¹⁸⁶ See the comments of Lord Hope in Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

¹⁸⁷ LC 318, recommendation 1, p 473. Surprisingly, this would enact the very error made by the House of Lords in Anderson [1986] AC 27, [1985] Crim LR 651, HL.

¹⁸⁸ This passage in the 13th edition was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Shillam [2013] EWCA Crim 160, [2013] Crim LR 592.

¹⁸⁹ Ardalan [1972] 2 All ER 257 at 261, [1972] Crim LR 370, CA.

What has to be ascertained is always the same matter: is it true to say . . . that the acts of the accused were done in pursuance of a criminal purpose held in common between them?¹⁹⁰

These propositions are well established,¹⁹¹ but some of the older cases demonstrate some questionable application of the principles. In Meyrick,¹⁹² D1 and D2, nightclub proprietors, each separately offered bribes to a police sergeant, E, to induce him to ignore breaches of the licensing laws in respect of their own premises. They were convicted of conspiring, inter alia, to contravene the licensing laws. The jury were directed that there must be a 'common design'. D1 and D2 were convicted, but it is difficult to see how the evidence justified this finding. The intent of each nightclub proprietor was simply to evade the licensing laws in respect of his own premises. There was no common design, merely parallel equivalent ones. Meyrick was distinguished in *Griffiths*¹⁹³ on the rather unconvincing ground that it related to a small geographical area (Soho), so the jury could come to the conclusion that 'the nightclub proprietors in that district well knew what was happening generally in relation to the police'.¹⁹⁴ But this cannot be right. Even if D1 and D2 each knew that the other had made a similar agreement with E, it would seem that there were two separate and specific conspiracies, not one general one. Consider the following powerful example:

I employ an accountant to make out my tax return. He and his clerk are both present when I am about to sign the return. I notice an item in my expenses of £100 and say: 'I don't remember incurring this expense.' The clerk says: 'Well, actually I put it in. You didn't incur it, but I didn't think you would object to a few pounds being saved.' The accountant indicates his agreement to this attitude. After some hesitation I agree to let it stand. On those bare facts I cannot be charged with fifty others in a conspiracy to defraud [Inland Revenue] of £100,000 on the basis that this accountant and his clerk have persuaded 500 other clients to make false returns, some being false in one way, some in another, or even all in the same way. I have not knowingly attached myself to a general agreement to defraud.¹⁹⁵

It is submitted that the position would be no different if the accountant had said: 'We do this for all our clients'; there would still have been a series of conspiracies, not one general conspiracy.¹⁹⁶ These difficulties in describing forms of conspiracy were addressed by the Court of Appeal in Shillam,¹⁹⁷ in which S and others were charged with conspiring with each other and with persons unknown, to supply cocaine. The evidence against them included text messages from people wanting to buy cocaine, quantities of the drug, quantities of cutting agent, etc. The prosecution case did not assert that S and R (one of the co-defendants) knew each other, but that both knew X (another co-defendant) and obtained drugs from him. The judge directed the jury that the critical question was: 'did the particular defendant whose case you are considering agree with at least one other person at some point during the period on the indictment that cocaine should be supplied to someone else?' The Court of Appeal quashed S's conviction. It was held that the jury may have been misled by the direction, as it allowed for the possibility that all three defendants could be convicted of separate

¹⁹⁰ Meyrick (1929) 21 Cr App R 94, CCA at 102 and Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589, CCA, applied in Chrastny [1991] 1 WLR 1381, CA; Mintern [2004] EWCA Crim 7; Clark [2012] EWCA Crim 1220; Papachristos and Kerrison [2014] EWCA Crim 1863; Bhatti [2015] EWCA Crim 1305.

¹⁹¹ See eg Cooper and Compton [1947] 2 All ER 701, CA; Sweetland (1957) 42 Cr App R 62, CCA. For a more recent analysis, see Mehta [2012] EWCA Crim 2824 and Crocker [2012] EWCA Crim 1762.

¹⁹² See n 190. ¹⁹³ (1965) 49 Cr App R 279, CCA. ¹⁹⁴ ibid, 291.

¹⁹⁵ Paull J, ibid. Cf the argument of Maddocks in Meyrick (1929) 45 TLR 421, CCA at 422.

¹⁹⁶ The convictions in Griffiths were quashed as the evidence did not establish the single 'wheel conspiracy' alleged.

¹⁹⁷ [2013] EWCA Crim 160, [2013] Crim LR 592.

conspiracies with different people. In quashing S's conviction, the court reiterated its earlier conclusion in Mehta:¹⁹⁸ conspiracy requires a single joint design between the conspirators within the terms of the indictment. It is always necessary that for two or more persons to be convicted of a single conspiracy each of them must be proved to have shared a common purpose or design. The court confirmed that although each conspirator need not necessarily know the identity or even the existence of all the other conspirators, there must be a shared criminal purpose or design in which all have joined, rather than merely similar or parallel ones. Toulson LJ emphasized that the prosecution should always think carefully before making use of the law of conspiracy, how to formulate the conspiracy charge or charges and whether charging a substantive offence or offences would be more appropriate.¹⁹⁹

Who can be a party to the agreement?

Corporations

A company may be convicted of an offence of conspiracy.²⁰⁰ It must be proved that D conspired with another person but that other need not be identified.²⁰¹ If the managing director of a company resolves to perpetrate an illegality in the company's name, but communicates this to no other person, there is no conspiracy between him and the company.²⁰² In the civil law, as Lee v Lee's Air Farming Ltd demonstrates,²⁰³ it is possible for there to be a conspiracy where the company is alleged to have conspired with only one human agent, who is the very person identified with that company. As others have argued,²⁰⁴ there is no principled reason why the criminal law should deviate from the civil law in this regard.²⁰⁵

Statutory exceptions

In statutory conspiracies there are three cases in which the requirement of two parties is not satisfied. By s 2(2) of the Act, a person is not guilty of a statutory conspiracy:

if the only other person or persons with whom he agrees are (both initially and at all times during the currency of the agreement) persons of any one or more of the following descriptions, that is to say—

- (a) his spouse^[206] or civil partner;
- (b) a person under the age of criminal responsibility; and
- (c) an intended victim of that offence or of each of those offences.

¹⁹⁸ [2012] EWCA Crim 2824.

¹⁹⁹ For discussion of this issue, see P Jarvis and M Bisgrove, 'The Use and Abuse of Conspiracy' [2014] Crim LR 261. For an example of a case in which D's conviction was quashed because there was insufficient evidence that he was party to the same agreement as his alleged co-conspirators, see Mehtab [2015] EWCA Crim 1665. By way of contrast, D's conviction was upheld in Dad [2017] EWCA Crim 321, as Macur LJ held that the summing up alerted the jury to the requirement that they must be sure there was only one conspiracy.

²⁰⁰ ICR Haulage Ltd [1944] KB 551, CCA.

²⁰¹ Phillips (1987) 86 Cr App R 18, CA, discussed [1988] Crim LR at 338.

²⁰² To allow such an indictment would be to 'offend against the basic concept of a conspiracy, namely an agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act . . . it would be artificial to take the view that the company, although it is clearly a separate legal entity can be regarded here as a separate entity or a separate mind . . .', McDonnell [1966] 1 QB 233 (Nield J). Cf ICR Haulage Ltd [1944] KB 551, CCA. A conviction might ensue if D agrees with his company in his capacity as a person responsible for the acts of another corporation rather than as the person responsible for his company: see the Canadian cases cited in McDonnell. The validity of McDonnell was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in A Ltd [2016] EWCA Crim 1469.

²⁰³ [1961] AC 12, PC.

²⁰⁴ Simester, Spencer, Stark, Sullivan and Virgo, CLT&D, 335.

²⁰⁵ For further discussion, see P Jarvis, 'Conspiring with Oneself' [2017] Arch Rev 7.

²⁰⁶ The Court of Appeal in Bala [2016] EWCA Crim 560 held that the term 'spouse' means a husband or wife in a marriage recognized under English law. Therefore, if the defendants' marriage was void (eg being polygamous) under s 11 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973, they cannot rely upon s 2(2)(a) of the 1977 Act.

Spouses/civil partners Paragraph (a) almost certainly states the rule of the common law, although no English case has ever been so decided.²⁰⁷ The common law rule was based upon the fiction that husband and wife were one person with one will. The application of the rule to statutory conspiracies is based upon a social policy of preserving the stability of marriage.²⁰⁸ The common law rule applies only where the parties are married at the time of the agreement. Marriage after the conspiracy or during its continuance is no defence.²⁰⁹ Clearly, the same rule applies under the Act. A wife is guilty, though she agrees only with her husband, if she knows that there are other parties to the conspiracy.²¹⁰ There is no protection against prosecution should the married couple be charged with the substantive offence having perpetrated the offence as they agreed. The protection extends only to conspiracies exclusive to the married couple; if they agree with a third party the conspiracy can be prosecuted.²¹¹ It is anomalous and anachronistic and the Law Commission has recommended abolition.²¹² In declining to extend the exemption to unmarried couples in committed relationships, the Court of Appeal in Suski appears also to have taken the view that it is anachronistic.

Infants²¹³ For the purposes of paragraph (b) a person is under the age of criminal responsibility 'so long as it is conclusively presumed by section 50 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933,^[214] that he cannot be guilty of any offence'²¹⁵—that is, he is under the age of ten.

Victims The Act does not define 'victim'. The Supreme Court in *Gnango*²¹⁶ suggested, obiter, that 'victim' in s 2 ought to be given a narrow meaning. Lord Phillips observed that if 'victim' were to be interpreted widely then it would produce the surprising result that an agreement by two persons that one will act as a suicide bomber would not attract criminal liability. The Supreme Court adopted the formulation of the victim rule advanced by Glanville Williams.²¹⁷ Williams thought that a person would be a victim where:

the courts perceive the legislation is designed for the protection of a class of persons. Such people should not be convicted as accessories to an offence committed in respect of them when they co-operate in it. Nor should they be convicted as conspirators.²¹⁸

It is unclear whether D and V who agree to engage in sadomasochistic activity would commit a conspiracy to commit GBH or ABH at the time of the agreement,²¹⁹ although Lord ²⁰⁷ See eg Hawkins, 1 PC, c 27, s 8 and Mawji v R [1957] AC 126, PC.

²⁰⁸ LCCP 76, paras 1.46–1.49. In Suski [2016] EWCA Crim 24, [2016] Crim LR 558, the Court of Appeal considered whether the exemption violates Arts 8 and 14 of the ECHR on the basis that it extends only to those couples who are married or in a civil partnership. The court rejected this argument and held that there was no reason to extend any further than statute required a rule of the common law which had come to be regarded as anomalous today.

²⁰⁹ Robinson's Case (1746) 1 Leach 37.

²¹⁰ Chrastny [1991] 1 WLR 1381, CA; Lovick [1993] Crim LR 890.

²¹¹ Chrastny, ibid. See also Singh [2011] EWCA Crim 2992. ²¹² See LC 318, para 5.16.

²¹³ The Law Commission recommended that the rule that an agreement involving a person of or over the age of criminal responsibility and a child under the age of criminal responsibility gives rise to no criminal liability for conspiracy should be retained. LC 318, para 5.45.

²¹⁴ See p 341. ²¹⁵ Section 2(3) of the Act. ²¹⁶ [2011] UKSC 59.

²¹⁷ Support for such an interpretation was derived from the SCA 2007, s 51, which explicitly refers to offences that exist wholly or in part for the protection of a particular category of persons. See p 484. It has been suggested that since s 2(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977 does not use this terminology, it can plausibly be assumed that Parliament intended this section to be given a broad interpretation. See C de Than and J Elvin, 'Towards a Rational Reconstruction of the Law on Secondary Participation and Inchoate Offences: Conspiracy' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013).

²¹⁸ G Williams, 'Victims and Other Exempt Parties in Crime' (1990) 10 LS 245.

²¹⁹ See Brown [1994] 1 AC 212, [1993] Crim LR 583, HL, p 666.

Phillips in Gnango stated, obiter, that there would be no bar to convicting the 'victims' of the sadomasochistic acts of having aided and abetted offences against themselves.²²⁰ This is because GBH and ABH are not designed for the protection of a class of persons, but are offences of general application. By contrast, if a 14-year-old girl were to agree with her 16-year-old boyfriend that they will have sex, there would be no liability for conspiracy as the offences in ss 9 to 15 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 are designed for the protection of a designated class, namely those under the age of 16. There appears to be no common law authority in point and the question seems unlikely to arise on a charge of conspiracy at common law since an agreement to defraud with the victim of the fraud is difficult to imagine. It remains to be seen whether the narrow interpretation the Supreme Court suggested ought to be given to s 2 will prevail.

The Law Commission recommended reform of the rule.²²¹

Solo conspirators

The 1977 Act does not deal with other cases where one of two parties to the agreement could not be liable to prosecution for the substantive offence, but it is clear that there may be a conspiracy although only one party is capable of committing the substantive offence as a principal. If, for example, the offence can be committed only by a licensee and A, who is a licensee, agrees with B, a customer who is incapable of committing the substantive offence as a principal, that he, A, will do so, there is a conspiracy to contravene the licensing legislation. The course of conduct will necessarily amount to the commission of the offence by one of the parties.²²² The controversial case of *Whitchurch*²²³ is thus readily explicable. D, believing herself to be pregnant, agreed with two others that they would procure her miscarriage. It was not proved that D was in fact pregnant. A person who unlawfully uses instruments on a woman to procure an abortion commits an offence whether the woman is pregnant or not; but a woman who does the same acts to herself is guilty only if she is in fact pregnant. It was held that all three were guilty of conspiracy and it is submitted that the result would be the same if D had agreed with only one other person. D is guilty as a secondary party if the substantive offence is committed by using the instruments on her,²²⁴ so she is not a 'victim' under the principle of Tyrell.²²⁵

In Duguid,²²⁶ D agreed with E to remove a child of whom E was the mother from the possession of her lawful guardian. This would have been a crime by D under s 56 of the OAPA, but it was provided that a mother should not be liable to prosecution on account of taking her own child. It was held that E's 'immunity from prosecution for an act done by herself' was no bar to the conviction of D for conspiracy. The court did not find it necessary to decide whether E could have been convicted of the conspiracy.²²⁷ This suggests ²²⁰ [2011] UKSC 59, [53]. For further discussion, see J Herring, 'Victims as Defendants: When Victims Participate in Crimes Against Themselves' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013). This would be subject to proving the requisite mens rea of intention.

²²¹ LC 318, para 5.35. The reform would result in the following: D1, aged 15, conspires with D2, 16, that P, 18, should have sex with D1. D1 has the defence, D2 does not.

²²² B will be liable as a secondary party if the offence is committed.

²²³ (1890) 24 QBD 420, criticized by Williams as 'gravely wrong for it sets at naught the limitation upon responsibility imposed by Parliament': CLGP, 673. But see B Hogan, 'Victims as Parties to Crime' [1962] Crim LR 683.

²²⁴ Sockett (1909) 1 Cr App R 101, (1908) 72 JP 428, CCA.

²²⁵ See p 229.

²²⁶ (1906) 21 Cox CC 200, CCR. Cf Sherry and El Yamani [1993] Crim LR 537, CA.

²²⁷ The language used suggests that she might well have been guilty of conspiracy and of secondary participation in the ulterior offence if D had committed it, whether or not she could have been prosecuted. Section 56 has been repealed by the Child Abduction Act 1984, p 730 but the similar problems which could arise under that Act should be resolved in the same way.

that there may be a conspiracy with only one guilty party but the case is far from clear because the court may have accepted the argument of the prosecution that any bar to the prosecution of E was of a procedural nature. The better view is that there must be two conspirators.²²⁸

Mentally disordered conspirators

The Act does not deal with an agreement with a mentally disordered person so the common law, whatever it may be, applies to all conspiracies. In 1976 the Law Commission thought express provision unnecessary because 'a purported agreement with a person who is so mentally disordered as to be incapable of forming the intent necessary for the substantive offence will not be an agreement within clause 1(1) of the draft Bill [now, in substance, s 1(1) of the Act]'.²²⁹ This seems to be right in the case of a mentally disordered person who does not know the nature and quality of the proposed act; but a person who, through mental disorder, does not know the proposed act is 'wrong' may be perfectly capable of forming the intent to commit it with full knowledge of the facts and circumstances.²³⁰ In such a case it is arguable that the party to the agreement who does not have a mental illness is guilty of a statutory conspiracy though the mentally ill person is not because it is sufficient that the carrying out of the agreement will amount to an offence by one of the parties.²³¹

An agreement creating multiple conspiracies?

A single agreement between D1 and D2 may involve them in two or more conspiracies. There is nothing to prevent their being charged as such. Where D1 and D2 agreed to buy cannabis in Thailand and import it into the UK, a conviction in Thailand for conspiracy to possess cannabis for sale did not bar a prosecution in England for conspiracy to import the cannabis into England.²³² But where there is a general conspiracy to commit offences of a certain type, perhaps extending over a lengthy period, agreements to commit particular offences of that type may be treated simply as evidence of the general conspiracy.²³³

In Ali,²³⁴ the Crown had originally alleged that D was party to a conspiracy to murder. At trial that count was amended so that it became more specific—to murder by detonating improvised explosive devices (IEDs) on transatlantic passenger aircraft. A second count alleging conspiracy to murder in general was added. The Court of Appeal accepted that on the unusual facts of the case, it was permissible for the Crown to charge two conspiracies though each involved an agreement to commit the same substantive offence of murder. A wider agreement or conspiracy would not preclude the existence of sub-agreements or sub-conspiracies to cause explosions in particular places. As a matter of law those sub-conspiracies or agreements could properly be charged as separate offences. However, it was essential that the conspiracies in the counts were different. Although the object was to commit the same underlying offence of murder, the court was satisfied that in this case they

²²⁸ cf Yip Chiu-Cheung, p 88. ²²⁹ LC 76, 22, n 166.

²³⁰ cf Matusевич v R (1977) 51 ALJR 657 at 670, per Aickin J (High Ct of Aust).

²³¹ Section 1(1), p 437.

²³² Lavercombe [1988] Crim LR 435, CA. ²³³ Hammersley (1958) 42 Cr App R 207, CCA, discussed in [1958] Crim LR 422–429 (acts alleged ranged over eight years and involved numerous illegal agreements with others, yet the Court of Criminal Appeal contrived to hold that only one conspiracy to obstruct the course of justice, evidenced by a large number of overt acts, was disclosed by the indictment). Barratt and Sheehan [1996] Crim LR 495, CA is a similar case. Cf Edwards [1991] Crim LR 45, CA.

²³⁴ [2011] EWCA Crim 1260, [2012] Crim LR 378. Cf Papachristos and Kerrison [2014] EWCA Crim 1863, n 190.

were distinct and different agreements as the first involved a more serious and sophisticated agreement to do so by detonating IEDs on aircraft.

Agreements to commit more than one offence

It has been held to be legitimate to charge a conspiracy alleging a single agreement embracing conduct involving several offences.²³⁵ So, for example, D can be indicted for conspiracy to rob and murder as part of one agreement. Moreover, in some cases there is nothing to prevent charges being laid for conspiracy where D1 and D2 agree to commit offences 'X or Y' as one agreement.²³⁶ The problem frequently arose in the context of money laundering conspiracies where until relatively recently there were two categories of substantive offence. Dealing with money from drug-related crime was one form of offence, and dealing with money from non-drug-related crime was another. If D1 and D2 agreed to deal with monies from X in the future, being unaware whether the money from X would be from drug crime or other crime, but knowing it will be one or the other, the agreement, if carried out, would necessarily lead to the commission of the offence contrary to the Drug Trafficking Act 1994 and/or to the offence contrary to the Criminal Justice Act 1987. Such a count is not bad for duplicity; it alleges one agreement: Suchedina.²³⁷ These cases on the procedure for indicting conspiracy effect significant extensions of an already broad offence.²³⁸ It would be preferable for two counts to be included where that is possible.²³⁹

Timing of agreement

It is probably not essential that the agreement should have been made prior to the concerted action to bring about the criminal purpose. If, when D1 is taking steps towards the commission of a crime, D2 comes to his assistance and the two work in concert, they might thereby be held to have conspired;²⁴⁰ but if D1 is unaware of, or rejects, D2's assistance, there is no conspiracy,²⁴¹ though D2 might be held to be an accessory of any offence or attempt consummated by D1.²⁴² Some of these principles derive from common law conspiracy cases, but it is submitted that they apply equally to statutory conspiracy.

Proof of the agreement

The question of what conduct amounts to a sufficient agreement to found a charge of conspiracy is complicated by a confusion between the substantive law and the law of evidence, as with several other questions in the criminal law. In most cases the agreement will probably be made in private. Direct evidence of it, even in an era of covert surveillance and telephone tapping, will rarely be available. Agreements are frequently proved by showing that the parties concerted in the pursuit of a common object in such a manner as to show

²³⁵ Roberts [1998] 1 Cr App R 441, [1998] Crim LR 334, CA; Greenfield [1973] 1 WLR 1151, [1973] Crim LR 533, CA; Taylor and others [2001] EWCA Crim 1044, [2002] Crim LR 205.

²³⁶ Hussain [2002] EWCA Crim 6, [2002] Crim LR 407. Many of the cases on this involve the pre-POCA money laundering offences and are complicated by what are recognized in the wake of Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998 to be erroneous statements about the mens rea of conspiracy: El-Kurd [2001] Crim LR 234, CA. The Law Commission discusses these in LC 318, Part 4.

²³⁷ [2006] EWCA Crim 2543, and see LCCP 183, para 5.19 and Ch 4.

²³⁸ Similarly where the parties agree to import 'prohibited drugs' which might be Class A or B or C—three separate offences: Taylor (RJ) [2002] Crim LR 203. See later.

²³⁹ See LC 318, Part 4, and para 4.25.

²⁴⁰ Leigh (1775) 1 Car & Kir 28n; Tibbits and Windust [1902] 1 KB 77, CCR.

²⁴¹ State v Tally, 102 Ala 25 (1894); J Michael and H Wechsler, Criminal Law and Its Administration: Cases, Statutes, and Commentaries (1940) 699; Hawkesley [1959] Crim LR 211 (QB).

²⁴² Rannath Mohan v R [1967] 2 AC 187, PC.

that their actions must have been coordinated by arrangement beforehand.²⁴³ The danger is that the importance attached to the acts done may obscure the fact that these acts do not in themselves constitute a conspiracy, but are only evidence of it. If the jury are left in reasonable doubt, when all the evidence is in, whether the two or more accused persons were acting in pursuance of an agreement, they should acquit, even though the evidence shows that they were simultaneously pursuing the same object.²⁴⁴

11.3.3.2 A 'course of conduct' which has been agreed

The words 'the agreement' mean the agreement that a 'course of conduct' shall be pursued. To consider D's liability for conspiracy, we therefore have to imagine that the course of conduct he intended was pursued and to ask, would it, when completed, have necessarily amounted to or involved the commission of any offence?²⁴⁵ But the phrase 'course of conduct' is ambiguous. It might mean: (a) that the defendants have only to have agreed on the actual physical acts which they propose shall be done; or it might mean (b) that they must also have agreed on the consequences which they intend to follow from their conduct; and/or (c) on the relevant circumstances which they know, or believe, or intend, to exist.²⁴⁶ The broader interpretation in (b) and (c) is, it is submitted, the correct interpretation. This deserves more detailed discussion.

The narrow view

At common law, in DPP v Nock,²⁴⁷ the defendants agreed to extract cocaine from a particular substance by subjecting it to a certain process. The substance contained no cocaine. The House of Lords interpreted 'course of conduct' to mean proof only of the physical acts. The 'course of conduct' was the conduct involved in applying the process to that substance. If D1 and D2 agreed on that course of conduct, it would not necessarily amount to or involve the commission of the offence of producing a controlled drug.²⁴⁸ They were not guilty of conspiracy to produce a controlled drug.

Nock is a case where the 'existence of facts'—that is, that there was no cocaine in the substance—rendered the commission of the offence of producing a controlled drug impossible; and, but for that fact, the course of conduct would necessarily have resulted in the production of a controlled drug. Section 1(1)(b), earlier, which was added by the Criminal Attempts

²⁴³ Cooper and Compton [1947] 2 All ER 701, CCA; Hammersley (1958) 42 Cr App R 207, CCA. Lord Diplock thought that it is 'a legal fiction' (DPP v Bhagwan [1970] 3 All ER 97, HL at 104) and 'the height of sophistry' (Kneller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1972] 2 All ER 898, HL at 921) that the offence lies not in the concerted action but in the inferred anterior agreement; but the law is clear that it is the agreement that is the offence. The concerted action is evidence of the crime, but not the crime itself. Cf JC Smith, 'Proving Conspiracy' [1996] Crim LR 386 and 'More on Proving Conspiracy' [1997] Crim LR 333.

²⁴⁴ Where there are counts for both conspiracy and the substantive crime, and the only evidence of conspiracy is the collaboration of the parties in the completion of the substantive crime, the only logical verdicts are guilty of both conspiracy and the substantive crime or not guilty of both: Cooper and Compton [1947] 2 All ER 701, cf Beach and Owens [1957] Crim LR 687. See later on the use of substantive and conspiracy counts.

²⁴⁵ cf Barnard (1979) 70 Cr App R 28, [1980] Crim LR 235, CA and commentary. Barnard was analysed extensively in Mehra [2012] EWCA Crim 2824, in which the Court of Appeal endorsed Professor Sir John Smith's criticisms of the decision. The impact of this is that on a charge of conspiracy, the greater includes the lesser such that, eg, if DD are charged with conspiracy to rob, the jury can find them guilty of conspiracy to commit theft. Mehra was subsequently considered and endorsed in Shillam [2013] EWCA Crim 160, [2013] Crim LR 592. For commentary, see A Shaw QC [2013] 5 Arch Rev 4.

²⁴⁶ See LC 318, Part 2 for discussion of what this should mean.

²⁴⁷ [1978] AC 979, HL, [1978] Crim LR 483 and commentary. A case of common law conspiracy committed before, but decided after, the Act came into force.

²⁴⁸ They would now be guilty because of the addition of s 1(1)(b), discussed earlier, which was added by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981.

Act 1981, is designed to ensure that in a case of statutory conspiracy the fact that the course of conduct relied on rendered the substantive offence impossible does not prevent a conviction for conspiracy. The section provides that if D1 and D2 agree that a course:

shall be pursued which, if the agreement is carried out in accordance with their intentions, either—

- (a) will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of any offence or offences by one or more of the parties to the agreement, or
- (b) would do so but for the existence of facts which render the commission of the offence or any of the offences impossible, they are guilty of conspiracy to commit the offence or offences in question.

On the facts in Nock, but for the existence of a fact (the non-existence of cocaine in the substance), the course of conduct agreed on (applying the process to the substance) would necessarily have resulted in the production of a controlled drug. There could now be liability for the conspiracy even though the intended result was impossible. Section 1(1)(b) removes any problem concerning the existence of facts at the time of the agreement and, as a corollary, consequences which depend on the existence of those facts—for example, the production of cocaine. The subsection has nothing to say, however, about (a) other consequences, which do not depend on the existence of facts believed to exist by the defendants or (b) the existence of facts precluding the commission of the crime at the time it is to be carried out.

Consequences as part of the course of conduct

Suppose the defendants D1 and D2 agree to kill V by putting poison in his tea. This, surely, must be conspiracy to murder; but the act of putting poison in the tea will not necessarily result in murder. V may decide not to drink it. So, if the law treats the ‘course of conduct’ as merely putting poison in the tea, it is not conspiracy to murder—which is absurd.²⁴⁹ Subsection (1)(b) has nothing to say on the matter because there is no question of impossibility. To avoid the absurdity, ‘course of conduct’ must be read to include the intended consequences—in this case, the death of V.²⁵⁰

Circumstances as part of the course of conduct

In determining whether conspiracy is committed, we have to look forward from the time of the agreement—will the agreed course of conduct necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence? Circumstances change. The commission of the offence may be perfectly possible at the time of the agreement and become impossible by the time it is to be performed. Where this may happen, how can we say that the pursuance of the course of conduct will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence? Defendants agree to receive certain goods next Monday, which they know to be stolen; but, before next Monday, the goods may cease to be stolen goods by being restored to lawful custody. D1 and D2 may agree to marry next Tuesday, knowing that D1’s wife is alive; but, before next Tuesday, she may die. These events may be unlikely, but they are possible, and therefore it cannot be said that the receipt of the goods or the going through with the marriage ceremony will necessarily amount to, or involve, the offences of handling stolen goods and bigamy respectively. If the contemplated receipt of the goods, or the marriage ceremony, is the 'course of conduct', the agreements do not amount to conspiracy to handle or commit bigamy.²⁵¹ Clearly, they ought to do so.

²⁴⁹ It would be conspiracy to attempt to commit murder, since putting poison in the tea necessarily amounts to an attempt. The Criminal Attempts Act 1981 does not rule out the possibility of such an offence, but it is a strange concept. An agreement to attempt to do something is, in practical terms, an agreement to do it. See LCCP 183, para 4.19. See LC 318, Part 3.

²⁵⁰ This argument is discussed in full in Ormerod (2006) 59 CLP 185 and by Smith in [1977] Crim LR at 601–602. See also G Williams (1977) 127 NLJ 1164 at 1165 and see LCCP 183, para 4.19.

The obvious way out of this difficulty is to construe 'course of conduct' to include material circumstances which the parties believe will (not may) exist. There are two difficulties about this approach. First, under s 1(2) of the Act (discussed later) a person is not guilty of conspiracy unless he 'intends or knows' that circumstances necessary for the commission of the offence shall or will exist at the time when the conduct constituting the offence is to take place.²⁵² In the examples just given, D cannot 'know' that the circumstances will exist because, as we have seen, they may not do so. This was confirmed in Saik,²⁵³ where the House of Lords held that it is not enough that D 'believes'²⁵⁴ that the circumstances will exist; knowledge requires true belief. In the case of a conspiracy in relation to a future event this will not always be possible to prove. For example, if D1 and D2 are charged with conspiring to handle stolen goods, if they are to receive the goods at a future date, they cannot, at the time of the agreement, know that the goods will be stolen. That is a future circumstance. They may be guilty if they can be shown to have intended that the goods they will handle were to be stolen goods. It seems strange to say that D1 and D2 'intend' that they shall exist when the pair have, and know they have, no control over their existence.²⁵⁵ The circumstance may, however, be held to be intended because it is part of an intended result.

The second difficulty, which applies to both consequences and circumstances, arises following the amendment made by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, which added s 1(1)(b). If 'course of conduct' includes the circumstances believed by the parties to exist, this provision is entirely unnecessary. It is necessary only if the narrow *Nock*²⁵⁶ interpretation of 'course of conduct' is right. Arguably, by enacting s 1(1)(b) Parliament has accepted that interpretation, but taken the sting out of it so far as impossibility at the time of the agreement is concerned. The trouble with this approach is that it leaves other stings elsewhere. However, the argument that 'course of conduct' must include intended consequences and foreseen circumstances is so compelling that s 1(1)(b) might reasonably be regarded as an 'avoidance of doubt' provision, strictly unnecessary, but there for the guidance of the unwary. Nock is a discredited, though not overruled,²⁵⁷ decision on the common law and should not be applied in interpreting the 1977 Act.

The Law Commission recommended that a conspirator must be shown to have intended that the conduct element of the offence, and (where relevant) the consequence element (or other consequences), should respectively be engaged in or brought about.²⁵⁸

Conditional agreements

The question of conditional agreements requires separate consideration, particularly in the light of s 1(1) of the Act.²⁵⁹ The parties may agree on alternative courses of action depending on the existence of some fact to be ascertained or some event which may or may not happen.

It seems settled that there will be a conspiracy where the parties' objective is to commit a crime—but not if it proves too difficult or too dangerous—as where D1 and D2 agree that ²⁵¹ They might be conspiracies to attempt. See LCCP 183, Part 7. ²⁵² See p 456.

²⁵³ [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998. The decision prompted the government to refer the subject to the Law Commission: LCCP 183, para 1.20. Since the decision and the Court of Appeal's clarification of the approach in Suchedina, n 237, it seems not to have given rise to problems in practice. See LC 318, Part 4.

²⁵⁴ Lord Nicholls at [26]; Lord Hope at [78], cf Lord Brown at [119]; nor of suspicion: Lord Nicholls at [30].

²⁵⁵ For a further discussion of 'intend or know', see Ormerod (2006) 59 CLP 185, and the 4th edition of this book at pp 220–222.

²⁵⁶ See p 445. ²⁵⁷ See p 447. ²⁵⁸ LC 318, para 2.56.

²⁵⁹ See Campbell (1982) 2 LS 77. See LCCP 183, Part 5, taking a different view of these categories.

they will abandon their intention to commit burglary if they find the house surrounded by police. They agree to commit the burglary only if it is safe. If they go through with the agreed conduct as intended they must, of necessity, commit burglary. The fact that an agreement to commit a crime is subject to express or implied reservation does not necessarily preclude liability for conspiracy.²⁶⁰

There are far more difficult aspects to conditional intentions.²⁶¹ If one of the courses of action agreed upon involves the commission of a crime and the other does not, is this a conspiracy to commit the crime? Can it be said that, if the agreement is carried out in accordance with their intentions, the course of conduct pursued will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence? Is not the agreement carried out in accordance with their intentions if, in the event, they take the non-criminal course? For example, D1 and D2 may agree that they will transfer money brought into their bureau de change even if it is criminal property. Is this an agreement to launder criminal property? What if, when it is delivered, the money is not from criminal activity and so is not criminal property after all? Can it be said that, if the agreement is carried out in accordance with their intentions, the course of conduct pursued will necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence?²⁶² This is a complex area and only an outline can be offered here by reference to scenarios involving the putative money launderers who agree to transfer monies brought into their bureau de change.²⁶³

Agreements to do 'x' if 'y'

If D1 and D2 declare 'we will transfer the money if it is non-criminal property', there is no declared intention about what course of conduct they would adopt if the money is illicit. This is not, it is submitted, sufficient to constitute an agreement to launder money. D1 and D2 have, implicitly, seen the risk that the money will be illicit, but have not declared an intention to deal with criminal money. It cannot be said that D1 and D2 have agreed on a course of conduct that will necessarily involve them in the commission of an offence if carried out in accordance with their intentions. In fact, acting in accordance with their declared intentions, all we can assert is that they will not commit a money laundering offence.²⁶⁴ The defendants' state of mind is declared only in relation to one possible eventuality.

Agreements to do 'x' only if 'y'

The money laundering duo might say: 'we will transfer the money only if the money is non-criminal property; if it is criminal we will not transfer it'.²⁶⁵ There is no intention to pursue a course of conduct that will necessarily involve the commission of an offence: there can be no liability for conspiracy.²⁶⁶ They differ significantly from the previous category because D1 and D2 have declared intentions as to their course of conduct in both eventualities: where y materializes and not.²⁶⁷

²⁶⁰ Mills (1963) 47 Cr App R 49, [1963] Crim LR 181, CCA, and commentary. Cf Hussein [1978] Crim LR 219, CA.

²⁶¹ For extensive analysis, see J Child, 'Understanding Ulterior Mens Rea: Future Conduct Intention is Conditional Intention' (2017) 76 CLJ 311. See p 203.

²⁶² See further Ormerod (2006) 59 CLP 185; Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998; we are grateful to Tony Shaw QC for the very many valuable discussions on this topic and conspiracy in general.

²⁶³ cf Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998. See LCCP 193 and LC 318, Part 2.

²⁶⁴ Kenneth Campbell in his useful analysis of the concepts describes these as 'non-comprehensive conditional intentions': Campbell (1982) 2 LS 77 at 84–85.

²⁶⁵ The courts got muddled with this in the theft and burglary cases in the 1970s, in particular Easom [1971] 2 QB 315. See also L Koffman, 'Conditional Intention to Steal' [1980] Crim LR 463 and J Parry, 'Conditional Intent: A Dissent' [1981] Crim LR 6. See also the cogent criticism by Campbell (1982) 2 LS 77 at 78–80.

²⁶⁶ Campbell calls these 'comprehensive conditional intentions', ibid.

²⁶⁷ As Lynch observes ('Further Comment' [1978] Crim LR 205), conditional intentions provide that 'if A then B, if not A then C', at 207.

Agreements to do 'x' even if 'y'

Our money launderers D1 and D2 might acknowledge that 'the monies involved in the business might be criminal, and agree to pursue such conduct even though some of the monies we transfer will be criminal property'. Their agreement could be reconstructed as one which includes a confirmed intention: 'we intend to pursue a course of conduct (transferring money) which is not criminal and if certain circumstances transpire (the money is criminal property), we intend nevertheless to pursue a course of conduct (transferring money)'. The agreement will, if completed in accordance with one of their intentions, necessarily involve the commission of a crime. Campbell calls these unconditional intentions. They are generally regarded as a form of direct intention.²⁶⁸

In Saik, members of the House took different approaches to conditional agreements,²⁶⁹ but the majority recognized that it had no part to play on the facts of that case as only suspicion and not intention was proved. Baroness Hale, dissenting, provided what is, it is submitted, a powerful example to support her conclusion that a conditional intention suffices for liability in a conspiracy. Where D1 and D2 consider having sex with a woman and agree that they will do so even if she turns out not to be consenting, they should be guilty of conspiracy since they have expressed an intent to rape.²⁷⁰ The complex issue of conditional intentions may need to be addressed in further detail on a future occasion if it arises directly.²⁷¹

Conditional agreements in the case law

The courts have been untroubled by these theoretical difficulties and have taken a broad-brush approach to conditional intention in a series of cases. In Reed,²⁷² D1 and D2 were guilty of conspiring to aid and abet suicide (as the offence was then drafted) where they agreed that D1 would visit suicidal individuals and either discourage or actively help them, depending on his assessment of the appropriate course of action. D1 and D2 have agreed on a course of conduct which if carried out in accordance with their intentions will necessarily involve an offence. The court held that the following hypothetical case is distinguishable: D1 and D2 agree to drive from London to Edinburgh in a time which can be achieved without exceeding the speed limits, but only if the traffic which they encounter is exceptionally light. In this example, as in Reed itself, the parties have apparently agreed that, in a certain event, they will commit a crime. The difference appears to be that exceeding the speed limit is only incidental to the main object of the agreement—getting from London to Edinburgh in a certain time. In Jackson,²⁷³ D1 and D2 agreed with D3 that D3, if convicted of the burglary for which he was on trial, should be shot in the leg so that the court would sentence him more leniently. They were guilty of conspiring to pervert the course of justice. This was an agreement that D1 and D2 intended to shoot D3 if he was convicted. D1 and D2 agreed on a course of conduct which if carried out in accordance with their intentions will necessarily involve an offence. In O'Hadhmaill,²⁷⁴ it was held that an agreement by IRA members during the period of the IRA ceasefire to make bombs with ²⁶⁸ The Law Commission regards these as forms of recklessness not conditional intention. But that seems doubtful. In recklessness D has awareness of a risk. Here, D has beyond mere awareness of the risk, and demonstrated a commitment to perform the conduct even if the risk eventuates. See LC 318, Part 2.

²⁶⁹ Lord Nicholls seems, strictly speaking, not to reject it outright, at [5]. Lord Brown finds it beguiling but reluctantly rejects it.

²⁷⁰ At [99]. See the rejection of this in LC 318, Part 2, para 2.115.

²⁷¹ The Law Commission considers the matter in detail in LCCP 183, Part 5 and LC 318, Part 2. See also Appendix B.

²⁷² [1982] Crim LR 819, CA. Cf O'Hadhmaill [1996] Crim LR 509, later.

²⁷³ [1985] Crim LR 442, CA. ²⁷⁴ [1996] Crim LR 509, CA. See LCCP 183, para 5.8.

a view to causing explosions, if, but only if, the ceasefire came to an end was a conspiracy to cause an explosion.²⁷⁵

11.3.3.3 The object of the conspiracy

An agreement to commit any offence is a conspiracy contrary to s 1 of the Act, triable on indictment.²⁷⁶

Summary offences

Proceedings for conspiracy to commit summary offences²⁷⁷ may be instituted only with consent of the DPP.²⁷⁸ The availability of trial on indictment for conspiracy to commit summary offences was introduced to meet the fear of²⁷⁹ 'social danger involved in the deliberate planning of offences on a widespread scale'.

Conspiracies to commit inchoate offences

Although technically possible, conspiracies to commit other inchoate offences would be rare and in principle ought to be treated with caution since the remoteness from the substantive offence is so significant.²⁸⁰ The matter is discussed in the Law Commission Report No 318.²⁸¹

Conspiracies to aid and abet

The Criminal Attempts Act 1981²⁸² makes it clear that there can be no attempt to aid and abet an offence but it leaves open the question whether there can be a conspiracy to do so.²⁸³ D1 and D2, knowing that E intends to commit a burglary, agree to leave a ladder in a place where it will assist him to do so. E is not a party to that agreement so is not a co-conspirator. If E uses the ladder and commits burglary, D1 and D2 will be guilty of aiding and abetting him to do so. Are they guilty of conspiracy to commit burglary? Conspiracy requires an agreement that will involve 'a course of conduct' amounting to or involving 'the commission of an offence'. If the course of conduct is placing the ladder, it seems clear that they are not guilty. Placing the ladder is not an attempt to aid and abet burglary, since the Criminal Attempts Act 1981²⁸⁴ makes it clear that this is not an offence known to the law. However, it is argued earlier²⁸⁵ that 'course of conduct' should be interpreted to include the ²⁷⁵ Sullivan suggests that the decision is useful in 'refut[ing] any notion that, in legal discourse, one can never be found to have knowledge of facts relating to the future'. But, does this overlook the fact that the decision is more readily if not equally explicable on the basis of future intentions without detracting from the orthodox view that one cannot know the future? See also J Parry, 'Conditional Intent: A Dissent' [1981] Crim LR 6. Cf LCCP 183, para 5.5. Arguably the agreement was subject to further necessary agreement of the parties as to whether the ceasefire had ended, and was not a concluded intention on the unusual facts of this case. Cf LC 318, para 2.112.

²⁷⁶ There is one exception: Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, s 242. Section 3 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875 is repealed by 1977 Act: s 5(11). See JC Smith [1977] Crim LR 638.

²⁷⁷ But cf s 5(6) which limits this.

²⁷⁸ Section 4(1) or, where prosecution for the summary offence itself so requires, that of the A-G: s 4(2). The Law Commission recommends abolishing that requirement: LC 318, para 4.35.

²⁷⁹ LC 76, para 1.85. The Commission refers to Blamires Transport Services Ltd [1964] 1 QB 278, as a typical example of the sort of case they had in mind. The conspiracy to contravene certain provisions of the Road Traffic Acts extended over two years and included a large number of offences, all triable only summarily.

²⁸⁰ It is an offence to conspire to attempt and to conspire to commit an offence under SCA 2007, ss 44–46.

²⁸¹ Part 3. ²⁸² Section 1(4)(b).

²⁸³ The question is discussed by JC Smith in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 21, 35–36 and 40–41. See also LC 318, Part 3.

²⁸⁴ See p 432. See the possible offences under the SCA 2007, p 485.

²⁸⁵ See p 447.

consequences intended to follow from the conduct agreed upon, including the action of a person not a party to the agreement—for example, V, who takes up poisoned tea left by D and E and drinks it. So it might be argued, consistently with that, that the course of conduct ought to include E's use of the ladder in committing burglary. If that should be accepted, the next question would be whether the burglary is 'the commission of any offence by one or more of the parties to the agreement'. E is not a party to the agreement, so the question becomes, do the words 'commission of any offence' include participation in the offence as a secondary party? Since all the parties to a conspiracy to commit an offence will be guilty of that offence if it is committed, but s 1(1) contemplates that it may be committed by only one of them, it is clear that 'commission' means commission by a principal. It is submitted, therefore, that an agreement to aid and abet an offence is not a conspiracy under the Act.

The previous paragraphs were approved by the Court of Appeal in Hollinshead.²⁸⁶ DD agreed to sell to X 'black boxes', devices for altering electricity meters to show that less electricity had been used than was the fact. They expected X to resell the devices to consumers of electricity for use in defrauding the electricity supplier. The House of Lords²⁸⁷ did not find it necessary to decide whether there could be a conspiracy to aid and abet and Lord Roskill said that it should be treated as open for consideration de novo if the question arises again. But there was clearly an agreement to aid and abet the consumers to commit offences under what was then s 2 of the Theft Act 1978²⁸⁸ against the electricity supplier. By upholding the conviction for conspiracy to defraud, the House implicitly²⁸⁹ decided that an agreement to aid and abet the consumers to commit an offence against the suppliers was not a statutory conspiracy.²⁹⁰ This, it is submitted, is the position under the Act. In Kenning,²⁹¹ Lord Phillips CJ confirmed this interpretation:

an agreement to aid and abet an offence is not in law capable of constituting a criminal conspiracy under section 1(1) of the 1977 Act.

The Supreme Court of Hong Kong in *Po Koon-tai*²⁹² has held, however, that there may be a common law conspiracy to aid and abet an offence.

Care may be needed where the allegation is that D has conspired to commit an offence that, although appearing to be a form of secondary liability, is in fact a statutory offence in its own right giving rise to liability as a principal offender for those who commit it (assisted suicide was a good example). In Dang,²⁹³ D and others were convicted on count 1 of a conspiracy, contrary to s 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977, to be concerned in the production of cannabis by another in contravention of s 4(2)(b) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. On appeal, it was argued that the 'course of conduct' for the conspiracy relied on by the prosecution was the importing and selling of hydroponic and other equipment. The defence argued that that course of conduct did not necessarily amount to or involve the commission of an offence because although they agreed to sell equipment they did not care whether it was used to produce cannabis. Their agreement was not to embark upon a course of conduct that necessarily would amount to or involve the commission of an offence under s 4(2)(b) of

²⁸⁶ [1985] 1 All ER 850 at 858, [1985] Crim LR 301, CA. ²⁸⁷ [1985] AC 975, HL.

²⁸⁸ The conduct in Hollinshead is now an offence under s 7 of the Fraud Act 2006.

²⁸⁹ If that agreement were a statutory conspiracy, it could not under the then prevailing (though now repealed) rule in Ayres, n 176, be a conspiracy to defraud.

²⁹⁰ See commentary on Hollinshead [1985] Crim LR 653 at 656.

²⁹¹ [2008] EWCA Crim 1534. ²⁹² [1980] HKLR 492.

²⁹³ [2014] EWCA Crim 348 in which the Court of Appeal, citing Hollinshead and Kenning, held that a mere agreement to sell equipment, one of the uses of which may be unlawful, cannot constitute a conspiracy. It has been cogently argued that there are differences between Dang and Kenning that the court ought to have considered in its analysis. See R Fortson [2014] Crim LR 675.

the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. The Court of Appeal held that the convictions were safe. The offence charged as a conspiracy was the making of the agreement to be concerned in the production of cannabis by others. There could be a lawful charge of conspiracy to commit the offence of 'being concerned in' the unlawful production of cannabis, contrary to s 4(2)(b) of the 1971 Act. It was distinct from aiding and abetting production which could not found a conspiracy charge: Kenning.²⁹⁴ For the purposes of the conspiracy charge, there had to be an agreement which, if carried into effect such that cannabis was produced by the use of the equipment sold with that intention, would necessarily involve the commission of the offence of being concerned in the production of cannabis.

Conspiracy and voluntary manslaughter

What is the position where there is an agreement by D1 and D2 to kill where D2 would have a defence of diminished responsibility on a charge of murder? If the killing is to be done by D1 it will be murder and so the agreement is a conspiracy to murder. If it is to be done by D2, D1 will still be guilty of murder by virtue of s 2(4) of the Homicide Act 1957.²⁹⁵ However if, as submitted earlier,²⁹⁶ 'commission of any offence' means commission as principal this appears to be a conspiracy to commit manslaughter.

11.3.3.4 An intention to agree

Clearly, if D1 is unaware that his conduct is being construed by D2 as an assent or agreement to a criminal proposal he will have no liability for conspiracy since he will not be intending to form the necessary agreement. It might be argued that there are two elements to this part of the mens rea. First, it must be shown that D intended to perform the acts/speak the words that were capable of constituting an offer or acceptance of the agreement. This provides a very limited scope for denial of mens rea, but this might succeed where D is so intoxicated that he uses language or actions without being aware of their likely interpretation.²⁹⁷ Secondly, the requirement of actus reus that there is an agreement suggests a corresponding mens rea requirement that D intentionally used conduct that he was aware might be understood to constitute an offer/acceptance in the non-contractual sense.²⁹⁸

11.3.3.5 Intention that the agreement will be carried out

Section 1 of the 1977 Act assumes the existence of an intention of the parties not merely to agree, but also to carry out their agreement. This is not surprising because the essence of conspiracy, like attempt, is the intent to cause the forbidden result. The Law Commission understood this well enough and their Report,²⁹⁹ the draft Bill and the Bill which was introduced into Parliament, also expressly required proof of intention. Unwisely, this provision was deleted from the Bill because it was thought too complex; but, in agreeing to the amendment, the Lord Chancellor stated that the speeches in Parliament had conceded that 'the law should require full intention and knowledge before conspiracy can be established'.³⁰⁰

²⁹⁴ [2008] EWCA Crim 1534.

²⁹⁵ See Ch 12.

²⁹⁶ See n 291.

²⁹⁷ The Law Commission has recommended that it should be possible for a defendant to deny that he or she possessed the fault element for conspiracy because of intoxication, whether voluntary or involuntary, even when the fault element in question is recklessness (or its equivalent): LC 318, para 2.164. In other words, the proposed offence will be treated as a specific intent offence even though it would be one of recklessness.

²⁹⁸ cf Prior [2004] EWCA Crim 1147, [2004] Crim LR 849 and commentary discussing the mens rea for an 'offer' to supply drugs.

²⁹⁹ LC 76, Report on Conspiracy and Criminal Law Reform (1976) paras 1.25–1.41. For the common law, see Mulcahy (1868) LR 3 HL 306 at 317, per Willes J. Yip Chiu-Cheung, p 459, assumes that a person is guilty of conspiracy at common law only if he intends to carry out the agreement. See per Lord Griffiths [1994] 2 All ER 924 at 928c.

³⁰⁰ HL, vol 379, col 55.

However, in Anderson,³⁰¹ Lord Bridge, in a speech with which all of the House agreed, said that it was sufficient that an alleged conspirator had agreed that the criminal course of conduct be pursued and that he would play his role, but that it was not necessary to prove in addition that he intended the crime to be committed.³⁰² Lord Bridge was concerned with cases like that of the owner of a car, D, who agrees with a gang to hire it to them for use in a robbery. D may be quite indifferent whether the robbery is committed or not. In that situation the gang members are certainly guilty of conspiracy for they do intend to carry out the robbery; and D is guilty of abetting the conspiracy by giving encouragement to its continuance. There was no need to dilute the requirement that the conspirators must intend the commission of a crime.³⁰³

In Anderson, D was convicted of conspiring with a number of others to enable one of them to escape from prison. D had agreed to supply diamond wire to cut bars. He had certainly intended to be a party to that agreement. But D said that he never intended the plan to be put into effect and believed that it could not possibly succeed. It was held that this was no defence. It was clear in that case that two or more of the alleged conspirators did intend to carry out the agreement, so D's conviction could have been upheld on the ground that he aided and abetted that conspiracy—which he undoubtedly did, encouraging the making or continuance of it by his offer to help.³⁰⁴

The decision that no intention need be proved on the part of one alleged principal offender in conspiracy would significantly alter the scope of the offence. If no intention needs to be proved on the part of conspirator A, then none needs to be proved on the part of another, B. But if A and B are the only parties, and neither has the intention that it should be carried out, how can there be a crime of conspiracy? A conspiracy which no one intends to carry out is an absurdity, if not an impossibility. Moreover, s 1(2)³⁰⁵ of the Act requires the conspirators to have intention or knowledge as to facts or circumstances constituting an offence, and it would be very remarkable indeed if intention or knowledge were required for the circumstances of the principal offence and not for its consequences.

It is submitted that Anderson should not be followed in this respect. It has been overlooked or ignored more than once by the Court of Appeal.³⁰⁶ In Edwards, where D had agreed to supply amphetamine but there was a possibility that he intended to supply ephedrine, it was held that the judge had rightly directed the jury that they could convict of conspiracy to supply amphetamine only if D intended to supply amphetamine—that is, it was not sufficient that D agreed to supply amphetamine unless he intended to carry out the agreement.

Anderson was distinguished in McPhillips,³⁰⁷ where the Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland, accepted the proposition in this book³⁰⁸ that s 1(1) of the 1977 Act³⁰⁹ assumes ³⁰¹ [1986] AC 27, [1985] Crim LR 651, HL, and commentary. See also PW Ferguson, 'Intention Agreement and Statutory Conspiracy' (1986) 102 LQR 26.

³⁰² It might be argued that D1 and D2 agreeing to the course of conduct is sufficient because if they intend that they can be inferred to intend its consequences—the offence. This is a very strained interpretation. Anderson is criticized in LCCP 183, paras 4.26–4.41. In LC 318 the Law Commission recommends that a conspirator must be shown to have intended that the conduct element of the offence, and (where relevant) the consequence element (or other consequences), should respectively be engaged in or brought about (para 2.56). See also LC 318, para 4.30.

³⁰³ Sections 44–46 of the SCA 2007 will now extend to deal with such cases.

³⁰⁴ See commentary on the decision of the Court of Appeal [1984] Crim LR 551, and, on conspiracy to aid and abet, p 451.

³⁰⁵ See p 456.

³⁰⁶ Edwards [1991] Crim LR 45, CA; Ashton [1992] Crim LR 667, CA; Harvey [1999] Crim LR 70, CA.

³⁰⁷ (1990) 6 BNIL. ³⁰⁸ See the 6th edition of this book, at p 259.

³⁰⁹ Art 9(1) of the Criminal Attempts and Conspiracy (Northern Ireland) Order 1983 is identical with s 1(1).

the existence of an intention of the parties to carry out the agreement. Lord Lowry CJ held that D, who had joined in a conspiracy to plant a bomb, timed to explode on the roof of a hall at 1 am when a disco would be at its height, was not a party to the conspiracy to murder of which his accomplices were guilty because, unknown to his accomplices, he intended to give a warning enabling the hall to be cleared. He did not intend that anyone should be killed. Anderson was distinguished relying on Lord Bridge's dictum that a 'perfectly respectable citizen' who joins in an agreement 'without the least intention of playing any part in the ostensibly agreed criminal objective but rather with the purpose of frustrating and exposing the objective of the other parties' is not guilty of conspiracy. The dictum may be correct³¹⁰ but hardly seems to fit McPhillips, whose convictions, arising out of the same facts, for conspiracy to cause explosions and offences under the Explosive Substances Act 1883, were upheld. He was rightly acquitted of conspiracy to murder as a principal offender simply because he lacked the required intention.

More debatable is the decision that he was not guilty as an abettor of the conspiracy to murder. He intentionally gave assistance or encouragement to what he knew to be a conspiracy to murder and that is normally sufficient for liability. This suggests that an intention to frustrate the object of the conspiracy is a special defence. There are clear public policy grounds for allowing such a defence, although any such withdrawal-type defence will need to be carefully prescribed in the context of inchoate liability.³¹¹ Arguably, it should be limited to conduct of the conspirator who serves unequivocal notice of withdrawal on his co-conspirators and seeks to nullify the effects of any overt acts he has performed as part of the conspiracy.³¹² It has been held that where D1 intends that the offence should be carried out, he is guilty of conspiracy although he had an ulterior motive to gather evidence of the criminal wrongdoing and expose it.³¹³ The Law Commission recommended that the defence of acting reasonably provided for by s 50 of the SCA 2007 should be applied to the offence of conspiracy.³¹⁴

The 1977 Act does not deal specifically with the case where E purports to conspire with D but has no intention of going through with the plan. The question was formerly of no practical importance because D could be convicted of an attempt to conspire, but the 1977 Act provides that there is no such offence. The point has not arisen in England but in some jurisdictions it has been decided that there is no conspiracy.³¹⁵ It might be argued that, looking at the facts objectively, there is such an agreement as (apart from the illegality) would be enforceable in the law of contract and that therefore there is an actus reus. D, who, with mens rea, has caused the actus reus should be guilty. An answer to this argument is that there is no actus reus unless E agrees in fact, that is, that an actual subjective agreement is required. If *Anderson*³¹⁶ is followed and E held to be guilty of conspiracy notwithstanding his lack of intention, the problem disappears.

³¹⁰ Edwards, n 306. But cf Yip Chiu-Cheung v R, p 459, and Somchai Liangsiriprasert v United States Government (1990) 92 Cr App R 77, PC at 82 where the Privy Council left open the question whether law enforcement officers who entered into an agreement to import drugs into the United States with the object of trapping the dealers should be regarded as conspirators. For valuable discussion on the liability of state officials, see A Ashworth, 'Testing Fidelity to Legal Values: Official Involvement and Criminal Justice' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 299, 324–325.

³¹¹ The Law Commission rejected a withdrawal defence in LC 318, paras 2.35–2.45.

³¹² cf the earlier discussion in relation to secondary withdrawal, p 225.

³¹³ Jones and Warburton [2002] EWCA Crim 735.

³¹⁴ LC 318, Part 6.

³¹⁵ Harris [1927] NPD 347 (South Africa); O'Brien [1954] SCR 666 (Canada); Delaney v State, 164 Tenn 432 (1932) (Tennessee); State v Otu [1964] NNLR 113 (Nigeria). Cf Thomson (1965) 50 Cr App R 1. See GHL Fridman in (1956) 19 MLR 276.

³¹⁶ See p 453.

11.3.3.6 Intention to play some part in carrying out the agreement

According to Lord Bridge in Anderson,³¹⁷ the mens rea of conspiracy is established:

if, and only if, it is shown that the accused, when he entered into the agreement, intended to play some part in the agreed course of conduct in furtherance of the criminal purpose which the agreed course of conduct was intended to achieve.

No authority was cited for this novel dictum and the Court of Appeal has subsequently held that Lord Bridge is not to be taken as saying what he plainly did say (above); the court in Siracusa said that participation in conspiracy can be active or passive and D's intention to participate 'is established by his failure to stop the unlawful activity'.³¹⁸ D's liability is, however, complete when he joins the agreement, intending that it be carried out, and his failure to stop it is, at most, evidence of his agreement and intention. In truth, O'Connor LJ in Siracusa appears to have been using this as a mechanism to circumvent Anderson.

It is submitted that the correct statement of the law is that there is nothing in the section, nor in the common law, to require for every conspirator to have an intention to participate personally in the carrying out of the full offence.³¹⁹ All that need be contemplated is the commission of the offence 'by one or more of the parties to the agreement'. So an agreement between A and B that A will supply a controlled drug to B is a conspiracy between them to supply the drug.³²⁰

Unforeseen but inevitable consequences

It is submitted that, notwithstanding Anderson, the parties must intend that at least one of them will pursue the course of conduct agreed upon. If so, they must be proved to have intended the foreseen consequences.³²¹ Exceptionally, the agreed course of conduct may be such that it will necessarily cause a consequence not foreseen by the parties. For example, they agree to inflict a particular type of bodily harm, not appreciating that it will necessarily cause death. On a literal interpretation of the Act they are guilty of conspiracy to murder. In principle, that would be a wrong result, because killing is not intended and possibly not even foreseen as a possibility. It is thought that, as in interpreting other aspects of the offence, the answer lies in the construction of 'course of conduct'.³²² This should be read not only to include the consequences which are intended by the parties, but also to be limited to such consequences, whether they will in fact necessarily result or not. This is justifiable because it is the agreed course of conduct that we are concerned with; and the agreement does not include causing death.

If D1 and D2 agree to cause grievous bodily harm to V they are guilty of conspiring to commit an offence under s 18 of the OAPA but they are not guilty of conspiracy to murder although, if they carry out their intention and consequently V dies, they will be guilty of ³¹⁷ [1986] AC 27 at 39, [1985] Crim LR 651, HL. Strangely, the Law Commission recommendations (para 2.45) endorsed this.

³¹⁸ Siracusa (1989) 90 Cr App R 340, [1989] Crim LR 712, CA; cf Chambers [2009] EWCA Crim 2742, following Anderson.

³¹⁹ In King [2012] EWCA Crim 805, Pitchford LJ noted the criticisms made in this section in the 12th edition but declined to enter into the debate about whether it is in fact necessary to prove an intention to play some part in the full offence being carried out.

³²⁰ Drew [2000] 1 Cr App R 91, [1999] Crim LR 581, CA. But an indictment alleging a conspiracy to supply 'another' will be taken to mean a conspiracy to supply someone other than the conspirators: cases cited in commentary at [1999] Crim LR 582.

³²¹ As noted earlier, Parliament deleted the provision in the Bill requiring an intention to cause any consequence which is an ingredient in the crime the parties are alleged to have conspired to commit.

³²² See p 445.

murder.³²³ Similarly, an agreement to behave with gross negligence towards V is not a conspiracy to commit manslaughter, even though the parties will be guilty of manslaughter if they carry out the agreement and kill V.³²⁴

11.3.3.7 Intention or knowledge as to circumstances

Section 1(2) of the Act provides:

Where liability for any offence may be incurred without knowledge on the part of the person committing it of any particular fact or circumstance necessary for the commission of the offence, a person shall nevertheless not be guilty of conspiracy to commit that offence by virtue of subsection (1) above unless he and at least one other party to the agreement intend or know that the fact or circumstance shall or will exist at the time when the conduct constituting the offence is to take place.

The provision is intended to reflect the general principle that elements of mens rea in inchoate offences ought not to be diluted since that mens rea often forms the core of the wrongdoing in the absence of any tangible harm resulting from the actus reus. The aim of this section is to ensure that even if strict liability and recklessness as to circumstances are sufficient mens rea for the substantive crime, these are to have no place in conspiracy. Intention or knowledge as to all the circumstances of the actus reus is required even where the agreement is to commit a crime which in its substantive form may be committed recklessly, or is a crime of strict liability or one committed on the basis of D's suspicion or negligence.³²⁵ Although the aim of s 1(2) is clear enough, a number of problems arise in its interpretation. These were addressed by the House of Lords in Saik.³²⁶

Scope of application

First, there is no express provision in s 1(1) requiring intention or knowledge as to circumstances. Section 1(2) is expressed to apply only to those conspiracies which involve an offence which in its substantive form has an element of strict liability as to a circumstance or requires only recklessness as to a circumstance. A strict interpretation would lead to the conclusion that the section does not apply where the conspiracy alleged is one involving a substantive crime in which there is a requirement of intention or knowledge (and not mere recklessness) as to a circumstance.³²⁷ In Saik,³²⁸ the House of Lords accepted that Parliament could not have intended a scandalous paradox³²⁹ whereby the requirement of mens rea should be greater on a charge of conspiring to commit an offence of strict liability or recklessness than on a charge of conspiring to commit an offence requiring knowledge.³³⁰ Despite the unequivocal terms in which the House of Lords held that the mens rea ³²³ For an argument to the contrary, see 4th edition of this book, at pp 222–223 and [1977] Crim LR 638–639. Cf Williams (1977) 127 NLJ at 1169 and Williams, TBCL (1st edn, 1978) 357–359.

³²⁴ A conspiracy to commit manslaughter seems a theoretical possibility in the case of a suicide pact or where the party to do the killing is suffering from diminished responsibility. See p 548.

³²⁵ The Law Commission proposed to reverse this position. Two provisions are recommended. Where the agreement relates to a substantive offence for which fault as to circumstances is strict liability or negligence an alleged conspirator must be shown at the time of the agreement to have been merely reckless whether a circumstance element of a substantive offence (or other relevant circumstance) would be present at the relevant time (LC 318, para 2.137). Where the agreement relates to a substantive offence with fault requirements not involving mere negligence (or its equivalent), in relation to a fact or circumstance element, an alleged conspirator may be found guilty if shown to have possessed those fault requirements at the time of his or her agreement to commit the offence (para 2.146). The intention was to simplify the law.

³²⁶ [2006] UKHL 18, [2007] 1 AC 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

³²⁷ Elliott [1978] Crim LR 204; LCCP 183, para 4.65.

³²⁸ Lord Nicholls at [18].

³²⁹ Elliott, n 327.

³³⁰ Smith [1977] Crim LR 606; Williams (1977) 127 NLJ 1166. See LCCP 183, paras 4.45 et seq.

as to circumstances must be knowledge and nothing less, Thomas demonstrates that errors are still made.³³¹ In that case D was charged with conspiracy to possess criminal property. The substantive offence requires knowledge or suspicion as to circumstances, namely that the property is criminal property. The judge directed the jury that on a charge of conspiring to possess criminal property, suspicion as to that circumstance element would suffice. The Crown conceded that this was an error and the Court of Appeal quashed D's conviction, with Davis LJ commenting that he 'hoped this sort of thing would not happen again'.

What constitutes knowledge?

The knowledge required relates to the fact or circumstance which must be proved as part of the actus reus.³³² The full reading of s 1(2) might be, though it is unclear, that the parties are not liable for conspiracy to commit any crime where the actus reus includes proof of a circumstance which they do not know exists or intend will exist. In Saik, the House of Lords confirmed that within s 1(2) the requirement of 'knowledge' or 'intention' as to the fact or circumstances necessary for the commission of the substantive offence is not to be diluted. Knowledge is not satisfied by proof of 'belief'³³³ nor of suspicion.³³⁴ These states of mind will not suffice for the conspiracy even if they would for the substantive offence. In this respect, the offence of conspiracy is stricter than that of attempt where the courts have accepted that recklessness as to circumstances is a sufficient mens rea where that would suffice for the substantive crime attempted.³³⁵

What are the 'facts or circumstances' which must be known?

Suppose that D1 agrees to help D2 move out of his flat. D2 is unsure whether the cabling he has installed for his satellite TV belongs to him or to his landlord. D1 and D2 confer together and are uncertain, but agree, nevertheless, to remove it knowing their actions will result in damage in the process. They therefore have an intention to cause damage, and are reckless as to whether the property belongs to another. The substantive offence of criminal damage requires that D intends or is reckless as to the causing of damage (the result), and that D knows or is reckless as to whether the property belongs to another (circumstance).³³⁶ If D1 and D2 went ahead, they would have sufficient mens rea to be convicted of the substantive offence. As for the conspiracy, in the actual circumstances that exist, the carrying out of the agreement 'will necessarily amount' to criminal damage; but on an orthodox reading of s 1(2), it is not a conspiracy to commit criminal damage. It would not be criminal damage in the circumstances which the parties intend, or know, shall or will exist. D1 and D2 are reckless as to the circumstance. Recklessness as to the circumstance of the actus reus (property belonging to another) is not a sufficient mens rea on a charge of conspiracy to commit a crime (criminal damage) even where it is a sufficient mens rea for the crime itself. If the Law Commission recommendations are accepted, the law will extend considerably. It is submitted that the law would be overbroad.

For s 1(2) to apply there must be a fact or circumstance in the actus reus on which liability in the substantive offence is strict, based on negligence or for which D's recklessness suffices.³³⁷ This has caused problems. For example, in a series of cases involving conspiracies

³³¹ [2014] EWCA Crim 1958.

³³² See, generally, S Shute, 'Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law' (at 187) and GR Sullivan, 'Knowledge, Belief and Culpability' (at 215) in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, Chs 8 and 9 respectively.

³³³ Lord Nicholls at [26], Lord Hope at [78]; cf Lord Brown at [119]. ³³⁴ Lord Nicholls at [30].

³³⁵ Khan (1990) 91 Cr App R 29, [1990] Crim LR 519, CA, p 417. LCCP 183, paras 4.145 et seq.

³³⁶ Smith (David Raymond) [1974] QB 354, [1974] Crim LR 101, CA. See p 1075.

³³⁷ This is discussed in full in Ormerod (2006) 59 CLP 185.

to commit criminal damage being reckless as to whether life is endangered,³³⁸ the Court of Appeal has held that it is sufficient to establish recklessness (rather than knowledge) on the part of the conspirators. These cases were based on the false assumption that the substantive offence requires proof of a fact that life is endangered. It does not: Parker.³³⁹ Since life endangerment is not 'a circumstance' that needs to exist for the full offence, it is unnecessary in a conspiracy to prove that DD 'knew of' or intended it.³⁴⁰

Conspiring to import prohibited drugs

The offences of evading the prohibition on the importation of drugs come within s 1(2).³⁴¹ They are offences for which liability may be incurred without knowledge on the part of the defendant that the drug was of a particular class. For the substantive offence, it is sufficient that D knew the goods were subject to a prohibition on importation. If he is charged with importing pethidine (a Class A drug—penalty, life imprisonment) it is no defence that he believed the drug to be pemoline (a Class C drug—penalty, five years). But the fact that the drug was in fact pethidine is, of course, a fact necessary for the commission of the offence. On a charge of conspiracy, it must be proved that the defendant and at least one other party intended or knew that that fact should or would exist.³⁴² An indictment for conspiracy to import 'prohibited drugs' is different. It embraces agreements to import Class A, B and C drugs and, as these are different offences carrying different penalties, it appears at first sight to allege three distinct conspiracies. But s 1, defining statutory conspiracy, speaks of 'any offence or offences' and s 3 provides that, where the penalties for the substantive offences differ, the maximum for the conspiracy is the longer or longest of these.³⁴³

³³⁸ Mir (1994) 22 Apr; Browning (1998) unreported; Ryan (1999) The Times, 13 Oct.

³³⁹ [1993] Crim LR 856, CA.

³⁴⁰ See Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998. There are two arguments that these cases are not wrongly decided. First, they were all heard at a time when Caldwell recklessness was a sufficient mens rea for criminal damage. As such, although the offence did not require proof of a circumstance of a life being endangered, it did require proof of the reasonable person's awareness of a risk of life endangerment. That it is said could be a 'circumstance' in the substantive offence for which D must be held to have knowledge for the charge of conspiracy. Secondly, since G [2004] 1 AC 1034, [2004] Crim LR 369, HL, the mens rea as to the endangerment of life is subjective. Arguably, however, there is still an 'objective circumstance' that must exist because even in a case of subjective recklessness, there must be proof that D 'unreasonably' took the risk he foresaw.

³⁴¹ See p 458.

³⁴² Siracusa [1989] Crim LR 712, CA and commentary. In Patel (89/4351/S1, CA, 7 Aug 1991), Archbold, para 34-16, it was said that an agreement to deal with a drug believing it to be of a higher class than was in fact the case would be a conspiracy to deal in the drug of the lower class. That seems irreconcilable with s 1(2). But the parties appear to be guilty of a conspiracy to deal with the drugs of the higher class! The commission of the offence is impossible, but that is immaterial. See further Taylor (RJ) [2002] Crim LR 203 and commentary, and 301; Hussain [2002] EWCA Crim 6, [2002] Crim LR 407 and commentary; Hanif [2012] EWCA Crim 1968. In Ayala [2003] EWCA Crim 2047, Buxton LJ approved a line of reasoning found in Siracusa (1989) 90 Cr App Rep 340, [1989] Crim LR 712, CA; Patel (1991) 7 Aug, unreported, and Taylor and others [2001] EWCA Crim 1044, [2002] Crim LR 205. Buxton LJ said the effect of those decisions was that where a conspiracy identified in its particulars a named controlled drug, it must be proved against any defendant either: (a) that he knew the agreement related to the particular drug mentioned in the indictment; or (b) that it related to a drug of the same class, without any knowledge or belief as to it involving any particular drug; or (c) believed that it related to another particular drug of the same class or a class attracting a greater penalty; or (d) believed it related to a drug of a class attracting a greater maximum penalty without belief as to particular drug; or (e) not to have cared at all what particular drug was involved. See Hanif [2012] EWCA Crim 1968, [14].

³⁴³ Conspiracy thus appears to be a statutory exception to the rule in Courtie [1984] AC 463, that, when Parliament provides that an offence shall be more severely punishable when a particular fact is present, it necessarily creates two offences. See also the interesting decision of the Privy Council in Karpavicius [2002] UKPC 59 construing the New Zealand drugs legislation, although the ruling turns largely on the particular statutory words in s 6(2A)(c) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1975 (NZ) which are not present in the English legislation. See also J Evans, 'Dilemma of Proof and the Extension of Criminal Statutes' [2003] Crim LR 181.

Where only one party has mens rea

Section 1(2) makes it clear that, so far as the relevant circumstances are concerned, both parties to the agreement (or, where there are more than two parties, at least two of them) must have mens rea. If D1 and D2 agree to touch V sexually and D1 knows that she is only 15, there is no conspiracy if D2 reasonably believes that she is 16.

The Law Commission's rejected subsection from 1976 would have made similar provision for foresight of consequences, but there is no such provision in the Act. If, however, 'course of conduct' is construed, as suggested previously, to include intended consequences, and only intended consequences, the result is the same. As Lord Griffiths said in Yip Chiu-Cheung,³⁴⁴ 'The crime of conspiracy requires an agreement between two or more persons to commit an unlawful act with the intention of carrying it out. It is the intention to carry out the crime that constitutes the mens rea of the offence.' If D1 intends death and D2 intends grievous bodily harm, this is a conspiracy to cause grievous bodily harm but not a conspiracy to murder.

Ignorance of criminal law no defence

There is no requirement that DD have knowledge of the relevant criminal law which renders their proposed conduct illegal.³⁴⁵

11.3.4 Procedural issues relating to conspiracies

11.3.4.1 Conspiracy where the contemplated offence is committed

The courts discourage the charging of conspiracy where there is evidence of the complete crime.³⁴⁶ However, one attraction of conspiracy charges is that evidence is admissible on a conspiracy charge which would not be admissible on a joint trial for the complete crime.³⁴⁷ The real objections to conspiracy being charged reflect a concern expressed by Williams.³⁴⁸ It is:

to the use of a conspiracy count to give a semblance of unity to a prosecution which, by combining a number of charges and several defendants, results in a complicated and protracted trial. The jury system is unworkable unless the prosecution is confined to a relatively simple issue which can be disposed of in a relatively short time.³⁴⁹

The length and complexity of trials for conspiracy raise doubts whether justice can be done.³⁵⁰

In Dosanjh,³⁵¹ the Court of Appeal held that it does not infringe the principle enunciated in Rimmington for the Crown to charge an individual with the statutory conspiracy

³⁴⁴ [1994] 2 All ER 924 at 928, [1994] Crim LR 824, PC.

³⁴⁵ Churchill v Walton [1967] 2 AC 224, HL; Broad [1997] Crim LR 666, CA.

³⁴⁶ Cockburn CJ, in Boulton (1871) 12 Cox CC 87 at 93. West [1948] 1 KB 709, CCA at 720, and see Gray and others [1995] 2 Cr App R 100, CA, sub nom Liggins [1995] Crim LR 45.

³⁴⁷ For a discussion of the circumstances in which conspiracy should not be charged, see P Jarvis and M Bisgrove, 'The Use and Abuse of Conspiracy' [2014] Crim LR 261. In Dady [2013] EWHC 475 (QB), applying Rimmington [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153, it was held that where an agreement could be charged as a statutory conspiracy or as a conspiracy to defraud it should ordinarily be charged as a statutory conspiracy unless there is good reason to charge conspiracy to defraud instead.

³⁴⁸ CLGP, 684; and see The Proof of Guilt (3rd edn, 1963) Ch 9 and 'The Added Conspiracy Count' (1978) 128 NLJ 24.

³⁴⁹ See also the speech of Lord Hope in Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

³⁵⁰ eg the Jubilee Line Fraud. See S Lloyd Bostock, 'The Jubilee Line Jurors: Does their Experience Strengthen the Argument for Judge-Only Trial in Long and Complex Fraud Cases?' [2007] Crim LR 255.

³⁵¹ [2013] EWCA Crim 2366.

to commit the common law offence of cheating the Revenue in circumstances where a substantive statutory offence was available.

Acquittal of the other alleged conspirators

Where D was alleged to have conspired with one other person, E, the acquittal of E, either before or after the trial of D, is no bar to, or ground for quashing, as the case may be, the conviction of D.³⁵² This is so whether tried separately or together:³⁵³ see s 5(8) and (9) of the 1977 Act.

There may be evidence—usually a confession, but not necessarily so³⁵⁴—which is admissible against D but not against E, which shows that D conspired with E. In these circumstances, it is perfectly logical for the jury to be satisfied, as against D, that he conspired with E but not satisfied, as against E, that he conspired with D. It is only when the evidence against D and E is of equal weight, or nearly so, that the judge should direct the jury that they must either acquit both or convict both—being careful to add that, if they are unsure about the guilt of one, both must be acquitted.³⁵⁵ The difficult question for the judge remains in deciding whether there is a sufficient inequality between the weight of the cases against each conspirator. The required degree of difference has been explained as ‘marked’³⁵⁶ or ‘substantial’.³⁵⁷ Ultimately, the question would seem to be whether the difference is sufficient to displace a juror’s reasonable doubt that they might otherwise have had. There is nothing to prevent the conviction of one conspirator at a retrial where his co-conspirator was acquitted at the original trial.³⁵⁸

11.3.4.2 Jurisdiction

The situation where there is an agreement in England to commit an offence abroad is now regulated by s 1A³⁵⁹ of the Criminal Law Act 1977. The section applies where the pursuit of the agreed course of conduct would involve an act by one or more of the parties, or the happening of some event, in a place outside England and Wales which (a) would be an offence by the law of that place, and (b) would be an offence triable here but for the fact that it was committed abroad. Then, if, in England or Wales (a) a person became a party to the agreement, or (b) a party to the agreement did anything in relation to it before its formation, or did or omitted anything in pursuance of it, the agreement is indictable as a conspiracy, contrary to s 1(1) of the 1977 Act.³⁶⁰ In the Crown Court the question is to be treated as one of law to be decided by the judge. This is a significant extension of the scope of the already broad-reaching offence of conspiracy.³⁶¹ It is indicative of Parliament’s approach ³⁵² DPP v Shannon [1975] AC 717, [1975] Crim LR 703, HL. See Zaman [2010] EWCA Crim 209, [2010] Crim LR 574 (Ch 7). See also CW Coulter, ‘The Unnecessary Rule of Consistency in Conspiracy Trials’ (1986) 135 U Pa L Rev 223.

³⁵³ ibid. D1 and D2 can be tried even if D3 has been acquitted earlier: Austin [2011] EWCA Crim 345.

³⁵⁴ See Testouri [2003] EWCA Crim 3735, [2004] Crim LR 372.

³⁵⁵ Longman and Cribben (1981) 72 Cr App R 121, CA, [1981] Crim LR 38 and commentary. Cf the similar problem which arises with secondary parties, p 222. Roberts (1984) 78 Cr App R 41, [1985] Crim LR 218, CA.

³⁵⁶ Longman at p 125. ³⁵⁷ Roberts at p 47.

³⁵⁸ James [2002] EWCA Crim 1119; Austin [2011] EWCA Crim 345.

³⁵⁹ Inserted by the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 and amended by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, s 72. See also C Campbell, ‘Two Steps Backwards: The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998’ [1999] Crim LR 941; J Holroyd, ‘The Reform of Jurisdiction over International Conspiracy’ (2000) 64 J Crim L 323. See further LCCP 183, Part 11; LC 318, Part 7.

³⁶⁰ There is, in effect, a presumption that the act or event is an offence by the foreign law unless the defence gives notice that, in their opinion, for which they must show grounds, it is not, and requires the prosecution to prove it: s 1A(8).

³⁶¹ Section 1A is not an offence in its own right: Patel [2009] EWCA Crim 67, [2009] Crim LR 466. In Bina [2014] EWCA Crim 1444, [2015] Crim LR 287, D argued that he ought to have been charged under s 1A, but the court rejected this argument on the basis that at all material times he was in the UK.

to extending the scope of the criminal law beyond the physical limits of the jurisdiction in general.³⁶²

The 1977 Act makes no express provision for agreements abroad to commit an offence in England. It has been clear since 1973³⁶³ that, at common law, an agreement abroad to commit a crime in England is indictable here if an overt act is done in England in pursuance of the agreement. The Privy Council held in *Somchai Liangsiriprasert v United States Government*³⁶⁴ that it is unnecessary to prove that any overt act was done in England. The only purpose of requiring an overt act could be to establish the link between the conspiracy and England or to show that the conspiracy was continuing and any other evidence that establishes this is just as good.

Agreements abroad to commit offences abroad deserve a brief mention. D1 and D2, British citizens in France, agree to kill V in France or to go through a ceremony of marriage there both knowing that D1 is married. The offences contemplated are triable in England even if committed in France so, literally, these are indictable conspiracies under the Act. It may be, however, that the presumption against the extraterritorial application of the criminal law will exclude agreements not made within the jurisdiction and not intended to have any effect therein, but this seems less likely after Liangsiriprasert.³⁶⁵

The Law Commission made proposals on jurisdiction which would, if enacted, bring the law for conspiracy broadly into line with that for assisting and encouraging under the SCA 2007, as discussed later.³⁶⁶

11.3.5 Common law conspiracies

All common law conspiracies require proof of an agreement as considered in relation to statutory conspiracies discussed earlier.

11.3.5.1 Conspiracy to defraud

This offence³⁶⁷ is one of the most controversial in English criminal law, and there has been sustained pressure for its abolition.³⁶⁸ It is excessively broad, vague and potentially criminalizes conduct by two or more that would not be criminal or even tortious when performed by an individual. It offends against the principles of legality, certainty and fair warning, and results in an offence which is commonly defined by reference only to the concept of dishonesty—a concept that is ill-suited to shoulder that responsibility.³⁶⁹ The Law Commission has ³⁶² See generally Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law, 142–148 for critical analysis of the provisions.

³⁶³ DPP v Doot [1973] AC 807, [1973] Crim LR 292, HL.

³⁶⁴ (1990) 92 Cr App R 77, PC (a case of extradition from Hong Kong to the United States, but applying the common law of England), followed in Sansom [1991] 2 All ER 145, [1991] Crim LR 126, CA where, however, one of the conspirators had acted in England in pursuance of the conspiracy. Somchai was applied in Re Goatley [2002] EWHC 1209 (Admin) to a case of cannabis importation. For discussion see LC 318, para 7.53.

³⁶⁵ cf the corresponding problem in attempts, p 433.

³⁶⁶ See LC 318, Part 7.

³⁶⁷ See Smith, Property Offences, Ch 19; C Montgomery and D Ormerod (eds), Fraud: Criminal Law and Procedure (2008) Ch D7; Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft. For an historical account see T Hadden, 'Conspiracy to Defraud' (1966) 24 CLJ 248. See also JC Smith, 'Fraud and the Criminal Law' in P Birks (ed), Pressing Problems in the Law (1995) vol 1, 49.

³⁶⁸ See for discussion Law Commission Working Papers No 56 (1974) and 104 (1988) and ATH Smith, 'Conspiracy to Defraud' [1988] Crim LR 508; LC 228, Conspiracy to Defraud (1994) and JC Smith, 'Conspiracy to Defraud: Some Comments on the Law Commission's Report' [1995] Crim LR 209. The Law Commission offered a defence of its approach: S Silber, 'The Law Commission, Conspiracy to Defraud and the Dishonesty Project' [1995] Crim LR 461, and see JC Smith, Letter [1995] Crim LR 519.

³⁶⁹ See the discussion below in Ch 18. As noted by the Law Commission in LCCP 155, Legislating the Criminal Code: Fraud and Deception (1999) in rejecting the idea of an offence based on an element of dishonesty because of anxiety that it would not be compatible with Art 7. See also D Ormerod, 'A Bit of a Con' [1999] Crim LR 789.

commented that the offence is 'so wide that it offers little guidance on the difference between fraudulent and lawful conduct'.³⁷⁰ Even the Home Office acknowledged that the offence was 'arguably unfairly uncertain and wide enough potentially to encompass sharp business practice'.³⁷¹ The Commission's conclusion was that the offence should be abolished with the implementation of the Fraud Act, but the government was insistent that conspiracy to defraud was to be retained as a safeguard against lacunae being revealed in the new scheme.³⁷²

Following the enactment of the Fraud Act 2006, a prosecutor should only select a charge of conspiracy to defraud having had regard to the Attorney General's guidelines. These provide that, in selecting charges in fraud cases, the prosecutor should first consider: whether the behaviour could be prosecuted under statute—whether under the Fraud Act 2006 or another Act or as a statutory conspiracy; and whether the available statutory charges adequately reflect the gravity of the offence. Statutory conspiracy to commit a substantive offence should be charged if the alleged agreement satisfies the definition in s 1 of the Criminal Law Act 1977,³⁷³ provided that there is no wider dishonest objective that would be important to the presentation of the prosecution case in reflecting the gravity of the case.³⁷⁴

Scope of the offence

It was stated by the House of Lords in *Scott v Metropolitan Police Comr*³⁷⁵ that:

it is clearly the law that an agreement by two or more by dishonesty to deprive a person of something which is his or to which he is or would be or might be entitled^[376] and an agreement by two or more by dishonesty to injure some proprietary right of his, suffices to constitute the offence of conspiracy to defraud.³⁷⁷

In Scott, D agreed with the employees of cinema owners that in return for payment they would abstract films without the consent of their employers, or of the owners of the copyright, in order that D might make copies infringing the copyright, and distribute them for profit.

It was held that D was guilty of a conspiracy to defraud. It was held to be immaterial that no one was deceived; the offence is one of defrauding. Although the well-known definition of 'defraud' by Buckley J in *Re London and Globe Finance Corpn Ltd*³⁷⁸ includes a reference to deceit ('to defraud is by deceit to induce a course of action'), there can be fraud without deceit. For example, larceny was an offence which had to be committed 'fraudulently', but deceit has never been a necessary ingredient of theft.

³⁷⁰ LC 276, Fraud (2002) para 1.6.

³⁷¹ See Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Consultation on Proposals for Legislation (2004) para 6. For comment, see P Binning, 'When Dishonesty is Not Enough' (2004) 154 NLJ 1042 and the references cited in Ch 22.

³⁷² See for detailed comment, Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, paras 5.65 et seq. HM Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate, Review of the Investigation and Criminal Proceedings relating to the Jubilee Line Case (2006): para 11.88. The Ministry of Justice Post-Legislative Assessment of the Fraud Act 2006 has concluded that the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud works satisfactorily with the Fraud Act 2006.

³⁷³ See Dady [2013] EWHC 475 (QB).

³⁷⁴ Available at www.gov.uk/use-of-the-common-law-offence-of-conspiracy-to-defraud-6.

³⁷⁵ [1975] AC 819, [1975] Crim LR 94, HL.

³⁷⁶ In Tarling v Government of the Republic of Singapore (1980) 70 Cr App R 77, [1978] Crim LR 490, HL the House of Lords by a majority held that the intention of company directors to make and retain a secret profit for which they would have been accountable to the shareholders was not evidence of an intention to defraud. See, however, JC Smith, 'Theft, Conspiracy and Jurisdiction: Tarling's Case' [1979] Crim LR 220 at 225–226. In Adams v R [1995] 1 WLR 52, PC, the court seems to have been of the view that, even if the agreement to make and retain the secret profit is not an offence, the agreement to take positive steps to conceal it is. See commentary [1995] Crim LR 561, 562.

³⁷⁷ Per Viscount Dilhorne at 1039.

³⁷⁸ [1903] 1 Ch 728 at 732, 733.

There are two versions of the offence of conspiracy to defraud. The most commonly encountered is that involving dishonest agreements relating to property.³⁷⁹ In neither version of the offence is it necessary for the alleged co-conspirators to have met. The Court of Appeal in Cook stated that, 'It is not a requirement of a criminal conspiracy that the co-conspirators have met to devise their plan, or that any individual participant is aware of the identities of any of the others who are involved.'³⁸⁰

Defrauding by imperilling economic interests

In Evans,³⁸¹ Hickinbottom J, as he then was, preferred to describe the offence in terms of 'a proprietary right or interest of the victim [being] actually or potentially injured'³⁸² rather than by using the expression 'economic prejudice' which in his lordship's view 'has the potential for obfuscating the true requirement'.³⁸³ It is respectfully submitted, however, that that may be an unduly narrow definition. The House of Lords in Scott held that it was sufficient that proprietary rights or interests were to be affected by D's dishonest agreement; it did not hold that there had to be injury or potential injury to property. Moreover, the Law Commission in its Report No 276 catalogued those forms of conduct that are capable of being prosecuted only as conspiracy to defraud,³⁸⁴ and these include examples in which there is no proprietary interest that is injured. Further, several cases demonstrate that the scope of the offence clearly includes cases where the agreement is to do an act that would not injure a property interest of the victim. In Button,³⁸⁵ DD were convicted of conspiracy to use their employer's dyeing equipment, which they were not permitted to do, in order to make profits for themselves and so to defraud their employer of the profit. In using the dyes they no doubt stole them; but there was no theft of the profit DD made: the employer did not have a proprietary interest in the profit so that the appropriation of that did not constitute a substantive offence.³⁸⁶ The great majority of agreements to defraud in this category will be agreements to commit offences under the Theft Act and/or the Fraud Act 2006 but clearly there are cases amounting to fraud within the definition. It is submitted that the above authorities demonstrate that conspiracy to defraud is broader than the judgment in Evans would suggest. Admittedly, in most cases there will be little difference in practice.

The offence as defined in Scott also applies to an agreement to deprive someone temporarily of their property. Parliament chose not to create a general offence of temporarily depriving another of his property in the Theft Act;³⁸⁷ but it remains the case that an agreement so ³⁷⁹ There is no need for any deprivation. ³⁸⁰ [2017] EWCA Crim 353, [11].

³⁸¹ Evans and others [2014] 1 WLR 2817 (Cardiff Crown Court). After Hickinbottom J dismissed the charges against the defendants, the Serious Fraud Office sought a voluntary bill of indictment. Fulford LJ, sitting as a judge of the Queen's Bench Division, refused the SFO's application. See SFO v Evans [2014] EWHC 3803 (QB).

³⁸² At [184]. ³⁸³ At [169].

³⁸⁴ These included: deception which obtains a benefit which does not count as property, services or any of the other benefits defined in the Theft Acts; deception which causes a loss and obtains a directly corresponding gain, where the two are not the same property (other than a transfer of funds between bank accounts); deception which causes a loss and obtains a gain where the two are neither the same property nor directly correspondent; deception which does not obtain a gain, or cause a loss, but which prejudices another's financial interests; deception for a non-financial purpose; deception to gain a temporary benefit; deceptions which do not cause the obtaining of a benefit; conduct involving a view to gain or an intent to cause loss, but not deception; making a secret gain or causing a loss by abusing a position of trust or fiduciary duty; obtaining a service by giving false information to a machine; 'fixing' an event on which bets have been placed; dishonestly failing to fulfil a contractual obligation; and dishonestly infringing another's legal right. Most are now caught by the general fraud offence in the Fraud Act 2006, s 1.

³⁸⁵ (1848) 11 QB 929.

³⁸⁶ JC Smith, 'Embezzlement and the Disobedient Servant' (1956) 19 MLR 39. But see A-G for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] 1 AC 324, PC and p 862.

³⁸⁷ The CLRC rejected such an offence: Eighth Report, para 29.

to do is clearly capable of amounting to conspiracy to defraud under Scott.³⁸⁸ Likewise, it is a conspiracy to defraud where D1 and D2 dishonestly agree to shift D1's boundary fence so as to appropriate V's land—an act which is not theft.

It is clear that V is defrauded if he is induced to take an economic risk which he would not have taken but for a deception.³⁸⁹ It is no answer that D believed that the speculation was a good one and that V had a good chance of making a profit. If V is induced to part with something of economic value, he is probably defrauded even if he does receive the promised return.³⁹⁰

In Evans, Hickinbottom J held that it is not necessary under this head of conspiracy to defraud that anyone should be deceived, provided that there is a dishonest agreement that some proprietary right of the victim will or might be injured. His lordship also confirmed that in order for a dishonest agreement to amount to a conspiracy to defraud, either the object of the agreement had to be unlawful or, if the object was lawful, the means of achieving that object had to be unlawful: it is not an offence of conspiracy to defraud to form a dishonest agreement to achieve a lawful object by lawful means.³⁹¹ The offence may be broader than this, however. Whilst not necessarily conclusive, there are a number of authorities that suggest conspiracy to defraud can encompass a dishonest agreement to achieve a lawful object by lawful means. For example, in Cooke Lord Bridge (repeating what he had earlier held in *Ayres*³⁹²) stated that:³⁹³

It is, I apprehend, precisely in order to maintain the criminality of certain forms of fraudulent conduct when agreed to be pursued by persons acting in concert which would not, of itself, be criminal conduct on the part of an individual acting alone that conspiracy to defraud at common law has been preserved.

Cooke was not cited in Evans and others and, although not conclusive, it is submitted that the judgment of the House of Lords does call into question what was held in Evans about the scope of conspiracy to defraud. Whilst it could be argued that as a matter of principle conspiracy to defraud ought to be confined to cases where there is an agreement to pursue an unlawful means or to attain an unlawful object (or both), there are, however, authorities that suggest the offence is in fact much broader than this.

The breadth and flexibility of the offence are both its vice and its virtue.

