests that it is important for judges to give juries ‘some colour to the issue of self defence which arises’. It is unclear, however, why the court considered it preferable to rely upon fact-specific examples rather than to continue to place reliance upon concepts that have broad application, and which can apply equally to non-householder cases as they can to householder cases.

Is this what Parliament intended?

A final potential problem is that this interpretation is, arguably, not what Parliament intended. Lord Thomas CJ held that the court’s ‘narrow’ construction of the legislation was in keeping with the aim the householder provision was intended to achieve, but as the parliamentary material cited by the court demonstrates, the government intended to amend the law to ensure it was ‘on the side of people who defend themselves when confronted by an intruder in their home’. Given the court’s conclusion that it is for the jury to assess whether the degree of force used was reasonable and that something less than grossly disproportionate force may be considered unreasonable, householders may be just as likely to be prosecuted now as they were before the enactment of s 76(5A). Parliament’s intention has, on that view, been frustrated. Further evidence of the court’s interpretation being contrary to that intended is derived from the MOJ circular that was cited by the court: ‘if householders act honestly and instinctively to protect themselves or their loved ones from intruders using force that was reasonable in the circumstances as they saw them, they will not be guilty of an offence if the level of force turns out to have been disproportionate in those circumstances.’ That statement of what was intended is not what Ray delivers. The Court of Appeal in Ray confirmed that the jury remain free to convict the householder on the basis that, despite the fact the degree of force he used was proportionate, it was nevertheless unreasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be.

The fact that a five-member Court of Appeal presided over by the Lord Chief Justice was convened to consider the proper construction of s 76(5A) of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 means that further challenge to the interpretation of the provision is now unlikely.

What is a householder case?

It is important to bear in mind that the different approach only applies in ‘householder cases’. In s 76(5A), a ‘householder case’ is defined as one that has the following characteristics:

- (1) the defence concerned is the common law of self-defence;
- (2) the force concerned is force used by D while in or partly in a building, or part of a building, that is a dwelling or is forces accommodation (or is both);
- (3) D is not a trespasser at the time the force is used; and
- (4) at that time D believed V to be in, or entering, the building as a trespasser.

While the statute, in subsection (8F), clarifies that ‘building’ includes a vehicle or vessel,³⁷⁸ it does not define what is meant by ‘dwelling’. Historically, ‘dwelling’ could mean not only a person’s home, but also the structures within the curtilage of a home, such as sheds, greenhouses, etc.³⁷⁹ If D confronts V in his kitchen, that is clearly a householder case and the higher threshold applies. What if D confronts V attempting to steal the lawnmower from his shed? Further, what if D confronts V initially in the kitchen, ³⁷⁸ Ensuring that inhabitants of houseboats and caravans will also be able to invoke the provision.

³⁷⁹ For discussion, see K Laird, ‘Conceptualising the Interpretation of “Dwelling” in Section 9 of the Theft Act 1968’ [2013] Crim LR 656. For further discussion, see p 1020.

but only uses force once both are struggling in the garden? The failure explicitly to define the scope of the provision is disappointing and could lead to difficulties in practice. It is submitted that 'dwelling' in this context ought to be narrowly defined and should not extend to buildings within the curtilage of a home. This has the benefit of ensuring a relative degree of certainty whilst also fulfilling the policy objective at which the legislation is aimed. It is questionable whether confronting an intruder in one's shed is as terrifying as confronting an intruder in one's living room. In the former case, D ought to be required to take greater care to ensure that he only uses force that is proportionate in the circumstances. The minister was explicit in debates on the clause in Parliament, after all, that s 76(5A) is not intended to be a vigilantes' charter.

Subsection (8B) makes clear that if a part of a building is where D dwells and it is internally accessible to another part that is a place of work for D or another person, then it is considered part of a dwelling. This is to deal with cases such as that of the pub landlord who lives above the pub and who confronts a trespasser behind the bar. This would constitute a householder case. It would not be a householder case if the pub were not connected to the landlord's accommodation by way of an internal means of access.

It is important to note that a householder case only arises when D is not a trespasser at the time when force is used. While this ought to be uncontroversial in most cases, it could require some consideration of the civil law. Crucially, the statute does not state that D must be the homeowner; he must simply not be a trespasser.³⁸⁰ This would enable a guest of the homeowner to invoke s 76(5A) for example. Whether, for example, the boyfriend of the homeowner's daughter, who surreptitiously climbed through her window, is a trespasser, poses greater difficulty.³⁸¹ Subsection (8E) makes clear that a person is a trespasser if he derives title from a trespasser or has the permission of a trespasser. The squatter's guest, therefore, is no less a trespasser because he has an invitation. Again, this limitation is in keeping with the policy objective behind the enactment of the provision.

The final point to note is that at the time force is used D must have believed V to be in or entering the dwelling, or part of it, as a trespasser. Two questions arise in relation to this element of the householder provision. First, must D's belief be reasonable or does it suffice that it is genuinely held? Secondly, can D rely upon a belief induced by voluntary intoxication? Subsection (8D) provides that the provisions in subsections (4) and (5) also apply to subsection (8A)(d). The consequence of this is twofold: it suffices for D to have had a genuine belief that V was a trespasser; and a belief induced by voluntary intoxication will not suffice. In relation to the latter, if D's mistake as to V's status as a trespasser is attributable to his voluntary consumption of alcohol, then he cannot rely upon the householder provision. This ensures there is consistency between householder cases and non-householder cases in relation to the nature of D's belief.³⁸² Interestingly, in Collins, Sir Brian Leveson P stated, obiter, that the common law requires an approach which it is at least arguable is unduly restrictive for householders. His lordship stated that whilst those who go about in public ought to be expected to take responsibility for their level of intoxication, whether the same ought to be expected of a defendant who is in his own home in circumstances where he is not anticipating any interaction with a trespasser is perhaps a more open question. It is submitted that there is much to be said for his lordship's characterization of the current state of the law and that this is something that merits Parliament's attention.³⁸³

³⁸⁰ In Day [2015] EWCA Crim 1646, Laws LJ confirmed that self-defence is available not just to the property owner, but to anyone in lawful occupation of the dwelling who seeks to eject a trespasser. The court was not concerned with s 76, but the same principle applies.

³⁸¹ For discussion, see p 1008.

³⁸² The MOJ Circular reiterates that it suffices that D 'genuinely believed (rightly or wrongly)' that the person in respect of whom they used force is a trespasser, at para 16.

³⁸³ [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin), [30], [2016] Crim LR 438.

10.6.1.5 The effect of the Human Rights Act 1998

There are arguments of some force³⁸⁴ that the effect of Art 2 of the ECHR—the right to life—may be to invalidate the principle of Gladstone Williams and Beckford that a defendant is to be judged on the facts as he genuinely, though unreasonably, believed them to be. Article 2 provides:

- (1) Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.
- (2) Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:
 - (a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
 - (b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
 - (c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.

It is argued by some eminent commentators, including in particular Ashworth and Leverick, that the present English law may be incompatible with this provision since a person's right to life is not sufficiently protected if he may be killed by force used without reasonable grounds.³⁸⁵

The arguments of incompatibility highlight a number of issues. First, the Article allows for life to be taken only where 'absolutely necessary'. A defendant in England could be acquitted even though his lethal attack turns out to have been completely unnecessary. Furthermore, the European Court has underlined the restrictive nature of the exceptional circumstances in which killing is permitted.³⁸⁶ In McCann v UK and in Andronicou, the Court referred to the fact that the accused must have had 'good grounds' to use force. This looks like an objective test, which is not what English law requires: Gladstone Williams (and s 76) requires only a genuine belief in the need to use such force. Finally, it is noted that Art 2 restricts the circumstances in which a life may be taken to the purposes of quelling riots, etc or in defence of unlawful violence. In English law, it is possible for a defendant to be acquitted where he uses lethal force even in response to an attack merely on property.³⁸⁷

Despite these arguments of incompatibility, it is not clear that Art 2 or the ECtHR's jurisprudence (which is typically vague) demands a change in the law to an objective test. The test of 'absolute necessity' applied in Strasbourg is not an inflexible one. In a recent assessment of the position, the Divisional Court in *R (Duggan) v HM Assistant Deputy Coroner*³⁸⁸ recognized 'some ambiguity in the language used by the Strasbourg Court'. The court was not persuaded that an objective test of reasonableness was required to ensure that English law was compatible. The Court of Appeal subsequently agreed with this conclusion.³⁸⁹

³⁸⁴ By A Ashworth, commenting on Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus, ECtHR, 9 Oct 1997 [1998] Crim LR 823. But see Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and the Substantive Criminal Law' [2000] Crim LR 331 at 336–337. See F Leverick, 'The Use of Force in Public or Private Defence and Article 2' [2002] Crim LR 347; JC Smith, 'The Use of Force in Public or Private Defence and Article 2' [2002] Crim LR 958; and F Leverick, 'The Use of Force in Public or Private Defence and Article 2: A Reply to Professor Sir John Smith' [2002] Crim LR 963. See also Leverick, n 325, Ch 10; Horder, APOCL, 142.

³⁸⁵ See Leverick, previous note.

³⁸⁶ See Andronicou, para 171; Gul v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 28, para 77; McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 95. More recently, see Ramsahai v Netherlands (2006) 43 EHRR 39; Huohuanainen v Finland [2007] EHRLR 472.

³⁸⁷ See the Joint Committee on Human Rights 15th Legislative Report 2007–8, para 2.35.

³⁸⁸ [2014] EWHC 3343 (Admin).

³⁸⁹ R (Duggan) v North London Assistant Deputy Coroner [2017] EWCA Civ 142.

Moreover, the ECtHR has not condemned English law when it has had the opportunity to do so. The European Court's test was reiterated in *Bubbins v UK*³⁹⁰ where the Court stated that D had an 'honest belief which was perceived for good reason to be valid at the time but which was mistaken'. There was no outright condemnation of the English test. In the most recent Strasbourg authority to consider this issue, the Grand Chamber held in *Da Silva v UK*³⁹¹ that it could not be said that the test applied in the law of England and Wales is significantly different from the standard applied by the Court in McCann. The Court concluded that the definition of self-defence in England and Wales did not fall short of the standard required by Art 2. As Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald³⁹² point out, the truth is that there is no case yet before the Strasbourg Court in which a use of lethal force in English law has been based on a wholly irrational mistake. If such a case arose, the Court would have to face the conflict between the Strasbourg jurisprudence and English law.

The English courts' approach to the ECHR question

In the English courts, it has been accepted that the current rules of English law on the use of potentially lethal force by the police are not incompatible with the ECHR as in *R (Bennett) v HM Coroner for Inner London*³⁹³ and R (Duggan) v North London Assistant Deputy Coroner.³⁹⁴ In both cases the principal issue was whether a killing committed by the police as a result of an honest but mistaken act of self-defence (not amounting to a crime, but possibly involving civil liability to pay compensation, etc) could be classed by a coroner's inquest as a 'lawful homicide'.

In the High Court in Bennett Collins J held, having regard to the case law, that:

the European Court of Human Rights has considered what English law requires for self defence, and has not suggested that there is any incompatibility with Article 2. In truth, if any officer reasonably decides that he must use lethal force, it will inevitably be because it is absolutely necessary to do so. To kill when it is not absolutely necessary to do so is surely to act unreasonably. Thus, the reasonableness test does not in truth differ from the Article 2 test as applied in McCann.

The Court of Appeal upheld that decision.³⁹⁵

Subsequently, in Ashley and others v Chief Constable of Sussex Police,³⁹⁶ the House of Lords compared self-defence when used as a defence to a criminal charge and a defence in civil proceedings. In both criminal and civil proceedings, the conduct/degree of force in self-defence must objectively be reasonable but, in judging what was reasonable, the court must in either case have regard to all the circumstances, including the fact that the action may have been taken in the heat of the moment. However, there are differences: (a) in cases of mistaken self-defence an honest but unreasonable mistake may operate as a defence only in criminal proceedings. In civil proceedings, a mistaken view of the facts provides no defence in the absence of reasonable grounds for that mistake. (b) The burden of proof is different: in criminal proceedings, the burden of negating self-defence is on the prosecution; but in civil proceedings the burden is on the defendant to establish that he acted in reasonable self-defence.³⁹⁷

³⁹⁰ [2005] 41 EHRR 24. See N Martin (2006) 69 MLR 242 for comment. Applied more recently in Giuliani v Italy (2012) 54 EHRR 10 and Reynolds v UK (2012) 55 EHRR 35.

³⁹¹ (2016) 63 EHRR 12. ³⁹² HR&C], para 18.33.

³⁹³ [2006] EWHC 196 (Admin). ³⁹⁴ [2017] EWCA Civ 142.

³⁹⁵ [2007] EWCA Civ 617. The basis of appeal was principally that it had been a misdirection not to direct the jury to consider whether the officer's claim to have acted in self-defence was reasonable in light of the requirement in the relevant ACPO manual to reassess at all times whether it was 'absolutely necessary' to shoot.

³⁹⁶ [2008] UKHL 25; see the Court of Appeal's decision: [2006] EWCA Civ 1085.

³⁹⁷ Cf the decision at first instance [2005] EWHC 415 (QB).

Looking at the subject more broadly, one can argue that notwithstanding some unguarded language by the CLRC and the courts, English law does not say that D may take the life of another where there are no reasonable grounds for doing so. It says only that he is not guilty of a criminal offence, if he believes honestly though unreasonably that such ground exists. The killing is unlawful, but not criminal; D remains liable in tort. Parliament has now endorsed that principle in s 76. Where D's belief is unreasonable that will, of course, be a powerful reason for disbelieving his account and convicting him. But that is not all: the criminal law itself provides protection. If D's mistake is so unreasonable as to amount to gross negligence, D will be guilty of manslaughter.³⁹⁸ That is, D will be guilty of criminal homicide if the jury think his conduct bad enough to amount to a crime—or, as is submitted later in the discussion in Ch 14, bad enough to deserve condemnation as manslaughter. The criminal law therefore does offer some protection. The fact that it is a conviction for manslaughter with a maximum life sentence cannot mean that the protection is inadequate.

Moreover, most force used in public or private defence is not intended to, and does not have, fatal results. Does the human rights argument require the Beckford principle to be outlawed only where it has fatal results? There would not seem to be any logic in that. The alternative is that it is invalidated entirely. It is submitted that this would be an undesirable and unnecessary conclusion and the English courts should not arrive at it unless compelled to do so. The present law, at least as regards protection against violence to the person, balances the need to protect life—and limb—against the ordinary rights of persons accused of crime.

In R (Collins) v Secretary of State for Justice, the focus of the judgment delivered by Sir Brian Leveson P was on whether the so-called 'householder provisions' were compatible with Art 2.³⁹⁹ In assessing the compatibility of s 76(5A) with Art 2, the key question for the court was whether the criminal law of England and Wales effectively deters offences against the person in householder cases. His lordship held that although there may be cases when a jury consider the actions of a householder in self-defence to be more than what might be objectively described as the minimum proportionate response, this did not weaken the capacity of the criminal law to deter offences against the person in householder cases. The householder will only be able to plead self-defence if the degree of force he used was reasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be. His lordship concluded that the criminal law provides reasonable safeguards against the commission of offences against the person in householder cases, which was sufficient to satisfy Art 2.

In addition to the right to life guaranteed in Art 2, the European Court has recognized that the rights in Arts 3 (freedom from torture and inhuman and degrading treatment) and 5 (right to liberty) are subject to an implied exception for injuries inflicted in self-defence.⁴⁰⁰ D, who is protecting himself against an unlawful attack from V, will not infringe V's Art 5 rights by detaining him to prevent further attack.

³⁹⁸ Cf Leverick [2002] Crim LR 347 at 361. See Leverick, Killing in Self Defence, Ch 10. See on the need for careful direction, Maddocks [2006] EWCA Crim 3112. Use of lethal force is a last resort: Noye [2011] EWCA Crim 650.

³⁹⁹ [2016] EWHC 33 (Admin), [2016] Crim LR 438. This aspect of the court's reasoning is discussed further in S Foster and G Leigh, 'Self-Defence and the Right to Life; the Use of Lethal or Potentially Lethal Force, UK Domestic Law, the Common Law and Article 2 ECHR' [2016] EHRLR 398.

⁴⁰⁰ Rivas v France [2005] Crim LR 305; RL v France [2005] Crim LR 306.

10.6.2 Force used in the course of preventing crime or arresting offenders

The common law on this subject was both complex and uncertain;⁴⁰¹ but, by s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967:

- (1) A person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime, or in effecting or assisting in the lawful arrest of offenders or suspected offenders or of persons unlawfully at large.
- (2) Subsection (1) above shall replace the rules of the common law on the question when force used for a purpose mentioned in the subsection is justified by that purpose.⁴⁰²

Section 3 states a rule both of civil and criminal law. When the force is 'reasonable in the circumstances' it is justified in every sense. No civil action or criminal proceeding will lie against the person using it. The section says nothing specifically about any criminal liability of the user of the force. When that is in issue the ordinary principles of mens rea should apply. The use of force may be unjustified in the civil law because it is not in fact 'reasonable in the circumstances'; but D, while liable in tort, may nevertheless be excused from criminal liability if it was 'reasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be'.⁴⁰³ It has been held in a civil action in Northern Ireland⁴⁰⁴ that, for the purpose of an identical provision, the objectives of the use of force are to be determined, not by the evidence of the user of the force, but by the court, applying an objective test. D, a soldier, said that his purpose in shooting was to arrest the occupants of a vehicle whom he believed on reasonable grounds to be determined terrorists who would probably continue to commit terrorist offences if they got away; but the court held that the use of force was not reasonable to make an arrest but was justified because it was reasonable to prevent crime.⁴⁰⁵ If this is right (and it is a persuasive opinion) in a civil action, it is also right in criminal law. The only difference is that in the criminal case D need not have reasonable grounds for his honest belief in the circumstances. The Court of Appeal confirmed in *Morris*⁴⁰⁶ that it is a misdirection to direct the jury that D must have reasonable grounds for believing it is necessary to use force. So long as D has a genuine belief, this will suffice, even if it is a mistaken one. This case is welcome confirmation that the first limb of both private defence and the defence in s 3 embodies a subjective test.

10.6.2.1 Prevention of crime

Where D seeks to rely on the defence based on his belief that V was committing a crime, the question may well arise whether the offence was in fact occurring when D used force. In Bowden,⁴⁰⁷ the issue was whether V had completed his appropriation of an article ⁴⁰¹ See the 1st edition of this book, at pp 230–238.

⁴⁰² See s 76 of the CJIA 2008, p 380.

⁴⁰³ See Duggan, n 394. The court held that it would be inconsistent with the statutory regime governing inquests to say that a verdict of lawful killing was available only where the coroner's jury also concluded that there would be no civil liability.

⁴⁰⁴ Kelly v Ministry of Defence [1989] NI 341. On whether the defence applies to British soldiers abroad, see Rowe, n 319.

⁴⁰⁵ The ECtHR (App no 17579/90) observed that the 'prevention of crime' does not appear in the justifications for taking life in Art 2 of the ECHR, but held that the shooting was justified to effect a lawful arrest. This decision is cogently criticized by JC Smith, 'The Right to Life and the Right to Kill in Law Enforcement' (1994) 144 NLJ 354.

⁴⁰⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 436, [2013] Crim LR 995.

⁴⁰⁷ [2002] EWCA Crim 1279.

before D used violence to prevent what he understood to be a theft being perpetrated by V, but that is not a strong example. Similarly, in *Attwater*⁴⁰⁸ D sought to rely on s 3 when he was charged with dangerous driving. He claimed that he drove in that manner (crashing with other vehicles) so that he could apprehend another driver X because X had been in an earlier incident and failed to stop. In short, D claimed to be apprehending X for his crime of failing to stop after a road traffic accident. On the facts, X's offence was probably already over.⁴⁰⁹ In R (DPP) v Stratford Magistrates' Court, the Divisional Court emphasized that in order to plead the defence, there must be a link between the use of force and an imminently apprehended crime.⁴¹⁰ In that case, which involved protestors obstructing the passage of vehicles making their way to an exhibition centre, Simon LJ stated that there was a lack of clarity as to what crime was being committed and how force was preventing it. There was no evidence that the vehicles being obstructed were involved in anything other than lawful activity. As there was nothing to link the obstruction of the highway with an imminent or immediate crime, it was held that the defendants could not rely on the defence.