Agreement to deceive V to act contrary to public duty

The proposition in Scott is not an exclusive definition of conspiracy to defraud. A person is also defrauded if he is deceived into acting contrary to his public duty.³⁹⁴

In Evans, Hickinbottom J commented that for this form of the offence there is no need to establish any injury to the victim but 'there is a requirement for the victim to be deceived and, as a result of that deceit, act in a different way from that in which he would have acted if ³⁸⁸ The defendants intended to deprive the owners temporarily of the films but permanently of the profits the owners would otherwise have made; and the defrauding was the loss of the profits: [1974] 3 All ER 1032 at 1038.

³⁸⁹ Allsop (1976) 64 Cr App R 29, [1976] Crim LR 738, CA and commentary; cf Hamilton (1845) 1 Cox CC 244; Carpenter (1911) 22 Cox CC 618 (Central Criminal Court).

³⁹⁰ Potger (1970) 55 Cr App R 42, CA. ³⁹¹ At [160].

³⁹² [1984] AC 447, [1984] Crim LR 353, HL.

³⁹³ [1986] AC 909 at 919, [1987] Crim LR 114, HL. We are grateful to Tony Shaw QC for discussions on this.

³⁹⁴ Welham v DPP [1961] AC 103, HL. Welham was followed in Terry [1984] AC 374, HL (D, driving his own unlicensed vehicle, displayed on his dashboard an excise licence disc issued to another vehicle intending to cause police officers to act on the assumption that his vehicle was correctly licensed, had an intention to defraud, even though he intended to pay the licence fee).

he had known the true position'.³⁹⁵ His lordship stated that this form of the offence requires a causal nexus between the conspirators' agreement and the conduct of V.

It would therefore be a conspiracy to defraud if DD agree by deception to induce a public official to grant an export licence,³⁹⁶ or to supply information,³⁹⁷ or to induce a professional body to accept an unqualified person as a member,³⁹⁸ assuming, in each case, that it was the duty of the person so deceived not to do as asked in the actual circumstances of the case. If the public official is persuaded by means other than deception—for example, bribes or threats—to act contrary to his duty, he is obviously not defrauded and the agreement is not a conspiracy to defraud unless it can be said that those affected by the breach of duty have been defrauded—for example, those persons about whom the confidential information is disclosed or, more likely, perhaps, the official's superiors whose duty to keep the information secret has been vicariously violated. Many conspiracies to pervert the course of justice consist in agreements to deceive a public official so that he acts contrary to his duty and are conspiracies to defraud.

Some of their lordships in *Withers*³⁹⁹ thought that this principle was strictly confined to public officials, and did not extend to the case, for example, of a bank manager deceived into breaking his contractual duty.⁴⁰⁰ However, in Wai Yu-tsang v R,⁴⁰¹ the Privy Council said that the cases concerned with public duties are not to be regarded as a special category but as examples of the general principle that conspiracy to defraud does not require an intention to cause economic loss. The Board, disapproving Lord Diplock's more restrictive statement in Scott,⁴⁰² preferred the broad propositions of Lord Denning—'If anyone may be prejudiced in any way by the fraud, that is enough'—and Lord Radcliffe, who agreed with Lord Denning and used similar language, in Welham.⁴⁰³ This seems to open a very broad vista of potential criminal liability.

'Intention' to defraud

If a person is defrauded when he is 'prejudiced', conspirators clearly have a sufficient mens rea if it is their purpose to cause that prejudice by carrying out their agreement. There are dicta to the effect that such 'direct' intention in the form of a 'purpose' is required, but in Wai Yu-tsang the Privy Council thought this too restrictive and that it is enough that the parties have agreed to cause the prejudice. If they have agreed to cause it, that is, to defraud, they intend to defraud, and it is immaterial that defrauding is not their purpose.

The purpose of fraudsters is almost always to make a profit for themselves and not to cause loss to another. They act out of greed, not spite. Since they know that they can make a gain only by causing loss or prejudice, they intend to cause the loss or prejudice, even though they have no 'wish' to cause it and perhaps regret the 'necessity' of doing so in order to achieve their objective.

In the light of these principles, A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1982) (the 'whisky-label case')⁴⁰⁴ is a doubtful decision. In that case the court suggested that the damage to the ³⁹⁵ At [48]. ³⁹⁶ Board of Trade v Owen [1957] AC 602, HL.

³⁹⁷ DPP v Withers [1975] AC 842, [1975] Crim LR 95, HL.

³⁹⁸ Bassey (1931) 22 Cr App R 160, CCA. ³⁹⁹ [1975] AC 842, [1975] Crim LR 95, HL.

⁴⁰⁰ On the broad interpretation of public duty in the offence of misconduct in public office, see A-G's Reference (No 3 of 2003) [2004] EWCA Crim 868.

⁴⁰¹ [1991] 4 All ER 664 at 670, [1992] Crim LR 425, PC.

⁴⁰² [1975] AC 819 at 840–841, [1975] Crim LR 94, HL. But the court in Wai made no reference to Withers [1975] AC 842, [1975] Crim LR 95, HL, decided by the same judicial committee at the same time as Scott, where Lords Simon and Kilbrandon agreed with Lord Diplock.

⁴⁰³ [1961] AC 103, HL at 133 and 124 respectively.

⁴⁰⁴ [1983] QB 751, CA, [1983] Crim LR 534 and commentary.

victim company by D's false labelling of whisky would have been merely 'a side effect or incidental consequence of the conspiracy and not its object'.⁴⁰⁵ The defendants were charged with conspiracy to defraud X Co by causing loss by unlawful labelling, sale and supply of whisky, falsely purporting to be 'X label' products. The agreement was made in England but the whisky was to be sold in Lebanon. The ratio decidendi was that the trial judge had rightly held that he had no jurisdiction to try the indictment because the contemplated crime in Lebanon (obtaining by deception from the purchasers of the whisky) would not have been indictable in England (see later on jurisdiction). One reason for holding that there was no conspiracy to defraud X Co was that this was not the 'true object' of the agreement. This must now be considered in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in Cooke.⁴⁰⁶ British Rail stewards boarded a train, equipped with their own food which they dishonestly sold to passengers, instead of that provided by their employers, intending to keep the proceeds of sale for themselves.⁴⁰⁷ The House had no difficulty in holding that they were guilty of conspiracy to defraud British Rail. It is true that the House was preoccupied with the problem of distinguishing Ayres, the 'whisky-label case' was not cited and it does not appear that it was argued that the loss to British Rail was 'a side effect or incidental consequence'. Nevertheless, it is clear that this was a case where the object of the conspirators was to make a profit out of the customers, not to defraud British Rail.

Of course, one must agree with Lord Lane CJ in the 'whisky-label case'⁴⁰⁸ that 'it would be contrary to principle, as well as being impracticable for the courts, to attribute to defendants constructive intentions to defraud third parties based on what the defendants should have foreseen as probable or possible consequences'. Constructive intentions are to be abhorred; but presumably the House in Cooke thought that a jury could properly find that the defendants must have known that their conduct would, inevitably, cause loss to British Rail. If so, it was right to hold that they *intended*⁴⁰⁹ to defraud British Rail and it should be immaterial that this was not their purpose.

The intention must always be proved.⁴¹⁰ The Privy Council in Cassell v The Queen emphasized that the mens rea for the offence is subjective.⁴¹¹ Thus, the use abroad of a stolen chequebook and cheque card is capable of being fraud on a bank in England because the effect is to cause the bank in England to meet its legal or commercial obligation to honour the cheque; but, if D is charged with conspiracy to defraud the bank, the jury must be directed that he appreciated that his conduct would have this effect.⁴¹² Subject to the jurisdictional problem, considered later, it is submitted that, on a proper direction, the whisky-label conspirators might properly have been convicted of conspiracy to defraud the X Co. They might have been more sophisticated in this respect than the stewards in Cooke and better able to appreciate the effect of their actions on third parties.

⁴⁰⁵ [1983] QB 751 at 757, CA, [1983] 2 All ER 721 at 724, [1983] Crim LR 534. But in Governor of Pentonville Prison, ex p Osman (1990) 90 Cr App R 281, QB, at 298, [1988] Crim LR 611, it was held, distinguishing the whisky-label case, that a conspiracy to deprive V of dollars in the United States was only the means to effecting the 'true object' of the conspiracy which was the defrauding of V in Hong Kong. The distinction is not blindingly obvious.

⁴⁰⁶ [1986] AC 909, [1987] Crim LR 114, HL.

⁴⁰⁷ They were probably guilty in law of going equipped to cheat the passengers and, when they sold food to them, of obtaining the price by deception. See p 1026.

⁴⁰⁸ [1983] 2 All ER 721, CA at 724, [1983] Crim LR 534.

⁴⁰⁹ See p 91, Ch 3.

⁴¹⁰ See eg Sentamu [2013] EWCA Crim 248. The court seemed to import the test for statutory conspiracy in Saik [2006] UKHL 18, [2006] Crim LR 998.

⁴¹¹ [2016] UKPC 19.

⁴¹² McPherson and Watts [1985] Crim LR 508, CA.

Prejudice includes putting at risk

If the conspirators know that the effect of carrying out the agreement will be, for example, to put V's property at risk, then they intend prejudice to V and, if they are dishonest, they are guilty of conspiracy to defraud him.⁴¹³ This is so notwithstanding that it turns out that V's property is unimpaired, or even that he makes a profit out of the transaction. A clear example would be where the conspirators agree to take V's money without his consent and then bet with it on a horse with odds at 20 to 1. They have agreed to defraud him and the conspiracy is not undone even if the horse wins and, as they intended throughout, they pay half the winnings into his bank account. This, it is submitted, is the best explanation of *Allsop*⁴¹⁴ in which D helped applicants for hire-purchase finance for cars to fill in forms using false information. D believed the finance company, V, would get its money; the applicant would get the car and the car dealer would get his sale. D also got his commission. The judgment is difficult because of its reliance on two dicta of Lord Diplock which were mutually inconsistent and have both since been disapproved; but the decision on the facts is readily explicable. D was a 'sub-broker' for a hire-purchase finance company, V. His function was to introduce prospective hire-purchasers who wished to acquire cars. In collusion with others, he filled in application forms with false statements about the value of the cars and the payment of deposits so as to cause V to accept applications for hire-purchase finance which, otherwise, it might have rejected. He expected and believed that the transactions he introduced would be duly completed, so that V would achieve its contemplated profit to the advantage of all concerned, including D who got his commission. His defence was that he did not intend V to suffer any pecuniary loss or be prejudiced in any way. The court found that V was defrauded when it was induced to do the very acts which D intended it to do. V paid an excessive price for cars and advanced money to persons who were not as creditworthy as they were alleged to be. This not merely put it at risk of being defrauded, but actually defrauded it: 'Interests which are imperilled are less valuable in terms of money than those same interests when they are secure and protected.'⁴¹⁵ The result intended by D was, in law, the defrauding of V; and V was in law defrauded. It is wholly immaterial whether D would have regarded that result as 'fraud'. If he did not, he was making a mistake of criminal law.

According to this explanation, D intended to prejudice V. The facts admitted of no other interpretation. The judge in that case had directed the jury that they could convict if they were satisfied that D realized that his conduct was likely to lead to the detriment or prejudice of V. If this is taken literally, it is sufficient that D is reckless (in the Cunningham/G sense) whether prejudice—that is, defrauding—occurs. It is submitted that this would be going too far and take common law conspiracy out of line with statutory conspiracy. In Wai Yu-tsang, the Privy Council expressed a reluctance 'to allow this part of the law to become enmeshed in a distinction, sometimes artificially drawn between intention and recklessness'; but they then said, of Allsop and the instant case, that it is enough that:

the conspirators have dishonestly agreed to bring about a state of affairs which they realize will or may deceive the victim into so acting, or failing to act, that he will suffer economic loss or his economic interests will be put at risk.⁴¹⁶

The use of the words, 'or may', admit recklessness as a sufficient mens rea—it is enough that the parties have taken a conscious risk of causing prejudice. This was probably not necessary to the decision since the trial judge had directed the jury that D was guilty if he knew what he had done 'would cause detriment or prejudice to another'.

⁴¹³ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 5.28.

⁴¹⁴ (1976) 64 Cr App R 29, [1976] Crim LR 738, CA.

⁴¹⁵ ibid, 32, per Shaw LJ.

⁴¹⁶ Emphasis in original.

Dishonesty in putting property at risk

The intention to defraud is readily discernible where there could be no question of D believing he has any right to do what he did. More difficult is the case where company directors take a risk with the company's property, perhaps hoping to make a large profit and so benefit the shareholders. If the risk taken was such that 'no director could have honestly believed . . . it was in the interest of that company that the risk should be taken',⁴¹⁷ then the company is defrauded. Whether a risk is unjustifiable is a question of judgement and a matter of degree. There is no clear dividing line between right and wrong, such as was crossed in Allsop when false statements were made, or in Wai Yu-tseng where the dishonouring of cheques was concealed in a bank account. Whether the risk is so grave that no director could believe it justified is equally a matter of judgement and degree. Conspiracy to defraud thus lacks the precision that we should normally look for in any offence, and certainly in one of this seriousness. The courts have made clear that care needs to be taken in drafting indictments to ensure that sufficient detail is provided,⁴¹⁸ and in particular making clear a distinction between the agreement alleged and the reasonable information given in respect of it.⁴¹⁹

Dishonesty

Dishonesty is an essential constituent of the mens rea but historically there has been controversy about what 'dishonesty' means in this context. In Landy,⁴²⁰ the court appeared to think that the ultimate test was whether the defendant thought his conduct dishonest. In Mclvor,⁴²¹ the court reiterated this view, holding that the test in theft is different; but shortly afterwards in *Ghosh*⁴²² it was held that the same test should be applied in conspiracy to defraud as in theft. The Ghosh test applied so that the standard of honesty was that of ordinary decent people and D was dishonest if he realized he was acting contrary to that standard. Applying that test, if D knew, for example, that no 'ordinary decent company director' would take the risk in question, then he knew that the risk was an unjustifiable one and it was dishonest for him to take it.⁴²³ The test in *Sinclair*⁴²⁴ was similar: if no director could have believed the risk was justified, it follows that the defendant did not; but it would seem right that the jury should be directed that they must find this is so.

As discussed in detail in Ch 18, the test for dishonesty was changed by the Supreme Court in Ivey. To preclude different tests for dishonesty applying to different offences, the test for dishonesty in this offence will no doubt now follow that described in Ivey:

When dishonesty is in question the fact-finding tribunal must first ascertain (subjectively) the actual state of the individual's knowledge or belief as to the facts. The reasonableness or otherwise of his belief is a matter of evidence (often in practice determinative) going to whether he held the belief, but it is not an additional requirement that his belief must be reasonable; the question is

⁴¹⁷ Sinclair (1968) 52 Cr App R 618, CA.

⁴¹⁸ See eg Landy (1981) 72 Cr App R 237, [1981] Crim LR 326, CA. See also more recently Evans [2014] 1 WLR 2817.

⁴¹⁹ K [2004] EWCA Crim 2685, [2005] Crim LR 298. It was noted, however, that it is only necessary to specify in detail in the indictment the agreement, and not how the participants intended individually to go about (or had gone about) defrauding V; and see Giannakopoulos [2005] EWCA Crim 247, [2005] All ER (D) 54 (Feb). See also Fussell [1997] Crim LR 812, CA.

⁴²⁰ [1981] 1 All ER 1172 at 1181, [1981] Crim LR 326, CA.

⁴²¹ [1982] 1 WLR 409, [1982] Crim LR 312, CA.

⁴²² [1982] QB 1053, [1982] Crim LR 608. See Cox and Hodges [1983] Crim LR 167 and commentary (fraudulent trading).

⁴²³ For a remarkable difference of opinion in the House of Lords as to whether there was evidence of dishonesty, see Tarling v Government of the Republic of Singapore (1980) 70 Cr App R 77, HL. See, on this case, Smith [1979] Crim LR 220.

⁴²⁴ See n 417.

whether it is genuinely held. When once his actual state of mind as to knowledge or belief as to facts is established, the question whether his conduct was honest or dishonest is to be determined by the fact-finder by applying the (objective) standards of ordinary decent people. There is no requirement that the defendant must appreciate that what he has done is, by those standards, dishonest.⁴²⁵

It is at least arguable that the overwhelmingly objective nature of this test makes an already broad offence even broader. Even if D is genuinely unaware that no 'ordinary decent company director' would have taken the risk in question, he can still be dishonest applying Ivey and therefore guilty of the offence. It is disappointing that the desirability of this possibility was not addressed by the Supreme Court.

Fraud: by whom?

In statutory conspiracy it is expressly provided that the contemplated offence is to be committed 'by one or more of the parties to the agreement'.⁴²⁶ In Hollinshead,⁴²⁷ the Court of Appeal held that this was a restatement of the common law, so the same principle applied to conspiracy to defraud: the contemplated fraud must be one which is to be perpetrated by one of the parties to the agreement in the course of carrying it out. But complete execution of the agreement to sell the black boxes in that case would not defraud anyone. The parties contemplated that the fraud would be carried out by other persons, not yet ascertained, who would buy the boxes and use them to defraud the electricity suppliers. The court therefore quashed the convictions for conspiracy to defraud—but they were restored by the House of Lords. The House held that the 'purpose' of the defendants was to cause economic loss to the electricity suppliers. This is difficult to understand. Their purpose was to make a profit by selling the devices to the (as they thought) middleman. Presumably they did not care what happened to the boxes after they had sold them. If, post-sale, they had been accidentally destroyed in a fire, they would not consider that their enterprise had failed. On the contrary, they might have been pleased at the prospect of selling some more. The House seems to have been much influenced by the fact that the boxes were 'dishonest devices' with only one 'purpose', which was to cause loss. But 'purpose' is here used in the sense of 'function'. An inanimate thing cannot have a 'purpose' (any more than it can be 'dishonest') in the sense in which that word is used in the law of conspiracy. However that may be, Hollinshead seems to broaden the law of conspiracy to defraud to include the case where the defendants contemplate that the execution of their agreement will enable some third party to perpetrate a fraud.

Jurisdiction over conspiracy to defraud

An agreement in England or Wales to carry out a fraud abroad is not indictable at common law in England or Wales as a conspiracy to defraud.⁴²⁸ This is now regulated by s 5(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1993 which provides that, where the conspiracy would be triable in England but for the fraud, which the parties had not envisaged intending to take place in England and Wales, a person may be guilty of conspiracy to defraud if:⁴²⁹

- (a) a party to the agreement constituting the conspiracy, or a party's agent, did anything in England and Wales in relation to the agreement before its formation, or
- (b) a party to it became a party in England and Wales (by joining it either in person or through an agent), or
- (c) a party to it or a party's agent, did or omitted anything in England and Wales in pursuance of it.

⁴²⁵ Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd (t/a Crockfords) [2017] UKSC 67, [74]. See K Laird [2018] Crim LR 395.

⁴²⁶ Criminal Law Act 1977, s 1(1)(a), p 437.

⁴²⁷ [1985] 1 All ER 850 at 857, [1985] Crim LR 301, CA, p 451.

⁴²⁸ See generally Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law, 175–178.

⁴²⁹ Hirst argues that s 5(3) should be charged separately from and in addition to conspiracy to defraud.

ECHR

As has been noted, the offence is heavily dependent on the concept of dishonesty, and that test is one lacking in certainty.⁴³⁰ Concerns were raised by Liberty and the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights as to whether the offence was compatible with Art 7 of the ECHR which prohibits criminal laws which lack sufficient certainty. The Law Commission acknowledged the force of the argument in its Report on Fraud by stating:

We continue to believe that a general dishonesty offence, by not requiring as an element some identifiable morally dubious conduct to which the test of dishonesty may be applied, would fail to provide any meaningful guidance on the scope of the criminal law and the conduct which may be lawfully pursued. We do not accept the argument that inherent uncertainty is satisfactorily cured by the promise of prosecutorial discretion.⁴³¹

These views were echoed by the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights which, when scrutinizing the Fraud Bill, concluded:⁴³²

we remain concerned that the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud is a general dishonesty offence and as such is not compatible with the common law and ECHR requirements of legal certainty for the reasons given above.

A challenge seems most likely if the conspiracy to defraud offence is used in a case where it amounts to an allegation of an agreement to act dishonestly, even though that action would not constitute an agreement to perform a criminal offence.⁴³³

There is plenty of authority supporting the argument against such a broad common law offence being expanded.⁴³⁴ Examples include confirmation from the House of Lords in *Jones*⁴³⁵ that criminal law can only be extended by Parliament and that the English common law does not permit the creation of new offences nor the application of existing offences to activity previously regarded as outside the remit of the criminal law.⁴³⁶ Similarly in Goldstein and Rimmington,⁴³⁷ the House of Lords stated that:

Where Parliament has defined the ingredients of an offence, perhaps stipulating what shall and shall not be a defence, and has prescribed a mode of trial and a maximum penalty, it must ordinarily be proper that conduct falling within that definition should be prosecuted for the statutory offence and not for a common law offence which may or may not provide the same defences and for which the potential penalty is unlimited.⁴³⁸

In the extradition case of Norris v US, the particular form of conduct that had not been previously charged as a conspiracy to defraud involved the dishonest agreement between suppliers to fix prices or limit production. Such anti-competitive cartels are now proscribed by a series of specific offences introduced by the Enterprise Act 2002. The allegation in Norris v US and the related case of GG was that the conspirators routinely sold product to their customers under an agreement to avoid price competition. In effect, the allegation was that the conspirators 'defrauded their customers by requiring that they pay higher prices than they might otherwise have paid had there been no conspiracy'. The argument

⁴³⁰ See p 21. ⁴³¹ Para 5.28. ⁴³² Para 2.25.

⁴³³ The challenge to the offence of cheating on this basis failed in Pattni [2001] Crim LR 570 (Southwark CC).

⁴³⁴ See in the case of the conspiracy to defraud offence, Zemmel (1985) 81 Cr App R 279, [1985] Crim LR 213, CA.

⁴³⁵ [2006] UKHL 16, [2007] Crim LR 66. ⁴³⁶ At [28]–[29].

⁴³⁷ [2005] UKHL 63, [2006] Crim LR 153.

⁴³⁸ At [30]. See also the ECtHR decision in Hashman and Harrup v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 241, [2000] Crim LR 185. See Dady, n 347.

that this charge infringed Art 7 was rejected by the Administrative Court and the Court of Appeal.⁴³⁹

In the House of Lords⁴⁴⁰ the House rejected the lower courts' approach, acknowledging the 'consistent message . . . through cases decided from 1875 through to 1984 . . . that price-fixing was not of itself capable of constituting a crime . . . There was no reported case, indeed, it would appear, no unreported case, no textbook, no article which suggested otherwise.'⁴⁴¹ Their lordships, having regard to Jones and Rimmington, concluded that it would infringe the principle of legality to allow a first prosecution for conspiracy to defraud on the terms alleged.

Conspiracy to defraud and the Fraud Act 2006

In view of the breadth of offences created under the Fraud Act 2006, very little fraudulent conduct will now be chargeable only as conspiracy to defraud. The Home Office suggested that possibly the only instances of conspiracy to defraud not covered by the 2006 Act would be dishonestly failing to fulfil a contractual obligation;⁴⁴² deception for a non-financial purpose; 'fixing' an event on which bets have been placed; and dishonestly infringing another's legal right.⁴⁴³ In respect of those situations, it is questionable whether they ought to be criminal at all: hence, the Law Commission's 2002 Report recommendation that conspiracy to defraud should be abolished.⁴⁴⁴ Indeed, the Law Commission went so far as to describe the continued existence of the offence as 'indefensible'.⁴⁴⁵ The Home Office had also stated:

if we achieve a proper and full definition of fraud there should be no need for a fall back offence of this kind.⁴⁴⁶

On public consultation by the Home Office, the majority were opposed to abolition of the offence.⁴⁴⁷ The main arguments for retention of the offence of conspiracy to defraud despite the incredible breadth of the Fraud Act offences were that: abolition might leave an unforeseen lacuna in the law;⁴⁴⁸ retention would be necessary, even with the availability of the new fraud offences where, for example, a person allows his bank account to be used by a third party to transfer funds (typically from overseas) which form part of a conspiracy to defraud; retention was needed to deal with cases like Hollinshead;⁴⁴⁹ most importantly, there are cases in which the use of the conspiracy to defraud charges, although not necessary, would render a prosecution far easier than if charges were brought under the 2006 Act.⁴⁵⁰

As Jarvis makes clear in his discussion of Evans, 'It would be a mistake to assume that if the facts of a case reek of dishonesty but don't fit snugly into any of the statutory offences (such as the various fraud offences under the Fraud Act 2006) then conspiracy to defraud will catch them as a last resort.'⁴⁵¹

⁴³⁹ The court was influenced by Sir Jeremy Lever QC and J Pike, 'Cartel Agreements, Criminal Conspiracy and the Statutory "Cartel Offence"' (2005) 26 ECLR 90.

⁴⁴⁰ Norris v US [2008] UKHL 16; GG Plc [2008] UKHL 17, [2009] Crim LR 433. ⁴⁴¹ At [55].

⁴⁴² Now possibly an offence under s 3 of the Fraud Act 2006.

⁴⁴³ Home Office, Fraud Law Reform (2004) para 38.

⁴⁴⁴ See also LC 228, Conspiracy to Defraud (1994). ⁴⁴⁵ LC 276, Fraud (2002) para 1.4.

⁴⁴⁶ Home Office, Fraud Law Reform (2004) para 37.

⁴⁴⁷ See Home Office, Fraud Law Reform Responses to Consultation (2004).

⁴⁴⁸ See ibid, paras 39–45.

⁴⁴⁹ This is misplaced. The conduct would be caught by s 7 of the Fraud Act 2006.

⁴⁵⁰ Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 5.65.

⁴⁵¹ P Jarvis, 'Conspiracy to Defraud: A Siren to Lure Unwary Prosecutors' [2014] Crim LR 738, 742.

11.3.5.2 Conspiracy to corrupt public morals

In Shaw v DPP,⁴⁵² the House of Lords (Lord Reid dissenting) held that a conspiracy to corrupt public morals is an offence. D published a booklet—the Ladies' Directory—which advertised the names and addresses of sex workers with, in some cases, photographs and, in others, particulars of sexual activities which they were willing to perform. He was convicted of inter alia conspiring to corrupt public morals and Obscene Publications Act offences. The House of Lords held that there was an offence of conspiring to commit a public mischief and that the corruption of public morals was a public mischief; but it did not reject the view of the Court of Criminal Appeal that to corrupt public morals is a substantive offence. Lord Simon in *DPP v Withers*⁴⁵³ concluded that there were three possible rationes decidendi.

- (1) There is a substantive offence of corrupting public morals, so an agreement to do so is a conspiracy.
- (2) The corruption of public morals is a separate head of conspiracy.
- (3) There is an offence of conspiracy to effect a public mischief and the corruption of public morals is a public mischief.

Lord Simon held that it was open to the House to reject ratio (3) and, indeed, the decision does so. Since Lord Tucker did not decide in Shaw that there is a substantive offence of corrupting public morals, it seems clear that the ratio must be taken to be (2).

It is therefore uncertain whether an agreement to corrupt public morals is a statutory conspiracy which should be charged under the 1977 Act; but judges of first instance may consider themselves bound by the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal to hold that it is. Shaw was followed in *Knulier*⁴⁵⁴ where, Lord Diplock dissenting, the House held that an agreement to publish advertisements to facilitate the commission of homosexual acts between adult males in private was a conspiracy to corrupt public morals, although such conduct was by then not criminal.⁴⁵⁵ Lord Reid maintained his view that Shaw was wrongly decided but held that it should nevertheless be followed in the interests of certainty in the law. Given the existence of the offence, he thought there was sufficient evidence of its commission on these facts.⁴⁵⁶

In Shaw, Lord Simonds used language which suggested that the House was asserting the right to expand the scope of the criminal law:⁴⁵⁷

In the sphere of criminal law I entertain no doubt that there remains in the courts of law a residual power to enforce the supreme and fundamental purpose of the law, to conserve not only the safety and order but also the moral welfare of the State, and that it is their duty to guard it against attacks which may be the more insidious because they are novel and unprepared for.

In Knulier, however, the House was emphatic that there is no residual power to create new offences. That is a task for Parliament. 'What the courts can and should do (as was truly laid down in Shaw's case) is to recognize the applicability of established offences to new circumstances to which they are relevant.'⁴⁵⁸ This is no longer tenable. Moreover, a finding that conduct is liable to corrupt public morals was said to be one not lightly to be reached. It ⁴⁵² [1962] AC 220, HL. ⁴⁵³ [1974] 3 All ER 984 at 1003, [1975] Crim LR 95. See p 435.

⁴⁵⁴ [1973] AC 435, [1975] Crim LR 704, HL. ⁴⁵⁵ See Ch 17.

⁴⁵⁶ See [1972] 2 All ER 898, HL at 904.

⁴⁵⁷ [1962] AC 220 at 267, HL. For a judicial view to the contrary, see Stephen, III HCL, 359. See S Davies, Annual Survey of English Law (1932) 276–277. For criticism of Shaw, see D Seaborne Davies (1962) 6 JSPTL (NS) 104; A Goodhart (1961) 77 LQR 560; Williams (1961) 24 MLR 626; and [1961] Crim LR 470.

⁴⁵⁸ [1972] 2 All ER 898, HL at 932, per Lord Simon of Glaisdale. This seems impossible to square with Rimmington.

is not enough that it is liable to 'lead morally astray'. Lord Simon of Glaisdale went so far as to say that, "The words "corrupt public morals" suggest conduct which a jury might find to be destructive of the very fabric of society."⁴⁵⁹

There are very strong objections of principle to an offence based on such vague notions of morality. It is doubtful whether such an offence would withstand challenge under Art 7 of the ECHR for its uncertainty. If the allegations involve the publication of material it may also be that a defence under Art 10 arises.⁴⁶⁰ In view of the range of specific statutory offences dealing with obscenity and indecent images, it is doubtful whether there is any need to retain the offence of conspiracy to corrupt public morals.⁴⁶¹ Unfortunately, the offence did not form part of the comprehensive review of sexual offences conducted in 2000.⁴⁶²

It is important to recall the House of Lords' confirmation in Rimmington that where Parliament has defined the ingredients of an offence, the statutory offence and not the common law offence should be relied on.⁴⁶³

11.3.5.3 Conspiracy to outrage public decency

A majority of the House in Knulier (Lords Reid and Diplock dissenting) held that there is a common law offence of outraging public decency⁴⁶⁴ and, consequently, it is an offence to conspire to outrage public decency. But:

'outrage', like 'corrupt' is a very strong word. 'Outraging public decency' goes considerably beyond offending the susceptibilities of, or even shocking, reasonable people . . . [T]he offence is concerned with recognized minimum standards of decency, which are likely to vary from time to time . . . [N]otwithstanding that 'public' in the offence is used in a locative sense, public decency must be viewed as a whole; and . . . the jury should be invited, where appropriate, to remember that they live in a plural society, with a tradition of tolerance towards minorities, and that this atmosphere of tolerance is itself part of public decency.⁴⁶⁵

This is a strict test. In Choi,⁴⁶⁶ the defendant had secretly filmed women using a public lavatory in a supermarket. The court considered the meaning of the expression 'outraging public decency' and concluded that it involved activity which 'fills the onlooker with loathing or extreme distaste or causes them extreme annoyance'. Following the decisions of the Court of Appeal, including Hamilton,⁴⁶⁷ recognizing the existence of a substantive offence of outraging public decency, it may well be prudent to charge the offence under s 1 of the 1977 Act. Statutory conspiracies and common law conspiracies to corrupt public morals or to outrage public decency remain mutually exclusive, under s 5(3) of the 1977 Act. The prosecutor cannot therefore hedge his bets.

11.3.6 Reform of conspiracy

Conspiracy is one of the most complex offences in English law. It is ill-defined and lacks even a clear rationale. Few would deny that reform is desirable. However, many of the ⁴⁵⁹ cf Lord Devlin's views, p 9. ⁴⁶⁰ This is discussed in Ch 30 on 'Publication offences'.

⁴⁶¹ A Hamilton, 'Live Streamed Sex Videos' (2003) 14(2) Computers and the Law 29, considers the possibility of prosecution for live video broadcasts on the internet.

⁴⁶² See especially Setting the Boundaries (2000), available at <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/+/http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/documents/vol1main.pdf?view=Binary> and the discussion later in Ch 17.

⁴⁶³ [2005] UKHL 63, [30], [2006] Crim LR 153.

⁴⁶⁴ See p 51, following Mayling [1963] 2 QB 717, CCA.

⁴⁶⁵ [1972] 2 All ER 898, HL at 936, per Lord Simon. ⁴⁶⁶ [1999] 8 Arch News 3.

⁴⁶⁷ [2007] EWCA Crim 2062, [2008] Crim LR 225, Ch 30. The Law Commission has proposed abolition of this common law conspiracy: LC 358, Simplification of the Criminal Law: Public Nuisance and Outraging Public Decency (2015).

complexities have developed as a result of a willingness of prosecutors to stretch the offence to breaking point, using it as a convenient ‘device’ for presenting a continuing course of conduct involving numerous defendants. Arguably, reform should look to deter prosecutors from stretching the boundaries of the offence, not encourage it. The Law Commission’s recommendations in LC 318—particularly the dilution of mens rea—will extend the scope of the offence dramatically. Take D1 and D2 who own a bureau de change. If they intend that people transfer money in their business and foresee a risk that criminal property might be transferred by a third party through their business (this is surely inevitable in any such exchange) and agree nevertheless to continue to transfer any monies that do come into their business, it would appear that they would commit the offence of conspiring to launder money under the Commission’s plan. Their foresight of a risk that some money will be the proceeds of crime, coupled with their willingness to take that risk, constitute a sufficient mens rea. That stands in stark contrast to the House of Lords’ interpretation of the offence of conspiracy in Saik as requiring proof of intention or knowledge that criminal property will be transferred.

11.4 Encouragement and assistance under the Serious Crime Act 2007

11.4.1 Introduction

At common law it was an offence for D to incite another person, P, to do or cause to be done an act or acts which, if done by P, would involve the commission of the offence or offences by P.⁴⁶⁸ It had to be shown that D intended or believed that P, if he acted as D encouraged him, would do so with the fault required for the offence or offences. The second element of mens rea required proof that D knew (or had deliberately closed his eyes) to any material circumstances which were necessary elements alongside the conduct and consequences (if any) of the offence he was inciting. For example, if D was inciting P to sexually assault V (a child under 13), D would have to have intended that P would sexually touch her (conduct) and D would have to have known that V would be under 13 (circumstance). D did not need to do any more than incite with that state of mind. D could be liable irrespective of whether P committed the offence.⁴⁶⁹

This was a simple offence that generated very few appeals. Unfortunately, it has been swept away with one of the most complex pieces of criminal legislation to have been drafted in recent times.⁴⁷⁰

⁴⁶⁸ See, for detailed analysis, R Fortson, Blackstone’s Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007 (2008) Ch 6; R Fortson, ‘Inchoate Liability and the Part 2 Offences under the Serious Crime Act 2007’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013). We are extremely grateful to Rudi Fortson QC for his valuable comments on a draft of this part of this chapter. We have drawn on the collaborative piece, D Ormerod and R Fortson, ‘Serious Crime Act 2007: The Part 2 Offences’ [2009] Crim LR 389.

⁴⁶⁹ For a discussion of the offence see earlier editions of this work.

⁴⁷⁰ For critical comment see Ormerod and Fortson [2009] Crim LR 389; JR Spencer and G Virgo, ‘Encouraging and Assisting Crime’ [2008] 9 Arch News 7. The complexity of the provisions has also been recognized by the House of Commons Justice Committee. The Committee expressed concern and recommended that the Ministry of Justice conduct a further post-legislative assessment of Part 2 and, in the interim, if the number of appeals increases to consider bringing forward legislative proposals for revising or even replacing Part 2 to meet the purpose of the legislation in a less tortuous fashion. The government disagreed and did not believe that further post-legislative scrutiny would serve any purpose.

Part 2 of the SCA 2007 has been in force since October 2008. It abolished the common law offence of incitement⁴⁷¹ replacing it with three new offences. They are based on the Law Commission's Report No 300⁴⁷² although the provisions as finally enacted differ from the Commission's recommendations. In summary, Part 2 of the SCA 2007 creates offences where:

- D does an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting another, P, intending to encourage or to assist P, to commit an offence (s 44);
- D does an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting P, believing that the offence by P will be committed and, D believes that his act will encourage or assist its commission (s 45);
- D does an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more of a number of offences by P, and he believes (a) that one or more of those offences will be committed (without having any belief as to which particular crime); and (b) that his act will encourage or assist the commission of one or more of them (s 46).

11.4.2 Background to the Act

It is doubtful whether these tortuously complex offences were necessary.⁴⁷³ The law of incitement was well settled. Even if the breadth of the offences was necessary, the complex drafting style was not.

In Law Commission Report No 300, the Law Commission recommended two broad new offences. The first was relatively uncontroversial at least in terms of its breadth, if not its complexity: encouraging or assisting the commission of a criminal act *intending*⁴⁷⁴ that the criminal act should be committed. This has been enacted in s 44 of the SCA 2007. The second proposal was for an offence with a wider mens rea for the assister or encourager: it would be sufficient if D believed that his encouragement or assistance would (not might) encourage or assist P in the commission of the criminal act, believing that P would (not might) commit it. Parliament produced a scheme of broader and more complex offences with wider mens rea.

In Part 4 of Report No 300, the Commission addressed the possible pros and cons of offences of assisting and encouraging. The pros included that such inchoate offences: (a) allow enforcement agencies to combat serious crime at an earlier stage; are based on strong utilitarian principles; (b) eliminate the element of risk inherent in making D's liability turn on whether P will act or not; (c) reflect D's culpability for the actions he has taken and contribute to a coherent scheme of offences; and (d) provide appropriate labels for the criminal conduct. Against the imposition of such inchoate liability are arguments that the offences: (a) are too broad and criminalize D's lawful conduct on the basis of his mens rea alone; (b) are too premature and may saddle D with liability unfairly; (c) create a disparity between the criminality of the assister who will be liable in every case and the principal who will ⁴⁷¹ Section 59. The many statutory offences of incitement have been retained and are set out in Sch 3. They include soliciting murder. See Ch 15. Statutory conspiracy under s 1 of the Criminal Law Act 1977, and criminal attempts under s 1 of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, are unaffected. Similarly, liability as an accessory under s 8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 is not altered by the provisions. There will be a considerable degree of overlap.

⁴⁷² Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging Crime (2006). See also the HL Research Paper 07/52, and the Home Office Green Paper, New Powers Against Organised and Financial Crime (2006) Cm 6875, at 24 et seq.

⁴⁷³ But see the statements in New Powers Against Organised and Financial Crime (2006) 25; and see GR Sullivan, 'Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging' [2005] Crim LR 1047.

⁴⁷⁴ See LC 300, para 5.89.

only be liable if he performs the full offence; and (d) are likely to be in vague form with too great a degree of dependence on D's mens rea. The Law Commission rebutted the arguments against, being driven by the moral principle that D is culpable and deserving of punishment once he has performed his acts of assistance or encouragement irrespective of whether P performs the conduct of the substantive offence.⁴⁷⁵

The Law Commission's recommendations in LC 300 are only properly appreciated when read with LC 305 where the Law Commission provides a new range of offences to deal with all aspects of secondary liability.⁴⁷⁶ If enacted, there would be eight separate offences to deal with assisting and encouraging.⁴⁷⁷ Unless the recommendations in LC 305 are enacted, which seems highly unlikely, the law will be left in a rather imbalanced state. The inchoate offences in the 2007 Act were designed by the Law Commission to be of wide application, in part because the Commission proposed that the offences to replace secondary liability will be much narrower.

11.4.3 The scope and forms of liability

Four matters need to be understood from the outset.⁴⁷⁸ First, the offences create inchoate liability. D (with the requisite fault) will be liable as soon as he has performed any act *capable*⁴⁷⁹ of assisting or encouraging P irrespective of whether it has any effect on P, or whether P goes on to commit the offence, or even whether D had communicated with P.⁴⁸⁰ As the Law Commission suggested:

If D sells P a weapon that D intends P will use to murder V, D has done everything that he or she intends to do. Nothing more turns on D's subsequent conduct whereas P has yet to take the step of attempting to commit the offence.⁴⁸¹

Secondly, the offences apply also where D has done any act capable of assisting and encouraging P and it has assisted or encouraged. D will be liable in such circumstances even if P did not commit the anticipated offence. Again, D's liability is inchoate.⁴⁸²

Thirdly, the offences are also available against D even if P has committed the offence if D has done any acts capable of assisting or encouraging: s 49(1). This overlaps with D's secondary liability under the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861. This was a specific aim of the Law Commission. The result is to add to the breadth and confusion of the law. Under s 44, for example, D will be liable in relation to the criminal act that he intended (say, murder) rather than the actual offence committed by P (perhaps only wounding). In some cases the Crown would have the choice of charging D with aiding and abetting wounding or assisting and encouraging murder. There is a significant advantage in charging D with the offence under s 44 rather than as an accessory to P's act because it does not matter whether P has deliberately changed the manner of offence, or the identity of the victim.⁴⁸³ Furthermore, D

⁴⁷⁵ ibid, para 4.18. See also the valuable discussion in RD Taylor, 'Procuring, Causation, Innocent Agency and the Law Commission' [2008] Crim LR 32; W Wilson, 'A Rational Scheme of Liability for Participating in Crime' [2008] Crim LR 3.

⁴⁷⁶ See Wilson [2008] Crim LR 3 discussing the coherence that will be brought to bear when they are both enacted.

⁴⁷⁷ See also the comments on LC 300 by GR Sullivan, 'Inchoate Liability for Assisting and Encouraging' [2005] Crim LR 1047.

⁴⁷⁸ The discussion is based on s 44 because it is the simplest of the offences. The distinctions apply to the other sections.

⁴⁷⁹ LC 300, para 5.22.

⁴⁸⁰ Ransford (1874) 31 LT 488.

⁴⁸¹ LC 300, para 4.25.

⁴⁸² Where D does acts capable of encouraging P, his liability is in one sense wider than liability for conspiracy between D and P because P need not share his intention.

⁴⁸³ See LC 300, para 5.5. This is different from the position where D is a secondary party, see Ch 6.

could be liable under these provisions of the 2007 Act where P is incapable of committing the offence in relation to which D has done acts to assist or encourage.⁴⁸⁴

Fourthly, the offences are available not only against D, but also against P, the person D has assisted or encouraged. This may seem rather surprising, but is a logical application of the terms of the offences. Again, to take an example from the Law Commission's Report No 300,⁴⁸⁵ P will be liable if:

P asks D to supply him or her with an article so that P can commit an offence, P is doing an act capable of encouraging D to do an act capable of assisting P to commit an offence. In other words, if D supplies the article to P, not only is D committing at least the [s 45] offence but, by encouraging D to commit the [s 45] offence, P is committing the [s 44] offence.⁴⁸⁶

The extent to which prosecutors will abandon reliance on other offences and rely on these offences to charge those whom we would currently regard as principals and secondary parties as well as inciters is open to debate. Since the provisions came into force, the number of prosecutions brought has increased steadily.⁴⁸⁷ Graham Virgo makes the point that following the judgment in Jogee there is a growing disconnect between the breadth of inchoate liability and the court's more restrictive interpretation of accessorial liability. This disconnect is attributable to the fact that following Jogee the prosecution must be able to prove intention on the part of the accessory before he will be guilty as an accessory, whereas in the context of the 2007 Act recklessness suffices as a substantive element. Virgo argues that this might lead prosecutors to prefer to charge D with the inchoate offence of assisting or encouraging despite the commission of the substantive offence.⁴⁸⁸ The relationship between secondary liability and inchoate liability is discussed in more detail later.

11.4.3.1 Interpreting the 2007 Act

The offences are rendered complex because the sections (and the rest of that Part of the Act) include extended definitions of (a) what suffices as relevant conduct by D; and (b) the subdivision of the elements of the offence to be committed by P, into conduct, circumstances and consequences.⁴⁸⁹ Unfortunately, several of the fundamental terms in the offences are left undefined, including core elements of the actus reus: 'encouraging' and 'assisting'.⁴⁹⁰ The Law Commission Report No 300 will serve as an important interpretative document, but given the degree of difference between what was proposed and what was enacted, considerable caution is warranted. In addition, caution must be exercised in reading the statute itself since the true scope of the offences in ss 44 to 46 cannot be appreciated without reference to the ensuing 20 sections.

⁴⁸⁴ LC 300, paras 4.22–4.26.

⁴⁸⁵ Para 4.26.

⁴⁸⁶ See also Goldman [2001] EWCA Crim 1684, [2001] Crim LR 822.

⁴⁸⁷ See the statistics appended to the following document: www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201314/cmselect/cmjust/918/918.pdf.

⁴⁸⁸ G Virgo, 'The Relationship Between Inchoate Liability and Accessorial Liability after Jogee' [2016] 9 Arch Rev 6.

⁴⁸⁹ For an alternative model by which inchoate offences may be analysed, see J Child and A Hunt, 'Mens Rea and the General Inchoate Offences: Another New Culpability Framework' (2012) 63 NILQ 247. See also a reformulated version of this complex scheme in J Child, 'The Structure, Coherence and Limits of Inchoate Liability: The New Ulterior Intent' (2014) 34 LS 537.

⁴⁹⁰ This has been a feature of legislation in which the draftsman introduces undue technicality in some aspects of the statute whilst failing to define the essentials. See the Sexual Offences Act 2003 and the Fraud Act 2006 for other examples.

11.4.3.2 What must D's conduct have been capable of assisting or encouraging?

The Act describes D's conduct in terms of acts capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of 'an offence'. Although at first sight the 2007 Act appears to require focus on whether D's act was capable of assisting or encouraging P's crime, in fact, the statute only requires proof that D's acts are capable of assisting or encouraging the conduct element of P's offence.⁴⁹¹ The Law Commission proposal focused on whether D's acts were capable of assisting or encouraging P's 'criminal act', by which the Commission meant merely the conduct element of P's offence.⁴⁹² The Law Commission accepted that D ought not to be liable because he intends or believes that P should or will commit an 'act' that is criminal. The 'act' that is criminal in theft is the appropriation of property. It would be absurd if D could be criminally liable for doing nothing more than encouraging P to do that 'act' of mere appropriation.⁴⁹³ The difference is significant because in some cases D's act of assistance or encouragement will be with intent towards a result which goes beyond the conduct element of P's offence.

11.4.4 Intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime: s 44

By s 44 of the SCA 2007:

- (1) A person commits an offence if—
 - (a) he does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence; and
 - (b) he intends to encourage or assist its commission.
- (2) But he is not to be taken to have intended to encourage or assist the commission of an offence merely because such encouragement or assistance was a foreseeable consequence of his act.⁴⁹⁴

This is the most straightforward of the offences. A simple example illustrates how the section is intended to operate: D commits the offence by supplying P with a gun, intending that P will use it in the murder of V. D is liable under s 44 (subject to mens rea) as soon as he has done the act of supply that is capable of encouraging or assisting P. D's liability is not affected by whether P commits the crime, as made clear in s 49. D is liable if P does nothing further because P gets cold feet, or has already died; or P attempts to commit the crime but fails because V is untraceable, or survives; or even where P does succeed and murders V. In all these cases D is liable for assisting or encouraging murder, and liable to be sentenced to life imprisonment.

Section 44 is triable in the same way as the 'anticipated offence' (ie the offence which D is intentionally assisting or encouraging P to commit but which P does not in fact need to commit⁴⁹⁵ (in our example the murder)). Where the anticipated offence is murder, the maximum sentence on conviction under s 44 is life.⁴⁹⁶ Where the anticipated offence is any offence other than murder, the maximum sentence is that available for the full anticipated offence if it had been committed.⁴⁹⁷

⁴⁹¹ Section 47(2)–(4) explains what those expressions really mean (namely, the conduct element of the anticipated offence): s 47(2)—for s 44; s 47(3)—for s 45; s 47(4)—for s 46.

⁴⁹² See LC 300 Draft Bill, cl 17(2).

⁴⁹³ LC 300, para 5.100. For telling criticism see Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, 634.

⁴⁹⁴ To be understood, this section must be read together with s 47(2), (5), (7), (8), and s 49(1) and (2).

⁴⁹⁵ Section 55(1). Note that by 51A as introduced by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, s 44 does not apply to an offence under s 2(1) of the Suicide Act 1961 (as now amended).

⁴⁹⁶ Section 58(1).

⁴⁹⁷ Section 58(2). See LC 300, paras 5.43 and 5.65.

11.4.4.1 Actus reus

D's conduct must be 'capable' of 'assisting or encouraging' P. The focus is on D's conduct, not P's.⁴⁹⁸ D's conduct can include a 'course of conduct'⁴⁹⁹ as where D supplies a number of articles to P over time. This follows the Law Commission recommendation that D is liable if he performs 'a number of acts, none of which would be regarded as having the capacity to encourage or assist the doing of a criminal act, if the cumulative effect of D's course of conduct would be regarded as having the capacity to encourage or assist'.⁵⁰⁰

There is no requirement that D's act does in fact encourage or assist P, or anyone. P might ignore D's assistance or encouragement, or find it of no encouragement or assistance at all. P need not be aware of D's acts which were intended to assist or encourage him.⁵⁰¹ This extends the scope of liability from that at common law for incitement where it was necessary that the incitement should have at least been communicated.⁵⁰²

The scope of the actus reus is extended in three ways by ss 65 and 66. First, s 65 provides that D's act is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence if D's conduct includes taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought in respect of that offence. D's assistance in providing a disguise for P who is about to commit a bank robbery is a simple example. An interesting question arises whether D's acts, which are capable of assisting or encouraging P, can include those relating to P's conduct after the entire actus reus of the substantive offence is committed by P. What of D who provides the getaway car which is available to P only after the robbery, or D providing false passports for P to flee the country after the robbery? Perhaps the Crown can get round such objections by arguing that the cases are the same: the provision of the disguise, getaway car, false passports, etc, 'encourage' P to commit the anticipated offence.

Secondly, by s 65(2)(b) D is liable if he fails to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty.⁵⁰³ Whether there had been a failure to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty is a question of fact. To borrow the Law Commission's example, D would incur criminal liability in situations where he is a disgruntled security guard who fails to turn on a burglar alarm with the intention of assisting P to burgle the premises of D's employer.⁵⁰⁴ Whether a duty existed is a matter of law, to be decided by the judge. Rudi Fortson makes the important point that s 65(2)(b) is restricted to cases in which D deliberately failed to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty 'but it does not apply where D failed to discharge a duty through inadvertence or forgetfulness'.⁵⁰⁵ The third extension of the actus reus is by s 66. If D arranges for P to do an act capable of encouraging or assisting X and P does that act, D is liable, being deemed also to have done it. This is not necessarily the same as encouraging/

⁴⁹⁸ Note the trap for the unwary of confusing the use of the term 'act' in this part of the statute. 'Act' is used inconsistently and without clarification. Although from a reading of s 47, it might appear as if D's 'act' that is capable of giving assistance or encouragement might include 'a failure to act; the continuation of an act that has already begun; an attempt to do an act (except an act amounting to the commission of the offence of attempting to commit another offence)'. In fact the 'act' being discussed in that section is P's. Cf s 65(2)(b) where 'the act' refers to D. See further Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, Ch 6.

⁴⁹⁹ Section 67. ⁵⁰⁰ LC 300, para A.101 fn 108.

⁵⁰¹ The Law Commission suggested that it is immaterial if no one was aware of D's words of encouragement: ibid, para 5.29.

⁵⁰² Banks (1873) 12 Cox CC 393; Ransford (1874) 31 LT 488.

⁵⁰³ By s 65(3) a person is not to be regarded as doing an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence merely because he fails to respond to a constable's request for assistance in preventing a breach of the peace. See Ch 7. LC 300, para 5.46.

⁵⁰⁴ LC 300, para 5.62; LC 305, para 3.34.

⁵⁰⁵ Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, n 498, para 6.55.

assisting D2 to encourage or assist P to commit an offence. The Law Commission provided an illustration:⁵⁰⁶ if D arranges for another person P to do something which has the capacity to encourage or assist another person to commit a criminal act, then D is also to be regarded as having done P's act. Thus, a person such as a gang leader can be held liable for the encouragement or assistance provided by a member of his gang in carrying out his instructions.

Encouraging

The 2007 Act offers no definition of this core term.⁵⁰⁷ The Law Commission intended that 'encouraging' would have the same meaning as it had developed under the common law offence of incitement. It would include 'instigating', 'persuading', 'threatening' and 'coercing'.⁵⁰⁸ In LC 300, the Commission proposed that the definition should also extend to conduct which 'emboldens a person who has already decided to commit an offence'. What of the provision of the getaway car in the earlier example?

There need not be actual (ie effective) encouragement: the 'act' need only be 'capable of encouraging or assisting another person to commit an offence.

Some guidance on the likely interpretation of the concept of encouragement might be drawn from the case law on incitement. In Marlow,⁵⁰⁹ for example, D was convicted on the basis of 'encouraging' others by his publication of a book on cannabis cultivation.⁵¹⁰ Encouragement can be by hostile threats or pressure as well as by friendly persuasion.⁵¹¹ It may be implied as well as express. It was held to be an incitement to advertise an article for sale, stating its potential to be used to do an act which is an offence. It was an act capable of encouraging P to commit that offence⁵¹²—even when accompanied by a warning that the act is an offence. By contrast, it has been held that merely intending to manufacture and sell, wholesale, a device—which has no function other than one involving the commission of an offence—is not to incite the commission of that offence.⁵¹³ Arguably, there may be circumstances in which offering such devices for sale would be capable of constituting 'encouragement' for the purposes of Part 2 of the 2007 Act.

As stated above, there may be cases in which both D and P would be liable under Part 2 of the 2007 Act. Consider, for example, the facts in Goldman,⁵¹⁴ where it was held that D was ⁵⁰⁶ LC 300, para A.95. ⁵⁰⁷ See Wilson [2008] Crim LR 3 at 12.

⁵⁰⁸ LC 300, para 5.37. See further Wilson [2008] Crim LR 3.

⁵⁰⁹ [1998] 1 Cr App R (S) 273, [1997] Crim LR 897, CA. (A statutory offence of incitement, contrary to the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, s 19.)

⁵¹⁰ Note the danger in using synonyms—see Smith [2004] EWCA Crim 2187, referring to the 10th edition of this book.

⁵¹¹ It includes 'by threatening another person [P] or otherwise putting pressure on another person to commit the offence': s 65(1). Race Relations Board v Applin [1973] QB 815 at 827, CA (Civ Div), per Lord Denning MR, followed in Invicta Plastics Ltd v Clare [1976] RTR 251, [1976] Crim LR 131, DC.

⁵¹² Invicta Plastics Ltd, ibid. (Indication that 'Radatex' may be used to detect police radar traps was incitement to an offence under s 1(1) of the Wireless Telegraphy Act 1949. Note that the licensing requirement was removed by SI 1989/123, and that no offence of 'obtaining information' is committed by the user of the apparatus: Knightsbridge Crown Court, ex p Foot [1999] RTR 21.) Cf the reports in The Times, 6 Aug 1998 that a student was convicted of 'inciting speeding offences' by the sale of a 'speed trap jammer'. In Parr-Moore [2002] EWCA Crim 1907, [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 425, the court described the appellants' publication of disclaimer on such a device serving only to illustrate their realization that the trade was illegal, at [3].

⁵¹³ James and Ashford (1985) 82 Cr App R 226 at 232, [1986] Crim LR 118, CA, distinguishing Invicta Plastics Ltd, n 511. See also Maxwell-King [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 28, (2001) The Times, 2 Jan, CA: incitement to commit offence contrary to the Computer Misuse Act 1990, s 3, by supply of device to allow unauthorized access to satellite TV channels.

⁵¹⁴ [2001] EWCA Crim 1684, [2001] Crim LR 822.

liable where P published an advertisement inviting readers to buy indecent photographs of children. D replied to the advertisement offering to buy the photographs of children under 16. D was guilty of attempting⁵¹⁵ to incite P to distribute indecent photographs of children under 16,⁵¹⁶ contrary to s 1 of the Protection of Children Act 1978.⁵¹⁷ It is arguable (although the argument may be thought to be somewhat strained) that conduct such as subscribing to a website with indecent images of children may be caught by Part 2 of the 2007 Act,⁵¹⁸ particularly in light of the decision in O.⁵¹⁹ In doing so D may be held to have encouraged P, the business offering for supply on the site, to continue doing so even though his communication had been with a wholly automated computer system. At common law there had to be contact with a person. Under s 44 it would seem that D is liable as soon as he sends his subscription details.

Assisting

This fundamental term is not defined. As noted, s 65 provides an extended definition to include D taking steps to reduce the prospect of criminal proceedings being brought⁵²⁰ or by failing to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty.⁵²¹ Read literally, D should be liable if his act is capable of assisting (or encouraging) another person to any extent.⁵²² There is no requirement that D's conduct was, or could have been, a substantial contribution or assistance to P.⁵²³

Assisting or encouraging multiple offences

If D's act is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of a number of offences, then by s 49(2), s 44 will apply separately in relation to each offence that he intends to encourage or assist to be committed. Presumably, therefore, each instance must be treated as a separate count in relation to each type or category of offence and not rolled up into one count. If D provides P with a gun which he intends P to use in threatening a number of debtors, D will be liable for each offence of robbery, blackmail, etc, which P commits provided that it was D's purpose to assist those offences.

11.4.4.2 Mens rea

There are four elements of mens rea to be proved under s 44.

Intention to do acts capable of assisting or encouraging

There must be an intention to do the act which is capable of encouraging or assisting. In the earlier example, D must intend to do the act of supplying the gun which he intends P to use in the murder. This excludes liability where D has only been reckless or negligent about performing conduct which might assist P, as where D leaves his gun cupboard open and P helps himself.

⁵¹⁵ There is no explanation as to why the acts were not charged as incitement per se. They should have been. Cf Jones [2007] EWCA Crim 1118; see also [2007] Crim LR 979 and commentary.

⁵¹⁶ See now the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 45.

⁵¹⁷ If P in this scenario is a State official, care must be taken to avoid a plea of 'entrapment', which, if successful, will lead to the proceedings being stayed as an abuse of process.

⁵¹⁸ R (on the application of O) v Coventry Justices [2004] EWHC 905 (Admin), [2004] Crim LR 948. The court in O did not discuss whether a corporation might be incited. The decision has been criticized in the Crim LR commentary but liability under the SCA 2007 may be less problematic given that words/acts of encouragement/assistance need not be communicated to P.

⁵¹⁹ [2004] EWHC 905 (Admin), [2004] Crim LR 948.

⁵²⁰ Section 65(2)(a).

⁵²¹ Section 65(2)(b). ⁵²² LC 300, para 5.5.

⁵²³ ibid, para 5.51. Cf the discussion by KJM Smith [1994] Crim LR 239, 246.

Intention to assist or encourage

D must intend to encourage or assist the conduct element of P's offence.⁵²⁴ Section 44(2) makes clear that this is not satisfied by proof that the encouragement was a foreseeable consequence of D's intentional acts.⁵²⁵ This surely means (and s 44(2) should have said) D must have as his purpose to encourage or assist.⁵²⁶ This element of the mens rea is in contrast with that in secondary liability where D's intention is satisfied by oblique intention.⁵²⁷

D's mens rea as to P's mens rea

Where the anticipated crime (by P) is one of mens rea, then s 47(5)(a) states that it must be proved that:

- (i) D believed that, were the act^[528] to be done, it would be done with that fault;
- (ii) D was reckless as to whether or not it would be done with that fault; or
- (iii) D's state of mind was such that, were he to do it, it would be done with that fault.

As an example of how this will operate, consider D who encourages P to touch V sexually. D is liable under s 44 for encouraging the offence if he does acts capable of encouraging P to do so and (a) intends purposively to encourage and (b) intends or is (subjectively) reckless as to whether P would sexually touch V with intent (which is the relevant part of the mens rea required under s 3 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003).⁵²⁹ Section 47(5)(a)(iii) deals with the cases where D would have mens rea if he committed the anticipated crime himself, even though he does not believe and is not reckless as to whether P would have such mens rea. For example, D encourages P to rape V. P has sex with V but lacks mens rea for rape. D is guilty of encouraging rape if D himself had the mens rea for rape even though he did not commit it and nor did P. Where this limb is relied on, D is presumed to be able to do the act in question; that is, there is no defence of impossibility for him (s 47(6)). So, in this example, D can be guilty for encouraging rape even if D is a woman.

D's mens rea as to consequences and circumstances of P's offence

D must also have mens rea as to any consequences and circumstances necessary for the commission of the anticipated offence. Therefore, by s 47(5)(b) it must be proved that:

- (i) D believed [or (purposively⁵³⁰) intended⁵³¹] that, were the act to be done, it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences; or
- (ii) D was reckless as to whether or not it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences.

⁵²⁴ ibid, para 5.89.

⁵²⁵ Child (2012) 76 J Crim L 220, suggests that recklessness suffices. We disagree. The interpretation is not assisted by the unduly complex drafting of the Law Commission and the poor drafting of the Act. Section 44 requires an intention that the conduct element of the anticipated offence will be completed. One very clear indicator that intention is required under s 44 is that even in ss 45 and 46 there is a requirement that D believes that P will carry out the conduct element. It would be very odd indeed if the narrower offence in s 44 did not require that D intend the commission of the conduct element but instead had a lower level mens rea than the wider offences.

⁵²⁶ See Sullivan [2005] Crim LR 1047.

⁵²⁷ See p 198. See LC 305, paras 2.63–269; see generally Jogee [2016] UKSC 8.

⁵²⁸ The act in question here is not D's, but P's. The Act uses the term 'act' inconsistently without clarifying whether the reference is to D or P. See Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, para 6.47.

⁵²⁹ Care will be needed here to distinguish between intending to encourage or assist—and the states of mind set out in s 47(5).

⁵³⁰ Section 47(7)(b) provides that D is not to be taken to have intended that an act would be done in particular circumstances or with particular consequences merely because its being done in those circumstances or with those consequences was a foreseeable consequence of his act of encouragement or assistance. Once again, it seems that this should have said purpose.

⁵³¹ In this offence, by s 47(7)(a), the word belief is to be read as if it were a reference to intended or believed.

So, in the previous example of the sexual touching of a child, D must intend, or believe or be reckless as to whether, the child whom he has encouraged P to touch sexually would be under 13 when the act (by P) was done.

Similarly this will apply where the anticipated crime is one of constructive liability. To take an example provided by the Home Office, D gives P a baseball bat and intends P to use it to inflict minor bodily harm on V. P, however, uses the bat to attack V and intentionally kills V. It would not be fair to hold D liable for encouraging and assisting murder, unless he also believes, or is reckless as to whether, V will be killed.⁵³²

Rudi Fortson demonstrates how technical this provision might be in practice, discussing the example⁵³³ of D who hopes that P will cause grievous bodily harm to V and supplies P with a baseball bat to do so, being unclear what P's exact intention might be. Assuming that P does not harm V, D cannot be liable for assisting or encouraging murder because although D would have acted with the fault for murder if he himself had committed the conduct element of that offence, s 47(5)(b)(i) is not satisfied 'because D does not believe that V will be killed (and it was not D's purpose that V should be killed)'.⁵³⁴

11.4.4.3 Defences and exemptions to s 44

The standard defences that are discussed in Chs 9 and 10 will apply. If when he hands P a weapon, D is an infant or insane or acting in self-defence, he will be entitled to an acquittal.⁵³⁵ Four other issues relating to specific defences or exemptions need also to be considered. Two preliminary ones are: first, it is no defence that D is unaware that the conduct by P that D is intentionally encouraging or assisting would be a criminal offence.⁵³⁶ Secondly, as noted, it is no defence for D to claim that no offence is actually committed by P: s 49(1). Two other more significant defences need to be discussed in detail.

Reasonable conduct

It is a defence for D to prove on the balance of probabilities that he acted reasonably. Section 50 provides:

- (1) A person is not guilty of an offence under this Part if he proves—
 - (a) that he knew⁵³⁷ certain circumstances existed; and
 - (b) that it was reasonable for him to act as he did in those circumstances.
- (2) A person is not guilty of an offence under this Part if he proves—
 - (a) that he believed certain circumstances to exist;
 - (b) that his belief was reasonable; and
 - (c) that it was reasonable for him to act as he did in the circumstances as he believed them to be.
- (3) Factors to be considered in determining whether it was reasonable for a person to act as he did include—
 - (a) the seriousness of the anticipated offence (or, in the case of an offence under section 46, the offences specified in the indictment);

⁵³² Explanatory Notes, para 135.

⁵³³ Based on the Law Com example LC 300—para 8.35.

⁵³⁴ Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, para 6.113. D is, however, liable for intentionally encouraging or assisting the offence of causing grievous bodily harm with intent (OAPA 1861, s 18).

⁵³⁵ But what if D gives P a bat anticipating that P would use it to unlawfully assault V? In the event, P uses the bat but, ironically, P acts in self-defence against V who got in his attack first and used excessive force! D has no defence since his liability is not dependent on P's.

⁵³⁶ There is no reason for thinking that ignorance of the law would be a defence here.

⁵³⁷ Note that it is not enough that D believed they existed.

- (b) any purpose for which he claims to have been acting;
- (c) any authority by which he claims to have been acting.

The defence is broader than that proposed in LC 300, where no such defence was recommended for intentional assisting or encouraging under s 44. Note that it is not enough that D thinks that his conduct is reasonable; it must be found to be reasonable by the jury. This objectively determined requirement provides a 'brake' on defences run under s 50 which the jury considers to be unmeritorious. No doubt challenges will be mounted to the ECHR compatibility of the imposition of the burden on D. Perhaps that burden will itself serve to prevent spurious claims being made.⁵³⁸

Little guidance as to the precise scope and operation of the defence can be gleaned from the Law Commission Report. However, the Commission was of the view that it is unreasonable to perform acts of assistance with direct intent that the offence be committed. It is submitted that in such cases, the defence will rarely if ever succeed under s 44.⁵³⁹

Three specific examples of the defence in operation were offered by the Commission:⁵⁴⁰

D, a motorist, changes motorway lanes to allow a following motorist (P) to overtake, even though D knows that P is speeding; D, a reclusive householder, bars his front door to a man trying to get into his house to escape from a prospective assailant (P); D, a member of a DIY shop's check-out staff, believes the man (P) purchasing spray paint will use it to cause criminal damage.

During parliamentary debates, Baroness Scotland of Asthal explained that the defence would be available to a civil servant whistleblower, but that the success of the defence turns on whether the jury accepts that argument.⁵⁴¹ It was recognized in Parliament, and by the Home Office and Law Commission, that 'unmeritorious defendants' will seek to rely on the defence. The breadth of the defence is also indicated, implicitly, by the government's decision that a separate defence of 'good purpose' is not necessary. The Law Commission had recommended such a defence for D whose acts capable of assistance or encouragement were reasonable and performed with the purpose of preventing or limiting harm.⁵⁴² Arguably, the defence would be open for undercover police officers and security service agents who may need to encourage criminal offences when undercover.

Defences for victim assisters

The Tyrrell principle is put in statutory form.⁵⁴³ D will have a defence if he is a 'victim' of the offence that D intends to encourage P to commit—for example, where a 13-year-old, D, encourages her boyfriend, P, to have sex with her. The Supreme Court in Gnango characterized this section as being a 'limited exemption from criminal liability'.⁵⁴⁴ Section 51 provides that a person does not commit an offence if:

- (1) ...
 - (a) he falls within the protected category; and
 - (b) he is the person in respect of whom the protective offence was committed or would have been if it had been committed.

⁵³⁸ cf Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, para 6.133.

⁵³⁹ See the discussion by Sullivan [2005] Crim LR 1047 as to whether the defence is truly one of justification which its name suggests or an excuse.

⁵⁴⁰ LC 300, para A.63.

⁵⁴¹ Hansard, HL, 25 Apr 2007, col 744.

⁵⁴² See LC 300, para A.57.

⁵⁴³ cf Tyrrell [1894] 1 QB 710, CCR.

⁵⁴⁴ Gnango [2011] UKSC 59, [50].

- (2) Protective offence' means an offence that exists (wholly or in part) for the protection of a particular category of persons ('the protected category').

This works well enough where, for example, D (14) encourages P (35), to have sex with her, but the absence of further statutory definition leaves the scope of the defence unclear. For example, what of D aged 12 encouraging P aged 12? What of adult D encouraging adult P to engage in sadomasochism? What is a protected category?

11.4.4.4 Relationship with other forms of culpability

Relationship with liability as a principal

In some circumstances, D's liability under s 44 will be greater than that of the principal offender who carried out an offence as, for example, where D encourages P to murder and P merely wounds V. The Act also provides for an extended form of principal liability for D in cases where D has assisted or encouraged, and where the anticipated offence has been committed in full. In such a case, if it is unclear whether D merely assisted or encouraged or himself committed the full offence, by s 56 he may be convicted of the s 44 offence. As with accessorial liability, D may be convicted of an offence if the prosecution cannot prove whether he was a perpetrator, or an accessory, but it can be proved that he must have been one or the other.⁵⁴⁵ Once again the breadth of the scheme is obvious.

Relationship with secondary liability

If P commits the anticipated offence D may also be liable as an accessory in the usual way. The elements of D's conduct as an accessory are considered in Ch 6. If D has performed acts capable of assisting or encouraging P's conduct, that will not necessarily mean that he will have done enough to render him liable as an accessory. P might never have heard D's words of encouragement, so D will not have aided in fact.⁵⁴⁶ As for mens rea, if D has the mens rea for s 44, since the judgment in Jogee he will not have the mens rea necessary to be an accessory. This is because recklessness no longer has any part to play in establishing liability as an accessory, but it can be a sufficient mens rea to establish liability under s 44. It has been argued that greater reliance may now be placed upon the offences in Part 2 of the Serious Crime Act in order to circumvent the strict mens rea requirements necessitated by the Supreme Court's judgment in Jogee.⁵⁴⁷ Given the complexity of the offences contained in Part 2 and the difficulty in explaining them to a jury, it is submitted that secondary liability will continue to be a more attractive option for prosecutors, despite the more onerous mens rea requirements.

Relationship with conspiracy

D may be liable under s 44 in a wider range of circumstances than for conspiracy. Crucially, in a conspiracy DD must share a common purpose to commit the offence. Under s 44, D is liable irrespective of whether P has any intention to commit the anticipated offence.⁵⁴⁸

11.4.4.5 Double inchoate liability

Attempting or conspiring to commit: ss 44–46

Since D's acts need only be capable of assisting or encouraging, there would seem to be little practical scope for liability for D to be guilty of an attempt to commit a ss 44–46 offence.

⁵⁴⁵ cf s 56(2). The purpose of s 56(2) is obscure. ⁵⁴⁶ See Ch 6, p 185.

⁵⁴⁷ G Virgo, 'The Relationship Between Inchoate Liability and Accessorial Liability after Jogee' [2016] 9 Arch Rev 6.

⁵⁴⁸ See the discussion of Anderson, p 453.

The possibility arises where, for example, D is about to post the letter to P containing details of how to break into V's safe. In addition, D may be liable for an attempt to commit a ss 44–46 offence where he mistakenly believes that the acts he will perform are capable of assisting or encouraging P's conduct element of his offence, but they are not, as a matter of fact, capable of doing so. The Act is ambiguous whether D can be liable for an attempt in either of these circumstances. As Fortson points out, it is not possible to impose liability on D for an attempt to assist or encourage by reference to s 47(8)(c) which deals with proving offences under s 44;⁵⁴⁹ s 47(8)(c) 'must not be read as meaning that it is sufficient to found liability for an offence under ss 44–46 if D attempts to encourage or assist D2 to commit an offence'.⁵⁵⁰ However, the fact that the attempt by D is not provided for in s 47(8) does not necessarily preclude the existence of that form of liability: D can attempt to commit a ss 44–46 offence.

There seems to be nothing to prevent liability for conspiring to commit offences under ss 44 to 46: D1 agreeing with D2 that D1 will perform acts capable of assisting or encouraging P to commit an offence against V. Perhaps D1 and D2, serious drug villains, agree that D1 should supply a local hoodlum, P, with a weapon so that he will kill V, a competitor in the local drug market.⁵⁵¹ D can conspire to commit an offence under ss 44 to 46. Again, this is stretching liability so far that one begins to ask where it will all end.

Assisting or encouraging attempts or conspiracies

The Law Commission⁵⁵² proposed that D should be liable for the inchoate offence of doing an act which is capable of encouraging or assisting P to attempt to commit an offence,⁵⁵³ but only if it was his direct intention that P should do so.⁵⁵⁴ Under s 44,⁵⁵⁵ D can be convicted of an offence if he performs acts capable of assisting or encouraging P to attempt to commit an offence.⁵⁵⁶ The Law Commission noted that, at common law, a charge of incitement to commit attempt is uncommon because D will nearly always be encouraging P to commit the full offence.⁵⁵⁷

As for assisting or encouraging conspiracy, under s 5(7) of the Criminal Law Act 1977 it was no offence to incite a conspiracy,⁵⁵⁸ but the Law Commission has been recommending repeal of that provision since 1989.⁵⁵⁹ In LC 300, the Commission recommended that D should be liable for acts capable of encouraging or assisting P to conspire to commit an offence, but only if it was D's direct intention that P should do so. D can be liable under s 44⁵⁶⁰ where he does acts capable of assisting or encouraging P1 and P2 to conspire to commit an offence. Section 5(7) of the Criminal Law Act is repealed.⁵⁶¹

⁵⁴⁹ Section 47 focuses on P's acts, and includes expressly P attempting to do an act.

⁵⁵⁰ Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, para 6.87.

⁵⁵¹ D1 and D2 might also separately (or jointly) be charged with a s 44 offence.

⁵⁵² LC 300, para 7.23.

⁵⁵³ cf the original proposals in LCCP 131, Assisting and Encouraging Crime (1993) para 4.184 and see for discussion Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, para 6.78.

⁵⁵⁴ Note s 44(2).

⁵⁵⁵ But not s 45 or 46 since Sch 3 to the Act removes attempt from the scope of their application.

⁵⁵⁶ But not an act of assisting or encouraging an attempt to attempt: s 47(8)(c).

⁵⁵⁷ LC 300, para 7.22. ⁵⁵⁸ cf Sirat (1985) 83 Cr App R 41, [1986] Crim LR 245, CA.

⁵⁵⁹ See LC 177, Criminal Law: A Criminal Code for England and Wales, Vol 2: Commentary on Draft Criminal Code Bill (1989) para 13.15; and see LC 300, para 7.19.

⁵⁶⁰ But not under s 45 or 46 as Sch 3 removes statutory conspiracy from the scope of their application. See later as to common law conspiracies.

⁵⁶¹ Para 54 of Part 2 of Sch 6 to the SCA 2007.

Assisting or encouraging the act of assisting or encouraging

D can be liable for performing acts capable of encouraging or assisting P to encourage or assist P2. If D supplies a weapon to P knowing that the weapon will be passed to P2 to perpetrate a murder, D is liable under s 44. As the Law Commission explained:

If it is D's intention that P should encourage or assist X, his or her conduct should not be considered too remote from the principal offence merely because, were P to encourage or assist X, P would not intend X to commit the principal offence.⁵⁶²

11.4.5 Assisting or encouraging believing offence will be committed: s 45

By s 45 of the Act a person commits an offence if:

- (a) he does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence; and
- (b) he believes—
 - (i) that the offence will be committed; and
 - (ii) that his act will encourage or assist its commission.

A simple example of this section in operation is where D supplies a gun to P, believing that P will use it to commit a murder. Under the old law, D would not be liable for assisting or encouraging unless P committed the murder. D would not have been liable for conspiring with P unless there was a common agreement. Arguably, D could not have been charged with incitement unless there was encouragement rather than pure assistance. Under s 45, D can now be convicted of this new inchoate offence of assisting or encouraging the commission of a crime, even if P does not commit the crime (s 49(1)). The s 45 offence is triable in the same way as the 'anticipated offence' (ie the offence that P would commit if he did as D believed).⁵⁶³ Where the anticipated offence is murder, the sentence on conviction under s 45 is life: s 58(1). Where the anticipated offence is any offence other than murder, the maximum sentence is that available for the full anticipated offence if it had been committed: s 58(2).

11.4.5.1 Actus reus

D's conduct needs only to be capable of assisting or encouraging. This will be satisfied by, for example, the provision of weapons, tools, advice, etc. There is no requirement that the conduct does in fact encourage or assist P or anyone. As under s 44, D fulfils the actus reus by a 'course of conduct'.⁵⁶⁴ Similarly, conduct capable of assisting or encouraging includes threats or putting pressure on another person.⁵⁶⁵ The extended definitions from s 65⁵⁶⁶ (taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought, and failing to fulfil a duty) apply to s 45. Failing to assist a police officer preventing a breach of the peace does not amount to encouraging or assisting in the commission of an offence under s 45.⁵⁶⁷ As with s 44, if D arranges for P to do an act capable of encouraging or assisting X, and P does that act, D is treated as also having done it: s 66.

11.4.5.2 Mens rea

This differs significantly from that under s 44. There are three elements of the mens rea. They turn on the requirement that D has a 'belief'. Belief is a state of awareness short of ⁵⁶² LC 300, para 7.15.

⁵⁶³ Section 55(1).

⁵⁶⁴ Section 67.

⁵⁶⁵ Section 65(1).

⁵⁶⁶ '(a) taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought in respect of that offence; (b) failing to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty.'

⁵⁶⁷ Section 65(3).

knowledge, but greater than mere suspicion.⁵⁶⁸ Unlike s 44, D need not intend that the criminal act by P should be done; D must believe that the criminal act will be done and that his own act will encourage or assist the doing of the criminal act.⁵⁶⁹

Belief that conduct element of P's offence will be committed: s 45(b)(i)

It is sufficient that D believes that the conduct element of the anticipated offence will be committed.⁵⁷⁰ Although in secondary liability the courts purport to apply a test of knowledge of what P might do, in practice they apply a much lower mens rea requirement satisfied by contemplation of the risk of a real possibility that P will commit it.⁵⁷¹

Belief that acts will assist or encourage: s 45(b)(ii)

D must be proved to have intended or believed that his act (eg supplying the gun to P) will (not might) encourage or assist the P in his performance of the conduct element of the offence (eg murder).⁵⁷² For example, it is sufficient to prove that D believed that the act of supply would encourage or assist the doing of P's act in using the gun to kill V.⁵⁷³ Under s 45, D must believe that an act will be done which 'would amount to the commission' of the anticipated offence.⁵⁷⁴ In the example with the supply of the gun, D must believe that P will use the gun to cause death to be liable for assisting in the commission of a murder.

D's mens rea as to P's mens rea

Where the anticipated crime is one of mens rea, D must believe or be reckless as to whether P would perform the conduct element of the offence with the prescribed mens rea for that offence with which P would be charged.⁵⁷⁵ For example, if D encourages P to touch V sexually, D is liable for encouraging the offence if he does acts capable of encouraging P and believes that they will encourage/assist and believes that P will sexually touch V with intent (which is a relevant aspect of the mens rea required under s 3 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003). As with s 44 discussed earlier, s 47(5)(a)(iii) deals with the cases where D would have mens rea if he committed the offence, even though he does not believe and is not reckless as to whether P would have it.

D's mens rea as to circumstances and consequences

D must also have mens rea as to the consequences and circumstances of the anticipated offence.⁵⁷⁶ For example, in the previous illustration D must believe or be reckless as to whether the child whom he has encouraged P to touch sexually would be under 13 if the act (by P) was done. As a second example, in a case of encouraging P to use violence on V, D would only be liable for murder if D believed or was reckless as to that consequence, that is, that level of fatal violence.

11.4.5.3 Defences and exemptions to s 45

There is no requirement that any offence is actually committed by P: s 49(1). It is a defence for D to prove that he acted reasonably under s 50. D cannot be liable if he is a 'victim': s 51. These defences were considered previously when discussing s 44.

⁵⁶⁸ See Ch 26 on handling.

⁵⁶⁹ Child takes issue with this proposition in J Child, 'Exploring the Mens Rea Requirements of the Serious Crime Act 2007: Assisting and Encouraging Offences' (2012) 76 J Crim L 220. For a response see R Fortson, 'Inchoate Liability and the Part 2 Offences under the Serious Crime Act 2007' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participation in Crime—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2013) 184–185 and 192–196.

⁵⁷⁰ Section 49(7).

⁵⁷¹ Bryce [2004] EWCA Crim 1231; cf Webster [2006] EWCA Crim 415.

⁵⁷² Section 45(b)(ii).

⁵⁷³ Section 47(3)(b).

⁵⁷⁴ Section 47(3)(a).

⁵⁷⁵ Section 47(5).

⁵⁷⁶ Section 47(5)(b).

11.4.5.4 To which offences does s 45 apply?

Unlike s 44, there are several offences specifically listed by Parliament as not being capable of being assisted or encouraged under s 45. None of the listed statutory incitement offences in Sch 3 can be committed under s 45. D cannot be convicted under s 45 of encouraging or assisting a conspiracy to commit an offence, on mere belief that the offence (conspiracy) will be committed.⁵⁷⁷ (He can be if he intends it: s 44.) Nor can D be liable under s 45 for doing an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting P to attempt to commit an offence, on a mere belief that the attempt will be committed.⁵⁷⁸ (If he intends the attempt to be committed he is liable under s 44.) Nor can D be liable under s 45 for encouraging or assisting P to do an act which is capable of assisting X to commit a crime.⁵⁷⁹ Under s 45 there is no double inchoate liability.

11.4.6 Encouraging or assisting one or more offences D believes will be committed: s 46

By s 46, D is guilty of this offence if:

- (1) ...
 - (a) he does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more of a number of offences; and
 - (b) he believes—
 - (i) that one or more of those offences will be committed (but has no belief as to which); and
 - (ii) that his act will encourage or assist the commission of one or more of them.
- (2) It is immaterial for the purposes of subsection (1)(b)(ii) whether the person has any belief as to which offence will be encouraged or assisted.

It is not necessary for the prosecution to specify in the indictment every offence that D potentially might have encouraged or assisted. Note that an offence charged under s 46 of the SCA 2007 is triable only on indictment: s 55(5).

This is the broadest, most complex and most controversial of the three offences.⁵⁸⁰ It is introduced to deal with the problem encountered under secondary liability where D gives assistance and D is aware that P is likely to commit one of a number of offences, but is unsure which. For example, D drives P to a pub, being unsure whether D is going to commit robbery, murder, explosives offences or offences against the person, but knowing it will be one of them.⁵⁸¹ In secondary liability, the adequacy of D's mens rea has proved difficult to define with any precision. Section 46 creates an offence for D who does acts capable of encouraging more than one criminal act where D believes: that at least one of those acts will be done but without having any belief as to which it will be; and that his conduct will encourage or assist the doing of at least one of those acts. Note that this is markedly different ⁵⁷⁷ Sch 3, Part 2, para 32.

⁵⁷⁸ ibid, para 33.

⁵⁷⁹ Section 49(4). The Law Commission regarded this as an over-extension of criminal liability: LC 300, paras 7.12–7.13.

⁵⁸⁰ Despite its breadth the Court of Appeal in Sadique [2011] EWCA Crim 2872, [2012] Crim LR 449 rejected the argument that it infringed Art 7 of the ECHR.

⁵⁸¹ As in DPP for Northern Ireland v Maxwell [1978] 1 WLR 1350, [1978] Crim LR 40. As the Law Commission puts it: 'D, a taxi driver, is asked by a group of armed men to drive to a public house in the East End of London. D believes that they will commit an offence of violence and, from their comments to each other, he concludes that the offence might be robbery or it might be causing grievous bodily harm with intent', LC 300, para A.52.

from the form of secondary liability that may arise under DPP v Maxwell.⁵⁸² First, P need not perform any act or commit any offence; D's liability is inchoate, not dependent on P, and is complete as soon as D has performed his act. Secondly, D's mens rea under s 46 must be a belief that one of the crimes will be committed. Thirdly, it is unnecessary for the prosecution to specify every offence that D potentially might have encouraged or assisted but the indictment must specify all the offences which the prosecution allege D contemplated might be committed: s 46(3).⁵⁸³

As an example of its operation, D will be liable if:

- (1) he supplies a weapon which is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more of a number of offences (eg one or more robberies or murders⁵⁸⁴); and
- (2) D believes that his act of supplying the weapon to P will (not might) encourage or assist the commission of at least one of those offences; and
- (3) although it cannot be proved that D had a belief or intent as to which one will be committed, it can be proved that D believes that one or more such offences will (not might) be committed;⁵⁸⁵ and
- (4) D believes or is reckless as to whether, when P is to perform the conduct element of the offence, P will do so with the mens rea required for that offence (or D's state of mind is such that were he to do it, it would be done with the fault required); and
- (5) D believes or is reckless as to whether, were the conduct to be done by P, it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences, if any, of which the offence requires proof.

It is as easy as that.

The maximum penalty for an offence under s 46 is life imprisonment if one of the anticipated offences is murder: s 58(5). If none of the anticipated offences is murder but one or more is an imprisonable offence, the maximum penalty is that for whichever offence has the highest or an unlimited fine.

11.4.6.1 Actus reus

D's conduct needs only to be capable of assisting or encouraging. There is no requirement that the conduct does in fact encourage or assist P or anyone. As under s 44, D's conduct can be a 'course of conduct'.⁵⁸⁶ Similarly, conduct capable of assisting or encouraging includes threats or putting pressure on another person.⁵⁸⁷ The extended definitions from s 65 apply⁵⁸⁸ (taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought, and failing to fulfil a duty) but failing to assist a police officer preventing a breach of the peace does not amount to an offence.⁵⁸⁹ Under s 66, if D arranges for P to do an act capable of encouraging or assisting X, and P does that act, D is treated as also having done it.

⁵⁸² Rudi Fortson also points out that it is inaccurate to argue that s 46 simply embodies the Maxwell principles. He makes the cogent point that the limits of liability under Maxwell are themselves ill-defined: [2014] Crim LR 61.

⁵⁸³ Fortson, n 553, para 6.71. This is subject to the caveat that the Court of Appeal initially took a different approach in Sadique [2011] EWCA Crim 2872, [2012] Crim LR 449, discussed later.

⁵⁸⁴ Parliament may have had in mind different types/categories of offences rather than multiple offences of the same kind.

⁵⁸⁵ Section 46(1)(b)(i).

⁵⁸⁶ Section 67.

⁵⁸⁷ Section 65(1).

⁵⁸⁸ '(a) taking steps to reduce the possibility of criminal proceedings being brought in respect of that offence; (b) failing to take reasonable steps to discharge a duty.'

⁵⁸⁹ Section 65(3).

11.4.6.2 Mens rea

There are no fewer than five elements of mens rea to be proved (depending on the type of anticipated offence).

D's belief that he will assist or encourage: s 46(b)(ii)

D must believe that his act will encourage or assist the conduct element of each offence. It is not necessary that the Crown establish a belief as to which offence will be committed.

D's belief as to offences: s 46(b)(i)

D must believe that one or more criminal acts will be committed. It is sufficient that D believes that the offence or one of the offences will be committed if certain conditions apply (s 49(7)). So, for example, if D encourages P to burgle the house and to use force to enter if necessary, D will be encouraging criminal damage and burglary.

D's belief as to one of a number of offences

If the allegation is that D believed one or more of a number of offences would be committed and that his act would encourage or assist the commission of one or more of them, by s 47(4), it is sufficient to prove that D believed:

- (a) that one or more of a number of acts would be done which would amount to the commission of one or more of those offences; and
- (b) that his act would encourage or assist the doing of one or more of those acts.

The aim of the provision is to allow for a conviction where, although it cannot be proved that D had a belief or intent as to which criminal act will be committed, it can be proved that D believes that one or more such acts will (not might) be committed, and subject to the further mens rea requirements of s 47(5). Note that the section refers to the 'act' of P. This suggests that if D does an act which might assist or encourage murder or arson, it is enough that he believes that at least one of the criminal acts (setting fire to a deserted building) would be done which would (not might) amount to the crime in question.⁵⁹⁰

In the first appeal in *Sadique*⁵⁹¹ (as an interlocutory appeal) the Court of Appeal held that since D must believe that an identified offence will be committed, each offence which his act is capable of assisting or encouraging (ie the reference offence) must be charged as a separate count on the indictment. Consider D who supplied P with a baseball bat and believed that P would use it, and that the offences P might use it to commit were assault or robbery or GBH or to kill, but D was not sure which. P was arrested before using the weapon. On the Court of Appeal's approach in this first Sadique appeal the Crown would have to have counts of assault, robbery, GBH and murder when charging D under s 46. If the jury returned a guilty verdict on one (or more of those), the judge would be able to sentence appropriately knowing the factual basis of the guilty verdict.⁵⁹²

This decision was welcomed by some commentators on the basis that it would make the task of the judge easier and fairer when sentencing defendants found guilty under s 46.⁵⁹³ There were others, however, who took the view that the effect of the decision was to make the offence even more complex and effectively render it redundant.⁵⁹⁴

⁵⁹⁰ See further Fortson, Blackstone's Guide to the Serious Crime Act 2007, para 6.71.

⁵⁹¹ [2011] EWCA Crim 2872, [2012] Crim LR 449.

⁵⁹² On the approach to sentencing defendants who have been convicted under s 46, see McCaffery [2014] EWCA Crim 2550 and Hall [2013] EWCA Crim 2499.

⁵⁹³ Fortson [2012] Crim LR 449.

⁵⁹⁴ G Virgo, 'Legislative Comment; Encouraging or Assisting More Than One Offence' [2012] 2 Arch Rev 6 and 'Making Sense of Section 46 of the Serious Crime Act 2007' [2013] 7 Arch Rev 4.

The Court of Appeal revisited the issue in a second appeal in the same case⁵⁹⁵ (this time after conviction). In the second appeal, the Court of Appeal agreed with the criticism that requiring the prosecution to specify each reference offence as a separate count on the indictment collapsed the distinction between ss 45 and 46. Lord Judge CJ held that if Parliament creates three distinct criminal offences (ss 44 to 46) it is not open to a court to set one or other of them aside. Although it did not explicitly say so, this later decision overturned the earlier one and so it is not necessary for the Crown to specify each reference offence as a separate count on the indictment.⁵⁹⁶

D's mens rea as to P's mens rea

Where the anticipated crime is one requiring mens rea, D must believe or be reckless as to whether P would act with the mens rea for one⁵⁹⁷ (or more) of the anticipated offences with which he would be charged: s 47(5). For example, where D encourages P to commit sexual touching or rape on V, D is liable under the s 46 offence for encouraging if he does acts capable of encouraging P, and believes or is reckless (subjectively) as to whether P would commit either one of the offences with the mens rea for that offence. It is also sufficient under s 47(5)(a)(iii) that D's state of mind was such that, were he to do it, it would be done with that fault. This deals with the cases where D would have mens rea if he had committed the substantive offence personally, even though he does not believe and is not reckless as to whether P would have the mens rea.

D's mens rea as to circumstances and consequences of P's act

If the offence is one requiring proof of particular circumstances or consequences (or both), D must also have mens rea as to the consequences and circumstances of one of the⁵⁹⁸ anticipated offences: s 47(5). D must either believe that, were the act to be done, it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences; or be reckless as to whether or not it would be done in those circumstances or with those consequences. Using the sex offences example, D must believe or be reckless as to whether the person, V, whom he has encouraged P to touch sexually/rape would lack consent if P performed the relevant act (penetration or sexual touching). It is sufficient that D believes/is reckless as to the existence of the circumstances for either one offence.

11.4.6.3 Defences

There is no need for any of the anticipated offences to occur: s 47(4). It is sufficient to prove that D believed that one or more of a number of acts would be done which would amount to the commission of one or more of those offences; and that his act would encourage or assist the doing of one or more of those acts. There is no requirement that any offence is actually committed: s 49(1). It is a defence for D to prove that he acted reasonably under s 50. D cannot be liable if he is a 'victim': s 51.

11.4.6.4 Which offences are capable of being assisted or encouraged

In deciding under s 46 whether an act is capable of encouraging or assisting the commission of one or more of a number of offences, listed offences in Sch 3 are to be disregarded.⁵⁹⁹

⁵⁹⁵ Sadique [2013] EWCA Crim 1150, (2013) 72 CLJ 497, [2014] Crim LR 61.

⁵⁹⁶ The decision has been criticized. How is a judge to know how to sentence in the example posed? If P was going to commit murder the maximum sentence is life; if assault, six months. On the basis that an individual has a right under the ECHR to know the factual basis upon which he has been convicted and falls to be sentenced, and that s 46 as interpreted in Sadique [2013] EWCA Crim 1150, [2014] Crim LR 61 violates this principle, see Fortson [2014] Crim LR 61. Unsurprisingly, the decision was welcomed by Virgo. See [2013] 7 Arch Rev 4.

⁵⁹⁷ See s 48(2). ⁵⁹⁸ Section 48(2).

⁵⁹⁹ Sch 3 offences are dozens of statutory forms of incitement including solicitation to murder.

D cannot be convicted under s 46 of encouraging or assisting a conspiracy to commit an offence.⁶⁰⁰ Nor can D be liable under s 46 for doing an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting P to attempt to commit an offence.⁶⁰¹ Nor can D be liable under s 46 for encouraging or assisting P to do act which is capable of assisting X to commit a crime.⁶⁰² Nor is there an offence of encouraging or assisting P to commit a statutory incitement of X.⁶⁰³

11.4.7 Procedure

Where a prosecuting authority has power to prosecute the substantive offence which D is alleged to have assisted or encouraged, it will also have power to initiate a prosecution for an offence of encouraging or assisting the commission of that substantive offence: s 54(2)(b).

Under s 55 if D is acquitted of an offence contrary to ss 44 to 46 of the Act, he may be found guilty of an 'alternative offence' as defined by s 57(4) and (9).

Where the substantive offence which D is alleged to have assisted or encouraged requires the consent of the Attorney General or the DPP before a prosecution can commence, that consent must be obtained before proceedings are initiated under Part 2 of the 2007 Act: s 54(2).

11.4.8 Jurisdiction

D may be liable in England and Wales no matter where he was at the time of the acts of encouragement or assistance provided he knows or believes that what he anticipates might take place wholly or partly in England and Wales: s 52(1). Where D does not know or believe that the acts of encouragement or assistance might take place in England and Wales he may only be guilty under s 45 if Sch 4 applies (as in relation to s 44). Paragraph 1 of Sch 4 provides jurisdiction where D does an act in England and Wales, capable of encouraging or assisting an offence, and knows or believes that what he anticipates might take place outside England and Wales but the full offence is one for which P could be tried in England and Wales if it were committed outside England and Wales, or relevant conditions exist that would make it so triable. D in England who sends a gun to P in Madrid to shoot V can be tried under s 44 because if P shot V the murder would be triable here.⁶⁰⁴

Schedule 4, para 2, provides jurisdiction where D does an act in England and Wales, capable of encouraging or assisting an offence, and knows or believes that what he anticipates might take place in a country outside England and Wales but what he anticipates is also an offence under the law in force in that country. Where D in England sends P in Paris a letter telling him to rape a child in France, D is guilty of the s 44 offence since rape of a child is an offence in French law.

Schedule 4, para 3, provides jurisdiction where D does an act outside England and Wales, capable of encouraging or assisting an offence, and knows or believes that what he anticipates might take place outside England and Wales but the offence is one for which it would be possible to prosecute the person who provides encouragement or assistance in England

⁶⁰⁰ Sch 3, para 32.

⁶⁰¹ ibid, para 33.

⁶⁰² Section 49(4). The Law Commission regarded this as an over-extension of criminal liability: LC 300, paras 7.12–7.13.

⁶⁰³ As noted earlier, if D arranges for P to do an act capable of encouraging or assisting and P does that act D is treated as also having done it: s 66.

⁶⁰⁴ Without deciding the matter conclusively, the Court of Appeal (Civ Div) has stated that it is unnecessary for the English court to find that P has committed an offence triable in England and Wales. Rather, the question is whether any conduct which the UK national is assisting would be within the jurisdiction of the English court if P were a UK national. See R (Khan) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2014] EWCA Civ 24, [15]–[16].

and Wales if he were to commit the offence as a principal in that place. D, a British citizen on holiday in Spain, sends to his friend P in France instructions on how to assassinate V in Paris. Since the murder could be tried in England, D would be liable for the s 44 offence.

Where the offence is one listed in Sch 4, the Attorney General's consent is required: s 53.

11.5 Inchoate crime and impossibility

The problem of impossibility is peculiar to the 'inchoate' offences that are the subject of this chapter.⁶⁰⁵ If it is impossible to commit a crime, obviously no one can be convicted of committing it. It does not follow that no one can be convicted of attempting or conspiring or assisting/encouraging another to commit the crime. It is a fact that people sometimes do attempt, conspire and encourage others to do what is impossible. This happens only when D does not realize that what he has in view is impossible; that is, he is making a mistake of some kind, as for example when he tries to kill someone who (unknown to him) is already dead.

It is well established that in some circumstances a conviction for attempt, conspiracy or assisting/encouraging to commit an offence might be proper, although the commission of that offence was impossible. There has been great controversy about the circumstances in which impossibility will afford a defence and those in which it will not.

Several different categories of impossibility need to be considered in detail.

11.5.1 Impossibility and non-existent crimes

One category of case can be disposed of easily. That is where the crime is 'impossible' in the sense that the intended result is not a crime at all but D, because of his ignorance or mistake of criminal law, believes that it is. Here, the law is the same for all inchoate offences and it is clear that none of them is committed. Suppose that D comes from a country where adultery is a crime and he thinks that it is a crime in England. He may attempt the commission of adultery by chatting up his wife's friend. The 'offence' he has in mind is non-existent in England, its 'commission' is impossible and he is guilty of no offence.⁶⁰⁶ The same is true for conspiracy and assisting/encouraging.

11.5.2 Impossibility in fact

In all the other cases to be considered below, we are discussing cases where there is a crime that exists and is capable of being committed and D has the mens rea of that ulterior offence—he intends that it shall be committed; but because of some fact as to which he is ignorant or mistaken, either:

- (1) the result he intends cannot be achieved; or
- (2) the result he intends, if achieved, will not be the crime that he believed would be committed.

Into category (1) fall cases where the means used are inadequate to achieve the intended result and where the subject matter or victim of the intended offence does not exist. Category

⁶⁰⁵ See generally Duff, Criminal Attempts, Ch 3, and see S Christie, 'The Relevance of Harm as the Criterion for the Punishment of Impossible Attempts' (2009) 73 J Crim L 153.

⁶⁰⁶ See the discussion in Ch 9, p 337, of the case of Taaffe [1983] 2 All ER 625, CA, [1983] Crim LR 536 and commentary, Taaffe [1984] AC 539, [1984] Crim LR 356, HL.

(2) comprises cases where some circumstance, which is an element of the intended crime, does not exist. D believes that he is committing a crime, because he is making a mistake, not of criminal law, but of fact. For example, D intends that he (or the person with whom he conspires⁶⁰⁷) shall have sexual intercourse with V, whom he believes to be 15. V is 16 and consequently the 'result' (intercourse with V) will not be the crime that D intended. At one time,⁶⁰⁸ it was thought that the distinction between categories (1) and (2) was material but, as the law now stands, it makes no difference. The law now is that:

- (1) common law conspiracies are governed by the common law;
- (2) statutory conspiracy and attempt are governed by the Criminal Law Act 1977, s 1(1), as amended,⁶⁰⁹ and the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 1(2) and (3), respectively. Assisting and encouraging are governed by the SCA 2007.

11.5.2.1 Impossibility in common law conspiracies

*DPP v Nock*⁶¹⁰ holds that impossibility is a general defence for common law conspiracies. It seems that the only exception is that D may be convicted where the impossibility results merely from the inadequacy of the means used, or to be used, to commit the offence.

So, for example, D will not be guilty of common law conspiracy where:

- (1) the subject matter of the offence does not exist. D agrees with E to defraud V of her diamond ring. V had already sold it before D and E agreed.

On the other hand, D may be guilty of common law conspiracy to defraud where:

- (2) he agrees with E to use a phishing scam on the internet to defraud investors, but the phishing software program will not operate on his computer.⁶¹¹

11.5.2.2 Statutory conspiracies and attempts

For statutory conspiracies the law is to be found in s 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977⁶¹² as amended by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 and, for attempts, it is in s 1(2) and (3) of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 which provides:

- (2) A person may be guilty of attempting to commit an offence to which this section applies even though the facts are such that the commission of the offence is impossible.
- (3) In any case where—
 - (a) apart from this subsection a person's intention would not be regarded as having amounted to an intent to commit an offence; but
 - (b) if the facts of the case had been as he believed them to be, his intention would be so regarded, then for the purposes of subsection (1) above he shall be regarded as having an intent to commit that offence.

Section 1(3) is strictly unnecessary but it was wise to include it as a matter of caution. It is unnecessary because under it no one will 'be regarded as having an intention to commit that offence' who does not in fact have that intent. It would be wholly wrong to impute a ⁶⁰⁷ The 2007 Act makes no provision for impossibility under the new ss 44–46 offences. See later.

⁶⁰⁸ See the first three editions of this book. See also RA Duff, 'Attempts and the Problem of the Missing Circumstance' (1991) 42 NILQ 87; and White, Misleading Cases.

⁶⁰⁹ See p 437. ⁶¹⁰ [1978] AC 979, [1978] Crim LR 483, HL, p 445.

⁶¹¹ Where D agrees with E being unaware that E is a police officer, D's plea of impossibility will fail: Gleeson [2003] EWCA Crim 3357, [2004] 1 Cr App R 29, [2004] Crim LR 579.

⁶¹² See p 437.

non-existent intent to a defendant and the Act does not do so. In other words, the subsection does nothing—except forestall the following fallacious argument.

- (1) D (believing them to be stolen) intends to handle certain goods.
- (2) Those goods are not stolen.
- (3) Therefore D does not intend to handle stolen goods.

Section 1(3) says he shall be regarded as having an intention to handle stolen goods. Of course, he has such an intention anyway. The fact that the goods are not stolen, being unknown to him, is wholly irrelevant in determining his intention.

The gist of the two provisions is that for both statutory conspiracy and attempt there must be an intention to commit the offence⁶¹³ contemplated. Once that intention is proved, it is immaterial that it is in fact impossible to commit the substantive offence if, in the case of conspiracy, there has been an agreement to commit it and in the case of an attempt, a more than merely preparatory step towards its commission. The provisions have no application to the cases considered previously where there is no crime to commit despite D's intention to do so (eg adultery in England).

As an example of the section in operation, if D tries to break into V's safe to steal a diamond but there is no diamond present, D is guilty of attempting to steal the diamond. Similarly, if D and E agree that they will use D's jemmy to break into V's safe and steal a diamond, but there is no diamond, D and E are guilty of conspiracy to steal the diamond.

The proper construction of the Criminal Attempts Act was controversial but it is now settled by the decision of the House of Lords in Shivpuri.⁶¹⁴ It seems reasonable to assume that the same interpretation will be put on the amended s 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977 (statutory conspiracy), for that section was amended by s 5 of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 to keep the law of attempt and conspiracy in line in this respect.

In the case of attempts, it must be proved that D had an intention to commit the crime in question. Once that is established, the only question is whether, with that intent, he has done an act which is 'more than merely preparatory' to the commission of the offence. Since, ex hypothesi, the offence is impossible, it is the offence envisaged by D to which the act in question must be more than merely preparatory. The effect is that the court must ask, 'would the act (eg breaking into the safe) have been more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence (theft of the diamond) if the facts had been as D believed them to be (diamond within the safe)?'

In the case of conspiracy, it must be proved that D agreed with another or others that a course of conduct is to be pursued (breaking into the safe) which, in the circumstances believed by the parties to exist (diamond in the safe), will, in the event of their intention being achieved (theft of the diamond), amount to or involve the commission of the offence (theft).⁶¹⁵ It is then immaterial that the circumstances are in fact such that the offence is impossible, or that the results can never be achieved.

In the following examples, D will be guilty both of statutory conspiracy and attempt.

- (1) D and E agree that they will administer a poison, which D has acquired, to V in order to kill him. D administers the poison. As a matter of fact, the poison is too weak ever to kill anyone. D and E are guilty of conspiracy, and D of an attempt to murder V.

⁶¹³ For conspiracy, pace Lord Bridge in Anderson, p 453.

⁶¹⁴ [1987] AC 1, [1986] Crim LR 536, HL.

⁶¹⁵ It has been argued earlier that this is the only sensible interpretation of the phrase 'course of conduct' and that the amendment by the 1981 Act was strictly unnecessary. The 1981 amendment may, however, be taken to reinforce this opinion.

- (2) D and E agree that they will steal from V's safe. D attempts to break open the safe. It is empty. D and E are guilty of conspiracy, and D of an attempt to steal from the safe.
- (3) D and E agree that they will murder V. D shoots at V's heart but V is already dead. D and E are guilty of conspiracy to murder, and D of attempted murder.⁶¹⁶
- (4) D and E agree that they will receive from F certain goods which they believe to be stolen goods. D takes possession of the goods. The goods are not stolen goods. D and E are guilty of conspiracy, and D of an attempt to handle stolen goods.
- (5) D and E agree that D will have consensual sexual intercourse with V, a girl whom they believe to be aged 15. D has sexual intercourse with her. In fact she is 16. D and E are guilty of conspiracy, and D of an attempt to engage in sexual activity with a child under the age of 16.

Examples (2) and (3) would not have been offences at common law under the principles established in Haughton v Smith and Nock, but those decisions are now generally recognized to have been unduly restrictive. It is the cases exemplified by illustrations (4) and (5) which have been the subject of much controversy.⁶¹⁷ The reason is that, in these cases, if D succeeds in doing the precise thing that he set out to do, he will not commit a crime. D takes possession of the very goods he intended to take possession of—no other—and that is no offence, for the goods are not stolen goods. D has sexual intercourse with the girl he intends to have intercourse with. She is 16 and consents so there is nothing unlawful. How, then, can his taking steps towards the accomplishment of something that is no crime be a conspiracy or an attempt to commit it? Bramwell B ridiculed the idea in *Collins*⁶¹⁸ in 1864. He put the case of D who takes an umbrella from the stand near the door of his club, intending to steal it, but it turns out to be his own umbrella. Bramwell B thought it absurd that D should be convicted of attempting to steal it. Arguments of this kind prevailed in the House of Lords in *Anderton v Ryan*⁶¹⁹ but were then rejected in *Shivpuri*⁶²⁰ barely a year later.

In Anderton v Ryan, D bought a video recorder for £110. Later she said to police, 'I may as well be honest, it was a stolen one I bought . . .' She was charged with handling and attempted handling. The prosecution, presumably believing that they were unable to prove that the video had in fact been stolen, offered no evidence on the first charge. The magistrates were not satisfied that the recorder had been stolen, though D believed it had. They dismissed the charge. The Divisional Court allowed the prosecution's appeal⁶²¹ but the House of Lords, Lord Edmund-Davies dissenting, restored the decision of the magistrates. Section 1(3) of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, said Lord Roskill, 'does not compel the conclusion that an erroneous belief in the existence of facts which, if true, would have made his completed act a crime makes him guilty of an attempt to commit that crime'. Because the House thought the conclusion absurd, they were not going to reach it unless compelled to do so.

In Shivpuri, D was arrested by customs officials while in possession of a suitcase. He admitted that he knew it contained prohibited drugs. Analysis showed that the material in the suitcase was not a prohibited drug but a vegetable material akin to snuff. He was convicted of attempting to be knowingly concerned in dealing with a prohibited drug, contrary ⁶¹⁶ See also the example of Brown [2004] EWCA Crim 744, [2004] Crim LR 665 where D was rightly convicted of attempting to pervert the course of justice having put in train the machinery of public justice (by alleging he had been abused by V) which, if the matter were carried through in a way he wished or foresaw, would cause a risk to an innocent person (who was, unknown to D, already dead).

⁶¹⁷ The powerful article which influenced the decision in Shivpuri is G Williams, 'The Lords and Impossible Attempts' (1986) 45 CLJ 33.

⁶¹⁸ (1864) 9 Cox CC 497 at 498.

⁶¹⁹ [1985] AC 560, [1985] Crim LR 503, HL.

⁶²⁰ [1987] AC 1, [1986] Crim LR 536, HL.

⁶²¹ [1985] 1 All ER 138, [1984] Crim LR 483, QB.

to s 1(1) of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 and s 170(1)(b) of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. His appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal⁶²² and, overruling Anderton v Ryan, by the House of Lords. No distinction is to be drawn between 'objectively innocent' acts (taking one's own umbrella, receiving non-stolen goods, handling snuff) and 'guilty' acts, for the purposes of the law of attempts. The law is as stated previously.⁶²³

Since it must be proved that D intended to commit the crime in question, he is argued to be morally at least as bad as the person who actually commits the offence and, where the offence may be committed with some lesser degree of mens rea, perhaps worse; and he is as dangerous to whatever interest the particular law is designed to protect as the person who actually commits the offence. It is sometimes objected that he is punished solely for his thoughts but this is not true because it must be proved (in the case of an attempt) that he has taken such steps to put his intention into execution as would (if the facts were as he believed) be more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence. In the case of conspiracy (not expressly considered in Shivpuri but presumably governed by the same principles), he must have agreed with another that the offence be committed—the usual actus reus of conspiracy.

It is also argued that the conclusion offends against the principle of legality (no one shall be convicted of doing something which has not been declared by the law to be an offence).⁶²⁴ But the issue in these cases was the proper construction of the statute. If Parliament has said (and the House ultimately decided that it has) that it is to be an offence (attempt) to do any act which is more than merely preparatory with intent to commit an offence, the law may be criticized for being too wide-ranging; but the conviction of one who does any such act with that intent can no longer be criticized for breaching the principle of legality.

The breadth of the law is such that there may be cases where prosecution would be ill-advised. Bramwell B's man who took his own umbrella would no doubt be surprised to find himself charged with attempting to steal his own umbrella. D who has succeeded in having consensual sexual intercourse with V, a 16-year-old, might be astonished to find himself charged in consequence with attempting to commit a sexual offence against a person under 16. As such acts are objectively innocent, the offence is unlikely to come to light unless D advertises the fact that he acted with mens rea. There will be other cases, however, where a prosecution is in the public interest. The would-be drug smuggler, exemplified by Shivpuri, is an instance. It may well be that their lordships' change of mind was influenced by the fact that Anderton v Ryan would have required them to turn such dangerous persons loose on the public. Perhaps the most important case in practice is that of the person who receives goods wrongly believing them to be stolen. Mrs Ryan's was an unusual and trivial case. Typical of the case where a prosecution is likely to be brought is Haughton v Smith itself. A van, heavily laden with stolen corned beef, was intercepted by the police. Having discovered that the intended recipient was D, the police allowed it to proceed on its way, but under the control of disguised policemen. D received the goods, believing them to be stolen. However, the beef ceased to be stolen goods when the police took control of it.⁶²⁵ The House held that he was not guilty of attempted handling but now he could plainly be convicted. The public interest called for his conviction no less than if the police had never intercepted the goods.

⁶²² [1985] QB 1029, [1985] Crim LR 43, CA.

⁶²³ See p 497.

⁶²⁴ B Hogan, 'The Principle of Legality' (1986) 136 NLJ 267. For comparative analysis of the problem of impossible attempts in England, the Netherlands and Germany, see J Keiler, Actus Reus and Participation in European Criminal Law (2013) 394–404.

⁶²⁵ See p 497.

Two doubtful cases

Mistakes of civil law

It has been noted that an intention to commit a non-existent crime (adultery) arising from a mistake as to the criminal law involves no liability.⁶²⁶ A more difficult case is that where D has an intention to commit an existing offence because he is making a mistake of civil law. Believing that the law requires him to use money for a particular purpose, D dishonestly uses the money for another purpose. If his belief was true, he would be guilty of theft. Actually the law allows him to do what he likes with the money and he commits no substantive offence.⁶²⁷ He intends to steal and has done his best to do so. In principle, the case is difficult to distinguish from those where the intent to commit an offence is attributable to a mistake of fact; but the use of the word 'facts' in s 1(3)(b) is likely to exclude liability.

Reckless impossible attempts?

If we follow the decision in *Pace and Rogers*⁶²⁸ the mens rea requirement for an attempt is intention as to every element of the substantive offence. However, prior to that decision the leading authority was that of *Khan*⁶²⁹ discussed earlier. That case recognized that for attempts recklessness as to circumstances will suffice, if that suffices for the substantive offence. That raised the spectre of the reckless/impossible attempt.⁶³⁰ D burns V's rubbish on his bonfire, and V consents in fact to that act, but D is not sure whether V consented or not. Is he guilty of attempted criminal damage? In the context of subjective reckless rape, Glanville Williams thought a person who was not sure if V was consenting must be guilty of attempted rape even if V was consenting, but he thought that no prosecution should ensue. A possible answer is that s 1(3) of the Criminal Attempts Act requires us to treat D as if the facts were 'as he believed them to be' which removes the impossibility defence. This affords some ground for holding that even if Khan is followed the reckless/impossible attempt is still no offence. For the reasons given above, it is submitted that Khan adopts the correct interpretation.

11.5.2.3 Assisting and encouraging

The SCA 2007 makes no reference to the position regarding impossibility. The Law Commission believed that impossibility would be no defence under its scheme,⁶³¹ and that that is what the Act achieves by its silence.⁶³² If D encourages P or assists by providing him with the gun to kill V (who unknown to D is already dead), there are strong arguments for saying that D ought to be liable for assisting or encouraging murder. His conduct is no less blameworthy than those who attempt or conspire to murder in such circumstances. D has done an act capable of encouraging P to perform the conduct element of the offence of murder. The Act would seem to provide no defence of impossibility for D in such a case. The Commission provides the following example:

if D . . . provides P with a weapon believing that P will use it to attack V1 (intending to kill V1), D is guilty of assisting murder irrespective of whether P uses the weapon to attack anyone. Were P to attack and murder V2, instead of V1, D would be equally guilty of encouraging or assisting murder. If P attacked V2 because V1 was already dead at the time that D provided the weapon, D would still be guilty of encouraging or assisting murder. It may have been impossible for V1 to be murdered but, nonetheless, D had done an act capable of encouraging or assisting the conduct element of murder, namely an attack on any human being.⁶³³

⁶²⁶ See p 337. ⁶²⁷ Commentary on Huskinson [1988] Crim LR 620 at 622.

⁶²⁸ [2014] EWCA Crim 186, p 415. ⁶²⁹ See p 417.

⁶³⁰ G Williams [1983] Crim LR 365 at 375. ⁶³¹ LC 300, para 6.61.

⁶³² LC 318, para 5.42. The Law Commission conclusion appears in a footnote only.

⁶³³ LC 300, para 6.63.

This case would appear to be dealt with by the Act.

It is less clear that the silence of the Act deals with the case where D provides P with an article which he thinks is capable of assisting in the commission of a crime, but it is never going to be of assistance in committing any crime. Consider D who provides P with a plastic card which D believes is capable of assisting P to enter hotel bedrooms to steal therein. The card is not capable of opening any door. There is no magnetic strip and no data can be held on it. It would be arguable that because the card will not be 'capable of assisting or encouraging P' to commit the conduct element of the offence of burglary, impossibility is a defence. Consider D who sends P in prison a Monopoly 'get out of jail free' card. That act is clearly not capable of assisting or encouraging escape. What then of D who provides the would-be assassin with what he thinks are live bullets but are blanks? One answer is to charge D with attempting to assist or encourage in such situations.

11.5.3 The future of impossibility

In Shivpuri, Lord Hailsham, with whom Lord Elwyn-Jones and Lord MacKay concurred, offered reasons why Anderton v Ryan was distinguishable (even though they concurred in overruling it). That might suggest that Shivpuri was open to challenge. It is now surely too late to resurrect arguments which were in substance rejected in *Shivpuri*⁶³⁴ and which have been settled for over 30 years.

⁶³⁴ See the analysis of Lord Hailsham's speech at [1986] Crim LR 539–541. For attempts to reconcile the two decisions, see RA Duff, 'Regarding Intention: The Criminal Attempts Act 1981 s 1(3)' (1990) XII(2) Liverpool L Rev 161, and Duff, Criminal Attempts, 378–384.

Part II

Particular Crimes

12	Murder	503
13	Voluntary manslaughter	520
14	Involuntary manslaughter	568
15	Further homicide and related offences	615
16	Non-fatal offences against the person	657
17	Sexual offences	756
18	Theft	826
19	Robbery	895
20	Offences of temporary deprivation	903
21	Making off without payment	919
22	The Fraud Act 2006	926
23	Other offences involving fraud	980
24	Blackmail and related offences	996
25	Burglary and related offences	1007
26	Handling and related offences	1031
27	Offences of damage to property	1069
28	Computer misuse offences	1101
29	Forgery (available at www.oup.com/uk/sho/)	1116
30	Obscene communication and publication offences (available at www.oup.com/uk/sho/)	1117
31	Offences against public order (available at www.oup.com/uk/sho/)	1118
32	Selected road traffic offences (available at www.oup.com/uk/sho/)	1119

12

Murder

12.1 Definition

Although it is generally regarded as the most serious crime (apart perhaps from treason) the offence of murder has not been defined by statute. The Law Commission has described it as a 'rickety structure set upon shaky foundations'.¹ Indeed, the classic definition derives from a book from the seventeenth century. That definition, provided by Coke, is:

Murder is when a man of sound memory, and of the age of discretion, unlawfully killeth within any county of the realm any reasonable creature in rerum natura under the king's peace, with malice aforethought, either expressed by the party or implied by law, [so as the party wounded, or hurt, etc die of the wound or hurt, etc within a year and a day after the same].²

Over a decade ago, the Law Commission conducted a comprehensive review of the existing scope of the offence and made far-reaching recommendations for reform.³ These are discussed later in the chapter. The government has, after initially indicating that it would consider legislative change,⁴ subsequently decided not to take forward the recommendations.⁵

12.1.1 Who can commit murder?

'A man [sic] of sound memory and of the age of discretion' means simply a person who is responsible according to the general principles which have been discussed in Ch 9. Such a person must be at least ten,⁶ not insane within the M'Naghten Rules and, since 1957,⁷ not suffering from diminished responsibility.⁸

A corporation or other organization cannot be tried for murder because it cannot suffer the only penalty allowed by law, life imprisonment.⁹

¹ LCCP 177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005) para 1.4. The history of the offence is summarized in LCCP 177 at paras 1.92–1.103.

² Co 3 Inst 47. As to the words in parentheses, see p 508.

³ See LCCP 177 and LC 304, Murder Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006). Both these documents contain valuable analysis of the existing law meriting close attention.

⁴ See the written Ministerial Statement of Maria Eagle, 12 Dec 2007.

⁵ MOJ, Report on the Implementation of Law Commission Proposals (2011) para 54.

⁶ See the discussion of the doli incapax defence, p 341.

⁷ See s 2 of the Homicide Act 1957, as substituted by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, see Ch 13.

⁸ The fact that D suffers ADHD does not necessarily preclude D having formed an intent: Osborne [2010] EWCA Crim 547, [36].

⁹ See p 599 for possible liability for manslaughter.

12.1.2 Where murder can be committed

If the killing is by a British citizen, the courts have jurisdiction even if the killing was not within ‘any county of the realm’.¹⁰ Murder and manslaughter are among the exceptional cases where the English courts have jurisdiction over offences committed abroad. By s 9 of the OAPA 1861¹¹ and s 3 of the British Nationality Act 1948, a murder or manslaughter committed by a British citizen on land anywhere out of the UK may be tried in England or Northern Ireland as if it had been committed there.¹² Homicides on a British ship¹³ or aircraft¹⁴ are also triable here, whether committed by a British subject or not; those on a foreign ship (outside territorial waters¹⁵) may be triable if committed by a British citizen who ‘does not belong’ to that ship.¹⁶ There are other statutory extensions under which murder may be tried in England and Wales irrespective of the killer’s nationality.¹⁷

12.1.3 Who can be the victim?

Though it is only in relation to murder that a discussion arises as to who qualifies as a victim,¹⁸ it is clear that, in principle, the same rules must apply to assaults and offences against the person generally.¹⁹ Coke’s ‘reasonable creature in Rerum natura’ is simply the ‘person’ who is the victim of an offence in the modern law of offences against the person—that is, any human being.²⁰ The problems are at what stage in the process of birth a foetus becomes a person; and at what stage in the process of death a person becomes a corpse. Article 2 of the ECHR provides a right to life, and this imposes on the State certain obligations to ¹⁰ See generally on jurisdiction, M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) 226–232.

¹¹ The effect of s 9 is not to create a new statutory offence of murder, but rather to expand the territorial reach of common law murder and manslaughter: Venclovas [2013] EWCA Crim 2182, applying s 4 of the Suppression of Terrorism Act 1978. See commentary by Ormerod at [2014] Crim LR 684.

¹² See CLRC, Offences Against the Person Working Paper 67; Offences Against the Person Report 125. There is no provision enabling a murder committed in Scotland to be tried in England. See for discussion M Hirst, ‘Murder in England or Murder in Scotland’ (1995) 54 CLJ 488. Homicides committed abroad by non-British citizens may be tried here if the offences are under the War Crimes Act 1991, see Sawoniuk [2000] Cr App R 220. See also Venclovas [2013] EWCA Crim 2182—Lithuanian killing a Lithuanian in either Poland or England.

¹³ As defined in the Merchant Shipping Act 1995, s 1. The jurisdiction applies not only when sailing on the high seas, but also when in the rivers of a foreign territory at a place below bridges, where the tide ebbs and flows and where great ships go: Anderson (1868) LR 1 CCR 161. See further the Merchant Shipping Act 1995, ss 281–282.

¹⁴ Civil Aviation Act 1982, s 92. The Civil Aviation (Amendment) Act 1996, s 1(2), amending the 1982 Act, extends the jurisdiction to offences on foreign aircraft in specified circumstances. See also the Aviation Security Act 1982, s 6.

¹⁵ Jurisdiction over offences within territorial waters is given by the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act 1878, s 2.

¹⁶ Merchant Shipping Act 1995, ss 281–282.

¹⁷ See especially the Suppression of Terrorism Act 1978, s 4 and Venclovas [2013] EWCA Crim 2182. In relation to British service personnel, see the Armed Forces Act 2006, s 42 and n 47.

¹⁸ See the discussion in J Herring, Medical Law and Ethics (6th edn, 2016). For historical accounts, see D Seaborne Davies, ‘Child-Killing in English Law’ (1937) 1 MLR 203; G Williams, Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (1957) 19–23; and see J Keown and D Jones, ‘Surveying the Foundations of Medical Law: A Reassessment of Glanville Williams’ The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law’ (2008) 16 Med LR 85; SB Atkinson, ‘Life, Birth and Live Birth’ (1904) 20 LQR 134.

¹⁹ In Tait [1990] 1 QB 290, the court held that the offence of threatening to kill under s 16 of the OAPA 1861 was not made out by threats to kill a foetus. Cited with approval in CP (A Child) v First-tier Tribunal (Criminal Injuries Compensation) [2014] EWCA Civ 1554.

²⁰ Draft Code, cl 53.

protect life, and investigate the taking of life, but the European Court of Human Rights has not directly addressed the issue of when life begins and ends.²¹

12.1.3.1 Child or foetus?

It is not murder to kill a foetus/child in the womb or in the process of leaving the womb. If the child is not capable of being born alive, destruction may be an offence under s 58 of the OAPA 1861.²² Where the child is capable of being born alive, it is an offence under the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929.²³ If the child has 'an existence independent of its mother' it is capable of being murdered. To have such an existence, the child must have been wholly expelled from its mother's body and be alive.²⁴ The cord and afterbirth need not have been expelled from the mother nor severed from the child.²⁵ The tests of independent existence which the courts have accepted are that the child should have an independent circulation, and that it should have breathed after birth. But there are difficulties with both these tests.

In Brain Park J said:²⁶

it is not essential that it should have breathed at the time it was killed; as many children are born alive and yet do not breathe for some time after their birth.

There is no readily available means of determining precisely when foetal and maternal circulations become so dissociated that the child can live without the help of the mother; and this dissociation may precede birth. There is therefore uncertainty about the precise moment at which the child comes under the protection of the law of murder, though the question does not seem to have troubled the English courts in recent years. The last reported case that the Criminal Law Revision Committee could trace was in 1874.²⁷ The Committee recommended that the test should be that the victim should have been born and have an existence independent of its mother. With the rapid developments in medical science and its increasing ability to keep alive children born prematurely, the law should be careful to avoid any more rigid form of definition. As Brooke LJ observed, in holding that a conjoined twin with useless heart and lungs, dependent on her twin, was protected by the law of murder: 'Advances in medical treatment of deformed neonates suggest that the criminal law's protection should be as wide as possible, and a conclusion that a creature in being was not reasonable would be confined only to the most extreme cases of which this is not an example.'²⁸ In Iby,²⁹ the New South Wales Court of Appeal held that the decision of viability should be left largely to the jury. This is, with respect, not an approach that will promote certainty and consistency in the law. It is hoped that it will not be adopted by the English courts.

²¹ See generally Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 19.43–19.50. See also E Wicks, 'Terminating Life and Human Right: The Fetus and the Neonate' in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007).

²² See p 645. A foetus of 24 weeks' gestation is presumed capable of being born alive: Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, s 37. The prescription, supply, administration or use of the contraceptive pill, mini-pill and morning-after pill does not contravene s 58 of the OAPA: R (on the application of Smeaton) v Secretary of State for Health [2002] All ER (D) 115 (Apr), [2002] Crim LR 664. Abortion in compliance with the 1967 Act does not contravene Art 2 of the ECHR: Paton v UK [1981] 3 EHRR 408. At common law, it was a 'great misprision' (misdemeanour): Co 3 Inst 50. According to Hale, 1 PC, 433, 'a great crime'. Willes J said in 1866 (British Parliamentary Papers 21 at 274) that the crime was obsolete. (See MACL at 310.)

²³ See p 641. See generally DM Katkin and R Ogle, 'A Rationale for Infanticide Laws' [1993] Crim LR 903.

²⁴ See Poulton (1832) 5 C & P 329; Enoch (1850) 5 C & P 539.

²⁵ Reeves (1839) 9 C & P 25.

²⁶ (1834) 6 C & P 349 at 350. But see C v S and Rance v Mid-Downs Health Authority, p 642.

²⁷ Handley (1874) 13 Cox CC 79, followed by Wright J in Pritchard (1901) 17 TLR 310. Fourteenth Report, para 35.

²⁸ Per Brooke LJ in Re A [2001] Fam 147, [2001] 2 WLR 480.

²⁹ [2005] NSWCCA 178, discussed at [2005] Crim LR 742.

The European Court of Human Rights has declined to decide directly whether the foetus is protected by the right to life in Art 2. In Vo v France,³⁰ a doctor negligently caused fatal injury to a viable foetus after mistaking the mother's identity for that of a similarly named patient. The French Criminal Court acquitted him on the basis that the foetus was not a human being for the purposes of the offence. On application to the ECtHR, the Court ruled that the issue was within the margin of appreciation for Member States to determine. The Court acknowledged that in:

the circumstances examined to date by the Convention institutions—that is, in the various laws on abortion—the unborn child is not regarded as a 'person' directly protected by Article 2 of the Convention and that if the unborn do have a 'right' to 'life', it is implicitly limited by the mother's rights and interests. The Convention institutions have not, however, ruled out the possibility that in certain circumstances safeguards may be extended to the unborn child . . .

The interpretation of Art 2 has involved the Court in balancing legal, medical, philosophical, ethical and religious issues. Since there is often no consensus at a national level, it is unsurprising that the Court has left States with considerable discretion in the matter—the issue of when the right to life begins comes within the margin of appreciation.³¹

12.1.3.2 Prenatal injury and postnatal death

Where D intentionally causes injury to, or attempts to kill, the foetus, but the child is born alive and dies of the injury sustained, D has caused the death of a person in being—the actus reus of murder. Coke³² stated that he was guilty of murder. In West, Maule J directed the jury that a woman was guilty of murder if, in attempting to procure an abortion, she caused the premature birth of her child who, consequently, died five hours later. The basis of that decision, however, appears to be that D caused the death by a felonious act, a type of 'constructive murder', which was abolished by the Homicide Act 1957. In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994),³³ D stabbed his girlfriend, V, who was 26 weeks pregnant with his child, X. V recovered but, because of the wound, X was born prematurely and, as a result of the premature birth, died after 120 days. The House of Lords accepted, obiter, as an established rule, that 'Violence towards a foetus which results in harm suffered after the baby has been born alive can give rise to criminal responsibility even if the harm would not have been criminal (apart from statute) if it had been suffered in utero.'

However, establishing mens rea in such a case is complex. An intention to cause death or injury to the foetus is not the mens rea of murder,³⁴ so that intent would not suffice for murder. If D intended the child to be born alive and then die or suffer serious injury, that would be murder. D might be liable for gross negligence manslaughter if there was an obvious and unjustifiable risk of, for example, premature birth and obvious and serious risk of early death.

³⁰ [2004] 2 FCR 577, on which see K O'Donovan, 'Taking a Neutral Stance on the Legal Protection of the Fetus' (2006) 14 Med L Rev 115 and E Wicks, n 21. The Court of Appeal (Civ Div) in CP (A Child) v First-tier Tribunal (Criminal Injuries Compensation) [2014] EWCA Civ 1554 stated that 'it is clear from [Vo] that European learning on Article 2 cannot assist in determination of the matter before this court. This is an issue for individual states to determine and one which will be governed by domestic law.' At [55].

³¹ In X v Norway (App no 867/60); X v Austria (1976) 7 DR 87; X v UK (1980) 1 DR 244, the Convention institutions declined to determine the issue of the time at which life begins.

³² Co 3 Inst 50; Hawkins, 1 PC, c 31, s 16; East, 1 PC, 228; contra Hale, 1 PC, 433; West (1848) 2 Cox CC 500. See also Kwok Chuk Ming (Hong Kong, 1963) discussed in [1963] Crim LR 748 and J Temkin, 'Pre-Natal Injury, Homicide and the Draft Criminal Code' (1986) 45 CLJ 414.

³³ [1997] 3 All ER 936 at 942, HL, reversing [1996] 1 Cr App R 351, [1996] Crim LR 268, CA.

³⁴ cf Temkin (1986) 45 CLJ 414, and the Draft Code, cl 53.

In the A-G Reference case, the Court of Appeal had resolved the problem by holding that the foetus is an integral part of the mother, in the same way as her arm or leg. On that basis, an intention to kill or cause serious harm to the foetus would be an intention to cause such harm to the mother: that would be the mens rea of murder. But the House of Lords held that this approach was wrong. ‘The mother and foetus were two distinct organisms living symbiotically, not a single organism with two aspects.’

Another way of seeking to resolve the problem was by relying on the doctrine of transferred malice. D had intended GBH to the mother and that could be transferred to the child when born. The House rejected this approach too. That would involve extending the doctrine of transferred malice to what their lordships regarded as a double transfer of intent—from the mother to the foetus and from the foetus to the child. The House of Lords therefore held it was not murder. The House of Lords went on to hold that D was liable for manslaughter of the child by the unlawful and dangerous act of stabbing the mother. This is problematic for two reasons. First, it appears to be the application of transferred malice which the House had just rejected.³⁵ Secondly, D’s act relied on for unlawful act manslaughter was not merely unlawful and dangerous—it was done with the mens rea of murder and, as it is acknowledged that it caused the death of the child, it is hard to see why it is not murder.

The decision of the House of Lords was considered in CP (A Child) v First-tier Tribunal (Criminal Injuries Compensation).³⁶ The claimant was a child who was born with foetal alcohol syndrome after her mother drank excessively during pregnancy. CP claimed criminal injuries from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority. Relying upon A-G’s Reference (No 3 of 1994), it was argued on behalf of CP that her mother had maliciously administered a noxious thing to her contrary to s 23 of the OAPA 1861 whilst she was in the womb. In rejecting this contention, both Treacy LJ and Lord Dyson MR held that ‘it is well established that a foetus is not a “person;” rather it is a sui generis organism’³⁷ and that A-G’s Reference (No 3 of 1994) did not undermine the validity of this proposition, but rather supported it.

It was held in *Senior*³⁸ that where D inflicted prenatal injury by gross negligence or with a mens rea sufficient only for manslaughter, and that conduct caused death to the child after it had been born, a conviction for manslaughter was appropriate. Logically, applying that reasoning, the mother should be guilty of manslaughter for gross prenatal neglect of the child leading to death after birth; but the courts have stopped short of this conclusion.³⁹ Neglect of the child by the mother after birth may give rise to liability; neglect before the birth does not. Note also that a woman is entitled to refuse medical treatment, even though she knows that the result may be the death of the foetus, or the child if it is born alive.⁴⁰

12.1.3.3 Death

Similar problems could arise in determining the moment at which life ends, though these do not seem to have troubled the courts very often.⁴¹ Is V dead, and therefore incapable of being murdered, if his heart has stopped beating but a surgeon confidently expects to start it again, by an injection or mechanical means?⁴² Is V dead if he is in a ‘hopeless’ condition

³⁵ cf J Horder, ‘Transferred Malice and the Remoteness of Unexpected Outcomes from Intentions’ [2006] Crim LR 383. Note also Grant [2015] EWCA Crim 1815, above p 124.

³⁶ [2014] EWCA Civ 1554.

³⁷ At [39] and [62].

³⁸ (1832) 1 Mood CC 346.

³⁹ Knights (1860) 2 F & F 46; Izod (1904) 20 Cox CC 690 (Channell J); and see the discussion by Davies, MACL, 308–309.

⁴⁰ St George’s Healthcare NHS Trust v S [1998] 3 All ER 673, 685–692 (Civ Div).

⁴¹ See, however, Re A (A Child) [2015] EWHC 443 (Fam).

⁴² G Williams, Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (1957) 18.

and ‘kept alive’ only by an apparatus of some kind?⁴³ There is, at present, no certain answer to these questions. The current medical view is that the test is one of brainstem death and that this can be diagnosed with certainty.⁴⁴ The law has not yet evolved a definition of its own and the CLRC declined to propose one⁴⁵ both because of the fluid state of medical science and the repercussions that such a definition might have on other branches of the law.⁴⁶

12.1.3.4 Under the Queen’s peace

All persons appear to be ‘under the Queen’s peace’⁴⁷ for this purpose, even an alien enemy, ‘unless... in the heat of war, and in the actual exercise thereof’.⁴⁸ In Page,⁴⁹ an argument that an Egyptian national who had been murdered in an Egyptian village by a British soldier serving there was not within the Queen’s peace was rejected.⁵⁰ Enemy soldiers who have been taken prisoner or have surrendered are protected by the law of murder.⁵¹ In his analysis of the position of British service personnel in Iraq, Rowe concludes that the term is vague and, in particular, insufficiently precise to establish whether it applies to ‘non-international armed conflict abroad to which the UK is a party’.⁵² It is surprising that the argument did not arise in *Blackman*⁵³ where D killed an Afghan insurgent. D was ultimately successful in pleading diminished responsibility.

12.1.4 Death within a year and a day

The rule stated by Coke that the death must occur within a year and a day has been abolished by the Law Reform (Year and a Day Rule) Act 1996.⁵⁴ If an act can be shown to be the cause of death, it may now be murder, any other homicide offence or suicide, however much time has elapsed between the act and the death. The 1996 Act, however, requires the consent of the Attorney General to the prosecution of any person for murder, manslaughter, ⁴³ Herring, Medical Law and Ethics, Ch 9 and references therein; IM Kennedy, ‘Alive or Dead?’ (1969) 22 CLP 102 and ‘Switching Off Life Support Machines’ [1977] Crim LR 443; B Hogan, ‘A Note on Death’ [1972] Crim LR 80; P Skegg, ‘Irreversibly Comatose Individuals: Alive or Dead?’ (1964) 33 CLJ 130; Broderick Committee, Report of the Committee on Death Certification and Coroners (1971) Cmnd 4810, paras 808–812 and LC 230, The Year and a Day Rule in Homicide (1995). For more recent analysis, see J Munby, ‘Medicine and the Law of Homicide: A Case for Reform?’ (2012) 23 KLJ 207.

⁴⁴ Re A [1992] 3 Med LR 303; British Medical Journal and The Lancet, 21 Feb 1979. Cf Malcherek [1981] 1 WLR 690, p 78. For detailed medical discussion see C Pallis and D Harley, ABC of Brain Stem Death (2nd edn, 1996) and MD Bell, E Moss and PG Murphy, ‘Brainstem Death Testing in the UK: Time for Reappraisal?’ (2004) 92 Br J Anaesthesia 633–640. See further J Herring, Medical Law and Ethics.

⁴⁵ Fourteenth Report, para 37.

⁴⁶ See also the discussion relating to the termination of patients’ life-sustaining treatment, p 59.

⁴⁷ See M Hirst, ‘Murder Under the Queen’s Peace’ [2008] Crim LR 541, arguing that the element ought now to focus on whether D is subject to the English law of homicide. On this see also ACE Lynch, ‘British Subjects’ Involvement in Foreign Military Clashes’ [1978] Crim LR 257; P Rowe, ‘The Criminal Liability of a British Soldier Merely for Participating in the Iraq War’ [2010] Crim LR 752.

⁴⁸ Hale, 1 PC, 433. In Adebelajo [2014] EWCA Crim 2779, D was ‘hopelessly misconceived’ to think that because D thought he was at war with the UK his killing of a British soldier in London was not under the Queen’s peace. The rule has nothing whatsoever to do with the status of the killer.

⁴⁹ [1954] 1 QB 170 (C-MAC). See further P Rowe, ‘Murder and the Law of War’ (1991) 42 NILQ 216.

⁵⁰ The court-martial assembled in the Suez Canal Zone was held to have jurisdiction to try the case. It was admitted that if D had been brought to this country and tried here, no question could have arisen as to the nationality of the victim.

⁵¹ Note also: a civilian of an enemy State in the custody of British forces is protected by Art 2 of the ECHR: R (Al Skeini) v Secretary of State for Defence [2007] UKHL 26; Al-Skeini v UK (2011) 53 EHRR 18.

⁵² See n 46. ⁵³ [2017] EWCA Crim 190.

⁵⁴ For historical material on the rule, see D Yale, ‘A Year and a Day in Homicide’ (1989) 48 CLJ 202, and on the reform see LCCP 136, The Year and a Day Rule in Homicide (1994).

infanticide or any other offence of which one of the elements is causing a person's death, or assisting or encouraging suicide: (a) where the injury alleged to have caused the death was sustained more than three years before the death occurred; or (b) where the accused has previously been convicted of an offence committed in circumstances alleged to be connected with the death. The Attorney General's consent is therefore required if D has been convicted of wounding V, who has subsequently died of the wound within three years of D's causing it and it is proposed to prosecute D for murder or manslaughter.⁵⁵ It would seem that consent is also required if D has been convicted of, for example, a robbery, burglary or driving offence in the course of which V sustained an injury from which he subsequently died. This is not incompatible with the guarantee against double jeopardy in Art 4 of Protocol 7 to the ECHR.⁵⁶

The year-and-a-day⁵⁷ rule continues to apply where any act or omission causing death was committed before 17 June 1996.

12.1.5 Unlawful

The requirement that the killing is unlawful is an important element of the offence. The most obvious example of its application is where the killing is in self-defence,⁵⁸ but the element applies more widely. For example, it was accepted by the Court of Appeal in *A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994)*⁵⁹ that the doctor who performed a lawful abortion would not be liable for murder should the foetus be born alive and die from injuries sustained in the termination procedure. The doctor in such a case would have performed a lawful act under the Abortion Act 1967. Consent, which in many offences will render conduct lawful, has no part to play in the context of murder. So, also, it was murder at common law if a person condemned to death was executed by someone other than the officer lawfully appointed, or if the officer lawfully appointed carried out the execution by an unauthorized method, as where he beheaded a person condemned to be hanged.⁶⁰

12.1.6 Causing death

It must be proved that D, by his own act or unlawful omission, caused death.⁶¹ For this purpose, D, who, for example, procures E to murder D's wife, does not cause her death. D does not kill; E does. D is guilty of murder but as a secondary party. The principles of causation apply to 'result crimes' generally and are considered in detail in Ch 2. In fact, most of the leading cases concern causing death in homicide offences.

12.1.6.1 Accelerating death

What must be caused is some acceleration of death. Since everyone must die sooner or later it follows that every killing is merely an acceleration of death; and it makes no difference for ⁵⁵ By virtue of s 74(3) of PACE 1984, where D is convicted of, eg, causing grievous bodily harm with intent and V subsequently dies, his conviction for that offence is admissible at any later trial for murder of the same victim to prove the fact that D had caused V GBH with intent to do so: Clift [2012] EWCA Crim 2750, [2013] Crim LR 506.

⁵⁶ Young [2005] EWCA Crim 2963.

⁵⁷ For further details, see 7th edition of this book, at p 330.

⁵⁸ See generally F Leverick, Killing in Self Defence (2007).

⁵⁹ [1996] 2 All ER 10.

⁶⁰ ibid. The death penalty is abolished for all crimes in England and Wales: Crime and Disorder Act 1998, s 36.

⁶¹ H Hart and T Honoré, Causation in the Law, especially Chs XII–XIV; G Williams, 'Causation in Homicide' [1957] Crim LR 429 and 510; F Camps and J Harvard, 'Causation in Homicide—A Medical View' [1957] Crim LR at 576. See also the discussion in Ch 2 and references therein.

this purpose that the victim is already suffering from a fatal disease or injury or is under sentence of death. Thus, in Dyson,⁶² Lord Alverstone CJ said:⁶³

The proper question [for] the jury was whether the prisoner accelerated the child's death by the injuries which he inflicted... For if he did, the fact that the child was already suffering from meningitis, from which it would in any event have died before long, would afford no answer to the charge of causing its death.

The administration of pain-saving drugs presents difficult problems. In Adams,⁶⁴ Devlin J directed the jury that there is no special defence justifying a doctor in giving drugs which would shorten life in the case of severe pain: 'If life were cut short by weeks or months it was just as much murder as if it were cut short by years.' He went on:

But that does not mean that a doctor aiding the sick or dying has to calculate in minutes or hours, or perhaps in days or weeks, the effect on a patient's life of the medicines which he administers. If the first purpose of medicine—the restoration of health—can no longer be achieved, there is still much for the doctor to do, and he is entitled to do all that is proper and necessary to relieve pain and suffering even if measures he takes may incidentally shorten life.

These passages are not easy to reconcile. If the doctor administers drugs with the sole object of relieving suffering of a dying person knowing that the drugs will certainly shorten life, then he intends to shorten life: he intends to kill. If, as Devlin J held, the doctor has a defence it cannot be because his act has not caused death nor because he did not intend so to do. It seems that the courts now do recognize a special defence for a doctor in these circumstances.⁶⁵ In Airedale NHS Trust v Bland,⁶⁶ Lord Goff referred, obiter, to:

the established rule that a doctor may, when caring for a patient who is, for example, dying of cancer, lawfully administer painkilling drugs, despite the fact that he knows that an incidental effect of that application will be to abbreviate the patient's life.

Lord Goff added:

Moreover, where the doctor's treatment of his patient is lawful, the patient's death will be regarded in law as exclusively caused by the injury or disease to which his condition is attributable.

But this approach involves a fiction and is therefore undesirable. It is not the doctor's purpose to kill but the brutal truth is that the doctor has foreseen death as virtually certain and he kills his patient. The ambiguity of the definition of intention in *Woollin*⁶⁷ allows the jury

⁶² [1908] 2 KB 454.

⁶³ ibid at 457. And see Hale, 1 PC, 428; Fletcher (1841) Russell 417; Martin (1832) 5 C & P 128 at 130. See L Hoyano and C Keenan, Child Abuse: Law and Policy (2007) 135.

⁶⁴ [1957] Crim LR 365; S Bedford, The Best We Can Do (1958) 192; P Devlin, Easing the Passing (1985); Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law, 344.

⁶⁵ cf David Moor (1999) Newcastle Crown Court (Hooper J) discussed by A Arlidge, 'The Trial of Dr David Moor' [2000] Crim LR 31 and JC Smith, 'A Comment on Dr Moor's Case' [2000] Crim LR 41. See also J Goss, 'Postscript on the Trial of David Moor' [2000] Crim LR 568. The broader issues raised by assisted suicide and euthanasia lie beyond the scope of this work. See in particular R Dworkin, Life's Dominion (1993); J Herring, Medical Law and Ethics (6th edn, 2016) Ch 9; H Briggs, Euthanasia, Death with Dignity and the Law (2002); J Glover, Causing Death and Saving Lives (1977); S Ost, An Analytical Study of the Legal, Moral and Ethical Aspects of the Living Phenomenon of Euthanasia (2003); P Lewis, Assisted Dying and Legal Change (2007); M Wilks, 'Medical Treatment at the End of Life: A British Doctor's Perspective' in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007).

⁶⁶ [1993] 1 All ER 821 at 868h–j. See also R (Burke) v GMC [2006] QB 273 and C Dupré, 'Human Dignity and the Withdrawal of Medical Treatment' (2006) 6 EHRLR 678.

⁶⁷ [1999] AC 82.

flexibility to conclude that the doctor is not a murderer: see Ch 3. If an unqualified and unauthorized person did the same act with the same knowledge he would presumably be guilty of murder. For the doctor, the killing is likely to be treated as unintentional or justified.⁶⁸ Despite the ambiguity of the position, the Supreme Court in Nicklinson acknowledged that, as Lord Sumption put it:⁶⁹

Medical treatment intended to palliate pain and discomfort is not unlawful only because it has the incidental consequence, however foreseeable, of shortening the patient's life.⁷⁰

It is not however permissible, even for a doctor acting in good faith, purposely to kill in order to terminate pain. When painkilling drugs were no longer effective, Dr Cox,⁷¹ in order to end the great suffering of his patient, administered a drug to stop her heart and end her suffering, not by the palliative effect of drugs but by death. He was held guilty of attempted murder (it was no longer possible to prove the actual cause of death). If he had administered a large dose of sedative causing her to lapse into a coma, he would probably have been on the right side of the law—even though that would have shortened life. In R (Burke) v GMC,⁷² it was noted obiter that a doctor would have no defence to a charge of murder if he interrupted life-sustaining treatment in the face of the patient's express wish to be kept alive. Section 4 of the Mental Capacity Act 2005 deals with the circumstances in which treatment or its withdrawal is in the best interests of the patient. Section 4(5) stipulates that where the determination of what is in the best interests of the person relates to life-sustaining treatment, the person making the decision 'must not in considering whether the treatment is in the best interests of the person concerned, be motivated by a desire to bring about his death'.⁷³

In Inglis,⁷⁴ the Court of Appeal confirmed that there is no defence of mercy killing in English law. D appealed against her conviction for the attempted murder and murder of her son, V, who had suffered catastrophic head injuries when aged 27. D tried to kill V by injecting him with heroin in his hospital bed. V was resuscitated but suffered substantial deterioration in his condition as a result. D was charged with attempted murder. While on bail D then injected V with a fatal dose of heroin. The court reviewed the current state of the law relating to 'mercy killing'. It was recognized that mercy killing is murder subject to any partial defences that apply.⁷⁵ The law does not distinguish between murder committed for malevolent reasons and murder motivated by familial love.⁷⁶

In R (Nicklinson) and another v Ministry of Justice and others,⁷⁷ a nine-member Supreme Court reconsidered some of these issues. The claimants had each suffered catastrophic physical disabilities but their mental processes were unimpaired. They wished to die but could ⁶⁸ On the significance of offences and defences in murder, see Duff, Answering for Crime, 211–216.

⁶⁹ At [255].

⁷⁰ Citing Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] AC 789, 867D (Lord Goff) and 892 (Lord Mustill); R (Pretty) v DPP [2002] 1 AC 800, 831H–832A (Lord Steyn).

⁷¹ (1992) 12 BLMR 38. ⁷² [2006] QB 273.

⁷³ The Law Commission declined to engage in reform of mercy killings and euthanasia, preferring to see that as part of a free-standing review: LC 304, para 1.6. No such review was undertaken.

⁷⁴ [2010] EWCA Crim 2637.

⁷⁵ The Law Commission summary of the law on mercy killing in Ch 7 of LC 304, Murder Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006) was endorsed as an accurate statement of the law.

⁷⁶ The latest statute to address the problem of mercy killing (Criminal Justice Act 2003, s 269 and Sch 21), expressly includes as mitigation for the offence the offender's subjective belief that he was acting out of mercy. For discussion, see B Mitchell and JV Roberts, Exploring the Mandatory Life Sentence for Murder (2012) 19–20 and 46–47. That belief and motivation, however genuine, does not and cannot constitute any defence to the charge of murder.

⁷⁷ [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 7 Arch Rev 7.

not end their lives without third party assistance. The claimants sought declarations that, inter alia, the law of murder or of assisted suicide was incompatible with the right to respect for private life under Art 8 of the ECHR, insofar as it criminalized voluntary active euthanasia and/or assisted suicide. The case is discussed in more detail in Ch 15.

In the Supreme Court, Lord Neuberger confirmed that ‘mercy killing involves the perpetrator intentionally killing another person, and therefore, even where that person wished to die, or the killing was purely out of compassion and love, the current state of the law is that the killing will amount to murder or (if one or more of the mitigating circumstances are present) manslaughter’.⁷⁸

Lord Neuberger endorsed the fundamental difference between a positive action which caused death and an omission which resulted in a death and also between an act of administering the fatal drug to a person and setting up a machine so that the person can administer the drug to himself. The distinction is, in his lordship’s view, founded on personal autonomy and morality.⁷⁹

Where the act can be classified as an ‘omission’ (eg, to my mind somewhat uncomfortably in terms of common sense, switching off a life-supporting machine at least if done by an appropriately authorised person, as in Bland’s case and In re B (Adult: Refusal of Medical Treatment)), it seems to me that if the act which immediately causes the death is that of a third party that may be the wrong side of the line, whereas if the final act is that of the person himself, who carries it out pursuant to a voluntary, clear, settled and informed decision, that is the permissible side of the line. In the latter case, the person concerned has not been ‘killed’ by anyone, but has autonomously exercised his right to end his life.

12.1.7 The mens rea of murder

12.1.7.1 Malice aforethought

The mens rea of murder is traditionally called ‘malice aforethought’.⁸⁰ This is a technical term and it has a technical meaning quite different from the ordinary popular meaning of the two words. The phrase, it has been truly said, ‘is a mere arbitrary symbol ... for the “malice” may have in it nothing really malicious; and need never be really “aforethought”’.⁸¹ The House of Lords confirmed that this means intention.⁸² Thus, a parent who kills a suffering child out of motives of compassion is ‘malicious’ for this purpose; and there is sufficient aforethought if an intention to kill is formed only a second before the fatal blow is struck. Neither ill-will nor premeditation⁸³ is necessary. The concept of premeditation is one which has been considered as an option for reform and wisely rejected. The fact that killing is premeditated is not necessarily an aggravating feature as, for example, where an abused spouse plans a killing of her abuser.⁸⁴

⁷⁸ Per Lord Neuberger at [17].

⁷⁹ At [94].

⁸⁰ See Lord Goff, ‘The Mental Element in the Crime of Murder’ (1988) 104 LQR 30 and G Williams, ‘The Mens Rea for Murder: Leave it Alone’ (1989) 105 LQR 387. For discussion of the comparative approaches to the fault element in murder, see S Yeo, Fault in Homicide (1997), and the extensive discussion in LCCP 177 and LC 304.

⁸¹ Kenny, Outlines (15th edn, 1947) 153.

⁸² Moloney [1985] AC 905.

⁸³ For a suggestion for reform on this basis, see B Mitchell, ‘Thinking About Murder’ (1992) 56 J Crim L 78. See also the support for such a view derived from Mitchell’s research appended to LC 290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004). The Law Commission rejected redefinition in these terms in LC 304.

⁸⁴ See generally M Kremnitzer, ‘On Premeditation’ (1998) 1 Buffalo Crim LR 627. LCCP 177 rejected the approach on the basis of difficulties of proof. See also J Horder and D Hughes, ‘Comparative Issues in the Law of Homicide’ in J Horder (ed), Homicide Law in Comparative Perspectives (2007).

The meaning of the term malice aforethought is critical since that is what determines whether an unlawful killing is murder or manslaughter. Murder is unlawful homicide with malice aforethought. Manslaughter is an unlawful homicide without malice aforethought.⁸⁵

Malice aforethought is a concept of the common law with a long history but, since Moloney,⁸⁶ which held that malice aforethought means intention, it is no longer necessary to explore this. We can now state that the modern law defines malice aforethought as:

- (1) an intention to kill any person or;
- (2) an intention to cause grievous bodily harm to any person.

'Intention' has the meaning attributed to it in *Woollin*⁸⁷ as applied in Matthews and Alleyne.⁸⁸

GBH: 'grievous bodily harm', at one time broadly interpreted to mean any harm sufficiently serious to interfere with health and comfort, must now be given its ordinary natural meaning. 'Grievous' means 'really serious'⁸⁹ and the word 'really' probably adds nothing but emphasis to the fact that the harm intended must be (actually or really) serious.⁹⁰ The Court of Appeal in *Bollom*⁹¹ confirmed that the words are to be construed as ordinary English words and not assigned a specific legal definition.⁹² The evaluation of whether the harm is sufficiently serious is based on the jury's assessment of the harm caused to the particular victim. The age and vulnerability of the victim will therefore be important. It is not a question of whether D thought that the harm he was causing was serious. This can present problems since it may, theoretically, give rise to murder by pinprick if D stabs with a needle V who is a haemophiliac, and the stabbing is judged to have been really serious bodily harm.⁹³ In its provisional proposals on homicide reform, the Law Commission defined the term as 'harm of such a nature as to endanger life or as to cause or be likely to cause permanent or long-term damage to a significant aspect of physical integrity or mental functioning'.⁹⁴ The Commission's final recommendation was to retain the common law position, replacing the word injury for harm.

Although the expression GBH is ambiguous and forms a core element of the definition of such a serious offence carrying a unique sentence and stigma, it has been held, in Northern Ireland at least, to be compatible with the requirement in Art 7 of the ECHR of certainty.⁹⁵ There seems little doubt that this view would be followed by the courts in England.

Subjective test of mens rea: in 1960, in the notorious case of DPP v Smith, the House of Lords laid down a largely objective test of liability in murder—the test was 'not what the defendant contemplated, but what the ordinary reasonable man or woman would in all the circumstances of the case have contemplated as the natural and probable result'. That approach was modified by s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967.⁹⁶ It can be consigned

⁸⁵ Per Stephen J in Doherty (1887) 16 Cox CC 306 at 307.

⁸⁶ [1985] AC 905, [1985] 1 All ER 1025, p 91.

⁸⁷ [1999] AC 82, [1999] 1 Cr App R 8.

⁸⁸ [2003] 2 Cr App R 30, [2003] EWCA Crim 192, p 93. See also Royle [2013] EWCA Crim 1461 in which the judge adopted a less satisfactory definition although one more favourable to the defendant: 'You must be sure that he did not just realise that it could happen but acted on the basis that it would, or that he intended that it would.'

⁸⁹ DPP v Smith [1961] AC 290 at 334, [1960] 3 All ER 161 at 171.

⁹⁰ Saunders [1985] Crim LR 230. It is for the judge to decide in each case whether it is necessary to direct the jury that the harm intended must be 'really serious'. Where the act was stabbing with a five-and-a-half-inch knife blade, it was not necessary: Janjua [1999] 1 Cr App R 91.

⁹¹ [2003] EWCA Crim 2846.

⁹² cf other jurisdictions in which definitions based on lethality are used. See LCCP 177, paras 3.65 et seq.

⁹³ See LCCP 177, para 3.81. See also on the issues of this lack of definition: W Wilson, 'Murder and the Structure of Homicide' in B Mitchell and A Ashworth (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law (2000).

⁹⁴ LCCP 177, para 3.159. ⁹⁵ Anderson [2003] NI 12, CA.

⁹⁶ Section 8 applies not only to murder and its function is not to define what mens rea must be proved, but only how the mens rea required by the common law or other statutes is to be proved.

to history: in Frankland and Moore v R,⁹⁷ the Privy Council (comprising five judicial members of the House of Lords), acting on the dicta of Lord Diplock in Hyam,⁹⁸ Lord Bridge in *Moloney*⁹⁹ and Lord Scarman in Hancock,¹⁰⁰ held that Smith did not represent the common law of England.

12.1.7.2 Constructive malice

The common law of malice aforethought is now fully stated in the rule requiring an intention to cause death or grievous bodily harm. It is, however, still necessary to refer to s 1 of the Homicide Act 1957 which modified the common law.

- (1) Where a person kills another in the course or furtherance of some other offence, the killing shall not amount to murder unless done with the same malice aforethought (express or implied) as is required for a killing to amount to murder when not done in the course or furtherance of another offence.
- (2) For the purposes of the foregoing subsection, a killing done in the course or for the purpose of resisting an officer of justice, or of resisting or avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest, or of effecting or assisting an escape or rescue from legal custody, shall be treated as a killing in the course or furtherance of an offence.

The purpose of this section was, as the side-note in the statute indicates, to limit malice aforethought by the 'abolition of "constructive malice"'. 'Constructive malice' took two forms: (a) it was murder to kill in the course or furtherance of a violent felony (or possibly any felony) so that an intention to commit the felony (eg rape or robbery) was a sufficient mens rea for murder where death resulted from such an intentional felony;¹⁰¹ (b) it was murder to kill while attempting to prevent lawful arrest or bring about escape from lawful arrest or custody, so that an intention to do these things was also malice aforethought where the act caused death. Section 1(1) abolishes the first, and s 1(2) the second form of constructive malice. While eliminating constructive malice, the section leaves in existence 'express' and 'implied' malice. Although these terms have been used for centuries, their meaning is obscure and they certainly do not have any ordinary natural meaning.¹⁰² At common law 'express malice' must now be taken to mean the intention to kill and 'implied malice' the intention to cause grievous bodily harm. Though the terms remain on the 'statute book', there is in practice no need to use them and the sooner they are repealed the better.

It was at one time argued that s 1 also abolished intention to cause grievous bodily harm as a category sufficient for malice aforethought—an argument which required some other meaning to be given to 'implied malice' since that is expressly preserved.¹⁰³ In ⁹⁷ [1987] AC 576.

⁹⁸ [1975] AC 55 at 94.

⁹⁹ [1985] AC 905 at 921 and 928.

¹⁰⁰ [1986] AC 455 at 473.

¹⁰¹ This form of murder exists in some US states and in former British colonies, see eg Griffith [2004] UKPC 58 (Barbados) and Foster [2007] UKPC 20. See generally C Finkelstein, 'Merger and Felony Murder' in Duff and Green (eds), Defining Crimes.

¹⁰² See Lord Hailsham in Cunningham [1982] AC 566, [1981] 2 All ER 863 at 867.

¹⁰³ The argument was that the only reason why intention to cause grievous bodily harm was malice aforethought before 1957 was that in 1803 Lord Ellenborough's Act created a felony of causing grievous bodily harm with intent to do so. If death resulted, that was murder because, and only because, the killing was in the course or furtherance of that felony. The argument was rejected in Vickers [1957] 2 QB 664 (a court of five judges). As the LCCP 177 discusses at para 1.119, the Lord Chief Justice in that case took a different approach to that which only a short time before he had assured Parliament he would take in such a case. Parliament had therefore enacted the 1957 Act on a misunderstanding as to the law. Lords Diplock and Kilbrandon accepted the argument in Hyam but the matter was left open because Lord Cross was not prepared to decide between the conflicting views.

Cunningham,¹⁰⁴ the House of Lords confirmed that intention to cause grievous bodily harm survived the Homicide Act as a category of mens rea.¹⁰⁵

Both Lords Mustill and Steyn have criticized the rule that an intention to cause serious bodily harm is a sufficient mens rea for murder as a 'conspicuous anomaly' and an example of a 'constructive crime'.¹⁰⁶ Lord Steyn spoke of the result of the present definition being defendants 'classified as murderers who are not in truth murderers'.¹⁰⁷ The grievous bodily harm rule has been defended by some academic commentators, either as reflecting a general principle that the law imposes an obligation on an attacker to take the unforeseen consequences of his actions,¹⁰⁸ or as an appropriate response in cases of death caused by an 'attack'.¹⁰⁹

The House of Lords had the opportunity in Cunningham to rid the law of the anomaly by requiring at least awareness of the risk of causing death. It declined. It seems unlikely that the Supreme Court will go to the lengths of overruling decisions in this area. The House of Lords endorsed the GBH rule in Rahman.¹¹⁰

12.2 The sentence for murder

Until the Homicide Act 1957,¹¹¹ all persons convicted of murder were automatically sentenced to death. By s 5 of that Act certain types of murder were singled out and designated 'capital murder'. These continued to be punishable by death, while the remaining types of murder were punishable by imprisonment for life. In effect, there were two degrees of murder.

The distinction between the two degrees of murder proved to be unsatisfactory, and the death penalty for murder was suspended by the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965.¹¹² All persons convicted of murder must now be sentenced to imprisonment for life. The mandatory sentence¹¹³ was at that time unique in English law and the CLRC considered whether or not the judge should have discretion as in all other crimes. They were deeply and almost evenly divided on the issue. Their Report¹¹⁴ set out the arguments on both sides in some detail but made no recommendation.

Subsequently the matter was considered by a Select Committee of the House of Lords (the Nathan Committee) which recommended, with one dissent, that the mandatory sentence be abolished. The conclusion was that murder should be punishable with a maximum sentence of life but the judge should have the same discretion to impose lesser ¹⁰⁵ It ante-dated Lord Ellenborough's Act as a form of malice aforethought, distinct from constructive malice.

¹⁰⁴ [1982] AC 566.

¹⁰⁶ A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1998] AC 245, [1998] 1 Cr App R 91, 93, HL; Powell and Daniels and English [1999] AC 1, [1998] 1 Cr App R 261 at 267–268, and Woollin [1999] 1 AC 82, [1999] 1 Cr App R 8 at 13.

¹⁰⁷ ibid. Cf Scots law and the requirement of wicked recklessness.

¹⁰⁸ J Horder, 'Two Histories and Four Hidden Principles of Mens Rea' (1997) 113 LQR 9.

¹⁰⁹ W Wilson, 'Murder and the Structure of Homicide' in Ashworth and Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law.

¹¹⁰ Rahman [2008] UKHL 45. This aspect of the judgment has not been overruled by the Supreme Court's decision in Jorge [2016] UKSC 8.

¹¹¹ See M Wasik, 'Sentencing in Homicide' in Ashworth and Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law, 167.

¹¹² This, by virtue of affirmative resolutions of both Houses of Parliament on 16 and 18 Dec 1969, was to be permanently in force. See L Blom-Cooper, 'Life Until Death' [1999] Crim LR 899.

¹¹³ For extensive discussion see B Mitchell and JV Roberts, Exploring the Mandatory Life Sentence for Murder (2012).

¹¹⁴ Fourteenth Report, para 19.27.

sentences as he has for other crimes.¹¹⁵ The arguments in favour of this approach are overwhelming. Murders vary as greatly in their gravity, and murderers in their dangerousness, as for any other crime. The recommendation has not, however, found favour with the government, despite public opposition to the mandatory sentence,¹¹⁶ and there seems to be no prospect of its implementation at the present time.

On sentencing a murderer, formerly the judge would make a recommendation to the Home Secretary of the minimum period which should elapse before the prisoner is released on licence.¹¹⁷ That power was successfully challenged as incompatible with Arts 5 and 6 of the ECHR since the minister was not an independent and impartial arbiter of the term of imprisonment.¹¹⁸ (The mandatory sentence itself has been held not to be incompatible with Arts 3 and 5 of the ECHR.¹¹⁹ Even a ‘whole life tariff’ is not incompatible with the ECHR.¹²⁰)

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 imposed a new regime for the sentencing and procedure for release of those sentenced to life imprisonment.¹²¹ Under Sch 21 to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 the judge must determine the length of the minimum term which will be served by the offender before he is eligible to be considered for release on licence. The starting points for adult offenders are: (a) a whole-life term (ie where the offender will serve the rest of his life in prison)¹²² in the most exceptional cases; (b) a 30-year minimum tariff for serious cases such as murders of police or prison officers, murders involving firearms, sexual or sadistic killings or killings aggravated by race, religion, sexual orientation, disability or transgender identity; (c) 25 years for murders committed with a knife or other weapon taken to the crime; (d) a 15-year minimum starting point for murders not falling within the two higher categories. Judges will have the opportunity to take into account aggravating and mitigating features: the starting points are just that.¹²³

12.3 Proposals for reform of murder

Given the seriousness involved in the offence,¹²⁴ the sanctity of life, the unique stigma and the mandatory sentence, it is surprising that the offence remains so ill-defined in so many respects. Three main areas have been the subject of sustained criticism and focus ¹¹⁵ HL Paper 78-I (1989). See A Ashworth, ‘Reform of the Law of Murder’ [1990] Crim LR 75.

¹¹⁶ See B Mitchell and J Roberts, Public Opinion and Sentencing for Murder: An Empirical Investigation of Public Knowledge and Attitudes in England and Wales (2010).

¹¹⁷ See the review of the process since 1957—S Shute, ‘Punishing Murderers: Release Procedures and the “Tariff”’ [2004] Crim LR 873.

¹¹⁸ R v Home Secretary, ex p Anderson [2002] UKHL 46; Stafford v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 121.

¹¹⁹ Pyrah [2003] 1 AC 903, [2003] 1 Cr App R 33.

¹²⁰ Hutchinson v UK (App no 57592/08) [2017] ECHR 65.

¹²¹ See Practice Direction (Criminal Proceedings) [2013] EWCA Crim 1631; and Criminal Justice Act 2003, ss 269 et seq. For academic comment, see N Padfield, ‘Tariffs in Murder’ [2002] Crim LR 192.

¹²² The Grand Chamber of the ECtHR held in Vinter v UK [2014] Crim LR 81 that whole-life terms violated Art 3 of the ECHR. The basis for this decision was that there was a lack of clarity in relation to the Secretary of State’s power of release under s 30 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 and there was no statutory mechanism through which whole-life terms could be reviewed. For comment see N Mavronicola, ‘Inhuman and Degrading Punishment, Dignity and the Limits of Retribution’ (2014) 77 MLR 292. The Court of Appeal considered the implications of Vinter in A-G’s Reference (No 69 of 2013) [2014] EWCA Crim 188. It was held that the judgment of the Grand Chamber did not preclude a judge from imposing a whole-life term. The Court of Appeal disagreed with the ECtHR’s characterization of English law as lacking clarity and observed that the Secretary of State’s power in s 30 of the 1997 Act had to be exercised in a manner compatible with Art 3. For comment, see Ashworth [2014] Crim LR 471. In Hutchinson v UK (App no 57592/08) [2017] ECHR 65, the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR departed from its earlier reasoning and approved the Court of Appeal’s decision.

¹²³ On public attitudes and expectations in sentencing of murder, see B Mitchell, in LCCP 177, Appendix A. Schedule 21 has affected other sentencing policy: D Jeremy [2010] Crim LR 593.

¹²⁴ See LCCP 177, Appendix G on the background information about murder.

for reform proposals.¹²⁵ First, there is the ambiguity over the definition of the concept of intention (as examined in Ch 3). This increases the opportunity for inconsistency in application and generates uncertainty in the law. Secondly, there is the grievous bodily harm rule which, in creating a constructive crime, carries with it all of the criticisms normally levelled at such offences for a failure to respect principles of fair labelling and correspondence between actus reus and mens rea.¹²⁶ Thirdly, there is the sustained and cogent criticism of the mandatory sentence.¹²⁷ It is often assumed that the mandatory sentence is retained to reflect the will of the populus, but research does not always bear out such a conclusion.¹²⁸

Although the government has been content to add, piecemeal, to the stock of homicide offences for over a century (see the infanticide offence, causing death by dangerous driving, the offence under s 5 of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, corporate manslaughter,¹²⁹ causing death by driving while uninsured, etc¹³⁰), since 1957 it has avoided the reform of the most serious offence of them all—murder. Numerous reform proposals have been advanced, only a brief outline of which can be discussed here.¹³¹

12.3.1 Abolishing murder and manslaughter?

One unlikely way forward, which was rejected by the Law Commission in its 2006 Report, would be to replace murder and manslaughter with a single offence of unlawful killing in which the sentence is at the discretion of the trial judge (within guidelines). This view had some academic¹³² and judicial support (from Lord Kilbrandon in Hyam) but was rejected by the CLRC.¹³³ Since this would remove the specific label of murder and the uniqueness that ¹²⁵ For a history of efforts to reform the law of homicide, see J Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (2012) Ch 1.

¹²⁶ As regards labelling, Lord Steyn cited, n 107, that people are labelled murderers who are in truth not such. As for correspondence, the mens rea of intent to do GBH does not correspond with the actus reus—death. See, in particular, B Mitchell, 'In Defence of the Correspondence Principle' [1999] Crim LR 195; J Horder, 'A Critique of the Correspondence Principle in Criminal Law' [1995] Crim LR 759. See also N Lacey, 'Partial Defences to Homicide' in Ashworth and Mitchell, Rethinking English Homicide Law, Ch 5. Some might argue that there is no difficulty in holding D liable in a GBH case because his act of intentional GBH is an attack on V which shows sufficient culpability by its practical indifference for V's life. See Duff, Answering for Crime, 253–255.

¹²⁷ See generally B Mitchell, Murder and Penal Policy (1990).

¹²⁸ See the reports of Professor Mitchell's research as appended to LC 290, revealing that 62.9 per cent of the population surveyed thought that there ought not to be a mandatory sentence. Cf the findings in the LCCP 177, Appendix A.

¹²⁹ Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007.

¹³⁰ See the Road Safety Act 2006.

¹³¹ Horder is critical of the way in which legal experts have sought a privileged or elite position in the process of homicide law reform at the expense of the public at large. He argues that although the most recent law reform efforts have taken seriously the notion of public consultation, public opinion remains largely irrelevant in the legislative process. Horder's remedy for this is to conduct wider public consultation and require government periodically to consult on the substance of reforms made to what he terms 'violative crimes', such as homicide. See J Horder, 'Safe in Whose Hands? Judges, Experts, and Public Opinion in the Homicide Reform Process' in J Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (2012). For a critique see A Cornford, 'The Architecture of Homicide' (2015) 34 OJLS 819, who is frustrated by Horder's failure to discuss explicitly why direct popular involvement in the reform process would be desirable.

¹³² See L Blom-Cooper and T Morris, With Malice Aforethought: A Study of the Crime and Punishment for Homicide (2004).

¹³³ In its Fourteenth Report on Offences Against the Person (1980). See R Buxton, 'The New Murder' [1980] Crim LR 521.

attaches to it, the option is unlikely ever to find much general support.¹³⁴ It is an unrealistic prospect in political terms,¹³⁵ but it has the merit of simplicity.

12.3.2 A victim-specific model?

A second model which has found little support would be to reform the law with a hierarchy of forms of homicide based on categories of victim. The most serious form of homicide would, under such a model, be applicable to those who kill children or the elderly or police officers, etc. This would, it is submitted, be an unsatisfactory reform. The sentencing regime under Sch 21 to the Criminal Justice Act 2003 already allows judges, and in some categories requires judges, to have particular regard to the characteristic of the victim.

12.3.3 Law Commission Consultation Paper No 177

The Law Commission in LCCP 177¹³⁶ provisionally proposed to create a new ladder of homicide offences in a hierarchical structure respecting the correspondence principle. This follows the model adopted in many other jurisdictions where the seriousness of the wrongdoing is reflected in a graduated scheme of offences.¹³⁷ The proposals were for a crime of first degree murder which would carry the mandatory life penalty. This would be restricted to cases of intentional killing. Second degree murder would be a wholly new form of offence and would be much broader with a discretionary life maximum penalty. Second degree murder would include killing where D did not intend to kill but did intend to do serious harm, and ‘recklessly indifferent’ killing, where D realized that his conduct involved an unjustified risk of killing, but pressed on with that conduct without caring whether or not death would result. Second degree murder would also encompass the partial defences to what would otherwise be ‘first degree murder’. Below second degree murder would lie an offence of manslaughter capable of commission in one of two ways: by gross negligence; or through an intentional act intended to cause injury or involving recklessness as to causing injury. The maximum sentence for both would be a fixed term of years.

The Commission carried out extensive reviews of public perceptions of the offence of murder and the approach taken in other jurisdictions.¹³⁸

12.3.4 Law Commission Report No 304

In its final recommendations in Report No 304,¹³⁹ the Law Commission made some significant changes. Most significantly, the Law Commission extended the proposed offence of ¹³⁴ For fascinating studies into the public perceptions of the scope of the offence, see B Mitchell, ‘Public Perceptions of Homicide and Criminal Justice’ (1998) 38 Brit J Crim 453 and ‘Further Evidence of the Relationship Between Legal and Public Opinion on the Homicide Law’ [2000] Crim LR 814.

¹³⁵ See J Horder and D Hughes, ‘Comparative Issues in the Law of Homicide’ in Horder (ed), Homicide Law in Comparative Perspectives, 7. See also B Mitchell (2007) 71 J Crim L 318 recognizing that it would devalue the enormity of the worst cases.

¹³⁶ On the Commission’s proposals see: W Wilson, ‘The Structure of Criminal Homicide’ [2006] Crim LR 471; A Norrie, ‘Between Orthodox Subjectivism and Moral Contextualism: Intention and the Consultation Paper’ [2006] Crim LR 486; C Wells and O Quick, ‘Getting Tough with Defences’ [2006] Crim LR 514; V Tadros, ‘The Homicide Ladder’ (2006) 69 MLR 601; J Rogers, ‘The Law Commission’s Proposed Restructuring of Homicide’ (2006) 70 J Crim Law 223.

¹³⁷ See J Horder, ‘The Changing Face of the Law of Homicide’ in Horder (ed), Homicide Law in Comparative Perspectives.

¹³⁸ See also Horder, ibid.

¹³⁹ See A Ashworth, ‘Principles, Pragmatism and the Law Commission’s Recommendations on Homicide Law Reform’ [2007] Crim LR 333; R Taylor ‘The Nature of “Partial Defences” and the Coherence of (Second Degree) Murder’ [2007] Crim LR 345.

first degree murder (which would still carry a mandatory life penalty). This offence would, under the final proposal, include both: (a) killing intentionally; and (b) killing where there was an intention to do serious injury, coupled with an awareness of a serious risk of causing death.

Second degree murder (which would carry a discretionary life maximum penalty) would include: (a) killing where D intended to do serious injury; (b) killing where D intended to cause some injury or a fear or risk of injury, and was aware of a serious risk of causing death; as well as (c) killing in which there is a partial defence (loss of self-control (gross provocation or fear of serious violence); diminished responsibility; participation in a suicide pact) to what would otherwise be first degree murder.

Manslaughter (also carrying a discretionary life maximum penalty) would include: (a) killing through gross negligence as to a risk of causing death; and (b) killing through a criminal act which is (i) intended to cause injury or (ii) where there was an awareness that the act involved a serious risk of causing injury.¹⁴⁰ These provisions relating to manslaughter are considered in Ch 14.

Special provision was also made for an offence of participating in a joint criminal venture in the course of which another participant commits first or second degree murder. This would be an offence of manslaughter where the circumstances are such that it should have been obvious that first or second degree murder might be committed by another participant.

The government has now decided it will not act upon these recommendations from the Law Commission.¹⁴¹

In 2016, the House of Commons Justice Committee held a single evidence-gathering session on the law of homicide. The session examined the effectiveness of the operation of the law of homicide and considered the proposals for reform discussed in this section. In his evidence, the then Minister of State for Courts and Justice, Sir Oliver Heald QC MP, stated that the government had no intention of reopening this area.¹⁴²

¹⁴⁰ See LC 304, para 1.67.

¹⁴¹ See The Rt Hon Oliver Heald MP QC, 'Law of Homicide', MOJ, 24 Oct 2017, available at www.parliament.uk/business/committees/committees-a-z/commons-select/justice-committee/one-off-sessions/parliament-2015/law-of-homicide-16-17/.

¹⁴² www.parliament.uk/business/committees/committees-a-z/commons-select/justice-committee/news-parliament-2015/law-of-homicide-evidence-16-17/.

Voluntary Manslaughter

At common law, all unlawful homicides which are not murder are manslaughter. The offence has a broad scope, being limited by murder at one extreme and accidental killing at the other. There are an increasing number of statutory offences of unlawful killing including, for example, causing death by dangerous driving and corporate manslaughter.¹ Some of these statutory offences preclude prosecution for manslaughter (notably corporate manslaughter) but in most cases manslaughter remains available as an alternative charge to the specific statutory offences.²

It is customary and useful to divide manslaughter into two main groups: ‘voluntary’ and ‘involuntary’ manslaughter. The distinction is based on D’s intention at the time of the killing. Where there is no intention to kill or cause grievous bodily harm, the offence falls within the category of involuntary manslaughter. In contrast, voluntary manslaughter comprises cases where D had the intention to kill or do grievous bodily harm but some defined mitigating circumstance—loss of self-control, diminished responsibility or killing in pursuance of a suicide pact—reduces his crime to the less serious grade of criminal homicide.³ These partial defences to murder were originally introduced to avoid the death penalty. Today they subsist unsatisfactorily in order to avoid the mandatory life sentence for murder. The partial defences to murder were radically overhauled in the Coroners and Justice Act 2009.⁴

Three partial defences to murder exist:

- (1) where D kills with the mens rea for murder but at the time he had lost his self-control and one of the statutory qualifying triggers applied (governed by ss 54–56 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009);
- (2) where D kills with the mens rea for murder but he establishes on the balance of probabilities that he was suffering from diminished responsibility (under s 52 of the 2009 Act);
- (3) where D kills in pursuance of a suicide pact.⁵ The problem of the suicide pact is looked at in Ch 15 alongside the statutory crime of assisting or encouraging suicide.⁶

¹ These offences, their theoretical implications and the relationship with ‘normal’ manslaughter are considered in the valuable collection of essays edited by C Clarkson and S Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (2008); see, in particular, A Ashworth, ‘Manslaughter Generic or Nominate Offences’ in that volume.

² See also V Tadros, ‘The Limits of Manslaughter’ in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (2008), who argues that the special offences discriminate and fail to optimize coherence in the law; see also Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 348 et seq.

³ A-G of Ceylon v Perera [1953] AC 200, PC; Lee Chun Chuen v R [1963] AC 220; Parker v R [1964] AC 1369; Smith (Clean) v R [2002] 1 Cr App R 92; contra, per Viscount Simon in Holmes v DPP [1946] AC 588 at 598, HL.

⁴ For analysis of the defences of provocation and diminished responsibility under the law before the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, see the 12th edition of this book, Ch 15.

⁵ See p 619.

⁶ See p 620.

13.1 Loss of self-control

13.1.1 Provocation—the old law

The common law had recognized a defence of provocation for centuries.⁷ The common law defence reduced murder to manslaughter where D killed with mens rea for murder, provided at the time of the killing he had been subjected to provoking acts of such gravity that they caused him and would cause a reasonable person a sudden and temporary loss of control of a significant degree.⁸ That common law rule was modified (but not codified) by s 3 of the Homicide Act 1957. The elements of that defence were that if, when D killed, he had mens rea for murder he would be guilty of manslaughter if: things said or done provoked him; and he suffered a sudden and temporary loss of self-control; and the provocation was enough to make a reasonable man do as D did (with the reasonable man sharing those of D's characteristics that would affect the gravity of the provocation but not those which affected his ability to exercise self-control).

The defence was extremely controversial.⁹ Courts struggled with the application of the defence, in part because it was being used as a means of relieving the potential injustice of the mandatory life sentence for murder. There were disagreements as to the terms of the defence,¹⁰ with numerous high-profile appeals including several to the House of Lords and Privy Council in which majority judgments added to the confusion. The core disagreement centred on whether, when addressing the question whether a reasonable person would have done as D did, the jury were to have regard to D's personal characteristics, and if so, which ones. The appellate courts failed to adopt a consistent approach, in some cases taking an objective view, but in others concluding that the jury ought to take a subjective view taking into account D's characteristics. For the appellate courts to fluctuate so often and so significantly on the interpretation of a defence in cases of such seriousness led to confusion and presented a disappointing spectacle.¹¹

Even the theoretical foundation for the defence remained unclear: was the defence properly regarded as one of partial justification (D has gone beyond what would be an acceptable response to the provoking conduct, or that the deceased deserved it) or of partial excuse (D's loss of self-control was uncharacteristic, the bad character exhibited exceeds that to be expected in the circumstances)?¹² One of the most powerful influences for reform was the claim that the defence operated in a discriminatory fashion, which given its historical origins is hardly surprising.¹³ Women who killed abusive partners were disadvantaged if

⁷ For a comprehensive review of the theoretical and historical context of the defence, see J Horder, Provocation and Responsibility (1992). See also JM Kaye, 'Early History of Murder and Manslaughter' (1967) 83 LQR 365.

⁸ Duffy [1949] 1 All ER 932n. On this case see S Edwards 'Justice Devlin's Legacy' [2009] Crim LR 851.

⁹ There is a wealth of literature on the topic. LC 290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004) is a valuable starting point. The Law Commission documents leading to the new Act also include valuable discussion: see LCCP 177, A New Homicide Act for England (2005) and LC 304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006). Valuable articles and essays include the seminal piece by A Ashworth, 'The Doctrine of Provocation' (1976) 35 CLJ 292.

¹⁰ See LCCP 177, para 2.78.

¹¹ This passage was cited with approval by Lord Judge CJ in Clinton [2012] EWCA Crim 2.

¹² Horder, Provocation and Responsibility, Chs 6–9, in particular at 130–135. See further J Dressler, 'Provocation: Partial Justification or Partial Excuse' (1988) 51 MLR 467; F McAuley, 'Anticipating the Past: The Defences of Provocation in Irish Law' (1987) 50 MLR 133; V Tadros, 'The Characters of Excuses' (2001) 21 OJLS 495. See also the discussion in LC 290, paras 3.22 et seq and the Irish Law Reform Commission, LRC Consultation Paper No 27, Homicide: The Plea of Provocation (2003).

¹³ See Horder, Provocation and Responsibility.

they did not act in a state which could legally be described as one of 'sudden and temporary loss of control'.¹⁴ In addition, until relatively recently, the cumulative effect of years of abuse was not considered. Further, the mental characteristics arising from an abusive relationship (including what some recognize as battered woman syndrome)¹⁵ could only be taken into account if that was relevant to the gravity of the provocation (ie the sting of the words or conduct that provoked D), but not to D's ability to exercise her self-control.¹⁶ The abused woman is unlikely as a matter of fact to kill in self-defence (as that term is understood in law). Owing to relative limited physical strength, it is uncommon for women to respond lethally when facing an attack by an abusive male partner.¹⁷ Women charged with murder were forced to rely on diminished responsibility, which aside from requiring expert evidence and imposing a burden of proof on the accused, stigmatized them as mentally abnormal.

A further general difficulty with the defence was its relationship with the partial defence of diminished responsibility. The elements were very different, with different burdens of proof, but they overlapped in many cases.¹⁸

These serious problems with the provocation defence prompted reform. Law Commission papers examined numerous options for reform including whether it was even necessary or desirable to retain the defence if the mandatory sentence were to be abolished.¹⁹ Fundamental questions included whether the purpose of the defence was to unshackle the judge from imposing the mandatory life sentence²⁰ or to label more distinctly those killers whose conduct might be regarded as morally different, despite their malice aforethought, owing to some mitigating feature of the killing. The unique stigmas and heightened emotions aroused by the stark fact of death generate strong views on these issues. Many other jurisdictions have faced similar difficulties where defence and reform proposals have been widely canvassed.²¹

¹⁴ S Edwards, Sex and Gender in the Legal Process (1996) Ch 6; O'Donovan (1991) 18 J Law & Soc 219; C Wells (1994) 14 LS 266; A McColgan, 'In Defence of Battered Women who Kill' (1993) 13 OJLS 508. For a valuable summary see LCCP 173, Ch 10.

¹⁵ See L Walker, Battered Women Syndrome (1st edn, 1984; 3rd edn, 2008).

¹⁶ See C Wells, 'Provocation: The Case for Abolition' in A Ashworth and B Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law (2000).

¹⁷ On the availability of the defence, see A McColgan (1993) 13 OJLS 508; C Wells (1994) 14 LS 266; J Dressler, 'Battered Women Who Kill Their Sleeping Tormentors' and J Horder, 'Killing the Passive Abuser: A Theoretical Defence' both in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory.

¹⁸ There were calls to merge the defences in something similar to that in the US Model Penal Code, § 210(3) (1)(b). See also LC 304, para 5.22. On the merits of such overlap and a potential merging of the defences, see R Mackay and B Mitchell, 'Provoking Diminished Responsibility: Two Pleas Merging into One?' [2003] Crim LR 745; J Chalmers, 'Merging Provocation and Diminished Responsibility: Some Reasons for Scepticism' [2004] Crim LR 198; J Gardner and T Macklem, 'No Provocation Without Responsibility: A Reply to Mackay and Mitchell' [2004] Crim LR 213; R Mackay and B Mitchell, 'Replacing Provocation: More on a Combined Plea' [2004] Crim LR 219. See also R Holton and S Shute, 'Self-Control in Modern Provocation Defence' (2007) 27 OJLS 49.

¹⁹ See LC 290, Ch 2 and paras 3.35 et seq and the responses discussed to LCCP 173. Horder considers the arguments for abolition in Provocation and Responsibility, Ch 9.

²⁰ See C Wells, 'The Death Penalty for Provocation' [1978] Crim LR 662.