10.6.2.2 Arresting an offender

Where D seeks to rely on the defence to justify his use of force in arresting an offender, issues of civil powers of arrest may arise and the jury may well need further guidance on those powers under s 24A of PACE, namely whether on the facts as D believed them to be: (a) an offence was being committed by V (s 24A(1)(a)); or (b) D had reasonable grounds to suspect that V was committing an offence (24A(1)(b)); or (c) D reasonably suspected V to have committed the offence (s 24A(2)(b)); and (d) he reasonably believed an arrest was necessary (s 24A(3)).⁴¹¹

10.6.2.3 What is a crime for the purposes of s 3?

Section 3 operates only where D responds to prevent a 'crime'. In Jones,⁴¹² the House of Lords concluded that the concept of 'crime' in this context can only have been intended to mean a crime recognized in English and Welsh law (ie not something which constitutes a crime only in international law).⁴¹³ The CLRC⁴¹⁴ explained the proposed s 3 in very broad terms:

the court, in considering what was reasonable force, would take into account all the circumstances, including in particular the nature and degree of force used, the seriousness of the evil to be prevented and the possibility of preventing it by other means; but there is no need to specify in the clause the criteria for deciding the question. Since the clause is framed in general terms, it is not limited to arrestable^[415] or any other class of offences, though in the case of very trivial offences it would very likely be held that it would not be reasonable to use even the slightest force to prevent them.

Despite the breadth of this statement, the House of Lords' limitation in Jones seems warranted if the defence is to retain the degree of certainty desirable.

⁴⁰⁸ [2010] EWCA Crim 2399.

⁴⁰⁹ Jackson [1985] RTR 257. The court left open whether this was strictly speaking a matter that should have been left to the jury. The court had no doubt that a jury would have rejected the defence.

⁴¹⁰ [2017] EWHC 1794 (Admin), [42]–[44].

⁴¹¹ See Morris [2013] EWCA Crim 436, [2013] Crim LR 995.

⁴¹² [2004] EWCA Crim 1981, [2005] Crim LR 122.

⁴¹³ See Lord Bingham at [31], Lord Hoffmann at [54] and Lord Mance at [105].

⁴¹⁴ Cmnd 2659, para 23.

⁴¹⁵ Since the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, all offences are potentially arrestable.

10.6.2.4 When is the use of force reasonable in s 3?

The CLRC,⁴¹⁶ in drafting the section, described it as set out in the last paragraph: ‘reasonable force, would take into account all the circumstances, including in particular the nature and degree of force used, the seriousness of the evil to be prevented and the possibility of preventing it by other means’.⁴¹⁷

It cannot be reasonable to cause harm unless (a) it was necessary to do so in order to prevent the crime or effect the arrest and (b) the evil which would follow from failure to prevent the crime or effect the arrest is so great that a reasonable person might think himself justified in causing that harm to avert that evil. It is likely, therefore, that even killing will be justifiable to prevent unlawful killing or grievous bodily harm, or to arrest a person where there is an imminent risk of his causing death or grievous bodily harm if left at liberty. The European Court has emphasized that the use of lethal force to stop a person suspected of a non-violent offence who does not pose an immediate risk of harm to anyone is contrary to Art 2.⁴¹⁸ The whole question is somewhat speculative. Is it reasonable to kill or cause serious bodily harm in order to prevent rape?⁴¹⁹ Or robbery, when the property involved is very valuable?⁴²⁰ How much force may be used to prevent the destruction of a great work of art? The most extreme cases in which the police use lethal force are because they believed D to be a terrorist suicide bomber and in which any lesser force would have been futile.

It seems that the question, ‘What amount of force is reasonable in the circumstances?’ is always for the jury and never a point of law for the judge.⁴²¹ If the prosecution case does not provide material to raise the issue, there is an evidential burden on the accused. If that burden is satisfied, that question for the jury is:

Are we satisfied that no reasonable person (a) with knowledge of such facts as were known to the accused^[422] believed by him to exist (b) in the circumstances and time available to him for reflection (c) could be of the opinion that the prevention of the risk of harm to which others might be exposed if the suspect were allowed to escape, justified exposing the suspect to the risk of harm to him that might result from the kind of force that the accused contemplated using.⁴²³

At common law it was recognized that the standard of reasonableness should, as noted earlier, take account of the nature of the crisis in which the necessity to use force arises for, in circumstances of great stress, even the reasonable person cannot be expected to judge the minimum degree of force required to a nicety. This is now reflected in s 76(7) of the CJIA 2008. In holding quite considerable force to be justified to prevent an obstruction of the highway by a violent and abusive driver, Geoffrey Lane J said: ‘In the circumstances one did not use jewellers’ scales to measure reasonable force...’⁴²⁴

In R (DPP) v Stratford Magistrates’ Court, the Divisional Court reiterated that citizens who apprehend a breach of the law are normally expected to call the police and not take the law into their own hands. Simon LJ emphasized that the use of force by individuals in the prevention of crime must be confined so as to avoid anarchy. His lordship stated that ⁴¹⁶ Cmnd 2659, para 23. ⁴¹⁷ Note s 76, earlier.

⁴¹⁸ See Nachova v Bulgaria (2004) 39 EHRR 37. ⁴¹⁹ See Leverick, n 325, Ch 8.

⁴²⁰ There are plenty of reported instances where the courts seem to have approved of the killing. See the more recent cases discussed by E Tennant (2003) 167 JP 804.

⁴²¹ Reference under s 48A of the Criminal Appeal (Northern Ireland) Act 1968 (No 1 of 1975) [1976] 2 All ER 937 at 947, HL, per Lord Diplock.

⁴²² Lord Diplock used the word ‘reasonably’ here and, in the light of his often stated opinion, it is likely that he would wish to continue to use it, were he still alive; but his remarks, in the light of Gladstone Williams and the cases following it, should be read as if ‘reasonably’ were omitted.

⁴²³ Reference under s 48A of the Criminal Appeal (Northern Ireland) Act 1968 (No 1 of 1975) [1976] 2 All ER 937 at 947, HL, per Lord Diplock.

⁴²⁴ Reed v Wastie [1972] Crim LR 221.

the use of force to prevent crime may be legitimate and enable D to plead the defence when individual action is necessary to prevent some imminent crime.⁴²⁵

10.6.2.5 Section 3 provides a defence only if force used

Section 3 excuses only the use of force. In Blake v DPP,⁴²⁶ D, demonstrating against the Iraq war, wrote with a felt pen on a concrete pillar near the Houses of Parliament. He was charged with criminal damage and argued that his act was justified by, inter alia, s 3. The court held that his act was ‘insufficient to amount to the use of force within the section’. This suggests that the defence might not have been ruled out on this ground (though it almost certainly would on other grounds) if D had used a hammer and chisel. It is odd that force should be excused when less serious acts might not be; but that is the effect of the section.⁴²⁷

The Court of Appeal considered this issue again in Bailey.⁴²⁸ There was a collision between D’s car and the car of a third party, C. C failed to stop and D sped after him, but struck V, who died. D sought to argue that he was using force to assist in the lawful arrest of C, who had committed the offence of failing to stop after an accident. The judge declined to leave the defence to the jury on the basis that D had not used force in attempting to stop C, indeed his evidence was that he had been a perfect gentleman throughout. Laws LJ stated: ‘Giving chase in a motor car in order to ascertain the registration number of a car ahead cannot as a matter of language or good sense be regarded as a use of force.’⁴²⁹ In addition, his lordship observed that D was not attempting to assist the arrest of C, rather his aim was to get his insurance details. This would also have precluded him from relying upon s 3.

In Jones, the House of Lords expressed doubt as to whether s 3 ought to be relied on in cases of alleged damage to property. Section 5 of the Criminal Damage Act provides the appropriate defence. The House also doubted whether s 3 was intended to apply to peaceable protest activities such as those used by the defendants in that case—cutting wire and chaining themselves to armed service vehicles.

In the most recent case to consider this issue, R (DPP) v Stratford Magistrates’ Court,⁴³⁰ Simon LJ stated that the defence applies to the direct application of force, although the force does not necessarily have to be applied directly against a person. The example given by his lordship was a defendant who attached himself to a lorry which he believed to be carrying chemical weapons. By way of contrast, it was held that the defence would not be available to those who lie down in the road in front of lorries making their way to a place where crimes are believed to be taking place or who block access by chaining themselves to gates.

10.6.3 Force used in private defence

The Criminal Law Act 1967 made no reference to the right of private defence—the right to use force in defence of oneself or another against an unjustifiable attack.⁴³¹ Insofar as that position differed in effect from s 3 of the 1967 Act, the common law was probably modified ⁴²⁵ [2017] EWHC 1794 (Admin), [18].

⁴²⁶ [1993] Crim LR 586, DC.

⁴²⁷ The illogicality of this restriction was noted by Brooke LJ in Bayer v DPP [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin), [2004] Crim LR 663, calling for reform of the defences. See also Riddell, p 407.

⁴²⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 378.

⁴²⁹ At [16]. His lordship distinguished Renouf on the basis that D in that case had forced another car off the road and rammed it to ensure that its occupants would still be there when the police arrived. That clearly did constitute the use of force.

⁴³⁰ [2017] EWHC 1794 (Admin), [50], [2018] Crim LR 157.

⁴³¹ Thus where D knows that the actual or imminent danger he faces is not from an unlawful or criminal act he cannot rely on the defence: Bayer v DPP [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin). See also Cresswell v DPP [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin) where the defendants could not be acting to prevent a crime when DEFRA officials were within the law to take the badgers in dispute.

by s 3. Private defence and the prevention of crime are sometimes indistinguishable. If D goes to the defence of E whom V is trying to murder, he is exercising the right of private defence but he is also seeking to prevent the commission of a crime. It would be absurd to ask D whether he was acting in defence of E or to prevent murder being committed and preposterous that the law should differ according to his answer. He was doing both.⁴³² The law cannot have two sets of criteria governing the same situation: s 3 of the Criminal Law Act is applicable. This is supported by the application of the same tests in s 76 of the 2008 Act to both the common law and s 3 defences.

The 1967 Act may be taken to have clarified the common law. Before the Criminal Law Act, the Court of Criminal Appeal equated the defence of others with the prevention of crime. In Duffy,⁴³³ it was held that a woman would be justified in using reasonable force when it was necessary to do so in defence of her sister, not because they were sisters, but because 'there is a general liberty as between strangers to prevent a [crime]'. The principles applicable are the same whether the defence is put on grounds of self-defence or on grounds of prevention of crime. The degree of force permissible should not differ, for example, in the case of an employer defending his employee from the case of a brother defending his sister—or, indeed, that of a complete stranger coming to the defence of another under unlawful attack. As s 76(10)(b) of the 2008 Act makes clear, references to self-defence include acting in defence of another. The position is the same where D acts in defence of property, whether his own or that of another, which V seeks to steal, destroy or damage.

Where D is acting in defence of his own person it may be less obvious that he is also acting in the prevention of crime but this will usually be in fact the case. D's purpose is not the enforcement of the law but his own self-preservation; yet the degree of force which is permissible is the same.⁴³⁴ An inquiry into D's motives is not practicable.⁴³⁵

As with s 3, the private law defence is limited to cases in which D responds to an unjustified attack by using force. However, there is no requirement with the private law defence at common law that D is responding to a 'crime'. Therefore, where D believes that V's actions are unjustified because they are, for example, unlawful in international law, his use of force to prevent V's action may be justified.

10.6.4 Further elements of private and public defence

10.6.4.1 A duty to retreat?

There were formerly technical rules about the duty to retreat before using force, or at least fatal force. This is now simply a factor to be taken into account in deciding whether it was necessary to use force, and whether the force was reasonable.⁴³⁶ The courts had developed the principle at common law (Palmer v R,⁴³⁷ *Duffy v DPP*⁴³⁸) that it was a matter of evidence relevant to whether D was acting in self-defence but that there was no rule that a person had to retreat from threatened violence.⁴³⁹ In Jones, the House of Lords emphasized the view that it is not for the citizen who apprehends a breach of the law to take matters into his own hands if there is an opportunity to summon official help.⁴⁴⁰ Section 76(6)(A) now ⁴³² See Clegg [1995] 1 All ER 334 at 343, [1995] Crim LR 418. ⁴³³ [1967] 1 QB 63, CCA.

⁴³⁴ Devlin v Armstrong [1971] NI 13 at 33; McInnes [1971] 3 All ER 295 at 302. ⁴³⁵ See p 101.

⁴³⁶ McInnes, n 434. But cf Whyte [1987] 3 All ER 416 at 419, CA.

⁴³⁷ [1971] AC 814, PC. This passage then appearing in the 4th edition was approved by the Court of Appeal in Bird [1985] 2 All ER 513 at 516, [1985] Crim LR 388. Cf Horder, APOCL, 138 arguing that this should be seen as an exception to the general principle of a duty to avoid conflict.

⁴³⁸ [2007] EWHC 3169 (Admin). ⁴³⁹ See M (ZM) [2007] EWCA Crim 376.

⁴⁴⁰ See Lord Mance at [78]–[81]. This point was also emphasized by Simon LJ in R (DPP) v Stratford Magistrates' Court [2017] EWHC 1794 (Admin), [2018] Crim LR 157.

states explicitly that there is no duty to retreat. Rather, the possibility that D could have retreated is to be considered (so far as it is relevant) as a factor to be taken into account when considering whether the degree of force used by D was reasonable in the circumstances as he believed them to be. In Ray, discussed earlier, the Lord Chief Justice stated that if there is a threat of confrontation in the street, then the option to retreat may be important in determining whether the use of any force was reasonable. In the case of an intruder in the home, however, it was observed that the option of retreat is unlikely to arise in many cases and therefore the degree of force used, although otherwise appearing to be disproportionate, might nonetheless be assessed as reasonable.

10.6.4.2 Pre-emptive strikes

It has been accepted that a defendant need not wait for the attacker to strike the first blow before he defends himself. In Devlin v Armstrong,⁴⁴¹ following serious disturbances in Londonderry, D exhorted crowds of people who were stoning the police to build a barricade and keep the police out and fight them with petrol bombs. D claimed that she had acted in this manner because she honestly believed that the police were about to behave unlawfully in assaulting people and damaging property in the area. The Northern Ireland Court of Appeal acknowledged that a 'plea of self-defence may afford a defence [where D used force] not merely to counter an actual attack, but to ward off or prevent an attack which he honestly anticipated. In that case, however, the anticipated attack must be imminent.'⁴⁴² In Beckford,⁴⁴³ the Privy Council also acknowledged that circumstances may justify a pre-emptive strike in self-defence. The availability of the defence in circumstances of pre-emptive strike has been narrowly construed by the courts. Where there is no evidence to support a suggestion that D has acted in pre-emptive defence, no jury direction on the issue is needed.⁴⁴⁴

The requirement of imminence, strictly construed, prevents the widespread reliance on the defence where battered spouses kill their abusive partners. Commonly, the physical disparity between the parties means that the woman will seize her opportunity to kill the abuser when he is not poised about to strike her, but in a position of vulnerability. This caused such individuals to rely on the partial defences of provocation and diminished responsibility.⁴⁴⁵

Under s 54 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, a defendant who kills with malice aforethought may rely on a defence of loss of control (LOSC) if he has lost his self-control and, inter alia, he fears serious violence from V towards himself or an identified person. The relationship between the LOSC defence and self-defence or defence of others under s 76 of the CJIA 2008 needs to be approached with caution. Self-defence is available on any charge; LOSC defence is available only on a charge of murder.⁴⁴⁶ Self-defence results in an acquittal; LOSC in a verdict of manslaughter. With self-defence, D can only rely on a threat of (or believed threat of) imminent attack; with LOSC, D can rely on fear of future non-imminent attack. The defence of self-defence is available if D holds a genuine, though mistaken and ⁴⁴¹ [1971] NI 13. ⁴⁴² Per Lord MacDermott LCJ at 33.

⁴⁴³ [1987] 3 All ER 425, [1988] Crim LR 116, PC.

⁴⁴⁴ Williams [2005] EWCA Crim 669, cf Carter [2005] All ER (D) 372 (Apr); Murphy [2007] EWCA Crim 2810.

⁴⁴⁵ See, generally, the discussion at p 528 and C Wells, 'Battered Woman Syndrome and Defences to Homicide: Where Now?' (1994) 14 LS 266; A McColgan, 'In Defence of Battered Women Who Kill' (1993) 13 OLS 508; J Dressler, 'Battered Women Who Kill Their Sleeping Tormentors' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory arguing for a duress-type defence and J Horder, 'Killing the Passive Abuser: A Theoretical Defence' in ibid, 285.

⁴⁴⁶ If there are multiple counts relating to different victims, care will be needed in directing the jury.

unreasonable, belief of the threat to him of any violence. The LOSC defence is available if D genuinely, though mistakenly and unreasonably, believes himself to be at risk of serious violence.⁴⁴⁷ Violence is undefined in the LOSC defence but includes sexual violence.⁴⁴⁸ If the degree of force used by D in killing V is, viewed objectively, excessive, that will deprive D of the defence of self-defence,⁴⁴⁹ but will not automatically deprive D of the LOSC defence.⁴⁵⁰

10.6.4.3 Defence against a provoked attack

In Browne,⁴⁵¹ Lowry LCJ in Northern Ireland said, with regard to self-defence, 'The need to act must not have been created by conduct of the accused in the immediate context of the incident which was likely or intended to give rise to that need.'

Self-defence is clearly not available where D deliberately provoked the attack with the intention of killing purportedly in self-defence.⁴⁵² Where D's act was merely 'likely' to give rise to the need, the proposition, with respect, is more questionable. If D did not foresee that his actions would lead to an attack on him, it is submitted that he should not be deprived of his usual right of self-defence. Even if he did foresee the attack, he may still be entitled to act in self-defence if he did not intend it. D intervenes to stop V from ill-treating V's wife. He knows that V may react violently. V makes a deadly attack on D. Surely D's right of self-defence is unimpaired. This suggestion was cited obiter with approval in Balogun.⁴⁵³

In Rashford,⁴⁵⁴ the Court of Appeal made it clear that self-defence is available to the person who started the fight, if the person whom he attacks not only defends himself but goes over to the offensive. As a matter of principle, the defence ought to be available where D has prompted V's attack, and even where D has foreseen that V was likely to respond with violence, subject to the restriction that it should not be available where D deliberately provoked the attack with the intention of killing purportedly in self-defence. Considerable care will be necessary in directing the jury in such cases. In Rashford, Dyson LJ approved the Scottish decision in *Burns v HM Advocate*⁴⁵⁵ as an important decision which should be more widely known. In that case⁴⁵⁶ it was said that the question:

depends upon whether the violence offered by the victim was so out of proportion to the accused's own actings as to give rise to the reasonable apprehension that he was in an immediate danger from which he had no other means of escape, and whether the violence which he then used was no more than was necessary to preserve his own life or protect himself from serious injury.

As the commentary in the Criminal Law Review points out, that test is inaccurate for English law as it suggests that the apprehension which D must have as to the threat of danger must be a reasonable one.⁴⁵⁷ ⁴⁴⁷ See MOJ Circular 2010/13, para 25. Cf Leigh, p 533 n 107 who states that the test is objective.

⁴⁴⁸ MOJ CP 19/08, para 44.

⁴⁴⁹ And therefore of a complete acquittal. See Clegg [1995]. See also Leverick, Self Defence (2007) 172 et seq.

⁴⁵⁰ This analysis in the 13th edition was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322, [2013] Crim LR 770, [59].

⁴⁵¹ [1973] NI 96 at 107, CCA, discussed 24 NILQ 527. On 'prior fault' generally, see S Yeo, Compulsion (1990) Ch 5.

⁴⁵² Cf Mason (1756) Fost 132. Under the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, the loss of self-control defence is not available in such circumstances. See Ch 13, p 531.

⁴⁵³ [1999] 98/6762/X2.

⁴⁵⁴ [2005] EWCA Crim 3377, [2006] Crim LR 547. Considered in Marsh v DPP [2015] EWHC 1022 (Admin), [2015] Crim LR 713.

⁴⁵⁵ 1995 SLT 1090. ⁴⁵⁶ At 1093H.

⁴⁵⁷ cf Williams (Gladstone) [1987] 3 All ER 411, [1984] Crim LR 163; Beckford v R [1988] AC 130, [1988] Crim LR 116, PC; Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, s 76.

The principles were reiterated in *Harvey*⁴⁵⁸ in relation to self-defence relied on by an initial aggressor. The court followed Rashford. This is subject to a principle that D cannot rely on self-defence where he has set out to engineer an attack by V which will allow him, D, to respond with greater violence under the guise of self-defence. The difficulty of course lies in how to explain that to a jury. The court in Harvey emphasized that the direction on self-defence for initial aggressors is not always necessary simply because there is a dispute about 'who started it'. The Court of Appeal once again returned to this in Keane,⁴⁵⁹ which provides a useful review, endorsing the guidance given in Harvey on the application of the defence where D provokes violence from another but on whom the tables are turned. Hughes LJ said:

It seems to us that that kind of homely expression, like 'the roles being reversed', can quite well encapsulate the question which may arise if an original aggressor claims the ability to rely on self-defence. We would commend it as suitable for a great many cases, subject only to this reminder.^[460]... We need to say as clearly as we may that it is not the law that if a defendant sets out to provoke another to punch him and succeeds, the defendant is then entitled to punch the other person... The reason why it is not the law is that underlying the law of self-defence is the common-sense morality that what is not unlawful is force which is reasonably necessary... Of course it might be different if the defendant set out to provoke a punch and the victim unexpectedly and disproportionately attacked him with a knife.

10.6.4.4 Defence against lawful force

Lord Lowry CJ of Northern Ireland stated in Browne:⁴⁶¹

Where a police officer is acting lawfully and using only such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime or in effecting the lawful arrest of offenders or suspected offenders, self-defence against him is not an available defence.

Again, it may be respectfully suggested that this proposition is too wide. If D, an innocent person, is attacked by the police who mistakenly believe him to be a gunman and the police attack is such that it would be reasonable if D were the gunman, does the law really deny D the right to resist?⁴⁶² Again, if D reasonably supposes that the police are terrorists, he surely commits no crime by resisting, even if the police are in fact acting lawfully and reasonably. In *Oraki v DPP*⁴⁶³ D was convicted of obstructing an officer in the execution of his duty contrary to s 89(2) of Police Act 1996. D thought his mother was being assaulted by a police officer and intervened to prevent that from taking place. D was convicted on the basis that neither self-defence nor defence of another could be pleaded as defences to a charge of obstructing a police officer. Singh LJ stated that what was crucial was whether D genuinely believed ⁴⁵⁸ [2009] EWCA Crim 469. ⁴⁵⁹ [2010] EWCA Crim 2514, [2011] Crim LR 393.

⁴⁶⁰ His lordship added that: 'Lord Hope's formulation of the rule [in Burns] makes it clear that it is not enough to bring self-defence into issue that a defendant who started the fight is at some point during the fight for the time being getting the worst of it, merely because the victim is defending himself reasonably. In that event there has been no disproportionate act by the victim of the kind that Lord Hope is contemplating. The victim has not been turned into the aggressor. The tables have not been turned in that particular sense. The roles have not been reversed', at [18].

⁴⁶¹ [1973] NI 96 at 107.

⁴⁶² This passage in the 14th edition was cited with approval by the Divisional Court in Oraki v DPP [2018] EWHC 115 (Admin), [27]. Mckoy [2002] EWCA Crim 1628 suggests that D may resist unlawful restraint by a police officer. The judgment of Winn LJ in Kenlin v Gardiner [1967] 2 QB 510 is ambivalent. Albert v Lavin [1982] AC 546, DC (reversed by the House of Lords on another point) supports the view in the text. And see Ansell v Swift [1987] Crim LR 194 (Lewes Crown Court). Cf Fennell [1971] 1 QB 428, [1970] 3 All ER 215, [1970] Crim LR 581 and commentary; p 709. These cases must now be read in light of Oraki.

⁴⁶³ [2018] EWHC 115 (Admin).

he needed to use force to defend his mother from being assaulted. It was observed that the reasonableness of a mistaken belief on the part of a defendant is relevant to the question of whether it is a genuinely held belief but if it is a genuinely held belief, it does not matter that the belief is an unreasonable one. The Divisional Court held that the defence of self-defence or defence of another person is, as a matter of law, available in relation to the offence of obstructing a constable in the execution of his duty under s 89(2) of the Police Act 1996. It is submitted that the judgment in Oraki is correct as a matter of principle as it is faithful to the subjective nature of the first limb of the defences.⁴⁶⁴ Although the judgment in Browne has not been overturned, it ought to be treated with considerable caution.

A person is not to be deprived of his right of self-defence because he has gone to a place where he might lawfully go, but where he knew he was likely to be attacked.

In a very limited number of cases, the attacker may not be committing a crime because, for example, he is a child under ten, insane, in a state of automatism or under a material mistake of fact. If D is unaware of the circumstances which exempt the attacker (eg the attacker's insanity), then s 3 of the Criminal Law Act will still, indirectly, afford D a defence to any criminal charge which may be brought, provided he is acting reasonably in the light of the circumstances as they appear, reasonably or not, to him; for he intends to use force in the prevention of crime, as that section allows, and therefore has no mens rea.

Where D does know of the circumstances which mean that the attack on him is not criminal, then s 3 is inapplicable, but it is submitted that the question should be decided on similar principles. A person should be allowed to use reasonable force in defending himself or another against an unjustifiable attack, even if the attacker is not criminally responsible.⁴⁶⁵ Authority for this can now be found in the case of the conjoined twins, Re A (Children).⁴⁶⁶ The court granted a declaration that it would be lawful to carry out an operation to separate the twins to enable A to live even though the operation would inevitably kill B. B's heart and lungs were too deficient to keep her alive. She lived only because A was able to circulate sufficient oxygenated blood for both. The evidence was that if the operation was not carried out both would die. The ratio decidendi of the three judges differed but it is submitted that Ward LJ rightly held that this was a case of self-defence. B was, of course, completely innocent but she was killing A. He equated the case with that of a six-year-old boy shooting all and sundry in a playground. It would be lawful to kill him if that was the only way to prevent the deaths of others. There is a great difference between the boy's active conduct and the pathetic inactivity of B; but neither is committing a crime. Whatever the position regarding necessity and duress, it has always been held that private defence may be an answer to a charge of murder.

10.6.4.5 D's reliance on unknown justifying circumstances

What of D who seeks to rely on facts that existed and would justify his use of force, but of which he was unaware at the time of acting?⁴⁶⁷ The test proposed in the CLRC's Fourteenth Report and adopted as the law in Gladstone Williams and s 76 is stated exclusively in terms of D's belief. Its terms do not apply where D is unaware of existing circumstances which, if he ⁴⁶⁴ In the subsequent case of Wheeldon v CPS [2018] EWHC 249 (Admin) the Divisional Court, relying upon Oraki, held that in principle there was no rule that the defence of self-defence was not available to a person who assaulted a police officer who was found to be acting in the execution of their duty contrary to s 89(1).

⁴⁶⁵ Bayer v DPP, n 431.

⁴⁶⁶ [2000] 4 All ER 961, [2001] Crim LR 400, CA (Civ Div) and commentary.

⁴⁶⁷ See TM Funk, 'Justifying Justifications' (1999) 19 OJLS 630, arguing that Dadson represents a 'very principled, precedent, coherent and logically compelling decision'. See also PH Robinson, 'Competing Theories of Justification: Deeds v Reasons' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 45; R Christopher, 'Unknowing Justification and the Logical Necessity of the Dadson Principle in Self-Defence' (1995) 15 OJLS 229; J Gardner, Offences and Defences, Ch 5.

knew of them, would justify his use of force. This line of reasoning accords with Dadson.⁴⁶⁸ This is no accident. The Committee gave careful consideration to the matter and concluded that the Dadson principle was correct.⁴⁶⁹

Some academics take the view that where the circumstances justify his act, it is immaterial that D is not aware of them; where they can merely excuse his act, they do so only if he is aware of them.⁴⁷⁰ Force used to make an arrest is said to be justified, not merely excused, so, it is argued, Dadson was a case of justification and is wrongly decided. Duress, which obviously requires awareness, is distinguishable because according to most commentators it merely excuses. But such an analysis based solely on justification and excuse is overly simplistic and does not provide a satisfactory explanation of Dadson. A boy who, knowing it is a wicked thing to do, deliberately kills his playmate has a defence if he was aged only nine at the time. Ten is the minimum age of criminal responsibility. He is excused, but no one would say he was 'justified' in killing his playmate because he was only nine. Is he to be liable for murder if he thought he was ten? Obviously not. He is excused by the fact, whether he knows of it or not. It is the policy of the law that a child under ten shall not be convicted of crime and the child's mistake cannot be allowed to defeat that policy.

Self-defence is, subject to s 76, still governed by the common law. Suppose that D shoots at V with intent to murder him and kills him. It turns out that D did so in the nick of time because, unknown to D, V was about to shoot D dead.⁴⁷¹ If D had only known he would certainly have had the defence of self-defence. Is D guilty of murder? According to orthodox justification/excuse theory, it depends on whether self-defence provides a justification or an excuse for the use of force. Glanville Williams, who at one time thought self-defence merely an excuse, later concluded that it is a justification,⁴⁷² so he thought D would have a defence. But can it really be right that a person who has fired a gun at another with intent to murder should be beyond the reach of the law? One answer is that, though not guilty of murder, he is guilty of attempted murder under the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 (since, by that Act, he is to be treated for the purpose of an attempt charge as if the facts were as he believed them to be). But how can it be said that his act was both (a) justified and (b) attempted murder? What would a jury make of a direction to that effect? The better view is that the Dadson principle applies and that it is generally applicable to defences unless policy (as in the case of the nine-year-old, above) otherwise requires.

10.6.4.6 Defence of property

Where D is charged with criminal damage and his defence is that he was acting in defence of his own property—as where he kills V's dog which, he claims, was attacking his sheep, the matter is regulated by the Criminal Damage Act 1971, which is considered in Ch 27.⁴⁷³ Where D is charged with an offence against the person, or any other offence, and his defence is that he was defending his property, he will generally be acting in the prevention of crime and, as in defence of the person, s 3 is likely to be held to provide the criterion. Following amendment to s 76 of the CJA, it is clear that the provisions apply to '(ia) the purpose of defence of property under the common law'.

⁴⁶⁸ (1850) 2 Den 35.

⁴⁶⁹ The discussion is not included in the Fourteenth Report, paras 281–287.

⁴⁷⁰ See in general GP Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978); Smith, Justification and Excuse; ML Corrado (ed), Justification and Excuse in the Criminal Law: A Collection of Essays (1994); A Eser et al (eds), Justification and Excuse: Comparative Perspectives (1987). For monographs and essays providing sophisticated analyses of the theories, see especially R Schopp, Justification Defences and Just Convictions (1988) and Horder, Excusing Crime.

⁴⁷¹ This paradox of the unknowing justification is analysed by R Christopher (1995) 15 OJLS 229.

⁴⁷² Compare CLGP (1961) 25, (1982) 2 LS 233, 250.

⁴⁷³ See D Lanham, 'Defence of Property in the Criminal Law' [1966] Crim LR 368.

In Faraj,⁴⁷⁴ the Court of Appeal considered the defence of protection of property where D had made a mistake in thinking that a gas repair man was a burglar and had threatened him with a knife. The court could see no reason why a householder should not be entitled to detain someone in his house whom he genuinely believed to be a burglar. 'The householder must honestly believe that he needs to detain the suspect and must do so in a way which is reasonable': Gladstone Williams applies to mistakes in relation to defence of property.

It can rarely, if ever, be reasonable to use deadly force merely for the protection of property.⁴⁷⁵ Would it have been reasonable to kill even one of the Great Train Robbers to prevent them from getting away with their millions of pounds of loot, or to kill a man about to destroy a priceless painting (even assuming that no means short of killing could prevent the commission of the crime)? It will be recalled that Art 2 of the ECHR does not permit the use of lethal force otherwise than in preventing riot, etc, or unlawful 'violence'.

In the case of Hussey,⁴⁷⁶ it was stated that it would be lawful for a person to kill one who would unlawfully dispossess him of his home. Even if this were the law at the time, it would seem difficult now to contend that such conduct would be reasonable; for legal redress would be available if the householder were wrongly evicted. Insofar as the householder was preventing crime, his conduct would be regulated by s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 which replaces the rules of common law.

More recently, in *Burns*⁴⁷⁷ the court emphasized the narrow scope of defences where D is protecting property. B was convicted of causing actual bodily harm to V, a prostitute whom B had picked up and driven to a secluded spot. Having decided not to have sex with V, and having paid her, B requested V to leave the car and when she refused, used force. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction. B had not acted in self-defence nor in defence of anyone else; he had not been defending his property against threat or risk of damage; he was not acting for any purpose within s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967. The defence was one of 'self-help'. That defence was always a last resort. It was a defence which the common law would be reluctant to extend. Lord Judge CJ added:

Recognising that to be lawful the use of force must always be reasonable in the circumstances, we accept that it might be open to the owner of a vehicle, in the last resort and when all reasonably practicable alternatives have failed, forcibly to remove an individual who has entered into his vehicle without permission and refuses to leave it. However, where that individual entered the car as a passenger, in effect at the invitation of the car owner, on the basis that they mutually understood that when their dealings were completed she would be driven back in the car from whence she had come, the use of force to remove her at the appellant's unilateral whim, was unlawful.

The court also doubted, as a matter of legal theory, whether the car owner's rights could be treated as analogous to those of a landowner to remove trespassers. However, caution is required since it does not seem the point was argued in full.

10.6.4.7 To what offences is public or private defence an answer?

These defences are most naturally relied on as answers to charges of homicide, assault, false imprisonment and other offences against the person. It is not clear to what extent public or private defence may be invoked as defences to other crimes.⁴⁷⁸

⁴⁷⁴ [2007] EWCA Crim 1033.

⁴⁷⁵ See Leverick, Killing in Self-Defence, Ch 7.

⁴⁷⁶ (1924) 18 Cr App R 160, CCA.

⁴⁷⁷ [2010] EWCA Crim 1023.

⁴⁷⁸ Clause 44 of the Draft Code ('Use of force in public or private defence') would not justify or excuse any criminal conduct not involving the use of force (except acts immediately preparatory to the use of such force); but the Code would leave it open to the courts to develop a wider defence at common law.

In A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1983),⁴⁷⁹ D made and retained in his shop petrol bombs at a time when extensive rioting was taking place in the area. He was acquitted of an offence under s 4(1) of the Explosive Substances Act 1883 of possessing an explosive substance in such circumstances as to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that he did not have it for a lawful object. It was a defence under the terms of the section for D to prove that he had it for a lawful object. The Court of Appeal held that there was evidence on which a jury might have decided that the use of the petrol bombs would have been reasonable force in self-defence against an apprehended attack. If so, D had the bombs for 'a lawful object' and was not guilty of the offence charged. Yet it was assumed⁴⁸⁰ that he was committing offences of manufacturing and storing explosives contrary to the Explosives Act 1875. The court agreed with the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland in *Fegan*⁴⁸¹ that possession of a firearm for the purpose of protecting the possessor may be possession of a lawful object, even though the possession was unlawful being without a licence. The judgment is strangely ambivalent.

[D] is not confined for his remedy to calling in the police or boarding up his premises. He may still arm himself for his own protection, if the exigency arises, although in so doing he may commit other offences. That he may be guilty of other offences will avoid the risk of anarchy contemplated by the reference.

To say 'He may do it—but he will commit an offence if he does' seems inconsistent. There is, however, a clear statement that acts immediately preparatory to justifiable acts of self-defence are also justified. This must surely be right. If D becomes caught up in a shoot-out between police and dangerous criminals, picks up a handgun dropped by a wounded policeman and fires in order to defend his own and police lives, it would be astonishing if he had a defence to a charge of homicide but not to possessing a firearm.⁴⁸² Possibly, then, the passage earlier refers to preparatory, but not immediately preparatory, acts. This does not resolve the ambivalence. The law must say whether a person may, or may not, do such acts; and if it says they are crimes, he may not.

The matter must now be considered in the light of the defence of duress of circumstances.⁴⁸³ A person may save himself from injury by an attacker by using force or by running away and Willer and *Conway*⁴⁸⁴ are cases where this form of self-defence was an answer to a charge of reckless driving. In Symonds,⁴⁸⁵ where a driver, charged under s 20 of the OAPA and with dangerous driving, raised self-defence, it was held that the same considerations applied to the driving charge as to the s 20 offence. Calling the defence to the driving charge 'duress of circumstances' may make no difference—but sometimes it may, because duress requires an objective test where the test for self-defence under s 76 is certainly subjective. As a matter of policy there is a great deal to be said for encouraging a threatened person to escape, even where that involves committing a minor offence, rather than using force against the aggressor.

A successful defendant will not care whether his defence is called 'duress of circumstances' or 'private defence'; but whether the defence succeeds may well depend on how it is categorized, because duress of circumstance is limited to threats to the person whereas self-defence extends to defence of property; and the former is governed by an objective test

⁴⁷⁹ [1984] QB 456, [1984] 1 All ER 988, [1984] Crim LR 289 and commentary.

⁴⁸⁰ A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1983) [1984] 1 All ER 988 at 992–993, [1984] Crim LR 289.

⁴⁸¹ [1972] NI 80. Cf Emmanuel [1998] Crim LR 347.

⁴⁸² cf Georgiades (1989) 89 Cr App R 206, [1989] Crim LR 574; see also Salih [2007] EWCA Crim 2750; McAuley [2009] EWCA Crim 2130, [2010] Crim LR 336.

⁴⁸³ See Pommell, p 344.

⁴⁸⁴ See p 365. See DW Elliott, 'Necessity, Duress and Self-Defence' [1989] Crim LR 611.

⁴⁸⁵ [1998] Crim LR 280.

whereas a subjective test is applied to the latter. A disqualified driver who drove his Rolls-Royce to avoid its destruction by an aggressor could not plead duress (no threat of death or serious injury). Duress would not excuse possession of the handgun even if the possessor honestly believed that life was in danger, unless his belief was based on reasonable grounds (though D's self-defence would not be impaired). For the avoidance of such anomalies, acts immediately preparatory to public or private defence are better regarded as justified or excused by those defences.

The fears of the courts regarding a general defence of necessity⁴⁸⁶ probably militate against a recognition that public and private defence may constitute a defence to crime generally; but, where contravention of any law is (a) necessary to enable the right of public or private defence to be exercised, and (b) reasonable in the circumstances, it ought to be excused. It is open to the courts to move in this direction.

The availability of private defence to a charge of dangerous driving was considered by the Court of Appeal in Riddell.⁴⁸⁷ It was held that although the legal elements of that offence do not inherently involve the use of force, that does not preclude the availability of the defence where, on the particular facts of the case, use of responsive force was involved in the dangerous driving alleged. The court rejected the argument that a wholly uniform approach ought to apply that would preclude private defence from being pleaded by reference to the nature of the offence charged without reference to the underlying facts. It is submitted that there is much to commend the Court of Appeal's approach, as it ensures that focus is placed on the substance of what occurred, rather than on the offence D is alleged to have committed.

In *Oraki v DPP*⁴⁸⁸ Singh LJ doubted whether it was right as a matter of principle that private or public defence is restricted to cases involving the use of force. The example his lordship gave of such a case was someone who blocks a police car by driving his own car in front of it, and in doing so enables a third party to escape. This person would commit the offence of obstructing a police officer and Singh LJ stated that the fact force was not used should not preclude someone from pleading the defence. It is respectfully submitted that this dictum ought to be treated with caution, as the use of force is the hallmark of the defences discussed in this part of the chapter. Although there may appear to be an anomaly in that someone who does not use force will be unable to plead the defence, as Davis LJ stated in Riddell, 'self-defence ordinarily arises—putting it shortly—where a person uses force in order to meet actual or perceived force or threat of force'.⁴⁸⁹ An individual who finds himself in the situation described by Singh LJ would be able to plead duress of circumstances, but not self-defence or defence of another.

10.6.4.8 Use of force excessive in the known circumstances

Generally, where D, being under no mistake of fact, uses force in public or private defence, he either has a complete defence or if he uses excessive force, no defence. In murder, if D used excessive force and lost his self-control he may (subject to the other elements of the defence being satisfied) be able to rely on the loss of self-control defence to reduce the offence to manslaughter. However, even in murder, if D has not lost his self-control, but has used excessive force, he will be guilty for the full offence of murder even if he genuinely (and reasonably) believed some force was necessary. This was affirmed by the House of Lords in Clegg.⁴⁹⁰ D, a soldier on duty in Northern Ireland, fired four shots at a car (in fact stolen) which did not stop at the checkpoint he was guarding. The judge, sitting in a ⁴⁸⁶ See p 369. ⁴⁸⁷ [2017] EWCA Crim 413.

⁴⁸⁸ [2018] EWHC 115 (Admin). ⁴⁸⁹ [2017] EWCA Crim 413, [41].

⁴⁹⁰ [1995] 1 All ER 334, [1995] Crim LR 418 and commentary. See also M Kaye, 'Excessive Force in Self Defence After Clegg' (1996) 61 J Crim L 448.

'Diplock' court (without a jury), accepted that the first three shots had been fired in self-defence or defence of a colleague but that the fourth, which killed, was not, as the car had passed the soldiers and was already 50 feet down the road. D's conviction of murder was affirmed by the House of Lords, holding that it is established law that killing by excessive force in self-defence is murder and that if a change is to be made, it is for Parliament, not the courts, to make it. Where D has not lost control, but has used excessive force, there is no partial defence resulting in a manslaughter conviction, as with loss of control and diminished responsibility. The possibility was considered and rejected immediately after the Clegg decision.⁴⁹¹

In Palmer,⁴⁹² the Privy Council explained why they saw no need for further refinement of the law in England:

If there has been an attack so that defence is reasonably necessary it will be recognized that a person defending himself cannot weigh to a nicety the exact measure of his necessary defensive action. If a jury thought that in a moment of unexpected anguish a person attacked had only done what he honestly and instinctively thought was necessary that would be most potent evidence that only reasonable defensive action had been taken. A jury will be told that a defence of self-defence, where the evidence makes it[s] raising possible, will only fail if the prosecution show beyond doubt that what the accused did was not by way of self-defence.⁴⁹³

The CLRC was persuaded that Howe was right in principle and recommended its adoption in relation to private defence of person and property and the prevention of crime.⁴⁹⁴ It is submitted that the soundness of this recommendation is not impaired by Clegg.⁴⁹⁵

10.6.5 Reform of self-defence/private defence

The Law Commission's general proposals on defences are contained in Report No 218 which provides:

- 27(1) The use of force by a person for any of the following purposes, if only such as is reasonable in the circumstances as he believes them to be, does not constitute an offence—
- (a) to protect himself or another from injury, assault or detention caused by a criminal act;
 - (b) to protect himself or (with the authority of that other) another from trespass to the person;
 - (c) to protect his property from appropriation, destruction or damage caused by a criminal act or from trespass or infringement;
 - (d) to protect property belonging to another from appropriation, destruction or damage caused by a criminal act or (with the authority of the other) from trespass or infringement; or
 - (e) to prevent crime or a breach of the peace.