²¹ See eg New South Wales Law Reform Commission No 83, Partial Defences to Murder: Provocation and Infanticide (1997); Irish Law Reform Commission, LRC Consultation Paper No 27 (2003) n 12, and LCCP 173 for a valuable summary of a number of jurisdictions. For comparative material generally, see S Yeo, Unrestrained Killings and the Law: Provocation and Excessive Self-Defence in India, England and Australia (1998). See also eg the Victoria Law Reform Commission, 'Law Reform Defences to Murder' [2005] Crim LR 256 and for proposals in New South Wales, T Crofts and A Loughnan, 'Provocation, NSW Style: Reform of the Defence of Provocation in NSW' [2014] Crim LR 109.

13.1.2 Loss of self-control—the new law

By s 56 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 the common law defence of provocation is abolished and replaced by a new defence of loss of control (in this chapter 'LOSC'), contained in ss 54 and 55.²² In Clinton, Lord Judge CJ emphasized that the old provocation defence is irrelevant and that 'The full ambit of the defence is encompassed within these statutory provisions.'²³ The provisions derive from the Law Commission Report No 304²⁴ and earlier Law Commission Reports²⁵ and papers. Since the enacted provisions differ in important respects from the proposal put forward by the Law Commission, care is needed in relying on these documents as a source for interpretation, if they can be relied on at all.²⁶

Sections 54 and 55 replace the common law defence with a related but significantly different defence labelled 'loss of control'. This is designed to be a much narrower defence than at common law and under s 3 of the 1957 Act. Section 54 provides:

- (1) Where a person ('D') kills or is a party to the killing of another ('V'), D is not to be convicted of murder if—
 - (a) D's acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing resulted from D's loss of self-control,
 - (b) the loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger, and
 - (c) a person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D...
- (7) A person who, but for this section, would be liable to be convicted of murder is liable instead to be convicted of manslaughter.

The LOSC defence is further defined in s 55. It comprises three main elements. In short, the requirements are:²⁷

- (1) a loss of self-control although not one that is necessarily sudden;
- (2) D's loss of control must have been attributable to one or both of two specified 'qualifying triggers':
 - (a) D's fear of serious violence from V against D or another identified person, and/or
 - (b) things done or said (or both) which:

²² See: A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) Ch 11; A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility: Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (2011); C Withy, 'Loss of Control, Loss of Opportunity' [2011] Crim LR 263; R Fortson and A Keene, Current Law Statutes Annotation (2010); J Glasson and J Knowles, Blackstone's Guide to the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (2010) Ch 8; S Edwards, 'Anger and Fear as Justifiable Preludes for Loss of Self-Control' (2010) 74 J Crim L 223.

²³ Clinton [2012] EWCA Crim 2, [2]. See also Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178: 'It should rarely be necessary to look at cases decided under the older law of provocation.' Per Lord Thomas CJ at [4].

²⁴ Murder Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006).

²⁵ LC 290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004). See also LCCP 173 (2003) and LCCP 177, A New Homicide Act for England and Wales? (2005).

²⁶ The Law Commission proposal had no loss of control requirement nor did it exclude reliance on sexual infidelity as a sufficient trigger, see later for discussion. Lord Judge in Clinton stated, at [3], that the legislation does not sufficiently follow the recommendations of the Law Commission to allow the court to discern any link between the views and recommendations of the Law Commission and the legislation as enacted. See also Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178.

²⁷ As Lord Judge CJ emphasized in Clinton, each of these components is integral to the defence and if one is absent, then the defence fails. His lordship stated that the components ought to be analysed sequentially and separately, at [9]. See also Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178 per Lord Thomas CJ.

- (i) constitute circumstances of an extremely grave character, and
 - (ii) cause D to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged;
- (3) A person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D.

13.1.2.1 Commencement

Sections 54 to 56 were brought into force on 4 October 2010.²⁸ The LOSC defence will only apply if both D's act and V's death occurred after 4 October.²⁹

13.1.2.2 The defence applies only to murder

The LOSC defence is available only to a charge of murder whether as a principal or secondary party.³⁰ Loss of self-control is not a defence to a charge of attempted murder or any charge other than murder. The defence should, it is submitted, have no relevance to the determination of whether D committed the acts or omissions³¹ causing death when he has been found unfit to plead under s 4A of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964.³²

13.1.2.3 Procedure

One of the problems with the provocation defence was that judges were compelled to leave the defence to the jury in every case in which there was some evidence of provocation even if the defence was not pleaded by D (and even if it ran counter to D's interests³³). The LOSC defence need not be left in every case: s 54(6). Under that section the defence must be left only if 'sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue with respect to the defence' and this is when 'evidence is adduced on which, in the opinion of the trial judge, a jury, properly directed, could reasonably conclude that the defence might apply'. This significant change is one that the Court of Appeal was keen to assert in the early cases under the Act: Clinton, Dawes, Gurpinar and more recently in Martin. In Clinton, Lord Judge stated that in reaching this decision the trial judge is required to address each component of the defence, ensuring that there is sufficient evidence to establish each one.³⁴ Lord Judge CJ observed that this exercise:

requires a common sense judgment based on an analysis of all the evidence. To the extent that the evidence may be in dispute, the judge has to recognise that the jury may accept the evidence ²⁸ The Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (Commencement No 4, Transitional and Saving Provisions) Order 2010, SI 2010/816. For some considerable time after 4 October 2010 many homicide trials related to offences alleged to have been committed 'wholly or partly' before that date: see para 7 of Sch 22 to the Coroners and Justice Act 2009. The law of some Caribbean jurisdictions mirrors that of England prior to the enactment of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, so the Privy Council may still have to consider provocation for some time to come.

²⁹ Para 7 of Sch 22 to the 2009 Act.

³⁰ Section 54(8): 'The fact that one party to a killing is by virtue of this section not liable to be convicted of murder does not affect the question whether the killing amounted to murder in the case of any other party to it.' This follows the position in relation to provocation: Marks [1998] Crim LR 676. It has been suggested that provocation (and diminished responsibility) should be available to all offences—J Horder, Excusing Crime (2003) 143–146.

³¹ It is possible to have an omission causing death and plead LOSC. Eg D is so angered by his wife's perpetual taunts that he loses control and leaves her to die when she has fallen and is critically injured despite having a duty to assist.

³² That was the position with provocation: Grant [2001] EWCA Crim 2611.

³³ eg if D was claiming that he killed V in self-defence and remained in control of his temper, if there was evidence of provocation and loss of self-control the provocation defence would be left to the jury even though that would undermine the defendant's plea of self-defence: Bullard v R [1957] AC 635; Rolle v R [1965] 3 All ER 582; Lee Chun-Chuen v R [1963] AC 220. Empirical work by B Mitchell ('Distinguishing Between Murder and Manslaughter in Practice' (2006) 71 J Crim L 318), reveals that 75 per cent of provocation pleas were accompanied by one or more other defence.

³⁴ This was reiterated in Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322, Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178 and Martin [2017] EWCA Crim 1359. This represents a change from the old law: see Acott [1997] 1 WLR 306, 312.

which is most favourable to the defendant, and reject that which is most favourable to the prosecution, and so tailor the ruling accordingly. That is merely another way of saying that in discharging this responsibility the judge should not reject disputed evidence which the jury might choose to believe. Guiding himself or herself in this way, the more difficult question which follows is the judgment whether the circumstances were sufficiently grave and whether the defendant had a justifiable grievance because he had been seriously wronged. These are value judgments. They are left to the jury when the judge concludes that the evidential burden has been satisfied.³⁵

Lord Judge CJ further elaborated on the role of the judge in Dawes.³⁶ His lordship observed that the use of the term ‘opinion’ in s 54(6) does not mean there is a discretion pursuant to which different judges may reasonably form different opinions on how it ought to be exercised.³⁷ What the section mandates is a judgement that may be right or wrong. Lord Judge CJ sought to emphasize that, provided the evidence crosses the threshold imposed by s 54(6), the judge must leave the defence to the jury even if the defence has, for tactical reasons, decided not to plead LOSC.³⁸ Similarly, whether the prosecution has raised the question or not, at the end of the evidence the judge should examine it and decide whether sufficient evidence relating to all the ingredients of the defence has been raised. The Court of Appeal emphasized in *Jewell*³⁹ that judges need to be cautious. There will often be no other evidence to substantiate D’s claim and the judge should not reject disputed evidence that the jury may well choose to believe. It is the judge’s duty to consider whether, on the whole of the evidence, the defence arises.

Sufficient evidence of each of the elements of the defence may appear in the case presented by the Crown. If not, there is an evidential burden on D.⁴⁰ If no evidence is adduced by the Crown or D that D lost his self-control, then the judge will withdraw the defence.⁴¹ Similarly if there is no sufficient evidence of the qualifying trigger.⁴² Since the burden of proof is on the Crown, evidence which might leave a reasonable jury in reasonable doubt whether or not the element is satisfied is sufficient. There must be evidence of loss of self-control and of a qualifying trigger; mere speculation will not suffice.⁴³ The trial judge’s task is not easy and assistance from the advocates must be provided.⁴⁴ The Court of Appeal will not lightly interfere with the trial judge’s decision.⁴⁵

13.1.2.4 No considered desire for revenge

The defence cannot apply where there is ‘a considered desire for revenge’ (s 54(4)) even if D lost control as a result of a qualifying trigger. This is a very important qualification and in many cases will be worth considering before any other element of the defence.⁴⁶ The restriction must also be seen in combination with the requirement in s 55(6)(a): even if D has lost his self-control, if that was caused by a thing which D incited to be done or ³⁵ At [46]. ³⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 322, [2013] Crim LR 770.

³⁷ This was reiterated in Workman [2014] EWCA Crim 575, in which the Court of Appeal emphasized that the judge is required to leave the partial defence to the jury if there is sufficient evidence to raise the issue. This is not a matter of discretion.

³⁸ For an example of a case in which the defence was left to the jury despite not being relied upon by the defence, see Cox [2014] EWCA Crim 804.

³⁹ [2014] EWCA Crim 414. See also Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178 per Lord Thomas CJ.

⁴⁰ It is submitted that as in provocation mixed statements could be relied on: Jama [2004] EWCA Crim 960. Care will need to be taken with reliance on D’s lies: Davies [2004] EWCA Crim 1914 (under the old law).

⁴¹ eg Workman [2014] EWCA Crim 575. ⁴² cf McDonald [2016] EWCA Crim 1529.

⁴³ See in relation to provocation: Miao [2003] EWCA Crim 3486; Van Dongen [2005] EWCA Crim 1728.

⁴⁴ Gurpinar [15] per Lord Thomas CJ. ⁴⁵ ibid.

⁴⁶ In Davies-Jones [2013] EWCA Crim 2809, the Court of Appeal observed that ascertaining the existence of a considered desire for revenge is a logical precursor to the consideration of loss of control.

said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence, the qualifying triggers are not available.

The courts struggled for many years to distinguish revenge killings, of a premeditated or calculated nature, from killings committed in the heat of the moment for which the partial defence is available. Under the provocation defence the requirement of the sudden loss of self-control was an (imperfect) mechanism for drawing this distinction. In Duffy, it was said that:⁴⁷ circumstances which induce a desire for revenge are inconsistent with provocation, since the conscious formulation of a desire for revenge means that a person has had time to think, to reflect, and that would negative a sudden temporary loss of self-control, which is of the essence of provocation.

The Law Commission's recommendation did not include any requirement for a loss of self-control, but did propose an explicit safeguard against the defence being used for revenge killings.

With the section as enacted including a requirement for D to have lost self-control, the position is even more complex. The judge is required to identify whether there was a 'considered desire for revenge' bearing in mind that D must have lost control and satisfy a qualifying trigger. Aside from the theoretical incoherence which results from a requirement for a loss of self-control and a restriction on considered revenge killings, problems may arise in practice. An abused spouse who kills after years of torment might well have a desire for revenge and yet be out of control at the time of killing.

The judge and jury face a difficult task. The word 'considered' which suggests that there is some element of premeditation, is likely to be significant, but is unfortunately undefined.⁴⁸ Lord Judge CJ suggested in Clinton that 'in reality, the greater the level of deliberation, the less likely it will be that the killing followed a true loss of self-control'.⁴⁹ Whilst this may be true, it is important not to conflate what ought to be two separate inquiries. It is possible for D to have lost his self-control and to act out of a considered desire for revenge. If so, D cannot plead the partial defence.

It is important to note also that under the 2009 Act there is no requirement for the loss of control to be 'sudden': s 54(2). The removal of that restriction means that in some cases it will be even harder for the court to determine whether the killing is one that is motivated by a considered desire for revenge or by other emotions. For example, to take cases from the old law, there was held to be sufficient evidence to go to the jury in *Thornton*⁵⁰ where a wife had previously declared an intention to kill her brutally abusive husband, and after a fresh provocation she went to the kitchen, took and sharpened a carving knife and returned to another room where she fatally stabbed him. Is that a 'considered desire for revenge'? Similarly, under the old law, in Pearson,⁵¹ although DD had armed themselves in advance with the fatal weapon and the killing was a joint enterprise, provocation was left. Is arming oneself evidence of a 'considered desire for revenge'? In Baillie,⁵² where D, being greatly enraged, fetched a gun from an attic and drove his car to V's house (stopping for petrol on ⁴⁷ [1949] 1 All ER 932n.

⁴⁸ The language the Law Commission used to describe this element was adopted in the statute despite the Commission not having engaged in statutory drafting: LC 304, para 5.27. See also Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (2012) 214 et seq.

⁴⁹ At [10].

⁵⁰ [1992] 1 All ER 306. The jury rejected the defence, presumably being satisfied that there was no 'sudden and temporary' loss of self-control.

⁵¹ [1992] Crim LR 193. See on this under the old law, M Wasik, 'Cumulative Provocation and Domestic Killing' [1982] Crim LR 29.

⁵² [1995] Crim LR 739.

the way) before shooting him, provocation was also left to the jury. Would this be regarded as a 'considered desire for revenge'? In Clinton, the Court of Appeal approved the direction of the judge that a considered desire for revenge connoted a 'deliberate and considered decision ... one that has been thought about'.⁵³

If D acted in a considered desire for revenge the defence is denied whether or not the desire for revenge exists before any potential qualifying trigger—fear of serious violence or things said or done. It is enough that having been taunted, D goes away for a period of time to brood and returns to stab V. It was suggested in Parliament that the courts should look to D's dominant motive at the time of the killing. That view was rejected by ministers⁵⁴ who stated a belief that:

the expression 'considered desire for revenge' achieves the right balance in ensuring that thought-out revenge killings are excluded without automatically barring every case where revenge may be part of a complex range of motivations.

13.1.2.5 Loss of control

The requirement of a 'loss of control' lies at the heart of the loss of control defence but what that means is undefined—other than that we know it need not be a 'sudden' loss.⁵⁵ As observed in parliamentary debates, it could refer to the failure to exercise self-control or the inability to do so.⁵⁶ It is a subjective test. If D is of an unusually phlegmatic temperament and it appears that he did not lose his self-control, the fact that a reasonable person in like circumstances would have done so will not assist D in the least. It is submitted that the test may be best understood as founded on whether D has lost his ability to maintain his actions in accordance with considered judgement or whether he had lost normal powers of reasoning.⁵⁷ The threshold is a high one. As Lord Judge explained in Dawes: 'For the individual with normal capacity of self-restraint and tolerance, unless the circumstances are extremely grave, normal irritation, and even serious anger do not often cross the threshold into loss of control'.⁵⁸

In deciding whether D lost his control in fact,⁵⁹ the jury are, naturally, entitled to take into account all the relevant circumstances; the nature of the conduct which constitutes the qualifying trigger, and all the relevant conditions in which it took place, the sensitivity or otherwise of D,⁶⁰ and the time, if any, which elapsed between the qualifying trigger and the act which caused death. The length of time between the qualifying trigger and the killing will be important, but unlike under the provocation defence it is not critical that the time gap is short.⁶¹

⁵³ At [129]–[131].

⁵⁴ See <https://publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm200809/cmpublic/coroners/memos/ucm2802.htm>.

⁵⁵ The Court of Appeal observed in McGrory [2013] EWCA Crim 2336 that: 'It is not a requirement of the law that this legal concept be explained to the jury in any precise defined form of words...' At [30], per Maddison J. See now the Crown Court Compendium (2017) Ch 19, section 2.

⁵⁶ See Hansard, HL, 7 July 2009, col 572.

⁵⁷ This definition proposed in the 13th edition was approved in Jewell [2014] EWCA Crim 414. In Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178, this test was challenged by the Crown but the Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to resolve the issue. See the discussion on the old law in R Holton and S Shute, 'Self-Control in the Modern Provocation Defence' (2007) 27 OJLS 49.

⁵⁸ At [60]. See also Martin [2017] EWCA Crim 1359, in which Davis LJ stated that 'a panicky or scared response to aggressive conduct of another person is not of itself necessarily indicative of the existence of an issue of loss of control'. At [47].

⁵⁹ It is not sufficient that a reasonable person would have done if D did not.

⁶⁰ See under s 3 Gregson [2006] EWCA Crim 3364 (epileptic and mentally abnormal).

⁶¹ See Hansard, HC Public Bills Committee, 3 Mar 2009, col 434.

D's failure to testify to his loss of self-control is not, it is submitted, necessarily fatal to his case. In their evaluation of the defence as a whole, the jury should, it is submitted, be directed to consider the loss of control element before examining the qualifying triggers.⁶²

The requirement that there must be a loss of control is not satisfied by evidence that D acted 'instinctively', for example where a boxer punches V who had taunted him.⁶³ In one tragic case⁶⁴ under the old law in which D yielded to the entreaties of his incurably ill and suffering wife to put an end to her life, it was held that D had not lost his self-control. Indeed, the evidence was that he was so in control as to stop immediately when he thought, wrongly, that she had changed her mind. The case highlights the arbitrariness of a defence partially absolving those who kill in a state of anger or outrage, but not those who exercise mercy.⁶⁵

The removal of the requirement for the loss of self-control to be sudden is a significant change from the position at common law and under the 1957 Act. Under the old law the requirement of a 'sudden and temporary loss' of control was regarded as problematic. The test had the potential to operate in a discriminatory way, rendering the defence too readily available to those who are quick to temper (more commonly men), and less accommodating of those who endure the provoking circumstances before responding with lethal force (often women who kill abusive partners).⁶⁶ The requirement was tempered by the courts in decisions such as *Thornton*⁶⁷ and *Ahluwalia*⁶⁸ to bring within the partial defence persons whose reaction to circumstances was delayed rather than instantaneous.⁶⁹

The absence of any suddenness requirement may make it harder to establish an evidential foundation for LOSC than it had been for provocation.⁷⁰ In practical terms, it may be difficult to establish whether there was a loss of control if it was not 'sudden'.⁷¹ In Dawes, Lord Judge CJ gave the following guidance on how this element of the defence ought to be understood.

Provided there was a loss of control, it does not matter whether the loss was sudden or not. A reaction to circumstances of extreme gravity may be delayed. Different individuals in different situations do not react identically, nor respond immediately. Thus, for the purposes of the new defence, the loss of control may follow from the cumulative impact of earlier events. For the purposes of this first ingredient, the response to what used to be described as 'cumulative provocation' requires consideration in the same way as it does in relation to cases in which the loss of control is said to ⁶² This was the case under s 3: Brown [1972] 2 All ER 1328 at 1333.

⁶³ Serrano [2006] EWCA Crim 3182 decided under s 3.

⁶⁴ Cocker [1989] Crim LR 740, discussed by PR Taylor, 'Provocation and Mercy Killing' [1991] Crim LR 111.

⁶⁵ The focus of the defence on the element of anger and spontaneous loss of control as an excusing feature is critically examined by J Horder, 'Reshaping the Subjective Element in the Provocation Defence' (2005) 25 OJLS 123 who considers a defence akin to what is now s 55 of the 2009 Act.

⁶⁶ For a broader-ranging critique of the s 3 defence for its 'gendered and heterosexualist' nature and of measuring the reasonableness of killing across cultures, see H Power, 'Provocation and Culture' [2006] Crim LR 871. Other defences are also difficult to apply to these circumstances. See J Loveless, 'Domestic Violence, Coercion and Duress' [2010] Crim LR 93.

⁶⁷ [1992] 1 All ER 306, [1992] Crim LR 54. For a further appeal, see [1996] 2 Cr App R 108, [1996] Crim LR 597.

⁶⁸ [1992] 4 All ER 889, [1993] Crim LR 63. On which see D Nicolson and R Sanghvi, 'Battered Women and Provocation: The Implications of R v Ahluwalia' [1993] Crim LR 728.

⁶⁹ The issue has generated immense literature, see generally K O'Donovan, 'Defences for Battered Women Who Kill?' (1991) 18 J Law & Soc 219; C Wells, 'Battered Women Syndrome and Defences to Homicide: Where Now' (1994) 14 LS 266; and n 14.

⁷⁰ cf Duffy [1949] 1 All ER 932.

⁷¹ The test at common law suggested that the longer the period to cool off and calm down, the more likely the killing is a revenge killing. But this assumption was not borne out by psychological/physiological evidence: see P Brett, 'The Physiology of Provocation' [1970] Crim LR 634. The requirement of suddenness was criticized for restricting the defence and excluding cases of outraged retaliation: Horder, Excusing Crime, 69–71 et seq.

have arisen suddenly. Given the changed description of this defence, perhaps 'cumulative impact' is the better phrase to describe this particular feature of the first requirement.

His lordship was seeking to emphasize that just because D's response to the events was delayed does not necessarily mean there was no loss of control. It will, however, remain difficult to ascertain whether D in fact reached the point at which self-control is lost.⁷²

The 'loss of self control' element in s 54 raises several further issues. First, the loss of control must, presumably, still be temporary otherwise it would be a case of insanity.⁷³ Secondly, the burden is on the Crown to disprove the element once D has raised evidence of it. It is important to note that the judge has greater control of this LOSC defence: as has already been explained, the judge should not leave the defence to the jury unless there is sufficient evidence on which a jury, properly directed, could conclude that the defence might apply.⁷⁴ Thirdly, a further element (considered later) of the LOSC defence is that D must be judged on the basis that he possesses a 'normal degree of tolerance and self restraint' (s 54(1)(c)). It would therefore seem relevant, when considering whether at the moment that V was killed D had lost his self-control, for the jury to consider the period available to D to reflect and to cool off.⁷⁵ The cooling-off period was construed generously to D in a number of cases under the old law.⁷⁶

By including a loss of control element, it has been argued that the government has rendered the LOSC defence incoherent.⁷⁷ The loss of control requirement was not part of the Law Commission's scheme for the proposed defence.⁷⁸ The government added it to meet concerns that there was a risk of the partial defence being used inappropriately, for example where D killed in cold blood, or the killing was gang-related, or the killing was a so-called 'honour' killing,⁷⁹ and 'where a defendant has killed while basically in full possession of his or her senses, even if he or she is frightened, other than in a situation which is complete self-defence'.⁸⁰ The Law Commission's model was based on the qualifying triggers of fear and a sense of 'justified anger'.⁸¹ To retain these qualifying limbs but to add a loss of control element renders the scheme unnecessarily complex and lacking logic; a person who has lost control cannot easily be described as acting in a state of 'justified' anger.⁸²

⁷² In numerous reported cases the trial judge found that there was no evidence of a loss of control. See eg Charles [2013] EWCA Crim 1205 in which the court observed that the fact that there might have been a trigger for violence does not lead to the inference of a loss of control. In this case the trial judge observed that the deliberate nature of V's injuries was evidence that whoever had inflicted them was very much in control. In Dawes, D's own evidence was that he had acted out of shock rather than anger. See also Barnsdale-Quean [2014] EWCA Crim 1418; Jewell [2014] EWCA Crim 414; Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178.

⁷³ The 'temporary' nature of the loss of self-control seems irrelevant, provided only that it extended to the fatal act. D should not be deprived of a defence because he continued to be berserk for days thereafter—but sudden losses of self-control are, in practice, temporary.

⁷⁴ Section 54(6). This follows a recommendation of LC 304, para 5.11(5); and see paras 5.25–5.32.

⁷⁵ cf Jewell [2014] EWCA Crim 414 in which there was a 12-hour cooling-off period. The judge withdrew the defence from the jury on the basis that there was no evidence (looking not just at the delay) from which it could reasonably be concluded that the defence might apply.

⁷⁶ Pearson [1992] Crim LR 193; Ibrams (1981) 74 Cr App R 154; Baillie [1991] Crim LR 383. In Mann [2011] EWCA Crim 3292, Baillie was regarded as a case decided upon its own special facts.

⁷⁷ See Norrie, n 22, 322–325; S Edwards, 'Anger and Fear as Justifiable Preludes for the Loss of Self-Control' (2010) 74 J Crim L 223 discussing potential difficulties for abused spouses.

⁷⁸ The Law Commission recommended abolishing the positive requirement that D lost his self-control on the grounds that the requirement was unnecessary and undesirable and see LC 304, para 5.19.

⁷⁹ Ministry of Justice Consultation Paper 19/08, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide: Proposals for Reform of the Law (CP 19/08).

⁸⁰ ibid, para 36.

⁸¹ What Norrie describes as 'imperfect justifications' [2009] Crim LR 278.

⁸² See the powerful critique by Norrie, n 22, 312–314.

Critics have also questioned the retention of the loss of control element given the government's expressed intention to amend the law to rectify imbalances that exist in the treatment of men and women. The Law Commission recognized that women's typical reactions might make it harder for them to demonstrate a loss of self-control, and hence rejected that element in its final proposal. By retaining a requirement of loss of control, the government may have reduced the availability of the defence for abused women. It may be difficult to describe as a 'loss of control' circumstances where a person executes a plan to protect herself—as with abused women who kill their abusers while they sleep.⁸³

13.1.2.6 Qualifying triggers: s 55

Under the old law, there was no restriction on the words or conduct that were capable of founding the provocation defence, provided D lost his self-control. The provocation could arise from perfectly legal acts by V or others. To take an extreme example, in Doughty,⁸⁴ provocation should have been left to the jury as a defence where there was evidence that the persistent crying of D's two-week-old baby had caused D to lose his self-control and kill it.

The LOSC defence under s 55 is designed to be narrower.⁸⁵ This was reiterated in Dawes, in which Lord Judge CJ stated that the impact of the qualifying triggers is that 'the circumstances in which the qualifying triggers will arise are much more limited than the equivalent provisions in the former provocation defence. The result is that some of the more absurd trivia which nevertheless required the judge to leave the provocation defence to the jury will no longer fall within the ambit of the qualifying triggers defined in the LOSC defence.'⁸⁶ Now, only qualifying triggers which cause the loss of self-control will be recognized. Section 55 provides:

- (2) A loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger if subsection (3), (4) or (5) applies.
- (3) This subsection applies if D's loss of self-control was attributable to D's fear of serious violence from V against D or another identified person.
- (4) This subsection applies if D's loss of self-control was attributable to a thing or things done or said (or both) which—
 - (a) constituted circumstances of an extremely grave character, and
 - (b) caused D to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.
- (5) This subsection applies if D's loss of self-control was attributable to a combination of the matters mentioned in subsections (3) and (4).

Three preliminary points in relation to the qualifying triggers may be noted.⁸⁷ First, the statute requires that the loss of self-control is 'attributable to' a qualifying trigger and this ⁸³ cf B Mitchell, 'Loss of Self-Control under the Coroners and Justice Act 2009: Oh No!' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011). Mitchell would prefer there to be some form of mental or emotional disturbance at the core of the defence. See B Mitchell, 'Years of Provocation, Followed by a Loss of Control' in L Zedner and JV Roberts (eds), Principles and Values in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2012).

⁸⁴ (1986) 83 Cr App R 319. See J Horder, 'The Problem of Provocative Children' [1987] Crim LR 655.

⁸⁵ For an analysis of whether they restrict the scope of the defence too much, see R Taylor, 'The Model of Tolerance and Self-Restraint' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011). It has been argued that LOSC is not as restrictive as has been suggested and that it may be possible for the mercy killer to plead the partial defence. See B Livings, 'A New Partial Defence for the Mercy Killer: Revisiting Loss of Control' [2014] NILQ 187; with respect this seems unlikely.

⁸⁶ Dawes, [60]. Cited subsequently in Charles [2013] EWCA Crim 1205 and Martin [2017] EWCA Crim 1359.

⁸⁷ In Clinton, Lord Judge CJ made the additional point that, 'There is no point in pretending that the practical application of this provision will not create considerable difficulties', at [11].

raises the question whether it might be construed as requiring something less than a formal causal link. Despite the ambiguity of the word, it is submitted that the courts ought to treat this as a requirement of causation. Secondly, the presence or otherwise of a qualifying trigger is not defined or decided by D and any assertions he might make in evidence. The Court of Appeal has confirmed that the existence of a qualifying trigger requires an objective assessment by the judge at the end of the evidence⁸⁸ and, if the defence is left, by the jury considering their verdict.⁸⁹ Thirdly, what would otherwise be sufficient for a qualifying trigger is to be disregarded if D brought that state of affairs upon himself by, for example, looking for a fight by inciting something to be said or done (s 55(6)(a) or (b)), as the case may be. The restriction in s 55(6) is:

- (a) D's fear of serious violence is to be disregarded to the extent that it was caused by a thing which D incited to be done or said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence;
- (b) a sense of being seriously wronged by a thing done or said is not justifiable if D incited the thing to be done or said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence.

Despite some clarification in Dawes, the law is not as clear as it could be.⁹⁰ Under the old law, the jury were told to take into account everything both done and said according to the effect which, in their opinion, it would have on a reasonable person, even where that which was done and said was a predictable result of D's own conduct. That was the decision in *Johnson*⁹¹ (not following dicta of the Privy Council in Edwards v R)⁹² where the Court of Appeal rejected the submission 'that the mere fact that a defendant caused a reaction in others, which in turn led him to lose his self-control, should result in the issue of provocation being outside a jury's consideration'.⁹³

Read literally, however, the availability of the LOSC defence is wider. LOSC would only be removed from the jury if D's purpose was subsequently to use violence. D will not be able to rely on LOSC where D deliberately induces a state of affairs that will generate a qualifying trigger—D taunts V whom he wants to kill, to do an act so that D may kill him and rely on the defence and be convicted of manslaughter only. Such a situation may seem far-fetched.⁹⁴

In Dawes, Lord Judge CJ held that the impact of Johnson has been diminished, but not wholly extinguished by the statutory provisions contained in the 2009 Act.⁹⁵ His lordship stated that 'the mere fact that in some general way the defendant was behaving badly and looking for and provoking trouble does not of itself lead to the disapplication of the qualifying triggers based on section 55(3)(4) and (5) unless his actions were intended to provide him with the excuse or opportunity to use violence'.⁹⁶ The focus of the inquiry under s 55(6)(a) and (b), it is submitted, should be narrow; namely whether D's purpose was to provide an excuse to use violence, not whether a violent reaction was the foreseeable consequence of what D was doing. Lord Judge pointed out, however, that the judge would have to consider the additional issue of whether D did in fact 'fear' serious violence if he was out to incite it and also whether he truly had a justified sense of being seriously wronged.

⁸⁸ cf the exchange between the court and counsel in McDonald [2016] EWCA Crim 1529.

⁸⁹ Dawes, [61]; Gurpinar [2015] EWCA Crim 178. ⁹⁰ See Dawes [2013] EWCA Crim 322.

⁹¹ [1980] 1 WLR 740; was preferred to the dicta of the Privy Council in Edwards [1973] AC 648.

⁹² [1973] AC 648, PC. ⁹³ Johnson, 744.

⁹⁴ Analogy should be drawn with the law on self-defence where D is the initial aggressor, see Harvey [2009] EWCA Crim 469; Keane [2010] EWCA Crim 2514, on which see Ch 10.

⁹⁵ See commentary by Ashworth [2013] Crim LR 770.

⁹⁶ Dawes, [58].

Fear of serious violence: s 55(3)

Section 55(3) provides:

This subsection applies if D's loss of self-control was attributable to D's fear of serious violence^[97] from V against D or another identified person.

And by s 55(6):

In determining whether a loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger—

- (a) D's fear of serious violence is to be disregarded to the extent that it was caused by a thing which D incited to be done or said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence;

This qualifying trigger is the one which renders the LOSC defence quite distinct from the defence of provocation. It flows from a Law Commission recommendation.⁹⁸ It is designed primarily to accommodate within the partial defence regime those women who kill their violent and abusive partners.⁹⁹ The sudden and temporary requirement of the common law of provocation frequently proved a stumbling block for such women. This qualifying trigger will, however, apply more widely.¹⁰⁰ It clearly encompasses two quite distinct sets of circumstances: (a) where D kills in order to thwart an anticipated (albeit not imminent) attack; and (b) where D overreacts to what he perceived to be an imminent threat.¹⁰¹ In the first category, the defence will be particularly useful for abused spouses who kill. In that regard the reform is welcome. However, in relation to the second category, there is scope for the defence to be used in a very broad range of killings that were previously classed as murder and which attracted no defence. For example, D who stabs V in a fight in a pub might claim that he stabbed V having feared that V was going to stab him first. Even if D has used excessive force given the threat he thought he faced, and even if D has made an unreasonable mistake about the need for any force at all, he will, if the jury believe his story may be true, be convicted of manslaughter. This is a significant change in the law.

The defence is limited under this qualifying trigger to cases where D fears violence from V to himself or an identified other. That acts as a restriction, but it is unclear how narrowly it will be interpreted. What if D, who is in V's presence, hears V ordering X to commit an act of violence on D's fellow gang member who is miles away? D loses his self-control and kills V. Is this sufficient?

The relationship between the LOSC defence and self-defence or defence of others under s 76 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 needs to be approached ⁹⁷ It has been argued that despite Lord Judge CJ stating in Dawes that each element of the qualifying triggers requires objective evaluation, whether D feared serious violence ought to be a subjective question, ie did D himself regard this violence as 'serious'. See T Storey, 'Loss of Control: The Qualifying Triggers, Self-Induced Loss of Control and "Cumulative Impact"' (2013) 77 J Crim L 189. Such an approach has the potential to render the partial defence extremely wide.

⁹⁸ LC 304, para 5.55. Historically the common law defence of provocation did encompass reactions prompted by fear: LC 304, para 5.49.

⁹⁹ It has been argued that domestic violence is such a serious wrong that it would be relatively easy for women who lose control and kill their abusers to rely on the other qualifying trigger. See J Herring, 'The Serious Wrong of Domestic Abuse and the Loss of Control Defence' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

¹⁰⁰ For an analysis of whether the provision will achieve this goal, see S Edwards, 'Loss of Self-Control: When His Anger is Worth More Than Her Fear' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

¹⁰¹ See MOJ CP 19/08, para 28.

with care.¹⁰² In Martin,¹⁰³ the Court of Appeal emphatically rejected the suggestion that where self-defence is raised in a murder case, then that will of itself also give rise to a potential defence of loss of control. It was held that not only was such a suggestion not the law but it was wholly contrary to the designedly limited nature of the defence as confirmed by the 2009 Act. It is important to note that the defences have the following distinguishing features.

Self-defence is available on any charge; LOSC is available only on a charge of murder.¹⁰⁴ Self-defence results in an acquittal; LOSC in a verdict of manslaughter. With LOSC, D can rely on fear of future non-imminent attack; with self-defence he can only rely on a threat (or believed threat) of imminent attack.¹⁰⁵ The defence of self-defence is available if D uses force in response to a perceived threat of any violence (including sexual violence¹⁰⁶). The LOSC defence is available if D responds to a threat of serious violence.¹⁰⁷ Violence is undefined.¹⁰⁸ If the degree of force used by D in killing V is, viewed objectively, excessive,¹⁰⁹ that will deprive D of the defence of self-defence,¹¹⁰ but will not automatically deprive D of the LOSC defence. Section 54(1)(c) (see later) requires a comparison of D's behaviour with that of a person of normal self-restraint. It has therefore been argued that if D uses excessive force in self-defence and kills, since a person of normal tolerance and self-restraint would, by definition, not use excessive force, the defence ought not to be available. This view appears to be too strict. The requirement in s 54(1)(c) is to consider whether the person of normal self-restraint 'might have reacted' as D did. Even people of normal self-restraint sometimes use excessive force and kill. It is submitted that it is not appropriate to read the LOSC defence as restricted in such a way.¹¹¹

Particular problems may arise where on the facts there is evidence that might support self-defence or LOSC. If D has used excessive force, the complete defence of self-defence will fail, but D may still be able to rely on LOSC; the excessive amount of force being explicable by reference to the 'loss of self control'. Directions to the jury will need to be approached with great care. A further problem is posed by s 54(5):

On a charge of murder, if sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue with respect to the defence under subsection (1), the jury must assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not.

At first sight this seems to suggest that in a case where D pleads self-defence, the Crown will automatically be entitled to a manslaughter conviction in any case where D lost his ¹⁰² Lord Judge CJ cited this paragraph from the 13th edition with approval in Dawes, [59]. In Skilton [2014] EWCA Crim 154, Jackson LJ observed: 'There must be a clear distinction between the defence of self-defence, on the one hand, and the partial defence of loss of control on the other hand.' At [24]. The Court of Appeal held that the trial judge was correct not to leave loss of control to the jury, as D admitted in cross-examination that he was acting out of fear and was not out of control.

¹⁰³ [2017] EWCA Crim 1359.

¹⁰⁴ If there are multiple counts relating to different victims, care will be needed in directing the jury.

¹⁰⁵ For discussion of how the two interact in the context of abused women, see N Wake, 'Battered Women, Startled Householders and Psychological Self-Defence: Anglo-Australian Perspectives' (2013) 77 J Crim L 433.

¹⁰⁶ MOJ CP 19/08, para 44.

¹⁰⁷ See MOJ Circular 2010/13, para 25. Cf L Leigh, 'Two New Partial Defences to Murder' (2010) 53 Crim L & Justice Weekly 53, who states that the test is objective.

¹⁰⁸ Fortson, n 22, argues that it includes psychological harm. It includes sexual harm: MOJ CP19/08, para 27.

¹⁰⁹ By virtue of s 43 of the Crime and Courts Act 2013; if the case is a 'householder case' then if the degree of force was grossly disproportionate or unreasonable D will be denied the defence.

¹¹⁰ And therefore of a complete acquittal. See Clegg [1995] and Ch 10. See also Leverick, Self Defence (2007) Ch 6.

¹¹¹ cf the suggestion by J Miles, 'A Dog's Breakfast of Homicide Reform' [2009] 6 Arch News 8. See on this Fortson, n 22.

self-control. However, when applied properly, this provision does not create the conflict it appears to.¹¹² Section 54(5) requires only that sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue under s 54(1). Thereafter, the prosecution shoulders the legal burden of proving, to the criminal standard of proof, that the defence is not satisfied. Unless the prosecution discharges that burden, s 54(5) requires the jury to assume that the defence is satisfied.

- (6) For the purposes of subsection (5), sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue with respect to the defence if evidence is adduced on which, in the opinion of the trial judge, a jury, properly directed, could reasonably conclude that the defence might apply.

It is essential in cases where D pleads self-defence and LOSC that the jury deal with self-defence before LOSC. If jurors address these matters in the wrong order, a manslaughter conviction becomes compulsory. This seems to be a case in which written directions instructing jurors of the steps to verdict would be valuable.¹¹³ Lord Judge CJ in Dawes confirmed this view; the appropriate approach is to leave loss of control for the jury's consideration after it has rejected self-defence.¹¹⁴

Further problems may arise if D's fear of serious violence was based on an entirely mistaken interpretation of the facts by D.¹¹⁵ Under the old law the authorities suggested that where D was provoked partly as the result of a mistake of fact, he was entitled to be treated as if the facts were as he mistakenly supposed them to be. This line of reasoning accords with the approach to other defences.¹¹⁶ Given that the LOSC defence based on this first qualifying trigger is similar in many respects to self-defence, and a mistaken belief in the need for self-defence will not deprive a defendant of that defence, it is submitted that the defence should be available if D has a genuine mistaken belief in facts that would amount to a qualifying trigger of a fear of serious violence.

It is unclear whether a mistake induced by voluntary intoxication precludes reliance on the defence.¹¹⁷ In self-defence, on policy grounds, mistakes due to intoxication are irrelevant, notwithstanding that murder is a crime of specific intent.¹¹⁸ That would suggest that the defence of LOSC was not available. However, there are several arguments that could be marshalled in favour of adopting a more generous approach in LOSC. First, the policy-driven approach in relation to self-defence and intoxicated mistakes has been heavily and cogently criticized.¹¹⁹ Secondly, this is a partial defence which leads to a manslaughter conviction—it is not the case that D will leave court with a complete acquittal if he is permitted ¹¹² Maria Eagle stated that s 54(5) was to 'clarify where the burden of proof lies when a partial defence of loss of control arises in a case' and that 'the usual principles apply in relation to the burden of proof in the new partial defence'. Hansard, HC, 3 Mar 2009, col 437; see also the speech of Baroness Scotland of Asthal: Hansard, HL, 7 July 2009, col 585.

¹¹³ See generally the Crown Court Compendium (2017).

¹¹⁴ Dawes, [59].

¹¹⁵ Edwards makes the important point that habituated gender thinking might impress upon what is considered sufficient to constitute both fear and serious violence. She states that women who are the victims of domestic violence can have a heightened awareness of their physical security. In cases in which D has killed in fear of an anticipated attack by V, if this is not made clear to juries then they might be inclined to think that D simply overreacted. See S Edwards, 'Loss of Self-Control: When His Anger is Worth More Than Her Fear' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

¹¹⁶ cf Oye [2013] EWCA Crim 1725 in which the Court of Appeal stated that it was best not to draw comparisons between loss of control and self-defence in relation to mistaken beliefs. With reference to the relationship between them, the Court of Appeal observed, obiter, that 'the highly complex provisions of ss.54–56 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 would seem to indicate no particular parliamentary intention that a corresponding approach is designed to be adopted'. At [43] per Davis LJ.

¹¹⁷ See also the discussion of Asmelash, p 545 suggesting the Court of Appeal's reluctance to allow intoxication to be considered.

¹¹⁸ Hatton [2006] 1 Cr App R 247, CA.

¹¹⁹ See Ch 9, p 325.

to found his plea on an intoxicated mistaken view of the facts.¹²⁰ It is established that a drunken mistake may negative the mens rea of murder¹²¹ and it is therefore consistent that such a mistake should be relevant in determining whether the killing should be reduced to manslaughter on the ground of LOSC. Thirdly, under the provocation defence an intoxicated mistake as to the facts did not preclude reliance on the defence. In Brown,¹²² D, a soldier, wrongly, but apparently reasonably, supposed that V was a member of a gang who were attacking him and his comrade. He struck V with a sword and killed him. The judges were clearly of the opinion that this was only manslaughter. In the other cases the mistake arose from drunkenness. In Letenock,¹²³ the Court of Criminal Appeal substituted a verdict of manslaughter in the case of a soldier who had stabbed another, where the 'only element of doubt in the case is whether or not there was anything which might have caused the applicant, in his drunken condition, to believe that he was going to be struck'.¹²⁴ Against this is, of course, the requirement that D has by definition lost his self-control.¹²⁵

Things said or done; circumstances of an extremely grave character, etc: s 55(4)

This form of the defence bears greatest similarity to the old law of provocation. This version of the LOSC defence is available in s 55(4) if D's loss of self-control was:

attributable to a thing or things done or said (or both) which—

- (a) constituted circumstances of an extremely grave character, and
- (b) caused D to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.

Section 55(6) further provides that:

In determining whether a loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger—

- (b) a sense of being seriously wronged by a thing done or said is not justifiable if D incited the thing to be done or said for the purpose of providing an excuse to use violence.

Under the provocation defence a wide range of situations in which D claimed that he had been provoked by things said and/or done could be left for the jury's consideration (eg the crying of a 17-day-old baby in *Doughty*¹²⁶). This broad interpretation of the trigger for the defence meant that there was no requirement that the provoking acts or words were performed consciously, let alone with the deliberate intention to provoke.¹²⁷ The test under the LOSC defence is much stricter¹²⁸ although the statutory language is disappointingly vague.

¹²⁰ Although that is also true in relation to self-defence in murder because an unreasonable intoxicated mistake will lead to a conviction for manslaughter despite the courts' gloss on this in O'Grady. See p 326.

¹²¹ See p 321. ¹²² (1776) 1 Leach 148. ¹²³ (1917) 12 Cr App R 221, CCA. ¹²⁴ ibid, 224.

¹²⁵ This is one example of how the insertion of the loss of control element to the Law Commission's original proposal creates difficulties and illogicalities.

¹²⁶ (1986) 83 Cr App R 319, CA.

¹²⁷ This dilution of the concept of 'provocation' to mean merely words or conduct that cause the loss of control in the defendant has been heavily criticized by academics. See, in particular, T Macklem and J Gardner, 'Provocation and Pluralism' (2001) 64 MLR 815, and Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 355–368. See LCCP 173, paras 4.8–4.11.

¹²⁸ The facts of Zebedee [2012] EWCA Crim 1428 illuminate how strict the qualifying triggers now are: D was convicted of the murder of his father. V was aged 94, suffered from senile dementia and was doubly incontinent. D claimed that he had lost his self-control after V soiled himself during the night, after which D cleaned him up, only for V to soil himself again 20 minutes later. The jury rejected his plea of loss of control. In the Court of Appeal, Spencer J observed that the jury must have concluded that whatever had triggered D's violence did not constitute circumstances of an extremely grave nature. For an analysis of some of the cases that were successful under the old law, but which would now probably fail, see T Storey, 'Raising the Bar: Loss of Control and the Qualifying Triggers' (2013) 77 J Crim L 17.

Even if a person with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint might have reacted in the circumstances as D did (see s 54(1)(c) and s 54(3)), this will not be enough unless those circumstances meet the thresholds as specified in s 55(4) of the 2009 Act. The Court of Appeal has confirmed that all the elements of s 55(4) require objective evaluation.¹²⁹

Things done or said

As under the provocation defence, mere circumstances (rather than something said or done) no matter how provocative, cannot be a sufficient basis for this qualifying trigger.¹³⁰ Loss of control by a farmer on his crops being destroyed by a flood, or his flocks by foot-and-mouth, or an author on his manuscript being destroyed by lightning, cannot constitute a qualifying trigger. An 'act of God' could hardly be regarded as 'something done' within s 55(4). There is no requirement that the things said or done be said or done by the victim (subject to the other elements of the defence). This follows the old law. For example, in Davies, D killed his wife, V having been provoked by X, her lover.¹³¹ Bearing in mind that there is no restriction on the source of the words or conduct which cause D to lose control, it seems odd to distinguish cases where the trigger is words by a third party (defence available) and mere circumstances (defence unavailable). If D may rely on the defence where the crops or the manuscript were destroyed by an unknown arsonist, why should it be different where no human agency was involved?

There must, as with the provocation defence, be some evidence of the qualifying trigger. In Acott,¹³² the House of Lords held that for the defence of provocation it was not enough that D's loss of control may possibly have been the result of some unidentified words or actions by another. There must be 'some evidence of what was done or what was said to provoke the homicidal reaction'.¹³³ The trial judge is best placed to make this assessment.

There is no express provision in the 2009 Act to deal with the situation where D mistakenly believes that things were done or said. Several different situations may need to be distinguished. First, there is the position where D mistakenly believes that things were said or done when nothing was in fact said or done at all. In that case, it would be hard to see how the qualifying trigger is satisfied on a literal interpretation of the section. Secondly, there is the case in which words or acts occur, but D mistakes what was said or done. What of D who mishears V and thinks that V has issued a racist taunt when in fact V's words were completely innocuous? In that case, it could be argued that the defence ought to be available (subject to the other elements), even if D's mistake is an unreasonable one.¹³⁴ That raises the question of whether D can rely on this trigger for the LOSC defence if D acts on a mistaken belief induced by voluntary intoxication. Arguably, since the 'things done or said' must lead to a 'justifiable' sense of being seriously wronged, it will be appropriate to ignore intoxicated mistakes unless the mistake was one which D would have made had he been sober.

It is submitted that the defence will be available, as provocation was, if D sought to kill the person responsible for the acts or words but, by accident, missed him and killed an innocent person. The doctrine of transferred malice¹³⁵ should operate and D would be guilty of only ¹²⁹ See Clinton, [12] and Dawes, [61]. ¹³⁰ Acott [1997] 2 Cr App R 94.

¹³¹ [1975] QB 691. Cf to the same effect by Lawton J in Twine [1967] Crim LR 710, where D's girlfriend's conduct caused D to lose his self-control and strike and kill the man she was with.

¹³² [1997] 1 All ER 706, HL, [1997] Crim LR 541. See also Bharj [2005] EWCA Crim 499 emphasizing that the jury would be looking at all the evidence.

¹³³ Emphasis in the original.

¹³⁴ Elvin questions whether an unreasonable belief could ever lead to a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. See J Elvin, 'Killing in Response to "Circumstances of an Extremely Grave Character": Improving the Law on Homicide' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011). Whether the two are in fact mutually exclusive is questionable.

¹³⁵ See p 122. For discussion, see M Bohlander, 'Transferred Malice and Transferred Defences' (2010) 13 New Crim LR 555.

manslaughter, as was held for provocation in *Gross*¹³⁶ where D, provoked by blows from her husband, shot at him, intending to kill him but missed and killed V.¹³⁷ If D knew it was virtually certain that she would hit V, she would have an independent mens rea with respect to V, probably sufficient to fix her with liability for murder¹³⁸ at common law; but now the acts or words of the third party would be a partial defence even for D's acts towards V.

Historically, it used to be said that there was no defence if acts or words were not done to the defendant;¹³⁹ but the 2009 Act as with the 1957 Act has no such explicit requirement.¹⁴⁰ D can rely on the defence if V does acts to P that might cause D to lose his self-control and, in circumstances of extreme gravity, to kill V with intent and with a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. For example, D might find V raping his child P.¹⁴¹

There is no statutory limitation to prevent a third party description or report being sufficient to satisfy the trigger, as where D loses his temper following X's report of V's admission that V had attacked D's child. That is, of course, subject to the other elements of the defence, and in particular it must be noted that the less plausible the account relayed to D, the less likely it will cause a loss of self-control and the less likely it will give rise to a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.

There is nothing to prevent a lawful act by V being sufficient to constitute the trigger, although the fact that the acts or words were lawful will cast doubt on whether D had a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged (see later).¹⁴² In particular, where the act is one which is not merely permitted, but which is positively praiseworthy, it is doubtful that a jury would find that it would cause D to lose his temper and to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged and that such action might have been performed by a person of normal tolerance and self-restraint in D's position.

Must constitute circumstances of an 'extremely grave character'

For the purposes of this second 'qualifying trigger' (s 55(4)), the threshold is that things said and done must constitute circumstances of an 'extremely grave character'. Presumably, grave means in all the circumstances. The intention is to restrict the scope of the defence from what was the position under the defence of provocation. The Law Commission offered the following guidance:

The jury should be trusted to evaluate the relative grossness of provocation, in whatever form it comes, according to their own sense of justice in an individual case.¹⁴³

It is disappointing that such a key term of the defence is left undefined. In Hatter (one of the cases conjoined with Dawes), it was observed that the break-up of a relationship, of itself, will not normally constitute circumstances of an extremely grave nature entitling the aggrieved party to feel a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. Lord Judge CJ did state, ¹³⁶ (1913) 23 Cox CC 455 (Darling J); and see Porritt [1961] 1 WLR 1372. Bohlander, n 135, doubts whether this case is one concerning the transfer of defences at all. Bohlander argues that in the same way that a temporary mental disease may exempt any and all actions D committed in that state from liability, so a temporary loss of control exempts any and all actions committed under its influence. We disagree. Given that the statute mandates that the defence is only available on a charge of murder, it is difficult to see how it exempts D from all liability. If D loses his self-control and causes criminal damage to his rival's car, he cannot plead loss of control.

¹³⁷ 23 Cox CC at 456. ¹³⁸ See p 99.

¹³⁹ But see Fisher (1837) 8 C & P 182 (Park J, obiter) (D discovering V raping D's son) and Harrington (1866) 10 Cox CC 370 (Cockburn CJ contemplating the possibility of a defence where D found his daughter being violently assaulted by her husband).

¹⁴⁰ cf J Elvin, 'Killing in Response to "Circumstances of an Extremely Grave Character": Improving the Law on Homicide' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

¹⁴¹ Examples under the 1957 Act included Pearson [1992] Crim LR 193.

¹⁴² Doughty (1986) 83 Cr App R 319. ¹⁴³ LC 304, p 85 fn 31.

however, that just as issues relating to sexual infidelity have to be examined in their overall circumstances, so the events surrounding the circumstances in the breakdown of a relationship will often but not always fall to be disqualified by s 55(6).¹⁴⁴

'justifiable sense of being seriously wronged'

The defendant must have been caused by the things done or said to have a 'justifiable sense of being seriously wronged' (s 55(4)). This is much narrower than for provocation. It is intended to be an objective test.¹⁴⁵ It is, again, disappointing that the Act provides no further guidance on how the jury will approach this question. It was intended that it would provide an opportunity to take into consideration cumulative abuse, which will be particularly important in domestic killings by abused women. At the same time, it was intended to exclude from the scope of the defence the cases of racist or 'honour' killings. For example, it is difficult to see how the defence could be left to the jury if D, a white supremacist, killed V, a black man, because V refused to give way to D on the staircase. No reasonable jury properly directed could conclude that D had a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. The defence should be withdrawn from the jury. Similarly where D, a devout Muslim, kills his daughter because she has a sexual relationship before marriage, he cannot be said to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.¹⁴⁶

In many cases, of course, the judge will be obliged to leave the defence to the jury for their good sense. Note that the question for them is not whether D's act in killing was justifiable, but whether D had a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. Again, it is presumably a question of whether the sense of serious wrong would be felt by someone in D's circumstances. In Bowyer, the other conjoined appeal in Dawes, D was a burglar who killed the householder from whose home he was intending to steal. Given the circumstances, the Court of Appeal held that it could hardly be said that V had given D any cause to feel justifiably wronged.¹⁴⁷ The same was true in Meanza.¹⁴⁸ In that case D's evidence was that he felt aggrieved at being asked to turn down the television in the secure unit in which he was being detained. He also felt aggrieved by the fact his meetings and encounters with his girlfriend had to take place on a supervised basis. The Court of Appeal held, rightly it is submitted, that D could have no justifiable grievance in relation to hospital and restriction orders that were lawfully imposed, nor in relation to the restrictions imposed upon his relationship with his girlfriend.

Sexual infidelity

Historically, one of the classic examples of extreme provocation recognized by the courts for centuries was where D killed having found his spouse in the act of adultery.¹⁴⁹ The ¹⁴⁴ Dawes, [65].

¹⁴⁵ Some commentators (eg Liberty) suggested that the provision was insufficiently clear and that it might be construed subjectively.

¹⁴⁶ cf Mohammed [2005] EWCA Crim 1880 where in cross-examination D claimed that 'it is part of our religion' to do as he did in killing his sexually active unmarried daughter. D's perception cannot be determinative of what is justifiable.

¹⁴⁷ Dawes, [66].

¹⁴⁸ [2017] EWCA Crim 445.

¹⁴⁹ Killing, in such a case, was 'of the lowest degree of [manslaughter]; and therefore... the court directed the burning in the hand to be gently inflicted, because there could not be a greater provocation': Blackstone, Commentaries, iv, 192. See also the case of Manning (1671) T Raym 212. For a contemporary case with exactly these facts, see Christie [2004] EWCA Crim 1338, D was convicted of murder. As an example of how significant this factor was, see Evans [2009] EWCA Crim 2243 where the Court of Appeal accepted that had E been aware of the infidelity of his wife he might have been able to plead provocation. For an analysis of the way sexual infidelity-related evidence has influenced perceptions of a homicide defendant's culpability, see J Horder and K Fitz-Gibbon, 'When Sexual Infidelity Triggers Murder: Examining the Impact of Homicide Law Reform on Judicial Attitudes in Sentencing' (2015) 74 CLJ 307.

government's intention was to prevent the LOSC defence from being run in such a case and to prevent obsessively jealous men using suspected infidelity on the part of the spouse or partner as a defence for killing.¹⁵⁰

Under the LOSC defence, D's loss of control that is attributed to anything said or done which constitutes sexual infidelity is to be disregarded (s 55(6)(c)). This limitation did not form part of the Law Commission's original proposals and was introduced amid much controversy in the debates in Parliament. The restriction was met with anxiety by Lord Phillips who admitted he was 'uneasy about a law which so diminishes the significance of sexual infidelity as expressly to exclude it from even the possibility of amounting to provocation'.¹⁵¹

It is important to be clear about what s 55(6) forbids:

In determining whether a loss of self-control had a qualifying trigger . . .

(b) the fact that a thing done or said constituted sexual infidelity is to be disregarded.

The restriction on the defence is likely to present difficulties of interpretation and application. In addition, it may well fail to defeat the intended mischief. The concern is that men are able to rely on loss of self-control defences when their anger and loss of control results from sexual jealousy. As Lord Judge CJ emphasized in Clinton, however, D remains at liberty to tell the jury the whole story about the relevant events, including the fact and impact of sexual infidelity.¹⁵² The jury must still consider and ultimately evaluate this evidence.

Numerous problems of interpretation arise as recognized by the Court of Appeal in Clinton.¹⁵³ First, there is no definition of what 'sexual infidelity' means. Clearly, there can be infidelity outside marriage, but how 'solid' a relationship must there be before sexual acts with others outside that relationship constitute infidelity?¹⁵⁴ Lord Judge in Clinton accepted that 'infidelity' connotes a continuing relationship. His lordship accepted that the consequence of this is that a killing by a spouse or partner might fall outside the defence, but a killing by a jealous stalker would not.¹⁵⁵

Secondly, the term 'sexual' infidelity can be read narrowly, so as to comprise only those incidents of, and conduct directly related to, sexual activity. Lord Judge accepted that a betrayal by one partner that involved telling others about an illicit relationship was capable of falling within the prohibition.¹⁵⁶

Thirdly, it seems that words might constitute sexual infidelity where, for example, D overhears his wife V saying 'I love you' to her lover, X.¹⁵⁷ But what of words spoken by V telling D that she loves X? Do her words 'I love someone else' constitute infidelity or are they a report of her infidelity? On a narrow view of the section, it can be argued that the words do ¹⁵⁰ See Hansard, HC Public Bills Committee, 3 Mar 2009, col 439. For consideration of the more conceptual issues, see A Reed and N Wake, 'Sexual Infidelity Killings: Contemporary Standardisations and Comparative Stereotypes' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

¹⁵¹ The Times, 7 Nov 2008.

¹⁵² At [28].

¹⁵³ Apart from the specific problems that arise from the drafting of this provision, it has been argued that exclusionary clauses in general give rise to difficulties when invoked in this context. See N Wake, 'Political Rhetoric or Principled Reform of Loss of Control? Anglo-Australian Perspectives on the Exclusionary Conduct Model' (2013) 77 J Crim L 512.

¹⁵⁴ The debates in Parliament do not reveal what types of relationship will qualify, but the references are usually to spouses, civil partners and in some instances to 'partners'.

¹⁵⁵ At [18].

¹⁵⁶ ibid.

¹⁵⁷ In Clinton, Lord Judge CJ stated that this may, or may not, provide evidence of sexual infidelity. In addition, his lordship observed that it may not constitute sexual infidelity. Whether it does so will depend upon the relationship between the parties, the person by whom and to whom it is spoken and the circumstances. His lordship stated that situations seemingly as simple as this one 'will give rise to manifold difficulties in the context of the prohibition on sexual infidelity as a qualifying trigger'. At [25]–[27].

not constitute sexual infidelity and they are not to be disregarded under s 55(6)(c).¹⁵⁸ In the debates in Parliament, in response to a question whether V bragging to D that he had been having an affair with D's wife would be sexual infidelity, the government spokesman said that the defence would turn on the facts, but that:

*sexual infidelity in itself cannot and should not be an acceptable reason for a defence for murder.*¹⁵⁹

Fourthly, read literally s 55(6)(c) only forbids regard being had to the fact that the thing said or done constituted sexual infidelity when determining if there is a qualifying trigger sufficient for the defence to be left to the jury. The effect on D of the sexual infidelity is not to be disregarded, merely the words or acts that constituted it. This is disappointing legislative drafting.

Fifthly, provided there is some other thing besides the fact of sexual infidelity said or done which amounts to extreme circumstances which D claims caused him to lose his self-control and to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, the trigger will be satisfied. It may be difficult to discern whether D's loss of self-control is attributable to things done or said by his sexual partner other than her act of infidelity. What related aspects can be taken into account in determining if the trigger is present? The MOJ¹⁶⁰ makes clear that:

it is only the fact of sexual infidelity that must be disregarded. The thing said or done can still potentially amount to a 'qualifying trigger' if (ignoring the sexual infidelity) it amounts to circumstances of an extremely grave character which caused the defendant to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged.¹⁶¹

Examples of the sorts of activity that might trigger the defence and would not be excluded by s 55(6)(c) include D who has found his wife in bed with her lover and killed the lover, saying in defence of the killing that it was not the act of sex that triggered the loss of self-control but the fact that the lover was D's best friend. Some such claims will be plausible: D will claim the thing that caused him to lose self-control in extremely grave circumstances having a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged was not the sex but, for example, 'the fact that V threatened to take the kids', or 'the fact that she taunted me about my erectile dysfunction' or 'the fact that she smashed up my prized possession as she was leaving', etc. In debates, the government spokesman stated:

it is important to set out the position precisely and uncompromisingly—namely that sexual infidelity is not the kind of thing done that is ever sufficient on its own to found a successful plea of loss of control so as to reduce the verdict from murder to manslaughter.¹⁶²

More extreme examples are easier to classify and were recognized in the debates: for example, where D comes home to find her husband, V, having sex with his young stepdaughter. In such a case, if D killed V, it would be open to D to argue that it was the fact of sexual abuse and not the sexual infidelity per se that formed the qualifying trigger. As has also been pointed out by others,¹⁶³ the combined impact of the statutory drafting and the judgment

¹⁵⁸ It was confirmed in Clinton that 'things said' includes admissions of sexual infidelity (even if untrue) as well as reports by others. Therefore it seems to be the case that if D is told by C that his wife, V, is having an affair, then that will be a 'thing said' for the purposes of the section.

¹⁵⁹ Hansard, HC, 9 Nov 2009, col 82 (Claire Ward) (emphasis added).

¹⁶⁰ MOJ Circular 2010/13.

¹⁶¹ Para 30. This echoes statements in Parliament where the spokeswoman stated: 'If other factors come into play, the court will of course have an opportunity to consider them, but it will not be able to make the decision exclusively on the ground of sexual infidelity.' Hansard, HC, 9 Nov 2009, col 80 (Claire Ward).

¹⁶² Hansard, HC, 9 Nov 2009, col 83 (Claire Ward) (emphasis added).

¹⁶³ N Wake, 'Loss of Control Beyond Sexual Infidelity' (2012) 76 J Crim L 193; A Clough, 'Sexual Infidelity: The Exclusion That Never Was?' (2012) 76 J Crim L 382; F Stark, 'Killing the Unfaithful' (2012) 71 CLJ 260.

in Clinton is to undermine the practical impact of s 55(6)(c), given that it will be a rare case where sexual infidelity stands alone as a potential qualifying trigger.¹⁶⁴

Finally what is perhaps most astonishing is that the drafting means that s 55(6)(c) only forbids regard to the sexual infidelity when considering whether there is a trigger, not for the defence as a whole. As Lord Judge recognized in Clinton, sexual infidelity may be relevant to the third component of the defence: s 54(3) expressly excludes some of the defendant's circumstances from being considered and the fact that he has been 'sexually betrayed' is not one of them. Therefore:

sexual infidelity is not subject to a blanket exclusion when the loss of control defence is under consideration. Evidence of these matters may be deployed by the defendant and therefore the legislation proceeds on the basis that sexual infidelity is a permissible feature of the loss of control defence.¹⁶⁵

Provided there is some other thing said or done which amounts to extreme circumstances which could have caused D to lose his self-control and to have a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged, the trigger will be satisfied. If the trigger is satisfied, s 54(1)(c) then requires the jury to consider whether:

- (c) a person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D.

And by s 54(3):

- (3) In subsection (1)(c) the reference to 'the circumstances of D' is a reference to all of D's circumstances other than those whose only relevance to D's conduct is that they bear on D's general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint.

The statute does not at this final stage of the defence preclude consideration of the fact of sexual infidelity. There are really two arguments. First, it can be said that what is being considered in s 54(1)(c) is not the sexual infidelity but the effects of the sexual infidelity on D. A defendant in such cases might be exceptionally vulnerable in the sense of being more easily 'wounded' by such actions.¹⁶⁶ In psychiatric or psychological terms, the act causing the loss of control would be the effects of the unfaithfulness and the betrayal rather than the 'things said or done' which constitute sexual infidelity.¹⁶⁷ Section 54(1)(c) does not preclude reliance on such factors provided they are 'circumstances' and that they are relevant. They clearly are, and do not solely bear only on D's general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint. Secondly, it can be argued that the terms of s 54(1)(c) do not preclude reliance on the 'circumstance' of D discovering the sexual infidelity itself. This would allow the jury to have regard to the act/words in determining whether a person of D's age and sex, etc in his 'circumstances' (ie just discovering sexual infidelity) might have reacted as he did.¹⁶⁸

On one view, these interpretations of s 54(1)(c) would seem to undermine the purpose of the provision in s 55. On another view, there is no conflict because there must be some trigger other than the mere fact of sexual infidelity for the defence to get to the jury, and what ¹⁶⁴ A point echoed by Norrie, n 22, 316.

¹⁶⁵ At [37].

¹⁶⁶ See eg the acceptance that someone who was sexually abused is more likely to take offence at sexual advances than someone who was not: Hill [2008] EWCA Crim 76.

¹⁶⁷ But the government rejected an amendment that would have limited s 55(6)(c) to cases in which the motive for killing was punishment, sexual jealousy or sexual envy. Hansard, HC, 9 Nov 2009, col 84 (Claire Ward).

¹⁶⁸ The Court of Appeal in Clinton stated that this is the correct approach. Lord Judge observed that there will therefore be occasions when the jury will be both disregarding and considering the same evidence. His lordship characterized this as being 'counter intuitive', which is to put it mildly.

the government was seeking to prohibit was sexual infidelity as a sole basis for the trigger. It was acknowledged that:

If something else is relied on as the qualifying trigger, any sexual infidelity that forms part of the background can be considered but it cannot be the trigger. That is essentially what the legislation seeks to do—to stop the act of sexual infidelity being the trigger that enables people to say that these are extremely serious and grave circumstances.¹⁶⁹

The Court of Appeal in Clinton, relying upon much of the analysis contained in this section in the 13th edition, was extremely critical of this component of the LOSC defence. Indeed, rather than stating that the court was interpreting the provision, Lord Judge CJ characterized the court's role as 'mak[ing] sense of it'. Lord Judge stated that the rationale behind the inclusion of the provision is to prohibit the 'misuse' of sexual infidelity as a potential qualifying trigger for loss of control in circumstances in which it was thought to have been misused in the former defence of provocation.

His lordship stated that to compartmentalize sexual infidelity and exclude it when it was integral to the facts as a whole would be difficult, unrealistic and could lead to injustice.¹⁷⁰ His lordship derived support for this conclusion from statements made by the minister that the government did not believe that sexual infidelity by itself ought to enable D to avoid liability for murder. This implies the government accepted that if there is evidence other than the sexual infidelity, then the partial defence should be left to the jury.

Despite the criticisms that have been made of Clinton,¹⁷¹ it is submitted that the judgment is a pragmatic one that avoids the potential injustice alluded to by Lord Phillips. Clinton ensures that D will not be able to plead the partial defence if the only evidence is the sexual infidelity. Trial judges will have to make a judgement as to whether the sexual infidelity provides the context for the killing, in which case it may be considered, or whether it was the cause of it, in which case it is to be disregarded. As Ashworth pointed out in his commentary, Lord Judge's interpretation of the language utilized in s 55(6)(c) is not the only plausible one.¹⁷² Ashworth also states, correctly it is submitted, that interpreting s 55(6)(c) so that it only precludes sexual infidelity from constituting the sole trigger conforms with statements made by the minister explaining what the government intended to achieve through the enactment of the provision. For this reason, those who argue that Lord Judge has frustrated Parliament's intention seem somewhat misguided.

Combined qualifying triggers: s 55(5)

Section 55(5) provides:

This subsection applies if D's loss of self-control was attributable to a combination of the matters mentioned in subsections (3) and (4).

It is possible for D to rely on both qualifying triggers under s 55 in combination—that he killed having lost control because he was in fear of serious violence and that he also had a justifiable sense of being seriously wronged. In Dawes, Lord Judge CJ observed that 'there are unlikely to be many cases where the only feature of the evidence relating to the qualifying ¹⁶⁹ Hansard, HC 9 Nov 2009, col 94 (Claire Ward) (emphasis added).

¹⁷⁰ So long as sexual infidelity is 'integral to and forms an integral part of the context in which to make a just evaluation of whether a qualifying trigger properly falls within the ambit of subsections 55(3) and 55(4), the prohibition in section 55(6)(c) does not operate to exclude it'. At [39].

¹⁷¹ See DJ Baker and LX Zhao, 'Contributory Qualifying and Non-Qualifying Triggers in the Loss of Control Defence: A Wrong Turn on Sexual Infidelity' (2012) 76 J Crim L 254.

¹⁷² [2012] Crim LR 539.

trigger in the context of fear of violence will arise in total isolation from things done or said within section 55(4). In most cases the qualifying trigger based on a fear of violence will almost inevitably include consideration of things said and done; in short, a combination of the features identified in section 55(3) and (4).¹⁷³ A striking example would be where D kills V whom he found raping his daughter at knifepoint. The two limbs might also be relied on by the woman who kills her abusive partner after years of torment when she lost control fearing another violent attack by him.

Where D relies on both limbs but there is insufficient evidence of each limb in isolation though in combination the evidence would satisfy s 54(5), it is submitted that the defence ought to be available. Lord Judge's dicta in Clinton support that approach.

13.1.2.7 Degree of tolerance and self-restraint: s 54(1)(c)

In addition to the loss of control and the qualifying trigger, the third element of the defence is an important limitation on its scope in the form of an objective requirement enacted in s 54(1)(c). The requirement is that 'a person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D'.¹⁷⁴ By s 54(3):

In subsection (1)(c) the reference to 'the circumstances of D' is a reference to all of D's circumstances other than those whose only relevance to D's conduct is that they bear on D's general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint.

In some respects the test is similar to the test under the 1957 Act which centred on whether a reasonable man might have done as D did. This element of the old test gave rise to confusion and numerous visits to the House of Lords.¹⁷⁵

Under the old provocation defence the House of Lords and Privy Council had struggled to identify a clear position on which of the defendant's characteristics were to be considered when evaluating whether a reasonable person would have done as D did. In Camplin,¹⁷⁶ the House decided that the jury should be told that the reasonable man is a person having the power of self-control to be expected of an ordinary person of the sex and age of the accused, but in other respects sharing such of the accused's characteristics as they think would affect the gravity of the provocation to him; and that the question is not merely whether such a person would in like circumstances be provoked to lose his self-control but also whether he would react to the provocation as the accused did.¹⁷⁷ The distinction was central to subsequent decisions of the House of Lords: Morhall,¹⁷⁸ and Privy Council in Luc Thiet Thuan v R,¹⁷⁹ but the House shifted towards a much more subjective test in Smith

¹⁷³ Dawes, [56]. ¹⁷⁴ Emphasis added.

¹⁷⁵ Camplin [1978] AC 705; Morgan Smith [2001] AC 146: not followed in A-G for Jersey v Holley [2005] 2 AC 580.

¹⁷⁶ [1978] AC 705.

¹⁷⁷ This line of reasoning accords with the argument made earlier by Ashworth in a seminal article. The proper distinction is that individual peculiarities which bear on the gravity of the provocation should be taken into account, whereas individual peculiarities bearing on the accused's level of self-control should not: (1976) 35 CLJ 292. Cf the distinction made between provocativeness and provocability made in the commentary on Morhall [1995] Crim LR 890. For consideration of whether the questions can be kept separate, see A Norrie, 'From Criminal Law to Legal Theory: The Mysterious Case of the Reasonable Glue Sniffer' (2002) 65 MLR 538 at 547.

¹⁷⁸ [1996] AC 90, HL, [1995] Crim LR 890. A unanimous decision of the House which was virtually ignored in Smith [2001] AC 146.

¹⁷⁹ [1996] 2 All ER 1033 (Lord Goff, Sir Brian Hutton and Sir Michael Hardie Boys, and Lord Steyn). Noted, [1996] Crim LR 433.

(Morgan).¹⁸⁰ Finally, in A-G for Jersey v Holley,¹⁸¹ a specially convened nine-member Board of the Privy Council concluded that a distinction should be drawn between characteristics of the accused that were to be taken into account because they affected the gravity of the provocation, and those relating to the ability to exercise self-control which were not to be taken into account.¹⁸² In James and Karimi,¹⁸³ the Court of Appeal took the radical and controversial step of endorsing the Privy Council decision in Holley over that of the House of Lords in Smith.¹⁸⁴

The position under the LOSC defence

The requirement is that 'a person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint and in the circumstances of D, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way to D'. It would therefore be wrong to assume that the combined effect of s 54(1)(c) and s 54(3) is to codify the decision of the majority of their lordships in Holley.¹⁸⁵ What constitutes a 'normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint' is a matter for the jury to determine according to their judgement and their collective experience of life. The reference to 'D's sex and age' is consistent with statements made in Camplin, and Holley, that the 'powers of self-control possessed by ordinary people vary according to their age and ... their sex'.¹⁸⁶ Why sex was included at all¹⁸⁷ and why these are always relevant circumstances is not clear. Difficulties may arise for defendants of mental abnormality for their age since if read restrictively it is the age that is to be taken into account.¹⁸⁸

However, in other respects the test is quite different.¹⁸⁹ First, the words that a person 'might have reacted in the same or similar way to D' creates a test that is more generous to D than the requirement in s 3 of the 1957 Act which was that 'the provocation is enough to make reasonable man do as he did'. There is no express restriction that D's acts must ¹⁸⁰ [2001] AC 146 [2000] Crim LR 1004, HL. For critical comment see, inter alia, T Macklem and J Gardner, 'Compassion without Respect: Nine Fallacies in R v Smith' [2001] Crim LR 623 and 'Provocation and Pluralism' (2001) 64 MLR 815. For a defence of the case see B Mitchell, R Mackay and W Brookbanks, 'Pleading for Provoked Killers: In Defence of Morgan Smith' (2008) 124 LQR 675 arguing that the approach allowed for those who lacked capacity to control themselves to rely on the defence. Rowland [2003] EWCA Crim 3636, [41]. See Part 2 of LCCP 173, especially paras 21–22; LC 304, para 5.41.

¹⁸¹ [2005] UKPC 23. For commentary see Ashworth [2005] Crim LR 966; Virgo (2005) 64 CLJ 532. See also the discussion in LC 304, paras 5.34–5.39.

¹⁸² The minority disagreed. Lords Bingham and Hoffmann suggest that it is not rationally possible to consider the two in isolation. The majority regarded any difficulties of 'mental gymnastics' required of jurors in having regard to a defendant's 'characteristics' for one purpose of the law of provocation but not another as having been exaggerated. At [26]. Lord Carswell in dissent challenged that view, at [73].

¹⁸³ [2006] EWCA Crim 14, [2006] 1 Cr App R 29.

¹⁸⁴ On the precedent issue, see J Elvin, 'The Doctrine of Precedent and the Provocation Defence' (2006) 69 MLR 819.

¹⁸⁵ See on Holley the comments of Lord Lloyd, Hansard, HL, 7 July 2009, col 572, and Lord Thomas, col 579.

¹⁸⁶ Holley [2005] UKPC 23, [13].

¹⁸⁷ For criticism, see N Cobb and A Gausden, 'Feminism, "Typical" Women and Losing Control' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011). The authors question exactly how sex is relevant to capacity and argue that its inclusion could exacerbate the stereotyping and essentialism of women.

¹⁸⁸ cf Norrie, who makes the cogent point that what matters is not D's age, but rather his maturity. As he points out, 'age is no more than a rough and ready way of marking maturity'. See Norrie, n 22, 319–320.

¹⁸⁹ Norrie argues that the old law was 'under-demanding and over-enabling', but that the new law is 'narrow, harsh, and censorious'. He states that neither the new nor the old law fully captures the morally appropriate group. See Norrie, n 22, 308–312 and 316–319. It is submitted that for the reasons given in this section, the LOSC defence is in fact in many ways more generous to defendants because all the circumstances other than those solely relevant to general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint may be considered.

be proportionate to the threat/trigger he faced.¹⁹⁰ In Clinton, Lord Judge CJ explained the operation of this component of the defence in the following way:

The defendant's reaction (that is what he actually did, rather than the fact that he lost his self-control) may therefore be understandable in the sense that another person in his situation and the circumstances in which he found himself, might have reacted in the same or in a similar way.¹⁹¹

Secondly it is important to note that s 54(3) clarifies s 54(1)(c) so that the reference to 'the circumstances of D' includes 'all of D's circumstances' except those which bear on D's 'general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint' (eg a propensity to violent outbursts). The words 'in the circumstances of D' may enable a jury to adopt a more generous approach when judging D's response than might have been possible under the old law. This opens up a broader range of subjective considerations than under the Holley test.¹⁹² Judges will have to be vigilant to ensure that the broad nature of the test for including D's circumstances in considering how a person of his age, etc might have reacted does not lead to evidence of tenuous relevance being admitted and distracting the jury from the central inquiry.

A third distinguishing feature from the old law is that s 54(3) only appears to exclude a circumstance on which D seeks to rely if its sole relevance is to diminish D's self-restraint.¹⁹³ This could open up the opportunity for D to claim, for example, that his intake of alcohol or other intoxicants was a relevant circumstance and that the intoxication did not simply diminish his self-restraint, but also had some other relevance—for example, that it caused a relevant mistake. This may amount to no more than a plea of lack of intent on grounds of intoxication, but it will make directing the jury more complex. In Asmelash,¹⁹⁴ Lord Judge CJ held that there was nothing in the statutory language to indicate that Parliament had intended for the normal rules governing voluntary intoxication not to apply.¹⁹⁵ D's voluntarily intoxicated state is therefore not a matter to be taken into account by the jury when considering whether D exercised ordinary self-control. It was observed that if a sober individual in D's circumstances, with normal levels of tolerance and self-restraint, might have behaved in the same way as the defendant when confronted by the relevant qualifying trigger, then D would not be deprived of the loss of control defence just because he was not sober. It was held that the trial judge was correct to direct the jury that they had to be sure that a person of D's sex and age with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint in the same circumstances, but unaffected by alcohol, would not have reacted in the same or a similar way.

Equally, evidence that D was suffering from chronic alcoholism is not (unless the taunts related to D's alcoholism) a matter to be taken into account by the jury. If D had a severe ¹⁹⁰ cf Van Dongen [2005] EWCA Crim 1728 where the Court of Appeal seemed to imply such despite the decision against in Phillips v R [2005] Crim LR 971.

¹⁹¹ At [30].

¹⁹² Indeed in Clinton it was held that sexual infidelity may be a circumstance. At [31].

¹⁹³ It is important not to lose sight of the fact that a circumstance is excluded only if its sole relevance is that it bears on D's general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint.

¹⁹⁴ [2013] EWCA Crim 157, [2013] Crim LR 599.

¹⁹⁵ The Court of Appeal was heavily influenced by the earlier case of Dowds, see n 237, in which Hughes LJ held that voluntary intoxication could not constitute a recognized medical condition for the purposes of diminished responsibility. Lord Judge CJ held that the two partial defences ought to adopt the same approach to intoxication because 'in a fair proportion of cases both defences are canvassed before the jury, the potential for uncertainty and confusion which would follow the necessarily very different directions on the issue of intoxication, depending on which partial defence was under consideration, does not bear contemplation'. At [24]. However, since murder is a crime of specific intent and D will often seek to argue that his intoxication meant that he did not form the necessary mens rea, the jury will already have to approach the relevance of intoxication from more than one perspective.

problem with alcohol and was taunted about his addiction, then it was held that to the extent that it constituted a qualifying trigger, D's alcohol dependency would form part of the circumstances.

Although the facts of Asmelash did not present this possibility, an additional situation in which D's voluntary intoxication ought to be deemed a circumstance is if it causes him to make a relevant mistake. Suppose that D was so intoxicated that he mistook V's slap on the back as an attack rather than an exuberant act of friendship and consequently kills him. Although D's intoxication might bear on his general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, in this situation it would not be its sole relevance and so falls within the 'gap'¹⁹⁶ left by the legislation.¹⁹⁷

Section 54(3) excludes circumstances 'whose only relevance to D's conduct is that they bear on D's general capacity for tolerance or self restraint'. That restriction is similar to the old law in excluding certain features. However, there is now no positive requirement that D's individual circumstances have to affect the gravity of the triggering conduct in order for them to be included in the jury's assessment of what the person of D's age and sex might have done. So, where D has a learning disability and is provoked, his disability will be relevant even if the taunts relate to something completely different. Again, there is a need to be vigilant in avoiding evidence of marginal relevance from distracting the jury.

The question that arises is which, if any, of D's mental conditions are relevant. There are now a number of cases that have considered this issue. In McGrory,¹⁹⁸ the Court of Appeal held that the judge was correct not to refer the jury to the evidence of the medical expert who testified that D's depression would have meant that he had a 'reduced ability to deal with taunting and to cope with those sorts of pressures compared to someone not suffering from depression'. Maddison J stated that this was not a relevant circumstance, as it was excluded by s 54(3). In B, Hughes LJ, as he then was, stated that: 's.54 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 . . . excludes from consideration those characteristics of the defendant which bear on his capacity for tolerance and self-restraint. Thus mental illness reducing that capacity would not be relevant to the partial defence of loss of control, but would be material if it amounted to insanity or (in the particular case of a murder charge alone) fulfilled the different criteria for the separate (also partial) defence of diminished responsibility.'¹⁹⁹

The answer, it is submitted, lies in the statutory formula. The evidence of D's mental illness would be a relevant circumstance so long as it had some relevance other than it bore on his general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint. One example already mentioned is that it induced D to make a relevant mistake. In Wilcocks,²⁰⁰ Holroyde J, as he then was, directed the jury that:

If and insofar as you conclude a personality disorder reduced his general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, that would not be a relevant circumstance when you are considering the defence of loss of control. But it is important to emphasise that this exclusion only relates to any feature of a personality disorder which reduced his general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint. Let me give you an illustration. If you thought that [D] suffered from a personality disorder which made him unusually likely to become angry and aggressive at the slightest provocation, that would of course ¹⁹⁶ Ashworth [2013] Crim LR 599.

¹⁹⁷ Some commentators have expressed concern that this might lead to defendants making spurious claims with the aim of establishing that their intoxicated state had some other relevance. A Jackson and N Wortley, 'Loss of Control and the "Normal" Person: The Relevance of Self-Induced Intoxication' (2013) 77 J Crim L 292. No doubt, however, trial judges will be alive to this possibility and will scrutinize D's claim closely. Further, just because D's intoxicated state is permitted to be considered by the jury as a 'circumstance' in some situations, does not necessarily mean the partial defence will be pleaded successfully.

¹⁹⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 2336.

¹⁹⁹ [2013] EWCA Crim 3, [38].

²⁰⁰ [2016] EWCA Crim 2043, [40].

be relevant to diminished responsibility but it could not assist him in relation to loss of control. But if you thought that a personality disorder had caused him to attempt suicide, then you would be entitled to take into account as one of his circumstances the effect on him of being taunted that he should have killed himself.

The Court of Appeal endorsed this direction and it seems to reflect the statutory intent—that provided the mental condition is relevant to some aspect other than D's general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, it should be considered by the jury in their deliberations on s 54(3). If, on the other hand, the mental condition's only relevance is that it bears on the defendant's general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, then it should not be considered. For example, in Meanza it was conceded that D's paranoid schizophrenia and anti-social personality disorder could not be relevant circumstances within the meaning of s 54(1)(c).²⁰¹

The leading case is now Rejmanski, in which the Court of Appeal accepted the analysis of the legislation that was advanced above.²⁰² The Court of Appeal held that the potential relevance of mental disorder to each of the elements of the LOSC defence is fact-specific: it depends on the nature of the defendant's disorder, the effect it has on the defendant and the facts of the case. In relation to the final element of the partial defence, the court held that the wording of s 54(1)(c) makes clear that:

the defendant is to be judged against the standard of a person with a normal degree, and not an abnormal degree, of tolerance and self-restraint. If, and in so far as, a personality disorder reduced the defendant's general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint, that would not be a relevant consideration. Moreover, it would not be a relevant consideration even if the personality disorder was one of the 'circumstances' of the defendant because it was relevant to the gravity of the trigger. Expert evidence about the impact of the disorder would be irrelevant and inadmissible on the issue of whether it would have reduced the capacity for tolerance and self-restraint of the hypothetical 'person of D's sex and age, with a normal degree of tolerance and self-restraint'.²⁰³

If the mental disorder has some relevance to D's conduct other than it bears on his general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint, it is not excluded by subs (3) and the jury will be entitled to take it into account as one of D's circumstances. The court emphasized, however, that it will be necessary to identify 'with some care' how the mental disorder is said to be relevant as one of D's circumstances. The court also emphasized that the disorder must not be relied upon to undermine the principle that D's conduct is to be judged against 'normal' standards, rather than the abnormal standard of an individual defendant. The court emphatically rejected the argument that if a disorder is relevant to the gravity of the qualifying trigger, and evidence of the disorder is admitted in relation to the gravity of the trigger, the jury would also be entitled to take it into account insofar as it bore on D's general capacity for tolerance and self-restraint. Whilst the disorder would be a relevant circumstance of the defendant, it would not be relevant to the question of the degree of tolerance and self-restraint which would be expected of the hypothetical person referred to in s 54(1)(c). Citing Holley and Wilcocks, the court accepted that a mental disorder may be a relevant circumstance where it is relevant to the gravity of the qualifying trigger. The example given by the court is a woman suffering from 'Battered Woman's Syndrome' or a personality disorder, who kills her abuser, and who may adduce evidence of her condition, on the basis that it may be relevant to both the loss of self-control and to the gravity of the provocation for her. Given that loss of control and diminished responsibility may be pleaded together as alternatives, the court emphasized that the law does not ignore a mental disorder that, through no fault of the defendant, renders him unable to exercise the degree of self-control of a 'normal' person. In a case such as this, the defendant could still plead diminished responsibility.

²⁰¹ [2017] EWCA Crim 445.

²⁰² [2017] EWCA Crim 2061.

²⁰³ ibid, [25].

Rejmanski is a welcome judgment and ensures that D's reaction to the qualifying trigger is assessed against the objective standard required by the legislation. Before permitting evidence of a mental disorder to be considered by the jury, trial judges must ensure that a sufficiently cogent case has been advanced that the disorder is relevant to something other than D's general capacity for tolerance or self-restraint. As the Court of Appeal observed, in the majority of cases the disorder will be relevant to the gravity of the qualifying trigger. The court must not, however, be taken to have laid down a rule that this is the only relevance it can have. It is possible to envisage other ways in which the mental disorder may be relevant. In this regard, the judgment in Rejmanski confirms that the LOSC defence is more generous to defendants than provocation given that there is no positive requirement for D's circumstances to affect the gravity of the triggering conduct.

13.2 Diminished responsibility

Section 2 of the Homicide Act 1957 introduced a new defence to murder: 'diminished responsibility'.²⁰⁴ The defence has been substituted with one of the same name contained in s 52 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009.

If successful, the defence allows D to be found guilty only of manslaughter.²⁰⁵ By s 2(2) of the 1957 Act the burden of proof is on D. It was held in Foye,²⁰⁶ a case brought under the old law, that placing the burden upon D did not infringe the presumption of innocence enshrined in Art 6(2) of the ECHR. That was endorsed by the Court of Appeal in relation to the new law in Wilcocks.²⁰⁷ Imposing a burden on D is said to be justified on the basis that: (a) diminished responsibility is an exceptional defence; (b) the defence depends upon the 'internal functioning of [D's] mental process'; (c) it would be impractical to require the Crown to disprove diminished responsibility whenever it was raised on the evidence. It has been held that, as in the case of insanity, the standard of proof required is not beyond reasonable doubt but on a balance of probabilities.²⁰⁸ Diminished responsibility is not a general defence, but applies only to murder.²⁰⁹ It is ²⁰⁴ For historical and general accounts see Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 248–256; RD Mackay, 'Diminished Responsibility and Mentally Disordered Killers' in Ashworth and Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law (2000); E Tennant, The Future of the Diminished Responsibility Defence to Murder (2001); S Dell, Murder into Manslaughter: The Diminished Responsibility Defence in Practice (1984).

²⁰⁵ The defence derives from the law of Scotland, where it was a judicial creation, originating in the decision of Lord Deas in HM Advocate v Dingwall (1867) 5 Irv 466. See TB Smith, 'Diminished Responsibility' [1957] Crim LR 354 and Lord Keith, 'Some Observations on Diminished Responsibility' [1959] Jur Rev 109. The Scottish version was redefined in the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1995, s 51B, inserted by s 168 of the Criminal Justice and Licensing (Scotland) Act 2010. The defence in Scotland now results in a conviction for 'culpable homicide on grounds of diminished responsibility'. The new statutory provisions implement recommendations made by the Scottish Law Commission in Report No 195, Insanity and Diminished Responsibility (2004); see for comment on those recommendations (2013) 77 J Crim L 512 and [2014] Crim LR 109.

²⁰⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 475. For compelling criticism, see Ashworth [2013] Crim LR 839.

²⁰⁷ [2016] EWCA Crim 2043.

²⁰⁸ Dunbar [1958] 1 QB 1, [1957] 2 All ER 737. This rule is not affected by the HRA 1998: Ali and Jordan [2001] 1 All ER 1014, CA. Where the medical evidence of diminished responsibility is based on certain facts, it is for the defence to prove those facts by admissible evidence: Ahmed Din (1962) 46 Cr App R 269; Bradshaw (1985) 82 Cr App R 79, [1985] Crim LR 733 and commentary.

²⁰⁹ Given that LOSC and diminished responsibility will often be pleaded together (a fact noted by Lord Judge in Dawes (earlier)), Mitchell argues that the differences in the burdens and standards of proof of the respective partial defences could cause considerable difficulties for juries. See B Mitchell, 'Years of Provocation, Followed by a Loss of Control' in L Zedner and JV Roberts, Principles and Values in Criminal Law and Criminal Justice (2012). See also Norrie, n 204, 256–257.

not available as a defence to attempted murder,²¹⁰ nor can it be raised on a finding of unfitness to plead.²¹¹

13.2.1 The old law

Only the briefest outline of the old law is required. Under s 2 of the 1957 Act as enacted, the defence was available on a charge of murder where D could prove that ‘he was suffering from such abnormality of mind (whether arising from a condition of arrested or retarded development of mind or any inherent causes or induced by disease or injury) as substantially impaired his mental responsibility for his acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing’.

The elements of the defence were therefore: (a) an abnormality of mind (b) which arose from one of the specified conditions (c) which substantially impaired (d) D’s mental responsibility. None of the elements was defined with any precision and arguably the courts in collusion with psychiatrists were content to avoid definition so that the defence maintained its flexibility, thereby allowing for its application in deserving cases in which the mandatory sentence for murder would otherwise apply.²¹²

There had been numerous calls for reform. The Law Commission Report No 290, Partial Defences to Murder, concluded that²¹³ there was ‘overwhelming support’ for reform. The old law was regarded by many as ‘chaotic’ and it was suggested that a rational sentencing exercise would be a better response for meeting the needs of mentally ill defendants. It was noted that the defence was ‘grossly abused’ and whether a defendant ‘finds a psychiatrist who will be prepared to testify that, for example, depression was responsible for his behaviour is “a lottery”’. There was some pressure for abolition, particularly if the mandatory sentence was removed, but the Law Commission identified several arguments²¹⁴ for retention, including the need for ‘fair and just labelling’.²¹⁵

The Commission refined its original proposal from the Partial Defences Project.²¹⁶ The proposals were taken forward by the MOJ and the new defence as enacted in 2009 is very similar to those proposals (but note the omission of a defence of developmental immaturity).

13.2.2 The new defence

Section 52 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 provides:²¹⁷

- (1) In section 2 of the Homicide Act 1957 (persons suffering from diminished responsibility), for subsection (1) substitute—

²¹⁰ Campbell [1997] Crim LR 495, Sedley J. See also Farrar [1992] 1 VR 207.

²¹¹ Antoine [2001] AC 340. ²¹² LC 304, para 5.107.

²¹³ LC 290, para 5.10 and see Scottish Law Commission, Report No 195, Insanity and Diminished Responsibility (2004). See also J Horder, Homicide and the Politics of Law Reform (2012) 226.