⁴⁹¹ See the Inter-Departmental Review of the Law on Lethal Force in Self-Defence or the Prevention of Crime (1996) paras 83–84.

⁴⁹² [1971] AC 814.

⁴⁹³ On the importance of this direction and the potential for it to be underestimated, see LC 290, Part 4, paras 4.11–4.14.

⁴⁹⁴ Fourteenth Report, para 228. Cf PF Smith, 'Excessive Defence—A Rejection of Australian Initiative' [1972] Crim LR 524.

⁴⁹⁵ The Law Commission in cl 59 of the Draft Code have implemented the recommendation.

- (6) Where an act is lawful by reason only of a belief or suspicion which is mistaken, the defence provided by this section applies as in the case of an unlawful act, unless—
- (a) D knows or believes that the force is used against a constable or a person assisting a constable, and
 - (b) the constable is acting in the execution of his duty.

10.7 Impossibility

Where the law imposes a duty to act, it has sometimes been held that it is a defence that, through no fault of his own, it was impossible for D to fulfil that duty.⁴⁹⁶ The secretary of a limited company is not liable for failure to annex to an annual return a copy of a balance sheet laid before the company in a general meeting where there is no such balance sheet in existence: 'nobody ought to be prosecuted for that which it is impossible to do'.⁴⁹⁷ A person is not liable for failure to leave a particular place if he is unaware of the order requiring him to do so.⁴⁹⁸ In New Zealand, it has been held that a failure to leave the country after a revocation of a permit was not an offence if no airline would carry D because of the advanced state of her pregnancy.⁴⁹⁹ Impossibility is a defence to a charge of failure to assist a constable to preserve the peace when called upon to do so.⁵⁰⁰

On the other hand, the failure of a driver to produce a test certificate is not excused by the fact that it is impossible for him to do so, the owner of the vehicle being unable or unwilling to produce it.⁵⁰¹

We find here the inconsistency which is so common in relation to strict liability. It cannot be asserted, therefore, that any general defence of impossibility is recognized at the present time. It has to be regarded as a question of the interpretation of the particular provision, with all the uncertainty that this entails.

When impossibility might be available as a defence, it will presumably fail if the impossibility has been brought about by D's own default.⁵⁰² The defence would also seem to be confined to cases where the law imposes a duty to act and not to cases of commission where the corresponding defence, if any, is necessity.⁵⁰³

⁴⁹⁶ CLGP, 746–748. See A Smart, 'Criminal Responsibility for Failing to do the Impossible' (1987) 103 LQR 532.

⁴⁹⁷ Stockdale v Coulson [1974] 3 All ER 154 at 157, DC, per Melford Stevenson J.

⁴⁹⁸ Lim Chin Aik v R [1963] AC 160, [1963] 1 All ER 223, PC.

⁴⁹⁹ Finau v Department of Labour [1984] 2 NZLR 396.

⁵⁰⁰ Brown (1841) Car & M 314, per Alderson B.

⁵⁰¹ Davey v Towle [1973] RTR 328, [1973] Crim LR 360, DC.

⁵⁰² But cf Stockdale v Coulson, n 497, and comment at [1974] Crim LR 375.

⁵⁰³ See Canestra 1951 (2) SA 317 (AD) and EM Burchell and PMA Hunt, South African Criminal Law and Procedure (1970) 293–296.

Inchoate crime

11.1 Introduction

Attempts, conspiracies and assisting and encouraging under the Serious Crime Act 2007 are known collectively as ‘inchoate offences’. ‘Inchoate’ means just begun, incipient; in an initial or early stage. Criminalizing inchoate offences raises particular difficulties because the conduct involved will often be far removed from the type of harm that would be needed to give rise to a charge under the relevant substantive offence.¹ For example, where A and B agree to burgle V’s house, a conspiracy to burgle is complete even though they have never been near the house and have taken no further steps to perpetrate that crime. It does not follow that inchoate offences will never involve a tangible harm—attempted murder can be charged just as appropriately where D shoots V who survives as where D is arrested before he has taken aim to shoot.

The actus reus of inchoate offences can extend to cover a wide range of behaviour, sometimes seemingly innocuous as, for example, with ‘an agreement’ in conspiracy, or mere words of encouragement in assisting and encouraging. However, there are sound reasons of policy and principle for punishing these types of wrongdoing, a central one being that the defendant has demonstrated by his actions his willingness that a substantive offence be committed.

There is nevertheless a clear risk of over-criminalization.² Since the actus reus is so broad, it is important that inchoates are kept within reasonable limits by requiring substantial mens rea elements. In inchoate crimes it is not uncommon to find requirements of intention or knowledge that the substantive offence will be committed. But this emphasis on mens rea does not mean that inchoates can be regarded as thought-crimes; there remains a requirement that the defendant’s blameworthy state of mind manifests itself by some words or other conduct. In conspiracy, this is by agreement with others; in attempt by doing some act(s) beyond mere preparation towards the commission of the substantive crime, and in assisting and encouraging by doing acts capable of providing assistance and encouragement.

Inchoate offences always relate to a substantive offence.³ So, there is no crime of attempt per se, only crimes of, for example, attempted theft, attempted murder, etc. It should also be noted that liability for inchoate offences exists independently of accessorial liability. In the latter, the secondary party's liability derives from the commission of the full offence by the principal offender.⁴ Inchoate offences are completed before the commission of any full offence. If D agrees with P to import drugs, that is a completed conspiracy even if neither party does any more. D only becomes an accessory to the crime of importation if he aids, abets, counsels or procures P and P does actually import drugs.

¹ See generally LCCP 183, Conspiracy and Attempt (2007); and its Report, LC 318, Conspiracy and Attempts (2009).

² See D Husak, Overcriminalisation (2008) 160 et seq. See on the importance of this, LCCP 195, para 4.61.

³ For discussion of how the mens rea of the substantive offence ought to relate to the inchoate version of it, see J Child and A Hunt, ‘Mens Rea and the General Inchoate Offences: Another New Culpability Framework’ (2012) 63 NILQ 247.

Significant consequences flow from this. For example, there are defences of withdrawal for secondary parties who demonstrate a change of heart before the commission of the principal offence; inchoate liability, by contrast, is complete with the act of conspiracy or attempt or doing an act capable of assisting or encouraging, and any subsequent withdrawal goes only to mitigation in sentencing.⁵ Arguably, inchoate offences better respect the principle of fair labelling, since the description of D's conduct accurately reflects his personal behaviour; whereas in secondary liability the accessory's conduct may be fundamentally misdescribed because it is derivative on the conduct of the principal (eg where the getaway driver (accessory) in an armed robbery during which someone is intentionally killed is convicted as a 'murderer').⁶

A number of factors suggest that inchoate offences will become more commonplace in future, including, in particular, the shift from coercive to 'intelligence-led' policing where new powers and technological advances allow the police to gather evidence and intervene before substantive crimes are committed.⁷ Aside from their prevalence, the study of inchoate offences is also of increased importance because of Parliament's willingness to enact new forms of substantive offence that take the form of inchoate offences.⁸ Examples include the offence of sexual communication with a child,⁹ offences of 'inciting' another to engage in sexual activity,¹⁰ assisting or encouraging suicide,¹¹ expansive terrorist offences¹² and the wide-ranging offences under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.¹³

The government enacted a series of offences in Part 2 of the SCA 2007 to replace the common law offence of incitement. The Law Commission reviewed the offences of conspiracy and attempt relatively recently, and reference is made to the proposals throughout

⁴ See C de Than and J Elvin, 'Towards a Rational Reconstruction of the Laws on Secondary Participation and Inchoate Offences' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2012).

⁵ There have been suggestions that by analogy with counselling, such a defence should be available. For discussion see Wilson, Central Issues, 243–249.

⁶ See Ch 6, and the discussion of the Law Commission's proposals in respect of secondary liability, LCCP 131 (1993), on which see JC Smith, 'Secondary Participation in Crime—Can We Do Without It?' (1994) 144 NLJ 679. See further LC 305.

⁷ See GR Sullivan and I Dennis (eds), Seeking Security: Pre-Empting the Commission of Criminal Harms (2012).

⁸ LCCP 183, para 1.4. See recently s 45 of the Serious Crimes Act 2015 creating an offence of participating in the activities of an organized crime group.

⁹ See s 15A of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, and Ch 17, p 812. On the prevalence of this, see A Gillespie, 'Child Protection on the Internet' (2002) 14 CFLQ 411 and 'Children, Chatrooms and the Law' [2001] Crim LR 435, and B Gallagher et al, 'International and Internet Child Sexual Abuse and Exploitation—Issues Emerging from Research' (2003) 15 CFLQ 353–370.

¹⁰ Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 8, see p 803.

¹¹ See Ch 15.

¹² See eg Terrorism Act 2000, s 59; Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, s 50, discussed by C Walker, The Anti-Terrorism Legislation (3rd edn, 2014). In Rowe [2007] EWCA Crim 635, [2007] Crim LR 744, the Lord Chief Justice noted at [53] that s 57 of the 2000 Act creates an inchoate offence in relation to terrorism. Comparing it to attempt, his lordship commented that: 'Section 57, for good and obvious reason, makes criminal conduct that is merely preparatory to the commission of terrorist acts. While such conduct is highly culpable, it is not as culpable as attempting to commit, or actually committing, the terrorist acts in question. But the seriousness of the offence consists not merely in the culpability of the offender but the potential of his conduct to cause harm.' The use of statutory inchoates is considered by the Law Commission: LCCP 183, Ch 15.

¹³ See the discussion at p 1056, and references therein.

this chapter although the government has stated that it has no plans to enact any of the proposals at this time.¹⁴

11.2 Attempt

The common law of attempt¹⁵ was repealed by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 (in the rest of this part of the chapter referred to as ‘the Act’).¹⁶ Section 1(1) creates a statutory offence:

If, with intent to commit an offence to which this section applies, a person does an act which is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence, he is guilty of attempting to commit the offence.

Liability turns on D doing more than merely preparatory acts with intent to commit an offence—in this chapter referred to as the ‘substantive offence’. It is always essential to have in mind which substantive offence it is alleged D is intending to commit. Thereafter, it is a question of assessing D’s conduct and mens rea.

11.2.1 Mens rea in attempts

In contrast to the usual approach to discussing crimes, mens rea is discussed before actus reus here because, as has often been remarked,¹⁷ the mental element assumes paramount importance in attempts.¹⁸ The actus reus may be a seemingly innocent and harmless act, as where D puts sugar in V’s tea. If D intends to murder V and believes that the substance is a deadly poison when it is in fact sugar, he has committed attempted murder. The actus reus may be any act, provided it is done with intent to commit the offence and goes beyond mere preparation (see later). Although the terms of s 1 suggest that the mens rea requirement is straightforward—‘with intent’—the position is more complex, and requires discussion of a number of elements of fault. It also requires consideration of the relevant mens rea in relation to the conduct of D, the circumstances of the substantive offence and the consequence elements of any such offence.

11.2.1.1 ‘Intentional’ conduct

D must intend to perform the relevant act that goes beyond mere preparation towards the commission of the substantive offence. That is the conduct element of this offence. This can only sensibly be understood to mean a ‘purposive’ or direct intent rather than an oblique intent. If D, carrying a knife, trips and accidentally stabs V, D does not intend to wound V. He is not guilty of attempting to murder him.

11.2.1.2 Intention as to consequences

Where the substantive offence requires proof of a result or consequence, the offence of attempt will require proof of an intention as to that consequence. Wounding contrary to ¹⁴ As stated on the Law Commission website. Cf the MOJ, Report on the Implementation of Law Commission Proposals (2011).

¹⁵ See LCCP 183, Ch 13 for a review of the common law and see the 4th edition of this book, at pp 246–264. For a valuable theoretical examination of the offence, see RA Duff, Criminal Attempts (1996) see also G Yaffe, Attempts (2010) and more recently G Yaffe, ‘Criminal Attempts’ (2014) 124 Yale LJ 92.

¹⁶ See generally IH Dennis, ‘The Criminal Attempts Act 1981’ [1982] Crim LR 5. See also P Glazebrook, ‘Should We have a Law of Attempted Crime?’ (1969) 85 LQR 28; Wilson, Central Issues, Ch 8.

¹⁷ See eg Whybrow (1951) 35 Cr App R 141, CCA.

¹⁸ See Duff, Criminal Attempts, Ch 1; Yaffe, Attempts, Ch 4; LC 318, Part 8. For comparisons with Dutch and German approaches, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2013) 384 et seq.

s 20 of the OAPA 1861 requires a result—wounding. For a charge of attempted s 20, D must intend that consequence.

This is straightforward enough where the mens rea of the substantive offence requires an intention as to the consequence: the mens rea is the same on the attempt. However, many substantive offences require proof of some mental element short of intention (eg recklessness) as to consequences. On a charge of attempt, an intention and nothing less must be proved as to any result element of the actus reus of the substantive crime.¹⁹ So, for example, recklessness whether the relevant harm is caused is a sufficient mens rea for most non-fatal offences against the person, for criminal damage, and for many other offences, but it is not a sufficient mens rea on a charge of attempting to commit any of them.²⁰ So, in the example above, wounding contrary to s 20 of the OAPA requires a result—a break in the continuity of V's skin, but the mens rea is merely malice (which for these purposes is simply recklessness) as to some harm being caused. For a charge of attempted wounding, D must intend that V's skin is broken. Similarly, although an intention to cause grievous bodily harm is a sufficient mens rea for murder, that is plainly not an intention to commit murder and so is insufficient on a charge of attempted murder. Nothing less than an intention to kill will do on that charge.²¹

Purposive or oblique intention as to consequences?

As has been seen,²² intention has a variable meaning in the criminal law so the question arises, what does 'intent to commit an offence' mean in s 1(1) of the Act? It was held in *Pearman*²³ that 'intent' in s 1 has the same meaning as in the common law of attempts, applying *Mohan*²⁴ where the court held that there must be proved:

a decision to bring about, in so far as it lies within the accused's power, the commission of the offence which it is alleged the accused attempted to commit, no matter whether the accused desired that consequence of his act or not.

The concluding words are difficult to reconcile with the main proposition, which certainly seems to embody the notion of 'trying' to cause, or striving for, a result.²⁵

In Pearman, the court thought that these words:

are probably designed to deal with a case where the accused has, as a primary purpose, some other object, for example, a man who plants a bomb in an aeroplane, which he knows is going to take off, it being his primary intention that he should claim the insurance on the aeroplane when the freight

¹⁹ On one interpretation of A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1992) [1994] 2 All ER 121, [1994] Crim LR 348, CA, it may be sufficient that D has the mens rea (short of intention) sufficient for the full offence if he has completed that element in the course of his attempt. For discussion see LCCP 183, para 16.68. The final proposal in LC 318 was that the 1981 Act be amended to provide that, for the purposes of s 1(1), an intent to commit an offence includes a conditional intent to commit it: para 8.106.

²⁰ Millard and Vernon [1987] Crim LR 393, CA. Cf D Stuart, 'Mens Rea, Negligence and Attempts' [1968] Crim LR 647.

²¹ cf Whybrow, O'Toole [1987] Crim LR 759, CA. As the Court of Appeal accepted in Morrison [2003] All ER (D) 281 (May), an indictment containing a count of attempted murder includes, implicitly, an intention to cause grievous bodily harm with intent which can therefore be left as an alternative count. For comment on the need for proof in attempts of an intention as to the completed offence, see J Horder, 'Varieties of Intention, Criminal Attempts and Endangerment' (1994) 14 LS 335.

²² See Ch 3, p 90.

²³ (1984) 80 Cr App R 259, [1984] Crim LR 675, CA. For the common law position, see R Buxton, 'Inchoate Offences: Incitement and Attempt' [1973] Crim LR 656.

²⁴ [1976] QB 1, [1975] Crim LR 283, CA. See K Arenson, 'The Pitfalls in the Law of Attempt' (2005) 69 J Crim L 146; LC 318, para 8.87.

²⁵ See the discussion in Duff, Criminal Attempts and Yaffe, Attempts.

goes down into the sea. The jury would not be put off from saying that he intended to murder the crew simply by saying that he did not want or desire to kill the crew, but that was something that he inevitably intended to do.²⁶

This is the meaning given to intention in criminal law generally after the series of cases culminating in Woollin.²⁷ Intention encompasses direct (purposive) intent and a jury may find intent from D's foresight of virtually certain consequences (oblique intent). This approach was applied to the offence of attempt by the Court of Appeal in Walker.²⁸ It seems, therefore, that the requirement of intention as to consequences can be satisfied by proof of oblique intention.

On the facts of Walker, these refinements may not have been in point, since the jury had convicted on a direction that they must be satisfied that D was trying to kill. If he was trying to kill it was immaterial, as a matter of law, whether death was, or was known by D to be, virtually certain, highly probable or merely possible: a person may intend to kill even though the possibility of doing so is, and he knows it is, remote. Probability is no more than relevant evidence of the sufficient state of mind—it is easier to infer that D was trying to kill if he threw V from the window of the twentieth floor than if he threw him from the window of the ground floor. It was only if he was not trying to kill that the degree of probability assumed the character of a rule of law, and then Woollin requires foresight of virtual certainty and nothing less will do.²⁹ This issue of intention has been the subject of law reform proposals.³⁰

11.2.1.3 Intention as to circumstances forming part of actus reus?

Where the substantive offence requires proof of intention or knowledge as to a circumstance, it is clear that nothing less will suffice for the attempt. So, for example, the substantive offence of handling requires knowledge or belief as to the circumstance that the goods are stolen goods; D cannot be guilty of the offence of handling if he is merely reckless whether they are stolen. A fortiori, if D attempts to receive goods, being reckless whether they are stolen, he is not guilty of an attempt to handle stolen goods.

Where the fault element relating to circumstances forming part of the actus reus of the substantive offence is specified to include states of mind less than intention or knowledge, is it necessary always to prove intention as to that circumstance on a charge of attempt? For example, in the substantive crime of rape there is a circumstance element—that V is not consenting. The mens rea for that element of rape is that D did not reasonably believe in V's consent. For the offence of attempted rape, is it necessary to prove that D intended that V was not consenting or is it sufficient that he lacked a reasonable belief in her consent? Note that s 1 of the 1981 Act describes fault only in terms of 'intention'.

²⁶ (1984) 80 Cr App R 259, CA at 263, [1984] Crim LR 675.

²⁷ [1999] 1 AC 82, [1998] Crim LR 890, HL, p 91.

²⁸ (1989) 90 Cr App R 226, [1990] Crim LR 44, CA. In that case the court condoned the use by the judge of the phrase, 'very high degree of probability', but it is now clear that foresight of 'virtual certainty' is the minimum from which a jury may find intention.

²⁹ For discussion of the philosophical dimensions of a distinction between trying to do something and trying to succeed, see J Hornby, 'On What's Intentionally Done' in S Shute, J Gardner and J Horder, Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993) 60; J Horder (1994) 14 LS 335: those who try without an intention to succeed are equivalent to those who recklessly endanger. See also Yaffe, Attempts, Ch 2.

³⁰ The Law Commission provisionally proposed that Woollin should apply in attempts (LCCP 183), and that conditional intent would suffice: para 16.68. In LC 318 it was recommended that an intent to commit an offence includes a conditional intent to commit it: paras 8.96–8.106. Cf the earlier proposals in LC 143; R Buxton, 'The Working Party on Inchoate Offences: Incitement and Attempt' [1973] Crim LR 656, 662; Draft Code, cl 49(2) and G Williams, 'Intents in the Alternative' (1991) 50 CLJ 120.

Stating the precise nature of the relevant mens rea for attempt is far from easy. This task is made more difficult by the existence of a number of Court of Appeal authorities that have reached different conclusions.

- (1) In Pace and Rogers,³¹ the Court of Appeal favoured a strict approach: even if recklessness or some lesser mens rea as to the circumstance element suffices for the substantive offence, for the attempt it is always necessary to prove intention as to circumstances.
- (2) The Court of Appeal in *Khan*³² approached the problem by accepting that unless the substantive offence requires mens rea of intention as to circumstances, then recklessness as to circumstances will suffice for the attempt. So if the substantive offence has a mens rea requirement of, for example, belief or suspicion or negligence as to circumstances, proof of recklessness as to circumstances will suffice for a charge of attempt.
- (3) In yet another case, A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1992),³³ the Court of Appeal approached the problem by holding that the question is whether D has the mens rea of the substantive offence sufficient to make up for the missing element of the actus reus of the substantive offence.