²¹⁴ Justifications included the need for some defence other than insanity given the ‘out-dated nature of the insanity defence’ and its unsatisfactory scope and operation; the stigmatization of the label ‘insanity’; the need to prevent jurors being faced with only the option of murder or acquittal lest they perversely acquit; allowing the central issue of culpability to be determined by a jury and not by the judge as part of the sentencing process; the need to ensure public confidence in sentencing which is more likely on a diminished verdict than on murder; the need for a jury to evaluate the expert evidence; the need to retain the defence for abused women ‘driven to kill’; and the opportunity for the defence to provide a merciful but just disposition of mercy killing cases.

²¹⁵ LC 290, para 5.18. ²¹⁶ See V Tadros, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (2008).

²¹⁷ See in particular Norrie, n 204, 251–254; A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility—Domestic, Comparative and International Perspectives (2011); L Kennefick, ‘Introducing a New Diminished Responsibility Defence for England and Wales’ (2011) 74 MLR 750; R Fortson and AR Keene, Current Law Statutes Annotation (2010); J Glasson and J Knowles, Blackstone’s Guide to the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (2010) Ch 8; LH Leigh, ‘Two New Partial Defences to Murder’ (2010) Crim L & Justice Weekly 53; R Mackay, ‘The New Diminished Responsibility Plea’ [2010] Crim LR 290.

- (1) A person ('D') who kills or is a party to the killing of another is not to be convicted of murder if D was suffering from an abnormality of mental functioning which—
 - (a) arose from a recognised medical condition,
 - (b) substantially impaired D's ability to do one or more of the things mentioned in subsection (1A), and
 - (c) provides an explanation for D's acts and omissions in doing or being a party to the killing.
- (1A) Those things are—
 - (a) to understand the nature of D's conduct;
 - (b) to form a rational judgment;
 - (c) to exercise self-control.
- (1B) For the purposes of subsection (1)(c), an abnormality of mental functioning provides an explanation for D's conduct if it causes, or is a significant contributory factor in causing, D to carry out that conduct.'

Section 52 was brought into force on 4 October 2010.²¹⁸ Since the provision relates exclusively to a matter of substantive law, it will apply in relation to any murder which occurred on or after that date.²¹⁹

13.2.2.1 The elements of the defence

Section 52 makes significant changes to the defence of diminished responsibility. The main aim is to modernize and clarify the defence. In particular, the aim is to redraft the provision with the needs and practices of medical experts in mind, and to clarify what is involved in the 'substantial impairment of the defendant's mental responsibility'. Strikingly, the word 'responsibility' no longer features in the terms of the defence at all.²²⁰ The practical effects are, it would appear, to narrow the scope of the defence and to create the opportunity for experts to have even greater influence over the outcome.²²¹ Because the experts have a greater opportunity to provide a more definitive opinion on more of the elements of the offence, it is unclear whether this will lead to a greater proportion of cases in which there will be accepted pleas. In 2017 Professors Mackay and Mitchell conducted a review into cases which have applied the partial defence in its current form. They compared CPS research into the new law (limited to only 90 cases) with the Law Commission's study of the old law.²²² Statistics reveal that the total number of successful diminished responsibility pleas under the old law was around 20 per year in the years immediately preceding amendment (down from around 70–85 per year in the 1980s).²²³ The recent CPS study found a ²¹⁸ The Coroners and Justice Act 2009 (Commencement No 4, Transitional and Saving Provisions) Order 2010, SI 2010/816.

²¹⁹ Para 7 of Sch 22 to the Coroners and Justice Act 2009.

²²⁰ There has been a divergence of views expressed on whether this is desirable. Contrast L Kennefick, 'Introducing a New Diminished Responsibility Defence for England and Wales' (2011) 74 MLR 750 with R Fortson, 'The Modern Partial Defence of Diminished Responsibility' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

²²¹ Jurors remain at liberty to disregard the expert evidence left to them and find D guilty of murder. Golds [2016] UKSC 61 provides a vivid example of this, as the jury rejected the unanimous evidence of the three experts, two for the defence and one for the Crown, who testified that the elements of the partial defence were present. See also Brennan [2014] EWCA Crim 2387. For further discussion, see p 565.

²²² See R Mackay and B Mitchell, 'The New Diminished Responsibility Plea in Operation: Some Initial Findings' [2017] Crim LR 18.

²²³ See LC 290; LC 304, para 5.84.

higher proportion of cases being dealt with as jury trials (43.3 per cent) than occurred in the earlier research (22.9 per cent) which indicates that more cases are being contested under the new law.²²⁴

The elements of the new defence are the following.

- (1) An 'abnormality of mental functioning'. In itself this is not intended to be a change of substance, but rather one to adopt language preferred by psychiatrists.²²⁵
- (2) The abnormality must arise 'from a recognised medical condition'. This is designed to be wider than the old list of bracketed causes in the original definition in s 2 of the 1957 Act. Again, it is designed to allow expert evidence to be received on a more meaningful basis.
- (3) D's 'mental responsibility' must be substantially impaired. This means that his ability to do one or more of the things in s 2(1A), must be substantially impaired. The three things are:
 - (a) to understand the nature of D's conduct;
 - (b) to form a rational judgement;
 - (c) to exercise self-control.

This is a dramatic change from the old law. It is more specific and leaves less moral elbow room for the jury and is arguably harder for D to prove.

- (4) The abnormality of mental functioning from a 'recognised medical condition' must be a cause or contributory cause of D's conduct in killing. There is some ambiguity as to whether the section requires a cause or merely an explanation.

Each element of the offence deserves more detailed consideration.

(1) 'an abnormality of mental functioning'

Under the old s 2 test (of 'abnormality of mind') the determination of 'abnormality' could be left entirely to the jury. In Byrne,²²⁶ Lord Parker CJ stated²²⁷ that 'abnormality' of mind:

means a state of mind so different from that of ordinary human beings that the reasonable man would term it abnormal. It appears to us to be wide enough to cover the mind's activities in all its aspects, not only the perception of physical acts and matters and the ability to form a rational judgment whether an act is right or wrong, but also the ability to exercise will-power to control physical acts in accordance with that rational judgement.

That formula was appropriate when a jury was considering a concept as loose and general as the 'mind' and asking whether D's 'mind' deviated from the norm. But the expression 'abnormality of mind' has been superseded by the test of abnormality of 'mental functioning'. That test is, even if not a formal psychiatric test, one with a psychiatric flavour. The jury cannot have a sound grasp of that concept without expert evidence.²²⁸ Nor, therefore, can the jury understand how far D's mental functioning deviates from the norm without ²²⁴ R Mackay and B Mitchell, 'The New Diminished Responsibility Plea in Operation: Some Initial Findings' [2017] Crim LR 18 at 26.

²²⁵ See LC 304, para 5.114. It received support in Parliament from Baroness Murphy (Visiting Professor of Psychiatry at Queen Mary, University of London): Hansard, HL, 30 June 2009, vol 712, col 177.

²²⁶ [1960] 2 QB 396. ²²⁷ At 403.

²²⁸ This remains, however, a legal rather than a medical term. It has been argued that this fact demonstrates that the 'Law and psychiatry are based on opposing paradigms, they cannot work together'. See L Kennefick, 'Introducing a New Diminished Responsibility Defence for England and Wales' (2011) 74 MLR 750, 765. See also the discussion in Norrie, n 204, Ch 9.

expert evidence to assist them. As such, it is doubtful whether they can be left with as open a direction as in Byrne. Experts will express an opinion on whether there is an abnormal mental functioning. If there is uncontradicted expert evidence of the defence, the judge may withdraw murder from the jury, but should be cautious in doing so.²²⁹ In such a case 'the judge needs to ensure that the Crown explains the basis on which it is inviting the jury to reject [the expert] evidence. He needs to ensure that the basis advanced is one which the jury can properly adopt.'²³⁰ In Blackman,²³¹ the Lord Chief Justice emphasized that:

The fact that the prosecution calls no evidence to contradict a psychiatrist called by the defence is not in itself sufficient justification for doing so. In the light of the judgment in Golds, we see no reason not to follow the broad approach of this court in R v Khan (Dawood) [2009] EWCA Crim 1569, [2010] 1 Cr App R 4, to which reference was made in Brennan, which we would express as follows: it will be a rare case where a judge will exercise the power to withdraw a charge of murder from the jury when the prosecution do not accept that the evidence gives rise to the defence of diminished responsibility.²³²

The new law probably is stricter than the original s 2. Nevertheless, there is little doubt that on facts such as those in Byrne, the defence would still be available. Byrne strangled a young woman in a YWCA hostel and mutilated her corpse. Evidence was tendered that from an early age he had been subject to perverted violent desires; that the impulse or urge of those desires was stronger than the normal impulse or urge of sex, that he found it very difficult or, perhaps, impossible in some cases to resist putting the desire into practice and that the act of killing the girl was done under such an impulse or urge.²³³ That would be an abnormality of mental functioning.

(2) 'a recognised medical condition'

The abnormality of mental functioning must arise 'from a recognised medical condition'. This new element to the test is designed to be wider than the list of sufficient causes in the original s 2 of the 1957 Act.²³⁴ It is intended to produce clearer expert evidence from psychiatrists and psychologists and to allow sufficient flexibility for the new defence to develop in line with medical understanding and practice.²³⁵ The immediate questions arising are: What kind(s) of medical condition? Recognized by whom?

'medical condition'

This new element of the definition will provide a clearer foundation for the defence. As the Royal College of Psychiatrists explained, it will:

encourage reference within expert evidence to diagnosis in terms of one or two of the accepted internationally classificatory systems of mental conditions (i.e. the World Health Organisation: International Classification of Diseases (ICD-10); and the American Psychiatric Association: Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-IV)) without explicitly writing those systems into the legislation.²³⁶

²²⁹ This is examined further at p 565.

²³⁰ Per Lord Hughes in Golds [2016] UKSC 61, [51].

²³¹ [2017] EWCA Crim 190 (CMAC).

²³² At [43].

²³³ The defence of irresistible impulse, which is not within the defence of insanity, is therefore included in the law (but only of murder) by way of diminished responsibility.

²³⁴ The Law Commission originally wanted a wider formulation: that the source of the abnormality should be an 'underlying condition' (LCCP 177, para 10.21), which would not be limited to a mental condition existing independently of the external circumstances that gave rise to the commission of an offence. It would therefore have 'include[d] cases in which the origins of the condition itself lie in adverse circumstances with which the offender has had to cope': LCCP 177, para 6.54.

²³⁵ See the MOJ CP 19/08.

²³⁶ LC 304, para 5.114. See MOJ CP 19/08, fn 13.

It must be noted that any medical condition might suffice subject to the restriction imposed in Dowds.²³⁷ It will include physical conditions as well as psychological or psychiatric ones²³⁸ and conditions such as diabetes or ADHD. Depressive illnesses resulting from prolonged abuse will qualify,²³⁹ and hence the defence remains available to battered women on those terms.²⁴⁰

Acute intoxication, that is, being drunk, does not constitute a recognized medical condition.²⁴¹ Alcoholic dependency will, however, qualify as a medical condition irrespective of whether it resulted in brain damage.²⁴² The Court of Appeal strongly doubted in Lindo whether a drug-induced psychosis standing alone would be sufficient to constitute a recognized medical condition. In this case, it was submitted on behalf of L that he had entered what the expert called a 'prodromal state', which put him at risk of developing a mental illness. The court held that even if this were to be combined with the drug-induced psychosis, it would still be doubtful whether it was sufficient to trigger the operation of the partial defence. Hallett LJ stated that, 'public policy proceeds on the basis that an offender who voluntarily takes alcohol or drugs and behaves a way in which he would not have behaved when sober is not normally excused responsibility. People who take drugs run the risk of suffering side effects such as psychosis.'²⁴³ Her ladyship held that it would be wrong to permit individuals such as L to escape full responsibility for their actions simply on the basis that they took drugs at a time when they were at risk of developing a mental illness. So, if D voluntarily consumes drink or drugs which cause him immediately to suffer some medical condition or mental illness, he will not be able to plead the partial defence. We discuss the implications of this further later.

Although this element of the defence is much broader than the equivalent element under the 1957 Act, it should not create excessive breadth in the defence overall since the other elements are all, arguably, narrower.

In discussions during the reform exercise, groups expressed concern that this element may in some circumstances be narrower than the old law because it will not apply to those who kill terminally ill relatives when the killer has 'acted rationally in response to persistent ²³⁷ See p 554. In Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281, the Court of Appeal stated that just because a condition is transient or temporary does not preclude it from fulfilling this element of the partial defence. Hughes LJ suggested that concussion may be an example of such a condition, but did not resolve the matter conclusively, at [39].

²³⁸ See the MOJ CP 19/08, para 49.

²³⁹ The Law Commission also took the view that most cases of 'mercy' killing, in which there was evidence of an abnormality of mental functioning resulting from depression arising from long-term care, would be covered by its proposed changes. See LC 304, paras 7.34–7.37. Mackay doubts whether the Law Commission's view was correct, on the basis that there may be no recognized medical condition from which D is suffering. See R Mackay, 'The New Diminished Responsibility Plea: More than Mere Modernisation?' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility. See also M Gibson, 'Pragmatism Preserved? The Challenges of Accommodating Mercy Killers in the Reformed Diminished Responsibility Plea' (2017) 81 J Crim L 177. It has been argued that a specific provision ought to be enacted that provides a partial excusatory defence for those who kill out of compassion. See H Keating and J Bridgeman, 'Compassionate Killings: The Case for a Partial Defence' (2012) 75 MLR 697.

²⁴⁰ Battered women's syndrome, having been included in 1992 in the standard British classification of mental diseases, is a relevant condition: Hobson [1998] 1 Cr App R 31.

²⁴¹ cf Dowds [2012] EWCA Crim 281.

²⁴² See Kay and Joyce [2017] EWCA Crim 647 and Bunch [2013] EWCA Crim 2489. Historically this was a confused area until the decision of the House of Lords in Dietschman. See Tandy [1989] 1 All ER 267. See since Dietschman; Wood [2008] EWCA Crim 1305; Stewart [2009] EWCA Crim 593; Stewart (No 2) [2010] EWCA Crim 2159.

²⁴³ [2016] EWCA Crim 1940, [42].

requests from a seriously ill loved-one'.²⁴⁴ However, it may be that some depressive illness would be likely to be diagnosed, as a 'medical condition'.²⁴⁵ 'recognised'

The requirement that the medical condition is a 'recognised' one is also intended to prevent 'idiosyncratic diagnoses' being advanced as a basis for a plea of diminished responsibility.²⁴⁶ However, during the debates in Committee in Parliament, the government recognized that it is important that the legislation must be sufficiently flexible to cater for emerging medical conditions. It expressed the view that it is open to the defence to call a 'recognized specialist who has had their work peer-reviewed, although it has not quite got on the list [ie in the psychiatric manuals DSM V or ICD-10] and that it would be for the jury to decide whether the evidence met the partial defence requirements'.²⁴⁷ Care will be needed to ensure that 'quack' opinions are not received. The comment in Parliament might have been better expressed in terms of the recognized specialist being not yet on the list. This would reflect the desire to ensure flexibility for development.

Whether a condition in the manuals is 'recognised' is a matter of law. The Court of Appeal in *Dowds*²⁴⁸ stated that it is necessary, but not always sufficient, that a condition is included in one of the diagnostic manuals. D sought to argue that voluntary acute intoxication (which is different from alcohol dependency syndrome) was a recognized medical condition for the purposes of diminished responsibility.²⁴⁹ Hughes LJ observed that the general principle that voluntary intoxication is no defence 'is well-entrenched and formed the unspoken backdrop for the new statutory formula'.²⁵⁰ If Parliament had sought to alter this principle, then Hughes LJ stated that it would have made its intention to do so explicit.²⁵¹ It was observed that the diagnostic manuals are extremely broad and include many conditions of questionable legal impact. His lordship gave pyromania, unhappiness, suspiciousness and marked evasiveness, paedophilia and intermittent explosive disorder as some vivid examples.

Whilst the Court of Appeal's judgment in Dowds is uncontroversial as it applies to voluntary intoxication, it leaves open the question as to how trial judges ought to determine whether a condition recognized by medical experts is a 'recognised medical condition' for the purposes of the law. The issue is that the term 'recognised medical condition' is extremely broad. Requiring trial judges to pick and choose which ones ought to be capable of founding the defence of diminished responsibility is inimical to the aim of reforming the ²⁴⁴ See the evidence of 'Dignity in Dying' to Joint Committee on Human Rights, Eighth Report, 2008–09, para 1.150; evidence 44–45. Cf Cocker [1989] Crim LR 740 who would not fit within this defence nor LOSC. It has been argued that loss of control will provide a more viable defence for mercy killers, see B Livings, 'A New Partial Defence for the Mercy Killer: Revisiting Loss of Control' [2014] NILQ 187.

²⁴⁵ See the evidence presented to the Public Bill Committee, 3 February 2009, written evidence (CJ/01); Joint Committee on Human Rights, Eighth Report, 2008–09; para 1.151. For an engaging discussion of this issue, see M Gibson, 'Pragmatism Preserved? The Challenges of Accommodating Mercy Killers in the Reformed Diminished Responsibility Plea' (2017) 81 J Crim L 177.

²⁴⁶ LC 304, para 5.114.

²⁴⁷ Public Bill Committee Debates, 3 Mar 2009, col 414. Emphasis added.

²⁴⁸ [2012] EWCA Crim 281, [2012] Crim LR 612.

²⁴⁹ For discussion of how this issue is addressed in other common law jurisdictions, see N Wake, 'Recognising Acute Intoxication as Diminished Responsibility? A Comparative Analysis?' (2012) 76 J Crim L 71. For an early analysis, see M Gibson, 'Intoxicants and Diminished Responsibility: The Impact of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009' [2011] Crim LR 909.

²⁵⁰ At [35].

²⁵¹ It has been suggested that one way of avoiding the issue that arose in Dowds would have been for Parliament to state explicitly that intoxication is incapable of forming the basis of the partial defence, as is the case in Scotland. See N Wake, 'Diminished Responsibility and Acute Intoxication: Raising the Bar?' (2012) 76 J Crim L 197.

law to ensure it conforms with modern psychiatric practice. Hughes LJ made explicit that the question of whether the classification system addresses the legal issue in a particular case 'will inevitably [involve] considerations of legal policy which are irrelevant to the business of medical description, classification, and statistical analysis'.²⁵² The Court of Appeal did not, however, elucidate what D will have to prove in addition to the fact that the medical condition is accepted by the medical profession in order to satisfy this element of the defence. It seems that the list of conditions that are capable of constituting 'recognised medical conditions' will be determined on a case-by-case basis. The diagnostic manuals will be indicative and not determinative of the matter.

*Developmental immaturity as a 'medical condition'?*²⁵³ The new diminished defence differs from the Law Commission's proposal principally because the new definition does not include, as a cause of impairment, 'developmental immaturity in a defendant under the age of 18', alongside abnormality of mental functioning arising from a mental condition. So, as it was put in debates:

An adult who acts like a 10-year-old gets that taken into account, but a 10-year-old who acts like a 10-year-old does not.²⁵⁴

The government rejected this proposal on the grounds that this was unnecessary and because the concept of a 'recognised medical condition' is designed to be wide enough to cover relevant conditions affecting those under 18 (eg learning disabilities and autistic spectrum disorders).²⁵⁵

There was widespread support for the Law Commission proposal.²⁵⁶ Lord Phillips is on record as regretting the omission of any reference to developmental immaturity, saying:

The Government has not accepted this argument for two reasons. The first is that they do not believe that the absence of such a provision is causing serious problems in practice. The second is, I quote: We think there is a risk that such a provision would open up the defence too widely and catch inappropriate cases.²⁵⁷

Since there is now no defence of *doli incapax*²⁵⁸ the child killer has limited defence options. Arguably, there will be cases where a young defendant might be able to bring his developmental immaturity within the rubric of a 'recognised medical condition' for the purposes of the new defence. However, whatever the cause of the developmental immaturity, whether it is nature or nurture, unless it results in an abnormal mental functioning, D will not be able to meet the requirement under the new s 2(1)(a). The Law Commission was concerned that experts may find it impossible to distinguish between the impact of developmental immaturity on D's functioning and the impact of a mental abnormality on that functioning process. It concluded that it was 'wholly unrealistic and unfair' to expect medical experts to assess the impact of abnormal mental functioning whilst disregarding developmental ²⁵² Dowds, [30].

²⁵³ For further discussion, see R Fortson, 'The Modern Partial Defence of Diminished Responsibility' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011), and A Ashworth Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 184.

²⁵⁴ Public Bill Committee Debates, 3 Mar 2009, col 411.

²⁵⁵ See CP 19/08, para 55.

²⁵⁶ Supported by the Crown Court judges, the Criminal Bar Association, the Youth Justice Board, the Royal College of Psychiatrists, Dr Eileen Vizard, the NSPCC and a number of lawyers in Parliament.

²⁵⁷ Lord Phillips' Essex University/Clifford Chance lecture on Reforming the Law of Homicide, delivered on 6 Nov 2008. What should matter, it is submitted, is whether there is disfunction of ability to exercise control and judgement, etc.

²⁵⁸ R v T [2009] UKHL 20, Ch 10.

immaturity.²⁵⁹ The harshness of the inability to rely on developmental immaturity to found a diminished responsibility plea might be felt most keenly in some cases of joint venture murder where a young vulnerable defendant has joined with an older gang, one of whose members kills V.

It must not be forgotten that the mere fact that D suffers from a particular medical condition is only one part of the defence; all the elements need to be established by D.²⁶⁰

(3) 'a substantial impairment of mental ability'

Under the old law, the matter that had to be substantially impaired was D's mental responsibility for acting as he did.²⁶¹ The test of substantial impairment of responsibility²⁶² was one of moral responsibility.²⁶³ Under the new law, the matter that now has to be shown to be substantially impaired is D's ability to do any of the things mentioned in the new s 2(1A).

Under the old law the most authoritative case on the meaning of 'substantially' was Lloyd.²⁶⁴ In that case counsel for D contended that 'substantially' can mean one of two things: that the impairment was real and not illusory, or that it was of a considerable amount. That decision was seen by some to be inconsistent with that of Lord Parker CJ in the earlier case of Simcox.²⁶⁵ In Ramchurn,²⁶⁶ the Lord Chief Justice rejected the argument that the meaning of 'substantially' had been inconsistently applied under the 1957 Act. Lord Judge remarked that 'substantially' is an ordinary English word. The purpose of the term is to ensure that D does not escape liability for murder on account of any impairment of mental responsibility, no matter how trivial and insignificant, but also to ensure that D is not unduly burdened by having to prove that his mental responsibility was so grossly impaired as to be extinguished.

Two questions arose recently. First, did the directions approved in Lloyd and Simcox really say the same thing and, secondly, did the 2009 reformulation of the partial defence alter the meaning to be attributed to the term 'substantial'?

The correct interpretation is now governed by the Supreme Court's decision in Golds.²⁶⁷ G appealed against his conviction for murder. He had admitted killing his partner; the only question for the jury was whether he was guilty of murder or manslaughter by reason of his diminished responsibility. Three medical experts gave evidence that the conditions for establishing diminished responsibility were satisfied. The jury rejected the defence, however, after hearing evidence that G had committed acts of domestic violence against his partner on the day of her murder. One of the issues on appeal was whether the judge had erred in refusing to direct the jury as to the meaning of the word 'substantial' in relation to the question of whether G was suffering from an abnormality of mental functioning so as to substantially impair his ability to understand the nature of what he was doing, form a rational judgement, and/or exercise self-control. The Court of Appeal held that trial judges ordinarily should not direct juries on how the word 'substantial' ought to be interpreted,

²⁵⁹ LC 304, para 5.128.

²⁶⁰ Under the old law it was held that D's ADHD was not of itself enough to satisfy the defence: Osborne [2010] EWCA Crim 547 where D killed V in an unprovoked attack in anger and his illness was not a cause of the conduct.

²⁶¹ Byrne, n 226; Simcox [1964] Crim LR 402; Lloyd [1967] 1 QB 175. But cf R Sparks, 'Diminished Responsibility in Theory and Practice' (1964) 27 MLR 9, 16–19.

²⁶² Campbell (1986) 84 Cr App R 255 at 259.

²⁶³ A person whose impulse is irresistible bears no moral responsibility for his act, for he has no choice; a person whose impulse is much more difficult to resist than that of an ordinary person bears a diminished degree of moral responsibility for his act.

²⁶⁴ [1967] 1 QB 175.

²⁶⁵ [1964] Crim LR 402.

²⁶⁶ [2010] EWCA Crim 194, [15].

²⁶⁷ [2016] UKSC 61. K Laird, 'R v Golds' [2017] Crim LR 316, 318–319.

but that if the issue does arise, the jury should be directed that a more than merely trivial impairment is insufficient to establish the partial defence. G appealed to the Supreme Court. The certified questions asked, first, whether the judge is required to direct the jury on the meaning of 'substantial', and secondly, whether it is 'to be defined as "something more than merely trivial," or alternatively in a way that connotes more than this, such as "something whilst short of total impairment is nevertheless significant and appreciable"?'²⁶⁸

The Supreme Court examined the history of the defence and the cases dealing with the concept of 'substantial' under the old law. The court concluded that the word 'substantially' had historically been held, in the diminished responsibility context, to mean 'having some substance' or 'important or weighty'. It was not synonymous with 'anything more than merely trivial'. The court held that that same interpretation applies to the defence under its new formulation in the Coroners and Justice Act 2009. In the absence of any indication to the contrary, Parliament was to be taken to have adopted the established sense in which the word 'substantially' had been used. The court observed that:

(1) Ordinarily in a murder trial where diminished responsibility is in issue the judge need not direct the jury beyond the terms of the statute and should not attempt to define the meaning of 'substantially'. Experience has shown that the issue of its correct interpretation is unlikely to arise in many cases. The jury should normally be given to understand that the expression is an ordinary English word, that it imports a question of degree, and that whether in the case before it the impairment can properly be described as substantial is for it to resolve.

(2) If, however, the jury has been introduced to the question of whether any impairment beyond the merely trivial will suffice, or if it has been introduced to the concept of a spectrum between the greater than trivial and the total, the judge should explain that whilst the impairment must indeed pass the merely trivial before it need be considered, it is not the law that any impairment beyond the trivial will suffice. The judge should likewise make this clear if a risk arises that the jury might misunderstand the import of the expression; whether this risk arises or not is a judgment to be arrived at by the trial judge who is charged with overseeing the dynamics of the trial. Diminished responsibility involves an impairment of one or more of the abilities listed in the statute to an extent which the jury judges to be substantial, and which it is satisfied significantly contributed to his committing the offence. Illustrative expressions of the sense of the word may be employed so long as the jury is given clearly to understand that no single synonym is to be substituted for the statutory word...²⁶⁹

The Supreme Court's judgment was surprising given that Lord Judge CJ seemed to have adopted the more generous interpretation of 'substantial' as recently as 2010 in Ramchurn. It is submitted that there are a number of problems with the judgment. First, the Supreme Court's conclusion serves to narrow the defence, which has already been narrowed by its more medicalized recasting in 2009. Gibson argues that the judgment, 'unduly compromises access to diminished responsibility'.²⁷⁰ Limiting access to the partial defence could have harsh consequences. Professor Mackay gives the example of a post-natal mother who kills her 13-month-old child and who, because of the age of the child, cannot rely upon the statutory defence of infanticide. She may also be unable to rely upon diminished responsibility because the psychiatrists and/or the jury consider the degree of impairment insufficient to reach the level now required by Golds.²⁷¹ Secondly, it is not clear that the decision is faithful to its own premise. The Supreme Court suggests that 'substantial' is an ordinary English word and that the jury needs no assistance on how it ought to be interpreted, unless someone has suggested otherwise, in which case the jury is not simply to be told it is an ordinary English word but are to be given a further definition. If there is a technical definition that juries ought to adopt beyond the 'ordinary English one', why should every jury not hear it in all cases from the outset? Consequently, this may risk an inconsistent application of the law; some juries may receive an elaborate definition whereas others will not. Finally, the decision may generate more appeals. There is little to be lost in appealing a murder conviction in any event, but in light of the vagueness of the basic instruction to the jury—to draw the line of 'substantially impaired' according to degree—future appeals on this point are unavoidable.

²⁶⁸ [2016] UKSC 61, [43]. ²⁶⁹ At [43].

²⁷⁰ M Gibson, 'Diminished Responsibility in Golds and Beyond: Insights and Implications' [2017] Crim LR 543.

²⁷¹ R Mackay, 'R v Golds' [2017] Arch Rev 4.

Golds was subsequently applied in Squelch.²⁷² S killed his victim and was caught on CCTV. Three forensic psychiatrists agreed that S suffered from paranoid personality disorder (PPD), that he had an abnormality of mental functioning arising from that condition which had played some part in the killing. They disagreed, however, on whether it had substantially impaired S's ability to do one or more of the things listed in s 2 of the Homicide Act 1957. Two considered that it had, but the third concluded that the impairment was not substantial, only that it might be a partial cause for the incident. The judge directed the jury that:

'substantially' is an ordinary English word on which you will reach a conclusion in this case, based upon your own experience of ordinary life. It means less than total and more than trivial. Where you, the jury, draw the line is a matter for your collective judgment.

The Court of Appeal commended the judge's direction as concise and accurate. The Crown Court Compendium suggests that judges direct juries in the following terms: 'The abnormality of mental functioning substantially impaired D's ability to understand the nature of his conduct and/or to form a rational judgment and/or to exercise self-control. Substantially means that the impairment need not be total but must be more than merely trivial.'²⁷³

Under the current formulation of the law, D has to show a substantial impairment of his ability to do one or more of these:

- (1) to understand the nature of his own conduct;
- (2) to form a rational judgement;
- (3) to exercise self-control.²⁷⁴

Whether D has these abilities is a matter of psychiatry. The question is whether there is a 'substantial impairment' of one or more of these. It is submitted that it is a psychiatric question how far D's ability deviates from the normal level of ability to do those things. Giving the medical expert a greater role to play in this regard does not take the determination of the ultimate issue away from the jury, but merely ensures that they reach a verdict that is informed by medical expertise rather than lay intuition.²⁷⁵

If (1) and (2) are construed narrowly, they will be very similar to insanity and hence may be difficult for D to satisfy. If they are akin to insanity, in many cases D might well plead that complete defence rather than the partial defence of diminished responsibility.

²⁷² [2017] EWCA Crim 204. For further discussion, see Gibson, n 270.

²⁷³ Crown Court Compendium (2017) Part 1, Ch 19, section 5.

²⁷⁴ See Byrne [1960] 2 QB 396; and Khan [2009] EWCA Crim 1569.

²⁷⁵ See also the suggestion of LC 304, para 5.198 that it will be a question for the jury. See the most recent research by Mackay and Mitchell examining how often experts' reports deal with these matters, see n 222.

To understand the nature of D's conduct

As commentators have observed, this is similar to the first limb of the insanity plea.²⁷⁶ An example of how this element might be satisfied provided by the Law Commission²⁷⁷ was of a ten-year-old boy with a recognized medical condition:²⁷⁸ who has been left to play very violent video games for hours on end for much of his life, loses his temper and kills another child when the child attempts to take a game from him. When interviewed, he shows no real understanding that, when a person is killed they cannot simply be later revived, as happens in the games he has been continually playing.

One aspect of this form of the defence is that the focus is exclusively on whether D has the ability to understand the nature of his own conduct; it does not encompass his ability to understand anyone else's. Will this accommodate D who believes that his victim is, for example, possessed? Does this apply to the person with a very distorted thinking process? Baroness Murphy raised doubts about these in Parliament,²⁷⁹ and such cases may be difficult to fit within limb (1).

Substantially impaired capacity to form a rational judgement

Examples from the Law Commission included:

- (1) a woman who has been diagnosed as being in a state of learned helplessness consequent upon violent abuse suffered at her husband's hands comes to believe that only burning her husband to death will rid the world of his sins;
- (2) a mentally subnormal boy believes that he must follow his older brother's instructions, even when they involve taking part in a killing. He says, 'I wouldn't dream of disobeying my brother and he would never tell me to do something if it was really wrong';
- (3) a depressed man who has been caring for many years for a terminally ill spouse, kills her, at her request. He says that he had found it progressively more difficult to stop her repeated requests dominating his thoughts to the exclusion of all else, so that 'I felt I would never think straight again until I had given her what she wanted.'

In addition, Lord Judge CJ in Clinton observed that D's discovery that his partner has been sexually unfaithful may, and often will, be said to impair his ability to form a rational judgement (and/or exercise control).²⁸⁰

The recent case of *Conroy*²⁸¹ suggests that understanding the ability to form a rational judgement should not be 'over-refined'. The Court of Appeal held that the ability to form a rational judgement connotes not only rationality of outcome, but also rationality of thought process in achieving that outcome. All of a defendant's 'relevant circumstances preceding (and perhaps preceding over a very long period) the killing as well as any relevant circumstances following the killing',²⁸² can be taken into account. The judge instructed the jury to ask if the thought process leading to that was irrational, and whether his ability rationally to form a judgement had been substantially impaired. On appeal, D submitted that the summing up had significantly misdirected the jury because s 2 of the 1957 Act refers to the 'ability to form a rational judgment', requiring some rationality as to the final judgment, ²⁷⁶ See Mackay, n 217.

²⁷⁷ LC 304, para 5.21.

²⁷⁸ To reflect the provision as enacted we must amend the example so that he has an abnormality of mental functioning.

²⁷⁹ Hansard, HL, 30 June 2009, vol 712, col 180.

²⁸⁰ At [33]. Note that the defence also requires proof of the recognized medical condition, etc.

²⁸¹ [2017] EWCA Crim 81, [37].

²⁸² ibid, [32].

not the 'ability rationally to form a judgment'. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and stated:

As it seems to us, while of course any jury will need in the light of the available psychiatric evidence to assess a defendant's thinking processes in the context of assessing his ability to form a rational judgment, it is likely to be over-refined to divorce that consideration relating to a defendant's thinking processes from the actual outcome. Indeed, in some cases it may actually be extremely difficult to separate out the thought processes on the one hand from the 'outcome' on the other hand. In some cases it may well be that the two may be entirely enmeshed. In our view, there is a potential danger in a direction such as this straying beyond what is actually stated in section 2 itself. The elements of section 2 should so far as possible not be glossed in a summing-up to the jury.²⁸³

The courts seem willing to take a wide interpretation of what constitutes a substantial impairment of the ability to form a rational judgement. In Blackman,²⁸⁴ for example, the Court Martial Appeal Court (CMAC) found that, despite B's immediate recognition and admission that his actions constituted a breach of the Geneva Convention, his ability to form a rational judgement was substantially impaired.

The ability to exercise control

This might be construed very much more widely and render the defence available in a broader range of circumstances than under (1) and (2). As Rudi Fortson points out, it might be difficult to distinguish between cases of actual impairment of D's ability to exercise self-control from cases where D chose not to control his conduct.²⁸⁵ It was acknowledged in Blackman that the defendant's ability to exercise self-control may be sufficiently impaired even where no loss of self-control is externally discernible. In that case, despite the deliberate nature of B's actions, the CMAC still felt that he had exhibited a substantial loss of self-control.

(4) An explanation for (or cause of) the killing

The defence is narrowed by the further requirement that the abnormality of mental functioning, arising from a 'recognised medical condition' substantially impairing D's ability in a relevant manner must also 'explain' his acts in killing. By s 2(1B) 'an explanation' for D's conduct is provided 'if it causes, or is a significant contributory factor in causing, D to carry out that conduct'. Several problems arise. Section 2(1B) does not say that for the defence to succeed a sufficient explanation can only be provided if the abnormality of mental functioning is a 'cause'.²⁸⁶ On this basis, a causal link is just one of the ways in which the killing might be explained. It has been suggested that the medical experts could agree that all the other elements of the defence are present, but then disagree about the presence of this one. Mackay argues that one way of circumventing this difficulty is for the courts to interpret this provision so that once all the other elements are established it is assumed that it is present also, unless there is evidence to the contrary.²⁸⁷

Although the wording of s 2(1B) might lend itself to the argument that the subsection provides merely one way in which the killing might be 'explained', the language of the debates was clearly envisaging a causal link, although not necessarily 'but for' causation. In ²⁸³ Per Davis LJ at [37]. ²⁸⁴ [2017] EWCA Crim 190 (CMAC).

²⁸⁵ R Fortson, 'The Modern Partial Defence of Diminished Responsibility' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011). As he also points out, given that the burden of proof is on the defendant, the problem weighs most heavily on his shoulders.

²⁸⁶ See further Blackstone's Criminal Practice (2018) B1.

²⁸⁷ See R Mackay, 'The New Diminished Responsibility Plea: More than Mere Modernisation?' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility.

describing this element of the partial defence, the Supreme Court in Golds also used language that connoted the existence of some causal link. There may be cases where the abnormality provides an explanation sufficient to mitigate the conduct to manslaughter even if there is no causal link. In debates, the minister stated that:

We do not believe that the partial defence should succeed where random coincidence has brought together the activity of the person and the recognised medical condition.... *there must have been at least a significant contributory factor in causing the defendant to act as he did. We do not require the defence to prove that it was the only cause or the main cause or the most important factor, but there must be something that is more than a merely trivial factor.*²⁸⁸

Even if it is accepted that there must be some causal link, it is clear that the abnormality of mental functioning, etc need not be the sole cause of the killing. The Law Commission was clear that, for example, provocation might also be a relevant factor that caused D to kill. The government agreed with the Law Commission that it would be ‘impracticable to require abnormality to be the sole explanation [for D’s acts]’ and that there must be ‘some connection between the condition and the killing in order for the partial defence to be justified’.²⁸⁹

Some commentators suggest²⁹⁰ that it seems that s 2(1B) is merely giving effect to the interpretation of the old s 2 in *Dietschmann*²⁹¹ and Fenton.²⁹² Under the old law, in *Dietschmann*²⁹³ D killed the victim while D was heavily intoxicated. He was also suffering from a mental abnormality which all the medical witnesses described as an adjustment disorder arising from a ‘depressed grief reaction’ to the death of his aunt with whom he had a close physical and emotional relationship. In the House of Lords, Lord Hutton stressed that:²⁹⁴ ‘even if the defendant would not have killed if he had not taken drink, the causative effect of the drink does not necessarily prevent an abnormality of mind suffered by the defendant from substantially impairing his mental responsibility for his fatal acts’.²⁹⁵ In other words, even if a factor (in that case, alcohol) other than the abnormality was the principal cause of the defendant killing V, the defence would be available. Adopting that approach to the amended section, it would not matter that the abnormality of mental functioning from a recognized medical condition was not the principal cause of the killing. The Court of Appeal in Kay and Joyce stated that the killing must be caused by, or significantly caused by, the recognized medical condition. Therefore, an intoxicated defendant who would have killed even if he had not been suffering an abnormality will not be entitled to the defence.

Some commentators challenge the need for any causal element. Why should D have to prove a causal link given that the abnormality of mental functioning must be proved under s 2(1A) to have substantially impaired D’s ability to understand his conduct or form a rational judgement or exercise control in relation to the acts or omissions, that is, killing?²⁹⁶

Intoxicated defendants

The issue of the extent to which there must be a causal link between the abnormal mental functioning and the killing is most likely to arise in cases where D kills when he suffers from ²⁸⁸ Hansard, HC, 4 Mar 2009, col 416. Emphasis added.

²⁸⁹ CP 19/08, para 51; and see Hansard, HC, 3 Mar 2009, col 414 (Maria Eagle).

²⁹⁰ For discussion, see R Fortson, ‘The Modern Partial Defence of Diminished Responsibility’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Loss of Control and Diminished Responsibility (2011).

²⁹¹ [2003] 1 AC 1209, HL. ²⁹² (1975) 61 Cr App R 261, CA; Gittins [1984] QB 698, CA.

²⁹³ [2003] 1 AC 1209, [2003] Crim LR 550.

²⁹⁴ Note that this case did not involve alcohol dependence syndrome. ²⁹⁵ At [18].

²⁹⁶ See Mackay [2010] Crim LR 299 and n 287.

an abnormality of mental functioning and at the time of the killing D had also taken alcohol or other intoxicants.

As noted, in Dietschmann the House of Lords accepted that if a voluntarily intoxicated defendant kills, he is entitled to rely on diminished responsibility if the elements of the defence are made out even though he was intoxicated at the time of the killing. Subsequently in *Wood*²⁹⁷ the Court of Appeal applied this reasoning to a case where D was suffering from alcohol dependency syndrome. D stated that giving in to his alcohol craving was not an involuntary act, and argued that an alcoholic not suffering from severe withdrawal symptoms who chose to accept a drink after he reached his normal quota was not drinking 'involuntarily'.²⁹⁸ The Court of Appeal held that in light of the decision in Dietschmann it was wrong to imply that unless the jury were of the opinion that every drink consumed by D was involuntary his alcohol dependency syndrome had to be disregarded. That was too strict an approach. The jury could have regard to D's alcoholism in considering the plea of diminished responsibility even if not every drink consumed that day by D was involuntary.²⁹⁹

The position under the new form of the defence was considered by the Court of Appeal in Kay and Joyce, in which the court confirmed that 'the law does not debar someone suffering from schizophrenia [the medical condition in this case] from relying on the partial defence of diminished responsibility where voluntary intoxication has triggered the psychotic state, but he must meet the criteria in section 2(1)'.³⁰⁰ The court held that the authorities in Dietschmann and Wood apply with equal force to the amended version of diminished responsibility as they did under the former version. On the facts, there was no medical evidence available to K to show that his underlying illness was of such a degree that, independent of drug or alcohol abuse, it impaired his responsibility substantially. Therefore, once the jury rejected the defence's assertion that K was suffering from alcohol dependency syndrome, he no longer had a defence.

Applying the policy behind Dietschmann and Wood, as endorsed with reference to the amended defence in Kay and Joyce,³⁰¹ the position is as follows:

- (1) Where D has no medical condition other than acute intoxication, he cannot rely on the defence as there is no recognized medical condition: Dowds.
- (2) Where D suffers from a recognized medical condition other than alcohol dependency syndrome and is voluntarily intoxicated at the time of the killing,³⁰² the defence will succeed if: D proves that, ignoring his voluntary intoxication, he suffered an abnormality of mental functioning arising from a 'recognised medical condition' so as to substantially impair his ability in a relevant way, and that abnormality of mental functioning was a cause, or a significant contributing factor, of the conduct by which D killed. D should be entitled to the defence even if D might not have killed had he been sober, provided the abnormality of mental functioning arising from the 'recognised medical condition' nevertheless 'explains' or 'causes' his conduct in killing.
- (3) Where D suffers from a recognized medical condition in the form of alcohol dependency syndrome and is intoxicated at the time of the killing, the same approach should ²⁹⁷ [2008] EWCA Crim 1305. See also Stewart [2010] EWCA Crim 2159.

²⁹⁸ The trial judge directed in accordance with Tandy [1989] 1 All ER 267 which drew distinctions between alcoholism that caused brain damage and otherwise. For critical comment see J Tolmie, 'Alcoholism and Criminal Liability' (2001) 64 MLR 688.

²⁹⁹ This approach was more confirmed as being the correct one in Williams [2013] EWCA Crim 2749, a reference by the CCRC under the old law.

³⁰⁰ [2017] EWCA Crim 647, [16].

³⁰¹ [2017] EWCA Crim. See K Laird, 'R v Kay and Joyce' [2017] Crim LR 881.

³⁰² But not suffering from acute intoxication which is not a recognized medical condition.

be taken. The jury should be entitled to have regard to the alcohol dependency syndrome and D's intoxication, leaving out of account, insofar as it is possible, his voluntary intoxication. D is entitled to the defence if he proves he suffered an abnormality of mental functioning arising from a 'recognised medical condition' so as to substantially impair his ability in a relevant way, and that abnormality of mental functioning explains or was a cause of the conduct by which D killed.

- (4) In categories (2) and (3), if an intoxicated defendant with a recognized medical condition would have killed even if he had not had an abnormality of mental functioning, the availability of the defence depends on whether s 2(1B) is interpreted as requiring proof of a causal link in every case. If a causal link is required, a voluntarily intoxicated defendant who would have killed even if he had not been suffering an abnormality will not be entitled to the defence. If, on the other hand, s 2(1B) is interpreted as meaning that the abnormality might explain the killing even if it did not cause it, the defence may be available. This is most likely to be relevant where the ability substantially impaired under s 2(1A) 'was D's ability to form a rational judgement rather than to exercise self-control'.³⁰³

The amendment to s 2 of the 1957 Act by the 2009 Act does not diminish the authority of cases such as Byrne and Dix,³⁰⁴ confirming that medical evidence was a 'practical necessity' if the defence were to succeed.³⁰⁵ This has been confirmed in *Bunch*³⁰⁶ and more recently by the Privy Council's advice to the Queen in the Jamaican case of Brown.³⁰⁷

Must D's medical condition cause the killing?

As to proof of a causal link generally, in many cases the causal link between the abnormality of mental functioning and D's act of killing, or being a party to the killing, may be self-evident. It is not going to be easy to prove that an intoxicated defendant with an abnormality of mind would have killed even if he had not had an abnormality of mental functioning.³⁰⁸ Some commentators have questioned whether 'from a psychiatric perspective proving even a contributory causal link can be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to do in practice'.³⁰⁹ Moreover, although the Royal College of Psychiatrists did not object to the requirement, it cautioned against 'creating a situation in which experts might be called on to "demonstrate" causation on a scientific basis, rather than indicating, from an assessment of the nature of the abnormality, what its likely impact would be on thinking, emotion, volition, and so forth'.³¹⁰

The prior fault policy

The Court of Appeal's approach to intoxication and diminished responsibility is heavily influenced by the policy against allowing D to rely on his intoxicated state when it is self-induced. It is unclear, however, how fair that policy can be when it is taken in priority to the recognition of the medical condition.

The following situations may arise:

- (1) D is acutely intoxicated and that is the sole claim of a recognized medical condition—no defence: Dowds adopting the prior fault policy.

³⁰³ See further Blackstone's Criminal Practice (2018) Part B1, 24.

³⁰⁴ [1960] 2 QB 396 and (1982) 74 Cr App R 306 respectively. ³⁰⁵ At [11].

³⁰⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 2498. ³⁰⁷ [2016] UKPC 6.

³⁰⁸ Even if D made an admission to that effect, how much reliance is to be placed on a confession made by someone who has an abnormality of mental functioning?

³⁰⁹ J Miles, 'A Dog's Breakfast of Homicide Reform' [2009] 6 Arch News 8 and see the speech of Baroness Murphy, Hansard, HL, 30 June 2009, cols 177–180.

³¹⁰ LC 304, para 5.123.

- (2) D suffers from a recognized medical condition and is intoxicated at the time of the killing—defence may be available: Dietschmann, Kay, etc. D's recognized medical condition is not ousted by his also being voluntarily intoxicated.
- (3) D's recognized medical condition was caused by his chronic substance misuse (eg he has developed alcohol dependency syndrome) and D was intoxicated at the time of the killing—defence may be available (this is merely an example of (2), but in the context of D's sustained 'fault' in his substance abuse bringing about the recognized medical condition).
- (4) An underlying recognized medical condition suffered by D is triggered by his voluntary intoxication. For example, D has schizophrenia and is aware of that fact. He takes drugs voluntarily and triggers a schizophrenic episode. In such a case the defence is available, even if D was warned that taking drugs may trigger the schizophrenia: Kay.
- (5) D's voluntary intoxication causes a recognized medical condition (eg drug induced psychosis) where there was no pre-existing recognized medical condition—no defence: Dowds; Lindo.

It may seem odd that D can rely on the defence in (3) despite the fact that his sustained prior fault caused the recognized medical condition. It may also seem odd that D can rely on the defence in (4) where there is a considerable degree of prior fault in D triggering an existing recognized medical condition, but not in (5). Is the degree of prior fault in (5) that much greater than (4), or even (3)? It is submitted that these issues merit further consideration by the Court of Appeal.

13.2.2.2 The role of the expert and the jury

There is no statutory requirement of medical evidence, as there is with insanity, but surely the jury may not find that D is suffering from diminished responsibility unless there is medical evidence of a recognized medical condition and abnormality of mental functioning.³¹¹ Indeed, in *Brennan*³¹² Davis LJ stated that, 'most, if not all, of the aspects of the new provisions relate entirely to psychiatric matters. In our view it is both legitimate and helpful, given the structure of the new provisions, for an expert psychiatrist to include in his or her evidence a view on all four stages'. Under the old law, as with insanity,³¹³ whether the defence succeeded was a decision to be made by the jury, not the medical experts. They could reject unanimous medical evidence that D is suffering from diminished responsibility if there is nothing in the circumstances of the case to prevent them doing so.³¹⁴ The extent to which the jury remains free to do this will be considered later.

Under the old law, the 'abnormality of mind' element was a matter on which the psychiatric evidence was likely to be highly persuasive, but because the concept was a vague one, there was still an opportunity for the jury to apply its own understanding of the concept. Similarly, the crucial element of the old s 2 test involved moral rather than medical or legal evaluation: the 'substantial impairment' related not just to D's mental state, but to his 'responsibility'. In contrast, under the amended partial defence the expert may be offering opinions on: (a) whether there is an abnormality of mental functioning; (b) whether there is a recognized medical condition; (c) whether D had a substantial impairment of ability to understand/form a rational judgement/exercise control; and (d) whether it is a cause or explanation for the killing. The Royal College of Psychiatrists expressed the view that medical experts ought not to be called upon to express an opinion on the 'ultimate issue'.³¹⁵ However, it is submitted that, in practice, it will often be difficult for an expert not to express an opinion from which it will be possible for the jury to draw a very clear inference as to the ultimate issue.

³¹¹ Medical evidence was required under the old law, indeed it was described as being a 'practical necessity' because the onus is placed on the defendant: Byrne [1960] 2 QB 396 at 402; Dix (1981) 74 Cr App R 306 at 311. The Court of Appeal in Bunch [2013] EWCA Crim 2498 confirmed the continued validity of Byrne. For further discussion, see T Storey, 'Diminished Responsibility: No Defence Without Evidence' (2014) 78 J Crim L 113.

³¹² [2014] EWCA Crim 2387, [51]. ³¹³ See p 305.

³¹⁴ eg Salmon [2005] EWCA Crim 70; Eifinger [2001] EWCA Crim 1855; cf the position if there is uncontradicted expert evidence and no other live issue: Sanders [1991] Crim LR 781. See generally LCCP 177, para 6.99.

On one view, since the elements of the defence are now all capable of being subject to an opinion from an expert, there is much less, if anything, for the jury to consider, particularly if there was uncontradicted medical evidence for the defence. On the other hand, the courts may well continue to take the view that although the elements of the defence are now all capable of being subject to strong opinion evidence from an expert, the ultimate issue remains one for the jury. They must consider all the evidence, and the opinion of the expert is only that: an opinion. As was noted under the old law in Walton v The Queen:³¹⁶ upon an issue of diminished responsibility the jury are entitled and indeed bound to consider not only the medical evidence but the evidence upon the whole facts and circumstances of the case.³¹⁷

The Court of Appeal confronted this issue with reference to the amended partial defence in *Brennan*³¹⁸ and the Supreme Court considered it in Golds.

In Brennan, D was convicted of murder despite the fact that there was uncontradicted evidence from the experts that all the elements of the partial defence were satisfied. There was some evidence to suggest that V's murder was well planned. The defence expert, who was the only expert called, stated that such planning was not inconsistent with her finding that all the elements of the partial defence were satisfied, rather it was a facet of the mental condition from which D was suffering. Davis LJ characterized the case as one that brought to the fore two conflicting, but equally fundamental, principles. The first is that the ultimate issue on whether the partial defence is satisfied is a matter for the jury. The second is that the jury must base its verdict upon the evidence.³¹⁹ Davis LJ held that the experts can and should express a view on the ultimate issue. After reviewing the authorities analysed in this section, his lordship held that the judge ought to withdraw the murder charge from the jury if (a) the expert evidence is uncontested and (b) there is no other evidence which, looked at in the round, is at least capable of rebutting the defence.³²⁰ In relation to this latter point, Davis LJ stated that even if there is some other evidence that might rebut the defence, there might be instances when that other evidence is too tenuous or, even if taken at its highest, is simply insufficient to permit a rational rejection of the partial defence.

In Golds,³²¹ the Supreme Court examined the reasoning in Brennan. The court commented, obiter, on the circumstances in which a judge should withdraw murder from the jury where there is uncontradicted medical evidence of diminished responsibility. The court made the preliminary observation that if a murder trial is contested, it is of considerable importance that the verdict be that of the jury. Therefore, despite the more medicalized nature of the amended partial defence, the Supreme Court affirmed in unequivocal terms that it is for the jury to determine whether all the elements are satisfied. The court also observed that the presence of a causal link between the mental abnormality and the killing and whether the impairment was substantial are elements of the partial defence that are essentially jury questions.

³¹⁵ Paras 5.118–5.120; and see Khan [2009] EWCA Crim 1569.

³¹⁶ [1978] AC 788, PC.

³¹⁷ Lord Keith (at 793F), and see Khan [2009] EWCA Crim 1569, noting, in particular, the observations of the court at [18].

³¹⁸ [2014] EWCA Crim 2387.

³¹⁹ At [43]–[44].

³²⁰ At [65]–[66].

³²¹ [2016] UKSC 61.

Lord Hughes offered the following, valuable guidance:

Where, however, in a diminished responsibility trial the medical evidence supports the plea and is uncontradicted, the judge needs to ensure that the Crown explains the basis on which it is inviting the jury to reject that evidence. He needs to ensure that the basis advanced is one which the jury can properly adopt. If the facts of the case give rise to it, he needs to warn the jury that brutal killings may be the product of disordered minds and that planning, whilst it may be relevant to self-control, may well be consistent with disordered thinking. While he needs to make it clear to the jury that, if there is a proper basis for rejecting the expert evidence, the decision is theirs—that trial is by jury and not by expert—it will also ordinarily be wise to advise the jury against attempting to make themselves amateur psychiatrists, and that if there is undisputed expert evidence the jury will probably wish to accept it, unless there is some identified reason for not doing so. To this extent, the approach of the court in Brennan is to be endorsed.³²²

The point was reiterated subsequently in Blackman, in which the Lord Chief Justice emphasized that the judge should exercise caution before accepting the applicability of the partial defence and removing the murder charge from the jury. It was held that the fact the prosecution call no evidence to contradict a psychiatrist called by the defence is not in itself sufficient justification for the judge to take that course of action. His lordship stated that, ‘it will be a rare case where a judge will exercise the power to withdraw a charge of murder from the jury when the prosecution do not accept that the evidence gives rise to the defence of diminished responsibility’.³²³ These judgments demonstrate that despite the more medicalized nature of the partial defence, the crucial function of determining whether all the elements are satisfied rests firmly with the jury.

13.2.2.3 Procedural relationship with insanity

One might assume that defendants charged with murder who have killed with malice aforethought would prefer a conviction for manslaughter on the ground of diminished responsibility to an acquittal by reason of insanity, and that would explain why reliance on the M’Naghten Rules has been greatly reduced since 1957 (see Ch 9). Where D, being charged with murder, raises the defence of diminished responsibility and the Crown have evidence that he is insane within the M’Naghten Rules, they may adduce or elicit evidence tending to show that this is so. This is now settled by s 6 of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity and Unfitness to Plead) Act 1964³²⁴—resolving a conflict in the cases. That Act also provides for the converse situation: where D sets up insanity, the prosecution may contend that he was suffering only from diminished responsibility.³²⁵ The roles of the prosecution and defence may be strangely reversed, according to which of them are contending that D is insane. It seems clear in principle that the Crown must establish whichever contention it puts forward is beyond reasonable doubt.³²⁶ It must follow that D rebuts the Crown’s case if he can raise a doubt. Where D relies on some other defence, such as loss of self-control, and evidence of diminished responsibility emerges, it seems that the most the judge should do is to draw the attention of D’s counsel to it.³²⁷ Diminished responsibility is an ‘optional defence’. The defences of loss of self-control and diminished responsibility ³²² At [51]. ³²³ [2017] EWCA Crim 190 (CMAC), [43].

³²⁴ By s 52(2) of the 2009 Act, ‘In section 6 of the Criminal Procedure (Insanity) Act 1964 (c. 84) (evidence by prosecution of insanity or diminished responsibility), in paragraph (b) for “mind” substitute “mental functioning”’.

³²⁵ It had been so held at common law by Elwes J in Nott (1958) 43 Cr App R 8.

³²⁶ Grant [1960] Crim LR 424, per Paull J.

³²⁷ Campbell (1986) 84 Cr App R 255 at 259–260; Kookan (1981) 74 Cr App R 30.

overlap in some respects,³²⁸ and this can lead to a complex decision regarding trial tactics since the defences carry differing burdens. Similarly, a jury will have to be directed carefully on the respective burdens.

Where the defence rely on D's abnormal state of mind of whatever kind, it is open to the prosecution to allege, and to call evidence to prove, that the abnormality amounts to insanity or diminished responsibility and it is submitted this is so even where D is alleging that he was an automaton. This view is supported by the fact that the CLRC³²⁹ was of the view that the prosecution could call evidence in cases such as Kemp.³³⁰ The prosecution may not, however, lead evidence of D's insanity where the defence have not put the abnormality of D's mind in issue,³³¹ even though this course is desired by the defence.

Sentencing

The sentence available to the judge is discretionary with the maximum sentence being life imprisonment. The available disposals on conviction are not something for the jury's consideration: Edgington.³³²

³²⁸ On the merits of such overlap and a potential merging of the defences under the old law before the 2009 Act, see Mackay and Mitchell [2003] Crim LR 745; Chalmers [2004] Crim LR 198; Gardner and Macklem [2004] Crim LR 213; Mackay and Mitchell [2004] Crim LR 219.

³²⁹ (1963) Cmnd 2149, para 41. ³³⁰ See p 294.

³³¹ Dixon [1961] 3 All ER 460n, [1961] 1 WLR 337, per Jones J.

³³² [2013] EWCA Crim 2185.

Involuntary manslaughter

In the previous chapter we considered those categories of manslaughter in which the defendant has been proved to have killed with the mens rea for murder, but has a partial defence which results in a manslaughter verdict. In this chapter we consider the other forms of manslaughter—known collectively as involuntary manslaughter. This category of manslaughter includes varieties of homicide which are unlawful at common law but committed without the mens rea for murder. Given the breadth of cases that involuntary manslaughter must cover, it is not surprising that more than one form of the offence has evolved, and that the elements of each form of involuntary manslaughter are distinct, particularly as to the fault required. Equally, as the limits of the mens rea for murder are uncertain, it follows inevitably that there is a corresponding uncertainty at the boundary between murder and manslaughter. The difficulties do not end there, for there is another vague borderline between manslaughter and accidental death. Indeed, Lord Atkin said that:¹

of all crimes manslaughter appears to afford most difficulties of definition, for it concerns homicide in so many and so varying conditions...the law...recognizes murder on the one hand based mainly, though not exclusively,^[2] on an intention to kill, and manslaughter on the other hand, based mainly, though not exclusively,^[3] on the absence of intent to kill, but with the presence of an element of 'unlawfulness' which is the elusive factor.

This ambiguity is unfortunate, since the offence is one of the most serious in the criminal calendar and carries a maximum life sentence. The upper and lower limits of the offence remain obscure, and there is little internal coherence between the forms of manslaughter currently recognized—other than the fact that D causes a death. Lumping together the many different types of behaviour that give rise to an unintentional unlawful killing under one label is unsatisfactory in principle, and can engender unmerited disparities in sentencing.⁴ The Law Commission concluded that the offence of manslaughter was at risk of being devalued by being left as a 'residual, amorphous, "catch-all" homicide offence'.⁵

The forms of manslaughter overlap considerably. There are four broad categories of involuntary manslaughter:

- (1) manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act;
- (2) manslaughter by gross negligence;
- (3) manslaughter by subjective recklessness;
- (4) statutory corporate manslaughter.

The constituents of each of these categories require some degree of analysis.

¹ In Andrews v DPP [1937] AC 576 at 581, [1937] 2 All ER 552 at 554–555.

² See p 513. ³ See p 521.

⁴ See M Wasik, 'Form and Function in the Law of Involuntary Manslaughter' [1994] Crim LR 883.

⁵ LC 304, para 2.9. To avoid drawing an arbitrary line between murder and manslaughter, the Commission recommended a middle tier of second degree murder. See Ch 12. For an argument that there ought to be aggravated murder and aggravated manslaughter to reflect different forms of killing, see C Elliot and C de Than (2009) 20 King's College Journal 69.

14.1 Manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act

The modern form of this offence has evolved from a very harsh one dating to at least the seventeenth century. The institutional writer Coke stated that an intention to commit any unlawful act was a sufficient mens rea for murder,⁶ so that if D shot at V's hen with intent to kill it and accidentally killed V by the shot, this was murder, 'for the act was unlawful'. This savage doctrine was criticized by Holt CJ⁷ and by the time Foster wrote his Crown Law,⁸ it appears to have been modified by the proviso that to constitute murder the unlawful act which D intended to carry out had to be a felony (and not merely a misdemeanour or civil law wrong such as a tort). So, if D shot at the hen intending to steal it (a felony), the killing of V was murder even though D did not intend to kill any human. This doctrine of 'constructive murder' existed until the Homicide Act 1957. Alongside this doctrine of constructive murder, there existed a parallel doctrine of constructive manslaughter: any death caused while in the course of committing an unlawful act, other than a felony, was manslaughter. An act was unlawful for this purpose even if it was only a tort, so that the only mens rea which needed to be proved was an intention to commit the tort.

The present law is that D is guilty of unlawful act manslaughter (UAM) if he kills by an unlawful and dangerous act. The only mens rea required is an intention to do the unlawful act and any fault required to render it unlawful. It is irrelevant that D is unaware that it is unlawful or that it is dangerous.⁹ It is enough that a reasonable and sober person would have been aware of the danger in the sense of a risk of some harm (not necessarily serious harm) to a person.¹⁰ The offence is heavily and cogently criticized because of this constructive element by which D's liability for manslaughter turns on the consequence of death, which will often be unforeseen by D and indeed be regarded as a matter of 'bad luck' beyond his control.¹¹ The offender is labelled as a manslaughterer when he might only have foreseen, if at all, a risk of some minor harm being caused.¹²

It is a notoriously difficult crime to apply. A good starting point is to ask what offence D would have been charged with had no one died. That is the unlawful act on which the manslaughter may be constructed.

The crime comprises:¹³

- (1) an unlawful act;
- (2) intentionally performed;
- (3) in circumstances rendering it dangerous;
- (4) causing death.

⁶ Co 3 Inst 56. See Turner, MACL, 195 at 212 et seq for a discussion of the historical development.

⁷ Keate (1697) Comb 406 at 409. ⁸ Discourses (1762).

⁹ Newbury [1977] AC 500; Ball [1989] Crim LR 730; JF [2015] EWCA Crim 351.

¹⁰ Watson [1989] 2 All ER 865, [1989] Crim LR 733.

¹¹ See RA Duff, 'Whose Luck is it Anyway?' in C Clarkson and S Cunningham (eds), Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death (2008). See generally on liability for consequences, A Ashworth, 'Taking the Consequences' in S Shute, J Gardner and J Horder (eds), Action and Value in Criminal Law (1993).

¹² On the issue generally, see G Williams, 'Convictions and Fair Labelling' (1983) 42 CLJ 85; B Mitchell, 'In Defence of a Principle of Correspondence' [1999] Crim LR 195; cf J Horder, 'A Critique of the Correspondence Principle in Criminal Law' [1995] Crim LR 759 and 'Questioning the Correspondence Principle: A Reply' [1999] Crim LR 206. See also the criticism in LC 304, paras 3.42 et seq.

¹³ Per Lord Hope, A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1994) [1998] AC 830. Numerous cases have relied upon this formulation of the offence, for examples see Webster v CPS [2014] EWHC 2516 (Admin) and Bristow [2013] EWCA Crim 1540.

As a simple example, consider D who throws a stone at V's greenhouse intending to break the window or being reckless as to the window being broken. V is kneeling close to the greenhouse tending his plants when the pane of glass shatters and a shard penetrates his eye and kills him. There is an unlawful act (criminal damage), the act (throwing the stone) is intentionally performed, the reasonable and sober person would consider that there was a risk of some harm (not necessarily serious harm) to V by D's actions, and V's death is caused. D is guilty of manslaughter. The offence is commonly prosecuted where D has thrown a punch at V or scuffled with V in a drunken dispute.¹⁴ If V falls as a result of the, perhaps minor, contact and on hitting his head V dies, D will be liable for manslaughter even though he intended or was reckless as to an assault. Several elements require further examination.

14.1.1 The unlawfulness

Issues requiring elaboration are whether the unlawful act must: (a) be criminal; (b) involve a completed crime; (c) be a crime of mens rea; (d) be one dependent on proof of an act, or whether an omission will suffice; (e) be a crime involving an offence against the person.

The current state of the law is that to be sufficient for unlawful act manslaughter, the unlawful act may be any criminal offence involving an act (but not an omission), with mens rea of more than mere negligence.

14.1.1.1 A crime

At one time it was thought that even a tort which led to a death was sufficiently unlawful to trigger this offence. In Fenton,¹⁵ D was liable for manslaughter when he threw stones down a mine and broke some scaffolding which caused a wagon to overturn with fatal results. D's act was a trespass and the only question was whether it caused V's death. Even in the nineteenth century the judges were sometimes troubled by the harshness of this approach. Some judges refused to apply it. For example, in Franklin,¹⁶ D, walking on Brighton pier, took up 'a good sized box' from a refreshment stall and threw it into the sea where it struck a swimmer, V, and killed him. The prosecution argued that apart from any question of negligence, it was manslaughter if the commission of the tort of trespass against the stall-keeper had caused death. Field J, after consulting Mathew J who agreed, held that the case must go to the jury 'on the broad ground of negligence'. Expressing his 'great abhorrence of constructive crime', Field J asserted that 'The mere fact of a civil wrong committed by one person against another ought not to be used as an incident which is a necessary step to a criminal case.'

It is clear that under the present law D's 'act' must be a crime to found liability for manslaughter. In Kennedy (No 2),¹⁷ the House of Lords affirmed that to establish the crime of unlawful act manslaughter it must be shown: (a) that the defendant committed an unlawful act; (b) that such unlawful act was a crime; and (c) that the defendant's unlawful act was a significant cause of the death of the deceased. A good rule of thumb, as noted, is to identify the criminal charge that could be laid against D if no one had died as a result of his conduct.

In Lamb,¹⁸ D pointed a loaded gun at his friend, V, in jest. He did not intend to injure or alarm V and V was not alarmed. There was therefore no assault. Because they did not understand how a revolver works, both thought there was no danger in pulling the trigger; but, when D did so, he shot V dead. D was not guilty of a criminal assault or battery because he

¹⁴ For critical comment on the offence in such cases see B Mitchell, 'More Thoughts about Unlawful and Dangerous Act Manslaughter and the One Punch Killer' [2009] Crim LR 502.

¹⁵ (1830) 1 Lew CC 179.

¹⁶ (1883) 15 Cox CC 163.

¹⁷ [2007] UKHL 38.

¹⁸ [1967] 2 QB 981. The case is a controversial one. Glanville Williams wrote that 'Lamb was a fool but there is no need to punish fools to that degree. There is no need to punish Lamb at all. He had killed his friend and that was punishment enough': 'Recklessness Redefined' (1981) 40 CLJ 252 at 281.

did not foresee that V would be alarmed or injured. It was, therefore, a misdirection to tell the jury that this was 'an unlawful and dangerous act'. Sachs LJ, stated that it was not 'unlawful in the criminal sense of the word'; and, referring to Franklin, 'it is not in point to consider whether an act is unlawful merely from the angle of civil liabilities'. This was confirmed by Scarlett.¹⁹ D, a licensee, caused death by using excessive force while lawfully expelling a trespasser from his pub. His conviction for manslaughter was quashed because the judge had directed that D was guilty if he had committed a battery (used unnecessary and unreasonable force). What the judge should have said was that it was necessary to prove that the force used was excessive in the circumstances which D believed to exist²⁰—that would be more than a mere tort of battery as D would then have the mens rea of the crime of battery.

The House of Lords in *DPP v Newbury*²¹ appeared to cast doubt on these cases. D threw a piece of paving stone from a bridge as a train approached. It killed the driver. The House of Lords failed to identify any crime rendering D's act unlawful. Throwing concrete in this way certainly looks like a criminal act, which explains why it was not argued to be lawful before the House.²² The question for the House was whether D could properly be convicted of manslaughter if he did not foresee that his act might cause harm to another. The question is then what crime D committed with mens rea. As we have already outlined, UAM can be committed if D commits a crime by an intentional act provided also that a reasonable and sober person would see the risk of some harm to a person. The question is not whether D foresaw death or a risk of injury. It is whether he had mens rea for the offence that he would have been charged with if no one had died. In Newbury, D's act was not, on the facts, an assault or any of the usual offences against the person, all of which require mens rea. The only other likely crimes with which D could be charged were the offence of endangering passengers contrary to s 34 of the OAPA 1861 or an offence of criminal damage.²³ The House did not specify what offence was the base crime on which manslaughter was constructed.

The better view, it is submitted, is that as in Lamb and Scarlett, a criminal act must be identified and proved. Kennedy (No 2) supports this requirement.

The ambiguity of the concept of an 'unlawful' act has sometimes led the courts to gloss over the requirement for proof of a criminal offence. In Cato,²⁴ D caused V's death by injecting him with heroin with his consent. The court accepted that this was not an offence under the Misuse of Drugs Act and assumed for this purpose that it was not an offence under s 23 of the OAPA 1861²⁵ but said 'the unlawful act would be described as injecting the deceased with a mixture of heroin and water which at the time of the injection and for the purposes of the injection Cato had unlawfully taken into his possession'. The act was closely associated with other acts which are offences but it is submitted that neither this nor any moral condemnation attaching to that act should be enough to found liability for manslaughter. In the light of the House of Lords decision in Kennedy (No 2), such reasoning is untenable.

14.1.1.2 The 'base' crime must be proved in full

The requirement of a criminal offence prompts a further question: whether it is necessary for the prosecution to establish all of the elements of the crime that would have been ¹⁹ [1993] 4 All ER 629. The case must be read in the light of Owino [1995] Crim LR 743, p 384. See also Jennings [1990] Crim LR 588.

²⁰ Gladstone Williams, p 383.

²¹ [1977] AC 500, [1976] 2 All ER 365.

²² '... no question arose whether [Newbury's] actions were or were not unlawful'; Scarlett [1993] 4 All ER at 635, per Beldam LJ.

²³ Using an offence against property seems as objectionable a basis for convicting of manslaughter as a tort (see later). There is no doubt criminal damage will suffice as the base offence: JF [2015] EWCA Crim 351.

²⁴ [1976] 1 All ER 260.

²⁵ See p 715. In fact D was convicted of the s 23 offence so the remarks discussed in the text may be obiter.

charged had no one died—that is, the ‘base’ crime on which the unlawful act manslaughter charge is constructed. In principled terms the element of ‘unlawfulness’ should require the prosecution to prove all the elements (mens rea and actus reus with no defence) of the base offence. Unfortunately, this apparently obvious interpretation of ‘unlawful’ has not been put completely beyond doubt by the case law.

It seems clear that the prosecution must prove the full mens rea of the base offence. In Lamb, the trial judge had directed the jury that it is an unlawful act ‘whether or not it falls within any recognized category of crime’. The Court of Appeal found this to be a misdirection because ‘mens rea is now an essential element of the offence’.²⁶ The courts all too often gloss over this aspect, using language that implies that a mere voluntary act by D might suffice, as, for example, in A-G’s Reference (No 3 of 1994),²⁷ where Lord Hope referred to the requirement merely that D ‘did what he did intentionally’.²⁸

The proof of mens rea of the base offence is a necessary but not sufficient condition of unlawful act manslaughter. Where D, on facts similar to Lamb, thinks that the revolver is loaded and dangerous and he only intends to cause V to be frightened, but V does not apprehend violence because he does not believe the gun to be loaded, there is no complete assault. D has the mens rea, but the actus reus is not satisfied.²⁹ Again, it is submitted that a conviction for unlawful act manslaughter cannot be maintained.³⁰ In Lamb itself, L’s conduct did not constitute an assault both because he lacked the mens rea (he had no intention to frighten, nor because of his common lack of understanding of the operation of the firearm was he reckless as to causing apprehension in his victim), and there was no actus reus because his friend, believing that the whole thing was a joke, had no apprehension of immediate unlawful violence.³¹ The court was categorical as to ‘mens rea being now an essential element of the offence’, and also accepted that counsel had put forward the correct view that for the ‘act to be unlawful it must constitute at least what he then termed a technical assault’. Support also derives from Arobieke.³² D pursued V onto railway lines ‘looking for him’. V was killed. There was no evidence that D had actually threatened V, so no actus reus of assault could be established. The conviction for manslaughter was quashed.³³

In addition to proving the mens rea and actus reus of the base offence, the prosecution must disprove any defences to the base offence raised by D.³⁴ If the defence itself is clearly defined, there is little difficulty in applying it in the unlawful act manslaughter context. Two particular problems fall for further discussion.

14.1.1.3 Problems of consent and unlawful act manslaughter

It is a matter of policy whether the law will recognize as valid the factual consent of an individual (ie an adult of full mental capacity), which leads to conduct where harm is intended ²⁶ At 986. See also Reid (1975) 62 Cr App R 109 (fright by threat to use firearm was sufficient).

²⁷ [1998] AC 245. ²⁸ Per Lord Hope, at 274.

²⁹ It may be possible to charge a battery. There is no crime of attempted assault since it is a summary only offence. This point was not argued in Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 151.

³⁰ If these fractions of crimes are sufficient to form the basis for a UAM charge, that may tell us something about the underlying purpose of UAM. It would be clear that the punishment is based on the ‘dangerousness of the activity rather than on the technical ‘unlawfulness’.

³¹ Bruce (1847) Cox CC 262, Erle J supports this—on the facts no assault as no apprehension by V nor intent by D.

³² [1988] Crim LR 314.

³³ Compare Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 151 where D chased V and thereby assaulted him before V was knocked down.

³⁴ Jennings [1990] Crim LR 588; Scarlett (1994) 98 Cr App R 290.

or foreseen: Brown.³⁵ If D pleads that V consented to the base crime, that will be accepted where D's conduct falls within an established category for which V's consent is accepted in law; for example, boxing, surgery or horseplay. Since D commits no base crime as he has V's consent, there is no unlawful act manslaughter liability.³⁶ Similarly, where D has not intended that a consensual assault would lead to any greater degree of harm than the mere assault or battery consented to by V, there is no base offence and can be no manslaughter conviction: Slingsby.³⁷

In A,³⁸ D's post-exam celebrations included throwing V into a river where he drowned. D claimed that he was entitled to a defence of belief in consent to the assault, his actions being mere horseplay. If he had consent to the assault there could be no manslaughter. The Court of Appeal confirmed that if D had caused V to fall in the river by a non-accidental act and D did not have a genuine belief in V's consent to the assault, D would be liable if all sober and reasonable people realized it was dangerous in the sense discussed later.

14.1.1.4 Problems of intoxication and the unlawful act

Where the prosecution rely on an unlawful act which does not require a specific intent (eg a base crime that can be committed recklessly) and D was intoxicated at the time, it is immaterial that he lacked the mens rea of the crime in question and even that he was unconscious: Lipman.³⁹ In this memorable case D killed V by cramming a sheet into her mouth and striking her while he was on an LSD 'trip' and believed he was in the centre of the earth being attacked by serpents.⁴⁰ The unlawful act—the base crime—was the battery committed on V while D was unconscious. That battery required only the mens rea of recklessness, it was therefore a crime of basic intent, and D's self-induced intoxication provided no excuse. His prior fault satisfied that mens rea requirement.

14.1.1.5 A crime of mens rea?

It is implicit in the decision in *Church*⁴¹ that the base crime cannot be one where the fault is merely that D performed the act negligently. That case stipulates that for UAM the crime must involve an act which all sober and reasonable people would realize entailed the risk (ie an unjustifiable risk) of harm to others.⁴² This is in accordance with the well-established rule that negligence sufficient to found liability in tort is not necessarily enough for criminal guilt and that death caused in the course of committing the tort of negligence is not ³⁵ [1994] AC 212; A-G's Reference (No 6 of 1980) [1981] QB 715.

³⁶ eg Bruce (1847) Cox CC 262 (no assault where D spun boy round in jest and killed V), and see Lord Mustill's speech in Brown [1994] AC 212 at 264. In R v Morton (14 July 2017, Nottingham CC) D was charged with unlawful act manslaughter having caused V's death by strangulation in the course of what he argued was consensual sex. Carr J left the issue of consent to the jury on the basis that the relevant authorities do not impose a blanket prohibition on consent being relevant to D's liability in such circumstances.

³⁷ [1995] Crim LR 570 (D injuring V with ring in course of consensual sexual touching, V dies of infection from wound).

³⁸ (2005) 69 J Crim L 394.

³⁹ [1970] 1 QB 152. The case was heavily criticized. See commentary by I Hooker [1969] Crim LR 547; G Orchard, 'Drunkness, Drugs and Manslaughter' [1970] Crim LR 132; P Glazebrook, 'Constructive Manslaughter and the Threshold Tort' (1970) 28 CLJ 21; R Buxton, Annual Survey of Commonwealth Law (1970) 128 and 134. It was not followed in Australia: Haywood [1971] VR 755 (Crockett J) but was affirmed by the House of Lords in Majewski (p 315). Cf the decision in Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125.

⁴⁰ Though the jury convicted on the grounds that D was reckless or grossly negligent when, quite consciously, he took the drugs, the Court of Appeal upheld the conviction by applying the Church doctrine (p 577).

⁴¹ [1996] 1 QB 59.

⁴² The reference to 'an unlawful act' would be otiose if it did not mean unlawful in some other respect than negligence.

necessarily manslaughter. Not only is it insufficient that D was negligent in civil law, it is insufficient for UAM if the unlawfulness of the criminal act arises solely from the negligent manner in which it is performed. Death caused by such an act will not necessarily be manslaughter. This follows from the decision of the House of Lords in Andrews v DPP.⁴³ In that case Du Parc J told the jury that if D killed V in the course of dangerous driving contrary to s 11 of the Road Traffic Act 1930, he was guilty of manslaughter. Lord Atkin (who clearly regarded dangerous driving in the 1930 Act as a crime of negligence)⁴⁴ said that, if the summing up had rested there, there would have been misdirection:

There can be no doubt that this section covers driving with such a high degree of negligence as that, if death were caused, the offender would have committed manslaughter. But the converse is not true, and it is perfectly possible that a man may drive at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public, and cause death, and yet not be guilty of manslaughter.⁴⁵

Lord Atkin expressly distinguished⁴⁶ between acts which are unlawful because of the negligent manner in which they are performed and acts which are unlawful for some other reason:

There is an obvious difference in the law of manslaughter between doing an unlawful act and doing a lawful act with a degree of carelessness which the legislature makes criminal.

His lordship's next sentence implies that killing in the course of unlawful acts generally was manslaughter:

If it were otherwise a man who killed another while driving without due care and attention would ex necessitate commit manslaughter.

This passage has been severely criticized⁴⁷ and it is certainly unhappily phrased: 'doing a lawful act with a degree of carelessness which the legislature makes criminal' is a contradiction in terms, for the act so done is plainly not a lawful act. But the distinction evidently intended, viz. between acts which are unlawful because of negligent performance and acts which are unlawful for some other reason, is at least intelligible and, in view of the established distinction between civil and criminal negligence, a necessary limitation.

The natural reading of Lord Atkin's opinion is that the distinction is between acts which are unlawful because of negligent performance and acts which are unlawful for some other reason. An alternative (strained, but more attractive) reading is that only crimes of more than mere negligence will suffice to ground an unlawful act manslaughter conviction. This is supported by the comments of Sachs LJ in Lamb: 'mens rea being now an essential ingredient in manslaughter'.⁴⁸

This issue was confronted recently at first instance. In the case of R v Alliston, D was charged with unlawful act manslaughter after V died as a result of his bicycle colliding with her as she was crossing the road.⁴⁹ The unlawful act relied upon by the Crown was the offence of riding a bicycle on a public road without a front brake contrary to s 91 of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 in conjunction with regs 6 and 7 of the Pedal Cycles (Construction and

⁴³ [1937] AC 576.

⁴⁴ See Ch 32. The offence of dangerous driving was abolished by the Criminal Law Act 1977 but restored in a new form by the Road Traffic Act 1991, s 2.

⁴⁵ [1937] AC 576 at 584. ⁴⁶ ibid, 585.

⁴⁷ Turner, MACL, 238. Referred to by Devlin as 'the only obscure speech the great Lord Atkin ever made': 'Criminal Responsibility and Punishment: Function of Judge and Jury' [1954] Crim LR 661 at 672.

⁴⁸ [1967] 2 QB 981 at 988.

⁴⁹ See BBC News Online, 'Cyclist detained over pedestrian death', 18 Sept 2017 at www.bbc.co.uk/news/uk-england-41306738.

Use) Regulations 1983. HHJ Joseph QC accepted the prosecution's argument that there was nothing in the authorities to the effect that something more than a strict liability or 'regulatory offence' is necessary to establish the base offence of unlawful act manslaughter. She therefore concluded that there was no prohibition in law on a prosecution for unlawful act manslaughter being based upon the offence found in s 91 of the 1988 Act.⁵⁰

Despite the existence of authorities to the contrary, as a matter of principle, it is submitted that the offence should be read restrictively and should be based on offences that require mens rea proper.⁵¹ Gross negligence manslaughter is more than broad enough to deal with cases in which deaths are caused in other culpable circumstances.

A further issue which then arises is whether if it is insufficient to construct a manslaughter charge on a base crime of mere negligence, it is acceptable to construct such a charge on a base crime of strict liability. The issue has not been directly addressed by the courts.⁵² In the case of Andrews,⁵³ D gave V, with her consent, an injection of insulin in order to give her a 'rush'. V, who was also voluntarily intoxicated at the time, died as a result of the injection of insulin. D appealed against his conviction on the basis that the judge was wrong to rule that he would direct the jury that V's consent to the injection did not render D's act lawful. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction, holding that ss 58(2)(b) and 67 of the Medicines Act 1968 made D's act unlawful because no consent could be pleaded to that offence. The fact that these offences are of strict liability was not challenged in the appeal.

14.1.1.6 Omissions as 'unlawful acts'

In Lowe,⁵⁴ the Court of Appeal held that D is not guilty of UAM simply on the ground that he has committed the offence under s 1(1) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 of neglecting his child so as to cause unnecessary suffering or injury to its health, and that neglect has caused death. The court disapproved Senior,⁵⁵ which, on similar facts, held that this was manslaughter. Lowe has now been overruled on its interpretation of the 1933 Act⁵⁶ but on this point Lowe and not Senior represents the law. Death had certainly been caused by unlawful and dangerous conduct, but the court distinguished between omission and commission:

if I strike a child in a manner likely to cause harm it is right that if that child dies I may be charged with manslaughter. If, however, I omit to do something with the result that it suffers injury to its health which results in its death, we think that a charge of manslaughter should not be an inevitable consequence even if the omission is deliberate.

If the omission is no more than an act of negligence then it is right that the doctrine of the unlawful and dangerous act does not apply and D is not guilty of UAM (but may be of gross negligence manslaughter); but if the omission is truly wilful—a deliberate omission to ⁵⁰ R v Alliston, Central Criminal Court, 17 Sept 2017.

⁵¹ It is for this reason that Meeking [2012] EWCA Crim 641 ought to be treated with considerable caution. In that case the unlawful act relied upon was the offence of endangering road users, contrary to s 22A(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. As Ashworth points out, [2013] Crim LR 333, this is an offence of negligence and for that reason D should not have been prosecuted with UAM. As the Court of Appeal observes, D could have been charged with gross negligence manslaughter instead.

⁵² For discussion, see Ormerod at [2003] Crim LR 477; M Dyson, 'The Smallest Fault in Manslaughter' [2017] 6 Arch Rev 4.

⁵³ [2002] EWCA Crim 3021. See the commentary by Ormerod at [2003] Crim LR 477.

⁵⁴ [1973] QB 702. See, generally, IH Dennis, 'Manslaughter by Omission' (1980) 33 CLP 255.

⁵⁵ [1899] 1 QB 283. On the difficulties of UAM in child abuse cases, see L Hoyano and C Keenan, Child Abuse Law and Policy (2007) 142.

⁵⁶ Sheppard [1981] AC 394, per Lord Edmund-Davies at 410.

summon medical aid, knowing it to be necessary—there seems to be no valid ground for the distinction.⁵⁷

14.1.1.7 Other limitations of the category of unlawfulness

It has been questioned whether: (a) an inchoate offence might suffice for the base crime and (b) whether the base crime must be one involving an offence to the person.

As for inchoate offences, attempted offences of violence would be the most obvious scenarios in which such an issue might arise. Consider D who intends to poison V and adds what he thinks to be poison to V's tea, but he has made a mistake and is simply adding a very concentrated sweetener. V is a diabetic and dies. There is probably no completed offence under s 23 of the OAPA 1861, but there is a possible attempted poisoning.⁵⁸ The issue does not appear to have arisen in any reported case. In Willoughby,⁵⁹ D had poured petrol around a building which he owned and which he planned to burn down and to claim the insurance money. D claimed that he was absent from the premises when a spark ignited the petrol and his associate who was assisting in spreading the petrol was killed. The conviction for manslaughter was upheld by the court, with the conclusion that the base offence was one of causing criminal damage to property being reckless as to whether life was endangered thereby, as the jury found. It is unclear if the question was raised whether D pouring petrol was a completed act of criminal damage, or one that was merely preparatory.⁶⁰

There are plenty of examples to suggest that the base crime need not be an offence against the person. Public order offences are capable of founding an unlawful act manslaughter charge. In Carey, the Court of Appeal held that there might be circumstances in which a verdict of UAM could properly be entered where the unlawful act was affray, although on the evidence that was not possible in that case.⁶¹ On the facts the Court of Appeal quashed convictions where D1, D2 and D3 had committed an affray and D1 had hit V, a 15-year-old, apparently healthy, girl. V ran 109 metres away from DD. She died as a result of a heart condition which had not been diagnosed. The only sufficient dangerous act perpetrated on V had been the physical strike by D1. The other acts and threats used in the course of the affray were not dangerous in the relevant sense as against V. The judge should therefore have withdrawn the charge of manslaughter based on those acts. It would, it is submitted, have been easier for the Crown to argue that DD had assaulted V; that was an unlawful act, it was dangerous, and her death arose from V's foreseeable and reasonable flight and there was no break in the chain of causation since they must 'take their victim' as they find her.

Convictions have been upheld where D's unlawful act constituted criminal damage (eg Goodfellow)⁶² and burglary (eg Watson (discussed later) and Kennedy).⁶³ In JF,⁶⁴ the arson committed in a derelict building in which homeless men were living was enough. In *Ball*⁶⁵ (discussed later), the court distinguished examples posed by D's counsel on the ground that, unlike the case before the court, they were of acts 'not directed at V' (but with respect, ⁵⁷ See editorial comment in [1976] Crim LR 529, where Andrew Ashworth is heavily critical.

⁵⁸ Arguably D would not be liable not because of the unlawfulness element, but because there would be no objective risk of injury from the act.

⁵⁹ [2004] EWCA Crim 3365, [2004] Crim LR 389.

⁶⁰ In such cases, a gross negligence charge might be difficult to substantiate.

⁶¹ [2006] EWCA Crim 17, [2006] Crim LR 842 and commentary.

⁶² (1986) 83 Cr App R 23.

⁶³ (1993) 15 Cr App R (S) 141 (burglar dropped a match used to illuminate search of house).

⁶⁴ [2015] EWCA Crim 351.

⁶⁵ The point of law certified for the House of Lords postulated 'an act [not directed against V] which is the substantial cause of the death' and the court left open the question whether D was guilty of manslaughter by gross negligence which it could scarcely have done if it was deciding that D did not cause death.

that is irrelevant). The court therefore expressed no opinion on the example of D 'storing goods known to be stolen; if unknown to him the goods contain unstable explosive which explodes killing another, is that manslaughter?' The answer must surely be no, unless the sober and reasonable observer would have known of the danger. There is something to be said in favour of imposing some limitation to the offence if it is to be retained. It does not seem appropriate that a person's guilt for homicide should depend on whether he was handling stolen goods or committing criminal damage or burglary. Cases of this sort would be better left to the next category of killing by gross negligence.⁶⁶

14.1.1.8 No requirement that the unlawful act be 'directed at' the victim?

For a period in the 1990s the cases seemed to require that the unlawful act was directed at the victim. That was based on a statement in Dalby,⁶⁷ where Waller LJ said that, 'where the charge of manslaughter is based on an unlawful and dangerous act, it must be an act directed at the victim and likely to cause immediate injury however slight'. In Goodfellow,⁶⁸ D's argument that he was not guilty of manslaughter because his act was not directed against V was rejected. D, wanting to move from his local authority housing and seeing no prospect of exchanging it, set it on fire, attempting to make it appear that the cause was a petrol bomb. V died in the fire. The court said that in Dalby, Waller LJ was 'intending to say that there must be no fresh intervening cause between the act and the death'. It is true that that case could, and probably should,⁶⁹ have been decided on this ground, but it does not seem to have been the ratio decidendi.⁷⁰ It is also true that the act of burglary which causes the death of the obviously frail householder is not directed at him, but it is accepted in Watson that it may be manslaughter.⁷¹ It now seems clear that there is no requirement that the unlawful act is directed at V.

14.1.2 Dangerousness

Until 1966, it was possible to argue that any unlawful act, other than a merely negligent act, causing death was manslaughter; but in that year in Church the Court of Criminal Appeal rejected such a view. Edmund-Davies J said:

For such a verdict inexorably to follow, the unlawful act must be such as all sober and reasonable people would inevitably recognize must^[72] subject the other person to, at least, the risk of some harm resulting therefrom, albeit not serious harm.⁷³ ⁶⁶ For a suggestion that the offence ought to be restricted to cases of 'attack' on another person, see C Clarkson, 'Context and Culpability in Involuntary Manslaughter: Principle or Instinct' in A Ashworth and B Mitchell (eds), Rethinking English Homicide Law (2000). The basis for this suggestion is that there is no wrong done by convicting D of a constructive crime of manslaughter because by attacking V, D has shifted his moral stance vis-à-vis V. Since the concept of 'attack' has no foundation in English law, the proposal may generate uncertainty. As Ashworth and Mitchell observe, asking whether it is enough to say that choosing to engage in violence means you make your own luck begs the question (ibid, 13). See also J Gardner, Offences and Defences (2007) Ch 12.

⁶⁷ [1982] 1 All ER 916.

⁶⁸ (1986) 83 Cr App R 23. The conviction was upheld on the grounds of both unlawful act and reckless manslaughter.

⁶⁹ Kennedy (No 1) [1999] 1 Cr App R 54. In Kennedy (No 2) [2005] EWCA Crim 685, it was rightly accepted that there was no requirement that the act be 'aimed' at V.

⁷⁰ See n 66. ⁷¹ [1989] Crim LR 730, CA.

⁷² The degree of risk entailed is not further elaborated. See R Sparks, 'The Elusive Element of Unlawfulness' (1965) 28 MLR 601.

⁷³ [1966] 1 QB 59 at 70. Cf R Buxton, 'By Any Unlawful Act' (1966) 82 LQR 174 suggesting that the law could return to a position whereby unlawful act manslaughter is restricted to cases where D intends to cause serious injury.

The test of dangerousness is objective. In Newbury, Lord Salmon stressed that ‘the test is not did the accused recognize that it was dangerous but would all sober and reasonable people recognize its danger’.

The test describes the kind of act which gives rise to liability for manslaughter, not the intention or foresight, real or assumed, of the accused. Hence, the enactment of s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967⁷⁴ had no effect on the law as stated in Church. The question is whether the sober and reasonable person would have appreciated that the act was dangerous in the light, not only of the circumstances actually known to the accused, but also of any additional circumstances of which that hypothetical person would have been aware.⁷⁵ There is, of course, a risk that in practice the fact that a death has occurred will be treated by the jury as conclusive evidence of the fact that the activity was dangerous. Judges’ directions need to caution against such simplistic reasoning.

If the victim has some peculiarity that is relevant if it would have been known to the sober and reasonable observer of the event, even if it was not known to the accused. This principle can be explained by comparing two cases. The burglary of a house in which V, a frail 87-year-old man resides, becomes a ‘dangerous’ act as soon as V’s frailty and great age would be apparent to the reasonable observer. The unlawful act continues through the ‘whole of the burglarious intrusion’ so that if V dies of a heart attack caused by D’s continuing in the burglary after it has become a dangerous, as well as unlawful, act, he will be guilty of manslaughter.⁷⁶ In contrast, where a petrol station attendant with a weak heart died in consequence of an attempted robbery where D was outside the station behind armour-plated glass, this was not manslaughter. The reasonable observer would not, at any point in the continuance of the robbery, have known of V’s peculiar susceptibility—the act was not ‘dangerous’.⁷⁷

In the recent case of JF,⁷⁸ F, aged 14, and E, aged 16, were convicted of manslaughter. They had entered a derelict building and set alight a duvet on a pile of tyres before fleeing the building. They were unaware that anyone was in the building. In fact several homeless men lived in the building, and one of the men died. F had a low IQ (his understanding was comparable to a six-year-old child). At trial they were convicted of unlawful act manslaughter on the basis of the act of simple arson, which a reasonable person would have foreseen might have caused someone some harm, and which did in fact cause death. They were acquitted of the less serious charge of aggravated arson which required proof that they had been reckless as to a life being endangered. The Court of Appeal upheld the convictions. The judge had directed the jury on the objective test as follows:

It is immaterial whether or not the defendant actually knew or actually realised that the act was dangerous in the sense I have defined it for you and whether or not he intended any harm to result therefrom. And the sober and reasonable man is endowed with the knowledge which the defendant possessed before and at the time of starting the fire.

⁷⁴ See p 131.

⁷⁵ Confirmed as being the correct approach by the Court of Appeal in Bristow [2013] EWCA Crim 1540, [2014] Crim LR 457.

⁷⁶ Watson [1989] 2 All ER 865, [1989] Crim LR 733. D’s conviction was quashed because causation was not established. V’s death may have been caused by the arrival of the emergency services. But did this predictable event break the chain of causation? Cf commentary [1989] Crim LR 734. If V has sustained a fatal shock before D has any opportunity to observe his frailty, D’s liability seems to depend on whether his acts after he had that opportunity (now ‘dangerous’ acts) contributed to the death.

⁷⁷ Dawson (1985) 81 Cr App R 150. Yet, before the Homicide Act 1957, this would have been murder (killing in the course or furtherance of a violent felony) and, according to one theory, Parliament’s provision that it was not murder left it manslaughter. See the 1st edition of this book, at pp 19–20. The theory has not taken root.

⁷⁸ [2015] EWCA Crim 351.

The Court of Appeal rejected the argument that the objective test as to whether the act was a dangerous one was a test which should have been adapted to take into account the appellant's ages and, in the case of the appellant F, his mental capacity. The court held that it was for Parliament to act if there was a desire for a change in the law.

It is worth underlining three aspects of the Church doctrine. First, that there must be a 'likelihood' of harm. This suggests more than a mere possibility, but not perhaps that harm is more probable than not. Secondly, that the type of harm involved is only 'some' harm, not serious harm. This contrasts with the requirement in gross negligence manslaughter of a serious and obvious risk of death. Thirdly, that there is no requirement that D himself foresees any risk of harm.⁷⁹ Historically, UAM was limited to cases in which the accused had at least foreseen injury of his victim resulting from his crime.⁸⁰ The *Fourth Report of HM Commissioners on Criminal Law*⁸¹ described the offence in terms of 'death result[ing] from any unlawful act or omission done or omitted with intent to hurt the person'.⁸² The decision in Church may have marked a significant deviation from the historical position. Buxton, writing extrajudicially, described it as a 'staggeringly severe ruling, and one which turns its back on the major part of the 19th century development of the law'.⁸³ There have been many suggestions to limit the offence to cases where D has committed an unlawful act likely to cause at least serious personal injury, and to restrict it further by a requirement that D intend or be reckless as to such.⁸⁴

14.1.2.1 'Dangerousness' in crimes committed by multiple accused

An interesting issue arose in Carey (discussed earlier) as to whether, in considering the 'dangerousness of an act', it is permissible to aggregate the conduct of co-accused. It is submitted that there is no difficulty in aggregating the threats of violence offered by D1, D2 and D3 where they acted together for the purposes of ascertaining whether there was a crime of a sufficiently dangerous nature to satisfy the Church test. If D1 is waving a machete around and D2 is shaking his fist at V, their affray comprises their combined conduct. Likewise, the dangerousness of the acts is properly assessed by looking at the combination of their conduct. Nor, it is submitted, is there a problem in aggregating the conduct of D1, D2 and D3 towards V1 and V2. Take a case where, in the course of a robbery, D1 issues serious threats against V1 and D2 issues threats to V2, and the obviously frail V2 died from a heart attack induced by the shock. It is submitted that the actions of D1 and D2 could be aggregated in determining whether the conduct was sufficiently 'dangerous' in the sense required by Church.⁸⁵

⁷⁹ Reiterated by the Court of Appeal in M(J) [2012] EWCA Crim 2293, [20]. There is no requirement for D to foresee any harm let alone the type of harm V suffers.

⁸⁰ The case law bears examples, including Sullivan (1836) 7 C & P 641, where removing the trap-stick from a cart was sufficient to ground liability as D foresaw the risk of some harm arising.

⁸¹ (1839); see Russell, 588.

⁸² ibid, 589.

⁸³ See n 73.

⁸⁴ See also the Draft Scots Criminal Code, cl 38. A further attempt to narrow the offence was rejected by the Court of Appeal in M(J) [2012] EWCA Crim 2293. The Crown appealed against the judge's ruling that D could not be guilty unless 'the victim died as a result of the sort of physical harm that any reasonable and sober person would inevitably realise the unlawful act in question risked causing'. The Court of Appeal held that this placed 'a gloss on the ingredients of this offence which is not justified by the authorities and does not follow from the reasoning' (at [18]) and allowed the Crown's appeal. See Ashworth [2013] Crim LR 335.

⁸⁵ Difficulties may arise in terms of different jurors concluding that the danger emanated from one defendant rather than the other. See the discussion in Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 496.

14.1.2.2 Fright, shock and harm as dangerous acts?

Psychiatric injury is now acknowledged to be actual bodily harm,⁸⁶ but it would be hard to prove that the risk of such harm would inevitably be recognized by all sober and reasonable people, especially as the law requires expert evidence to prove it. Fright and shock do not amount to 'actual bodily harm' but it does not necessarily follow that they are not 'harm' for the purposes of constructive manslaughter. In Reid,⁸⁷ Lawton LJ, upholding a conviction for manslaughter, said that 'the very least kind of harm is causing fright by threats'—in that case, by the use of firearms—but he was discussing the mental element of an accessory rather than the nature of the act, which is our present concern. The act was, in the opinion of the court, likely to cause death or serious injury and therefore was certainly 'dangerous'. In Dawson,⁸⁸ the court assumed without deciding that in the context of manslaughter 'harm' includes 'injury to the person through the operation of shock emanating from fright'. So it seems that it is not enough that the act is likely to frighten. It must be likely to cause such shock as to result in injury.⁸⁹

Confusion was also caused by Lord Denning's dictum in the civil case of Gray v Barr,⁹⁰ which was criticized by Lord Salmon in Newbury.⁹¹ Lord Denning said: 'the accused must do a dangerous act with the intention of frightening or harming someone or with realisation that it is likely to frighten or harm someone'. This is simply to require the mens rea of assault or battery. However, an act which is intended or known to be likely to frighten is not necessarily a 'dangerous' act; and whether it is dangerous is a question to be answered by an objective test. The dictum is correct if it is confined to the case where the unlawful act relied on is assault or battery.

In Dhaliwal,⁹² D had struck his partner a minor blow and she had then committed suicide. This was against a history of domestic abuse amounting to psychological but not psychiatric injury by D. It was held that the infliction of mere psychological harm would not suffice to construct a manslaughter charge. The prosecution sought to rely for the relevant unlawful and dangerous act on D's conduct which caused psychological injury to V. The trial judge in his 'meticulous' judgment, and the Court of Appeal in turn, rejected this approach. It would have required an extension to the definition of grievous bodily harm. Chan-Fook and Burstow make it clear that psychiatric illness may amount to actual or indeed grievous bodily harm.⁹³ However, it is also clear that the Court of Appeal and House of Lords in those cases were not prepared to extend the definition of bodily harm to include emotional distress or any condition less than a 'recognisable psychiatric injury'. Attempts to dilute the definition further would exacerbate the already considerable problems of certainty in definition and proof.⁹⁴ However, in an obiter dictum, the Court of Appeal in *Dhaliwal*⁹⁵ left open the possibility that a manslaughter conviction might be available:

⁸⁶ Chan-Fook, p 688. ⁸⁷ (1975) 62 Cr App R 109 at 112.

⁸⁸ (1985) 81 Cr App R 150 at 155.

⁸⁹ See M Stallworthy, 'Can Death by Shock be Manslaughter?' (1986) 136 NLJ 51; A Busuttill and A McCall Smith, 'Fright, Stress and Homicide' (1990) 54 J Crim L 257.

⁹⁰ [1971] 2 QB 554 at 568, p 41. Lord Denning's emphasis.

⁹¹ [1977] AC 500. Cf Blackstone, Commentaries, i, 109.

⁹² [2006] EWCA Crim 1139.

⁹³ Expert evidence will be needed to prove the condition and that D caused it: Morris [1998] 1 Cr App R 386.

⁹⁴ Under the Offences Against the Person Bill (Home Office, Reforming the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 (1998)) the definition of injury includes mental injury which encompasses any impairment of a person's mental health. See also LC 361, Reform of Offences Against the Person (2015) para 2.32.

⁹⁵ [2006] EWCA Crim 1139, [2006] Crim LR 923.

where a decision to commit suicide has been triggered by a physical assault which represents the culmination of a course of abusive conduct, it would be possible . . . to argue that the final assault played a significant part in causing the victim's death.⁹⁶

14.1.3 Causing death

The principles of causation discussed in Ch 2 are applicable. The unlawful and dangerous act must cause death. Causation often gives rise to problems in UAM cases where there is frequently a factor other than D's unlawful dangerous act which plays a causal role in V's death. In the case of Johnstone,⁹⁷ for example, it could not be established that D's unlawful injury to V, fracturing his cheek and being abusive, had triggered the most direct cause of V's death which was a heart attack.⁹⁸

14.1.3.1 Fright and flight cases

The question for the court is always: if there is a sufficient dangerous act, did that unlawful and dangerous act cause death? In some cases where D has performed a number of acts it depends which dangerous act is relied on. The tests to be applied are discussed in Ch 2. In short, the victim's conduct in trying to escape D will not break the chain of causation if it is 'reasonably foreseeable'.⁹⁹ Another variation which has developed is that V's conduct will break the chain if it is beyond a range of responses which might be regarded as reasonable, given the threat posed by D and V's circumstances.¹⁰⁰ In evaluating the reasonableness of the response the jury are to have regard to V's circumstances. In Lewis,¹⁰¹ D was convicted of UAM having chased V into the road, where V was hit and killed by an oncoming car. The judge directed the jury to consider whether V running away from D was one of the responses which might have been expected from someone who found himself in V's situation. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. In cases of death during flight from an unlawful act it had to be shown that there was cause and effect; that is, but for the unlawful act, flight and therefore death would not have taken place: Williams.¹⁰² The court suggested that it would be appropriate to direct the jury to consider whether V's response was 'wholly disproportionate' or a 'daft response' to the nature of the threat posed by D.

14.1.3.2 Causation in drug supply cases

After a number of years in which the Court of Appeal created confusion in this area, the orthodox approach to causation was reasserted by the House of Lords in Kennedy (No 2).¹⁰³ It was held that where D provides V with a syringe for immediate injection in the case of a fully informed and responsible adult V, it is 'never' appropriate to find D guilty of UAM. The criminal law generally assumes the existence of free will.¹⁰⁴ In its remarkably short unanimous judgment delivered by Lord Bingham, the House concluded that the Court of Appeal had been in error repeatedly in recent years in imposing liability in such cases.¹⁰⁵ There was ⁹⁶ See further, J Horder and L McGowan, 'Manslaughter by Causing Another's Suicide' [2006] Crim LR 1035, arguing that in an abusive relationship case V would not be a free actor, and that general gross negligence manslaughter ought to be relied on.

⁹⁷ [2007] EWCA Crim 3133.

⁹⁸ See also Warburton [2006] EWCA Crim 627; Fitzgerald [2006] EWCA Crim 1655 (D, during a burglary, pushed 92-year-old V, injuring her, and she died later in hospital of pneumonia).

⁹⁹ Roberts (1971) Cr App R 95.

¹⁰⁰ Williams (1991) 95 Cr App R 1.

¹⁰¹ [2010] EWCA Crim 151.

¹⁰² (1991) 95 Cr App R 1.

¹⁰³ Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38; see generally W Wilson, 'Dealing With Drug Induced Homicide' in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Deaths.

¹⁰⁴ At [14].

¹⁰⁵ [2007] UKHL 38, [2008] 1 AC 269. Cf Keen [2008] 1 Cr App R (S) 8.

no doubt that D committed an unlawful and criminal act by supplying the heroin to V. But that act of supplying, without more, could not harm V in any physical way, let alone cause his death. The crucial question was not whether D facilitated or contributed to administration of the noxious thing by supplying V but whether he went further and 'administered' it, that is, completed the offence under s 23 of the OAPA 1861. *Rogers*¹⁰⁶ was wrongly decided in concluding that where D assisted V by holding the tourniquet he had administered to V and could be liable for his death.¹⁰⁷

14.1.3.3 Suicide

Homicide convictions have been upheld in a series of cases in which V has effectively committed suicide consequent upon being injured by D, but in each the decision was based on the fact that the injury inflicted by D was still an operating and substantial cause of the death, as, for example, in Blaue.¹⁰⁸ Similarly, in Dear,¹⁰⁹ the wounds inflicted by D were a continuing and substantial cause of death when V reopened them and bled to death. Similarly, in People v Lewis,¹¹⁰ the conviction for murder was upheld where V had cut his throat to hasten his death when languishing from a gunshot wound inflicted by D, but again the decision was based on the gunshot wound being a substantial and operating cause.

Can D ever be liable for UAM where V has committed suicide and D's unlawful dangerous act is not at that moment of the suicide a continuing and operative cause of death? What if V jumps from a tower block fearing that D might be about to inflict an attack in physical terms? What of an abused spouse who takes her own life being in fear of D's continued psychological abuse?

If D has inflicted an injury, the question is whether that remains an operative cause of death. If V is seeking to escape the infliction (or further infliction) of injury by D the test to be applied is that from the flight cases discussed earlier: is V's act a proportionate one or a reasonably foreseeable one given the threat faced? That would cause the court to ask: can suicide ever be a reasonably foreseeable response to violence or further psychological harm? To adopt the language from Williams and Lewis discussed previously, that would mean asking: can suicide ever be within a range of reasonable responses to a threat of such harm? In Dhaliwal, the Court of Appeal gives obiter support to a suggestion that an unlawful and dangerous act (eg an assault) may be enough for a manslaughter conviction where the victim was of a 'fragile and vulnerable personality'.¹¹¹ There was no reference to any of the case law or issues in the discussion in this paragraph, and it is submitted that the Court of Appeal's obiter dictum ought to be treated with considerable caution.¹¹²

Where D's act is still a substantial and operative cause in the sense that the injury is persisting and V commits suicide to avoid further suffering, it is submitted that it is open to a jury to decide that V's act is a reasonably foreseeable and proportionate response (depending on the suffering) and hence not 'daft' and therefore not a break in the chain of causation.

¹⁰⁶ [2003] 1 WLR 1374.

¹⁰⁷ ibid, [31]. In Burgess [2008] EWCA Crim 516, the court considered convictions secured pre-Kennedy (No 2) where D had laid the tip of the needle against the vein for V. It was held that the fact that V depresses the plunger does not automatically entitle D to an acquittal. Cf the position in Scotland where Kennedy (No 2) was rejected: MacAngus and Kane v HM Advocate [2009] HCJAC 8.

¹⁰⁸ (1975) 61 Cr App R 271.

¹⁰⁹ [1996] Crim LR 595.

¹¹⁰ 124 Cal 551 (1899).

¹¹¹ A Bill was introduced into Parliament to criminalize causing suicide, Hansard, HC Debates, 18 Dec 2006. It was not enacted.

¹¹² cf J Horder and L McGowan, 'Manslaughter by Causing Another's Suicide' [2006] Crim LR 1035.

In *W*¹¹³ the Court of Appeal confirmed that the suicide of the victim will not necessarily break the chain of causation. In this case, V was left severely disfigured, permanently paralysed, and in a state of unbearable physical and psychological suffering as a result of injuries alleged to have been inflicted by D. V travelled home to Belgium, where euthanasia is lawful, and was euthanized by doctors in accordance with Belgian law. The Court of Appeal held that it was open to a jury to conclude that neither the acts of V in taking the decision to be euthanized nor the acts of the doctors in Belgium in carrying out his wishes broke the chain of causation. The judgment of the Court of Appeal confirms that, provided the jury concludes that the victim's act was a reasonably foreseeable response to the injuries inflicted by the defendant, there will be no break in the chain of causation between the defendant's unlawful act and the victim's death. This will remain the case even if the victim commits suicide. The defendant can therefore be guilty not only of manslaughter, but also of murder if he has the requisite mens rea.

14.2 Gross negligence manslaughter

The offence of gross negligence manslaughter has been the subject of considerable interest and controversy. It is the subject of numerous recent appeals. In the judgment in Rose, Sir Brian Leveson P authoritatively stated the terms of the offence as follows:

- (1) The offence of gross negligence manslaughter requires breach of an existing duty of care which it is reasonably foreseeable gives rise to a serious and obvious risk of death and does, in fact, cause death in circumstances where, having regard to the risk of death, the conduct of the defendant was so bad in all the circumstances as to go beyond the requirement of compensation but to amount to a criminal act or omission.
- (2) There are, therefore, five elements which the prosecution must prove in order for a person to be guilty of an offence of manslaughter by gross negligence:
 - (a) the defendant owed an existing duty of care to the victim;
 - (b) the defendant negligently breached that duty of care;
 - (c) it was reasonably foreseeable that the breach of that duty gave rise to a serious and obvious risk of death;
 - (d) the breach of that duty caused the death of the victim;
 - (e) the circumstances of the breach were truly exceptionally bad and so reprehensible as to justify the conclusion that it amounted to gross negligence and required criminal sanction.
- (3) The question of whether there is a serious and obvious risk of death must exist at, and is to be assessed with respect to, knowledge at the time of the breach of duty.
- (4) A recognisable risk of something serious is not the same as a recognisable risk of death.
- (5) A mere possibility that an assessment might reveal something life-threatening is not the same as an obvious risk of death: an obvious risk is a present risk which is clear and unambiguous, not one which might become apparent on further investigation.¹¹⁴

This test is based on the decision of the House of Lords in Adomako.¹¹⁵ In that landmark decision the House of Lords rejected the argument that gross negligence manslaughter required proof of objective recklessness as to death, as had been held in one House of ¹¹³ [2018] EWCA Crim 690.

¹¹⁴ [2017] EWCA Crim 1168, [77].

¹¹⁵ [1994] 3 All ER 79, [1994] Crim LR 757.

Lords' case.¹¹⁶ The House reasserted the approach of Lord Hewart CJ in Bateman that the crime turns on whether, in the opinion of the jury, the negligence of the accused went beyond a mere matter of compensation between subjects and showed such disregard for the life and safety of others as to amount to a crime against the State and conduct deserving of punishment.¹¹⁷

14.2.1 Adomako in the Court of Appeal

In three appeals considered together in Prentice (Holloway and Adomako), the Court of Appeal sought to restrict the objective recklessness to cases of 'motor manslaughter'—causing death by driving a motor vehicle.¹¹⁸ Prentice and Holloway's appeals were allowed. Adomako's appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal and by the House of Lords.

In Prentice, doctors had administered an injection which created an obvious risk of causing death and in fact did so. The jury were directed in accordance with objective recklessness that the doctors were guilty if they never gave thought to the possibility of there being any such risk. The Court of Appeal held that the question should have been whether their failure to ascertain and use the correct method of administering the drug was 'grossly negligent to the point of criminality'. In Holloway, D, an electrician, had given no thought to the obvious risk of death created by the way he installed the electric element of a central heating system. Applying the objective recklessness test, D would be convicted but the Court of Appeal held that that was the wrong test: the further question should have been asked, whether it was grossly negligent to have such a state of mind.

In Adomako, D, an anaesthetist, failed to notice that the tube supplying oxygen to a patient had become detached. According to expert evidence, any competent anaesthetist would have recognized this immediately. The judge directed the jury that a high degree of negligence was required. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction as this was the appropriate test to apply, and the appellant appealed to the House of Lords.

14.2.2 The House of Lords' decision in Adomako

The House held that:¹¹⁹

- (1) there is no separate offence of motor manslaughter. As Lord Atkin said in Andrews, 'The principle to be observed is that cases of manslaughter in driving motor cars are but instances of a general rule applicable to all charges of homicide by negligence';¹²⁰
- (2) there is no manslaughter by objective recklessness, in effect, though not formally, overruling Seymour. It would now be wrong to direct a jury on any charge of manslaughter in terms of objective recklessness (since the decision in G overruling Caldwell, it would be unthinkable to apply that test);¹²¹

¹¹⁶ [1983] 2 AC 493. See PA Ashall, 'Manslaughter: The Impact of Caldwell' [1984] Crim LR 467; A Briggs, 'In Defence of Manslaughter' [1983] Crim LR 764; G Syrota, 'Mens Rea in Gross Negligence Manslaughter' [1983] Crim LR 776.

¹¹⁷ (1925) 19 Cr App R 8 at 11.

¹¹⁸ See G Williams, 'Misadventures of Manslaughter' (1993) 153 NLJ 1413.

¹¹⁹ See commentary at [1994] Crim LR 757 and S Gardner, 'Manslaughter by Gross Negligence' (1995) 111 LQR 22. On the safety of convictions based on recklessness, see Morgan [2007] EWCA Crim 3313.

¹²⁰ See generally ID Brownlee and M Seneviratne, 'Killing with Cars After Adomako: Time for Some Alternatives' [1995] Crim LR 389. See also Brown [2005] UKPC 18.

¹²¹ For a clear review of the development of fault in manslaughter from gross negligence, through forms of recklessness and back to gross negligence, see J Stannard, 'From Andrews to Seymour and Back Again' (1996) 47 NILQ 1.

- (3) there is now a single, 'simple' test of gross negligence. D must have been in breach of a duty of care under the ordinary principles of negligence; the negligence must have caused death; and it must, in the opinion of the jury, amount to gross negligence. The question, 'supremely a jury question', is:

having regard to the risk of death involved, [was] the conduct of the defendant . . . so bad in all the circumstances as to amount in [the jury's judgement] to a criminal act or omission?

Before examining the elements of the test in detail, it is necessary to point out that trials for gross negligence manslaughter often involve a great deal of expert evidence. Usually this evidence relates to whether D breached the duty of care he owed to V and whether the breach of duty was grossly negligent. The Court of Appeal emphasized in Sellu that despite the fact evidence of this nature will be crucial to the jury's assessment of whether D committed the offence, the experts cannot be permitted to undermine the role of the jury as the ultimate arbiter of guilt.¹²²

14.2.3 A duty of care

The most obvious categories of duty in which liability might arise are those involving doctor and patient,¹²³ optometrist and patient,¹²⁴ transport carrier and passenger,¹²⁵ employer and employee,¹²⁶ parent and child,¹²⁷ landlord and tenant,¹²⁸ restaurateur and customer,¹²⁹ etc but the categories are limitless and involve duties arising in the course of hazardous activity (eg on the road,¹³⁰ smuggling illegal immigrants,¹³¹ smuggling cocaine,¹³² taking heroin,¹³³

¹²² Sellu [2016] EWCA Crim 1716, [142]. His lordship cited Lord Kerr's opinion for the Board in Pora v The Queen [2015] UKPC 9.

¹²³ See Adomako itself; Misra [2004] EWCA Crim 2375, [2005] Crim LR 234 and R Ferner, 'Medication Errors that Led to Manslaughter Charges' (2000) 321 BMJ 1212; RE Ferner and SE McDowell, 'Doctors Charged with Manslaughter in the Course of Medical Practice 1795–2005: A Literature Review' (2006) 99 J Royal Society of Medicine 309; O Quick, 'Prosecuting Gross Medical Negligence' (2006) 33 J Law Soc 421; M Childs, 'Medical Manslaughter and Corporate Liability' (1999) 19 LS 316. See also O Quick, 'Medical Killing: Need for a Special Offence' in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death, arguing that medical professionals do not deserve to be charged under the category of manslaughter based on gross negligence, but one based on recklessness. See his similar argument in 'Medical Manslaughter: The Rise and Replacement of a Contested Issue' in C Erin and S Ost (eds), The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007). See also in that volume the essay by M Brazier and N Allen 'Criminalising Medical Malpractice'. For a discussion of the issues that arise when sentencing doctors who are convicted of gross negligence manslaughter, see H Quirk, 'Sentencing White Coat Crime: The Need for Guidance in Medical Manslaughter Cases' [2013] Crim LR 871.

¹²⁴ Rose [2017] EWCA Crim 1168.

¹²⁵ See Litchfield [1998] Crim LR 507 (schooner); Barker [2003] 2 Cr App R (S) 22; McGee [2013] EWCA Crim 1012.

¹²⁶ R v DPP, ex p Jones [2000] IRLR 373; Dean [2002] EWCA Crim 2410; Clothier [2004] EWCA Crim 2629; Crow [2001] EWCA Crim 2968. For an analysis of the extent to which employers owe their employees a duty of care, see S Antrobus, 'The Criminal Liability of Directors for Health and Safety Breaches and Manslaughter' [2013] Crim LR 309.

¹²⁷ Reeves [2012] EWCA Crim 2613.

¹²⁸ Harrison [2011] EWCA Crim 3139.

¹²⁹ Zaman [2017] EWCA Crim 1783.

¹³⁰ Including a pedestrian killing a motorcyclist by being knocked down: Devine [1999] 2 Cr App R (S) 409.

¹³¹ Wacker [2002] EWCA Crim 1944, [2003] Crim LR 108.

¹³² See news reports for 14 Aug 2010 reporting conviction of Mr Newman. N had smuggled cocaine in concentrated form in a bottle of rum. V, who had been given the bottle, was unaware of the content, drank some and died.

¹³³ Ruffell [2003] Cr App R (S) 53; Parfeni [2003] EWCA Crim 159 (although this must surely have been a case of unlawful act manslaughter by D injecting V with heroin in order to steal from him).

storing fireworks,¹³⁴ minding a firearm¹³⁵), or duties arising from relationships (eg failing to seek medical assistance for a spouse or someone to whose danger D has contributed).¹³⁶

It is impossible to catalogue all circumstances in which a duty will arise; rather, the approach is to apply the 'ordinary principles of negligence' to determine whether the defendant owed a duty to the victim. So, for example, in Yaqoob,¹³⁷ D was a manager of a minicab firm and he had failed to inspect the tyres of a minibus involved in a fatal accident. It was held that it was open to the jury to find that there was a duty to inspect and maintain beyond that required for an MOT test, council inspections and other duties imposed by regulation. Moreover, the jury did not require expert evidence to assess that duty.¹³⁸

In cases of positive acts, it is relatively easy to identify whether there was a duty based on whether the acts created a risk of death which was obvious to the ordinary prudent individual. In cases of omission, much greater care needs to be exercised as there will be situations in which a risk of death would be obvious, but where D has no duty—as with D witnessing a blind stranger walking towards a cliff. No doubt the courts will be prepared in many cases to recognize a duty arising from a combination of circumstances.¹³⁹ In Willoughby,¹⁴⁰ for example, D had, with V, spread petrol around D's property with the intention of burning it down to claim on the insurance. V died when the petrol ignited. The Court of Appeal concluded that D's ownership per se did not give rise to a duty, but because D engaged the deceased to participate in spreading petrol, and with a view to setting fire to D's premises for D's benefit, a duty existed.

The courts have been willing to take an expansive interpretation of the scope of the duty where that appears appropriate on policy grounds. In Evans,¹⁴¹ D was convicted of gross negligence manslaughter having supplied heroin to her half-sister V (a recovering addict). V self-administered the drug in the house with D and her mother (who was also convicted of manslaughter). D noticed that V looked as if she had overdosed, a condition D was familiar with. D, fearful of attracting the attention of the police, chose not to seek medical assistance and V died. The jury was directed that without D's involvement in the supply of heroin, there was no duty on D to act, even after she became aware of the serious adverse effect on V of the drug-taking. They were directed that if D was involved in supply, that fact, taken with the other undisputed facts, would and did give rise to a duty on D to act. On appeal, a five-member Court of Appeal held that having regard to the authorities on gross negligence manslaughter, it was an essential requirement of any potential basis for conviction that D was under a duty to act. The duty necessary to found gross negligence was plainly not confined to cases of a familial or professional relationship between the defendant and the deceased. For the purposes of gross negligence, a duty could arise if, inter alia, D had created or contributed to the creation of a state of affairs (V's danger) which D knew, or ought reasonably to have known, had become life-threatening. The duty on D was to act by taking reasonable steps to save the other's life by calling medical assistance. This is a controversial decision.¹⁴²

¹³⁴ Winter and Winter [2010] EWCA Crim 1474.

¹³⁵ S [2015] EWCA Crim 558, [2015] Crim LR 553.

¹³⁶ Hood [2004] 1 Cr App R (S) 73. See also Sogunro [1997] 2 Cr App R (S) 89 (starving V believing her to be possessed) and see Evans, n 141. See also the sentencing case of Barrass [2011] EWCA Crim 2629 in which D pleaded guilty to the gross negligence manslaughter of his sister. It is unclear from the judgment whether the duty arose because of the familial relationship or because V was dependent upon D.

¹³⁷ [2005] EWCA Crim 2169.

¹³⁸ Oughton [2010] EWCA Crim 1540.

¹³⁹ As in the cases of omission, especially in Stone and Dobinson [1977] QB 354 in which the duty arose from the cohabitation, blood relationship and voluntary assumption of responsibility.

¹⁴⁰ [2005] Crim LR 383.

¹⁴¹ [2009] EWCA Crim 650.

¹⁴² There are other reported instances of drug suppliers being convicted on this basis. For an example, see Phillips [2013] EWCA Crim 358.

From where does the duty on D derive? A duty might be thought to arise at the time of and from the mere act of supply. That is not the law. Following the decision of the House of Lords in Kennedy (No 2),¹⁴³ D cannot be convicted of unlawful act manslaughter on the basis of the act of supply to V who self-administers the drugs. D cannot be guilty of unlawful act manslaughter because if V is a free, informed, voluntary actor he breaks the chain of causation between D's unlawful act of supply and the resulting death.¹⁴⁴ If on such facts the prosecution was for gross negligence manslaughter, the same problem would arise: the mere act of supply will not, it is submitted, be sufficient to establish liability for manslaughter when V self-administers in a free, informed manner and dies. Although D might be said to owe a duty, have breached it and for there to have been a risk of death, the difficulty is that V's free, informed, voluntary act of self-administration breaks the chain of causation (as in cases of unlawful act manslaughter under Kennedy (No 2)).¹⁴⁵ Dealers who supply to their users to self-inject are not liable for manslaughter—at least provided the dealer does not stay with the user and witness the user becoming ill.

The duty arises, the court held in Evans, at the point in time when D realized or ought to have realized that V was suffering life-threatening illness. The duty arises at that time because D created or contributed to the creation of the life-threatening situation. This conclusion was reached by an extended application of the decision in Miller. In that case D was liable for criminal damage when, having fallen asleep with a lit cigarette, he awoke, realized his accidental conduct had created a danger but did not take reasonable steps to prevent further harm arising.¹⁴⁶ In this case the defendants had deliberately supplied the drugs, but V had self-injected. How, applying Miller in this extended form, can D be said to be under a duty of care given V's free, informed act to take the drugs? If D has not caused V's death when V self-injects (Kennedy), how can D have caused V to become ill when V has self-injected and therefore how can D owe a duty when V does become ill? The answer lies in the fact that the Court of Appeal used the broader expression 'created or contributed'.¹⁴⁷ A court may, it is submitted, conclude that a duty arises, applying that test, when D became aware (or ought to have become aware) of V's dangerous illness and either: (a) he was concerned in the supply to V; (b) D was in a pre-existing relationship with V (parent, carer, etc) which persists irrespective of V's self-administration (eg the husband of a woman who has self-injected and who realizes or ought to have realized that she is having breathing difficulty); (c) because D and V were engaged in a dangerous joint enterprise which went wrong;¹⁴⁸ or (d) where D has voluntarily assumed a duty to care for V who is in such a state¹⁴⁹ (eg where V becomes dependent on D's assistance as where D starts to care for V, who has overdosed

¹⁴³ [2008] 1 AC 269.

¹⁴⁴ There will be rare instances in which D is engaged in the act of injection to such an extent as to be liable for unlawful act manslaughter: Burgess [2008] EWCA Crim 516, p 75.

¹⁴⁵ In Evans, the Court of Appeal emphasized that 'The question in this appeal is not whether the appellant may be guilty of manslaughter for having been concerned in the supply of the heroin which caused the deceased's death.' Emphasis added.

¹⁴⁶ Although Miller was charged with criminal damage which at that time was satisfied by proof of objective recklessness, the House of Lords held that his duty only arose on his subjective realization of the danger. Gross negligence manslaughter is also a crime based on objective fault, but in Evans the court holds that the duty arises when D realizes or ought to have realized the danger.

¹⁴⁷ See for criticism, Glenys Williams [2009] Crim LR 631 and J Rogers [2009] 6 Arch News 6. The court's response might well be that V's free, deliberate, informed act might break the chain of causation if it was alleged that D's breach by supply per se caused V's death, but V's acts of supply do not become irrelevant when considering whether D contributed to the danger V now faces.

¹⁴⁸ See W Wilson, Criminal Law Theory and Doctrine (2008) 87.

¹⁴⁹ The court in Evans does not rule out this final possibility of duty in drug administration cases although it did not arise on the facts, at [36]. Arguably this is the basis for the decision in Ruffell [2003] 2 Cr App R (S) 53.

at a party by moving him from one room to a more secluded space, but then abandons him, leaving V worse off as he is less likely to be seen and rescued by others).

The decision has been heavily criticized but, in policy terms, it might be asked when someone has died, what is wrong with looking to the conduct of those who contributed in some way to the danger if they also did not take reasonable steps to alleviate the danger when aware of it? To take an example unencumbered by the policy considerations of the drug supply cases, consider an electrician, D, who leaves half-completed wiring creating a risk of death and V makes an informed choice to use the electrical equipment, aware of its hazardous status. If V is in the process of being electrocuted and D realizes that, surely D has a duty to act responsibly to avoid a life-threatening situation to which he has contributed. Why should a failure at least to seek help on realizing V has been electrocuted not be considered manslaughter if the jury determines the breach sufficiently 'gross'?¹⁵⁰

The duty question in gross negligence should, according to Lord MacKay in Adomako, be founded on the 'ordinary principles of negligence'. However, this should not be regarded as incorporating all of the technicalities of the tort of negligence into the gross negligence offence. Thus, in Wacker,¹⁵¹ it was held that where D had smuggled 60 illegal immigrants into the UK and 58 had died of suffocation owing to his having shut the air vent in their container, he could not displace the duty by relying on the victims' being jointly engaged with him in a criminal enterprise—that is, a plea of ex turpi causa.¹⁵²

The courts are clearly anxious to retain a degree of simplicity in this element of the offence which must be put before the jury. On some occasions the criminal courts seem readily to accept the existence of a civil law duty. In the case of Winter and Winter,¹⁵³ for example, MW and NW were convicted of manslaughter by gross negligence having stored fireworks of an extremely hazardous nature, in breach of their licence, in a container on a farm. A large explosion occurred, killing the fire service's civilian media awareness officer (V), who had been filming the fire for training purposes. V had ignored instructions to keep back from the container. The judge ruled that MW and NW owed a duty to take proper care in the storage and handling of explosives and that that duty was owed to all persons who were on the site or in the surrounding vicinity. The Court of Appeal held that it was reasonably foreseeable that civilian employees of the fire service might come on to and close to the site of a fire in order to film or photograph a fire.¹⁵⁴

Until relatively recently, confusion reigned over whether the duty issue involved a pure question of law to be determined by the judge,¹⁵⁵ or whether the judge was to rule on whether there was evidence capable of establishing a duty, in which case that was to be left to be determined by the jury.¹⁵⁶ The matter has finally been resolved in *Evans*¹⁵⁷ in which ¹⁵⁰ An issue might arise as to whether D discharged the duty of care despite the fact that he failed to summon assistance. The facts of Phillips [2013] EWCA Crim 358 are instructive. D became aware that V was suffering from the effects of an overdose, but instead of summoning help, administered adrenaline. The Court of Appeal stated that 'the "gross negligence" alleged therefore was the appellant's failure to act once he knew that [V]'s life was in danger'. D did not fail to act, however. It is important not to lose sight of the fact that the jury must be sure that there was a breach of duty, taking into consideration any steps D took to mitigate the life-threatening situation.

¹⁵¹ [2003] QB 1203, [2003] Crim LR 108 and commentary. Cf Scots law, Transco plc v HM Advocate 2004 SLT 41.

¹⁵² cf the statutory recognition in relation to corporate manslaughter (see later).

¹⁵³ Winter and Winter [2010] EWCA Crim 1474.

¹⁵⁴ It was held that V's failure to comply with instructions might be relevant to the issue of causation and, in civil cases, to the issue of causation, volenti and contributory negligence. It was not arguable in the instant case that any failure to comply with instructions had the consequence that no duty of care was owed to V.

¹⁵⁵ Gurphal Singh [1999] Crim LR 582.

¹⁵⁶ Khan [1998] Crim LR 830; Sinclair (1998) unreported.

¹⁵⁷ [2009] EWCA Crim 650. The court approved the commentary in Willoughby [2004] EWCA Crim 3365, [2005] Crim LR 389. On alternative interpretations that might have drawn from tort law, see J Herring and E Palser, 'A Duty of Care in Gross Negligence Manslaughter' [2007] Crim LR 24.

the Court of Appeal held ‘that whether a duty of care exists is a matter for the jury once the judge has decided that there is evidence capable of establishing a duty’. The court stated:¹⁵⁸

In some cases, such as those arising from a doctor/patient relationship where the existence of the duty is not in dispute, the Judge may well direct the jury that a duty of care exists. Such a direction would be proper. But if, for example, the doctor were on holiday at the material time, and the deceased asked a casual question over a drink, it may very well be that the question whether a doctor/patient relationship existed, and accordingly whether a duty of care arose, would be in dispute. In any cases where the issue is in dispute, and therefore in more complex cases, and assuming that the Judge has found that it would be open to the jury to find that there was a duty of care, or a duty to act, the jury should be directed that if facts A + B and/or C or D are established, then in law a duty will arise, but if facts X or Y or Z were present, the duty would be negated. In this sense, of course, the jury is deciding whether the duty situation has been established. In our judgment this is the way in which Willoughby should be understood and, understood in this way, no potential problems arising from art.6 and art.7 of the ECHR are engaged.

14.2.4 Breach of duty

The breach can be by positive act or by omission.¹⁵⁹

14.2.5 Risk of death

The proposition in Adomako refers to a risk of death, a point emphasized in Gurphal Singh.¹⁶⁰ If we are to have an offence of homicide by gross negligence at all, it seems right that it should be so limited.¹⁶¹ The circumstances must be such that a reasonably prudent person would have foreseen a serious risk, not merely of injury, even serious injury, but of death. The Court of Appeal confirmed this narrower interpretation in Misra.¹⁶² As a matter of policy, the CPS will not prosecute on evidence of anything less. In Yaqoob (discussed earlier), the Court of Appeal emphasized that a direction should expressly refer to the fact that it is the risk of death and not merely serious injury that is relevant. The direction in *Singh*¹⁶³ should be followed: ‘the circumstances must be such that a reasonably prudent person would have foreseen a serious and obvious risk not merely of injury, even serious injury, but of death’.

The Court of Appeal has emphasized that the question of whether there was a risk of death is an objective question—not a question about whether D himself foresaw any such risk. In S,¹⁶⁴ S, aged 15, shot his girlfriend, aged 15, when a prohibited firearm (which he was minding) went off at close range while he was showing it to her. There was no evidence that S had either known or believed the gun to be loaded. At trial, S claimed to have removed the magazine from the weapon and therefore believed that it was safe. Expert evidence was to the effect that an inexperienced 15-year-old may have reasonably believed it was safe (not being aware of the risk of a bullet still being in the chamber). The Court of Appeal rejected the argument that there could be no gross negligence when S did not know, believe or foresee the risk of death. Gross negligence manslaughter involved an objective test: whether a reasonable and prudent person of S’s age and experience would have foreseen a serious risk ¹⁵⁸ At [45]. ¹⁵⁹ See, on omissions, Watts [1998] Crim LR 833; Litchfield [1998] Crim LR 507.

¹⁶⁰ Gurphal Singh [1999] Crim LR 582. In Brown [2005] UKPC 18, the suggestion was of a ‘high’ risk of death. Singh was cited in Webster v CPS [2014] EWHC 2516 (Admin).

¹⁶¹ cf the view of LH Leigh, ‘Liability for Inadvertence: A Lordly Legacy?’ (1995) 58 MLR 457 at 459.

¹⁶² [2004] EWCA Crim 2375, [51]. ¹⁶³ [1999] Crim LR 582.

¹⁶⁴ [2015] EWCA Crim 558, [2015] Crim LR 553.

of death and, if so, whether S's conduct fell so far below the standard of care required that it was grossly negligent such that it constituted a crime. Cranston J stated that:

In answering that objective question, it was open to the jury to conclude on the evidence before it that [S's] conduct fell below the standard of care in pointing a gun and pulling the trigger when just a short distance away from [V]. The judge distinguished ordinary negligence and said that whether this was gross negligence turned on the circumstances.¹⁶⁵

A recent spate of cases involving medical error has led to a further refinement of the test. The focus of the Court of Appeal's attention has been on at what point the risk of death must be assessed as being obvious and in what context. The Court of Appeal has now decided that the risk must be obvious to the reasonable professional in D's shoes, who demonstrates the same level of negligence as D. In other words, the test is not whether the reasonable professional who had not been negligent would have appreciated the existence of a serious and obvious risk of death. The risk must be assessed with reference to D's negligent standard. The difference between these two approaches can be seen in the cases in which the applicable test has been forged.

In Rudling,¹⁶⁶ V, a 12-year-old boy, had died of Addison's disease (a very rare condition) after D, his GP, had failed to attend him. Addison's disease was not something any GP could be expected to recognize, but it was argued by the prosecution that the symptoms described to her by V's mother (including vomiting, soiling and black genitals) were so alarming that D ought to have visited him and had she done so she would then have seen that V needed immediate hospital admission. Had she arranged this, V would have been diagnosed and given life-saving treatment. The trial judge nevertheless accepted a submission of no case to answer and the Court of Appeal agreed with this. The thrust of the prosecution case was that a reasonably competent GP would have said to herself 'I cannot eliminate the possibility that this child may be suffering from a rare risk to life without the child being seen urgently', which equated to a serious and obvious risk of death. But according to the Court of Appeal:

At the time of the breach of duty, there must be a risk of death, not merely serious illness; the risk must be serious; and the risk must be obvious. A GP faced with an unusual presentation which is worrying and undiagnosed may need to ensure a face to face assessment urgently in order to investigate further. That may be in order to assess whether it is something serious . . . which may or may not be so serious as to be life-threatening. A recognisable risk of something serious is not the same as a recognisable risk of death.

What does not follow is that if a reasonably competent GP requires an urgent assessment of a worrying and undiagnosed condition, it is necessarily reasonably foreseeable that there is a risk of death. Still less does it demonstrate a serious risk of death, which is not to be equated with an 'inability to eliminate a possibility'. There may be numerous remote possibilities of very rare conditions which cannot be eliminated but which do not present a serious risk of death. Further, and perhaps most importantly, a mere possibility that an assessment might reveal something life-threatening is not the same as an obvious risk of death. An obvious risk is a present risk which is clear and unambiguous, not one which might become apparent on further investigation.

These distinctions are not a matter of semantics but represent real differences in the practical assessments which fall to be made by doctors. . . .¹⁶⁷

In the yet more recent case of Rose, the Court of Appeal addressed this issue more directly.¹⁶⁸ In Rose, the Court of Appeal, drawing on its earlier decision in Rudling, held that in assessing either the foreseeability of the risk of death or the grossness of the conduct in question, the jury were not entitled to take into account information which would, could or should have been available to the defendant had he not breached the duty in question: the test is objective and prospective. Turning to the facts of Rose, D was a registered optometrist who conducted a routine eye test and examination on V. D failed to examine the internal structure of D's eyes, however, as she was required to do by statute. A few months after the eye examination, V died of acute hydrocephalus. Had D examined V's eyes in accordance with her statutory duty, she would have noticed the swelling of his optic nerve, the significance of which would have been clear. The experts agreed that a competent optometrist would have known the significance of that swelling and would immediately have referred the case on to others for urgent treatment. The judge rejected a submission of no case to answer, determining that D had failed to conduct a full examination of the internal structure of V's eyes, there was no good reason for that failure and thus she had breached her duty of care. The judge further found that the risk of death caused by the breach of duty was reasonably foreseeable. He directed the jury to consider whether that risk would have been obvious to a reasonably competent optometrist with the knowledge that the appellant would have had 'if she had not acted in breach of her duty to investigate the true position'. D appealed on the basis that the judge was incorrect to direct the jury that in evaluating whether the risk of death was reasonably foreseeable, they were entitled to consider the knowledge D would have had if she had conducted the eye examination in accordance with her statutory duty.

¹⁶⁵ At [20]. ¹⁶⁶ [2016] EWCA Crim 741.

¹⁶⁷ At [39]–[41]. ¹⁶⁸ Rose [2017] EWCA Crim 1168.

The Court of Appeal accepted D's submission. It was held that the objective nature of the test requires the notional exercise of putting a reasonably prudent professional in the shoes of the person whose conduct is under scrutiny and asking whether, at the moment of the breach of the duty relied on by the prosecution, that person ought reasonably to have foreseen a serious and obvious risk of death. On the facts of the case, the risk of death would only have been serious and obvious had D examined the internal structure of V's eyes. Sir Brian Leveson P concluded that there was no legitimate basis for altering what is a prospective test of foresight into one which judges with hindsight. D's conviction was therefore quashed. When directing the jury on whether it was reasonably foreseeable that D's breach of the duty gave rise to a serious and obvious risk of death, the reasonably prudent professional is to be endowed with the knowledge D had at the time of the breach of duty, not the knowledge D would or might have had if the breach had not occurred.

The court did add a caveat, however. It was held that the position might be different if V presented with symptoms which themselves either pointed to the risk of a potentially life-threatening condition or provided a flag that alerted a competent optometrist to that risk. Sir Brian Leveson P stated that was not this case, however, given that D was conducting an entirely routine examination with no material pre-existing history.

It is respectfully submitted that there are several problems with framing the test in these terms.¹⁶⁹ First, it seems, in policy terms, to be counterintuitive since it appears to incentivize the person who owes the duty to do less—the less D engages, the less likely the reasonably competent person in his shoes would realize there was a risk of death. The optometrist who does not bother to examine the internal structure of the eye is less likely to be liable than one who does so badly. The counter-argument to this is that the test avoids the risk of medical and other professions being charged with gross negligence manslaughter by reason of negligent omissions to carry out routine eye, blood and other tests which in fact would have revealed fatal conditions notwithstanding that the circumstances were such that it was not reasonably foreseeable that failure to carry out such tests would carry a serious and obvious risk of death.¹⁷⁰

¹⁶⁹ See further K Laird, 'R v Rose' [2018] Crim LR 76 and K Laird, 'The Evolution of Gross Negligence Manslaughter' [2018] 1 Arch Rev 6.

Secondly, by endowing the reasonably competent professional with D's shortcomings, the Court of Appeal diminishes the objective nature of the test established in Adomako. The House of Lords in Adomako held that the standard against which D's conduct ought to be evaluated is that of a reasonably competent anaesthetist, optometrist, etc. If a reasonably competent optometrist would have performed a proper examination of the internal eye, why should D benefit from the fact that she failed to do so and therefore fell far below the standard expected of her? There is an important distinction between the facts of Rose and the facts of Rudling in this regard. In Rose, as D was an optometrist, any eye examination she conducted had to be in accordance with the Opticians Act 1989 and the Sight Test (Examination and Prescription) (No 2) Regulations 1989. These provisions specify that an optometrist, when conducting an eye examination, must perform an intra-ocular examination. There can be no doubt that the reasonably competent optometrist would have conducted V's eye examination in accordance with the duty imposed upon her by the applicable legislation. Had a proper intra-ocular examination been conducted, the reasonably prudent optometrist would have noticed the swelling of V's optic nerve and would have referred him for urgent medical treatment. As has already been pointed out, on the court's interpretation of the test, had D conducted an intra-ocular examination but failed to appreciate the significance of the swelling of the optic nerve, she might have been guilty. By failing to conduct an intra-ocular examination, she was able to avoid liability altogether. The facts of Rudling are different, however. Owing to the equivocal nature of V's symptoms, there was disagreement as to whether a reasonably competent GP would have attended V having been told of the symptoms from which he was suffering. If a reasonably competent GP might not have attended V and therefore would also have failed to appreciate the seriousness of his condition, then D should not be penalized for also failing to do so. As the House of Lords confirmed in Adomako, D is not to be judged against the standard of more skilled professionals but by the standard of a reasonably competent professional. In Rose, had the Court of Appeal agreed with the trial judge's formulation of the relevant test, this would not necessarily lead to the adverse consequences for medical and other professionals described by the Court of Appeal and set out in the previous paragraph.

A final difficulty is that the inquiry into whether the foresight of death was objectively identifiable will turn not just on the specific duty owed by D but by the critical context in which it arose. That will often be a less precise inquiry. Take a simple example of D the plumber who did not remove the front plate from a boiler to check its functioning. If the boiler subsequently explodes killing V, applying Rose, the question is whether the reasonable plumber in his shoes (not having taken off the front plate) would have realized there was a serious and obvious risk of death. That can only be determined by asking what the plumber was told to do when hired to examine the boiler. In a case where the plumber was called out because of a smell of gas, he may well be found liable; in a case where the call-out was to provide a routine service to the boiler, the jury may be less inclined to convict.

The problem is one which arises acutely in medical cases where the evidence of the 'context' will often be disputed and be based on what the deceased said. For example, in Rudling, the issue may turn on whether the mother described the boy's genitals as black (would have triggered a realization in a reasonable doctor of a risk of death) or discoloured (not immediately obvious that that suggests life-threatening illness).¹⁷¹

¹⁷⁰ This concern was expressed by the Court of Appeal in Rose, but whether a doctor's failure to diagnose a condition amounts to negligence depends upon a number of factors, including the symptoms presented, the diagnostic techniques available and the dangers associated with the alternative diagnoses. See M Jones, Medical Negligence (2017), para 4-018.

14.2.6 ‘Gross’ negligence

The test is objective—the question is whether the risk would have been obvious to the reasonably prudent and skilful doctor, anaesthetist, electrician, motorist, restaurateur or person on the Clapham omnibus, as the circumstances require.

14.2.6.1 Relationship with recklessness

It is, at first sight, surprising that the gross negligence test should be more favourable to the defendant than a recklessness test—even objective recklessness.¹⁷² The difference is that the recklessness test did not include the requirement that the jury must be satisfied that the defendant’s conduct was bad enough to be a crime. A direction based on the test in Lawrence terms deprived D of the chance of acquittal on that ground.¹⁷³ In Prentice, for example, there were many strongly mitigating factors in the doctors’ conduct, which were irrelevant if the jury were concerned only with what was foreseeable, but highly relevant to question whether their behaviour was bad enough to deserve condemnation as manslaughter. Ever since Bateman, the courts have asserted that the test is whether the negligence goes beyond a mere matter of compensation and is bad enough to amount to a crime; but this is incomplete, if not plainly wrong. Careless driving amounts to a crime and deserves punishment but, manifestly, it does not on that ground alone amount to manslaughter, if it happens to cause death. Even dangerous driving causing death is not necessarily manslaughter. There are degrees of criminal negligence, and manslaughter requires a very high degree. Should not the jury be asked whether the negligence is bad enough to be condemned, not merely as a crime, but as the very grave crime of manslaughter?¹⁷⁴

In Misra,¹⁷⁵ the defendants argued that gross negligence should be replaced with an offence of reckless manslaughter, relying on the fundamental rejection of objectivism in G, and the dicta in that case that all serious offences require proof of a blameworthy state of mind. The Court of Appeal concluded that such arguments had been duly considered and rejected in Adomako, and saw nothing in *G*¹⁷⁶ to cause them to regard Adomako as no longer binding.¹⁷⁷

14.2.6.2 Relevance of D’s state of mind

Since the test of gross negligence is purely objective, it might be thought that the state of mind of the particular accused is irrelevant to the inquiry. However, the courts have held that proof of the defendant’s state of mind and in particular his foresight of the risk of harm or death is ‘not a prerequisite to a conviction’ whilst recognizing also that there may be ¹⁷¹ See also Bawa-Garba [2016] EWCA Crim 1841.

¹⁷² See Leigh (1995) 58 MLR 457, and A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 66–69.

¹⁷³ Lord Mackay in Adomako did accept that ‘it is perfectly open to the trial judge to use the word “reckless” in its ordinary meaning as part of his exposition of the law if he deems it appropriate in the circumstances of the particular case’. See the direction in Winter and Winter [2010] EWCA Crim 1474.

¹⁷⁴ cf Litchfield [1998] Crim LR 507 and commentary. Whether evidence was sufficient to satisfy a jury, and whether evidence of subjective recklessness is admissible on a charge of manslaughter by gross negligence, is considered in DPP, ex p Jones [2000] Crim LR 858 and commentary.

¹⁷⁵ [2004] EWCA Crim 2375. See O Quick, ‘Medicine, Mistakes and Manslaughter: A Criminal Combination?’ (2010) 69 CLJ 186 discussing a statistical breakdown of such prosecutions revealing low success rates and potential racial bias in prosecutions against doctors.

¹⁷⁶ [2004] 1 AC 1034.

¹⁷⁷ See also the same conclusion in Mark [2004] EWCA Crim 2490.

cases in which the defendant's state of mind is 'relevant to the jury's consideration when assessing the grossness and criminality of his conduct'.¹⁷⁸ This approach has been endorsed on a number of occasions, and it has been recognized that it may operate in the accused's favour.¹⁷⁹ The Court of Appeal held in Bannister,¹⁸⁰ however, that taking into account the defendant's special skills in assessing liability in the context of s 2A(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1988 was inconsistent with the objective nature of the test.

14.2.6.3 Circularity of test

As Lord MacKay acknowledged, the test involves a degree of circularity. It may also be criticized, as was its predecessor, the 'Bateman test', on the ground that it leaves a question of law to the jury. It has always been held that the negligence which suffices for civil liability is not necessarily enough for manslaughter, so someone has to decide whether the particular negligence is bad enough to amount to a crime, indeed this very grave crime. It is not necessary for the judge to refer to the distinction between civil and criminal liability, which might tend to confuse the jury.¹⁸¹

The jury appear to be left with the task of deciding the scope of the offence. The task is quite unlike that in, say, applying the definition of intention, which has been supplied by the judge. In such a case, the jury looks at the facts and applies the legal definition of intention as provided by the judge. In gross negligence, the jury has to determine whether on their view the conduct should be called grossly negligent, and if so that amounts to the crime. This seems objectionable in principle. In rejecting a challenge that the offence was insufficiently certain to be compatible with Art 7 of the ECHR, the Court of Appeal in Misra held that the jury's function in gross negligence cases is not to decide a point of law, but one of fact:

The decision whether the conduct was criminal is described [in Adomako] not as 'the' test, but as 'a' test as to how far the conduct in question must depart from accepted standards to be 'characterized as criminal'. On proper analysis, therefore, the jury is not deciding whether the particular defendant ought to be convicted on some unprincipled basis. The question for the jury is not whether the defendant's negligence was gross, and whether, additionally, it was a crime, but whether his behaviour was grossly negligent and consequently criminal. This is not a question of law, but one of fact, for decision in the individual case.¹⁸²

With respect, it is doubtful whether this meets the criticisms that the test is circular, and that it requires the jury to determine the scope of the criminal law.

14.2.6.4 Guiding the jury

The Court of Appeal has recognized the need for the jury to receive greater assistance in determining whether a particular failing is 'grossly negligent'. The issue has arisen most acutely in cases of medical negligence.

In Sellu,¹⁸³ an experienced colorectal surgeon was convicted of gross negligence manslaughter for a series of errors in his treatment of the deceased who had undergone elective

¹⁷⁸ A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999) [2000] Crim LR 475 (Southall Rail crash case). Cf S [2015] EWCA Crim 558.

¹⁷⁹ R v DPP, ex p Jones [2000] IRLR 373, DC; R (Rowley) v DPP [2003] EWHC 693 (Admin). Whether the two are consistent on this is debatable.

¹⁸⁰ [2009] EWCA Crim 1571.

¹⁸¹ Becker, No 199905228/Y5, 19 June 2000, CA. For an argument that the circularity is not pernicious, see V Tadros, 'The Limits of Manslaughter' in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death.

¹⁸² At [62], emphasis in original.

¹⁸³ [2016] EWCA Crim 1716.

knee surgery. The post-operative treatment of a gastro-intestinal complication led to V's death. The prosecution alleged that three specific breaches of S's duty of care to his patient had occurred: S failed to take urgent action when an x-ray showed that an intestinal perforation was likely; S failed to visit the deceased when learning of his condition despite the potential need to perform emergency surgery; S failed to operate within eight hours of CT scan results confirming the diagnosis and the need to operate to avoid fatal peritonitis. In summing up, the jury were directed that the issue to be assessed by them was as follows: first, did S behave negligently, in that no reasonable consultant colorectal surgeon in his position would have behaved as he did. Secondly, whether any gross negligence caused or significantly contributed to the deceased's death. Furthermore, and crucially, the trial judge's description of the required level of culpability referred only to whether S's conduct fell below the standard 'in a way that was gross or severe'.

The Court of Appeal held that the trial judge's approach to gross negligence, and in particular his direction to the jury, was inadequate. Following Adomako, Bateman, Andrews and Misra the direction ought to have made clear to the jury that the required conduct must have been 'truly exceptionally bad' and such a departure from the requisite standard that it consequently amounted to it being criminal. The conviction was therefore quashed. The Court of Appeal was also critical of the judge for not giving a route to verdict although he had given written directions. It was confirmed that, in complex cases, routes to verdict are now routinely expected.

The court gave further guidance to judges on how juries should be directed on this element of the offence. To repeat the word 'gross' is insufficient. The jury need to understand that they must be sure of a failure that was not just serious or very serious but 'truly exceptionally bad'.¹⁸⁴ Sir Brian Leveson P accepted that when directing the jury in cases of alleged gross negligence manslaughter, no formulation of the concept of gross negligence is mandatory, but, he added:

What is mandatory is that the jury are assisted sufficiently to understand how to approach their task of identifying the line that separates even serious or very serious mistakes or lapses, from conduct which was 'truly exceptionally bad and was such a departure from that standard [of a reasonably competent doctor] that it consequently amounted to being criminal'.¹⁸⁵

In the subsequent case of Bawa-Garba, the Court of Appeal emphasized once again that juries should be left in no doubt as to the truly exceptional degree of negligence which must be established if gross negligence is to be made out.¹⁸⁶ This emphasis on the high threshold for the very serious offence to be committed will have an impact on the likelihood of medical professionals being convicted (and prosecuted).

The court in Sellu also emphasized the importance of ensuring that the evidence elicited from the experts assists the jury in determining whether D's degree of negligence crossed the high threshold necessary for it to constitute gross negligence. Finally, the court reaffirmed that whether D's breach or omission was grossly negligent is ultimately a matter for the jury, not the experts. Trial judges must therefore take care to ensure that the jury's role is not usurped by the experts.

14.2.6.5 ECHR compatibility

The Court of Appeal in Misra concluded that gross negligence manslaughter was sufficiently clear and did not offend the requirement of legal certainty imposed by Art 7 or the common law. The court referred to the writings of Bacon and Blackstone to support its view that Art 7 merely confirmed the common law position on the principle of legal certainty. Thus, the court felt confident that the House of Lords, when framing the offence in Adomako, was not 'indifferent to or unaware of the need for the criminal law in particular to be predictable and certain'.¹⁸⁷ The court observed that Art 7 does not require absolute certainty but that offences are defined 'with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he must be able—if need be with appropriate advice—to foresee to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which any given action may entail'.¹⁸⁸ On the court's view, even applying the stricter interpretation of the test in Hashman and Harrup v UK,¹⁸⁹ the offence would be likely to satisfy Art 7, since gross negligence manslaughter depends on jury evaluation of conduct by reference to its consequences, and in gross negligence manslaughter the jury must be satisfied as to the 'risk of death' and of causation.

¹⁸⁴ At [152].

¹⁸⁵ ibid. Langley J's direction to the jury in Misra [2005] 1 Cr App R 21 was cited with approval.

¹⁸⁶ Bawa-Garba [2016] EWCA Crim 1841, [36].

14.2.6.6 Causation

The breach of duty which posed a serious and obvious risk of death must be the cause of the death. Principles of causation in Ch 2 apply here. The prosecution is required to prove that D's breach of duty caused or made a significant contribution to the death.¹⁹⁰ The issue can be a difficult one in the context of medical negligence in particular. For example, in Sellu, Sir Brian Leveson P stated that what was crucial in that case was that the jury were sure D's failings were grossly negligent and went on to consider the question of causation, understanding that causation would not be established if that gross negligence occurred after the time that they could be sure V would have survived.¹⁹¹ Similarly, in Bawa-Garba, the Court of Appeal held that the judge's direction to the jury that D could only be guilty if her acts or omissions made a significant contribution to D's dying as and when he did was unassailable.¹⁹² Expert evidence will be necessary to help the jury assess whether D's gross negligence occurred at a time when V could still have survived.

14.3 Reckless manslaughter

Gross negligence is a sufficient, but not necessarily the only, fault for manslaughter. To some extent manslaughter by advertent recklessness—conscious risk-taking—still survives.¹⁹³ Where D kills by a reckless lawful act (therefore no UAM available) which he foresees might cause serious bodily harm (no gross negligence manslaughter available as no serious and obvious risk of death), this ought to be capable of being manslaughter. Similarly, where D kills by a reckless omission (no UAM) which does not pose a risk of death (no gross negligence manslaughter), reckless manslaughter may apply if D foresaw a risk of serious injury to V. These used to be murder (Hyam) before the decision in Moloney,¹⁹⁴ so must still be manslaughter. Where death is so caused, the jury do not have to decide whether D's conduct is bad enough to amount to a crime. That question is appropriate only when we are concerned with degrees of negligence, there being no other way of determining the criminal degree. The jury are not ¹⁸⁷ At [34]; cf commentary on Misra [2005] Crim LR 234.

¹⁸⁸ Sunday Times v UK [1979] 2 EHRR 245.

¹⁸⁹ [2000] Crim LR 185.

¹⁹⁰ Zaman [2017] EWCA Crim 1783.

¹⁹¹ [2016] EWCA Crim 1716, [127].

¹⁹² [2016] EWCA Crim 1841, [33].

¹⁹³ For an engaging analysis see F Stark, 'Reckless Manslaughter' [2017] Crim 763 arguing that the offence does not exist but it ought to. We suggest that it already does for the reasons explained in this section.

¹⁹⁴ See p 91.

asked this question in non-fatal offences against the person, which may be committed recklessly, so it would be quite inconsistent if it applied when death is caused.

The main concern with this least controversial form of manslaughter is to distinguish 'subjective recklessness' (manslaughter) from 'oblique intention' (murder).¹⁹⁵ The leading case is Lidar,¹⁹⁶ in which V died when run over by D's car to which he had been hanging on when pursuing D in the course of a fight. Although the trial judge directed that D's fault element would be satisfied by proof of recklessness (ie D's personal foresight) as to mere injury, the Court of Appeal held that this was not fatal to the safety of the conviction. Subjective reckless manslaughter requires proof that D foresaw a risk that V would suffer serious injury (or death) and took the risk unjustifiably. In a sentencing appeal, the Court of Appeal recognized the existence of the offence. In Hussain,¹⁹⁷ D had killed a child, V, by driving with V trapped under the car. At trial the Crown expressly put its case on the basis that D 'knew that it was a child who was under the car rather than some other object, that he foresaw the risk of serious injury or death by continuing to drive and yet chose to take that risk and death resulted'.

14.4 Reform

The reform debate¹⁹⁸ was rekindled by the Law Commission and MOJ agenda for reform of homicide which, although focusing principally on the appropriate scheme of murder and partial defences, has produced a coherent regime which integrates involuntary manslaughter offences.¹⁹⁹ The ladder structure of the Law Commission proposals allows for a clearer analysis of the relative degrees of culpability in the different forms of homicide.²⁰⁰

When considering the offences of manslaughter alongside that of murder and the proposed forms of murder, it is essential to bear in mind the numerous statutory offences of homicide—causing death by dangerous driving, causing death by careless driving, etc.²⁰¹

14.4.1 Unlawful act manslaughter (UAM)

In view of the sustained principled criticism of the offence, it is no surprise that there have been calls for reform and indeed abolition. In the Law Commission's Consultation Paper No 135, Involuntary Manslaughter, it was observed that there was 'no prospect' of being able to devise any clear principled statement of the law based on concepts of unlawful act manslaughter.²⁰² In LCCP 135 the Law Commission provisionally proposed abolition ¹⁹⁵ See p 92. See also J Horder, 'The Changing Face of the Law of Homicide' in J Horder (ed), Homicide Law in Comparative Perspective (2007) 26–33.

¹⁹⁶ [2000] 4 Arch News 3. ¹⁹⁷ [2012] EWCA Crim 188.

¹⁹⁸ For a compelling review of the defects with the present law see LC 237, Involuntary Manslaughter (1996) Part III. See also the Law Reform Commission of Ireland Report: Homicide (2008).

¹⁹⁹ See, generally, on the common law development of the homicide offences, J Horder, 'Homicide Reform and the Changing Character of Legal Thought' in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death.

²⁰⁰ See, inter alia, Tadros, 'The Limits of Manslaughter' in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death suggesting that there needs to be a lower category of homicide offence for the least serious cases.

²⁰¹ See Ashworth, '“Manslaughter”: Generic or Nominate Offences?' in Clarkson and Cunningham, Criminal Liability for Non-Aggressive Death, and S Yeo, 'Manslaughter versus Special Homicide Offences: An Australian Perspective' in the same volume.

²⁰² Para 5.4. On earlier reform proposals including those of the CLRC, Fourteenth Report; see S Prevezzer, 'Criminal Homicides Other Than Murder' [1980] Crim LR 530.

of UAM without replacement.²⁰³ By the time of the Report two years later, its opinion had changed. The Law Commission's final recommendation was that a person is guilty of careless killing (GCK) if he has intended to cause injury, or is aware of the risk of a new offence of injury and unreasonably takes the risk where the conduct causing or intended to cause the injury constitutes an offence. Keating²⁰⁴ is critical of the failure to secure correspondence between the fault (foresight of injury) and the harm caused, regarding it as 'unfortunate' for the Law Commission to include a version of unlawful act manslaughter. The Home Office subsequently questioned whether some version of the constructive manslaughter offence ought to be retained.²⁰⁵ It was unconvinced by the merits of the Law Commission proposal that it was wrong in principle to convict of an offence of death where the offender was aware only of a risk of injury. The example given by the Home Office is an extreme one of a person causing a minor wound to the victim who is a haemophiliac.²⁰⁶ The Home Office proposal would create liability where the accused intended some injury, in the course of the commission of a violent crime, and the death was not foreseen. As with the Law Commission proposal, there is no full correspondence between the fault (foresight of injury) and the harm (death) for which the defendant is punished. The Home Office offers no justification for basing liability on an accidental outcome rather than intention or foresight.

The Law Commission's latest recommendation is that the offence will be recast as killing another person:

- (a) through the commission of a criminal act intended by the defendant to cause injury, or
- (b) through the commission of a criminal act that the defendant was aware involved a serious risk of causing some injury ('criminal act manslaughter').²⁰⁷

14.4.2 Gross negligence manslaughter

In 1997, the Law Commission²⁰⁸ proposed the reform, rather than abolition, of the gross negligence offence. The Law Commission's recommendations as part of the Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide Report²⁰⁹ are that gross negligence be recast as follows. A person is guilty of gross negligence manslaughter if:

- (1) a person by his or her conduct causes the death of another;
- (2) a risk that his or her conduct will cause death ... would be obvious to a reasonable person in his or her position;
- (3) he or she is capable of appreciating that risk at the material time;
- and
- (4) ... his or her conduct falls far below what can reasonably be expected of him or her in the circumstances ...

²⁰³ See Wasik [1994] Crim LR 883.

²⁰⁴ See H Keating, 'The Restoration of a Serious Crime' [1996] Crim LR 535.

²⁰⁵ Consultation Paper, Reforming the Law of Involuntary Manslaughter (2000) para 2.11.

²⁰⁶ This seemingly fanciful scenario has occurred: see State v Frazier, 98 SW 2d 707 (1936) (Mo).

²⁰⁷ LC 304, para 2.163. In JF [2015] EWCA Crim 351, the Court of Appeal emphasized that it is for Parliament to change the law, not the courts.

²⁰⁸ LC 237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996). See also J Spencer and AM Brajeux, 'Criminal Liability for Negligence—A Lesson from Across the Channel' (2010) 59 ICLQ 1.

²⁰⁹ LC 304, para 3.60.

14.4.3 Reckless manslaughter

The Law Commission recommends abolition of this category of manslaughter. It is suggested that all cases will now be adequately catered for in either: (a) the new second degree murder offence where D realizes there is a serious risk of death from his conduct and intends to cause injury, or (b) the new version of gross negligence proposed earlier. What of D who has specialist knowledge of a risk of his lawful activity which is not known to the reasonable person and who foresees a risk of injury but not death by his conduct, but who kills V? D cannot be liable for gross negligence even though D's mental state can be considered by the jury in evaluating whether his conduct is grossly negligent, as there is no objective risk of death. Nor is D guilty of second degree murder unless he sees a risk of death.

14.5 The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007

14.5.1 Introduction

This long-awaited Act, which extends to the whole of the UK, received Royal Assent on 26 July 2007²¹⁰ and most of the Act was brought into force on 6 April 2008. Although the Act appears to create a broad-reaching offence in terms of bodies to which it will apply and the duties of care which will trigger liability, these are severely curtailed by the technical qualifications integral to the all important duty question and by the numerous and far-reaching exclusions designed to protect public bodies. The layers of technicality serve to restrict the scope of liability far more than would at first appear, and are also likely to lead to substantial practical difficulties in prosecution.²¹¹

14.5.1.1 Background

Public disquiet with the lack of a specific offence for corporate killing increased with each successive failure to secure convictions for gross negligence manslaughter in any of the large-scale disasters such as the Southall, Paddington, Hatfield and Potter's Bar rail crashes, the Zeebrugge (Herald of Free Enterprise) and Marchioness shipping disasters and the Piper Alpha and King's Cross fires. With that list in mind, it seems startling that the Act was such a long time in coming. The immediate background to the Act is traceable to the Law Commission Report from 1996²¹² recommending the creation of a new offence of 'corporate ²¹⁰ On the Act, see generally D Ormerod and R Taylor, 'The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007' [2008] Crim LR 589. In this part of the chapter we have drawn heavily on that article. See also A Norrie, Crime, Reason and History (3rd edn, 2014) 124–128, who argues that the offence takes an 'uncomfortable' hybrid 'organizational-identitarian' approach; J Gobert, 'The Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007' (2008) 71 MLR 413; J Horder, 'The Criminal Liability of Organisations for Manslaughter and Other Serious Offences' in S Hetherington (ed), Halsbury's Laws of England Centenary Essays (2007); M Hsiao, 'Abandonment of the Doctrine of Attribution in Favour of Gross Negligence Test in the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007' (2009) 30 Company Lawyer 110. Other background documents are on the Home Office website.

²¹¹ It has been argued that the 2007 Act has failed to increase accountability, see S Field and L Jones, 'Five Years On: The Impact of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007: Plus ça change?' (2013) 6 ICCLR 239. For an analysis of some of the criticisms that have been made of the legislation, see P Almond, Corporate Manslaughter and Regulatory Reform (2013). See also C Wells, 'Corporate Criminal Liability: A Ten Year Review' [2014] Crim LR 847.

²¹² LC 237, Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter (1996).

killing'.²¹³ A corporation would commit this offence if its 'management failure' were a cause of a person's death, and that failure fell far below what could reasonably be expected of the corporation in the circumstances. That proposal was, as Professor Wells noted, the start of the fundamental change in the UK to move the corporate manslaughter offence away from individual liability, bedevilled as it was by the identification doctrine discussed in Ch 8, towards liability based on 'management failure'.²¹⁴

The Law Commission Report was followed by a Home Office Consultation Paper in which the government accepted the need for reform,²¹⁵ recognizing the need to restore public confidence that companies responsible for loss of life can properly be held accountable in law. The government stated its belief that 'the creation of a new offence of corporate killing would give useful emphasis to the seriousness of health and safety offences and would give force to the need to consider health and safety as a management issue'.²¹⁶ The government was prepared to go further than the Law Commission proposal by extending the offence to all 'undertakings' including unincorporated associations and other trades or businesses. Following a Report of the Home Affairs and Work and Pensions Committees in 2005,²¹⁷ the government produced another Bill²¹⁸ which, after much controversy in Parliament, became the present Act.

14.5.1.2 Problems with the old law

Aside from the symbolic benefits of a specifically labelled offence reflecting the particular wrongdoing involved in death caused by organizational mismanagement, three legal reasons for reform were apparent.

Identification doctrine

The identification principle was a major obstacle to securing a conviction under the common law offence of gross negligence manslaughter, particularly with a company of any size or with any complexity in its management structure. The doctrine is discussed in full in Ch 8. It required there to be an individual holding a sufficiently senior position in the company who could be identified with the company as its 'directing mind and will' and who individually fulfilled the elements of the gross negligence offence: fatality following a gross breach of a duty of care which posed a risk of death. The only successful prosecutions against corporate entities for gross negligence were in relation to small companies,²¹⁹ where there was more likely to be a single person directly and immediately responsible for ²¹³ On which see H Keating, 'The Law Commission Report on Involuntary Manslaughter: (1) The Restoration of a Serious Crime' [1998] Crim LR 535; A McColgan, 'Heralding Corporate Liability' [1994] Crim LR 547. See also S Field and N Jorg, 'Corporate Liability and Manslaughter: Should We Be Going Dutch?' [1991] Crim LR 156.

²¹⁴ C Wells, 'The Corporate Manslaughter Proposals: Pragmatism, Paradox or Peninsularity' [1996] Crim LR 545 at 553. C Wells, 'Corporate Liability: A Ten Year Review' [2014] Crim LR 847 suggests that the Act provides 'an over-complex offence [with a] definition full of ambiguities and interpretive uncertainty'.

²¹⁵ Reforming the Law on Involuntary Manslaughter: The Government's Proposals (2000): www.corporateaccountability.org.uk/dl/manslaughter/reform/archive/homeofficedraft2000.pdf. See J Gobert, 'Corporate Killing at Home and Abroad: Reflections on the Government Proposals' (2002) 118 LQR 72; GR Sullivan, 'Corporate Killing—Some Government Proposals' [2001] Crim LR 31. For a different proposal based on causing death in the course of a specified 'scheduled' offence (eg one contrary to the Health and Safety at Work Act), see PR Glazebrook, 'A Better Way of Convicting Businesses of Avoidable Deaths and Injuries' (2002) 61 CLJ 405; see also C Clarkson, 'Corporate Manslaughter—Yet More Government Proposals' [2005] Crim LR 677.

²¹⁶ Para 3.1.9. ²¹⁷ HC 540 I-III. ²¹⁸ Cm 6755.

²¹⁹ See eg Kite and OLL Ltd, Winchester Crown Court, 8 Dec 1994 (1994) The Independent, 9 Dec; R v Jackson Transport (Ossett) Ltd, reported in Health and Safety at Work, Nov 1996, p 4; R v Great Western Trains Company (GWT), Central Criminal Court, 30 June 1999; Roy Bowles Transport Ltd (1999) The Times, 11 Dec.

the death and who was senior enough to be regarded as the 'directing mind and will' of the company. There were few successful prosecutions for gross negligence manslaughter against corporations. Arguably, the new law retains this disproportionate effect on smaller companies since there is now a requirement that the senior manager(s) played a substantial part in the organizational failure leading to death. The smaller the company, the more likely the 'senior managers' will have had a hand in formulating and implementing the relevant policy on safety, etc; the breach of which led to the death.

Aggregation

Many critics of the identification doctrine questioned whether it must be proved that an individual controlling officer (whether identifiable or not) was guilty or whether it is permissible to 'aggregate' the conduct of a number of officers, none of whom would individually be guilty, so as to constitute, in sum, the elements of the offence.²²⁰ In the context of gross negligence manslaughter, the argument was that a company owes a duty of care, and if its operation falls far below the standard required it is guilty of gross negligence. A series of minor failures by officers of the company might add up to a gross breach by the company of its duty of care. The argument was strengthened by the fact that such aggregation is permissible in tort²²¹ and the concept of negligence is the same in the criminal law, the difference being one of degree—criminal negligence must be 'gross'. This argument was, however, rejected by the Court of Appeal in A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1999).²²² The prosecution arose from the Southall train crash in which seven passengers died. The trial judge ruled that the gross negligence manslaughter offence requires negligence to be proved under the identification doctrine. The Court of Appeal approved that ruling, holding that unless an identified individual's conduct, characterized as gross criminal negligence, could be attributed to the company, the company was not liable for manslaughter at common law.²²³

Killing of a human by a human

It was at one time thought²²⁴ that a corporation could not be convicted of an offence involving personal violence but, in P&O European Ferries Ltd,²²⁵ Turner J held that an indictment for manslaughter would lie against the company in respect of the Zeebrugge disaster. The persuasive authority of this ruling is not impaired by the judge's subsequent decision that, on the evidence before him, the company had no case to answer. The rejected ²²⁰ See RD Taylor, Blackstone's Criminal Practice Bulletin (Oct 2007).

²²¹ WB Anderson & Sons Ltd v Rhodes (Liverpool) Ltd [1967] 2 All ER 850, Cairns J, discussed by M Dean, 'Hedley Byrne and the Eager Business Man' (1968) 31 MLR 322.

²²² [2000] QB 796; considering Great Western Trains Co (1999) 3 June, CCC. It was also rejected in Scotland in Transco v HM Advocate 2004 SLT 41. See also R (Bodycote) v HM Coroner for Hertfordshire [2008] EWCA Crim 164.

²²³ The court's conclusion that there can in general be no corporate liability in the absence of an identified human offender ignores the principle discussed earlier of corporate liability where a duty is specifically imposed on the corporation as a legal person: Birmingham & Gloucester Railway (1842) 3 QB 223.

²²⁴ Cory Bros Ltd [1927] 1 KB 810 (Finlay J, holding that a corporation could not be indicted for manslaughter or an offence under the OAPA 1861, s 31), a ruling of which Stable J said in ICR Haulage Ltd [1944] KB 551, 'if the matter came before the court today, the result might well be different'.

²²⁵ (1990) 93 Cr App R 72, [1991] Crim LR 695 and commentary. Streatfield J ruled that an indictment for manslaughter would lie in Northern Strip Mining Construction Co Ltd ((1965) 1 Feb, unreported, Glamorgan Assizes) but the corporation was acquitted on the merits. Maurice J's decision in a civil action, S and Y Investments (No 2) Pty Ltd v Commercial Co of Australia Ltd (1986) 21 App R 204 at 217, required a ruling that a company was guilty of manslaughter. A company, OLL Ltd, was convicted of manslaughter at Winchester Crown Court, 8 Dec 1994, following a canoeing tragedy in Lyme Bay.

argument was based on the fact that, from the time of Coke (1601), authoritative books had described manslaughter as ‘the killing of a human being by a human being’.²²⁶ This definition found its way into the law of some states of the USA and, via Stephen’s draft Code Bill of 1880, into the New Zealand Crimes Acts of 1908 and 1961. The effect was that the New Zealand Court of Appeal decided in *Murray Wright Ltd*²²⁷ that a corporation could not be guilty of manslaughter as a principal. Turner J did not follow that decision. Coke’s purpose in using the phrase ‘by a human being’ was not to exclude corporations from liability—corporations were not indictable for any crime at that time—but to distinguish killings by an inanimate thing or an animal without the fault of any person. Such killings at the time of his writing had legal consequences but were not murder or manslaughter. Moreover, the requirement of an act or omission by a human being is not peculiar to manslaughter. All crimes involve acts or omissions, or the results of acts or omissions, by human beings. It is not manslaughter if a person is killed by an earthquake, or a thunderbolt, or a wild animal in the jungle.

14.5.2 The 2007 Act

14.5.2.1 The offence

Section 1 of the 2007 Act provides:

- (1) An organisation to which this section applies is guilty of an offence if the way in which its activities are managed or organised—
 - (a) causes a person’s death, and
 - (b) amounts to a gross breach of a relevant duty of care owed by the organisation to the deceased . . .
- (3) An organisation is guilty of an offence under this section only if the way in which its activities are managed or organised by its senior management is a substantial element in the breach referred to in subsection (1).

The offence follows many of the core aspects of gross negligence manslaughter. The crucial difference is that ‘rather than being contingent on the guilt of one or more individuals, liability for the new offence depends on a finding of gross negligence in the way in which the activities of the organisation are run’.²²⁸ The statutory offence, in a reversal of the common law, is focused on the aggregate responsibility of the senior managers. The Home Office Explanatory Notes describe this as the ‘management failure’, but that phrase is not part of the statute.²²⁹

The first successful prosecution was of a small firm (eight employees) for the death of a 27-year-old geologist who was buried under earth when a 3.5m trench collapsed on him when he was unsupervised.²³⁰ The company’s sole director was directly implicated in the acts.²³¹

²²⁶ See eg Stephen, Digest (1st edn, 1877) art 218 and subsequent editions.

²²⁷ [1970] NZLR 476.

²²⁸ Home Office Explanatory Notes, para 14.

²²⁹ On the ambiguities of the term ‘management’ in the Act, see C Wells, ‘Corporate Criminal Liability: A Ten Year Review’ [2014] Crim LR 847, 854: ‘the CMCH Act slips between two grammatical uses of the word management. “Management” can mean either “the action or manner of managing”, or the “power of managing”, or it could function as a collective noun for “a governing body”.’

²³⁰ Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings Ltd [2011] EWCA Crim 1337, The Times, 20 July 2011. See CPS blog relating to the Cotswold Geotechnical prosecution (available at <http://blog.cps.gov.uk/2011/02/tuesday-15-february-afternoon-update.html>).

²³¹ For a list of the prosecutions, see C Wells [2014] Crim LR 847, 860.

14.5.2.2 Relationship to other homicide offences

The Act abolishes gross negligence manslaughter as far as it applies to corporations and other bodies to which the 2007 Act applies (s 20).²³² The Act also provides that individuals cannot be liable as secondary parties to an offence of corporate manslaughter (s 18(1)). Individuals within companies can, of course, still be prosecuted for gross negligence manslaughter as principal offenders subject to what has been said previously.²³³ This attempt at a strict division between organizational and individual fault may pose problems. If an individual defendant is charged alongside a company in the same proceedings, the jury will be faced with two different tests of manslaughter liability.

An organization can, although this is much less likely,²³⁴ be convicted of unlawful act manslaughter in appropriate circumstances (eg where D is the manager of a company who encourages employee X to set fire to the company premises in an insurance scam which leads to the death of V on the premises). The corporation may also be liable as an accessory to the principal individual offender in other homicide offences, such as causing death by dangerous driving.²³⁵

In terms of Health and Safety Act offences,²³⁶ an offending organization can be liable under the 2007 Act and under the relevant health and safety legislation (s 19(1)).²³⁷ Additionally, nothing in the 2007 Act precludes prosecution of an organization which has already been convicted of corporate manslaughter for a health and safety offence (s 19(2)). The relationship between the health and safety legislation and the 2007 Act offence is an interesting one.²³⁸ The government eschewed a model of constructive manslaughter where a breach of health and safety legislation which led to death could found liability for corporate manslaughter. Liability under the Act is, instead, based on duties founded in the civil law of negligence. However, the breaches of health and safety legislation will not be irrelevant since the jury are directed that they must have regard to such breaches in establishing whether the organization has been grossly at fault (s 8).²³⁹

²³² By s 27(4) 'any liability, investigation, legal proceeding or penalty for or in respect of an offence committed wholly or partly before the commencement of that section' remains, and by s 27(5) an offence is committed wholly or partly before the commencement if 'any of the conduct or events alleged to constitute the offence occurred before that commencement'. It is clear that there is no gap left in the law: gross negligence manslaughter remains available in all other relevant circumstances. In R v Cornish; Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells NHS Trust [2015] EWHC 2967 (QB), Coulson J rejected the submission that any prosecution for corporate manslaughter would have to be abandoned simply because it referred to an event that occurred before the commencement of the 2007 Act. Pre-commencement events could not found the charges, but it was held that they could be relevant to the charges that were brought under the 2007 Act.

²³³ The Home Office Consultation Paper in 2000 had suggested that there should be responsibility for corporate manslaughter placed on individual directors in appropriate cases but this attracted strong opposition. For an analysis of the extent to which individual corporate officers can be liable for other homicide offences, see S Antrobus, 'The Criminal Liability of Directors for Health and Safety Breaches and Manslaughter' [2013] Crim LR 309. Wells [2014] Crim LR 847 is heavily critical of this aspect of the new offence.

²³⁴ cf the argument advanced by C Wells, Corporations and Criminal Liability (2001) 120.

²³⁵ See JF Alford [1997] 2 Cr App R 326, [1997] Crim LR 745.

²³⁶ Defined in s 25 to mean 'any statutory provision dealing with health and safety matters, including in particular provision contained in the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974, and provisions dealing with health and safety matters contained in Part 3 of the Energy Act 2013'. See on corporate liability under the 1974 Act, Chargot Ltd (trading as Contract Services) and others [2008] UKHL 73.

²³⁷ The overlap is considered by Wells [2014] Crim LR 847.

²³⁸ cf Antrobus, n 233, and P Almond, Corporate Manslaughter and Regulatory Reform (2013). For criticism of the way the Act impacts on this relationship, see Wells [2014] Crim LR 847.

²³⁹ See also FB Wright, 'Criminal Liability of Directors and Senior Managers for Deaths at Work' [2007] Crim LR 949.

14.5.2.3 Which 'organizations' are caught?

Section 1(5) provides that the offence under this section is called: (a) 'corporate manslaughter', insofar as it is an offence under the law of England and Wales. This is rather misleading because it can also be committed by certain organizations other than corporations, for example an NHS Trust.²⁴⁰ Section 1(2) defines the organizations to which the new offence applies, which includes, most obviously, corporations.²⁴¹ Section 1(2) also applies the offence to police forces, partnerships²⁴² (partnerships under the Limited Liability Partnerships Act 2000 are caught by the definition of corporation in any event), trade unions²⁴³ and employers' associations,²⁴⁴ if the organization concerned is an employer. Schedule 1 lists the government departments to which the offence applies. There are some 40 such departments.²⁴⁵ These include some in which it is not difficult to imagine how corporate manslaughter liability might arise because of the functions they perform, for example Department for Transport, Department of Health, Forestry Commission. With some it may seem a little less likely, for example Revenue and Customs, CPS, National Audit Office—but since liability can arise as a result of being an employer or occupier, it is not difficult so see how they might be liable for a death.²⁴⁶

In the course of debates in the House of Lords it was emphasized how important is the extension of the offence to public bodies:

there is no reason why the death of an individual in one situation should be considered less of a death, or less deserving of justice, merely because that situation was presided over by government officials as opposed to privately employed foremen. Indeed, it is all the more of a tragedy and contravention of the natural principle of justice where the state itself acts with such gross negligence that the very lives of its own citizens are forfeit.²⁴⁷

Crown Immunity is removed by s 11. Section 11(2) provides that a Crown organization is to be treated as owing whatever duties of care it would owe if it were a corporation that was not a servant or agent of the Crown. However, as will be explained later there are a number of respects in which that liability is very heavily qualified in ss 3 to 7.

Partnerships are to be treated as owing whatever duties of care they would owe if they were a body corporate (s 14(2)).

²⁴⁰ See R v Cornish; Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells NHS Trust [2015] EWHC 2967 (QB).

²⁴¹ By s 25, 'corporation' does not include a corporation sole but includes any body corporate wherever incorporated. This includes companies incorporated under companies legislation, as well as bodies incorporated under statute (as is the case with many non-departmental public bodies and other bodies in the public sector) or by Royal Charter.

²⁴² By s 25, 'partnership' means: '(a) a partnership within the Partnership Act 1890, or (b) a limited partnership registered under the Limited Partnerships Act 1907, or a firm or entity of a similar character formed under the law of a country or territory outside the United Kingdom.' See also Stevenson & Sons, p 260.

²⁴³ By s 25, 'trade union' has the meaning given by s 1 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992.

²⁴⁴ By s 25, 'employers' association' has the meaning given by s 122 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992.

²⁴⁵ Provision is made in s 16 for the circumstances in which relevant functions are transferred between one government department and another or between the other bodies listed in Sch 1, and for cases in which a relevant government agency is privatized.

²⁴⁶ The list of organizations to which the offence applies can be further extended by secondary legislation, eg to further types of unincorporated association, subject to the affirmative resolution procedure (s 21). The list of government departments in Sch 1 may be changed by the negative resolution procedure (eg the name of a particular department) unless the change is to alter the range of activities or functions in relation to which the s 1 offence applies, in which case the affirmative resolution procedure applies. Since the Act was passed, the list in Sch 1 has been amended on a number of occasions.

²⁴⁷ Hansard, HL, text for 15 Jan 2007, col GC189 (Lord Hunt).

14.5.3 Elements of the offence

In summary there must be:

- a relevant duty owed to the victim;
- the breach of the duty by the organization must be as a result of the way the activities are managed or organized;
- a substantial element of the breach of the duty must be due to the way the senior management managed or organized activities;
- the breach of the duty must be a gross one;
- V's death was caused by the breach of the duty.

14.5.3.1 A relevant duty

The definition of a 'relevant duty of care' is provided in s 2 of the Act:

- (1) A 'relevant duty of care', in relation to an organisation, means any of the following duties owed by it under the law of negligence—
 - (a) a duty owed to its employees or to other persons working for the organisation or performing services for it;
 - (b) a duty owed as occupier of premises;
 - (c) a duty owed in connection with—
 - (i) the supply by the organisation of goods or services (whether for consideration or not),
 - (ii) the carrying on by the organisation of any construction or maintenance operations,
 - (iii) the carrying on by the organisation of any other activity on a commercial basis, or
 - (iv) the use or keeping by the organisation of any plant, vehicle or other thing;
 - (d) duty owed to a person who, by reason of being a person within subsection (2), is someone for whose safety the organisation is responsible [arising where V is in custody].
- (2) Subsection (1) is subject to sections 3 to 7.

The duties reflect the duties of care arising at common law. The duty is that owed in the common law of negligence²⁴⁸ or, where applicable, the statutory duty which has superseded the common law duty, for example the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957. It is made clear by s 2(4) that a duty owed under the law of negligence will apply if the common law duty of negligence has been superseded by statutory provision imposing strict liability. The Explanatory Notes give the example of the Carriage by Air Act 1961. The most important thing to remember is that the criminal offence does not impose new duties; it is based on the existing duties which are present in civil law—either by statute or common law. The requirement of proving a duty will add to the complexity of the prosecution.

The most frequently arising duties are likely to be from relationships as employers and occupiers, and duties arising from these activities are also of special significance when it comes to identifying the scope of the exemptions for certain types of organization/activity.²⁴⁹

²⁴⁸ Section 2(7) specifies, for the avoidance of doubt, that 'the law of negligence' includes, in relation to England and Wales, the Occupiers' Liability Act 1957, the Defective Premises Act 1972 and the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984.

²⁴⁹ See p 609.

It is easy to see how the categories might give rise to duties of care which, if breached, could lead to fatalities. Duties as employer would, for example, include duties to provide safe places of work. Note that the duty as an employer extends beyond the scope of employees as strictly defined and includes subcontractors, and volunteer workers, etc. Duties as occupiers of premises will render organizations liable if there are, for example, faulty electrical wiring, dangerous staircases, etc. 'Premises' includes land, buildings and moveable structures (s 25); a duty owed in connection with the supply by the organization of goods might arise from provision of foodstuffs; duties arising from the provision of services (whether for consideration or not), would include most obviously rail travel and other transport; duties from the carrying on by the organization of any construction or maintenance operations²⁵⁰ would include building operations.²⁵¹ Duties arising from the carrying on by the organization of any other activity on a commercial basis was a category included in case activities such as farming or mining were not regarded as involving the provision of services, etc. Duties arising from the use or keeping by the organization of any plant, vehicle or 'other thing' could be extremely wide-ranging.