As there are Court of Appeal decisions adopting each view, it is necessary to examine them in further detail. A decision of the Supreme Court would be welcome to clarify the present state of the law.³⁴ This problem has become particularly acute since the Court of Appeal in Pace cast doubt on the validity of the approach in Khan—an approach that did not seem to have caused problems in over two decades.

(1) Nothing less than intention as to circumstances will suffice

Both 'direct' and 'oblique' intention can properly be used to describe mens rea in relation to circumstances as well as consequences. D could be said to have a direct intention as to circumstances where the existence of the circumstance is part of the package of results he desires. The difficulties of distinguishing oblique intent from mere recklessness can be difficult. So, in Pigg,³⁵ before the Act, it was assumed without argument that a man might be guilty of attempted rape if he tried to have sex with a woman, intending to penetrate, but being reckless³⁶ whether she consented (ie the circumstance of her consent). Though the point was not spelled out in any case, it is submitted that this was right in principle.

The most recent decision of the Court of Appeal on this matter makes explicit the requirement of intention as to each element of the actus reus of the substantive offence irrespective of the overall package of desires D has. In Pace and Rogers,³⁷ DD were convicted of attempting to conceal, disguise or convert criminal property contrary to s 327 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA). The defendants ran a scrap metal business. They had been approached by undercover police officers and offered metal which the officers intimated was stolen. The metal was not in fact stolen, but belonged to Thames Valley

³¹ [2014] EWCA Crim 186. Referred to subsequently in Smith [2014] EWCA Crim 1941, which concerned an individual who was caught by the same undercover operation as the appellants in Pace and Rogers. The Crown conceded that D's conviction had to be quashed in light of the earlier judgment. This also occurred in Wheeler [2014] EWCA Crim 2706, which concerned a different undercover operation.

³² (1990) 91 Cr App R 29, [1990] Crim LR 519, CA.

³³ (1993) 98 Cr App R 383, [1994] Crim LR 348, CA.

³⁴ The Court of Appeal in Pace and Rogers did certify a question of law of general public importance. Leave was refused and there was no application made to the Supreme Court.

³⁵ (1982) 74 Cr App R 352, CA, [1982] Crim LR 446 and commentary. See also S White, 'Three Points on Pigg' [1989] Crim LR 539, 541.

³⁶ That being the mens rea for rape in 1981 when the Criminal Attempts Act was passed.

³⁷ [2014] EWCA Crim 186.

Police. If it had been stolen the scrap dealers, by agreeing to buy it, would have committed the substantive offence under s 327 of POCA provided they had the relevant mens rea as to the circumstance element of that offence (that it was criminal property). The mens rea of the substantive offence requires proof that they 'knew or suspected' the metal was stolen. Since the metal was not stolen, they were charged with attempting to commit the offence in s 327. It is important to note that, as we discuss later,³⁸ a conviction for attempt to commit an offence might be proper, although the commission of that offence was impossible (eg D may be liable for attempting to handle stolen goods even though the goods are not in fact stolen, or for attempting to murder someone when the person is already dead).³⁹

The question was what mens rea was required for the charge of attempting the POCA offence? The prosecution argued that because the mens rea for the substantive offence requires proof of suspicion, then that would also suffice for the attempt. It was argued that such an interpretation would be in keeping with the Court of Appeal's earlier decision in Khan. The court in Pace rejected this argument and held that Khan was not decisive, as it concerned an offence that based liability upon recklessness and because the court in that case was not analysing a situation in which the defendants could never have been guilty of the substantive offence.⁴⁰ In departing from Khan, Davis LJ pointed out that the court in that case had made clear that it was not purporting to set out an approach that would apply to every offence. His lordship held that the starting point when considering the requisite mens rea for an attempt must be the text of s 1(1) of the 1981 Act. In a crucial passage, Davis LJ stated that:

Turning, then, to s 1(1) we consider that, as a matter of ordinary language and in accordance with principle, an 'intent to commit an offence' connotes an intent to commit all the elements of the offence. We can see no sufficient basis, whether linguistic or purposive, for construing it otherwise.

Applying this to the facts of the case, it was held that in order for DD to be guilty the Crown had to prove an intention that the property in question be criminal property. In support of this proposition, the Court of Appeal relied upon the interpretation of the mens rea for conspiracy. To be guilty of conspiracy, as is discussed later, the House of Lords in *Saik*⁴¹ held that there must be knowledge or intention as to the circumstance elements of the substantive offence. This remains the case even though the substantive offence might require proof of a lesser form of mens rea, such as recklessness. It was held that this was an appropriate guide to the interpretation that ought to be given to the mens rea of an attempt. Given that DD had been convicted on the basis of what they suspected was the case rather than what they intended, their convictions were quashed.

The decision in Pace and Rogers has been the subject of cogent criticism. Findlay Stark⁴² makes the point that the court should have made reference to s 1(3)(b) of the 1981 Act. This provision requires the court to assume that facts DD believed to exist actually existed and in so doing provides the mens rea for impossible attempts. Therefore had it been proved that DD believed that the metal was stolen, then s 1(3)(b) mandates that the court proceed as though the property was in fact stolen. Stark makes the point that belief is a more culpable ³⁸ See p 497.

³⁹ The Criminal Attempts Act, s 1(3) requires us to treat D as if the facts were 'as he believed them to be' so the case should have been resolved on that basis without a need to engage with the controversy at all.

⁴⁰ The facts of Khan were such that had the defendants succeeded in penetrating the victim they would have been guilty of the substantive offence. In Pace, the full offence could not be committed since there was no stolen property. It was an impossible attempt case.

⁴¹ [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998. The analogy is problematic, though, given that an attempt has a more substantive actus reus than conspiracy.

⁴² F Stark, 'The Mens Rea of a Criminal Attempt' [2014] 3 Arch Rev 7.

form of mens rea than suspicion so DD would have had 'the intent to commit an offence' had they believed that the metal was stolen. Given that it was only proved that DD suspected the metal to be stolen, Stark argues that the court was correct to quash their convictions but erred in casting doubt on the continued validity of Khan. Graham Virgo argues that the Court of Appeal has 'destabilised' the offence.⁴³ Like Stark he suggests that the court ought to have relied upon s 1(3), thus acquitting DD because there was no proof of belief whilst preserving the ambit of attempt. Virgo suggests that the decision should simply be ignored as per incuriam. Although the court referred to the relevant authorities, Virgo argues that they were misunderstood. Finally, Matthew Dyson suggests that although the court's interpretation of s 1(1) is plausible, for reasons of policy it should nevertheless not be followed.⁴⁴

These criticisms are compelling.⁴⁵ It is submitted that the most significant problem with the approach adopted by the Court of Appeal in Pace and Rogers is that it may make it very difficult to secure a conviction for attempting to commit a crime in circumstances where D, despite the fact he has not committed the substantive offence, has demonstrated a high degree of culpability. Take attempted rape for example. D intends to penetrate V with his penis, but for some reason does not succeed. On the approach adopted in Pace and Rogers, D would only be guilty of attempted rape if the prosecution could prove not only that D intended to penetrate V with his penis, but also intended that V not consent to that penetration. This could be very difficult indeed, as it is more likely to have been the case that D did not care whether V consented, so was reckless as to the circumstance element of the offence. It is submitted that in a case such as this, where D has an intention to penetrate V with his penis, the fact that D was merely reckless as to whether V was consenting should not preclude him from being guilty of attempted rape. As Duff argues, D would be liable for the substantive offence if he succeeded in doing what he was trying to do with that level of mens rea as to circumstance, and it is logical therefore that he should be guilty of the attempt if he was unsuccessful in committing the substantive offence with the same mens rea.

Since the decision may well be subject to challenge, the alternative interpretations adopted by the Court of Appeal also merit consideration.

(2) A minimum of subjective recklessness as to circumstances is required for the attempt

In Khan,⁴⁶ the court, after considering conflicting opinions, held that for the purposes of the Criminal Attempts Act a man has an intention to commit rape if he intends to have sexual intercourse with a person, being reckless whether that person consents.⁴⁷ It is submitted that the approach in Khan is one that commends itself. The mens rea of the complete crime should be modified only insofar as it is necessary to accommodate the concept of attempt.

⁴³ G Virgo, 'Criminal Attempts—The Law of Unintended Circumstances' (2014) 73 CLJ 244.

⁴⁴ M Dyson, 'Scrapping Khan?' [2014] Crim LR 445.

⁴⁵ Although see, for support of the decision, J Child and A Hunt, 'Pace and Rogers and the Mens Rea of Criminal Attempt: Khan on the Scrapheap?' (2014) 78 J Crim L 220; P Mirfield, 'Intention and Criminal Attempts' [2015] Crim LR 140; A Simester, 'The Mens Rea of Criminal Attempts' (2015) 131 LQR 169.

⁴⁶ (1990) 91 Cr App R 29, [1990] Crim LR 519, CA. See further G Williams, 'The Problem of Reckless Attempts' [1983] Crim LR 365; R Buxton, 'Circumstances, Consequences and Attempted Rape' [1984] Crim LR 25; Duff (1991) 50 CLJ 100 and the response by Williams (1991) 50 CLJ 120. See LCCP 183, para 14.46; LC 318, para 8.129.

⁴⁷ This was of course before the Sexual Offences Act 2003 redefined rape. Note the error in the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 77: definitions and application of rebuttable and conclusive presumptions in ss 75 and 76 are, by s 77, applicable only in respect of the substantive offences, not inchoate versions. What then of D charged with attempted rape and rape, where the prosecution are unsure with what V was penetrated if anything, and D's plea is that V consented, whereas the complaint alleges that the penetration occurred while she was sleeping? See Ch 17.

Recklessness as to circumstances is a sufficient mens rea for the attempt unless the substantive crime requires proof of intent as to circumstances. If D, seeking to remove the satellite TV wiring from his rented accommodation sets out to damage the cable (intention as to a result), and at the time is reckless as to the ownership of the cable (a circumstance) because he is aware of the risk that it is the landlord's but is prepared to run that risk unjustifiably, he ought to be open to conviction for attempted criminal damage once he has gone beyond an act of mere preparation. The counter-argument to this—found persuasive by the court in Pace and Rogers—is that, as with all inchoate crimes, liability might arise where D has caused little if any tangible harm, and to avoid overbreadth, the law of attempts ought to require proof of a high level of culpability—in mens rea terms intention (perhaps even purposive intention) or knowledge.⁴⁸ This, however, ignores the fact that the law already compensates for the inchoate nature of the offence by always requiring proof of intention as to consequences. As Professor Sir John Smith pointed out in his seminal article,⁴⁹ the intuitive idea of an attempt means that D must have intended the consequences of his actions, but the same is not necessarily true of any circumstance elements of the substantive offence in question.⁵⁰

Support for the Khan approach also derives from the most recent Law Commission recommendations on the subject. It was recommended that for substantive offences which have a circumstance requirement but no corresponding fault requirement (ie strict liability as to circumstances), or which have a corresponding fault requirement which is objective (eg negligence), it should be possible to convict D of attempting to commit the substantive offence only if D was subjectively reckless as to the circumstance at the relevant time.⁵¹ In addition, it is recommended that where a substantive offence has fault requirements not involving mere negligence (or its equivalent)—that is, recklessness or knowledge—in relation to a fact or circumstance, it should be possible to convict D of attempting to commit the substantive offence if D possessed those fault requirements at the relevant time.⁵²

Unfortunately, the courts have complicated the picture still further, not only in Pace and Rogers, as discussed earlier, but also in A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1992).⁵³

(3) Has D done his best to supply the missing element of the substantive offence?

Khan was extended in *A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1992)*⁵⁴ where the offence charged was attempted arson being reckless whether life be endangered, contrary to s 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. DD had thrown petrol bombs at an occupied car and missed. The Court of Appeal stated a general principle:

a defendant, in order to be guilty of an attempt, must be in one of the states of mind required for the commission of the full offence, and did [sic] his best, so far as he could, to supply what was missing from the completion of the offence. It is the policy of the law that such people should be punished notwithstanding that in fact the intentions of such a defendant have not been fulfilled.⁵⁵

⁴⁸ See GR Sullivan, 'Intent, Subjective Recklessness and Culpability' (1992) 12 OJLS 381, 385 (relying on a concept of 'knowledge in the second degree') cf RA Duff, 'The Circumstances of an Attempt' (1991) 50 CLJ 100 at 100–101.

⁴⁹ JC Smith, 'Two Problems in Criminal Attempts' (1957) 70 Harv LR 422.

⁵⁰ It is submitted that the validity of this argument is not undermined when the circumstance element is at the core of the offence, such as lack of consent in rape. It could be argued however, that there ought to be a higher mens rea element attached to that element of the offence which is at its core.

⁵¹ LC 318, para 8.133. ⁵² ibid, para 8.137. ⁵³ (1993) 98 Cr App R 383, [1994] Crim LR 348, CA.

⁵⁴ ibid. For cogent criticism, see DW Elliott, 'Endangering Life by Destroying or Damaging Property' [1997] Crim LR 382, 393.

⁵⁵ See further on this approach J Stannard, 'Making Up for the Missing Element: A Sideways Look at Attempts' (1987) 7 LS 194.

Several comments must be made about this approach.⁵⁶ First, the decision goes beyond Khan by allowing a conviction for attempt where D's mens rea comprises only recklessness as to the existing consequences if there is an intention as to the missing circumstances. The full offence under s 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 requires proof of a consequence: that property is damaged. There has never been a requirement in s 1(2) of an actual endangerment of any life. The required circumstance is that the property belonged to someone (not necessarily another). In addition, there was at the time of the decision a requirement that an ordinary prudent observer would have realized that life might be endangered by the damage.⁵⁷ Since the court in the A-G's Reference concluded that it was sufficient if D was (Caldwell) reckless as to that element of life endangerment, it would seem that recklessness as to consequences (where that is sufficient mens rea for the full offence) may also suffice for the mens rea of an attempt. This is, it is submitted, contrary to the clear wording of the Act which requires an intention as to consequences.

Secondly, the statement is overbroad.⁵⁸ Read literally, this approach would lead to the conviction for attempt of D who is merely reckless as to a consequence element of the offence provided he had an intention as to the relevant missing circumstance element(s). This is clearly not what the Act was intended to mean. Consider D who is reckless as to whether his slapdash DIY will damage the TV cabling he is just about to try to remove (reckless as to consequence), but who intends/knows that it is property belonging to his landlord (intention as to circumstance). On any reading of s 1 he ought not to be guilty of attempt.

Thirdly, even if the case does not extend the law as regards the mens rea for consequences in attempt, it produces problems for the mens rea as to circumstances. On a broad interpretation, the case would introduce strict liability into the law of attempts. For example, if D tries to touch sexually a girl, V, whom he believes on reasonable grounds to be aged 16 but who is in fact only 12, he would on this approach be guilty of an attempt to commit the offence under s 7 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. He has the state of mind required for the commission of the full offence (an intention to touch a person, who is in fact, whether he knows it or not, under the age of 13); and he has done his best 'to supply [in the quaint language of the court] what was missing from the commission of the full offence'—sexual touching. There is a logical argument in favour of such an extension of inchoate liability;⁵⁹ but it goes beyond anything actually decided and beyond any recommendation of the Draft Code Team. It seems unlikely that the court in the A-G's Reference appreciated the point and the dictum should be regarded with caution.

Finally, at the time of the decision it was settled that Caldwell recklessness was sufficient for the full offence under the Criminal Damage Act and the court held that this was also the ⁵⁶ See RA Duff, 'Recklessness in Attempts (Again)' (1995) 15 OJLS 309 for an approach which seeks to explain the decision without distinctions between consequences and circumstances, focusing instead on the question whether D would have necessarily committed the full offence if he had carried out the actions. Mirfield argues that the decision no more accords with the language of s 1(1) than Khan but that the Supreme Court could find that it nevertheless has 'the valuable quality of being capable of practical application, obviating the need for strained judicial directions and jury headaches'. See P Mirfield, 'Intention and Criminal Attempts' [2015] Crim LR 140, 146.

⁵⁷ The latter requirement flowed from the application of the objective test in Caldwell as in Sangha (1988) 87 Cr App R 88, [1988] Crim LR 371, CA. It is worth noting that since Caldwell has been overruled by G, it is arguable that the requirement relating to the perception of endangerment of life is not purely one of D's mens rea—that D intends or is subjectively reckless as to that danger—because recklessness requires also that the risk taking is unjustified, which implicitly requires that the risk is objectively present.

⁵⁸ See also for criticism: LCCP 183, paras 14.42 et seq.

⁵⁹ See JC Smith, 'Two Problems in Criminal Attempts' (1957) 70 Harv LR 422 at 433 and 'Two Problems in Criminal Attempts Re-Examined' [1962] Crim LR 135. See for further discussion RA Duff (1995) 15 OJLS 309, defending the more radical view.

correct test on the attempt charge. Subjective recklessness (Cunningham/G recklessness) has long been thought to be an acceptable mens rea as to circumstances in attempt because it is a true state of mind. However, a person may be Caldwell reckless even if the possibility of the relevant risk (a bystander's perception of a danger to life) never enters his head. To hold that such an objective fault element is sufficient for attempt is, arguably, an unacceptable extension of liability for an inchoate offence.⁶⁰ The point does not appear to have been considered explicitly by the court. Given the overruling of Caldwell in G,⁶¹ the issue assumes less significance in relation to criminal damage, but if it is interpreted more broadly so that recklessness, negligence or even strict liability as to a circumstance will suffice, it remains of fundamental importance.

11.2.1.4 Conditional intention

The fact that D's intention is conditional upon some event or circumstance arising is no bar to conviction. D who picks up V's bag intending to steal anything worth keeping is guilty of theft. Great practical difficulty and much academic debate was caused by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hussey.⁶² The defendants opened the door of a van in which there was a holdall containing valuable sub-aqua equipment. They were charged with attempted theft of the equipment. The judge directed the jury that they could convict if the defendants were about to look into the holdall and, if in the defendants' opinion its contents were valuable, to steal them. The Court of Appeal held that this was a misdirection: 'it cannot be said that one who has it in mind to steal only if what he finds is worth stealing has a present intention to steal'. This caused particular difficulties in the law of burglary because most persons charged with that crime intend to steal not some specific thing, but anything they find which they think is worth stealing.⁶³ The Court of Appeal⁶⁴ got over this difficulty by holding that Hussey applied only where, as in that case, the indictment named the specific thing which the defendant was alleged to have attempted to steal (the sub-aqua equipment). The Court of Appeal held that there would be no problem in convicting of an attempt if the indictment had charged an attempt to steal 'some or all of the contents' of the holdall—or car, handbag or house, as the case may be. This purely procedural device was rightly criticized. In Hussey, for example, the only thing in the holdall was the sub-aqua equipment. If the defendant was guilty of attempting to steal 'some or all of the contents' he was obviously guilty of attempting to steal the sub-aqua equipment—there were no other contents—but if the indictment charged him with that he had to be acquitted!

Conditional intent under the 1981 Act

The Act does not expressly do anything about this absurd and unworthy distinction, and it remains part of the law.⁶⁵ The Act has, however, solved the problem because it is possible

⁶⁰ What of the person who does not give a thought to the relevant circumstance? He should be held sufficiently reckless if he was indifferent. Cf commentary on Mousir [1987] Crim LR 561, CA at 562.

⁶¹ [2004] 1 AC 1034, [2004] Crim LR 369, HL.

⁶² (1978) 67 Cr App R 131n, [1978] Crim LR 219, CA and commentary; AR White, Misleading Cases (1991) 63. See also G Williams, 'The Three Rogues Charter' [1980] Crim LR 263. Described in LCCP 183 as 'wrong': para 16.74. See also LC 318, paras 8.96 et seq. For extensive discussion of conditional intention, see J Child, 'Understanding Ulterior Mens Rea: Future Conduct Intention is Conditional Intention' (2017) 76 CLJ 311.

⁶³ Similarly, a person may be guilty of attempted burglary with intent to commit GBH if he attempts to enter, hoping to find someone inside whom he would wish to beat up. It is immaterial that there is no one in the house: Toothill [1998] Crim LR 876, CA; LC 318, para 8.129.

⁶⁴ A-G's References (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979) [1980] QB 180, [1979] Crim LR 585, CA; see also Walkington [1979] 2 All ER 716, [1979] Crim LR 526, CA, and commentary. For discussion, see LCCP 183, para 5.11.