The most controversial category is that relating to duties arising from detention. Lord Ramsbotham, former Chief Inspector of Prisons, was successful in the House of Lords in amending the Bill to include what is now s 2(1)(d). There was considerable government opposition and the Bill almost lapsed. The final compromise position reached was that the commencement of this element required the further approval of Parliament. The most difficult issue, and one which engaged the House of Lords, was the question whether suicides in detention would give rise to liability where the relevant agency, for example the Prison Service, could or should have prevented it.²⁵²

Section 2(2) lists the various forms of custody or detention²⁵³ which will trigger a duty:

(2) A person is within this subsection if—

- (a) he is detained at a custodial institution or in a custody area at a court or police station;
- (b) he is detained at a removal centre or short-term holding facility;
- (c) he is being transported in a vehicle, or being held in any premises, in pursuance of prison escort arrangements or immigration escort arrangements;
- (d) he is living in secure accommodation in which he has been placed;
- (e) he is a detained patient.

Deaths in custody give rise to problems because of the particular status of the victim; that by definition the activities will be occurring within 'premises'; and the fact that the ²⁵⁰ Section 2(7) further defines 'construction or maintenance operations' to mean 'operations of any of the following descriptions—(a) construction, installation, alteration, extension, improvement, repair, maintenance, decoration, cleaning, demolition or dismantling of—(i) any building or structure, (ii) anything else that forms, or is to form, part of the land, or (iii) any plant, vehicle or other thing; (b) operations that form an integral part of, or are preparatory to, or are for rendering complete, any operations within paragraph (a).'

²⁵¹ This provision overlaps significantly with the previous category of supply of goods or services. It was included to avoid any lacunae where the construction operator was not acting 'commercially'—as might be argued with some public sector bodies.

²⁵² Under the new division of power, prisons come under the responsibility of the Ministry of Justice.

²⁵³ The various categories are further defined in s 2(7). Section 23 provides a power to the Secretary of State to add to those categories listed in s 2(2), to whom a 'relevant duty of care' is owed by reason of s 2(1)(d). Eg by virtue of para 15(a) of Sch 9(2) to the Immigration Act 2014, s 2(2)(b) now mandates that a person is owed a duty of care if he is detained at a short-term holding facility or in pre-departure accommodation.

organization providing the detention 'service' is one which will have to make public policy decisions as to allocation of resources, etc (and therefore in some cases the duty would be excluded under s 3).²⁵⁴

Even before s 2(1)(d) was introduced, the broad terms of s 2(1) could trigger liability for a death in custody in some circumstances. Subject to the exceptions in ss 3 to 7, there was possible liability under s 2(1)(b) if the organization's duty was as an occupier. As parliamentary debates accepted, if a brick fell off a wall because of poor maintenance and killed a prisoner that would trigger liability under the provisions already in force since the duty of care was the ordinary one owed by an occupier of premises.²⁵⁵

Duty issues under s 2

Given the potential breadth of the categories of duty and examination of the common law which might be necessary to determine whether a duty does exist, it is reassuring to see that the question whether a duty of care is owed is a question of law. It is for the judge to decide: s 2(5). Moreover, 'the judge must make any findings of fact necessary to decide that question'. This latter provision about the judge finding facts is highly unusual and should be contrasted with the common law position on gross negligence manslaughter²⁵⁶ where whether a duty of care exists is a matter for the jury once the judge has decided that there is evidence capable of establishing a duty.

Section 2(6) makes it clear that the duty of care will not be excluded by ex turpi causa and volenti doctrines.²⁵⁷ This is potentially very important. The scope of liability at civil law is restricted in practice by the operation of these doctrines. However, the reason that they are excluded as defences or limits on criminal liability in this context is easy enough to deduce. The victim will in many cases not be properly described as taking a truly voluntary risk since he will be compelled to do so by the organization acting as his employer, etc.

14.5.3.2 The breach must be as a result of the way the activities are managed or organized

This second element of the offence is designed to ensure that the focus is on the so-called 'management failure'. This test is not linked to a particular level of management but considers how an activity was managed within the organization as a whole. It will now be possible to combine the shortcomings of a wide number of individuals within the organization to prove a failure of management by the organization. The language is designed to reflect the concentration on things done consistently with the organization's culture and policies more generally. It remains to be seen how easily this can be proved.

Senior management

The Act does, however, place a significant restriction on the organizational failure test. Under s 1(3), the offence is committed by an organization only if 'the way in which its activities are managed and organised by its senior management is a substantial element in the breach referred to in subsection (1)'.²⁵⁸ Who are the senior managers? By s 1(4)(c): 'senior management', in relation to an organization, means the persons who play 'significant roles' in making:

²⁵⁴ See p 609.

²⁵⁵ See Taylor, n 220. See also S Griffin, 'Accountability for Deaths Attributable to the Gross Negligent Act or Omission of a Police Force: The Impact of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007' (2010) 74 J Crim L 648.

²⁵⁶ Evans [2009] EWCA Crim 650.

²⁵⁷ Wacker [2003] QB 1203.

²⁵⁸ cf Norrie for the argument that this element of the offence demonstrates a problematic return to the identification approach. Norrie, Crime, Reason and History, 125.

decisions about how the whole or a substantial part of its activities are to be managed or organised, or the actual managing or organising of the whole or a substantial part of those activities.

This extends beyond the narrow category of senior individuals who would be caught at common law by the identification doctrine being the ‘directing mind and will’.²⁵⁹

The senior managers’ management and organization must be a ‘substantial element’ in the breach of duty leading to death. Two important consequences flow from this aspect of the offence. First, since the senior managers’ involvement need only be a substantial element in the organization, etc, the involvement and conduct of others—‘non-senior managers’ who are involved in the management and organization of activities—is also relevant. Secondly, when assessing the management failure the contribution of those individuals who are not senior management can be taken into account even if their involvement is ‘substantial’ provided it is not so great as to render the senior managers’ involvement something less than substantial. There can be more than one substantial element. No doubt the courts will say that a ‘substantial’ involvement is something that the jury can evaluate as an ordinary English word meaning more than trivial.

14.5.3.3 A ‘gross’ breach of duty?

The requirement of a gross breach of duty is clearly designed to echo the gross negligence manslaughter offence at common law. Section 2(4)(b) provides a more detailed explanation of the concept—a breach of a duty of care by an organization is a ‘gross’ breach if the conduct alleged to amount to a breach of that duty falls far below what can reasonably be expected of the organization in the circumstances. The language chosen is similar to that proposed by the Law Commission as a suitable form of words to replace gross negligence. The test retains a degree of circularity, although not to the extent of that in the common law offence of gross negligence manslaughter.

The jury’s duty in relation to determining the breach of duty is provided in s 8:

- (1) This section applies where—
 - (a) it is established that an organisation owed a relevant duty of care to a person, and
 - (b) it falls to the jury to decide whether there was a gross breach of that duty.
- (2) The jury must consider whether the evidence shows that the organisation failed to comply with any health and safety legislation^[260] that relates to the alleged breach, and if so—
 - (a) how serious that failure was;
 - (b) how much of a risk of death it posed.
- (3) The jury may also—
 - (a) consider the extent to which the evidence shows that there were attitudes, policies, systems or accepted practices within the organisation that were likely to have encouraged any such failure as is mentioned in subsection (2), or to have produced tolerance of it;
 - (b) have regard to any health and safety guidance that relates to the alleged breach.
- (4) This section does not prevent the jury from having regard to any other matters they consider relevant.

²⁵⁹ Is the test too restrictive? Will companies seek to avoid this by nominating people in less senior positions to take responsibility for all health and safety policies?

²⁶⁰ Defined in s 8(5): “health and safety guidance” means any code, guidance, manual or similar publication that is concerned with health and safety matters and is made or issued (under a statutory provision or otherwise) by an authority responsible for the enforcement of any health and safety legislation’.

This section deals with factors to be taken into account by the jury (the offence is only triable on indictment). Note that the jury 'must' consider these issues. Note also that the jury is obliged to consider whether the 'organization' complied, not just whether its senior management complied. This further supports the argument that the activities of non-senior managers are relevant in determining whether there has been a management failure. Section 8(3) emphasizes that the jury may have reference to general organizational and systems failures.²⁶¹ The inability to do so under the old law was a source of common complaint. How the 'attitudes, etc' are proved is problematic. There is the potential for lengthy arguments and evidence comparing practices across the particular sector or industry. Imagine a prosecution of a rail company and the potential for the company to adduce evidence of safety procedures and policies across the sector to demonstrate the quality of its own. No doubt the jury will have regard to the organization's overall objectives, published policy statements on safety, monitoring and compliance policies, attitudes to development of safety and to training and awareness, approaches to remedying previous health and safety infringements, etc.

14.5.3.4 Causing death

There must be a death of a person. Causation must be established in accordance with orthodox principles.²⁶² Difficulties may arise where the organization alleges that the individual employee has, with his free, voluntary, informed fatal act, broken the chain of causation.²⁶³

14.5.4 Excluded duties

The most important aspect of the legislation is not the scope of relevant duty and of potential liability under s 1 and s 2, but rather what the government excluded from the scope of liability under ss 3 to 7. The excluded categories of duty are considerable. The different categories and sub-categories of duty also make the interpretation of whether a duty is owed rather more complex to unravel.

14.5.4.1 Public policy

The broadest exclusion is provided in s 3(1) and deals with decisions of public policy taken by public authorities.

Any duty of care owed by a public authority in respect of a decision as to matters of public policy (including in particular the allocation of public resources or the weighing of competing public interests) is not a 'relevant duty of care'.

This excludes liability where a death is due to a public authority's decision not to allocate appropriate resources to a particular service. The section is seeking to reflect the distinction between 'operational' and 'public' policy matters in the law of tort.²⁶⁴ The manner in which a public authority implements its duty in practice is justiciable in negligence, but the way it exercises its statutory discretion is not. In X v Bedfordshire County Council,²⁶⁵ Lord Browne-Wilkinson said that, 'a common law duty of care in relation to the taking of decisions involving policy matters cannot exist'.²⁶⁶ The courts have continually struggled ²⁶¹ This section has been influenced, as has much of this Act, by the Australian legislation and academic comment in Australia. See further B Fisse and J Braithwaite, Corporations, Crime and Accountability (1993).

²⁶² See Ch 2.

²⁶³ See Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38. However, it is arguable that the decision in Latif [1996] 1 WLR 104 would apply because the employee and organization are acting in concert.

²⁶⁴ See Anns v Merton Borough Council [1978] AC 728, HL. See Horder, n 210, at 115.

²⁶⁵ [1995] 2 AC 633, HL. ²⁶⁶ ibid, 738.

with the dividing line and it has been recognized that the test is very difficult to apply.²⁶⁷ It remains to be seen to what extent the criminal courts will be willing to engage in detailed evaluations of the common law on this issue.

As an example of the difficulty, if a relevant public authority decides not to deploy resources to buy a particular drug for patients suffering a particular illness, no duty arises. If, having made the decision to supply the drug, there is negligence in the way it is supplied/administered, etc, liability may arise. Interesting issues could arise in a trial in which the breach is of a duty owed by a private company and a public body where they have joint responsibility for managing an activity. The effect of the exemptions would be stark.

Section 3(2) provides a less extensive exclusion in relation to things done ‘in the exercise of an exclusively public function’:

- (2) Any duty of care owed in respect of things done in the exercise of an exclusively public function is not a ‘relevant duty of care’ unless it falls within section 2(1)(a), (b) or (d).
- (3) Any duty of care owed by a public authority in respect of inspections carried out in the exercise of a statutory function is not a ‘relevant duty of care’ unless it falls within section 2(1)(a) or (b).
- (4) In this section—
 - ‘exclusively public function’ means a function that falls within the prerogative of the Crown or is, by its nature, exercisable only with authority conferred—
 - (a) by the exercise of that prerogative, or
 - (b) by or under a statutory provision;
 - ‘statutory function’ means a function conferred by or under a statutory provision.

The duty of care owed as employer or occupier or custodian under s 2(1)(a) or (b) or (d) still applies in these circumstances. This excludes only public functions involved in s 2(1)(c), notably the supply of goods or services and construction work, etc. The exemption was not supported by consultees in the government’s consultation exercise.²⁶⁸

14.5.4.2 Military activities: s 4

Many of the activities performed by the armed forces²⁶⁹ will be excluded by virtue of s 3(2) (above), but s 3(2) does not prevent liability arising as an employer or occupier. Section 4 goes further by providing a total exclusion for some activities. There is no relevant duty for:

operations, including peacekeeping operations and operations for dealing with terrorism, civil unrest or serious public disorder, in the course of which members of the armed forces come under attack or face the threat of attack or violent resistance.

Liability is also excluded for preparation and support of military operations of that description, or training of a hazardous nature, or training carried out in a hazardous way, which it is considered needs to be carried out, or carried out in that way, in order to improve or maintain the effectiveness of the armed forces with respect to such operations.²⁷⁰

²⁶⁷ See Phelps v Hillingdon LBC [2001] 2 AC 619, HL, and also: Gorringe v Calderdale Metropolitan Borough Council [2004] UKHL 15; Carty v Croydon London Borough Council [2005] EWCA Civ 19; Connor v Surrey County Council [2010] EWCA Civ 286. See further, Horder, n 210.

²⁶⁸ Home Office, Summary of Responses to Corporate Manslaughter: The Government’s Draft Bill for Reform, Mar 2005, para 9.

²⁶⁹ By s 12(1) ‘the “armed forces” means any of the naval, military or air forces of the Crown raised under the law of the United Kingdom’.

²⁷⁰ Will there be a problem in ECHR terms if the army cannot be prosecuted for killing? Arguably there will be no breach of Art 2 because an intentional killing will be prosecutable as murder on the part of the officer involved.

The armed forces will owe a duty as an employer²⁷¹ or occupier other than in those circumstances.²⁷²

14.5.4.3 The police: s 5

The exemptions provided for police activities are also complex.²⁷³ Two categories exist. Sections 5(1) and 5(2) create a total exemption—that is, no relevant duty arises for some types of policing activity—where, in short, there are operations in relation to terrorism or civil unrest. More fully, there is no duty on the organization where officers or employees²⁷⁴ of the public authority²⁷⁵ in question are engaged in operations for dealing with terrorism, civil unrest or serious disorder, which involve them coming under attack, or facing the threat of attack or violent resistance, or those involving the carrying on of policing or law enforcement activities (s 5(2)). Nor is there a duty when the police are preparing for those types of operations or training to enable them to carry out such operations.

In other circumstances, by s 5(3) a ‘relevant duty of care’ is owed where the organization is acting as employer, occupier or custodian (ie s 2(1)(a), (b) or (d)). This exemption will exclude circumstances where a member of the public has been killed in the pursuit of law enforcement activities. The Explanatory Notes suggest that this includes:

decisions about and responses to emergency calls, the manner in which particular police operations are conducted, the way in which law enforcement and other coercive powers are exercised, measures taken to protect witnesses and the arrest and detention of suspects.

Professor Horder has suggested²⁷⁶ that the extent of the exceptions in ss 4 and 5 is unwarranted and that the result may be to leave individuals at risk of liability when the agency is the one at fault. He suggests also that the exemption was unnecessary having regard to the need for the DPP’s consent.²⁷⁷ This is debatable. For Parliament to have fixed these activities as off-limits is one thing. To expect the DPP to have to make policy decisions such as the exemption of the police in a case of fatality is to subject him or her to media censure for whatever decision is made, and to diminish the level of certainty in the law.

14.5.4.4 Emergency services: s 6

In the law of tort, considerable difficulties have arisen in identifying the scope of the duty of care owed by the emergency and rescue services in the course of performing rescue activity. Section 6 puts beyond doubt that the corporate manslaughter offence does not apply ²⁷¹ By s 12(2), a person who is a member of the armed forces is to be treated as employed by the Ministry of Defence.

²⁷² There is no liability for special forces: ‘Any duty of care owed by the Ministry of Defence in respect of activities carried on by members of the special forces is not a “relevant duty of care” (s 4(3)). This is presumably necessary to allow for more extreme forms of training. By s 4(4), ‘the “special forces” means those units of the armed forces the maintenance of whose capabilities is the responsibility of the Director of Special Forces or which are for the time being subject to the operational command of that Director’.

²⁷³ See S Griffin, ‘Accountability for Deaths Attributable to the Gross Negligent Act or Omission of a Police Force: The Impact of the Corporate Manslaughter and Corporate Homicide Act 2007’ (2010) 74 J Crim L 648.

²⁷⁴ Section 13 provides that police officers are to be treated as the employees of the police force for which they work (and are therefore owed the employer’s duty of care by the force). It also ensures that police forces are treated as occupiers of premises and that other conduct is attributable to them as if they were distinctly constituted bodies.

²⁷⁵ This could include other authorities such as NCA or immigration officials: s 5(4).

²⁷⁶ See n 210, at 119.

²⁷⁷ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/corporate-manslaughter. In reality this consent can be granted by any prosecutor. It is not a significant safeguard.

generally to these agencies when responding to emergencies.²⁷⁸ Approximate consistency with the civil law is secured by excluding liability arising from delay in response to an emergency, or the level of skill exercised in responding to the operation. The relevant emergency services protected by this exclusion are: the fire and rescue authorities and other emergency response organizations providing fire and rescue services; NHS bodies and ambulance services or blood/organ transport; the Coastguard and RNLI;²⁷⁹ the armed forces (either responding to a military emergency such as a fire on a base or when assisting the civilian rescue services). By s 6(7), emergency circumstances are defined in terms of those that are life-threatening or which are causing, or threaten to cause, serious injury or illness or serious harm to the environment or buildings or other property.

The emergency services may still be liable for a death arising from their status as employer or occupier even where the death arises in the course of an emergency (s 6(5)). The exemption also does not apply to duties that do not relate to the way in which a body responds to an emergency, for example duties to maintain vehicles in a safe condition; these will be capable of prosecution under the offence. There is no exemption from liability for medical treatment itself, or decisions about this (other than decisions that establish the priority for treating patients). Matters relating to the organization and management of medical services will therefore be within the ambit of the offence (s 6(4)).

14.5.4.5 Child protection and probation: s 7

Section 7 limits the duty of care that a local authority or other public authority owes in respect of the exercise of its functions under Parts IV and V of the Children Act 1989. In relation to the carrying on of those duties, a relevant duty arises for the purposes of s 1 only in relation to its activities as employer, occupier and duties relating to detention (s 2(1)(a), (b), (d)). There is no relevant duty, for example, if a child was not identified as being at risk and taken into care and was subsequently fatally injured. Similarly, any duty of care that a local probation board, provider of probation services or other public authority owes in respect of the exercise by it of functions under Chapter 1 of Part 1 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 or the Offender Management Act 2007 is excluded. In relation to carrying out those duties, a relevant duty arises for the purposes of s 1 only in relation to its activities as employer, occupier and duties relating to detention (s 2(1)(a), (b), (d)).

14.5.5 Procedure

The offence of corporate manslaughter is triable only on indictment (s 1(6)), and a prosecution may not be instituted without the consent of the DPP (s 17(1)).²⁸⁰ Proceedings against partnerships²⁸¹ for the offence are to be brought in the name of the partnership (and not in that of any of its members) (s 14(2)). Any fine imposed on a partnership is to be paid out of the funds of the partnership (s 14(3)). Further provision is made in s 15 for evidential and procedural mechanisms to apply to organizations which are not corporations. The section ensures that the relevant evidential and procedural provisions apply, in the same way as they apply to corporations, to all those government departments or other bodies listed in Sch 1, as well as to police forces and those unincorporated associations covered by the offence.

²⁷⁸ Emergency circumstances include circumstances that are believed to be emergency circumstances: s 6(8). This deals with the circumstances in which the response is to a hoax call.

²⁷⁹ Those effecting sea rescue are also exempt in a very wide exclusionary provision.

²⁸⁰ cf L Jones and S Field, 'Corporate Criminal Liability for Manslaughter: The Evolving Approach of the Prosecuting Authorities and Courts in England and Wales' (2011) 32 JBL 80.

²⁸¹ Other than limited liability partnerships, which are corporate bodies and covered by the new offence as such.

14.5.5.1 Jurisdiction

Section 28 deals with extent and territorial application. The Act extends to the whole of the UK. Section 1 applies if the harm resulting in death is sustained: in the UK; or within the seaward limits of the territorial sea adjacent to the UK; on a British registered ship, British-controlled aircraft; a British-controlled hovercraft; in, on or above, or within 500 metres of, an offshore installation in UK territorial waters or a designated area of the UK's continental shelf (s 28(3)).²⁸²

Section 28(4) provides that:

For the purposes of subsection (3)(b) to (d) harm sustained on a ship, aircraft or hovercraft includes harm sustained by a person who—

- (a) is then no longer on board the ship, aircraft or hovercraft in consequence of the wrecking of it or of some other mishap affecting it or occurring on it, and
- (b) sustains the harm in consequence of that event.

Section 1 will therefore still apply if the harm resulting in death is sustained as a result of an incident involving a British vessel, but the victim is not physically on board when he suffers that harm. It will not apply if the incident involves a non-British vessel in international waters.

14.5.5.2 Penalties

An organization guilty of corporate manslaughter is liable to an unlimited fine (s 1(6)).²⁸³ Cotswold Geotechnical Holdings Ltd was fined £385,000. This fine was upheld despite the fact that it would lead the company into liquidation.²⁸⁴ It was held that in some bad cases this may be an acceptable consequence. In addition, the court has power on the application of the prosecution to impose a remedial order against an organization convicted of corporate manslaughter requiring it to take specified steps to remedy: the breach; any matter appearing to have resulted from it and to have been a cause of the death; or any health and safety deficiency in the 'organisation's policies, systems or practices' appearing to be indicated by the breach (s 9(1) and (2)). This provision is also heavily influenced by Australian experience. Any such order must be on 'such terms (whether those proposed or others) as the court considers appropriate having regard to any representations made, and any evidence adduced, in relation to that matter by the prosecution or on behalf of the organisation' (s 9(2)).

Section 9(4) provides for the form of a remedial order. It must specify a period within which the remedial steps are to be taken and may require the organization to supply evidence of compliance. Periods specified may be extended or further extended by order of the court on an application made before the end of that period or extended period. An organization which fails to comply with a remedial order commits an offence triable only ²⁸² For difficulties in international waters see the investigation into the death of a fisherman 15 miles off Cherbourg after a collision which resulted in no prosecution. See P Binning, 'Corporate Manslaughter on the High Seas' (2010) The Times, 28 Oct. Our thanks to Ms Chayne Hodgetts for background information.

²⁸³ The Sentencing Council has issued a definitive sentencing guideline which includes guidance on sentencing for corporate manslaughter and which is entitled Health and safety offences, corporate manslaughter and food safety and hygiene offences: Definitive guideline (2015). It has effect from 1 February 2016. It is available in full at www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/publications/item/health-and-safety-offences-corporate-manslaughter-and-food-safety-and-hygiene-offences-definitive-guideline/. For discussion of sentencing issues see M Woodley, 'Bargaining Over Corporate Manslaughter—What Price a Life?' (2013) 77 J Crim L 33.

²⁸⁴ [2011] EWCA Crim 1337.

on indictment and punishable with an unlimited fine (s 9(5)). There appears to be nothing to prevent the conviction of a director as an accessory to this offence.

In addition, the court has power to impose a 'publicity order' under s 10 'requiring the organisation to publicise in a specified manner' its conviction, specified particulars, the amount of any fine and the terms of any remedial order. Before imposing such an order, the court must ascertain the views of any relevant enforcement authority as it considers appropriate, and have regard to any representations made by the prosecution or the organization. The form of a remedial order must specify a period within which the publicity order must be complied with, and may require the organization to supply evidence of compliance. An organization which fails to comply with an order commits an offence triable only on indictment and punishable with an unlimited fine (s 10(4)). Section 10 was added to the Bill during its passage in the House of Lords. It is clearly predicated on the assumption (probably correct) that large organizations are more concerned about adverse publicity than a fine.

Further homicide and related offences

15.1 Offences ancillary to murder

Murder remains a common law offence, but Parliament was not content to leave to the common law the punishment of acts preliminary to murder. The OAPA 1861 created offences of conspiracy, solicitation, attempt and threats to murder. The offences of attempt were particularly complicated¹ and were repealed by the Criminal Law Act 1967. Attempts to commit murder are now governed by the Criminal Attempts Act 1981.² The conspiracy provision was repealed by the Criminal Law Act 1977 and conspiracy to murder is governed by that Act. Those who assist or encourage murder might be convicted of offences under Part 2 of the Serious Crime Act 2007, as discussed in Ch 11, but there is also a specific offence of soliciting murder.

15.1.1 Solicitation

By s 4 of the OAPA 1861 (as amended by the Criminal Law Act 1977) it is an offence punishable with life imprisonment to ‘solicit, encourage, persuade or endeavour to persuade or . . . propose to any person, to murder any other person’.

The offence is relied on commonly to deal with those who hire ‘contract killers’ (who turn out to be undercover police officers)³ and has been used in more recent years to prosecute fundamentalist preachers who encourage their congregations to kill.⁴ Sentences for the offence are high.⁵

15.1.1.1 A person

A child in the womb is not in law a ‘person’, so D encouraging X to kill the foetus while in the womb does not commit this offence.⁶ But, in Shephard,⁷ D’s conviction was upheld when he wrote to a pregnant woman, ‘When the kiddie is born you must lie on it . . . Don’t let it live . . .’ The decision seems reasonable on the facts—D was soliciting murder; that is,

¹ See the 1st edition of this book, at pp 250–253.

² See Ch 11.

³ See, as an example, Singh Rai (Jagjit) [2005] EWCA Crim 3126, [2006] 2 Cr App R (S) 13.

⁴ See El-Faisal [2004] EWCA Crim 343 and Abu Hamza [2006] EWCA Crim 2918, [2007] Crim LR 320. The offence is considered, briefly, in LCCP 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person: A Scoping Consultation Paper (2014), and LC 361 Reform of Offences Against the Person (2015) Ch 8.

⁵ See Saleem [2007] EWCA Crim 2692.

⁶ See Re F (in utero) [1988] Fam 122, CA (Civ Div). Nor is it the offence of assisting or encouraging grievous bodily harm to the mother, since the foetus is not part of the mother; see p 124.

⁷ [1919] 2 KB 125, CCA, a case found ‘very hard to follow’ in Tait, n 24.

to kill the child once born—but the court based it on the strange ground that the offence only arose if the child was in fact born alive. This seems untenable.

15.1.1.2 Victim

The proposed victim need not be named. If the solicitation is to kill members of a group, it must be a sufficiently well-defined one. Where D was charged with the offence and the indictment alleged he had incited murder of 'sovereigns and rulers of Europe', Phillimore J thought 'rulers' a somewhat vague word, but there were some 18 or 20 sovereigns in Europe and that was a sufficiently well-defined class.⁸ In El-Faisal,⁹ the incitement was to kill all Jews, Christians, Americans, Hindus and non-believers, but it does not appear from the report to have been challenged as an insufficiently defined class.¹⁰

There is no scope for an argument that the offence restricts the right to freedom of expression under Art 10 of the ECHR, since the limitation will, most obviously, be justified as necessary and proportionate for the protection of others.

15.1.1.3 Audience

The offence may be committed by the publication of an article in a newspaper and it is immaterial that the readers of the newspapers are not identified.¹¹ Logically, it must be capable of commission by email and by posts on the internet.¹² It seems, however, that the offence is not committed unless the mind of the person solicited, etc is reached: Krause.¹³ In that case Lord Alverstone CJ applied this restricted reading even though the offence extends to an 'endeavour to persuade' which might be thought to cover an unsuccessful attempt to communicate. He held, however, that there was a common law attempt to commit the statutory offence where it was not proved that the offending letters, though sent, had ever reached the addressee.¹⁴ If it is proved that the letter or other publication did reach the addressee, it is not necessary to prove that his mind was in any way affected by it.¹⁵

15.1.1.4 'Solicitation'

A soliciting to kill, not merely to do serious harm, must be proved.¹⁶ In deciding whether the words amount to a solicitation, etc, the jury will take account of: (a) the language used; (b) the occasion on which it was used; (c) the persons to whom the words were used; and (d) the circumstances surrounding their use. In Diamond,¹⁷ Coleridge J left the jury to decide whether an article extolling the virtues of the assassins of tyrants was sufficient. The ⁸ Antonelli and Barberi (1905) 70 JP 4 (Central Criminal Court). ⁹ [2004] EWCA Crim 343.

¹⁰ In Rahman [2008] EWCA Crim 2290, the offending words were made by D with a microphone referring to western forces in Iraq and Afghanistan. He said, among other things, 'We want to see them coming home in body bags. We want to see their blood running in the streets of Baghdad. We want to see their blood running in Fallujah. We want to see the Mujahideen shoot down their planes the way we shoot down the birds.' He then prayed to Allah, 'Don't leave any of them alive in Iraq. Don't leave any of them alive in Afghanistan.' D carried two different placards with slogans reading 'annihilate those who insult Islam' and 'behead those who insult Islam'.

¹¹ Most (1881) 7 QBD 244, CCR endorsed in Jones [2007] EWCA Crim 1118, [2007] Crim LR 979.

¹² See Sheppard and Whittle [2010] EWCA Crim 65, [2010] Crim LR 720, discussed in Ch 30. D could be tried in England because a substantial measure of his activities took place there.

¹³ (1902) 66 JP 121 (Central Criminal Court). Contrast Horton v Mead [1913] 1 KB 154.

¹⁴ See also Banks (1873) 12 Cox CC 393 at 399, per Quain J.

¹⁵ Diamond (1920) 84 JP 211 (Central Criminal Court); Most, n 11; Krause, n 13.

¹⁶ Bainbridge (1991) No 504/24/90, (1991) 93 Cr App R 32, [1991] Crim LR 535, CA (not reported on this point).

¹⁷ See n 15.

publication was just after an attempt on the life of the Viceroy of India, and the persons addressed were not 'a debating society of philosophers or divines' but 'anybody whom the paper would reach in this country or in Ireland'.

15.1.1.5 Offence solicited

It has been held to be sufficient that D incites P to act as an accessory to murder, as where D recruits P to act as the getaway driver in a murder.¹⁸

15.1.1.6 Mens rea

The section contains no explicit requirement that D intends or believes that his encouragement will be acted upon. It is likely that the offence follows the common law of incitement, as it existed before 2007.¹⁹ It is submitted that the mens rea is that D intends or believes that the other person, if he acts as incited, shall or will do so with the fault required for the offence.

15.1.1.7 Jurisdiction

Section 4 is applicable where the person to be murdered is not a British subject or within this jurisdiction. The section also catches an alien who, within this jurisdiction, incites the commission of murder abroad, and who might otherwise be immune at common law under the rule in Board of Trade v Owen.²⁰ In El-Faisal,²¹ the solicitation was sufficient where it was to murder all 'Hindus, Jews and non-believers [in Islam]' and it was contemplated that the killings incited might occur in any part of the world. In Abu Hamza,²² the Court of Appeal, after an extensive survey of case law, held that s 4 makes the solicitation of murder an offence in England, even where the inciter is not British, the proposed killer is not British, the killing will be abroad and the proposed victim is not British. The act of incitement under s 4 may be an offence under English law, even if the act of murder, if carried out, would not be. Lord Phillips CJ observed that the motivation for the enactment of s 4 appeared to have been the activities of aliens in England in support of murders, or attempts to murder, committed by foreigners outside the jurisdiction. If so, it would have made no sense to have restricted the offence to situations where the murderers were to be British subjects. There was nothing in the wording that suggested that the conspirators, or the person incited, should be British subjects.

15.1.2 Threats to kill

Section 16 of the OAPA 1861 created an offence of making written threats to murder.²³ Schedule 12 to the Criminal Law Act 1977 replaced that provision with a new and broader s 16:

A person who without lawful excuse makes to another a threat, intending that that other would fear it would be carried out, to kill that other or a third person shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years.

A foetus is not 'a third person' and so a threat to a mother to kill the foetus in her womb does not amount to this offence.²⁴ In Tait, the court thought that if the threat had been to ¹⁸ Winter [2007] EWCA Crim 3493, [2008] Crim LR 821. ¹⁹ See the 11th edition of this work.

²⁰ [1957] AC 602, HL, cf M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) 149, a view rejected by the CA in Abu Hamza, n 4.

²¹ [2004] EWCA Crim 343.

²² [2006] EWCA Crim 2918, [2007] Crim LR 320.

²³ See the 3rd edition of this book, at p 266.

²⁴ Tait [1990] 1 QB 290, [1989] Crim LR 834, CA. Cited with approval by the Court of Appeal (Civ Div) in CP (A Child) v Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority [2014] EWCA Civ 1554. See also LCCP 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person: A Scoping Consultation Paper (2014), and LC 361 Reform of Offences Against the Person (2015) Ch 8.

kill the child after it was born it would still not be an offence—if that were an offence, they asked, why should it not be an offence to threaten a non-pregnant woman to kill any child she might have in the future? This, the court thought, ‘seems to stretch the meaning of “any third person” altogether too far’. Perhaps so, but this was a threat to kill a particular person, already existing in embryo at least, which is altogether a different threat in terms of its impact on the mother—or anyone else. The decision in Shephard, discussed earlier²⁵ suggests that this would have been the offence (if we ignore the strange and unsupportable dictum)—how could it be soliciting to kill a person and not threatening to kill a person? Moreover, it is a threat to kill a person, which the foetus will by then have become.

The threat may take any form²⁶ and may be implied as well as express.²⁷ There is no need for the words ‘I will kill’ to be explicitly used.²⁸ There is no need for the threat to be made to the person against whom the violence will be carried out.²⁹ The offence is made out if D makes a threat to A, intending that A would fear it would be carried out. It does not matter if the threat is to kill A or B.

In principle, it is thought that a threat should be ‘made to another’ only when communicated; but, since it has been held that a ‘demand’ is ‘made’ within s 21(1) of the Theft Act 1968 when and where a letter containing it is posted,³⁰ it is at least possible that the same might be decided in the case of a threat. The inclusion of the words ‘to another’ in this section makes no difference, since the demand under s 21 must impliedly be made to another. Threats to kill in England and Wales made by emails from abroad have been sufficient to constitute the offence.³¹

The offence is triable either way.³² The statute makes a single threat to kill an offence and therefore where D has made repeated threats to kill over a period of time these ought not all to be charged in one count in the indictment (infringing the rule against duplicity).³³

15.1.2.1 Lawful excuses

There would be a lawful excuse for making the threat if, in the circumstances known to D, the killing would be excusable if the threat were carried out, as where D makes the threat in self-defence.³⁴ A threat to kill may, however, be excusable where actual killing would not. To cause fear of death might be reasonable to prevent crime or arrest an offender, whereas actually to kill would be quite unreasonable.³⁵ In many cases it will be desirable to tell the jury this.³⁶ Where there is some evidence of a lawful excuse, the onus is on the Crown to prove its absence and the question is always one for the jury.³⁷

²⁵ [1919] 2 KB 125, CCA, n 7.

²⁶ See n 28. See Kennedy [1999] 1 Cr App R 54, [1998] Crim LR 739, CA.

²⁷ cf Solanke [1970] 1 WLR 1, CA. See Boucher (1831) 4 Car & P 562. In Dhir v Saddler [2017] EWHC 3155 (QB) at [30], Nicklin J stated that ‘I am quite satisfied that the words “he threatened to slit my throat” impute the commission of the offence of making a threat to kill under s.16.’

²⁸ As in Robinson [2009] EWCA Crim 375 where D had said to a police officer who asked if D was making a loose threat: ‘I am making a semi automatic one and it is loaded.’

²⁹ See eg Donovan [2009] EWCA Crim 1258 (D informs prison officers he will kill V when he is released from present sentence).

³⁰ Teacy v DPP [1971] AC 537, HL; Pogmore [2017] EWCA Crim 925, see p 998.

³¹ M [2003] EWCA Crim 3067.

³² Magistrates’ Courts Act 1980, s 17 and Sch 1, para 5.

³³ See Marchese [2008] EWCA Crim 389, [2008] Crim LR 797 unless to do so is compatible with the Criminal Procedure Rules 2013, r 14(2).

³⁴ See p 380.

³⁵ The two preceding sentences were approved by the Court of Appeal in Cousins [1982] 2 All ER 115, CA, at 117, [1982] Crim LR 444.

³⁶ Cousins, ibid. ³⁷ ibid.

15.2 Complicity in suicide and suicide pacts

15.2.1 Position at common law

It was felony at common law for a sane person of the age of responsibility to kill himself either intentionally or in the course of trying to kill another.³⁸ Such a suicide was regarded as self-murder. Though the offender was, being dead, personally beyond the reach of the law, his guilt was not without important consequences at common law, since it resulted in the forfeiture to the Crown of his property. The results were more important, however, where the attempt failed, for then:

- (1) since D had attempted to commit a felony he was guilty, under ordinary common law principles, of the misdemeanour of attempted suicide;
- (2) if D, in the course of trying to kill himself, killed another, he was guilty of murder under the doctrine of transferred malice.³⁹

Though suicide was regarded as ‘not a very serious crime’,⁴⁰ an intention to commit it was the mens rea of murder. Moreover, someone who was an accessory to the suicide of another was guilty of murder as an accessory. It followed that the survivor of a suicide pact was also guilty of murder, for, even if he did not actually kill, he was an accessory to the other party’s self-murder.

15.2.2 The Suicide Act 1961

Suicide ceased to be a crime by virtue of the Suicide Act 1961 which simply provides that: ‘The rule of law whereby it is a crime for a person to commit suicide is hereby abrogated.’

There were very sound reasons for the abolition of the felony of suicide.⁴¹ The ‘felon’ was dead and thus beyond the reach of punishment. The legal sanction was not an effective deterrent—there were some 5,000 suicides a year; and the effect was merely to add to the distress and pain of the bereaved relatives. The most important practical effect of the Act, however, was its repeal by implication of the crime of attempted suicide. If it was not a crime to commit suicide, it could not be a crime to attempt it. This also recognized the realities of the situation for it had been the practice for many years to institute proceedings only where it was necessary for the attempter’s protection, for example because no relatives and friends were willing to give help. Thus, in 1959, of a total of 4,980 suicide attempts known to the police (and an estimated actual total of 25,000 concealed from the police) only 518 prosecutions were brought. The protection of the attempter may now be secured where necessary under the Mental Health Act 1983.

15.2.2.1 Complicity in another’s suicide

Section 2 of the Suicide Act created a new offence for D to aid, abet, counsel or procure P in his suicide or attempt to commit suicide. The form of the offence was, in theoretical terms, ³⁸ Hawkins, I PC, 77. For historical discussions on the implementation of the offences, see G Williams, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (1957) Ch 7; St John Stevas, Life, Death and the Law (1961) Ch 6; Second Report of the Criminal Law Revision Committee (1960) Cmnd 1187. See also on this historical position Toulson LJ in Nicklinson in the Divisional Court at [2012] EWHC 2381 (Admin) at [28] et seq.

³⁹ Hopwood (1913) 8 Cr App R 143, CCA; Spence (1957) 41 Cr App R 80, CCA.

⁴⁰ French (1955) 39 Cr App R 192, CCA, per Lord Goddard CJ.

⁴¹ In his judgment in Nicklinson [2014] UKSC 38, [212], Lord Sumption suggested the reason for decriminalization was not that suicide had become morally acceptable, but because it was recognized that imposing criminal sanctions was inhumane and ineffective.

an odd one. Since there was no principal offence committed by the suicidal person, so there was no crime for D to aid and abet. It had to be viewed as a specific statutory offence involving the use of the language of aiding and abetting even though there was no principal crime. Since the aiding, etc was the principal offence, it was possible to charge an attempt to aid, etc so that unsuccessful advice or encouragement was punishable.⁴² That offence has now been replaced by one defined, more logically, in terms of doing acts capable of assisting or encouraging suicide.

From 1 February 2010, s 59 of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 replaced s 2(1) of the Suicide Act with the following:

- (1) A person ('D') commits an offence if—
 - (a) D does an act capable of encouraging or assisting the suicide or attempted suicide of another person, and
 - (b) D's act was intended to encourage or assist suicide or an attempt at suicide.
- (1A) The person referred to in subsection (1)(a) need not be a specific person (or class of persons) known to, or identified by, D.
- (1B) D may commit an offence under this section whether or not a suicide, or an attempt at suicide, occurs.
- (1C) An offence under this section is triable on indictment and a person convicted of such an offence is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years.

The changes are designed to clarify the law.⁴³ There is no intended extension of the law. The main change is to shift the basis of the offence from one of 'aiding and abetting' and 'attempting' to an inchoate form of the offence as defined in the modern terminology under Part 2 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 relating to the inchoate offence of intentionally⁴⁴ encouraging and assisting crime. Moving to an inchoate form of offence (subs (1B)) means that there is no need to prosecute under the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 for attempt to assist suicide where no one, as a result of the encouragement, actually commits or attempts to commit suicide. The full offence under s 2(1) is now committed by doing an act capable of encouraging or assisting suicide whether or not any suicide is committed or attempted. The only scope for the operation of the law of attempt is where D attempts to do, but does not succeed in doing, 'the act' he intended to do by way of encouragement—for example, posting the letter of encouragement to the suicidal person.

Subsection (1A) makes it clear that one can be liable for doing acts capable of encouraging or assisting persons unknown to commit suicide. Material on a website may be caught.⁴⁵ The Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights expressed concern that the new offence might have a chilling effect on free speech.⁴⁶

⁴² McShane (1978) 66 Cr App R 97, [1977] Crim LR 737, CA, discussed by JC Smith in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 21 at 32–33. See more recently Workman [2006] EWCA Crim 2623, [2007] 1 Cr App R 637, and S [2005] EWCA Crim 819.

⁴³ The MOJ published a circular explaining the revised law on encouraging or assisting suicide, which came into effect on 1 Feb 2010, <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20110201140204/http://www.justice.gov.uk/publications/docs/circular-03-2010-assisting-encouraging-suicide.pdf>.

⁴⁴ It is unclear whether the restricted interpretation of that term that applies to s 44 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 applies here. See Ch 11.

⁴⁵ The reform was prompted in part by concerns about internet sites offering encouragement. See Safer Children in a Digital World: the report of the Byron Review (2008), www.iwf.org.uk/sites/default/files/inline-files/Safer%20Children%20in%20a%20Digital%20World%20report.pdf.

⁴⁶ It was suggested that the new offence might capture the publication of morbid poetry. The DPP in evidence to the Public Bill Committee gave assurance that this would not be caught because there would be no relevant intent.

Section 59 of the 2009 Act⁴⁷ also inserts a new s 2A into the Suicide Act as follows:

2A Acts capable of encouraging or assisting

- (1) If D arranges^[48] for a person ('D2') to do an act that is capable of encouraging or assisting the suicide or attempted suicide of another person and D2 does that act, D is also to be treated for the purposes of this Act as having done it.
- (2) Where the facts are such that an act is not capable of encouraging or assisting suicide or attempted suicide, for the purposes of this Act it is to be treated as so capable if the act would have been so capable had the facts been as D believed them to be at the time of the act or had subsequent events happened in the manner D believed they would happen (or both).
- (3) A reference in this Act to a person ('P') doing an act that is capable of encouraging the suicide or attempted suicide of another person includes a reference to P doing so by threatening another person or otherwise putting pressure on another person to commit or attempt suicide.

This new s 2A makes it clear: that the offence can be committed through an intermediary,⁴⁹ that there is no defence of impossibility⁵⁰ and that encouragement by threats or other forms of pressure is covered.⁵¹ Section 2B clarifies that D's liability need not be based on an individual act but may be based on a course of conduct over a period of time. Again, none of this is intended significantly to change the substance as opposed to the form of the previous law. That is doubtful as, over a decade after they were enacted, the breadth of the assisting and encouraging offences in the Serious Crime Act is yet to be fully tested.

During the passage of the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 Lord Falconer moved an amendment in the House of Lords which would have created an exception to s 2 of the 1961 Act in the case of acts done for the purpose of enabling or assisting a person to travel to a country in which assisted dying is lawful, subject to certain conditions. The amendment was defeated.

Prosecutorial policies

The operation of such an offence has given rise to considerable controversy because its scope means that those who help other consenting adults to die fall within its terms.⁵² To date the cases have arisen under the old definition, but the issues are as pertinent under the new offence.

Challenges to the offence were raised on the basis that it might even criminalize the distribution of a booklet giving advice to any person who wishes to commit suicide on how to do so efficiently and painlessly. It was held that this was not necessarily an offence under the pre-2009 law. In A-G v Able,⁵³ Woolf J refused to grant a declaration that the distribution ⁴⁷ Section 61 of and Sch 12 to the 2009 Act regulate, in relation to encouraging and assisting suicide, the liability of (electronic) information society service providers within the EEA area, thereby making the s 2 offence consistent with the UK's obligations under the E-Commerce Directive (2000/31/EC). Paragraphs 1 and 2 of Sch 12 extend the liability of domestically based providers to acts done within the EEA. Paragraph 3 limits the circumstances in which proceedings for the s 2 offence may be brought in the UK against EEA-based (as opposed to domestically based) service providers. Schedule 12 also provides for some limited exceptions where the service provider in question acts as a 'mere conduit', or is providing 'caching' or 'hosting' services.

⁴⁸ This is problematical. D1 who merely encourages D2 to provide encouragement to P to kill himself does not seem to have 'arranged', unlike D1 who provides D2 with material to pass to P.

⁴⁹ eg D gives lethal pills to X to administer to V.

⁵⁰ eg D gives V harmless pills that D thinks are lethal.

⁵¹ This could be very important with the types of bullying email and internet campaigns that lead to suicide.

⁵² See the references in n 67.

⁵³ [1984] QB 795, [1984] Crim LR 35, QBD. See Mental Capacity Act 2005, s 62 and Code, para 9.5. KJM Smith, 'Assisting Suicide—The Attorney-General and the Voluntary Euthanasia Society' [1983] Crim LR 579. See Mental Capacity Act 2005, s 62 and Code, para 9.5.

was unlawful, holding that an offence would be committed only if the distributor intended that the booklet would be used by someone contemplating suicide and that he would be (and in fact was) assisted or encouraged to do so. This challenge was brought to the old s 2 offence based on aiding and abetting and was in accordance with the ordinary principles of the law of secondary participation.⁵⁴ The new offence requires only that the publisher intends to do acts capable of assisting or encouraging and that his act was intended to encourage or assist suicide or an attempt at suicide.

The crime covers a variety of situations varying in moral culpability from D who encourages V to commit suicide for the purpose of inheriting his property,⁵⁵ to that of D who supplies a final fatal (over)dose to V of a prescribed drug to alleviate V's suffering when V is anxious to accelerate the end,⁵⁶ or refastens the plastic bag over the head of his terminally ill spouse as she desired.⁵⁷ The consent of the DPP is required in order to achieve consistency in prosecution practice.⁵⁸

A series of important cases in the House of Lords and Supreme Court have grappled with the limits of assisted suicide offences in English law, the prosecution policies that apply and the ECHR dimension to criminalizing assisted suicide. As Toulson LJ explained in the Divisional Court in Nicklinson (discussed later): 'these are tragic cases. They present society with legal and ethical questions of the most difficult kind. They also involve constitutional questions.'⁵⁹

R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP

In this landmark case it was held that the DPP had no power to give an undertaking that he would not prosecute the spouse, D, of a person, V, who suffered from an incurable disease which prevented her from committing suicide unaided, if D supplied V with the means of doing so when V requested it.⁶⁰ In Pretty v UK,⁶¹ the European Court of Human Rights accepted that Art 2's protection provides a right to life, not a right to death. It was held that Arts 2, 3 and 9 were not engaged by the claim of a right to assisted death; Art 8 was engaged in such circumstances, but the UK's criminal prohibition on assisted suicide fell within Art 8(2).⁶² The ⁵⁴ See Ch 6. ⁵⁵ eg Cumming [2006] EWCA Crim 3223, [2007] 2 Cr App R (S) 20.

⁵⁶ The Court of Appeal in Kennedy (No 2) [2005] EWCA Crim 685, suggested that 'it would be an abuse to prosecute someone assisting another to commit suicide for murder', at [32].

⁵⁷ See the prosecution of David March, discussed in S Burns, 'The Quality of Mercy' (2007) 157 NLJ 86.

⁵⁸ R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP [2002] 1 AC 800, HL. See also on prosecution policy Dunbar v Plant [1997] 3 WLR 1261. According to the DPP's Policy for Prosecutors in Respect of Cases of Encouraging or Assisting Suicide (Feb 2010, updated Oct 2014), www.cps.gov.uk/publications/prosecution/assisted_suicide_policy.html, the DPP will only consent where the full code test is met (para 14), and these cases are dealt with by the Special Crime Division, the head of which reports directly to the DPP (paras 49, 50). Lord Hughes observed that: 'There is no reason to think that section 2(4) was inserted into the Suicide Act 1961 with any intention of doing more than keeping the prosecutions in reliable hands.' Nicklinson, [273].

⁵⁹ [2012] EWHC 2381 (Admin), [1].

⁶⁰ R (Pretty) v DPP [2002] 1 AC 800, HL. The case decides that the ECHR does not oblige a State to legalize assisted suicide. For comment, see R Tur, 'Legislative Techniques and Human Rights—The Sad Case of Assisted Suicide' [2003] Crim LR 3. Cf D Calvert Smith and S O'Doherty, 'Legislative Technique and Human Rights—A Response' [2003] Crim LR 384.

⁶¹ [2002] 35 EHRR 1, ECtHR.

⁶² The House of Lords held that Art 8 was not engaged, since that Article was directed to the protection of personal autonomy whilst an individual was alive but did not confer a right to decide how or when to die: Lord Bingham [26], Lord Steyn [61]–[62], Lord Hope [100]–[102]. However, in R (Purdy) v DPP [2009] UKHL 45 (discussed later) the House of Lords departed from its decision in Pretty on this point and found Art 8(1) to be engaged: Lord Hope [35]–[38], Baroness Hale [67]–[68], Lord Brown [83]–[84] and Lord Neuberger at [95]. For analysis, see M Freeman, 'Death, Dying and the Human Rights Act 1998' (1999) 52 CLP 218 and 'Denying Death its Dominion' (2002) 10 Med L Rev 245; B Hale, 'A Pretty Pass—When is there a Right to Die?' (2003) 32 Common Law World Rev 1; D Morris, 'Assisted Suicide under the European Convention on Human Rights: A Critique' [2003] EHRLR 65.

doctor who complies with the request of a competent adult who refuses life-sustaining/saving treatment does not assist his suicide.⁶³ As Lord Goff observed in Bland, the doctor who keeps a patient comfortable whilst he dies cannot be said to assist suicide: 'there is no question of the patient having committed suicide nor therefore of the doctor of having aided or abetted him in doing so. It is simply that the patient has, as he is entitled to, declined to consent to treatment which might or would have the effect of prolonging his life, and the doctor has, in accordance with his duty, complied with the patient's wishes.'⁶⁴ The Mental Capacity Act 2005 is now in force and provides for advance refusals of life-sustaining treatment.⁶⁵

R (on the application of Purdy) v DPP

The second landmark challenge was to the sufficiency of the DPP's policy on prosecuting the offence.⁶⁶ P suffered from primary progressive multiple sclerosis for which there was no known cure. She would have liked to end her life when her continuing existence became unbearable, but at that stage in her disease she would be unable to travel to a country where assisted suicide was lawful without help. Her husband was willing to help her to travel. If P's husband helped her to travel outside the country, however, there was a substantial risk that he would be prosecuted. P challenged the lawfulness of the failure of the DPP to issue a crime-specific policy identifying the facts and circumstances that would be taken into account when deciding whether to prosecute an individual for assisting another to commit suicide. P sought information in order to make an informed decision about whether to ask for her husband's assistance in committing suicide.

In the House of Lords P argued that the offence of assisted suicide constituted an interference with her right to respect for her private life under Art 8(1) of the ECHR; and that the interference was not 'in accordance with the law' as required by Art 8(2), in the absence of an offence-specific policy. The House of Lords allowed her appeal holding that the right to respect for life contained in Art 8(1) was engaged. The ECtHR had determined that the very essence of the Convention was respect for human dignity and human freedom and it was under Art 8 that notions of the quality of life took on significance. Those notions covered the situation of people who were concerned that they should not be forced to linger on in old age or in states of advanced physical or mental decrepitude which conflicted with strongly held ideas of self and personal identity. For the purposes of Art 8(2), in order for s 2(4) of the 1961 Act to comply with the requirement that the law should be formulated with sufficient precision to enable the individual, if need be with advice, to regulate his conduct, the DPP had to create a code giving guidance on principles to be applied by Crown prosecutors in determining, in any case, whether proceedings for an offence under s 2(1) should be instituted. Such a code would be regarded for the purposes of Art 8(2) as forming part of the law in accordance with which an interference with the right of respect for private life might be held to be justified. In that way the requirements of accessibility and foreseeability would be satisfied.

The DPP was required to promulgate an offence-specific policy identifying the facts and circumstances which would be taken into account in deciding, in a case such as that which ⁶³ Re B (Refusal of treatment) [2002] 2 All ER 449, DC—also known as Mrs B v NHS Trust—in fact a hospital commits assault if they continue to treat her against her will and Butler-Sloss LJ awarded (albeit small) damages for assault.

⁶⁴ [1993] AC 789, HL, at 864.

⁶⁵ See s 25(5) and (6). These provisions only apply to adults who have capacity: s 24(1). Note also: s 24 does not include the word 'care'. Para 9.28 of the Code of Practice issued pursuant to the Act states: 'An advance decision cannot refuse actions that are needed to keep a person comfortable (sometimes called basic or essential care). Examples include warmth, shelter, actions to keep a person clean and the offer of food and water by mouth'—see www.justice.gov.uk/downloads/protecting-the-vulnerable/mca/mca-code-practice-0509.pdf.

⁶⁶ R (on the application of Purdy) v DPP [2009] UKHL 45. But see also the judgment of Lord Hughes in Nicklinson at [275].

the claimant's case exemplified, whether or not to exercise the discretion to consent to a prosecution under s 2(4). The House did not prescribe what the guidance might say. The decision was controversial in constitutional terms, with the highest court of the land compelling the DPP to provide such guidance.⁶⁷ Interim guidance was published and, after consultation,⁶⁸ a final version was produced.⁶⁹

The new prosecution policy does not 'decriminalize' the offence of encouraging or assisting suicide and does not give any express assurance that a person will be immune from prosecution if he does an act that encourages or assists another's suicide or attempted suicide. Sixteen factors that will be relevant and which will suggest that a prosecution is more likely to be required are listed. These include:

- the victim being under 18 years of age;
- the victim not having the capacity (as defined by the Mental Capacity Act 2005) to reach an informed decision to commit suicide;
- the victim not having reached a voluntary, clear, settled and informed decision to commit suicide;
- the victim not having clearly and unequivocally communicated his or her decision to commit suicide to the suspect;
- the victim not having sought the encouragement or assistance of the suspect personally or on his or her own initiative;
- the suspect not being wholly motivated by compassion, for example in that the suspect was motivated by the prospect that he or she or a person closely connected to him or her stood to gain in some way from the death of the victim;
- the suspect pressurizing the victim to commit suicide;
- the suspect not taking reasonable steps to ensure that any other person had not pressured the victim to commit suicide;
- the suspect having a history of violence or abuse against the victim;
- whether the victim could have herself performed the act that D did to assist V in her suicide;
- the suspect being unknown to the victim and encouraging or assisting the victim to commit or attempt to commit suicide by providing specific information via, for example, a website or publication;
- the suspect giving encouragement or assistance to more than one victim who were not known to each other;

⁶⁷ See in particular on the decision, R Nobles and D Schiff, 'Disobedience to the Law—Debbie Purdy's case' (2010) 73 MLR 295; and K Greasley, 'R (Purdy) v DPP and the Case for Wilful Blindness' (2010) 30 OJLS 301; J Rogers, 'Prosecutorial Policies, Prosecutorial Systems, and the Purdy Litigation' [2010] Crim LR 542; N Cartwright, '48 Years On: Is the Suicide Act Fit for Purpose?' (2009) 17 Med L Rev 467; A Mullock, 'Overlooking the Criminally Compassionate: What are the Implications of Prosecutorial Policy on Encouraging or Assisting Suicide?' (2010) 18 Med L Rev 442; P Lewis, 'Informal Legal Change on Assisted Suicide: The Policy for Prosecutors' (2011) 31 LS 119.

⁶⁸ See R Daw and A Solomon, 'Assisted Suicide and Identifying the Public Interest in the Decision to Prosecute' [2010] Crim LR 737 for an illuminating insight into how the policy was drawn up.

⁶⁹ See J Rogers, 'Prosecutorial Policies, Prosecutorial Systems, and the Purdy Litigation' [2010] Crim LR 542; A Mullock, 'Prosecutors Making (Bad) Law' (2009) 17 Med L Rev 290; R Heywood, 'Prosecutorial Guidelines on Assisted Suicide' (2010) 21 King's LJ 425. The DPP published the final policy on prosecuting cases of assisted suicide on 25 Feb 2010. A newer version of the policy with a short amendment was issued on 16 Oct 2014 following the Supreme Court's decision in Nicklinson (see later). The final policy can be found at www.cps.gov.uk/publications/prosecution/assisted_suicide_policy.html.

- the suspect being paid by the victim or those close to the victim for his or her encouragement or assistance;
- the suspect acting in his or her capacity as a medical doctor, nurse, other health-care professional, a professional carer (whether for payment or not) or as a person in authority, such as a prison officer, and the victim was in his or her care;⁷⁰
- the suspect being aware that the victim intended to commit suicide in a public place where it was reasonable to think that members of the public may be present;
- the suspect acting in his or her capacity as a person involved in the management or as an employee (whether for payment or not) of an organization or group, a purpose of which is to provide a physical environment (whether for payment or not) in which to allow another to commit suicide.

A prosecution is less likely to be required if:

- the victim had reached a voluntary, clear, settled and informed decision to commit suicide;
- the suspect was wholly motivated by compassion;
- the actions of the suspect, although sufficient to come within the definition of the offence, were of only minor encouragement or assistance;
- the suspect had sought to dissuade the victim from taking the course of action which resulted in his or her suicide;
- the actions of the suspect may be characterized as reluctant encouragement or assistance in the face of a determined wish on the part of the victim to commit suicide;
- the suspect reported the victim's suicide to the police and fully assisted them in their inquiries into the circumstances of the suicide or the attempt and his or her part in providing encouragement or assistance.⁷¹

The first instance of the public interest factors of the policy being applied was consideration of whether to prosecute Caractacus Downes, son of Sir Edward and Lady Downes who committed suicide at the Dignitas clinic in Switzerland. Between 1998 and 2011, a total of 215 people from the UK used Dignitas and no one providing assistance in that connection has been prosecuted.⁷² The first prosecution since the DPP's guidance was published was the case of Howe.⁷³

R (on the application of Nicklinson) v DPP and R (on the application of AM) v DPP

The issue came to the fore once more in conjoined appeals heard before a nine-member Supreme Court.⁷⁴ The claimants—LM and N—suffered from degenerative medical ⁷⁰ This emphasis is in the guidance, as is this footnote: 'For the avoidance of doubt the words "and the victim was in his or her care" qualify all of the preceding parts of this [bullet point]. This factor does not apply merely because someone was acting in a capacity described within it: it applies only where there was, in addition, a relationship of care between the suspect and the victims such that it will be necessary to consider whether the suspect may have exerted some influence on the victim.' The amendment is intended to clarify that the interpretation of the guidance given by Lord Judge CJ in Nicklinson [2013] EWCA Civ 961 is the correct one.

⁷¹ For comment on the guidelines creating de facto defences, see the Report of the Falconer Commission on Assisted Dying (2012) pp 285–286. For careful analysis of the guidelines see the judgment of Lord Judge CJ in the Court of Appeal.

⁷² Lord Neuberger in Nicklinson at [48].

⁷³ [2014] EWCA Crim 114. The Court of Appeal gave guidance as to what the appropriate sentence is in cases such as this.

⁷⁴ [2014] UKSC 38, [2014] 3 WLR 200.

conditions and expressed a strong, settled and reasoned wish to end their lives. Due to the debilitating nature of the claimants' medical conditions they would need assistance in order to carry out their wish to commit suicide. The Supreme Court held (by a majority),⁷⁵ that the offence in s 2 of the Suicide Act 1961 was within the margin of appreciation afforded to Convention States on the issue of whether to criminalize assisted suicide. The 1961 Act did not impose an impermissible 'blanket ban' which would take it outside the UK's margin of appreciation in this area.⁷⁶ The court recognized, by a majority,⁷⁷ that following the European Court's acceptance that it was for Convention States to decide whether their own law on assisted suicide infringed Art 8, the Supreme Court did have jurisdiction to hold that s 2 infringed Art 8 and to consider a declaration of incompatibility. The court went on to hold by a majority (Baroness Hale and Lord Kerr dissenting) that it would not be appropriate for the Supreme Court to declare that s 2 of the 1961 Act was incompatible with the ECHR at least until such time as Parliament had considered specific legislation on assisted suicide.

The Supreme Court unanimously declined to order the DPP to amend the policy on prosecuting cases of alleged assisted suicide.⁷⁸ The policy was to provide transparency and consistency in the approach that would be taken. It was not for the court to dictate its contents.

As a result of the Supreme Court's judgment, the matter was very clearly one for Parliament to resolve, with the clear warning that if it did not do so, the Supreme Court may be forced to declare s 2 incompatible.

R (on the application of Conway) v Secretary of State for Justice

In the most recent case to consider this difficult issue, the claimant suffered from motor neurone disease.⁷⁹ C wished to have the option, when he had a prognosis of six months or less to live, of seeking assistance from a medical professional to end his life. The claimant argued that s 2 of the Suicide Act 1961 was incompatible with his rights under Art 8. He argued that alternative statutory regimes could be envisaged that sufficiently protected the weak and vulnerable but which did not impose a blanket prohibition on assisted suicide. The Administrative Court held that s 2 of the Suicide Act fell within Art 8(2). It was aimed at protecting the weak and vulnerable and was objectively justified under Art 8(2) on that basis. The court held that there was a rational connection between s 2 and the protection of the weak and vulnerable. The statute also reinforced a moral view regarding the sanctity of life and promoted relations of trust between doctors and patients. Finally, the court concluded that the prohibition on assisted suicide was necessary, as there was evidence to suggest that there was a real risk of vulnerable people seeking assistance to die were the prohibition on s 2 to be relaxed and that it struck a fair balance between the rights of people in the claimant's position and the wider community. In an unusually long judgment, the Court of Appeal granted permission for the unsuccessful claimant to appeal to that court.⁸⁰

⁷⁵ Upholding the decision of the Court of Appeal (Civ Div). Lady Hale and Lord Kerr held that the law was incompatible with Convention rights. The effect of the prohibition in s 2 was to create a law that was disproportionate in Art 8 terms since it applied to cases such as theirs. The two dissenting Justices would therefore have granted the declaration of incompatibility.

⁷⁶ Having regard to ECHR law, Haas v Switzerland (2011) 53 EHRR 33; Koch v Germany [2013] 1 FCR 595; and Gross v Switzerland [2013] 3 FCR 608.

⁷⁷ Lords Clarke, Sumption, Reed and Hughes dissenting.

⁷⁸ In doing so, the court reversed a majority decision of the Court of Appeal (Civ Div). The court did, however, indicate that the DPP should 'review' the policy to clarify certain inconsistencies—see [144] and [251]. In October 2014, the DPP issued amended guidance (in the form set out earlier).

⁷⁹ [2017] EWHC 2447 (Admin).

⁸⁰ [2018] EWCA Civ 16.

Jurisdictional issues

There was a dispute under the old law as to whether a prosecution could ensue if D assisted V's suicide abroad.⁸¹ The issue gained a high profile with tragic cases such as that of Daniel James who travelled to the Dignitas clinic to commit suicide after having become paralysed.⁸² Concern was raised that relatives would be prosecuted. Under s 2 as substituted in the 2009 Act, there seems no doubt that D will commit the offence if he performs acts in England and Wales that are capable of assisting V to commit or attempt suicide abroad.⁸³

Transferred malice in suicides

Since suicide is not a crime, where D kills V in the course of trying to kill himself, there is now no room for the doctrine of transferred malice for there is no 'malice' to transfer. Where D kills V in the course of trying to kill himself, his liability depends on the general principles of murder and manslaughter. Thus, if the death of V was utterly unforeseeable, it would be accidental death; if there was gross negligence as to causing death or recklessness as to whether death or serious bodily harm was caused, it may be manslaughter; and if D foresaw death or serious bodily harm as virtually certain, it may be murder.⁸⁴

Mercy killing

English law admits of no defence of mercy killing or euthanasia.⁸⁵ In Inglis,⁸⁶ where a mother killed her severely injured son in what she considered to be an act of mercy, she was prosecuted for murder. As the Lord Chief Justice emphasized, upholding her conviction:

the law does not recognise the concept implicit in the defence statement that [V] was 'already dead in all but a small physical degree'. The fact is that he was alive, a person in being. However brief the time left for him, that life could not lawfully be extinguished. Similarly, however disabled [V] might have been, a disabled life, even a life lived at the extremes of disability, is not one jot less precious than the life of an able-bodied person. [V]'s condition made him especially vulnerable, and for that among other reasons, whether or not he might have died within a few months anyway, his life was protected by the law, and no one, not even his mother, could lawfully step in and bring it to a premature conclusion. Until Parliament decides otherwise, the law recognises a distinction between ⁸¹ M Hirst, 'Suicide in Switzerland: Complicity in England?' [2009] Crim LR 335 argued that if A helps or encourages B to travel from England to a jurisdiction (eg Switzerland) where assisted suicide is lawful in the knowledge that B will commit suicide there, A does not thereby commit any offence under the Suicide Act 1961, s 2(1). Lord Hope rejected this argument after careful consideration, referring to Smith (Wallace Duncan) (No 4) [2004] EWCA Crim 631, [2004] QB 1418.

⁸² See <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/england/hereford/worcs/7774802.stm>.

⁸³ See M Hirst, 'Assisted Suicide after Purdy: The Unresolved Issue' [2009] Crim LR 870.

⁸⁴ See p 90.

⁸⁵ See Toulson LJ in the Divisional Court in Nicklinson citing the this passage in the 13th edn of this work (at p 589) with approval at [59]. On mercy killing in general, see: S McLean, Assisted Dying: Reflections on the Need for Law Reform (2007); R Huxtable, Euthanasia, Ethics and the Law (2007); M Otłowski, Voluntary Euthanasia and the Common Law (2000); H Biggs, Euthanasia, Death with Dignity and the Law (2001); J Keown, Euthanasia, Ethics and Public Policy: An Argument against Legislation (2002). See also more specifically in the criminal law context, S Ost, 'Euthanasia and the Defence of Necessity' [2005] Crim LR 355; M Wilks, 'Medical Treatment at the End of Life: A British Doctor's Perspective' in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007); J Keown, 'Williams versus Kamisar on Euthanasia: A Classic Debate Revisited' in DJ Baker and J Horder, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law: The Legacy of Glanville Williams (2013); P Lewis, 'The Failure of the Defence of Necessity as a Mechanism of Legal Change on Assisted Dying in the Common Law World' in Baker and Horder, ibid. For an analysis of the operation of diminished responsibility in the context of mercy killing, see M Gibson, 'Pragmatism Preserved? The Challenges of Accommodating Mercy Killers in the Reformed Diminished Responsibility Plea' (2017) 81 J Crim L 177.

⁸⁶ Inglis [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243.

the withdrawal of treatment supporting life, which, subject to stringent conditions, may be lawful, and the active termination of life, which is unlawful.⁸⁷

This position was confirmed by the Supreme Court in Nicklinson.⁸⁸

There is no defence of mercy killing nor that the killing is in the best interests of the victim in some general sense, nor is there a defence of physician-assisted suicide.⁸⁹ Medical practitioners' obligations regarding the withdrawal of life-sustaining treatment are considered in Ch 2.⁹⁰ A competent but paralysed adult is entitled to refuse to continue medical treatment. This is not suicide and the health-care professionals are not assisting such.⁹¹ There is no breach of Art 2 of the ECHR by the withdrawal of treatment in such cases.

The European Court in Pretty v UK declined to express a view on whether an assisted suicide provision would be compliant with Art 2. The Court concluded that the regulation of suicide was for the Member State's law, and that there was no State obligation to facilitate death. The ECtHR has held that there is no breach of Art 8 if a Member State does not facilitate assisted suicide: Haas v Switzerland.⁹²

Reform

A Private Members' Bill for the Assisted Dying of the Terminally Ill, which would have enabled a competent adult who is suffering as a result of a terminal illness to receive medical assistance to die at his own request, and to make provision for a person suffering from a terminal illness to receive pain relief medication, was rejected in 2005.⁹³

Several law reform agencies have reviewed the possibility of such a defence (or special offence) being available.⁹⁴ The Law Commission declined to engage fully with the issue in its Consultation Paper on Homicide⁹⁵ and accepted in its subsequent Report No 304 that the government ought to commission such a reform study. Public attitudes to mercy killing, as confirmed in Professor Mitchell's illuminating empirical research,⁹⁶ reveal that where there is clear evidence of the victim's wish to die, such cases are perceived as amongst the least serious homicide cases.⁹⁷ The Law Commission concluded:

There are three reasons why it is arguable that it would be more satisfactory if, in cases of rational 'mercy' killing, Parliament were to make 'mercy' killing a partial defence rather than purely a matter going to mitigation of the minimum term. First, for a genuine 'mercy' killer, a life long licence seems neither necessary nor appropriate. Secondly, if there is a dispute of fact as to D's motive for ⁸⁷ ibid, [38]–[39]. Cf Webb [2011] EWCA Crim 152, [2011] Crim LR 419.

⁸⁸ See Lord Neuberger at [17].

⁸⁹ E Jackson, 'Whose Death is it Anyway? Euthanasia and the Medical Profession' (2004) 57 CLP 415; cf the Netherlands on which see J Griffiths, 'Assisted Suicide in the Netherlands' (1995) 58 MLR 232; J Griffiths, H Weyers and M Adams, Euthanasia and the Law of Europe (2009); J Keown, 'Euthanasia in the Netherlands' in J Keown (ed), Euthanasia Examined (1995) 261; P Lewis, Assisted Dying and Legal Change (2007).

⁹⁰ See especially the decisions in Nicklinson and R (Burke) v GMC [2004] EWHC 1879 (Admin); overruled in the Court of Appeal [2006] QB 273; and see the ECHR application (App no 19807/06). For comment see J Coggan, 'Could the Right to Die with Dignity Represent a New Right to Die in English Law?' (2006) 14 Med L Rev 219, and generally on the ECHR position, Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 18.48 et seq.

⁹¹ B (Consent to Treatment) [2002] 2 All ER 449, DC. ⁹² App no 31322/07.

⁹³ See S Evan and D Hewitt, 'A Question of Choice' (2006) 156 NLJ 44. See also the MOJ Consultation Paper 2009/06 which discusses these Bills.

⁹⁴ See the CLRC Working Paper on Offences Against the Person (1976) paras 79–87.

⁹⁵ See Ch 8 of that Paper and the criticism levelled by J Rogers in 'The Law Commission's Proposed Restructuring of the Law of Homicide' (2006) 70 J Crim L 223 suggesting a distinction might be drawn in terms of availability of a defence to relatives as opposed to professional carers. The Law Commission rejected that argument—see LC 304, para 7.28.

⁹⁶ Extracted in LCCP 177 and LC 304.

⁹⁷ LC 304, para 7.17.

killing V, it might be thought better that the jury, rather than the trial judge, should decide the issue. Thirdly, a partial defence would avoid the need for the practice, which concerns some of our consultees, of dressing up rational 'mercy' killing cases as ones of diminished responsibility by means of a sympathetic report from a pliant psychiatrist which the court and prosecution are content not to challenge.⁹⁸

In Inglis,⁹⁹ the Lord Chief Justice referred to the Law Commission's 'careful analysis of this profoundly sensitive issue'.

The Law Commission provisionally proposed that a verdict of assisting suicide might be left as an alternative verdict on a charge of murder or manslaughter where D proves that he and V had intended to take part in a suicide pact.¹⁰⁰ That proposal was withdrawn in the final Report.¹⁰¹ An attempt to reform the law was undertaken by Lord Falconer, whose Assisted Dying Bill had its first reading in the House of Lords in May 2014. The Bill reached Second Reading in July 2014. During a debate that lasted over nine hours, the Bill was debated in detail but no vote was held. In June 2015, Lord Falconer introduced an Assisted Dying Bill in materially similar terms to his earlier Bill. This time, however, the Bill was not given time for debate. In June 2016, Lord Hayward introduced a similar Bill, but Parliament was dissolved before it reached second reading. More recently, in January 2017, there was a brief debate following a question in the House of Lords about whether the government had any plans to legalize assisted dying for terminally ill adults with capacity, with appropriate safeguards. At the time of writing, the most recent engagement with this issue was in March 2017, when there was a Short Debate in the House of Lords on the question of what assessment the government had made of recent legislation on assisted dying in North America and whether such laws might provide an appropriate basis for legislation in England and Wales. Whether Parliament's recent engagement with this issue is sufficient to ensure compliance with what the majority of the Supreme Court held in Nicklinson has yet to be determined.

15.2.3 Suicide pacts

A party to a suicide pact who assists or encourages the other party to commit suicide is, of course, guilty of the assisting or encouraging offence discussed earlier.¹⁰²

The survivor of such a pact may, however, have either himself killed the deceased or have procured a third party to do it. Such cases do not fall within the Suicide Act, but within s 4(1) of the Homicide Act 1957 which, as amended by the Suicide Act, provides:

It shall be manslaughter and shall not be murder for a person acting in pursuance of a suicide pact between him and another to kill the other^[103] or be party to the other being killed by a third person.

'Suicide pact' is defined by s 4(3) of the Homicide Act as:

a common agreement between two or more persons having for its object the death of all of them, whether or not each is to take his own life, but nothing done by a person who enters into a suicide pact shall be treated as done by him in pursuance of the pact unless it is done while he has the settled intention of dying in pursuance of the pact.

⁹⁸ Para 7.48. ⁹⁹ [2010] EWCA Crim 2637, [2011] Crim LR 243.

¹⁰⁰ LCCP 177, para 8.95. ¹⁰¹ LC 304.

¹⁰² Until the enactment of the Suicide Act, this was manslaughter under the Homicide Act 1957, s 4. The public interest does not normally call for the prosecution of the survivor of a suicide pact: Dunbar v Plant [1997] 3 WLR 1261, CA (Civ Div) per Phillips LJ at 1285.

¹⁰³ If, otherwise than in pursuance of a suicide pact, D kills V at V's request, D is of course guilty of murder. Cf Robinson, p 211.

The onus on a charge of murder of establishing the ‘defence’ of suicide pact is put by s 4(2) on the accused and the standard of proof required is the balance of probabilities. This is not incompatible with Art 6(2) of the ECHR.¹⁰⁴

According to the Law Commission, writing in 2005, there are on average 10 to 15 successful suicide pacts per year.¹⁰⁵

The distinction between assisting or encouraging in suicide and manslaughter by suicide pact is not entirely satisfactory.¹⁰⁶ The latter, being punishable with life imprisonment, is evidently the more serious crime; yet, since the person guilty of it always intends to die himself, it is difficult to see how it can compare in moral heinousness with the case of D who, for example, incites V to die in order that he may live and enjoy V’s property.

The distinction between the two crimes may be very fine. If D and V agree to gas themselves with car exhaust fumes and D alone survives, it appears that he will be liable under the Homicide Act if he turned on the engine,¹⁰⁷ and possibly under the Suicide Act if V did. It may frequently be difficult to establish who did such an act and this is recognized by the provision in s 2(2) of the Suicide Act that, on the trial of an indictment for murder or manslaughter, the jury may find D guilty of assisting or encouraging in suicide if that is proved. If D is charged with murder and he establishes on a balance of probabilities that V committed suicide in pursuance of a suicide pact, he is entitled to be acquitted of murder and may presumably be convicted of assisting or encouraging in suicide since he has, in effect, admitted his guilt. If, however, D was charged with assisting or encouraging and it appeared that he had killed V, he would have to be acquitted. The Law Commission recently commented on the over- and under-inclusiveness of the offence.¹⁰⁸ It provides an undeserved defence to D who, as a leader of a cult, encourages followers to kill themselves but does not go through with the act himself. Yet it fails to deal with D’s consensual killing of a terminally ill spouse, V, where D has secretly planned to kill himself once V is dead, but fails to achieve his own demise.¹⁰⁹

15.2.3.1 Reform

There is considerable pressure for reform of the law. The Law Commission described the offence as having ‘long outlived its usefulness’ and having been flawed from the outset,¹¹⁰ resting as it does on a promise from D to V that he will kill himself—a promise of no intrinsic moral value.¹¹¹ The Commission took the view that it presented no significant problem in practice.¹¹² However, although individuals prosecuted for manslaughter of their nearest and dearest may well receive low sentences, the pain and anguish of their bereavement is exacerbated by the criminal process.¹¹³ Supporters of the law point to the significant protection it affords the vulnerable who face pressure to commit suicide when they perceive themselves to be a burden on carers. The defence is certainly more common among the elderly and, ¹⁰⁴ A-G’s Reference (No 1 of 2004) [2004] EWCA Crim 1025, [2004] 1 WLR 2111, [130]–[132].

¹⁰⁵ See LCCP 177, para 8.60.

¹⁰⁶ The Law Commission was not able to consider suicide in its review, LC 290, Partial Defences to Murder (2004). In its homicide review, LC 304, Murder, Manslaughter and Infanticide (2006) the Law Commission’s recommendations for homicide provide only that the offence would be reclassified as second degree murder. The label seems unsuited to the actions of many of the cases to which it would apply.

¹⁰⁷ But if D pours out a glass of poison and V takes it, he may be liable under the Suicide Act 1961.

¹⁰⁸ LCCP 177, paras 8.21–8.25.

¹⁰⁹ See also the discussion of the differences in culpability between ‘die together’ cases and ‘you then me’ (homicide suicide) cases.

¹¹⁰ LCCP 177, para 8.8.

¹¹¹ ibid, para 8.19.

¹¹² ibid, para 8.20.

¹¹³ See Blackburn (2005) 14 Jan, CCC, suspended sentence for killing terminally ill wife in suicide pact, and see the news reports for 15 Jan 2005.

interestingly, empirical work reveals that the defence is more commonly relied on by men. One interpretation is that the defence is more readily relied on by dominant and controlling male partners.¹¹⁴

The Law Commission provisionally proposed the repeal of s 4, intending that all such cases would fall within its extended definition of diminished responsibility as cases where D suffered severe depression.¹¹⁵ In its Report No 304, the Commission recognized that diminished responsibility would not deal with all depressed carer cases, nor with mercy killings. It was recommended that s 4 should not be repealed.¹¹⁶ Some of the cases will fall within the new diminished responsibility defence (explained in Ch 13).

15.3 Infanticide

Section 1(1) of the Infanticide Act 1938 was amended in 2009.¹¹⁷ From 4 October 2010 it now provides:

Where a woman by any wilful act or omission causes the death of her child being a child under the age of twelve months, but at the time of the act or omission the balance of her mind was disturbed by reason of her not having fully recovered from the effect of her giving birth to the child or by reason of the effect of lactation consequent upon the birth of the child, then if^[118] the circumstances were such that but for this Act the offence would have amounted to murder or manslaughter, she shall be guilty of felony, to wit of infanticide, and may for such offence be dealt with and punished as if she had been guilty of the offence of manslaughter of the child.

The 1938 Act provision replaced a statute of 1922 which had confined the defence to killings by mothers of 'newly born' children. The Court of Criminal Appeal had held that to be inapplicable to a child of 35 days, so that the mother was convicted of murder.¹¹⁹ The 1922 Act was itself the result of an agitation over very many years during which it was practically impossible to convict mothers of the murder of their young children because of the disapproval by public and professional opinion of a law which regarded such killings as ordinary murders. Where a conviction was obtained, the judge had to pronounce a sentence of death which everyone, except perhaps the offender, knew would not be carried out. A number of reasons were advanced why infanticide should be considered less reprehensible than other killings: (a) the injury done to the child was less, for it was incapable of the kind of suffering which might be undergone by the adult victim of a murder; (b) the loss of its family was less great; (c) the crime did not create the sense of insecurity in society which other murders caused; (d) generally, the heinousness of the crime was less, the motive very frequently being ¹¹⁴ See LCCP 177, paras 8.67–8.83.

¹¹⁵ The research reveals that as many as 79 per cent of s 4 cases involve depressed individuals, para 8.63.

¹¹⁶ See LC 304, Ch 7.

¹¹⁷ See LCCP 177, Ch 8; LC 304, Ch 9. See also D Seaborne Davies, 'Child-Killing in English Law' (1937) 1 MLR 203; MACL, 301; G Williams, The Sanctity of Life (1957) 25–45; K O'Donovan, 'The Medicalisation of Infanticide' [1984] Crim LR 259; RD Mackay, 'The Consequences of Killing Very Young Children' [1993] Crim LR 21; A Wilczynski and A Morris, 'Parents who Kill their Children' [1993] Crim LR 31; D Maeir-Katkin and R Ogle, 'A Rationale for Infanticide Laws' [1993] Crim LR 903; M Jackson, 'Infanticide: Historical Perspectives' (1996) 146 NLJ 416; K Brennan, 'Beyond the Medical Model: A Rationale for Infanticide Legislation' (2007) 58 NILQ 505; A Loughnan, 'The "Strange" Case of the Infanticide Doctrine' (2012) 32 OJLS 685. The Court of Appeal called for its urgent reform: Kai-Whitewind [2005] EWCA Crim 1092, [2006] Crim LR 348.

¹¹⁸ This replaced the words 'notwithstanding that'. In Gore [2007] EWCA Crim 2789, [2008] Crim LR 388, the Court of Appeal had construed that as meaning 'even if'. It is now clear it means merely 'if'.

¹¹⁹ O'Donoghue (1927) 20 Cr App R 132, CCA.

the concealment of the shame of the birth of an illegitimate child; and (e) where the killing is done by the mother, her responsibility may be reduced by the disturbance of her mind caused by the stress of the birth. It is, of course, the last of these considerations which is the governing one in the present legislation.¹²⁰ The killing of an infant by persons other than the mother, or by the mother if the balance of her mind is not disturbed, remains murder.

This section is unusual in that it provides both a charge of infanticide and also a partial defence to murder: by s 1(2) as amended by the Coroners and Justice Act 2009, a woman indicted for the murder of her child under the age of 12 months may be acquitted of murder and convicted of infanticide if the conditions of s 1(1) are satisfied. The new subs (2) reads:

Where upon the trial of a woman for the murder of her child, being a child under the age of twelve months, the jury are of opinion that she by any wilful act or omission caused its death, but that at the time of the act or omission the balance of her mind was disturbed by reason of her not having fully recovered from the effect of giving birth to the child or by reason of the effect of lactation consequent upon the birth of the child, then the jury may, if the circumstances were such that but for the provisions of this Act they might have returned a verdict of murder or manslaughter, return in lieu thereof a verdict of infanticide.¹²¹

Where the charge is murder, an evidential burden on the issue of disturbance will fall on D; but the onus of proof remains with the Crown. Where the charge is infanticide, the onus of proving disturbance appears to be on the Crown; but this, of course, is unlikely to be contested.¹²²

The 2009 Act amendment to the section came about following the case of Gore.¹²³ In that case, the Court of Appeal had construed the old s 1 as applying even if the mother was not charged with a homicide offence and held that it was available even if the mother lacked the mens rea for murder. The new section makes clear that infanticide as a defence and offence applies only in cases where the mother could otherwise have been convicted of murder or manslaughter.¹²⁴

The CLRC thought that, because of the way in which the offence is drafted, it is not possible to charge a person with attempting to commit infanticide,¹²⁵ but McCowan J held that such an indictment will lie.¹²⁶

15.3.1 Reform

It is arguable that the principles on which the Infanticide Act was based may be no longer accepted and that mental illness is not now considered to be a significant cause of infanticide. In many cases, the relationship of incomplete recovery from the effects of childbirth or lactation to the child-killing is remote.¹²⁷ If the true trigger for the killing is a range of other social factors associated with caring for a young child, the offence/defence ought to apply to carers of either sex. The Court of Appeal has drawn attention to the unsatisfactory nature of ¹²⁰ The validity of this psychiatric basis for the offence has been doubted, see N Walker, Crime and Insanity in England (1968) vol 1, 87–104, cf Maier-Katkin and Ogle [1993] Crim LR 903, 905–909.

¹²¹ Was it also necessary to insert ‘or manslaughter’ in the first line of s 1(2)? The effect of inserting it also into the opening words would be to make it clear that infanticide is an alternative verdict to a charge of manslaughter as well as to a charge of murder.

¹²² See the numerous instances in LC 304, Appendix.

¹²³ [2007] EWCA Crim 2789, [2008] Crim LR 388.

¹²⁴ HC Research Paper 09/06, p 22. The government rejected the Law Commission recommendation for a trial judge to have power to order medical reports where any mother killed a child under the age of one and was convicted of murder.

¹²⁵ Fourteenth Report, para 113.

¹²⁶ KA Smith [1983] Crim LR 739 and commentary.

¹²⁷ Butler Report, Cmnd 6244 at paras 19.23–19.24.

the defence in this respect.¹²⁸ Moreover, when the Infanticide Act was passed, there was no defence of diminished responsibility to murder.¹²⁹

There are several differences between the defence of diminished responsibility and infanticide. Infanticide requires that the balance of a woman's mind is disturbed at the time she kills her child, either by failure to make a full recovery from the effects of the birth or as a result of the effects of lactation; diminished responsibility requires proof of abnormality of mental functioning arising from a recognized medical condition that substantially impairs the defendant's ability to: (a) understand the nature of D's conduct; (b) form a rational judgement; (c) exercise self-control and that explains/causes her killing. Infanticide is both a partial defence to a charge of murder and an offence in its own right; diminished responsibility is only a partial defence. In infanticide, the burden of proof is on the prosecution; in diminished responsibility it is on the defendant on the balance of probabilities.¹³⁰ In infanticide, unlike diminished responsibility, the defendant can rely on the plea if at the time of the killing the balance of her mind was disturbed either by birth or by the effects of lactation irrespective of whether that caused¹³¹ her to kill the child. Infanticide is applicable only to biological mothers of the deceased and the deceased must have been under 12 months old at the time of death.¹³²

The Butler Committee thought that diminished responsibility even under the old (pre-2009 Act) law would probably cover all cases and recommended the abolition of the separate offence of infanticide.¹³³ The CLRC disagreed, at first on the ground that, so long as the prosecution are unable to charge manslaughter by reason of diminished responsibility, infanticide has the advantage that it avoids the necessity of charging the mother with murder;¹³⁴ and later on the ground that diminished responsibility might not cover all the circumstances¹³⁵ which in practice may be held to justify an infanticide verdict.¹³⁶

In order to bring the law into line with its practical operation, and because of the difficulty of establishing a direct connection between giving birth and the imbalance of the woman's mind, the CLRC recommended that the test should be whether the balance of her mind was disturbed by reason of the effect of giving birth to the child or circumstances consequent upon that birth.¹³⁷ A dissentient view was that the effect would be to make adverse

¹²⁸ See Kai-Whitewind [2005] EWCA Crim 1092, [2006] Crim LR 348.

¹²⁹ For comparison of the defence and offence, see Mackay [1993] Crim LR 21.

¹³⁰ The Court of Appeal in Foye [2013] EWCA Crim 475, [2013] Crim LR 839 stated that the reason why the burden of proof is on the defendant is because the defence is concerned with D's internal mental condition. The same conclusion was arrived at in relation to the amended version of the defence in Wilcocks [2016] EWCA Crim 2043, [2017] Crim LR 706.

¹³¹ See the debate at p 560 on whether the new diminished plea requires a causal link.

¹³² See Gore, n 123, at [20].

¹³³ ibid. For criticism, see Maier-Katkin and Ogle [1993] Crim LR 903. It has the advantage of applying to carers of either sex.

¹³⁴ CLRC, Working Paper on Offences Against the Person (1976) 26. The Committee tentatively suggested that a person apparently suffering from diminished responsibility should be indictable for manslaughter but later withdrew this proposal: CLRC/OAP/R, para 95.

¹³⁵ According to the Royal College of Psychiatrists, these circumstances include: (i) overwhelming stress from the social environment being highlighted by the birth of a baby, with the emphasis on the unsuitability of the accommodation etc; (ii) overwhelming stress from an additional member to a household struggling with poverty; (iii) psychological injury, and pressures and stress from a husband or other member of a family from the mother's incapacity to arrange the demands of the extra member of the family; (iv) failure of bonding between mother and child through illness or disability which impairs the development of the mother's capacity to care for the infant.

¹³⁶ Research reveals that half of women who plead or are convicted are not suffering any mental disorder. See Wilczynski and Morris [1993] Crim LR 31. See also the data in Appendix D of LC 304.

¹³⁷ Fourteenth Report, paras 103–106.

social conditions a defence to child killing when it is not a defence to any other crime.¹³⁸ Because of the decision to recommend the broadening of the offence in this way (in law, if not in practice),¹³⁹ the CLRC abandoned its earlier tentative recommendation that the killing of older children of the family should be infanticide and not murder;¹⁴⁰ and recommended that the maximum penalty should be five years' imprisonment and not two, as they had previously been disposed to think.¹⁴¹

The Law Commission reviewed the scope of infanticide in LCCP 177 and LC 304. In LCCP 177,¹⁴² its provisional proposals were to make minor amendment to the offence/defence so that it would apply where the deceased child was under two, and the reference to lactation in the defence would be removed since medical evidence did not support its retention. In LC 304, the Law Commission¹⁴³ considered extensive medical and psychiatric research,¹⁴⁴ along with the empirical survey by Professor Mackay¹⁴⁵ and recommended that no change be introduced to the offence/defence, save for a procedural amendment to allow an expedited appeal on medical evidence where a mother convicted of murdering her child under 12 months denied the killing. The 1938 Act was, somewhat disappointingly, described as a 'practicable legal solution'.¹⁴⁶

15.4 The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Acts 2004 and 2012

Insurmountable problems arose in prosecutions for the non-accidental serious injury or death of a young child when the only individuals who had access to the child at the time of the incident (usually the two primary carers) denied responsibility.¹⁴⁷ Although clear that at least one of the carers was guilty of a serious crime, it was often impossible to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the ill-treatment was at the hand of one (or both) rather than the other. The death or injury may have occurred while one carer was absent. Further, it was also often impossible to prove whether the carer not directly responsible was guilty as an accomplice. Prior to the 2004 Act, if all that could be proved was that the offence was committed either by D1 or by D2, both had to be acquitted. Only if it could be proved that the one who did not commit the crime must have aided and abetted it could both be convicted.¹⁴⁸ This was as true where carers were charged with injury to their child as it was in the case of any other defendants. The only difference was that one carer may have a duty to intervene to prevent the ill-treatment of their child by the other when a stranger would have no such duty. It was for the prosecution to prove that the carer who did not inflict the injuries must have aided and abetted the infliction by failure to fulfil that duty or otherwise.

In a series of cases, the Court of Appeal reluctantly accepted that trials in such circumstances would not normally proceed beyond a defence submission of no case to answer.¹⁴⁹

¹³⁸ See Annexes 7 and 8 to the Report.

¹³⁹ On the use of the offence in modern times see Mackay, n 117, and Wilczynski and Morris, n 117.

¹⁴⁰ Para 106. ¹⁴¹ Para 108. ¹⁴² Ch 7. ¹⁴³ Ch 6.

¹⁴⁴ Appendix E. Note also that the Royal College of Psychiatrists preferred a merger of the offence/defence with diminished responsibility: LC 304, para 8.35.

¹⁴⁵ Appendix D. ¹⁴⁶ Para 8.3.

¹⁴⁷ For further discussion, see SM Morrison, 'Should There Be a Domestic Violence Defence to the Offence of Familial Homicide?' [2013] Crim LR 826.

¹⁴⁸ See Banfield [2013] EWCA Crim 1394, [2014] Crim LR 147.

¹⁴⁹ Russell and Russell (1987) 85 Cr App R 388, [1987] Crim LR 494; Lane and Lane (1985) 82 Cr App R 5, [1985] Crim LR 789. For a valuable direction where one of two interrogating police officers has caused injury, see Forman and Ford [1988] Crim LR 677 (Judge Woods).

The result proved too much for some courts, and strained attempts to circumvent the problem were adopted. These were unsatisfactory.¹⁵⁰ The problem was a substantial one. Research revealed that in the UK no fewer than three children under the age of ten died or suffered serious injury each week, and only 27 per cent of cases led to a conviction.¹⁵¹ The difficulties had exercised great academic minds, but no consensus was reached as to the optimal solution.¹⁵² Was it better to create a new offence to catch A, who ought to have been aware of the wrongdoing of the other carer, B, who caused the injury? Alternatively (or additionally), was it appropriate to alter the procedure in such cases to upset the traditional burden of proof and presumption of innocence, or to admit pre-trial incriminating statements made by A against B, or to provide a statutory obligation to account for the death or injury?¹⁵³

Following detailed consideration by the Law Commission, proposals for new offences and procedural changes were made, and provisions based on, though differing significantly from, those recommendations were implemented in s 5 of the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004.¹⁵⁴ To appreciate the full significance of the s 5 offence, it must be seen alongside s 6 of that Act,¹⁵⁵ which introduces controversial procedural changes whereby inferences can be drawn from a defendant's silence when charged with murder/manslaughter and the s 5 offence even where no case to answer would otherwise be established.