⁶⁵ Smith and Smith [1986] Crim LR 166, CA.

in such a case to charge D with attempting to steal something in the holdall even if it was empty. It is no bar to conviction under the Act if it is impossible for D to commit the substantive offence (because the holdall is empty). This reverses the common law position in Haughton v Smith.⁶⁶ In Hussey, the jury must have found that D intended to steal anything in the holdall that he found to be of value. If he would have taken the sub-aqua equipment had he found it, he had certainly done an act that was more than merely preparatory to stealing it and he ought to be found guilty of attempting to do so. It might not, however, be possible for the jury to be satisfied that he would have taken that item. If he would not have taken it, it follows that he was looking for other things—we know not what and perhaps he did not know either—which were not there. He was attempting to steal all right, but his attempt was doomed to failure. This no longer matters since the Act reversed Haughton v Smith. He was no different in this respect from the person who attempts to steal from an empty pocket.

A practical difficulty remains in how to form the indictment. The formula approved by the Court of Appeal, 'some or all of the contents', is unsatisfactory because the jury may not be satisfied that D intended to steal any of the actual contents and may indeed be satisfied that he did not intend to steal any of them. The indictment would be accurate, however, if it simply stated, 'attempted to steal from a holdall'. This represents the truth, whether there is anything there that he would have stolen or not. The failure to specify any subject matter is not an objection because there is in fact no subject matter to be specified. D must be dealt with on the basis that he intended to take anything he thought worth taking, whatever it might be. The problem is exactly the same in the empty pocket case.

In Hussey, the court followed *Easom*⁶⁷ where D picked up a woman's handbag in a theatre, rummaged through the contents and put it back having taken nothing. The handbag was attached by a thread to a policewoman's wrist. D's conviction for stealing the handbag and the specified contents—tissues, cosmetics, etc—was quashed because there was no intention permanently to deprive the owner of these. Consequently, the court held, he was not guilty of attempting to steal the handbag or contents. Whether he was rightly acquitted of theft is debated⁶⁸ but, assuming he was, he was also innocent of attempting to steal the specific contents, but he was clearly guilty of an attempt to steal what was not there. Plainly, he was looking for money and therefore the handbag was, in effect, empty. The court posed a much-discussed example: 'If a dishonest postal sorter picks up a pile of letters intending to steal any which are registered, but, on finding that none of them are, replaces them, he has stolen nothing.' This is true; but he was then (before Haughton v Smith) and is now, guilty of attempting to steal registered letters.

Academic writing has produced a diverse range of classifications and terminology of conditional intentions but three broad categories are accepted: (a) 'non-comprehensive conditional intentions'—D intends to do 'x' if 'y';⁶⁹ (b) 'comprehensive conditional intentions'—D intends 'x' only if 'y'—D has a declared intentions as to his course of conduct in both eventualities: where y materializes and not; (c) unconditional intentions—D intends 'x' even if 'y'.⁷⁰ These have not been explicitly examined by the courts.

The Law Commission recommended that the 1981 Act be amended to provide that, for the purposes of s 1(1), an intent to commit an offence includes a conditional intent to commit it.⁷¹

⁶⁶ [1975] AC 476, [1974] Crim LR 305, HL, p 496. Though there was an understandable inclination on the part of the Court of Appeal to carry on as if that case did not exist. See Bayley and Easterbrook [1980] Crim LR 503, CA and commentary.

⁶⁷ [1971] 2 QB 315, CA. ⁶⁸ See Williams, TBCL, 651–653 and [1979] Crim LR 530; p 892.

⁶⁹ K Campbell, 'Conditional Intention' (1982) 2 LS 77 at 84–85.

⁷⁰ cf the view in LCCP 183, Part 5, see p 448.

⁷¹ LC 318, para 8.106.

The concept of conditional intent has gained prominence since the combined judgment of the Supreme Court/Privy Council in Jogee; Ruddock. This is discussed separately in Ch 6.

11.2.2 Actus reus in attempt

Although the mens rea of the offence is of primary importance, the actus reus of attempts remains significant.⁷² It ensures that the offence does not extend to criminalizing thoughts, but rather applies only when D has exhibited some physical willingness to bring his criminal intentions to fruition. This, of course, begs the question how much of a physical manifestation of that intention it is necessary for D to perform in order for his conduct to be regarded as an attempt to commit the crime.⁷³ The present law requires that D has done an act that is more than merely preparatory to the commission of the substantive offence.

The sufficiency of an act to prove attempt is an extremely controversial issue on many levels. First, on a practical level, the more broadly the law extends the scope of attempt liability to include even the slightest conduct towards the commission of an offence, the greater the protection that can be afforded and the earlier the police can intervene. The cost of that approach is in potentially overbroad criminalization and oppressive and intrusive policing.⁷⁴

Secondly, at a theoretical level, there is a division between the 'subjectivist' and 'objectivist' schools of thought. In short, it has been said that 'subjectivists require the relevant acts to manifest an intention to commit the substantive offence whereas objectivists require the relevant acts to manifest the actual attempt'.⁷⁵

Thirdly, there is an even broader related question which is why the criminal law places as much emphasis as it does on the consequences of the criminal actor's conduct. Why should the outcome of the defendant's intentional conduct make so much difference to his criminal liability? In the context of attempt, this raises the specific questions whether and why D ought to be treated differently in terms of liability and punishment when he embarks on carrying out his criminal intentions, but the proscribed harm does not occur.⁷⁶

11.2.2.1 Common law

Before the 1981 Act, there was a sufficient actus reus for an attempt if D's steps towards the commission of the offence were properly described as 'an attempt', in ordinary meaning. This did not maximize legal certainty nor clarity. Many steps may be taken towards the commission of a crime that could not properly be described in this fashion. D, intending to commit murder, buys a gun and performs target practice, studies the habits of V, ⁷² See Duff, Criminal Attempts, Ch 2; Yaffe, Attempts, Ch 10; D Stuart, 'The Actus Reus in Attempts' [1970] Crim LR 505; W Wilson, 'Participating in Crime: Some Thoughts on the Retribution/Prevention Dichotomy' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013). For comparisons with Dutch and German approaches see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2013) 359 et seq.

⁷³ It has been argued that the case law suggests that there can only be an attempt when there has been a 'confrontation' with the victim (CMV Clarkson, 'Attempt: The Conduct Requirement' (2009) 29 OJLS 25) but this is ultimately too simplistic an approach.

⁷⁴ For a discussion of an even broader approach in which attempt liability is founded not on D's physical manifestation to commit crime but his disposition to do so, see PH Robinson, 'The Modern General Part: Three Illusions' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 92–93.

⁷⁵ Wilson, Central Issues, 237. See also Yaffe, Attempts, Ch 1.

⁷⁶ See generally Duff, Criminal Attempts, Ch 12, Yaffe, Attempts, Ch 10; JC Smith, 'The Element of Chance in the Criminal Law' [1963] Crim LR 63; and in particular the writings of Professor Ashworth: 'Belief, Intent and Criminal Liability' in J Eekelaar and J Bell (eds), Oxford Essays in Jurisprudence (1987) and 'Criminal Attempts and the Role of Resulting Harm under the Code and under the Common Law' (1988) 19 Rutgers LR 725.

reconnoitres a suitable place to lie in ambush, puts on a disguise and sets out to take up his position. All are acts of preparation but could scarcely be described as attempted murder. D takes up his position, loads the gun, sees V approaching, raises the gun, takes aim, puts his finger on the trigger and squeezes it, but the bullet, caught by a sudden gust of wind, misses V. D has now certainly committed attempted murder; but he might have desisted or been interrupted at any of the stages described. At what point had D gone far enough to be guilty of an attempt? At common law it was a matter of fact: was D's act sufficiently proximate to the substantive crime to be properly described as an attempt to commit it?

More detailed formulations of the principle proved unsuccessful, being capricious in their operation or simply unhelpful.⁷⁷ This is not surprising when it is recalled that the principle has to apply to all crimes and that crimes are very diverse in their nature. The only well-settled rule at common law was that if D had done the 'last act' that, as he knew, was necessary to achieve the consequence alleged to be attempted, he was guilty of the attempt.⁷⁸ The converse, however, did not apply. An act might be sufficiently proximate although it was not necessarily the last act to be done. For example, in White,⁷⁹ D was held guilty of attempted murder by the attempted administration of a dose of poison, though he may well have contemplated further doses, and further doses may have been necessary, to kill.

11.2.2.2 Common law and 1981 Act compared

The Law Commission, when proposing the 1981 Act, found that there is no 'magic formula' to define precisely what constitutes an attempt. The proximity test (ie whether D's act is 'proximate' to the offence) was the only one broadly acceptable although it was imprecise. That imprecision was not without advantages since it allowed the issue to be left to juries. The purpose of the proximity test was to prevent too great an extension of criminal liability, by excluding acts of mere preparation. The test stated in s 1(1) of the Act is, in substance, that proposed by the Law Commission in formulating the provisions which led to the Act.⁸⁰ The Commission thought it 'undesirable to recommend anything more complex than a rationalization of the present law'. But a definition expressly in terms of proximity was rejected. There was concern with any formula which suggested that only the 'last act' could be an attempt.⁸¹

The formula in the 1981 Act, it was decided, should direct attention not to when the commission of the offence begins, but to when mere preparation ends. The resulting 'preparatory act' test is more suitable in one respect. The test of 'proximity' suggested that the attempter had to come 'pretty near'⁸² to success; yet, where the attempt is to do the impossible (as where D attempts to murder using sugar that he believes to be poison), success is an infinity away. In contrast, there is no such conceptual difficulty about preparatory acts to do the impossible—by one who does not know it is impossible, of course!

It seems that no substantial change in the law was intended by the introduction of the test of 'going beyond mere preparation'. If any change has been made, it is to extend the scope of ⁷⁷ The most interesting effort was called the 'equivocality theory' discussed in the 4th edition of this book, at pp 253–255. It is probably now of only historical interest, so far as English law is concerned.

⁷⁸ Even this, not very ambitious, rule was doubted by Lord Edmund-Davies in Stonehouse [1978] AC 55 at 86 but his lordship's doubts seem to relate to the last act of a secondary party which, admittedly, does not necessarily constitute an attempt. See [1977] Crim LR 547–549.

⁷⁹ [1910] 2 KB 124, CCA; see also Linnaker [1906] 2 KB 99, CCR.

⁸⁰ See LC 102, paras 2.45–2.52. Criticized by G Williams, 'Wrong Turnings on the Law of Attempt' [1991] Crim LR 416.

⁸¹ In particular, a test based on whether D had taken 'substantial steps'. Cf the American Model Penal Code, § 5.01(1)(c).

⁸² Commonwealth v Kennedy, 170 Mass 18 (1897) (OW Holmes J).

attempts because, if there is any ‘middle ground’ between mere preparation and a proximate act, an act in the middle ground now constitutes an attempt whereas formerly it did not do so.⁸³ It might be suggested, for example, that the assassin in the previous example was not proximate when he merely left home to the site of the intended assassination, but that conduct might now be regarded as being beyond mere preparation. However, it seems more likely that preparation and commission overlap than that there is any gap between them.⁸⁴

11.2.2.3 Interpreting ‘beyond mere preparation’

Every step towards the commission of an offence, except the last one, could properly be described as ‘preparatory’ to the commission of the offence.⁸⁵ When the assassin crooks his finger around the trigger that is an act preparatory to pulling it. If the section were to be interpreted in that narrow fashion, only the last act would amount to an attempt—a result which the Act was designed to avoid. The Act has not been read in that manner. An act can be more than merely preparatory and therefore sufficient to constitute an attempt without being the last act before the substantive offence is complete. D may be guilty of attempted murder where he has not yet fired the gun and D can be guilty of attempted rape though he has not physically attempted penile penetration.

The key word in interpreting the 1981 Act is ‘merely’.⁸⁶ Not all preparatory acts are excluded, only those that are ‘merely preparatory’. When does an act cease to be merely preparatory? The answer, it seems, must be when D is engaged in the commission of the offence which he is attempting—as Rowlatt J put it many years ago, when D is ‘on the job’.⁸⁷ Whether he is engaged in the commission of the offence, seems to be, as it was before the Act, the ultimate question. The question whether D is in the ‘executory stage’ of committing the offence is another way of describing this.⁸⁸

The first step for the court should be to determine precisely the nature of the substantive crime alleged to be attempted. That confirms the end stop and the court can then assess how preparatory D’s acts are to that. In Nash,⁸⁹ D, who had left notes for paper boys inviting them to meet him and perform indecent acts with him, was held to be guilty of attempting to procure acts of gross indecency.⁹⁰ What the court overlooked was that an act

⁸³ See the discussion of reform throughout this chapter.

⁸⁴ The Law Commission suggested that the law must allow the flexibility judges need: LCCP 183, para 16.3.

⁸⁵ It could be argued that the statute provides so little guidance as to what kind of conduct will constitute a criminal attempt that it infringes the rule of law and/or Art 7 of the ECHR. This criticism is rejected by Horder: J Horder, ‘Criminal Attempt, the Rule of Law, and Accountability in Criminal Law’ in L Zedner and JV Roberts (eds), Principles and Values in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2012).

⁸⁶ E Griew, Current Law Statutes (1981) says that, ‘If “merely” adds anything at all, it is only emphasis’; but elsewhere in his note he recognizes that all acts but the last are in one sense preparatory and that the phrase, ‘merely preparatory’, indicates that ‘there may, in any criminal transaction, be a point before which it is appropriate to describe the actor as not yet engaged in the commission of the offence but as only preparing to commit it’ (emphasis added). ‘Only’ equals ‘merely’. Griew seems to agree that not all preparatory acts are excluded, but only those that are ‘only’ or ‘merely’ preparatory. There is judicial support for the view that the word merely really matters. In Tosti [1997] Crim LR 746, CA, the court held that D’s acts were ‘preparatory, but not merely so’.

⁸⁷ Osborn (1919) 84 JP 63 (Central Criminal Court). Toulson LJ stated in Moore v DPP [2010] EWHC 1822 (Admin) that he found this phrase unhelpful, as it did not assist in determining when ‘the job’ begins. If it meant that D must have commenced the actus reus of the full offence, then his lordship doubted if it was accurate.

⁸⁸ LCCP 183, para 14.5.

⁸⁹ [1999] Crim LR 308, CA and commentary. Cf Toothill, n 63 where the act which had to be attempted was the entry, not the intended rape. See now the offence of committing an offence with intent to commit a sex offence under the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 62.

⁹⁰ Under the Sexual Offences Act 1956, s 13 now repealed (see the offences of inciting a child under 13 to engage in sexual activity, p 803).

is not 'procured' until it is committed; so the charge was, in substance, one of attempting to commit an act of gross indecency.⁹¹ D's conduct in leaving notes fell far short of that. The nature of the crime is also important since it has been recognized that where the substantive offence turns on the commission of a single act (eg killing or wounding) early acts are less likely to be regarded as beyond 'mere preparation' than where the crime in question is one continuing over time (eg fraud), where the 'moment of embarkation' may arise far earlier. This depends, of course, on the method by which the killing or the fraud is to be achieved.⁹² Particular care is needed if the charge is one of an attempt to commit an offence which has, in its substantive form, an inchoate nature.⁹³

Having identified the nature of the substantive crime and the nature of the conduct alleged to constitute acts beyond mere preparation, the court must determine whether the acts are indeed 'more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence'. This is a question of fact. In a jury trial, it is of course for the judge to decide whether there is evidence sufficient in law to support such a finding and it is then for the jury to decide (a) what acts D did, and (b) whether they were more than merely preparatory.⁹⁴ If the judge decides there is not sufficient evidence, he directs a verdict of not guilty. Where he decides there is sufficient evidence, he must leave both questions of fact to the jury, even where the only possible answer in law is that D is guilty.⁹⁵ Where, for example, the evidence is that D has done the 'last act', the judge may not tell the jury that, if they find that D did that act, that is an attempt even though in law this is so. The judge may express a strong opinion, but he must not appear to take the question of fact out of the hands of the jury.⁹⁶

The decision of the judge is not always easy. For example, in *K*⁹⁷ the defendant was convicted of attempting to cause a child to watch a sexual act. K spoke to some children playing near his office and asked children including a six-year-old if they wanted to look at pornography on K's laptop. There was no direct evidence that the laptop was in fact in K's nearby office. The judge explained to the jury that they had to be sure: that an invitation had been issued to the children, that the laptop had been in the office and that it had been used to show pornography. If they were sure of those facts then D's acts were more than merely preparatory. The Court of Appeal quashed the conviction. There was insufficient evidence in law to go before the jury and the directions given were inadequate. The mere invitation to the children and the presence of a laptop did not in law amount to an attempt to cause a child to watch sexual acts. There were acts that were merely preparatory and the judge

⁹¹ See PR Glazebrook, 'Attempting to Procure' [1959] Crim LR 774, commenting on Miskell (1954) 37 Cr App R 214. See LCCP 183—proposed offence of criminal preparation not adopted in LC 318. See for critical comment and discussion of the merits of such an approach, J Rogers, 'The Codification of Attempts and the Case for Preparation' [2008] Crim LR 937.

⁹² Qadir [1997] 9 Arch News 1, CA.

⁹³ See Shergill [2003] CLY 871 (Wolverhampton Crown Court) where the court rejected an indictment alleging an attempt to be knowingly concerned in the making of arrangements for facilitating entry of illegal entrants in to the UK (contrary to the Immigration Act 1971, s 25).

⁹⁴ See s 4(3) of the Act, which, in substance, codifies the common law as to the functions of judge and jury: Stonehouse [1978] AC 55, [1977] Crim LR 544, HL. For a more recent affirmation of the correctness of this approach, see Dyer [2011] EWCA Crim 900. On the difficulty in application for jurors, see JA Andrews, 'Uses and Misuses of the Jury' in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 55–56.

⁹⁵ Wang [2005] UKHL 9, [2005] Crim LR 645.

⁹⁶ Griffin [1993] Crim LR 515, CA. If the judge does and the jury convict, the Court of Appeal used to have an easy route to upholding the conviction under the proviso to the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, s 2. Since the Criminal Appeal Act 1995, there is no proviso, and the court would have to quash the conviction if it was regarded as unsafe. LCCP 183 provisionally proposed removing this problem by leaving the judge to decide the issue of whether there has been an attempt: para 16.89. The proposal was dropped in LC 318.

⁹⁷ [2009] EWCA Crim 1931. The full offence is only committed if the child does watch—cf Nash, n 89.

should not have allowed the matter to go before the jury.⁹⁸ Contrast this with *R*⁹⁹ in which it was held that D's text message to a prostitute asking if she knew of any 12-year-olds available for sex was capable of constituting an attempt to arrange a sexual offence with a child (Sexual Offences Act, s 14).

It has been argued¹⁰⁰ that the judge and jury, in performing their respective functions, are not entitled to have regard to the word 'attempt'. The question to be determined is, in the words of s 4(3), simply whether D 'did an act falling within subsection (1) of [s 1]'; and that subsection does not use the word 'attempt'. While there is great force in this argument, it is submitted that it should not prevail. As observed earlier, all acts but the last one are preparatory. How then are we to determine whether an act is more than merely preparatory? To be more than merely preparatory, it must also be something else. What? Some other concept not mentioned in the section must be invoked to give it a sensible meaning. The answer seems to be that the act must be part of the commission of the intended offence, an act that is done by D 'on the job', that it is, in a word, an 'attempt'. The following section will examine the various judicial interpretations that have been given to the concept of an attempt over the years.

Judicial interpretations of the concept of attempt

A number of tests have been proposed at one time or another:

- whether D's act is the last act necessary; that is, for there to be a completed attempt, not the completed crime. It would be enough for attempted murder that D was about to pull the trigger; there is no need for the victim to have died, which is the last act of murder;
- whether D's act is proximate to the commission of the full offence;
- whether D's act was one of a series which would lead to the crime if uninterrupted;
- whether D's act was immediately connected with the substantive offence.

The narrowest interpretation¹⁰¹ was that of Lord Diplock in *Stonehouse*¹⁰² where, having cited the opinion in *Eagleton*¹⁰³ that only acts 'immediately connected' with the offence can be attempts, he continued: 'In other words the offender must have crossed the Rubicon and burnt his boats.' The 'Rubicon test' was initially accepted as representing the law under the 1981 Act¹⁰⁴ but was rejected in Gullefer.¹⁰⁵ In Gullefer, D, seeing that the dog he had backed in a greyhound race was losing, jumped onto the track to stop the race. He hoped that the stewards would declare 'no race' whereupon punters would be entitled to have their money back and he would recover his £18 stake. His conviction for attempting to steal the £18 was quashed. His act was held to be merely preparatory. It remained for him to go to the book-maker and demand his money.

⁹⁸ The substantive offence involved is that contrary to s 12 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, D intentionally causes a child to watch a third person engaging in an activity, or to look at an image of any person engaging in an activity), p 808.

⁹⁹ [2008] EWCA Crim 619. The full offence requires that there is an 'arrangement' not that a sex act occurs.

¹⁰⁰ Griew, Current Law Statutes.

¹⁰¹ On which see Duff, Criminal Attempts, 390.

¹⁰² [1978] AC 55 at 68, [1977] Crim LR 544, HL. LCCP 183 suggests that Lord Diplock actually endorsed the proximity test despite his Rubicon comments.

¹⁰³ (1855) Dears CC 376, CCR at 515.

¹⁰⁴ Widdowson (1985) 82 Cr App R 314 at 318–319, [1986] Crim LR 233, CA.

¹⁰⁵ [1990] 3 All ER 882, 91 Cr App R 356n, [1987] Crim LR 195, CA. Cf Boyle (1986) 84 Cr App R 270, [1987] Crim LR 111, CA. Cf Stevens v R [1985] LRC (Crim) 17 (St Helena CA) discussed by L Blake (1986) 50 J Crim L 247.

In Jones,¹⁰⁶ applying Gullefer, the court upheld D's conviction of attempted murder where he got into V's car and pointed a loaded sawn-off shotgun at him, despite an argument by D that he had at least three acts to do: remove the safety catch, put his finger on the trigger and pull it. When he pointed the gun, there was evidence to leave to the jury. In the same vein is Litholetovs,¹⁰⁷ where D had done a sufficient act to be guilty of attempted arson by pouring petrol on V's door. It was unnecessary to prove that D had gone further by producing and operating the cigarette lighter he was carrying.

In Gullefer, Lord Lane CJ also referred to an alternative 'test' formulated by Stephen:¹⁰⁸ 'An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime and forming part of a series of acts which would constitute its actual commission, if it were not interrupted.' His lordship recognized the unhelpful nature of this test. It does not define where the 'series of acts' begins. Moreover, many acts that are obviously merely preparatory could be said to be part of such a series.¹⁰⁹ Lord Lane CJ said the 1981 Act requires a 'midway course' and that the attempt begins 'when the defendant embarks on the crime proper'. This seems the same as Rowlatt J's 'on the job' test.

The courts have failed to apply Gullefer consistently, adopting overly strict interpretations in some cases, with unsatisfactory results. This is demonstrated most vividly in *Campbell*¹¹⁰ where D was arrested by police when, armed with an imitation gun, he approached within a yard of the door of a post office with intent to commit a robbery therein. His conviction for attempted robbery was quashed: the court held there was no evidence on which a jury could 'properly and safely' find that his acts were more than merely preparatory. From the viewpoint of public safety, it is an unhappy decision. Though the police may lawfully arrest a person doing such preparatory acts because he is, or they have reasonable grounds for suspecting that he is, about to commit an offence,¹¹¹ they may feel obliged to wait until he has entered the post office and approached the counter before arresting him. The extra danger to post office staff, the public and the officers themselves is obvious.¹¹²

*Geddes*¹¹³ is similarly unsatisfactory. D was found in the boys' toilet of a school, equipped in such a way as to suggest strongly that his purpose was kidnapping. His conviction for attempted false imprisonment was quashed. Even clear evidence of what D had in mind 'did not throw light on whether he had begun to carry out the commission of the offence'. Lord Bingham CJ distinguished between evidence that D was 'trying to commit the offence ... [and ¹⁰⁶ (1990) 91 Cr App R 351. ¹⁰⁷ [2002] EWCA Crim 1154.

¹⁰⁸ Digest of Criminal Law (5th edn, 1894) art 50.

¹⁰⁹ LCCP 183 considers this in examining the appropriate definition for the new offence of criminal attempt which is narrower than that at present.

¹¹⁰ (1991) 93 Cr App R 350, [1991] Crim LR 268, CA. But cf Kelly [1992] Crim LR 181, CA.

¹¹¹ PACE, s 24(1), p 722.

¹¹² Campbell was convicted of the offence of carrying an imitation firearm and in similar cases it may be possible to convict of 'going equipped'; but the police may not know whether the suspect is armed or equipped and, whether they know or not, they will naturally wish to obtain a conviction for the more serious offence which they believe he intends to commit. For a philosophical discussion of the problem, see A Simester, 'Prophylactic Crimes' in GR Sullivan and I Dennis (eds), Seeking Security: Pre-Emptying the Commission of Criminal Harms (2012), 72.

¹¹³ [1996] Crim LR 894, CA, per Bingham LCJ. The offence would now be one of trespass with intent to commit a sex offence contrary to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 63. For a discussion of whether the creation of substantive offences such as this one is justified, see W Wilson, 'Participating in Crime: Some Thoughts on the Retribution/Prevention Dichotomy' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013). This case is not easy to reconcile with Tosti [1997] Crim LR 746, CA, where DD were examining a door to decide how best to break in, it was held to fall on the other side of the line and to be sufficient evidence of attempted burglary. Clarkson argues that in the latter case, DD had confronted the 'victim' of the offence, ie the door, and that this explains the different outcomes, see CMV Clarkson, 'Attempt: The Conduct Requirement' (2009) 29 OJLS 25.

that] he had only got himself ready to put himself in a position or equipped himself to do so'. Campbell and Geddes served as a significant catalyst for the Law Commission's recommendations for reform.¹¹⁴ The narrow approach in Geddes was echoed in the decision in *K*¹¹⁵ discussed earlier relating to the pornography on the laptop. A similar approach was taken in *Mason v DPP*¹¹⁶ holding that the act of opening a car door could not be characterized as more than merely preparatory to the act of driving the vehicle and, accordingly, D could not properly be convicted of an attempted drink-driving offence. In the Divisional Court, quashing the conviction, Nicol J said:¹¹⁷

In this case, the substantive offence, or the 'full offence', as it is referred to in the 1981 Act, is driving. In my view the appellant could not be said to have embarked on the 'crime proper' . . . until he did something which was part of the actual process of putting the car in motion. Turning on the engine would have been such a step, but starting to open the door of the car in my view was not capable of being so.¹¹⁸

It was thought that some pre-Act cases which were considered by judicial and academic critics to take too restrictive a view of attempts might be decided differently under the Act. Given the approach in Geddes, K and Mason this seems unlikely. One further example is Robinson.¹¹⁹ D, a jeweller, having insured his stock against theft, concealed some of it on his premises, tied himself up with string and called for help. He told a policeman who came to his assistance that he had been knocked down and his safe robbed. The policeman was not satisfied with the story and discovered the property concealed on the premises. D confessed that he had hoped to get money from the insurers. His conviction for attempting to obtain by false pretences was quashed. If this case still represents the law, a judge, on these facts, should direct a jury to acquit of the attempt to commit that offence.¹²⁰ Notwithstanding the criticisms of the result, it is by no means clear that this conduct ought to be regarded as more than merely preparatory. The stage had been set; but the business of obtaining money from the insurance company was yet to begin. D was undoubtedly preparing to commit what ¹¹⁴ Is it an overreaction to just a couple of bad cases in which the defendants could have been convicted of other offences in any event? See LCCP 183, Part 12. The Commission accepted that it was unduly influenced by that case: LC 318, para 8.13. For suggestions of non-criminal responses to D who never gets beyond preparation, see D Ohana, 'Desert and Punishment for Acts Preparatory to the Commission of a Crime' (2007) 20 Canadian J L & Jurisprudence 113 and 'Responding to Acts Preparatory to the Commission of a Crime' (2006) 25 Criminal Justice Ethics 23. For a contrary view see L Alexander and K Kessler Ferzan, 'Risk and Inchoate Crimes: Retribution or Prevention' in GR Sullivan and I Dennis (eds), Seeking Security: Pre-Emptying the Commission of Criminal Harms (2012).

¹¹⁵ [2009] EWCA Crim 1931.

¹¹⁶ [2009] EWHC 2198 (Admin). See also Ferriter [2012] EWCA Crim 2211, where D struggled with V and put his hand in her trousers. Held to be an act beyond mere preparation, but no evidence it was to rape rather than assault sexually. See also Beaney [2010] EWCA Crim 2551, and Bryan [2015] EWCA Crim 433.

¹¹⁷ At [19]–[20].

¹¹⁸ As previously, the distinction between fact and law is important in s 4(3). Turning on the engine may be considered to be something more than mere preparation to drive, but whether it does in fact amount to an attempt remains a pure question of fact in each case. M might have committed the offence of 'being in charge of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place', when over the limit, contrary to s 5(1)(b), provided he was on a road or public place. In Moore v DPP [2010] EWHC 1822 (Admin), a court was fully entitled to find that D had attempted to drive on a public road where D started his car on private property (the inside perimeter fence of an atomic weapons establishment) and was stopped by an officer a few metres from the public road to which he was heading.

¹¹⁹ [1915] 2 KB 342, CCA. Cf Button [1900] 2 QB 597, CCR.

¹²⁰ Interestingly it might be argued (as LCCP 183 assumes, para 13.15 fn 31) that D has attempted to defraud under the Fraud Act 2006 by making a false representation through conduct. But is it by the false representation of being tied up that he intends to gain? See p 934.

today would be a crime of fraud, but his conduct thus far could only properly be described as mere preparation, which is insufficient to fall within the terms of the Act. Widdowson,¹²¹ decided under the Act, was a rather similar case and the conviction was quashed.

In Comer v Bloomfield,¹²² D went a step further than Robinson. Having crashed his van, he pushed it into a nearby wood, reported to the police that it had been stolen and wrote to his insurers stating that the van had been stolen and inquiring whether he could claim for it. He was acquitted of an attempt to obtain money by deception and the Divisional Court held that the magistrates were entitled to conclude that the making of a preliminary inquiry was insufficiently proximate to the actual obtaining. Even if Robinson does represent the law under the 1981 Act, Bloomfield's inquiry to the company might well be held to be evidence of a more than merely preparatory act; D had set about the business of getting money from the insurers. He was on the job. This might be compared with the case of Bowles and Bowles,¹²³ in which DD had befriended a vulnerable old lady and completed her last will and testament naming themselves as beneficiaries, but had not sought to execute the document and had it languishing for months in a drawer. The Court of Appeal held that there was insufficient evidence of an act more than merely preparatory to making a false instrument. Perhaps the most striking of all the common law cases is *Komaroni and Rogerson*¹²⁴ where DD followed a lorry for 130 miles, waiting in vain for the driver to leave it unattended so that they could steal it. Streatfield J held that this was mere preparation. It seems likely that this would, rightly, be held to be evidence of an attempt under the 1981 Act.

The Law Commission suggested that the judicial interpretation of the test is so defective as to require at least rectification by specific guideline examples, and preferably full-blown statutory revision by the creation of new offences. Identifying the point at which D has moved from mere preparation into the territory of attempt is so difficult that the Law Commission initially proposed that the existing offence should be subdivided into: (a) an offence of criminal preparation, which is based on the conduct of D when performing acts which are more than merely preparatory to the commission of the substantive offence; and (b) an offence of attempt which will be narrower than the present law, requiring D to be performing the last acts needed to commit the intended offence. That was an odd solution which did not meet with support on consultation. The present problem is in identifying the boundary between mere preparation and attempt. The Commission proposed creating two boundaries between three categories: no liability, more than mere preparation and attempt. After consultation, the Commission rejected its initial proposals.

11.2.2.4 Attempt by omission

Section 1 of the 1981 Act is drafted in terms of an 'act' being more than merely preparatory. A crime of omission where the actus reus does not include any consequence resulting from the omission is, by its nature, incapable of being attempted.¹²⁵ This is not true of an offence including a consequence that may be committed by one having a duty to act. If the parents of a child deliberately withhold food from the child with the intent to kill it, they have set out to commit murder.¹²⁶ In fact, they are attempting to commit murder but, in the rare case where it cannot be proved that they did any act contributing to the death, it seems possible

¹²¹ (1985) 82 Cr App R 314, [1986] Crim LR 233. ¹²² (1970) 55 Cr App R 305.

¹²³ [2004] EWCA Crim 1608. ¹²⁴ (1953) 103 L Jo 97.

¹²⁵ For discussion of inchoate crimes as result or conduct crimes, see M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) 134 et seq.

¹²⁶ Gibbins and Proctor (1918) 13 Cr App R 134, CCA, p 49. Cf M Gunn and JC Smith, 'Arthur's Case and the Right to Life of a Down's Syndrome Child' [1985] Crim LR 705 at 706.

that, under the Criminal Attempts Act, they are not guilty of that offence.¹²⁷ They have done no 'act', as required by s 1(1). Though the government seems to have supposed that an attempt could be charged in such a case,¹²⁸ it would require bold judicial interpretation to read 'act' to include 'omission', although reference to the parliamentary debates would support liability for omissions in such a case.¹²⁹

Cases will be rare where an intention to commit an offence by omission can be proved. In Nevard,¹³⁰ D seriously injured his wife by striking her with an axe and a knife. He then forced her to abandon her attempt to dial 999 to call for assistance. Despite D's efforts to prevent the emergency services attending, V was found with non-fatal injuries. D was charged with wounding with intent and with attempted murder. The judge directed the jury to regard D's conduct in preventing the emergency services being contacted as an element of the overall evidence of D's intention to kill. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction, but suggested that the judge should have made explicit to the jury that attempting to divert the emergency services could not in itself constitute attempted murder. But was not D's conduct in taking the return call and lying a sufficient 'act'? He took positive steps to prevent the emergency services responding to his wife's call. If V dies because D prevents the emergency services from reaching her, or from helping her if they do arrive (eg by keeping them away at gunpoint), that must make D a substantial cause of V's death, even if D was not the one who inflicted the original injuries. If D takes such positive measures to prevent the emergency services arriving, but despite his best efforts V lives, D must surely have attempted to cause V's death.

The Law Commission Report No 318 recommends that the 1981 Act be amended so that D may be convicted of attempted murder if (with the intent to kill V) D failed to discharge his legal duty to V (where that omission, unchecked, could have resulted in V's death).¹³¹ The Commission's recommendation to extend liability in relation to murder only appears somewhat arbitrary.

11.2.3 Successful attempts

It has sometimes been argued that failure is essential to the very nature of an attempt so that D should not be convicted for attempting to commit a crime if he was successful in committing it.¹³² Section 6(4) of that Act provided:

where a person is charged on indictment with attempting to commit an offence or with an assault or other act preliminary to an offence, but not with the completed offence, then (subject to the discretion of the court to discharge the jury with a view to the preferment of an indictment for the completed offence) he may be convicted of the offence charged notwithstanding that he is shown to be guilty of the completed offence.

¹²⁷ They are, of course, guilty of the offence of wilful neglect of a young person under the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. See also the offences under the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, s 5 (as amended by the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims (Amendment) Act 2012), discussed in Ch 15.

¹²⁸ See IH Dennis, 'The Criminal Attempts Act 1981' [1982] Crim LR 5, 7. LCCP 183, paras 12.24, 16.83; LC 318, para 8.142.

¹²⁹ See also the discussion of the nurse who, intending to kill a terminally ill patient, omits to replace a life-sustaining drip: P Palmer, 'Attempt by Act or Omission: Causation and the Problem of the Hypothetical Nurse' (1999) 63 J Crim L 158.

¹³⁰ [2006] EWCA Crim 2896.

¹³¹ Para 8.151.

¹³² Hall, GPCL, 577: 'attempt implies failure . . .'; GP Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 131. In Commonwealth v Crow, 303 Pa 91, 98 (1931), the court said 'A failure to consummate a crime is as much an essential element of an attempt as the intent and performance of an overt act towards its commission.' Cf the argument in L Alexander and K Ferzan, Crime and Culpability: A Theory of Criminal Law (2009) 203.

This provision does not extend to summary trial. However, in Webley v Buxton,¹³³ it was held that an attempt to commit a misdemeanour did become subsumed within the completed offence at common law.

The 1981 Act makes no provision for this problem¹³⁴ so the matter is governed by the common law as stated in Webley v Buxton. As a matter of principle, this seems right. At a certain point in the transaction D is guilty of an attempt. The attempt may fail for many reasons, or it may succeed. There is no reason why, if it succeeds, it should cease to be the offence of attempt which, until that moment, it was. The greater includes the less. If D is convicted of attempted murder while his victim, V, is still alive and V then dies of injuries inflicted by D, D is now liable to be convicted of murder; but the conviction for attempt is not invalidated. It would, of course, be improper to convict D of both the attempt and the full offence at the same time. To that extent, the attempt is subsumed within the completed offence.

11.2.4 Categories of offence which may be subject to an attempt

There are a number of limitations on the scope of the liability for attempt.

11.2.4.1 No liability for attempting summary only offences

At common law it was doubtful whether an attempt to commit an offence triable only summarily was a crime. Under the Act, it is clear that it is not, unless the provision creating the offence expressly provides that it shall be.¹³⁵

Since 1981, the policy aimed at disposing of more cases in magistrates' courts has resulted in an increase in the number of offences that are triable only summarily, including common assault and battery. The effect was to abolish the former offence of attempted assault, which leaves an undesirable gap in the law.¹³⁶ It is submitted that there seems to be no good reason why it should not be an offence to attempt to commit a summary only offence and the policy should be reconsidered.¹³⁷

11.2.4.2 Limits on liability for attempts of conspiracy and other secondary liability

Given that inchoate liability is, by definition, some distance removed from the full offence, there are obvious dangers in imposing double inchoate liability—prosecuting D for ¹³³ [1977] QB 481, [1977] Crim LR 160, DC, overlooked in Velasquez [1996] 1 Cr App R 155, [1995] 7 Arch News 3, CA, which is therefore wrong.

¹³⁴ LCCP 102, para 2.113.

¹³⁵ The indictable offence of criminal damage is now triable only summarily if the damage is not more than £5,000: Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, s 22 and Sch 2. Only damage to the property itself is relevant, not any consequential damage: R (on the application of Abbott) v Colchester Magistrates' Court [2001] Crim LR 564, DC, but it has been held that such 'low-value' criminal damage remains an indictable offence. Bristol Magistrates' Court, ex p E [1998] 3 All ER 798, [1999] Crim LR 161, DC; Fennell [2000] 2 Cr App R 318, [2000] Crim LR 677, CA. It is therefore still an offence to attempt to commit it, however low the value of the damage attempted.

¹³⁶ Although common law assault and battery are not indictable offences, they can be charged on indictment if the charge is part of a series of offences of the same or similar character as an indictable offence which is also charged. See s 40(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988. This provision was analysed in Nelson [2013] EWCA Crim 30, [2013] Crim LR 689 in which the Court of Appeal held that it did have the power to substitute D's conviction for attempted assault with one of attempted battery but declined to do so. The court's conclusion that attempted battery is an offence known to law is, with respect, in error. There must be an offence which is triable on indictment which battery is not, having regard to the definition of indictable offence under the Interpretation Act 1978.

¹³⁷ The Law Commission provisionally proposed to reverse the present rule: LCCP 183, para 6.67, cf LC 318, para 8.154.

attempting to conspire with X to encourage Y to steal is preposterous. Limits on multiple inchoate liability need to be set. For attempts, the limits are set in the 1981 Act.

By s 1(4),¹³⁸ there can be no liability for attempting to commit crimes of conspiracy, whether common law or statutory,¹³⁹ nor offences of assisting an arrestable offender or compounding an arrestable offence contrary to ss 4(1) and 5(1) respectively of the Criminal Law Act 1967.¹⁴⁰ Liability for attempting these offences would be a considerable extension of the law, with the conduct involved being doubly remote from the substantive offence. Nevertheless, somewhat surprisingly, it is an offence under the Act¹⁴¹ to attempt to commit an offence of assisting or encouraging under the SCA 2007.¹⁴²

The 1981 Act makes clear that it is not an offence to attempt to aid, abet, counsel, procure or suborn the commission of an offence: s 1(4)(b).¹⁴³ Of course, some substantive offences are drafted in terms of aiding and abetting, and in these cases an attempt to commit such an offence is an offence under the 1981 Act. Section 1(4)(b) does not apply because these are not instances of aiding, etc an offence. An 'attempt under a special statutory provision' (s 3(1) of the Act) is now governed by the same principles as attempts under the Act.¹⁴⁴

11.2.4.3 Other exceptional cases where there is no liability for attempt

Apart from the statutory exceptions, there may be other crimes where an attempt charge cannot be pursued. Stephen thought there were a large number of such offences,¹⁴⁵ but his examples are not wholly convincing. In addition to those cases discussed earlier (summary only offences, conspiracy and aiding and abetting), offences where no attempt charge is possible include the following:

- (1) Where any act done with the appropriate intent amounts to the complete crime. Such crimes are rare but one may be the form of treason known as compassing the Queen's death. The offence requires proof of an overt act but it seems that any act done with intent to kill the Queen would be enough.
- (2) A crime defined as an omission¹⁴⁶ where the actus reus does not include any consequence of the omission, as in the case of misprision of treason or some statutory offences of omission.
- (3) It is difficult to conceive of an attempt where the actus reus is a state of affairs, such as 'being found' in particular circumstances.¹⁴⁷
- (4) It has been argued that there ought to be no liability for an offence that may be committed recklessly or negligently but not intentionally. The example most often used which comes readily to mind is involuntary manslaughter. The essence of this crime is ¹³⁸ This result was achieved, rather curiously, by s 8 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990.

¹³⁹ See later. Cf the statements in Harmer [2005] EWCA Crim 1, [2005] Crim LR 482 and comment.

¹⁴⁰ See Ch 7. Reasons for excluding the offences under the Criminal Law Act 1967 are given in LCCP 102 at paras 2.124–2.126.

¹⁴¹ As it was at common law, to attempt to commit the common law offence of incitement: Dunnington [1984] QB 472, (1984) 78 Cr App R 171, [1984] Crim LR 98, CA. For the common law, see JC Smith, 'Secondary Participation and Inchoate Offences' in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 21.

¹⁴² It is possible for D to assist or encourage an attempt: SCA 2007, s 44.

¹⁴³ For arguments as to whether the section is superfluous now that the SCA 2007, Part 2 is in force, see M Bohlander, 'The Conflict Between the Serious Crime Act and s 1(4)(b) of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981' [2010] Crim LR 483 and J Child who rejects the claim at [2010] Crim LR 924. There is considerable force in Bohlander's argument that the provision should have been repealed.

¹⁴⁴ The Law Commission's proposals in relation to double inchoate offences in LCCP 183, Ch 7 recommended that it should be an offence to attempt to conspire: para 7.57. This surely goes too far.

¹⁴⁵ II HCL, 227.

¹⁴⁶ Attempt by omission generally is considered at p 429.

¹⁴⁷ See p 43.

that the killing is unintentional. An intentional killing (in the absence of diminished responsibility, the conditions for infanticide, loss of self-control¹⁴⁸ or a suicide pact) is necessarily murder. Section 1(1) of the 1981 Act requires an intention to commit the offence which D is charged with attempting and on this view an intent to commit involuntary manslaughter is not a concept known to law. What, however, of D who intends to commit a strict liability offence but is foiled in the process—why should he not be liable for attempting to commit that offence? If liability can arise for strict liability, why not for the offence of manslaughter?¹⁴⁹

11.2.5 Jurisdictional issues

11.2.5.1 Attempt in England to commit an offence abroad

D may be prosecuted for attempt under the Act (as amended¹⁵⁰) where D intends an offence to be committed outside England and Wales, provided that the more than merely preparatory act D performs is done in England or Wales and the result attempted would be both an indictable offence as defined by English law and an offence by the law of the other country.¹⁵¹ If D, a British citizen, posts a letter bomb from England to V in France, intending to kill V in France, he is liable to conviction for attempted murder as soon as the letter is posted;¹⁵² but, if he intends only to injure V, he is not guilty of an attempt to cause him grievous or actual bodily harm. This is because murder abroad by a British citizen is triable in England but lesser offences against the person are not. If D were a foreign citizen, then he could not be tried in England for attempted murder. This seems anomalous, particularly since two foreigners could, since 1977, be convicted of conspiring in England to commit murder abroad.¹⁵³

The jurisdiction of the court has also been extended to certain cases where an act is done in England and Wales that would be an attempt under the Act, but for the fact that the offence, if completed, would not be triable in England and Wales.¹⁵⁴

11.2.5.2 Attempt abroad to commit an offence in England

It was settled before the Act by the decision of the House of Lords in *DPP v Stonehouse*¹⁵⁵ that an act done abroad with intent thereby to cause the commission of an offence in England could be prosecuted here (even if done by an innocent agent¹⁵⁶), at least if it had an effect in England. D, in Miami, falsely staged his death by drowning with the intent that his innocent wife in England should claim life assurance monies. He was guilty of attempting to enable his wife to obtain by deception. His acts abroad would have ¹⁴⁸ For attempted infanticide, see KA Smith [1983] Crim LR 739 (Crown Court), p 632; and for attempt under provocation, Bruzas [1972] Crim LR 367 (Crown Court), and Campbell [1997] Crim LR 495 (Crown Court) (Sedley J) and commentary.

¹⁴⁹ cf Simester, Spencer, Stark, Sullivan and Virgo, CLT&D, 345.

¹⁵⁰ Subsection (1A), inserted by the Criminal Justice Act 1993, s 5(2).

¹⁵¹ See, generally, Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law, Ch 4.

¹⁵² See p 504. ¹⁵³ See p 460.

¹⁵⁴ This applies to an offence under s 3 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990: s 1(1A) and (1B) of the Act; and to a 'Group A offence' as defined in Part 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1993: s 1A of the Act. This includes all the major offences under the Theft Act 1968, the Fraud Act 2006 and the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981, and the common law offence of cheating the public revenue.

¹⁵⁵ [1978] AC 55, [1977] Crim LR 544, HL.

¹⁵⁶ cf Latif [1996] 2 Cr App R 92, HL, [1996] Crim LR 414 and commentary. But if D knows or believes E to have mens rea, he is guilty, not of an attempt, but under the offences in the SCA 2007, Part 2.

the 'effect' of communicating through the media to his wife and the insurance companies the false statement that he had died.¹⁵⁷ In Somchai Liangsirprasert v United States Government,¹⁵⁸ the Privy Council, holding that a conspiracy abroad to commit an offence in England is indictable even though no overt act has been done within this jurisdiction, said, obiter, that the same rule applies to attempt. The Act has nothing to say on the question so it remains a matter of common law. This may be taken to have been settled by Liangsirprasert.

11.2.5.3 Attempt abroad to commit an offence abroad

D, a British citizen, while in France, attempts to kill V in France or, knowing himself to be married, attempts to go through a ceremony of marriage there with X. If he succeeds he will be liable to conviction in England of murder and bigamy. Exceptionally, English law assumes jurisdiction over these crimes when committed abroad by a British citizen. Literally, then, the attempt is an offence under the Act. It has been argued that the presumption against the extraterritorial operation of the criminal law¹⁵⁹ requires the words 'does an act' to be construed as applicable only to acts done within the jurisdiction, or having, or being intended to have, some effect therein; but this argument has less weight after Liangsirprasert. If the court has jurisdiction over the full offence when wholly committed abroad, why not over the attempt?

11.2.6 Abandonment

Once D's steps towards the commission of an offence are sufficiently far advanced to amount to an attempt—they are beyond mere preparation—it can make no difference whether the failure to complete the crime is owing to a voluntary abandonment by D, the intervention of the police or any other reason.¹⁶⁰ In Taylor,¹⁶¹ it was held that an attempt was committed where D approached a stack of corn with the intention of setting fire to it and lit a match for that purpose but abandoned his plan on noticing that he was being watched. Following the recommendation of the Law Commission,¹⁶² the 1981 Act made no change to the common law in this respect. The principal argument in favour of an abandonment defence is that it might induce the attempter to desist—but this seems unlikely. The existence of such a defence would add to the problems of law enforcement authorities as defendants caught before the last act would no doubt claim that they were in the process of desisting and had no intention of going beyond the stage they had reached. In some jurisdictions, however, logic has given way to policy and a defence of free and voluntary desistance is allowed.¹⁶³

¹⁵⁷ Lord Keith insisted that an effect within the jurisdiction was essential but Lord Diplock thought otherwise. Why should the result have been different if D had been rescued from the sea and confessed before any report of his death appeared in England?

¹⁵⁸ (1991) 92 Cr App R 77, PC at 87–90.

¹⁵⁹ See Griew, Current Law Statutes, General Note.

¹⁶⁰ See M Wasik, 'Abandoning Criminal Intent' [1980] Crim LR 785; Duff, Criminal Attempts, 65–75; Yaffe Attempts, Ch 11. For comparisons with Dutch and German approaches, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2013) 404 et seq.

¹⁶¹ (1859) 1 F & F 511; see also Lankford [1959] Crim LR 209, CCA. It is doubtful whether Taylor's desistance was 'free and voluntary' in the sense that he was motivated by a desire to avoid detection.

¹⁶² LC 102, paras 2.131–2.133.

¹⁶³ See D Stuart, 'The Actus Reus in Attempts' [1970] Crim LR at 519–521. See the Draft Scots Code which provides a defence where D 'voluntarily abandons his attempt as a result of repentance before all acts necessary for the commission of the offence were done', cl 18(2).

11.3 Conspiracy

11.3.1 Introduction

A criminal conspiracy is, in simple terms, an agreement between two or more persons to commit a crime. At common law conspiracy was defined as an agreement to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means.¹⁶⁴ The word 'unlawful' was used in a broad sense to include crimes, even some torts, and some immoral acts. The offence therefore included agreements to perform not only any crime triable in England, even a crime triable only summarily, but also at least: (a) fraud; (b) the corruption of public morals; (c) the outraging of public decency; and (d) some torts. In this respect it went far beyond the other inchoate offences of incitement and attempt, where the result incited or attempted must be a crime. For many years until DPP v Withers,¹⁶⁵ in 1974 the crime of conspiracy was believed to be even wider, including any agreement to effect a public mischief.

It has long been the generally approved aim of the Law Commission that:

The crime of conspiracy should be limited to agreements to commit criminal offences: an agreement should not be criminal where that which it was agreed to be done would not amount to a criminal offence if committed by one person.¹⁶⁶

The Criminal Law Act 1977 created a new offence of statutory conspiracy based on the policy that an agreement should not be criminal where that which it was agreed to be done would not amount to a criminal offence if committed by one person.¹⁶⁷ It is therefore an offence to agree with another that a crime (whether statutory or common law) will be committed. However, the present law retains instances in which a crime is committed by agreeing to engage in conduct which would not be criminal if performed by one actor alone. This remains the case with conspiracy to defraud, conspiracy to corrupt public morals or to outrage public decency.¹⁶⁸ The retention of these common law conspiracies is controversial. The Law Commission has repeatedly proposed abolition,¹⁶⁹ but the government remains unwilling to run the risk by removing flexible common law offences that might prove necessary to deal with some unforeseen scenario that would fall outside the scope of statutory conspiracy.¹⁷⁰

Despite amendment by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 and the Criminal Justice Act 1987, the Criminal Law Act 1977, which is the principal topic under examination in this part ¹⁶⁴ By Lord Denman CJ in Jones (1832) 4 B & Ad 345, KB, at 349. But a few years later in Peck (1839) 9 Ad & El 686 at 690 he declared, 'I do not think the antithesis very correct.' For an historical account, see LCCP 183, Ch 3.

¹⁶⁵ [1975] AC 842, [1975] Crim LR 95, HL. Conspiracy to commit the common law offence of public nuisance continues to be a potential source of expansion of the criminal law. See commentary on Soul (1980) 70 Cr App R 295, [1980] Crim LR 233, CA. The House of Lords confirmed the ECHR compatibility of the offence of public nuisance: Rimmington [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153.

¹⁶⁶ LC 76, Conspiracy and Criminal Law Reform (1976) para 1.113; see also Law Commission Working Paper No 50.

¹⁶⁷ LC 76, para 1.113; see also Law Commission Working Paper No 50.

¹⁶⁸ Cases since the 1977 Act (May (1989) 91 Cr App R 157, [1990] Crim LR 415, CA; Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619, [1990] Crim LR 738, CA; Rowley [1991] 4 All ER 649, [1991] Crim LR 785, CA) confirming that it is an offence for a person acting alone to do acts tending to corrupt public morals create a doubt whether there is any scope for the operation of common law conspiracy to do these things.

¹⁶⁹ As with the call for abolition of conspiracy to defraud in LC 276, Fraud (2002). See further Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 5.

¹⁷⁰ There is the irony—if it is so unforeseeable, prosecuting it is likely to run into difficulty under Art 7. See also Norris v US [2008] UKHL 16 holding that while price fixing in itself was not, prior to 2002, an offence under English law, when combined with other elements such as deliberate misrepresentation, it could lead to various offences such as fraud or conspiracy to defraud. See also GG Plc [2008] UKHL 17, [2009] Crim LR 433.

of the chapter, remains an ill-drafted piece of legislation presenting numerous problems of interpretation. The arguments for reform to clarify the position seem compelling. In 2009, the Law Commission produced proposals in which recommendations for a wider, and yet more complex, form of conspiracy were advanced.¹⁷¹

11.3.2 Summary of present law

Whether a particular agreement between D1 and D2 is a statutory conspiracy under the Criminal Law Act or a conspiracy at common law, or both, the offence involves an agreement. That is not a mere mental operation, but must involve spoken or written words or other overt acts. If D1 repents and withdraws immediately after the agreement has been concluded, he is guilty¹⁷² and his repentance is a matter of mitigation only.

11.3.2.1 Statutory conspiracy

It is an offence of conspiracy, triable only on indictment, to agree to commit any criminal offence, even an offence triable only summarily.¹⁷³ This is a 'statutory' conspiracy under the Criminal Law Act 1977. It is not limited to agreements to commit a statutory crime—agreements to commit the common law offence of murder are charged under this offence—rather, the term 'statutory conspiracy' is used to distinguish it from 'common law conspiracies'.

11.3.2.2 Common law conspiracies

It is an offence triable only on indictment to agree:

- (1) to defraud, whether or not the fraud amounts to a crime or even a tort;¹⁷⁴
- (2) to do an act which tends to corrupt public morals or outrage public decency, whether or not that act amounts to a crime.

The 1977 Act has no part to play in the prosecution of such offences.

11.3.2.3 Relationship between common law and statutory conspiracies

Section 1(1) of the 1977 Act creates the offence of statutory conspiracy. It provides in effect that it is a conspiracy to agree to commit any offence. Section 5(2) and (3)¹⁷⁵ preserve common law conspiracies of conspiracy to defraud and conspiracies to corrupt public morals and outrage public decency. Statutory conspiracies and common law conspiracies to corrupt public morals or to outrage public decency remain mutually exclusive. Section 5 was amended to rectify an error in earlier drafting which rendered statutory and all common law conspiracies mutually exclusive.¹⁷⁶ But s 12 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 provides that statutory conspiracy and conspiracy to defraud are not mutually exclusive. An agreement to commit a crime involving fraud or dishonesty is both a statutory conspiracy and ¹⁷¹ See LCCP 183; LC 318.

¹⁷² As in the Bridgewater Case, unreported, referred to by Lord Coleridge CJ in the Mogul Steamship Case (1888) 21 QBD 544 at 549.

¹⁷³ LCCP 183, para 6.58 on summary conspiracies. In LC 318 it was recommended to remove the present requirement for the DPP to give consent if proceedings to prosecute a conspiracy to commit a summary offence are to be initiated: para 4.35.

¹⁷⁴ See the House of Lords decision on the scope of the common law offence in GG Plc [2008] UKHL 17, [2009] Crim LR 433. See the extensive discussion in the Crown Court decision in Evans and others [2014] 1 WLR 2817 discussed by P Jarvis [2014] Crim LR 738.

¹⁷⁵ As amended by the Criminal Justice Act 1987.

¹⁷⁶ See Ayres [1984] AC 447, [1984] Crim LR 353, HL. The House substantially modified the effect of Ayres, as generally understood, in the decision in Cooke [1986] AC 909, [1987] Crim LR 114, HL.

a conspiracy to defraud. The prosecutor will frequently have a choice.¹⁷⁷ The broad and flexible nature of the conspiracy to defraud offence ensures its continued popularity with prosecutors. It is a 'not yet rusty and still trusty' weapon.¹⁷⁸

11.3.3 Statutory conspiracy

The offence of statutory conspiracy is defined by s 1(1) and s 1(2) of the Act.¹⁷⁹ Section 1(1) (as amended by s 5 of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981) provides:

Subject to the following provisions of this part of the Act, if a person agrees with any other person or persons that a course of conduct shall be pursued which, if the agreement is carried out in accordance with their intentions, either—

- (a) will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of any offence or offences by one or more of the parties to the agreement, or
- (b) would do so but for the existence of facts which render the commission of the offence or any of the offences impossible, he is guilty of conspiracy to commit the offence or offences in question.

Conspiracy is a crime where it is more difficult than usual to distinguish between actus reus and mens rea. The actus reus is said to be the agreement: but agreement is essentially a mental operation, though it must be manifested by or inferred from acts of some kind. 'In the case of conspiracy as opposed to the substantive offence, it is what was agreed to be done and not what was in fact done which is all important.'¹⁸⁰ The elements of the offence are best listed and examined separately rather than divided into sub-categories of mens rea and actus reus. They are:

- (1) an agreement;
- (2) that a course of conduct will be pursued;
- (3) the course of conduct will necessarily amount to the commission of an offence if carried out in accordance with the defendants' intentions;
- (4) the defendants had an intention to agree;
- (5) the defendants had an intention that the agreement will be carried out;
- (6) the defendants had an intention or knowledge as to any circumstances forming part of the substantive offence.

¹⁷⁷ To be exercised in accordance with the Attorney General's guidance of 2007 issued to ensure appropriate use of conspiracy to defraud after the Fraud Act 2006 came into force and s 6 of the general guidance in the Code for Crown Prosecutors issued by the DPP under s 10(1) of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985. In Dady [2013] EWHC 475 (QB), applying Rimmington [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153, it was held that where an agreement could be charged as a statutory conspiracy or as a conspiracy to defraud, it should ordinarily be charged as a statutory conspiracy unless there is good reason to charge conspiracy to defraud instead.

¹⁷⁸ Auld LJ in Norris v US [2007] EWHC 71 (Admin), [66]. But on the need to exercise care in charging the offence, note Evans and others [2014] 1 WLR 2817, Cardiff Crown Court, and the comment by P Jarvis [2014] Crim LR 738.

¹⁷⁹ For the background to Part I of the Criminal Law Act, see Law Commission Working Papers No 50, Inchoate Offences (1973); No 56, Conspiracy to Defraud (1974); No 57, Conspiracies Relating to Morals and Decency (1974); and No 63, Conspiracies to Effect a Public Mischief and to Commit a Civil Wrong (1975); and see LC 76, Conspiracy and Criminal Law Reform (1976). For the interpretation of the Act, see EJ Griew, 'Annotations on the Act' in Current Law Statutes; JC Smith, 'Conspiracy under the Criminal Law Act 1977' [1977] Crim LR 598 and 638; DW Elliott, 'Mens Rea in Statutory Conspiracy' [1978] Crim LR 202; G Williams, 'The New Statutory Offence of Conspiracy' (1977) 127 NLJ 1164 and 1188; D Ormerod, 'Making Sense of Statutory Conspiracies' (2006) 59 CLP 185.

¹⁸⁰ Bolton (1991) 94 Cr App R 74, CA at 80, per Woolf LJ. See also the commentary at [1992] Crim LR 57.

11.3.3.1 The agreement

Surprisingly, the courts have failed to define with precision what conduct suffices to constitute the completed agreement. It may be that it is not necessary to prove an agreement in the strict sense required by the law of contract,¹⁸¹ but the parties must at least have reached a decision¹⁸² that their unlawful object is to be carried out. Difficult questions may arise in cases where parties are at the stage of negotiating subject to final details being agreed, for example D1 agrees to sell D2 certain goods, known to both to be stolen, at 'a price to be agreed between us'.¹⁸³ In Walker,¹⁸⁴ a conviction was quashed although it was 'perfectly clear' that D1 had discussed with D2 and D3 the proposition of stealing a payroll, because it was not proved that they had got beyond the stage of negotiation when D1 withdrew. Once the parties have agreed, the conspiracy is complete, even if they take no further action because, for example, they are arrested.

Conspiracy is a continuing offence.¹⁸⁵ The offence offers a significant attraction for prosecutors because of this opportunity to roll together a course of criminal conduct under one charge on the one indictment.¹⁸⁶

The offence lies in agreeing with another that a crime will be committed. That is different from agreeing that D will commit the crime himself. D can be convicted of conspiracy even though he personally will not be participating in the commission of the substantive offence. The Law Commission's latest recommendation is that a conspiracy 'must involve an agreement by two or more persons to engage in the conduct element of an offence and (where relevant) to bring about any consequence element of the substantive offence'.¹⁸⁷ The recommendation would make a radical change to the law narrowing it considerably if each D must agree that he will engage in the conduct of the commission of the substantive offence. It is submitted that the recommendation should not be adopted. It ought to have reflected the present law—what is required is that D agrees and intends that the conduct of the substantive offence be performed by at least one party to the agreement.

Wheel and chain conspiracies

It may not be necessary to show that the persons accused of conspiring together were in direct communication with one another. It may be, therefore, that the conspiracy revolves around some third party, X, who is in touch with each of D1, D2 and D3, though they are not in touch with one another (a 'wheel conspiracy'). Provided that the result is that they have a common design—for example, to rob a particular bank—D1, D2 and D3 may properly be indicted for conspiring together though they have never been in touch with one another until they meet in the dock. The same is true of a chain conspiracy where D1 communicates with D2, D2 with D3, etc.¹⁸⁸ In either case it must be proved, of course, that each accused has agreed with another guilty person in relation to that single conspiracy.¹⁸⁹

¹⁸¹ See G Orchard, 'Agreement in Criminal Conspiracy' [1974] Crim LR 297 at 335.

¹⁸² cf Williams, CLGP, 212.

¹⁸³ May and Butcher Ltd v R [1934] 2 KB 17n, HL.

¹⁸⁴ [1962] Crim LR 458, CA; Mulcahy v R (1868) LR 3 HL 306 at 317. Careful jury direction is needed: Webster [2003] EWCA Crim 1946 (conspiracy to cheat the Revenue).

¹⁸⁵ DPP v Doot [1973] AC 807, [1973] Crim LR 292, HL.