15.4.1 The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims (Amendment) Act 2012

The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims (Amendment) Act 2012 received Royal Assent on 8 March 2012. The Act extends the offence in s 5 of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult.¹⁵⁶ As extended, the offence applies in relation to the death of or serious physical harm to a child or vulnerable adult. By a new subs (8), the maximum penalty in cases of serious injury is ten years' imprisonment. A new s 6A contains provisions relating to evidence and procedure.¹⁵⁷ Under the 2012 Act extension, the Crown can allege in one count that D either caused serious physical injury (which does not include psychiatric injury) or allowed it to be caused. The extension was predictable: in 2003, the Law Commission recommended that the proposed offence extend to serious injury in relation to children, and the parliamentary debates on the 2004 Act acknowledged the possibility of extension if s 5 worked well.¹⁵⁸

¹⁵⁰ Gibson and Gibson (1984) 80 Cr App R 24. See commentary [1984] Crim LR 615.

¹⁵¹ See LC 282, Children: Their Non-Accidental Death or Serious Injury (Criminal Trials) (2003) Part II.

¹⁵² See generally G Williams, 'Which of You Did It?' (1989) 52 MLR 179; E Griew, 'It Must Have Been One of Them' [1989] Crim LR 129.

¹⁵³ See LC 282 (2003) Part V.

¹⁵⁴ In particular, the Law Commission had proposed a new offence of aggravated child cruelty under s 1 of the Children and Young Person Act 1933, and had produced an offence which dealt with both serious injury and death in relation to children only. For comment on the Law Commission proposals, see P Glazebrook, 'Insufficient Child Protection' [2003] Crim LR 541, proposing an extremely wide offence which it is submitted would extend the ambit of the criminal law too far.

¹⁵⁵ See Ikram [2008] EWCA Crim 586, [2008] Crim LR 912 on difficulties that can arise as defendants shift their case in the course of the trial. Cf Reid (Jason) [2010] EWCA Crim 1478.

¹⁵⁶ In McCarney [2015] NICA 27, D was charged with 'causing the death of a child or vulnerable adult'. At the close of the prosecution case, D's application for the count to be quashed as not being an offence known to law was refused. The Northern Ireland Court of Appeal confirmed that s 5 creates a single offence of causing or allowing the death of a child or vulnerable adult.

¹⁵⁷ These provisions are controversial, but in McCarney, above, the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal held that the equivalent provisions in Northern Ireland were not incompatible with any of the rights guaranteed by Art 6. It can be assumed the Court of Appeal in England and Wales would take the same approach.

¹⁵⁸ Hansard, HC, 27 Oct 2004, vol 425, col 1473.

Parliamentary debates describe the evidence supporting such an extension. In 2010, six CPS areas identified 20 potential cases involving children and three involving vulnerable adults that could not be prosecuted under existing legislation, but which they believe could have been prosecuted under the proposed new offence.¹⁵⁹ The Metropolitan Police examined 179 cases between 2005 to 2008 in London, and suggested that of 69 cases where no prosecution took place, 39 would have been considered for prosecution under the extended s 5.¹⁶⁰

15.4.2 The offence as extended

Section 5 provides the definition of the offence as amended:¹⁶¹

- (1) A person ('D') is guilty of an offence if—
 - (a) a child or vulnerable adult ('V') dies or suffers serious physical harm as a result of the unlawful act of a person who—
 - (i) was a member of the same household as V, and
 - (ii) had frequent contact with him,
 - (b) D was such a person at the time of that act,
 - (c) at that time there was a significant risk of serious physical harm being caused to V by the unlawful act of such a person, and
 - (d) either D was the person whose act caused V's death or serious physical harm or—
 - (i) D was, or ought to have been, aware of the risk mentioned in paragraph (c),
 - (ii) D failed to take such steps as he could reasonably have been expected to take to protect V from the risk, and
 - (iii) the act occurred in circumstances of the kind that D foresaw or ought to have foreseen.
- (2) The prosecution does not have to prove whether it is the first alternative in subsection (1)(d) or the second (sub-paragraphs (i) to (iii)) that applies.
- (3) If D was not the mother or father of V—
 - (a) D may not be charged with an offence under this section if he was under the age of 16 at the time of the act that caused V's death or serious physical harm;
 - (b) for the purposes of subsection (1)(d)(ii) D could not have been expected to take any such step as is referred to there before attaining that age.
- (4) For the purposes of this section—
 - (a) a person is to be regarded as a 'member' of a particular household, even if he does not live in that household, if he visits it so often and for such periods of time that it is reasonable to regard him as a member of it;
 - (b) where V lived in different households at different times, 'the same household as V' refers to the household in which V was living at the time of the act that caused V's death.

¹⁵⁹ Hansard, 21 Oct 2011, col 1181.

¹⁶⁰ Public Bill Committee, 22 June 2011, col 7 (Sir Paul Beresford).

¹⁶¹ See L Hoyano and C Keenan, Child Abuse: Law and Policy (2007) 157–178; M Hayes, 'Criminal Trials Where the Child is the Victim: Extra Protection for Children or a Missed Opportunity' (2005) 17 CFLQ 307; C Colby, 'The Quest For Truth: Substantiating Allegations of Physical Abuse in Criminal Prosecutions and Care Proceedings' (2006) 20 I JLPF 317.

- (5) For the purposes of this section an ‘unlawful’ act is one that—
- (a) constitutes an offence, or
 - (b) would constitute an offence but for being the act of—
 - (i) a person under the age of ten, or
 - (ii) a person entitled to rely on a defence of insanity.

Paragraph (b) does not apply to an act of D.

The offence carries a maximum sentence of imprisonment for 14 years if death is caused and ten years if serious physical harm is caused.¹⁶² The first reported cases under the provision were rather uncontroversial. In Liu and Tan,¹⁶³ there was physical abuse tantamount to torture of T’s wife (a vulnerable adult) by T’s mistress, L. T was aware of the gross mistreatment and was a participant. The provision has been used in high-profile cases such as the prosecutions relating to the death of ‘Baby P’.¹⁶⁴

Despite the attempts to define the key elements, many arbitrary distinctions persist and numerous issues will fall for judicial consideration.¹⁶⁵ In some respects the offence is unsatisfactorily wide; in particular, the Crown need not specify whether it is alleged that D killed/seriously injured or failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the death/serious injury by the other member of the household.

15.4.3 Who is protected?

The offence is limited to cases in which the victim is a child or vulnerable adult. A child is simply anyone under 16. The application of s 5 to vulnerable adults is less straightforward. The category under protection is less easily defined. ‘Vulnerable adult’ involves the more expansive definition in s 5(6):

a person aged 16 or over whose ability to protect himself from violence, abuse or neglect is significantly impaired through physical or mental disability or illness, through old age or otherwise.

This might have been intended primarily to protect the elderly cared for at home, but it may apply to domestic violence on much younger victims. In Khan and others,¹⁶⁶ S was convicted of murdering V, his wife aged 19 who was completely dependent on S and his extended family. S severely beat and inflicted serious injuries on V for weeks prior to killing her. S and others were convicted of allowing the death of a vulnerable adult, contrary to s 5(1). The Court of Appeal held that V was vulnerable at least from the time she suffered serious injuries in the weeks prior to the fatal attack. Adults, or near adults over the age of 16, are vulnerable if their ability to protect themselves from ‘violence, abuse or neglect’ is significantly impaired. The state of vulnerability did not need to be long-standing. The court was not prepared to exclude ‘the possibility that an adult who is utterly dependent on others, even if physically young and apparently fit, may fall within the protective ambit of the Act’.¹⁶⁷ Moreover, the anticipation of a full recovery might not reduce the individual’s temporary vulnerability.

¹⁶² It has been argued that it is less than satisfactory that the jury cannot reflect the basis upon which they found the defendant guilty, given the maximum sentence available for the offences. See E Freer, “Causing or Allowing the Death of a Child”: Challenges to Working Out “Which of You Did It?” [2016] Crim LR 618.

¹⁶³ [2006] EWCA Crim 3321.

¹⁶⁴ Owen [2009] EWCA Crim 2259.

¹⁶⁵ See also Home Office Circular 9/2005, The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004.

¹⁶⁶ [2009] EWCA Crim 2, [2009] Crim LR 348. See also Watt and others [2011] EWCA Crim 1325.

¹⁶⁷ At [26].

The Court of Appeal in Uddin adopted an even broader interpretation than the one in Khan.¹⁶⁸ Hallett LJ rejected the argument that the term ‘vulnerable adult’ ought to be defined with reference to the words that precede it. Her ladyship held that the word ‘otherwise’ provided for an additional, third category or categories of potentially vulnerable adults who were not at the relevant time suffering from an illness, disability or old age. An adult may therefore fall within the ambit of the legislation by virtue of ‘a cause (other than physical or mental disability or illness or old age) which has the effect on the victim of significantly impairing his ability to protect himself from violence, abuse or neglect’.¹⁶⁹ Her ladyship held that the cause of V’s impaired ability to protect himself could be intrinsic or external and could be physical, psychological and/or arise from the victim’s circumstances. Unlike Lord Judge CJ in Khan, however, Hallett LJ did not state that V had to be in a state of utter dependency. The example given was a victim of sexual or domestic abuse or modern slavery who might find himself in a vulnerable position, having suffered long-term physical and mental abuse leaving him scared, cowed and with a significantly impaired ability to protect himself.

Such a broad interpretation has the potential to create problems. It may make an already broad offence undesirably wide. The court’s interpretation gives ‘otherwise’ within s 5(6) a meaning unconstrained by all of the words preceding it. As the statute introduces a positive duty to act, with a criminal sanction for failure to do so, a narrower approach to interpretation might have been expected. The s 5 offence applies to D2, who fails to protect a vulnerable person from death or serious injury, as well as to D1 who actually kills. Those who fail to protect are judged on a negligence-based standard—that they were or ought to have been aware of the significant risk to V. On a natural interpretation, there is no need for D2 to realize that V is a vulnerable adult: liability on that element of the offence is strict. If that is correct, D2’s liability turns exclusively on the awareness/negligence as to V being at significant risk of serious injury from D1 and D2’s failure to take reasonable steps to avoid that harm. If liability as to V’s status is strict, and the definition of vulnerability is as ambiguous as it seems to be, the offence is remarkably wide. Since D2 need not (and arguably cannot) know whether V qualifies as a vulnerable adult, D2 is under a duty as soon as D2 ought to have realized that any member of the household is at significant risk from any other member of the household, whether V is a child or even a fit adult. If D2 ought to have been so aware, D2 will only be acquitted if either he took reasonable steps to avoid the harm or, at trial it is determined that V was not a vulnerable adult after all. However, it is implicit in the decision that the extent to which D2 did or did not know of V’s vulnerability is highly material to what it was reasonable for D2 to be expected to do.¹⁷⁰

15.4.4 What type of act or omission?

The actus reus of the offence is committed by either D’s act or omission¹⁷¹ which caused the death of the victim or caused V serious physical harm; or D’s failure to take such steps as he could reasonably have been expected to take to protect V from the *significant*¹⁷² risk of serious physical harm by the unlawful act of a person living in the same household as V and having frequent contact with V. There is no requirement that the failure on D’s part to protect V is a legal cause of death or serious physical harm.¹⁷³ The conduct which caused ¹⁶⁸ [2017] EWCA Crim 1072, [2017] Crim LR 976. ¹⁶⁹ At [37].

¹⁷⁰ Problems of proof might arise in the case of a person who is apparently fit: the physically fitter V is, the less likely that D2 will be aware that he is at significant risk of GBH from D1 (unless D1’s treatment of V is extreme), particularly where D1’s conduct takes the form of neglect rather than physical attack.

¹⁷¹ Section 5(6) makes it clear that an act includes an omission.

¹⁷² See Mujuru [2007] EWCA Crim 1249, [2008] Crim LR 54 and commentary.

¹⁷³ D1’s act in killing V will break the chain of causation. D2 will remain liable under this offence, not for an omission based on a duty (identified under the categories in Ch 2).

death or serious physical harm is not limited to that which would form specific crimes provided it was unlawful—offences of violence are the most obvious examples, and in relation to children under 16, but not vulnerable individuals, offences of child neglect. Section 5(6) confirms that ‘serious’ harm means harm that amounts to grievous bodily harm for the purposes of the OAPA 1861.

D1’s conduct which results in V’s death or causes V serious physical harm must occur in circumstances of ‘the kind’ which were/ought to have been foreseen by D2; there is no need for the conduct to be identical to that which D2 ought to have foreseen.¹⁷⁴ It is odd that the offence is restricted by this requirement. It means that D2 who foresees that D1 might use violence by punching V cannot be convicted if D1 kills or seriously injures V by poisoning.

The unlawful act by D1 of which D2 must be aware/ought to be aware can include a course of violent conduct as well as an omission to act. If D1 neglects a vulnerable member of the household to whom he owes a duty of care and is liable for gross negligence manslaughter, D2, a fellow member of the household, might then be liable under s 5 if he at least ought to have been aware of the risk of serious injury to V by D1’s conduct. The fact that D1’s act must be an ‘unlawful’ one (including an omission) does not mean that there must be an unlawful ‘act’ as an element of the gross negligence manslaughter charge; rather, the gross negligence manslaughter qualifies because as a crime it is an unlawful act: s 5(5).

15.4.5 Household

The Act deliberately leaves undefined the concept of ‘household’.¹⁷⁵ This is disappointing for an offence of this seriousness, even with the additional qualifying requirement that D has contact with the victim. Some categories of carer who have regular contact—for example, nannies—are seemingly not caught by the Act unless under s 5(4)(b). The focus of the offence is clearly on imposing burdens on household members to police the risk of harm.¹⁷⁶ In that respect it is illogical that the offence is not triggered where D is/ought to be aware of the risk posed by other carers in regular contact with the victim.

In Khan, it was held that membership of a household was a question of fact. There had to be ‘frequent contact’ between the household member and the eventual victim. That was a question of fact. The lack of certainty is unsatisfactory in an offence of this nature.¹⁷⁷

15.4.6 What type of harm?

Serious harm is defined in the 2004 Act as ‘harm that amounts to grievous bodily harm for the purposes of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861’.¹⁷⁸

15.4.7 What mens rea?

In terms of mens rea, it is effectively a crime of negligence since the fault on D’s part if he is not the direct cause of the death or serious injury is a question of whether he ought to have ¹⁷⁴ See Khan at [39].

¹⁷⁵ Hansard, HL, 21 Jan 2004, col GC362: Baroness Scotland stated that it was a deliberate decision to leave the definition to courts.

¹⁷⁶ ‘It is drafted with the idea that members of the household will know enough about the activities of the other members that they can be expected to be aware of the risk to the victim and take action. They are “complicit” in the offence, either directly or by proximity, through standing by during the preceding abuse or neglect and doing nothing. Therefore, in this context, if one were to ask, “Am I my brother’s keeper?”, the answer would be, “Yes”.’ Baroness Scotland, Hansard, 21 Jan 2004, col GC361.

¹⁷⁷ A point also made by A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 39.

¹⁷⁸ Section 5(6).

been aware of the risk. The death or serious injury must have occurred in the circumstances that D ought to have foreseen. D who is aware that X has previously shaken his baby, V, violently might not be guilty if X caused V's death or serious injury by, for example, dipping its dummy in methadone to stop its incessant crying.¹⁷⁹

In Khan, the court referred to the extension of the offence to 'those who chose to close their eyes to a risk of which they ought to have been aware, and which they ought to have foreseen'.¹⁸⁰ Technically, this confuses wilful blindness, where D has some awareness of the risk (at least suspicion), with negligence, where D need not have any awareness provided a reasonable person would. The test in s 5 is simply whether D ought to have been aware.

Another limitation on the scope of liability is that in s 5(1)(d)(ii): D's failure is to be assessed against the steps he could be reasonably expected to take. If D is a child or has a learning disability this will be relevant to determining what he could be expected to do. What of D2 who is petrified of D1? In addition, in assessing the reasonableness of the steps that ought to have been taken by D2, the question for the jury is, seemingly, whether the steps are reasonable for this particular defendant to take. Thus, juries might hesitate before convicting D2 who lives in an abusive and violent relationship with D1, and is aware that D1 batters their child as he does D2. In Khan, the Court of Appeal sought to allay fears¹⁸¹ that the offence will be used inappropriately to victimize further those who, because they are themselves subjected to domestic abuse, have failed to take steps to protect a child or vulnerable adult from the risks posed by the abuser within the household. As the court observes, under s 5(1)(d)(ii) the protective steps which could have been expected of D2 depend on what reasonably could have been expected of him and the jury might therefore conclude that such a person's failure was reasonable in the circumstances.¹⁸²

It should also be noted that the offence is qualified: the risk of which D2 ought to have been aware is a 'significant' one of 'serious injury'. The Law Commission had concluded that the level of risk to the child which must exist before a person is exposed to criminal liability ought to be 'relatively high'.¹⁸³ The Commission drew support for its proposal that the risk should be a 'real risk' more than 'a possibility', from the interpretation of the expression 'likely harm' in s 31 of the Children Act 1989 as construed in the House of Lords in Re H and others.¹⁸⁴ The Law Commission also accepted, however, that a test of 'serious likelihood' or 'serious risk' would set the standard too high and inhibit successful prosecution.¹⁸⁵ Parliament substituted the words 'significant risk' for the Law Commission's formula 'real risk'. Some commentators suggest that Parliament may, therefore, have intended to impose a higher threshold.¹⁸⁶ Comments made in the course of parliamentary debates also support that view. Baroness Scotland of Asthal stated that 'We should remember too that we are ¹⁷⁹ For an example of a s 5 case involving poisoning, see V [2010] EWCA Crim 721 where D drugged her children to make them sleep.

¹⁸⁰ At [32].

¹⁸¹ Organizations such as Justice and Refuge cautioned during the Act's consultation process against the danger that the offence may be used to further victimize abused women by prosecuting them for allowing their abusive partners to kill the child: see eg Refuge, Response to the Domestic Violence Crimes and Victims Bill 07/04, a view echoed by J Herring, 'Familial Homicide, Failure to Protect and Domestic Violence: Who's the Victim' [2007] Crim LR 923. Mujuru, n 172, is one of the examples cited.

¹⁸² The argument that there ought to be a specific domestic violence defence within the legislation is rejected by Morrison on the basis that it may exonerate culpable defendants and that the need for such a defence has not been established. Morrison states that the mens rea element of the offence is sufficient to ensure that the offence does not criminalize those who are themselves victims. See SM Morrison, 'Should There Be a Domestic Violence Defence to the Offence of Familial Homicide?' [2013] Crim LR 826.

¹⁸³ Para 6.21.

¹⁸⁴ [1996] AC 563 at 592, per Lord Nicholls.

¹⁸⁵ Para 6.23.

¹⁸⁶ R Ward and R Bird, The Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004: A Practitioner's Guide (2005) para 3.24.

talking about “a significant risk of serious physical harm”. That is quite a high threshold. The signs of that risk would be very evident. In many cases, the risk of harm is all too evident from previous harm that a member of the household has inflicted on the child or on others.’¹⁸⁷

One issue that was considered is whether it is appropriate for the judge to direct the jury to explain in a ‘special verdict’ the basis of their finding of guilt for an offence under s 5. In Hopkinson,¹⁸⁸ D was found guilty of causing or allowing the death of V. The jury also returned a ‘special verdict’ that D had caused the injuries from which V had died. The Court of Appeal observed that while it could not abolish the special verdict procedure, it had fallen into virtual desuetude. Lord Judge CJ held that directing the jury to return a special verdict in the context of s 5 was especially inappropriate given that the offence was created in order to address the difficulty of proving which of two was responsible when there are no other possible candidates. It is submitted that this is the appropriate conclusion.

15.5 Child destruction and abortion

It has already been observed that it is not murder to kill a child in the womb or while in the process of being born.¹⁸⁹ Nor is it, in itself, an offence against the person of the mother, since the foetus is not part of the mother.¹⁹⁰ Though the killing of the child in the womb after ‘quickening’¹⁹¹ was a misdemeanour at common law, the present law on the subject is statutory. There are two offences to consider:

- child destruction—s 1 of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 prohibits the killing of any child which is ‘capable of being born alive’; and
- attempting to procure a miscarriage—s 58 of the OAPA 1861 (subject to the Abortion Act 1967)¹⁹² prohibits attempts to procure miscarriage from any time after the conception of the child until its birth.

The two offences thus overlap. Procuring a miscarriage so as to kill a child capable of being born alive may amount to both offences. Killing a child in the process of being born is not procuring a miscarriage and can amount only to child destruction.

15.5.1 Child destruction

Section 1 of the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 provides:

- (1) Subject as hereinafter in this subsection provided, any person who, with intent to destroy the life of a child capable of being born alive, by any wilful act causes a child to die before it has an existence independent of its mother, shall be guilty of an offence, to wit, of child destruction,^[193] and shall be liable on conviction thereof on indictment to imprisonment for ¹⁸⁷ Hansard, HL, 9 Mar 2004, col 1158 (emphasis added).

¹⁸⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 795, [2014] Crim LR 310.

¹⁸⁹ See J Herring, Medical Law and Ethics (6th edn, 2016) Ch 6; B Bennett, Abortion (2004). See also the Select Committee Report on Scientific Developments in Relation to the Abortion Act 1967 (2007) HC 1045-1. For historical accounts, see Williams, Sanctity of Life, 139–223 and ‘The Legalization of Medical Abortion’ (1964) The Eugenics Review; BM Dickens, Abortion and the Law (1966).

¹⁹⁰ A-G’s Reference (No 3 of 1994), p 124.

¹⁹¹ ‘Quickening’ was an ambiguous term but was generally accepted to mean the time at which the mother felt the motion of the child. It was commonly treated as being around the 15th/16th week from conception.

¹⁹² See p 643.

¹⁹³ See J Keown, ‘The Scope of the Offence of Child Destruction’ (1988) 104 LQR 120.

life: Provided that no person shall be found guilty of an offence under this section unless it is proved that the act which caused the death of the child was not done in good faith for the purpose only of preserving the life of the mother.

- (2) For the purposes of this Act, evidence that a woman had at any material time been pregnant for a period of twenty-eight weeks or more shall be prima facie proof that she was at that time pregnant of a child capable of being born alive.

While the actual physical condition in which a foetus would exist following birth is a matter for expert medical evidence, whether a foetus at that particular stage of its development can properly be described as 'a child capable of being born alive' is a question of law for the court. Differing interpretations have been proffered, including that the expression is limited to the child in the process of being born, that it extended to any viable foetus, and widest of all, that it extended to any foetus capable of being born alive, however short-lived its existence.¹⁹⁴

In C v S,¹⁹⁵ the medical experts disagreed as to whether a foetus at the stage it will normally have reached by the 18th to the 21st week of pregnancy would be described as capable of being born alive. In the light of the evidence that it would never be capable of breathing, the court held it could not be capable of being born alive.¹⁹⁶ In Rance v Mid-Downs Health Authority,¹⁹⁷ a civil action, Brooke J thought the meaning of the phrase was clear and that a child is 'born alive' if 'after birth, it exists as a live child, that is to say breathing and living by reason of its breathing through its own lungs alone, without deriving any of its living or power of living by or through any connection with its mother'. It is not necessary that the child be capable of survival into old age or even for a period of days. Applying this test, Brooke J was satisfied to 'a very high standard of proof' that the particular child was capable of being born alive after 26 weeks of pregnancy and that therefore to kill him would have been the offence of child destruction. The Abortion Act 1967 uses the phrase 'protecting the life of the viable foetus' in respect of the provisions of the 1929 Act; but, rejecting the view that 'viable' has a different and more restrictive meaning, Brooke J held that it was merely used as convenient shorthand for 'capable of being born alive' and its use in 1967 had no effect on the meaning of the 1929 Act.¹⁹⁸

The Rance test has the merit of being reasonably clear. However, it is not applicable to all situations. For example, in Re A, M never breathed on her own and yet, since she was clearly alive, was regarded as such by all involved and the point as to whether she was born alive was not taken with any seriousness.¹⁹⁹ The pressure on the law's ability to deal with these difficult issues will increase as medical advances allow, for example, for pre-birth treatment. It is now possible for a foetus to undergo surgery prior to birth, during the course of which it may be removed from the womb before being replaced in the mother. Is the child born? What if an individual was to burst in on the operating theatre and stab the foetus with murderous intent?

¹⁹⁴ See J Keown for discussion of the merits of each interpretation. See also D Price, 'How Viable is the Present Scope of the Offence of Child Destruction' (1987) 16 Anglo Am LR 220. Cf R v McDonald (1999) NICC, 4 Mar (sufficient that foetus had a real chance of being born alive).

¹⁹⁵ [1988] QB 135, CA.

¹⁹⁶ ibid, at 145–148 (Heilbron J). Cf G Wright, 'Capable of Being Born Alive?' (1981) 131 NLJ 188 and 'The Legality of Abortion by Prostaglandin' [1984] Crim LR 347; Tunkel and Wright [1985] Crim LR 133.

¹⁹⁷ [1991] 1 QB 587, QBD.

¹⁹⁸ The 1990 amendments provide that no offence is committed under the 1929 Act provided that the pregnancy is terminated in accordance with provisions of the 1967 Act (see later).

¹⁹⁹ See p 375. For a view that M was not 'born alive', see JK Mason, 'Conjoined Twins: A Diagnostic Conundrum' (2001) 5 ELR 226. On prenatal surgery, see Editorial, 'Progress in Understanding the Hemoglobin Switch' (2011) 365 N Engl J Med 852.

The Select Committee Report *Scientific Developments Relating to the Abortion Act 1967*²⁰⁰ recognized the difficulty in defining the viability of a foetus or neonate. In relation to neonates, the Committee reported that 'it has been subject to a range of interpretations. At one extreme a baby could be defined as viable simply because it was born showing signs of life, for example, breathing or a heart beat . . . at the other extreme it could mean that a baby is capable of surviving through childhood with no or minimal disabilities.'²⁰¹ There is, as ever, a danger with loose language. In general, viability might mean the minimum age of gestation at which any neonate could survive, the minimum age at which this neonate could survive or the age at which the majority of neonates would survive.²⁰² The Committee heard evidence that viability means, in medical terms, capability of surviving into adulthood.²⁰³

In a controversial series of decisions, the European Court declined to decide whether the protection of Art 2 extends to the unborn child. It was acknowledged in *Vo v France*²⁰⁴ that the Convention institutions have not 'ruled out the possibility that in certain circumstances safeguards may be extended to the unborn child'.²⁰⁵ The Court noted that 'the unborn child is not regarded as a person directly protected by Article 2 of the Convention and that if the unborn do have a right to life it is implicitly limited by the mother's rights and interests'.²⁰⁶ The decision has been cogently criticized.²⁰⁷

The jury may convict of child destruction on an indictment for murder, manslaughter, infanticide or an offence under s 58 of the OAPA 1861; and on an indictment for child destruction, they may convict of an offence under s 58.²⁰⁸

15.5.1.1 Interrelationship with the Abortion Act 1967

The Abortion Act 1967 legalizes abortion in certain circumstances and subject to certain formalities.²⁰⁹ It originally provided that it should not affect the offence of child destruction but, as amended by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990,²¹⁰ s 5(1) of the 1967 Act states that:

No offence under [the 1929 Act] shall be committed by a registered medical practitioner who terminates a pregnancy in accordance with the provisions of [the Abortion Act 1967].

²⁰⁰ (2007) HC 1045-1. See C Foster, 'Forty Years On' (2007) 157 NLJ 1517.

²⁰¹ Para 22. ²⁰² Para 23. ²⁰³ Para 27.

²⁰⁴ [2004] 2 FCR 577, ECtHR (Grand Chamber). See also ABC v Ireland [2010] ECHR 2032.

²⁰⁵ Para 82. ²⁰⁶ Para 80.

²⁰⁷ See JK Mason, 'What's in a Name: The Vagaries of Vo v France' (2005) 17 CFLQ 97, calling for an offence of feticide which can be committed without an intent to kill—in cases of gross negligence. See also A Plomer, 'A Foetal Right to Life' [2005] EHRLR 311 criticizing the judgment and suggesting that cases of violence against the mother's life might be treated as beginning at the point of foetal viability. See also E Wicks, 'Terminating Life and Human Rights: The Fetus and the Neonate' in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007) 201, discussing whether the right of the foetus might be subordinate to that of the mother, a violation of the foetus's right to life ought not to be justified on the basis of postnatal disability and suffering. For more recent analysis of the European Court's jurisprudence, see D Fenwick, 'Abortion Jurisprudence' at Strasbourg: Deferential, Avoidant and Normatively Neutral?' (2014) 34 LS 214.

²⁰⁸ For an example of a conviction where D used violence against the pregnant woman with the intention of causing the death of the child, see Virgo (1988) 10 Cr App R (S) 427.

²⁰⁹ For recent analysis of whether the legal framework fulfils its intended aims, see S Sheldon, 'The Decriminalisation of Abortion: An Argument for Modernisation' (2016) 36 OJLS 334.

²¹⁰ On which see A Grubb, 'The New Law on Abortion: Clarification or Ambiguity' [1991] Crim LR 659. See also the Government's Review of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act: Proposals for Revised Legislation (Including Establishment of the Regulatory Authority for Tissue and Embryos) (Dec 2006) Cm 6989. See now the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008.

The effect of this provision is that:

- if the doctor is complying with the terms of the 1967 Act, and causes the death of a child capable of being born alive, it is not an offence of child destruction under the 1929 Act;²¹¹
- if the death of such a child is caused by a doctor who is not complying with the provisions of the 1967 Act, or if it is caused by any other person, then it is prima facie child destruction. There will, however, be a defence to a charge of child destruction under the 1929 Act if the act is done for the purpose only of preserving the life of the mother;
- but, even where the operation is to save the life of the mother, that will not amount to a defence to a charge under s 58 of the 1861 Act unless the Bourne defence of necessity has survived the 1967 Act—a matter of some doubt, considered below.²¹²

A wide meaning was given to the words ‘for the purpose only of preserving the life of the mother’ by MacNaghten J in Bourne.²¹³ This was obiter so far as the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 was concerned since the charge was brought under the OAPA 1861; but MacNaghten J took the view that those words represented the common law and were implicit in the 1861 Act by virtue of the word ‘unlawfully’. He said:

As I have said, I think those words [‘for the purpose of preserving the life of the mother’] ought to be construed in a reasonable sense, and if the doctor is of opinion, on reasonable grounds and with adequate knowledge, that the probable consequence of the continuance of the pregnancy will be to make the woman a physical or mental wreck, the jury are quite entitled to take the view that the doctor who under these circumstances and in the honest belief, operates, is operating for the purpose of preserving the life of the mother.²¹⁴

Both before and after this, however, the judge stressed that the test was whether the operation was performed in good faith for the purpose of preserving the life of the mother. The passage was presumably intended to refer to whether the doctor had formed a belief about the circumstances that would have such an impact on the woman’s health as to shorten life, because the judge had said ‘life depends upon health and health may be so gravely impaired that death results’.²¹⁵

Informed medical opinion construed the judgment in the wider sense²¹⁶ and this appears to have been vindicated. In Bergmann and Ferguson,²¹⁷ Morris J is reported to have said that the court will not look too narrowly into the question of danger to life where danger to health is anticipated. Then, in Newton and Stungo,²¹⁸ Ashworth J stated in his direction to the jury, ‘Such use of an instrument is unlawful unless the use is made in good faith for the purposes of preserving the life or health of the woman’, adding that this included mental as well as physical health. Newton was acquitted of manslaughter by criminal negligence, but convicted of manslaughter by unlawfully using an instrument and of the offence under s 58. He did not appeal (obviously the direction was favourable to him); but it is thought likely that Ashworth J’s view would be accepted by the appellate courts.²¹⁹

²¹¹ M Bohlander, ‘Of Shipwrecked Sailors, Unborn Children, Conjoined Twins and Hijacked Airplanes—Taking Human Life and the Defence of Necessity’ (2006) 70 J Crim L 147 derives support from this for a defence of necessity applying to murder. That conclusion must be in considerable doubt following the decision in Nicklinson discussed earlier.

²¹² See p 653. ²¹³ [1939] 1 KB 687 (Central Criminal Court).

²¹⁴ ibid, 694. ²¹⁵ ibid, 692.

²¹⁶ J Havard, ‘Therapeutic Abortion’ [1958] Crim LR 600 at 605.

²¹⁷ (1948) unreported; Williams, Sanctity of Life, 154; 1 BMJ 1008.

²¹⁸ [1958] Crim LR 469 (Central Criminal Court), fully considered by Havard [1958] Crim LR 600.

²¹⁹ See also Paton v BPAS [1979] QB 276: ‘not only would it be a bold and brave judge . . . who would seek to interfere with the discretion of the doctors acting under the Abortion Act 1967, but I think he would really be a foolish judge who would try to do any such thing, unless, possibly, where there is clear bad faith and an obvious attempt to perpetrate a criminal offence’, per Sir George Baker P.

The defence as it has been applied by the courts is founded on the subjective belief of the actor; that is, the question is not whether the operation is in fact necessary to preserve the life of the mother but whether D believes it to be necessary.²²⁰ In answering this question, the court will take account of the size of the fee, a large fee being evidence of bad faith;²²¹ and whether D followed accepted medical practice.²²² What is the position if the operation was in fact necessary, but was performed by D in bad faith, to oblige, as he thought, the mere convenience of the woman, and for a high fee? One view might be that there is no actus reus here,²²³ but it is thought more likely that the defence will be limited to the case of a bona fide belief.²²⁴ Thus, in Newton, it does not seem to have been decided that an operation was unnecessary; only that Newton did not bona fide believe it to be necessary.²²⁵

These cases all relate to s 58 of the 1861 Act, where they are probably no longer of relevance.²²⁶ However, because they purport to be an interpretation of the proviso in the 1929 Act they cannot be ignored when construing the child destruction offence. On the other hand, it is quite possible that the court, when actually confronted with the interpretation of the proviso, might take a stricter and narrower view of what constitutes the preservation of the life of the mother.

15.5.2 Attempting to procure miscarriage

The common law misdemeanour of abortion applied only after the child had 'quickened' in the womb. To procure an abortion before this occurred was no crime. A statute of 1803²²⁷ enacted that it should be a felony punishable by death to administer a poison with intent to procure the miscarriage of a woman quick²²⁸ with child, and a felony punishable with imprisonment or transportation for 14 years to administer poison with a like intent to a woman who was not proved to be quick with child. The distinction between 'quick' and 'non-quick' women gave rise to complications and it disappeared in the re-enactment of the law by the Offences Against the Person Act 1837²²⁹ which established the law substantially in its modern form. The current statute is the OAPA 1861, which provides by s 58:

Every woman being with child who, with intent to procure her own miscarriage, shall unlawfully administer to herself any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, and whosoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall unlawfully administer to her or cause to be taken by her any poison or other noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or other means whatsoever with the like intent, shall be guilty of an offence, and being convicted thereof shall be liable . . . to imprisonment for life . . .

The extension of the law was of great practical importance, since most self-induced abortions occur before quickening. Prescription, supply, administration or use of the contraceptive pill, mini-pill and morning-after pill does not contravene s 58 because the pill is not an ²²⁰ Bergmann and Ferguson cited in The Sanctity of Life, 165.

²²¹ A significant difference between the case of Newton and that of Stungo (who was acquitted) seems to have been that Stungo took a very small fee, Newton a high one.

²²² See Havard [1958] Crim LR at 607, 608. ²²³ cf the discussion of Dadson, p 34.

²²⁴ cf Williams, The Sanctity of Life, 166, who would agree with this conclusion on the ground that the crime is in the nature of an attempt. But it is just as much a substantive crime as burglary.

²²⁵ But even if it was necessary to carry out the operation, it was probably not necessary to carry it out in the way it was done—in a consulting room, the patient being sent back to a hotel in a taxi afterwards.

²²⁶ See later. ²²⁷ 43 Geo 3, c 58 (Lord Ellenborough's Act 1803).

²²⁸ See n 191; ie whether the mother felt the foetus. ²²⁹ 7 Will & 1 Vic, c 85.

abortifacient.²³⁰ It has also been held that the fitting of an IUD was not an offence under s 58.²³¹

The statute makes it clear beyond all doubt that the offence may be committed by the woman herself as well as by others, the only distinction being that if the woman herself is charged, it must be proved that she is in fact pregnant, whereas this is not necessary if the accused is someone other than the mother herself.²³² The Act is not confined to the use of a 'poison or other noxious thing' or 'any instrument'; the 'other means' include manual interference, even though no instrument is employed and the medical evidence is that the conduct could not, in the circumstances, cause a miscarriage.²³³ The actus reus consists simply in the administration of the poison or other noxious thing or the use of the instrument or other means. The offence can be committed where the pregnant woman is not aware that the administration of the drug has been performed.²³⁴

The Act distinguishes between 'poison' and 'noxious thing' and it has been held that in the case of something other than a 'recognized poison', the thing must be administered in such quantity as to be in fact harmful though not necessarily abortifacient.²³⁵ A sleeping pill has been held not to be noxious;²³⁶ and the administration in harmless quantities of oil of juniper was no actus reus;²³⁷ but Denman J said that it would be otherwise if a thing, innocuous when administered in small quantities, were to be administered in such quantities as to be noxious. Field and Stephen JJ thought that if the thing were a 'recognized poison' the offence might be committed even though the quantity given was so small as to be incapable of doing harm. The distinction is hardly a logical one for 'recognized poisons' may be beneficial when taken in small quantities and in such a case the thing taken is no more poisonous than the oil of juniper was noxious.

As noted, the section makes a distinction between the case where the woman administers, etc the thing to herself, in which case she must be proved to be with child, and the case where it is administered to her by another, in which case she need not be. The importance of this distinction has been diminished by the decision in *Whitchurch*²³⁸ that a woman who is not pregnant may be convicted of conspiring with another to procure her own abortion, and by the decision in Socket that such a woman²³⁹ may be convicted of aiding and abetting in the offence of the other, if it is complete. Thus, in effect, the woman will be excused on the ground that she is not with child only in cases where she is not acting in concert with another. One view is that this interpretation has wholly undermined the intention of Parliament.²⁴⁰ But it has been argued elsewhere²⁴¹ that it would have been perfectly reasonable for Parliament to discriminate between the non-pregnant woman who calls in the back-street or professional abortionist and the non-pregnant woman who administers to ²³⁰ R (on the application of Smeaton) v Secretary of State for Health [2002] EWHC 610 (Admin), [2002] Crim LR 664. For critical comment on the decision, see J Keown, "'Morning After' Pills, "Miscarriage" and Muddle' (2005) 25 LS 296, and B Hewson, 'SPUC and the Morning-After Pill Saga' (2002) 152 NLJ 1004.

²³¹ Dhingra (1991) unreported but cited in E Jackson, Medical Law: Text, Cases, and Materials (4th edn, 2016).

²³² Section 2(3) of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 provides that 'for the purposes of the Act, a woman is not to be treated as carrying a child until the embryo has become implanted'.

²³³ Spicer (1955) 39 Cr App R 189, [1955] Crim LR 772 (Dorset Assizes).

²³⁴ See the case of Magira [2008] EWCA Crim 1939 where D secretly put into his wife's food abortifacient drugs that he had bought on the internet. D did not want a child.

²³⁵ Marlow (1964) 49 Cr App R 49, [1965] Crim LR 35, CA (Brabin J); Douglas [1966] NZLR 45. Cf Marcus [1981] 2 All ER 833, [1981] Crim LR 490, CA, p 714.

²³⁶ Weatherall [1968] Crim LR 115 (Central Criminal Court) (Judge Brodrick).

²³⁷ Cramp (1880) 5 QBD 307, CCR. ²³⁸ (1890) 24 QBD 420, CCR; p 442.

²³⁹ (1909) 1 Cr App R 101, (1908) 72 JP 428, CCA; p 442. ²⁴⁰ Williams, CLGP, 673.

²⁴¹ B Hogan, 'Victims as Parties to Crime' [1962] Crim LR 683 at 690.

herself an abortifacient in the solitude of her own bedroom.²⁴² The point is perhaps not of great practical importance as it appears that it is not the practice to prosecute the woman if she is not in fact pregnant.²⁴³

It is debatable whether s 1 of the Abortion Act allows for a defence only when a pregnancy is successfully terminated. There are cases where the abortion is unsuccessful.²⁴⁴ In RCN v DHSS,²⁴⁵ the House of Lords suggested that it would be 'absurd' and 'cannot have been the intention of Parliament' that anyone taking part in an unsuccessful termination would be unable to rely on defences in the Abortion Act so as to be guilty of an offence under the 1861 Act. Lord Edmund-Davies observed that 'Were it otherwise the unavoidable conclusion is that doctors and nurses could in such cases be convicted of what in essence would be the extraordinary crime of attempting to do a lawful act.'

15.5.3 Knowingly supplying or procuring poison, etc

Section 59 of the OAPA 1861 makes a substantive crime of certain preparatory acts, some of which might amount to counselling or abetting the offence under s 58. It provides:

Whosoever shall unlawfully supply or procure any poison or other noxious thing, or any instrument or thing whatsoever, knowing that the same is intended to be unlawfully used or employed with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding five years.

The word 'procure', on the first occasion on which it is used in the section, means 'get possession of something of which you have not got possession already';²⁴⁶ so D's conviction was quashed when there was no evidence as to how or when he had come into the possession of the instruments and the judge had misdirected the jury that the word was 'wide enough to include getting instruments or getting them together or preparing them for use'.²⁴⁷

This leaves a gap in the legislation. As Crown counsel said:²⁴⁸

if a defendant went to a chemist and bought an instrument to abort A, he would have committed an offence, but if he then put the instrument away in a cupboard and later, for the purpose of aborting B, went to the cupboard and took the instrument he would not have committed an offence.

The meaning was further considered in the extraordinary case of Ahmed.²⁴⁹ D was married to a woman who spoke no English who fell pregnant. D took her to an abortion clinic, telling her she was going for a minor operation for ovarian cysts. Staff at the clinic became concerned and provided an interpreter. No abortion occurred. D was convicted of an offence under s 59, but the conviction was quashed on appeal. One argument considered was that the surgical instruments which must have been available to carry out the intended abortion were procured by D, but the indictment referred only to medical or surgical procedures and not to instruments. The Court of Appeal noted that there was no evidence that any particular instruments had been selected for use at or brought to the place at which the operation would take place. 'Even if they had, we do not consider that the appellant could be said to have "procured" those instruments.' Referring to Mills, the court confirmed that the word 'procure' is ²⁴² For an extraordinary case in which the woman committed the offence by aborting a foetus a few days before full term, see Catt [2013] EWCA Crim 1187.

²⁴³ Nor has it been for some time. Cf The Sanctity of Life at 146; Peake (1932) 97 JPN 353.

²⁴⁴ Or dealing with an attempt, where abortion is attempted but the woman turns out not to be pregnant.

²⁴⁵ [1981] AC 800, [1981] Crim LR 322, HL.

²⁴⁶ Mills [1963] 1 QB 522, CCA, following Scully (1903) 23 NZLR 380.

²⁴⁷ ibid, 524.

²⁴⁸ ibid, 526.

²⁴⁹ [2010] EWCA Crim 1949, [2011] Crim LR 158.

not apt to describe a case in which the defendant brings about a situation in which a third person, here a nurse or doctor, will take possession of or use an instrument of some kind.

The meaning of 'thing' in s 59 was also considered in Ahmed.²⁵⁰ The Court of Appeal held that D did not supply or procure any poison, any other noxious thing or any instrument. The Crown argued that a 'thing' was anticipated medical or surgical procedure. The Court of Appeal rejected that view—'the juxtaposition of the word "thing" with the word "instrument" which almost immediately precedes it, indicates that the "thing" must be some sort of article or object rather than something such as a medical procedure which has no physical existence'.²⁵¹

The court drew support for this interpretation by comparing ss 59 and 58 of the 1861 Act. Section 58 extends to D who unlawfully uses 'any instrument or other means whatsoever'.

The words 'knowing that the same is intended to be unlawfully used' have been construed in an extraordinarily wide sense and one highly unfavourable to the accused. Their natural meaning is surely that some person other than the accused must intend to be the unlawful user and that the accused must know of that intention. But it has been held that it is enough if the accused believes that the poison, etc is to be so used, so that it is no defence for him to show that the person supplied did not intend to use it²⁵² or that the person supplied was a policeman who had obtained the thing by false representations about a purely fictitious woman.²⁵³ This construction was defended by Erle CJ, the rest of the court concurring, on the extraordinary ground that, 'The defendant knew what his own intention was, and that was that the substance procured by him should be employed with intent to procure miscarriage'.²⁵⁴ This attitude contrasts strikingly with the strict construction of the word 'procure'; and these two cases have been dissented from in Victoria,²⁵⁵ though followed elsewhere in the Commonwealth.²⁵⁶ In Ahmed, the court noted that a defendant such as Ahmed will not necessarily be liable since his lies might, the court thought, not have prevented the doctors concerned from forming the relevant medical opinions in the 1967 Act. D would not have been 'knowing' that the thing was 'intended to be unlawfully used or employed with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman'.

15.5.4 The Abortion Act 1967

The law relating to abortion was modified in important respects by the Abortion Act 1967.²⁵⁷ In the Act:

'the law relating to abortion' means ss 58 and 59 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, and any rule of law relating to the procurement of abortion.

Section 1 of the Act, as amended by s 37 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, provides:²⁵⁸

- (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, a person shall not be guilty of an offence under the law relating to abortion when a pregnancy is terminated by a registered medical ²⁵⁰ ibid. ²⁵¹ Per Hughes LJ at [13]. Emphasis added.

²⁵² Hillman (1863) 9 Cox CC 386, CCR. ²⁵³ Titley (1880) 14 Cox CC 502 (Stephen J).

²⁵⁴ (1863) 9 Cox CC 386, CCR, at 387. ²⁵⁵ Hyland (1898) 24 VLR 101.

²⁵⁶ Scully (1903) 23 NZLR 380; Nosworthy (1907) 26 NZLR 536; Neil [1909] St R Qd 225; Freestone [1913] TPD 758; Irwin v R (1968) 68 DLR (2d) 485.

²⁵⁷ See J Hoggett, 'The Abortion Act 1967' [1968] Crim LR 247. On the changes introduced by the Act, see HLA Hart, 'Abortion Law Reform: The English Experience' (1972) 8 MULR 389; M Simms, 'Abortion Law Reform: Has the Controversy Changed?' [1970] Crim LR 567, 573 and 'The Abortion Act: A Reply' [1971] Crim LR 86; JM Finnis, 'The Abortion Act: What Has Changed?' [1971] Crim LR 3; and generally S Sheldon, Beyond Control (1977).

²⁵⁸ See the valuable discussion of the amended Act by A Grubb, 'The New Law of Abortion: Clarification or Ambiguity?' [1991] Crim LR 659.

practitioner if two^[259] registered medical practitioners are of the opinion, formed in good faith—

- (a) that the pregnancy has not exceeded its twenty-fourth week and that the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated, of injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman or any existing children of her family^[260]; or
 - (b) that the termination is necessary to prevent grave permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman; or
 - (c) that the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk to the life of the pregnant woman, greater than if the pregnancy were terminated; or
 - (d) that there is a substantial risk that if the child were born it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped.^[261]
- (2) In determining whether the continuance of a pregnancy would involve such risk of injury to health as is mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (1) of this section, account may be taken of the pregnant woman's actual or reasonably foreseeable environment.

By s 1(3) and (3A), unless the abortion is carried out for the immediate saving of the life of the mother, the operation must be carried out in hospitals or other places as approved by the Secretary of State. In BPAS v Secretary of State for Health,²⁶² BPAS's claim to establish that it would be lawful to pilot and adopt a process of providing early medical abortion (EMA) whereby part of the treatment was administered at home was rejected by the Administrative Court. 'Parliament has decided by section 1(3A) to give the Secretary of State the responsibility for approval of the types of medicine that can be used, the manner in which they can be used and the places where they can be used.'²⁶³ Section 1(4) provides that the requirement for the opinion of two registered medical practitioners:

shall not apply to the termination of a pregnancy by a registered medical practitioner in a case where he is of the opinion, formed in good faith, that the termination is immediately necessary to save the life or to prevent grave permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman.

There were 185,596 abortions in England and Wales in 2016: 92 per cent of those were carried out at or under 13 weeks' gestation; 81 per cent were at or under ten weeks.²⁶⁴ Where ²⁵⁹ The Select Committee Report, Scientific Developments Relating to the Abortion Act 1967 (2007) HC 1045-1 discussed earlier, heard evidence that the practical reality of two doctors considering a case was a 'sham', para 86. See generally Ch 4 of that report. The Committee reported that it had not been presented with 'any good evidence' that in the first trimester of pregnancy the two signature rule safeguards the woman or the doctors or 'serves any useful purpose', at para 99.

²⁶⁰ It has been argued that where an abortion is sought before a woman is 24 weeks pregnant, then in reality it is impossible to police the reasons why women seek an abortion and that a doctor would have a defence if an abortion was conducted on the grounds of gender: see K Swift and M Robson, 'Why Doctors Need Not Fear Prosecution for Gender-Related Abortions' (2012) 76 J Crim L 348. See also K Greasley, 'Is Sex-Selective Abortion Against the Law?' (2016) 36 OJLS 535. For factual reasons, in September 2013 the CPS declined to prosecute in two cases in which it was alleged that doctors had agreed to conduct abortions on the grounds that the women concerned did not want to give birth to girls. See <http://blog.cps.gov.uk/2013/10/statement-from-director-of-public-prosecutions-on-abortion-related-cases.html>. Section 84 of the Serious Crime Act 2015 requires the Secretary of State to examine this issue and publish a strategy. The response may be found here: www.gov.uk/government/publications/abortion-on-grounds-of-sex-of-the-foetus.

²⁶¹ See S. McGuinness, 'Law, Reproduction, and Disability: Fatally "Handicapped"?' (2013) 21 Med L Rev 213 for critique of this exception.

²⁶² [2011] EWHC 235 (Admin). ²⁶³ At [37].

²⁶⁴ See www.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/652083/Abortion_stats_England_Wales_2016.pdf.

the pregnancy has not exceeded its 24th week²⁶⁵ the doctor must balance risks involved in an abortion against the risks to the woman or the existing child involved in the continuance of the pregnancy, and may perform the abortion only if it is his opinion that the latter are greater than the former. The Select Committee on Science and Technology reviewed the 24-week time limit to assess whether recent developments in medical science warranted a change in the law. The medical evidence suggested that around 89 per cent of fetuses born at 20 to 22 weeks are born dead.

Where the pregnancy has exceeded 24 weeks, the risks to the existing child(ren) are no longer a ground for abortion.²⁶⁶ The abortion can now be justified only on the grounds of risk of grave permanent injury to the woman or her death, or of the birth of a seriously handicapped child.²⁶⁷ In Jepson v Chief Constable of Mercia Police,²⁶⁸ D sought judicial review of the refusal to prosecute doctors who performed an abortion where the foetus had a cleft palate. The court concluded that the doctor had acted in good faith.²⁶⁹

Where the life of the woman is at risk, the doctor must engage in another balancing exercise and may terminate the pregnancy if he is of the opinion that this gives her a better chance of survival: 51/49 is enough. But where the risk is not to her life but of 'grave permanent injury' the pregnancy may be terminated only if abortion is 'necessary' to prevent this. If the doctor is of the opinion that the woman will certainly suffer grave permanent injury if the pregnancy is not terminated, then termination is, undoubtedly, necessary. It must be assumed, however, that Parliament, in distinguishing between grave permanent injury and death, intended that a higher degree of risk of grave permanent injury than of death is required to justify abortion. If so, termination is not 'necessary' simply because the doctor is of the opinion that grave permanent injury is more likely than not; that is, 51/49 is not enough. Whether necessity can be established somewhere between the balance of probabilities and virtual certainty is not clear. These balancing exercises do not pose problems under Art 2 of the ECHR. The European Court has recognized that 'if the unborn do have a "right to life" it is implicitly limited by the mother's rights and interests',²⁷⁰

²⁶⁵ It is uncertain when time starts to run. See the discussion by Grubb [1991] Crim LR 659. The Select Committee Report, Scientific Developments Relating to the Abortion Act 1967 considered whether medical advances should lead to a period shorter than 24 weeks. The conclusion was that no evidence had been presented that 'survival rates below 24 weeks gestation time have significantly improved', Ch 2. See also Jackson, Medical Law.

²⁶⁶ E Wicks, M Wyldes and M Kilby, 'Late Termination of Pregnancy for Foetal Abnormality: Medical and Legal Perspectives' (2004) 12 Med L Rev 285.

²⁶⁷ On this criterion, see the Select Committee Report, Ch 3, which is critical of the ambiguity of the wording and the difficulty in which this leaves doctors.

²⁶⁸ [2003] EWHC 3318 (QB). A Grear, 'The Curate, a Cleft Palate and Ideological Closure in the Abortion Act 1967—Time to Reconsider the Relationship Between Doctors and the Abortion Decision' [2004] Web JCLI; R Scott, 'Interpreting the Disability Ground of the Abortion Act' (2005) 64 CLJ 388. See the interesting analysis by E Wicks, 'Terminating Life and Human Rights: The Fetus and the Neonate' in C Erin and S Ost, The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007), considering the difference in the degree of protection afforded to a foetus with severe disability and a newly born baby with such disability. See also S Smith, 'Dignity: The Difference Between Abortion and Neonaticide for Severe Disability' in the same volume.

²⁶⁹ Jackson J did give leave, on the basis that the case raised an issue of public importance. West Mercia then reopened the case and the CPS decided not to prosecute, determining that the doctor had acted in good faith. See CPS press release: 16/3/2005. E Wicks, M Wyldes and M Kilby, 'Late Termination of Pregnancy for Reason of Fetal Abnormality: Medical and Legal Perspectives' (2004) 12 Med L Rev 285; S Sheldon and S Wilkinson, 'Termination of Pregnancy for Reason of Foetal Disability: Are there Grounds for a Special Exception in Law?' (2001) 9 Med L Rev 85.

²⁷⁰ Vo v France [2004] 2 FCR 577, para 80. See G Puppincck, 'Abortion and the European Convention on Human Rights' (2013) 3 IJLS 142.

There is a similar problem of determining what is a 'substantial' risk of abnormality resulting in 'serious' handicap to the child—but these uncertainties have been with us since 1967 without troubling the courts (but note Jepson earlier in this section), however much they may have troubled the doctors. Clearly, something a good deal less than certainty may amount to a substantial risk and it is thought that most people would regard something well below a 50 per cent chance as substantial in this context.

Section 1(1)(a), on a literal reading, could justify the termination of most pregnancies in their early stages, since some risk is necessarily involved in childbearing whereas the risks involved in an abortion operation at this early stage are very slight.²⁷¹ The 1967 Act allowed the interests of the existing children of the woman's family to be taken into account for the first time. These expressions are not defined in the Act, but it has been argued²⁷² that 'family' means the sociological and not the legal unit, so as to include illegitimate children and perhaps children who have been accepted as members of the family. The view has been expressed²⁷³ that a person over 21 could be a child of the family for this purpose if, for example, he were severely disabled.

An incapacitated adult could be provided with an abortion if it was in her best interests.²⁷⁴ The assessment would be in accordance with the Mental Capacity Act 2005.

15.5.4.1 Abortion and multiple pregnancies

Multiple pregnancies may be reduced by killing one or more of the foetuses. The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 amended s 5(2) of the Abortion Act 1967 to deal with the matter as follows:

- (2) For the purposes of the law relating to abortion, anything done with intent to procure a woman's miscarriage (or, in the case of a woman carrying more than one foetus, her miscarriage of any foetus) is unlawfully done unless authorised by section 1 of this Act and, in the case of a woman carrying more than one foetus, anything done with intent to procure her miscarriage of any foetus is authorised by that section if—
 - (a) the ground for termination of the pregnancy specified in subsection (1)(d) of that section applies in relation to any foetus and the thing is done for the purpose of procuring the miscarriage of that foetus, or
 - (b) any other grounds for termination of the pregnancy specified in that section applies.

So, if one or more of several foetuses is identified as being substantially at risk of becoming a child suffering from such a mental or physical abnormality as would lead to its being seriously handicapped, that foetus, or those foetuses, may be aborted. Where no foetus is so identified, but the continuance of the multiple pregnancy would satisfy one of the other conditions in s 1, the doctor may reduce the number of foetuses in order to eliminate or reduce the risk. In this situation, the doctor must select which of a number of healthy foetuses is to die.²⁷⁵

²⁷¹ '... it follows that a pregnancy may lawfully be terminated in order to secure a relatively small improvement in the woman's medical condition': A Guide to the Abortion Act 1967, at 11. The Act is not, however, interpreted in this way by the medical profession and administrators: Hart (1972) 8 MULR at 393–394. See also www.bma.org.uk/advice/employment/ethics/ethics-a-to-z/abortion.

²⁷² Hoggett [1968] Crim LR 247 at 249. ²⁷³ ibid.

²⁷⁴ See eg Re SG (Adult Mental Patient: Abortion) [1991] 2 FLR 329, DC; Re B (Wardship: Abortion) [1991] 2 FLR 426, DC; Re SS (An Adult: Medical Treatment) [2002] 1 FLR 445, DC—decided under common law pre-Mental Capacity Act 2005.

²⁷⁵ See Jackson, n 231. See also the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 2008.

15.5.4.2 Good faith of medical opinion

The Secretary of State for Health has exercised the powers under s 2 to require the opinion of medical practitioners to be certified in a particular form and notice of the termination of pregnancy and other information to be given. The question of the good faith of the doctors is essentially one for the jury. A verdict of guilty based on such bad faith where there is no evidence as to professional practice and medical probabilities is often likely to be regarded by the Court of Appeal as unsafe; but this depends on the nature of the other evidence.

An opinion may be absurd professionally and yet formed in good faith; conversely an opinion may be one which a doctor could have entertained and yet in the particular circumstances of a case may be found either to have been formed in bad faith or not to have been formed at all.²⁷⁶

If one or both of the doctors has expressed an opinion in bad faith but the operation is performed by a third, D, who is unaware of the bad faith, the conditions of the Act authorizing the procurement of the miscarriage are not satisfied but it is submitted that D has a defence. He lacks mens rea for, on the facts as he believes them to be, his act is a lawful one. The doctor in bad faith might, however, be convicted under Part 2 of the Serious Crime Act 2007 (see Ch 11) or the doctrine in Cogan and Leak or Millward.²⁷⁷

15.5.4.3 Termination ‘by a registered medical practitioner’

The defences provided by the Act are available ‘when a pregnancy is terminated by a registered medical practitioner’. When the conditions in the Act are satisfied and the pregnancy is terminated by the doctor, there is no actus reus. Those who assist him are therefore guilty of no offence. The Act obviously did not contemplate that every action in the steps leading to an abortion would be done personally by the doctor. If, however, the doctor were to delegate more and more of the process to others, there would come a point when it could no longer be said that the pregnancy had been terminated ‘by a registered medical practitioner’—and at that point it would become unlawful. In Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom v Department of Health and Social Security,²⁷⁸ the House of Lords by a majority of three to two, reversing a unanimous Court of Appeal judgment and restoring the judgment of Woolf J, held that a particular process for the extra-amniotic method of termination of pregnancies was lawful, notwithstanding the substantial part played by nurses in that process.²⁷⁹ According to Lord Diplock, what the 1967 Act requires is that:

a registered medical practitioner . . . should accept responsibility for all stages of the treatment for the termination of the pregnancy. The particular method to be used should be decided by the doctor in charge of the treatment for the termination of the pregnancy; he should carry out any physical acts, forming part of the treatment, that in accordance with accepted medical practice are done only by qualified medical practitioners, and should give specific instructions as to the carrying out of such parts of the treatment as in accordance with accepted medical practice are carried out by nurses or other members of the hospital staff without medical qualifications. To each of them, the doctor, or his substitute, should be available to be consulted or called on for assistance from beginning to end of the treatment.

Thus, if the doctor were to direct the whole procedure by correspondence, over the telephone or by webcam, the operation would presumably be unlawful.

²⁷⁶ Smith [1974] 1 All ER 376 at 381, [1973] Crim LR 700, CA and [1994] Crim LR 527.

²⁷⁷ [1976] QB 217, [1975] Crim LR 584, CA; [1994] Crim LR 527, 234.

²⁷⁸ [1981] AC 800, [1981] Crim LR 322, HL, n 245.

²⁷⁹ See also the Select Committee Report, Scientific Developments Relating to the Abortion Act 1967, recognizing the ability of nursing staff to perform the modern abortion process, paras 103 et seq.

Treatment to terminate a pregnancy, which, if the treatment were successful, would be lawfully terminated, is lawful treatment,²⁸⁰ notwithstanding (as apparently happens in 1 or 2 per cent of cases) an ultimate failure to terminate the pregnancy. If the conditions of the 1967 Act are otherwise fulfilled and known to be fulfilled, the steps taken to procure abortion are taken without mens rea—there is no intent unlawfully to administer anything or unlawfully to use any instrument. There is, moreover, no actus reus for the legalization of an abortion must include the steps which are taken towards it.

15.5.4.4 Necessity at common law

The provision in s 5(2) of the 1967 Act that, ‘For the purposes of the law relating to abortion, anything done with intent to procure a woman’s miscarriage . . . is unlawfully done unless authorised by section 1 of this Act . . .’ appears to be intended entirely to supersede the law as stated in Bourne.²⁸¹

Abortions, and the steps to procure them which are proscribed, are unlawful unless they can be justified by the Act. It is submitted, however, that this provision cannot have been intended entirely to eliminate the operation of general defences to crime. To take extreme examples, a child under the age of ten, or a person within the M’Naghten Rules, could surely not be convicted of committing or (slightly more likely) abetting an abortion. If this is conceded, then duress by threats ought equally to operate, so why not duress of circumstances or necessity? And so we are back to admitting Bourne’s case into the law. A possible interpretation of the Act would be to allow general defences other than necessity. Construing ss 5(2) in the light of the previous law, a court might conclude that its obvious purpose was to overrule Bourne; and that it would be unreasonable to extend its operation beyond that.

A limited defence of necessity would seem desirable in principle. The defence would necessarily be limited in scope by the fact that, in the great majority of cases where it is necessary to procure an abortion, this is lawful by statute so that there is no room for the operation of any broader defence. Having regard to Quayle,²⁸² in which necessity defences were held to be ousted by the statutory scheme under the Misuse of Drugs Act, a similar argument could be advanced.²⁸³ The Abortion Act is clearly intended to provide a scheme for the legalization of abortion—abortions outside the Act are unlawful and an offence. But suppose that a qualified doctor who is not a registered medical practitioner, and so does not come within the terms of s 1(4) discussed earlier, forms the opinion in good faith that immediate termination of a pregnancy is necessary in order to save the life of the mother who is in a remote place and beyond the help of any registered medical practitioner. Is it the law that he must let the woman die when he could save her by terminating the pregnancy?

In Bourne, MacNaghten J took the view that there was not only a right but a duty to perform the operation where a woman’s life could be saved only by the doctor procuring an abortion:

if a case arose where the life of a woman could be saved by performing the operation and the doctor refused to perform it because of his religious opinions and the woman died, he would be in grave peril of being brought before this court on a charge of manslaughter by negligence. He would have ²⁸⁰ Per Lord Edmund-Davies, citing the 4th edition of this book, at p 346 [1981] 1 All ER 545 at 573, [1981] Crim LR 322, HL.

²⁸¹ See p 370. Cf the Canadian case of Morgentaler [1976] 1 SCR 616, 20 CCC (2d) 449 discussed by LH Leigh, ‘Necessity and the Case of Dr Morgentaler’ [1978] Crim LR 151 and Davidson [1969] VR 667 (Menhennit J).

²⁸² [2005] EWCA Crim 1415, [2006] Crim LR 148.

²⁸³ Such an argument was also accepted in S (C) [2012] EWCA Crim 389, [2012] Crim LR 623. It was held that the existence of the statutory scheme in the Child Abduction Act 1984 precluded the possibility of there being any defence of necessity to a charge of child abduction.

no better defence than a person who, again from some religious reason, refused to call in a doctor to attend his sick child, where a doctor could have been called in and the life of the child could have been saved.²⁸⁴

Section 4 of the Abortion Act now provides:

- (1) Subject to subsection (2) of this section, no person shall be under any duty, whether by contract or by any statutory or other legal requirement, to participate in any treatment authorised by this Act to which he has a conscientious objection:

Provided that in any legal proceedings the burden of proof of conscientious objection shall rest on the person claiming to rely on it.

- (2) Nothing in subsection (1) of this section shall affect any duty to participate in treatment which is necessary to save the life or to prevent grave permanent injury to the physical or mental health of a pregnant woman.

The same people whose acts are rendered lawful by s 1 are given by s 4 the right in conscience to object to performing those same acts. The Supreme Court in Greater Glasgow Health Board v Doogan held that the term 'participate' ought to be given a narrow meaning synonymous with taking part in a 'hands-on' capacity and was not intended by Parliament to encompass hospital managers, caterers, cleaners, etc.²⁸⁵ A person can only claim that right in respect of an act which would have amounted to an offence before the Abortion Act came into force. So, a secretary was not entitled, by s 4, to refuse to type a letter arranging an abortion rendered lawful by s 1. It was held that she would not, under the old law, have been guilty of the abortion as a secondary party; her intention would have been merely to carry out her contract of employment, not to counsel or procure.²⁸⁶

Section 4(2) does not create any duty, but it does appear to recognize at least the possibility of a duty at common law. The only authority for this appears to be Bourne. It will be noted that MacNaghten J dealt only with the case where the woman died, whereas the Act refers to grave permanent injury to physical or mental health. MacNaghten J appeared to regard the doctor's liability as one arising from gross negligence; and this, if a ground of liability at all, is indeed confined to cases where death is caused.²⁸⁷ There is no general criminal liability for causing grievous bodily harm by gross negligence as distinct from recklessness.

If, however, the doctor is under a duty to act, and he knows all the circumstances giving rise to that duty and foresees the consequences of not fulfilling it, it would seem that he has the mens rea necessary to found a conviction for causing grievous bodily harm contrary to s 18 of the OAPA 1861.²⁸⁸ The only doubtful link in this argument appears to be the existence of the duty; but the Act strengthens the case for its existence. Clearly, a doctor with conscientious objections²⁸⁹ could fulfil his duty by referring the patient to another doctor who does not have such objections; and it is submitted that the doctor has a duty to do this where an abortion is necessary to save the woman from death or grave permanent injury. The question of a duty to participate in the operation can arise only where there is no effective substitute for the doctor concerned. Where the patient has conscientious objections there can be no duty to perform the operation since, clearly, it can only be lawfully performed with consent.

²⁸⁴ [1939] 1 KB 687 at 693 (Central Criminal Court).

²⁸⁵ [2014] UKSC 68.

²⁸⁶ Salford Area Health Authority, ex p Janaway [1989] AC 537, applied in Greater Glasgow Health Board v Doogan [2014] UKSC 68.

²⁸⁷ See p 693.

²⁸⁸ See p 694.

²⁸⁹ See for arguments that the ECHR might impact on this claim, L Hammer, 'Abortion Objection in the UK within the Framework of the ECHR' [1999] EHRLR 564.

Abortion in compliance with the 1967 Act does not contravene Art 2 of the ECHR: Paton v UK.²⁹⁰

15.5.5 Concealment of birth

This offence when first created by statute in 1623²⁹¹ was limited to: (a) an illegitimate child who (b) was born alive and whose body was disposed of so as to conceal its death (c) by its mother. The current statute, s 60 of the OAPA 1861, is subject to none of these limitations; it applies to any child, legitimate or not and whether born alive or not, whose body is disposed of so as to conceal its birth, by anyone. The section provides:

If any woman shall be delivered of a child, every person who shall, by any secret disposition of the dead body of the said child, whether such child died before, at, or after its birth, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof, shall be guilty of [an offence triable either way], and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years . . .

The expressed object of the original statute was to catch those women who would otherwise escape on a charge of murder because of the difficulty of proving that there had been a live birth.²⁹² Under a later Act,²⁹³ which repealed the 1623 provision, a woman could only be convicted if she was acquitted on an indictment for murder. But the current offence is an independent substantive crime for which an indictment will lie irrespective of any other offences being alleged.²⁹⁴

The test of a 'secret disposition' seems to be whether there was a likelihood that the body would be found. Bovill CJ held therefore that there would be a secret disposition, 'if the body were placed in the middle of a moor in the winter, or on the top of a mountain, or in any other secluded place, where the body would not be likely to be found'.²⁹⁵ If a body were thrown from a clifftop to the seashore, it might be a secret disposition if the place were secluded, but not if it were much frequented.²⁹⁶ So, where the body was left in a closed but unlocked box in D's bedroom in such a way as to attract the attention of those who daily entered the room, it was held that there was no secret disposition.²⁹⁷

D must be proved to have done some act²⁹⁸ of disposition after the child has died. If the living body of the child is concealed and thereafter dies in the place of concealment, this offence is not committed,²⁹⁹ though that is probably murder, manslaughter or infanticide.

According to Erle J in Berriman,³⁰⁰ the child must have 'arrived at that stage of maturity at the time of birth that it might have been a living child'; so that the concealment of a foetus but a few months old would be no offence.³⁰¹

²⁹⁰ [1980] 3 EHRR 408. Cf Kelly v Kelly 1997 SLT 896 and Vo v France, discussed earlier.

²⁹¹ 21 Jac 1, c 27.

²⁹² The original sentence was that the woman should suffer death as in the case of murder.

²⁹³ 43 Geo 3, c 58.

²⁹⁴ It was formerly the law that a person acquitted of murder, infanticide or child destruction might be convicted, on the same indictment, of concealment of birth; but this rule was abolished by the Criminal Law Act 1967, Sch 2. On its historical application, see MB Emmerichs, 'Trials of Women for Homicide in Nineteenth Century England' (1993) 5 Women and Criminal Justice 99.

²⁹⁵ Brown (1870) LR 1 CCR 244. See Hopkins [2005] NICC 1 where the defendant initially secreted the body in the wardrobe and then sought to burn it in an open field.

²⁹⁶ ibid. ²⁹⁷ George (1868) 11 Cox CC 41. Cf Sleep (1864) 9 Cox CC 559; Rosenberg (1906) 70 JP 264.

²⁹⁸ Derham (1843) 1 Cox CC 56 (leaving body in privy where born not act of concealment).

²⁹⁹ Coxhead (1845) 1 Car & Kir 623 (decided under 9 Geo 4, c 31, but the principle is the same); May (1867) 10 Cox CC 448.

³⁰⁰ (1854) 6 Cox CC 388 at 390.

³⁰¹ Colmer (1864) 9 Cox CC 506 is to the contrary but is doubted by Russell, 611 fn 69.

15.5.6 Other offences

It is a common law misdemeanour to dispose of or destroy a dead body with intent to prevent an inquest from being held.³⁰² There is a common law offence of preventing the decent and lawful burial of a body. It is an offence under the Perjury Act 1911 wilfully to make a false statement relating to births or deaths, or the live birth of a child.³⁰³ It is also a summary offence under s 36 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953, to fail to give information concerning births and deaths when under a duty, as defined in the Act, to do so.

³⁰² cf Hunter [1972] Crim LR 369. See M Hirst, 'Preventing the Lawful Burial of a Body' [1996] Crim LR 96. See also R (Ghai) v Newcastle City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 59, [2010] 3 WLR 737, CA (Civ Div).

³⁰³ Perjury Act 1911, s 4(1).

Non-fatal offences against the person

This chapter deals with offences against the ‘person’, and in relation to the offences under discussion that term means a human being; associations, whether corporate or unincorporated, cannot be victims of these offences though these bodies might be guilty of committing some of the offences either as principal or as an accessory.¹ The meaning of ‘person’ as a victim has been discussed almost exclusively in relation to murder but it seems clear that the same principles must apply to non-fatal offences. The common law² position is usefully summarized in the Draft Criminal Code which provides³ that victim ‘means a person who has been born and has an existence independent of his mother and, unless the context otherwise requires, “death” and “personal harm” mean the death of, or personal harm to, such a person’.⁴

A foetus or a child in the process of being born could not, therefore, be the victim of an assault or any other offence against the person.⁵ The attack might be an offence against the expectant mother where it affected her person, as distinct from the foetus which is not part of her. Statutory offences are probably to be construed in accordance with the common law.

16.1 Assault and battery

Assault and battery were two distinct crimes at common law and their separate existence (though now as statutory offences) is confirmed by s 39 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988:

Common assault and battery shall be summary offences and a person guilty of either of them shall be liable to an unlimited fine, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both.

Section 39 offers a valuable simplification of the law,⁶ replacing the complex provisions in the OAPA 1861.

¹ If a corporation may be guilty of manslaughter there is no logical reason why it should not be guilty of lesser offences against the person. See on corporate manslaughter, p 599. The 2007 Act deals only with corporate killings. In R (on the application of Gladstone plc) v Manchester City Magistrates’ Court [2004] All ER (D) 296 (Nov), it was held that a private prosecution for assault may be brought by a registered company (the victim being the Chief Executive who was kneed in the groin at the AGM). The company’s memorandum of association included power to lay an information in respect of the assault.

² cf Tait, p 617.

³ Cl 53(1).

⁴ For further reform, see p 697.

⁵ In A-G’s Reference (No 3 of 1994), p 124, the Court of Appeal held that the foetus is part of the mother; but the House of Lords decided that it is not: [1997] 3 All ER 936, 943. ‘The mother and the foetus were two distinct organisms living symbiotically, not a single organism with two aspects’, per Lord Mustill.

⁶ Common assault and battery were indictable offences at common law and under s 47, that element of s 47 was repealed by the 1988 Act, together with ss 42 and 43.

16.1.1 Definitions

An assault is any conduct by which D, intentionally or recklessly,⁷ causes V to apprehend immediate and unlawful personal violence.⁸ A battery is any conduct by which D, intentionally or recklessly, inflicts unlawful personal violence upon V.⁹ But ‘violence’ here includes any unlawful touching¹⁰ of another, however slight. As Blackstone explained:¹¹ the law cannot draw the line between different degrees of violence, and therefore prohibits the first and lowest stage of it; every man’s person being sacred, and no other having a right to meddle with it, in any the slightest manner.

This reflects the fact that the offences against the person protect the individual’s personal autonomy by providing at least the opportunity for criminal punishment for the slightest unjustified infringement. This is supported by the protection offered by the ECHR, in Art 8 (respect for private life).¹² The other dimension to autonomy in this context—the purported freedom to do as you will with your body¹³—is less well respected in the current state of the law.¹⁴ an intentional touching of another person without the consent of that person and without lawful excuse. It need not necessarily be hostile, or rude, or aggressive, as some of the cases seem to indicate.¹⁵

In modern times, Lord Lane CJ described battery in expansive terms:

However, in Brown,¹⁶ the majority of the House of Lords seem to have thought that hostility is an element in assault. But their lordships then interpreted ‘hostile’ in such a way as to deprive the word of all meaning. The case concerned sadomasochistic acts performed by a group of men on each other. All the acts were done for the mutual enjoyment of the participants, so they could not conceivably be assaults if hostility, in any ordinary meaning of the word, were required. The House of Lords suggested hostility was required but then upheld the convictions! Lord Jauncey said, ‘If the appellants’ activities in relation to the receivers [of the painful acts] were unlawful they were also hostile and a necessary ingredient of assault was present.’ But the acts were only unlawful if they amounted to assaults. The reasoning appears to be circular. Notwithstanding the opinions of their lordships, it is submitted that the actual decision confirms the view that hostility is not an essential ingredient in the criminal offences of assault or battery. Some commentators suggest that there is value in requiring proof of hostility because otherwise an intentional touching which is nothing more than a faux pas—D’s exuberant hug of a stranger at midnight on New Year’s Eve—is ⁷ Venna [1976] QB 421, CA (a case of battery but the same principle surely applies to assault); Savage [1992] 1 AC 699, 740.

⁸ In Ireland [1998] AC 147, [1997] 4 All ER 225, 236, 239, the House of Lords applied this definition, originating in the 1st edition of this book, at p 262, adopted in Fagan v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 1 QB 439, [1968] 3 All ER 442 at 445 and approved in Savage [1992] AC 699, 740.

⁹ Rolfe (1952) 36 Cr App R 4. Any amount of force will suffice, as emphasised in Afolabi [2017] EWHC 2960.

¹⁰ Note that the concept of touching may achieve a greater significance since it now forms the core of a number of offences under the Sexual Offences Act 2003. In H [2005] Crim LR 734, it was confirmed that touching of clothes would constitute the offence under s 3 of that Act. See Ch 17.

¹¹ Commentaries, iii, 120, cited by Goff LJ in Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374 at 378.

¹² For serious infringements, protection lies in Art 3—freedom from torture, inhuman and degrading treatment—and Art 5—freedom from unlawful deprivation of liberty. Art 4 protects against slavery. See the offence in the Modern Slavery Act 2015, s 1.

¹³ On which see J Gardner, Offences and Defences (2007) 12.

¹⁴ See the discussion of Brown later in this section.

¹⁵ Faulkner v Talbot [1981] 3 All ER 468 at 471, applied in Thomas (1985) 81 Cr App R 331 at 334; and see Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374 at 379, DC; Wilson v Pringle [1987] QB 237, CA (Civ Div), criticized by Wood J in T v T [1988] 2 WLR 189 at 200, 203 (Fam Div); Brown [1992] 2 WLR 441 at 446, CA.

¹⁶ [1994] AC 212, [1993] Crim LR 583.

potentially criminal.¹⁷ It is submitted that such cases are not criminal because D will have a genuine belief in consent to that level of touching on that occasion. The concept of ‘hostility’ is unnecessary and ambiguous; it could cause undesirable complications in an offence which, because of the volume and summary nature of prosecutions, needs to be kept simple. The Court of Appeal has potentially added further confusion by conflating the issue of V’s consent with whether D evinced hostility towards V. In B, Hughes LJ stated:¹⁸

The element of assault frequently and usefully described as hostility is a means of conveying to the jury that some non-hostile contact is an ordinary incident of life to which we all impliedly consent.

It is respectfully submitted that hostility is not an element of the offence and that the issue of consent ought not to be confused with it.

Assault and battery form the basis of many aggravated offences—for example, assaulting a police officer, assault with intent to resist arrest, etc.¹⁹ It should be noted that assault and battery are also torts; and many, though not all, of the principles appear to be equally applicable in both branches of the law. Consequently, some of the cases cited here are civil actions.

The CPS Charging Standards now advise charging assault and battery where there is ‘no injury or injuries which are not serious’. Previous versions of the guidance advised charging assault where: the injuries sustained amount to no more than: grazes; scratches; abrasions; minor bruising; swellings; reddening of the skin; superficial cuts; or a ‘black eye’²⁰ and there are no aggravating features. The breadth of the offences results in wide prosecutorial discretion.

16.1.2 The relationship between assault and battery

Assault and battery are separate crimes, although they were not always recognized to be such.²¹ The reason for this stems from the terminological problem: there is no acceptable verb corresponding to the noun, battery. As a result, ‘assaulted’ is almost invariably used to mean ‘committed a battery against’. Sometimes, even statutes use the term ‘assault’ to mean ‘assault or battery’ but on other occasions both words are used.²²

Problems of substance as well as terminology flow from the offences of assault and battery being separate and these have long been ignored. In DPP v Little,²³ a charge alleging that ‘D... did unlawfully assault and batter J’ was held to charge two offences and so to be ‘bad for duplicity’.²⁴ More recently, in R (on the application of Kracher) v Leicester Magistrates’ Court it was observed that:

¹⁷ Simester, Spencer, Stark, Sullivan and Virgo, CLT&D, 441.

¹⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 3.

¹⁹ The Home Office identified over 70 such offences: Violence. Reforming the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 (1998) para 3.5. See also LCCP 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person: A Scoping Consultation Paper (2014) Ch 2.

²⁰ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/offences-against-person-incorporating-charging-standard#P48_1458. See also C Clarkson, A Cretney, G Davis and J Shepherd, ‘Assaults: The Relationship between Seriousness, Criminalisation and Punishment’ [1994] Crim LR 4.

²¹ The CLRC Fourteenth Report, para 148, treated them as a single offence which may be committed in two ways and the Draft Code, cl 75, follows the CLRC’s recommendation.

²² There is a deplorable inconsistency in the statutory terminology. Even the Criminal Justice Act 1988, having made it crystal clear in s 39 that there are two offences, goes on in s 40(3)(a) to use ‘common assault’ in a context in which it can only sensibly mean—and has now been held to mean—‘common assault or battery’: Lyndsey [1995] 3 All ER 654.

²³ [1992] 1 All ER 299, [1991] Crim LR 900, DC.

²⁴ ie that it makes more than one allegation in the same charge against the defendant. That is not generally permitted. Many earlier cases decided that a charge of assault and/or battery in a single information is duplicitous: Jones v Sherwood [1942] 1 KB 127, DC and Mansfield Justices, ex p Sharkey [1985] QB 613, DC. But a blind eye appears to have been turned in Notman [1994] Crim LR 518.

the offence of common assault can be committed in two ways which amount in law to different offences, namely assault by beating and an assault by putting another in fear of immediate silence [sic]. It is not possible to charge common assault in the alternative within the same charge.²⁵

This has repercussions for aggravated offences which depend on proof of an assault or battery. Consider the offence under s 47 of the OAPA 1861: 'Whosoever shall be convicted of an assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable to [imprisonment for five years].' If D is charged under s 47 is it necessary for the Crown to spell out whether he assaulted or battered and occasioned ABH as a result or is it enough to use the term 'assault'? In Savage,²⁶ Lord Ackner's language when discussing s 47 suggests that that offence can be satisfied by proof of an assault only but it would be incredible if D, who battered V without assaulting him (eg by hitting him on the back of the head so V did not apprehend the violence), was not guilty of an 'assault occasioning actual bodily harm'. If the word 'assault' in s 47 embraces both the offence of assault and the offence of battery it seems to follow that the usual form of indictment for that offence—'AB... assaulted JN, thereby occasioning him actual bodily harm'—is defective because it actually alleges two offences.²⁷

There were further procedural problems which flowed from the failure to recognize the separateness of the offences,²⁸ but the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 remedied these.²⁹

16.1.3 Common law or statutory offences?

On a literal reading, s 39 of the 1988 Act does not create any offence. It assumes the existence of offences of common assault and battery and merely prescribes the mode of trial and penalty. Nevertheless, in DPP v Little,³⁰ it was held that common assault and battery have been statutory offences since the enactment of s 47 of the OAPA 1861. The better view is that s 47 merely prescribed the penalty for the common law offences of common assault—as statutes do for other common law offences, for example murder, manslaughter and conspiracy to defraud.³¹ Those offences all continue to exist at common law. Although Laws LJ has asserted unequivocally that 'in truth, common assault by beating remains a common law offence',³² the prosecutor is probably well advised, pending review by a ²⁵ [2013] EWHC 4627 (Admin) at [11], per Saunders J.

²⁶ [1991] 4 All ER 698 at 711.

²⁷ The same considerations apply to other aggravated assaults. The effect is that thousands of people were convicted on defective indictments since 1861—but this in no way detracts from the inescapable logic of the argument.

²⁸ An indictment alleging assault occasioning actual bodily harm required a separate count for s 39 assault because it was not an included offence for an alternative verdict: Mearns [1990] 3 All ER 989; Disalvo [2004] All ER (D) 316 (Jul). Arguably these were wrongly decided.

²⁹ Section 11 makes common assault an alternative verdict to more serious offences of assault, even if the count has not been preferred in the indictment. See Nelson [2013] EWCA Crim 30, [2013] Crim LR 689 for discussion although the decision is, it is submitted, in error. The court held that where a count for assault by beating is included in an indictment under the Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 40, then s 6(3A) does not enable a jury to return an alternative verdict of common assault on that count. The jury may return a verdict of assault on a charge of ABH. The court reasoned that if D threw a punch that missed, a verdict of 'attempted battery' may be returned on a charge of assault by beating. This overlooks the fact that attempted battery is not an offence known to law. The court's conclusion that common assault is not a permissible alternative on a charge of battery (because a battery can be inflicted on a victim who never saw the blow coming) is per incuriam because the case of MPC v Wilson [1984] AC 242, was not referred to.

³⁰ See n 23.

³¹ See [1991] Crim LR 900; Blackstone (2018) B2.1. The court in Lyndsey, n 22, noted the criticisms that have been made of Little but found it unnecessary to express any opinion.

³² Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire (2000) 164 JP 396, [2000] Crim LR 758, DC. The defendant was in fact charged under s 39.

higher court, to follow DPP v Little and to charge common assault or battery as a statutory offence, contrary to s 39.

16.1.4 Actus reus of assault

The typical case of an assault as distinct from a battery is that where D, by some physical movement, causes V to apprehend that he is about to be struck. D runs towards or drives at V, or acts so as to appear to V to be on the point of striking, stabbing or shooting him. Assault was once regarded as 'attempted battery': D had embarked on an act which, if not stopped, would immediately result in an impact of some kind on V. Many 'attempted batteries' are assaults, but this is not necessarily so: D's acts may be unobserved by V, as where D approaches V from behind, or V is asleep, or insensible, or too young to appreciate what D appears likely to do. And there may be an assault where D has no intention to commit a battery but only to cause V to apprehend one.³³ The requirement is for apprehension, not fear.

16.1.4.1 Immediacy

There is a tendency to enlarge the concept of assault by taking a generous, arguably too generous, view of 'immediacy' and to include threats to V where the impending impact is remote. In more recent years this approach was precipitated by the courts' desire to provide protection for those suffering harassment at a time before the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 was in force.³⁴

In Lewis,³⁵ D was uttering threats to V from another room but was convicted of maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm and therefore impliedly of an assault.³⁶ In Logdon v DPP,³⁷ D committed an assault by showing V a pistol in a drawer and declaring that he would hold her hostage. In Ireland,³⁸ the House of Lords held that words alone, or even silent telephone calls, are capable of amounting to an assault; but they found it unnecessary to decide whether they did so in that case. If the caller said, 'There is bomb under your house which I am about to detonate', that would seem a clear case of assault. Lord Steyn said that the caller may be guilty of assault if he said, 'I will be at your door in a minute or two.' It seems to be a question of fact. Did the call in fact cause V to apprehend immediate unlawful violence? In Constanza,³⁹ V, who had for some time been harassed by D, received two letters from him eight days apart which she interpreted as clear threats. It was held that they amounted to an assault occasioning actual bodily harm. Was this two assaults or one continuing assault? It is easy to see that the letters might have caused V immediate apprehension of violence at some time in the future, but less easy to suppose that, as V read them, she apprehended immediate violence.

In Smith v Chief Superintendent of Woking Police Station,⁴⁰ D was convicted of assault by looking through the window of a bed-sitting room at V in her nightclothes with intent to frighten her. Kerr LJ limited his decision to a case where D 'is immediately adjacent, albeit on ³³ Logdon v DPP [1976] Crim LR 121, DC.

³⁴ See C Wells, 'Stalking: The Criminal Law's Response' [1997] Crim LR 463.

³⁵ [1970] Crim LR 647, CA. ³⁶ But see now Wilson [1984] AC 242, p 696.

³⁷ See earlier.

³⁸ See earlier. See G Virgo, 'Offences Against the Person—Do-It-Yourself Law Reform' (1997) 56 CLJ 251. J Horder, 'Reconsidering Psychic Assault' [1998] Crim LR 392, regards this dilution of the immediacy requirement as a welcome shift to an offence based on causing fear. On the merits of general threat offences, see P Alldridge, 'Threat Offences: A Case for Reform' [1994] Crim LR 176. See also LCCP 217, Ch 5.

³⁹ [1997] Crim LR 576. The court used ambiguous language, referring to the fact that she apprehended violence 'at some time not excluding the immediate future'. The House of Lords refused leave to appeal, but that does not imply approval of the decision.

⁴⁰ (1983) 76 Cr App R 234.

the other side of a window'. His lordship distinguished, without dissenting from, the opinion in the fourth edition of this book that 'there can be no assault if it is obvious to V that D is unable to carry out his threat, as where D shakes his fist at V who is safely locked inside his car'. There may, of course, be an assault although D has no means of carrying out the threat.⁴¹ The question is whether D intends to cause V to believe that he can and will carry it out immediately and whether V does so believe. The question arises most obviously where D points an unloaded or imitation gun at V. If V knows the gun is unloaded or an imitation, there is no assault, for then he could not apprehend being shot.⁴² If V believes it is, or may be a real, loaded gun, there is an actus reus by D, for now V suffers the apprehension which is an essential element of assault.⁴³

16.1.4.2 Assault by words alone

Ireland has now settled that an assault can be committed by words alone. This seems right—as a matter of fact, words, no less than a gesture, are capable of causing an apprehension of immediate violence.⁴⁴ It follows from Constanza that an assault by writing, fax, email, tweet, text, etc is also possible.

Where D's actions would be an assault, but his words negate the effect of his actions, there is no offence.⁴⁵ If D's words are such that they amount to an implied threat or a conditional threat (eg 'as soon as we are alone I will hit you'), there may be an assault.⁴⁶

It has generally been assumed that an act of some kind—even if it is only making a telephone call and remaining silent—is an essential ingredient of assault. One case⁴⁷ seems to support assault by omission but the court's actual decision was that D's conduct was a 'continuing act'. Where D inadvertently causes V to apprehend immediate violence (D is checking the sights on his gun when V walks into the room) and subsequently wilfully declines to withdraw the threat (by lowering the gun), his 'omission' might therefore constitute an assault.

16.1.4.3 Attempt to assault

There can be no conviction for attempt to commit a common assault since common assault is a summary only offence.⁴⁸ There is no reason why there should not be attempt to commit a more serious offence of which assault forms an element; as where D points an unloaded gun at V, intending to frighten him in order to resist lawful arrest, but V, knowing the gun is unloaded, is unperturbed.⁴⁹

16.1.5 Actus reus of battery

The actus reus consists in the infliction of unlawful personal violence by D upon V. V need not be aware of the touching as, for example, where he is asleep.⁵⁰ It used to be said that every battery involves an assault; but this is plainly not so, for in battery there need be no apprehension of the impending violence. A blow from behind is a battery even though ⁴¹ Pace, Tindal CJ in Stephens v Myers (1830) 4 C & P 349.

⁴² Lamb, p 570. ⁴³ Logdon v DPP, n 33.

⁴⁴ Previously the law was unclear although many authoritative writers asserted that words could not amount to an assault. See generally G Williams, 'Assault and Words' [1957] Crim LR 219.

⁴⁵ See Tuberville v Savage (1669) 1 Mood Rep 3—words 'if it were not assize time I would not take such language' negated what would otherwise be an assault of D putting his hand on a sword in V's presence.

⁴⁶ See J Horder, 'Psychic Assault' [1998] Crim LR 392.

⁴⁷ Fagan v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 1 QB 439.

⁴⁸ The point was not argued in Lewis [2010] EWCA Crim 151 (manslaughter where D chased V into the path of oncoming traffic).

⁴⁹ AF Noyes, 'Is Criminal Assault a Separate Substantive Crime or is it an Attempted Battery?' (1945) 33 Ky LJ 189; State v Wilson, 218 Ore 575, 346 P 2d 115 (1955). See also D White, 'Attempts: Initiatives in the Common Law Caribbean' [1980] Crim LR 780.

⁵⁰ See also Thomas (1985) 81 Cr App R 331.

V was unaware that it was coming.⁵¹ It is generally said that D must have done some act and that it is not enough that he stood still and obstructed V's passage⁵² like an inanimate object. But suppose D is sitting at the corner of a corridor with his legs stretched across it. He hears V running down the corridor and deliberately remains still with the intention that V, on turning the corner, shall fall over his legs. Why should this not be a battery? It would be if D had put out his legs with the intention of tripping up V. It would not be too difficult to conclude that D has a duty to V from the creation of the dangerous situation, applying the general principle recognized in Miller.⁵³ Further support for this proposition derives from Santana-Bermudez,⁵⁴ where D, an intravenous drug user, assured a police officer who was about to search him that he was carrying no 'sharp' and the officer stabbed her finger on a syringe in D's pocket. The court upheld the conviction, applying Miller.⁵⁵ where someone (by act or word or a combination of the two) creates a danger and thereby exposes another to a reasonably foreseeable risk of injury which materializes, there is an evidential basis for the actus reus of an assault occasioning actual bodily harm. It remains necessary for the prosecution to prove an intention to assault or appropriate recklessness.⁵⁶

By having the needles in his pocket and assuring the police officer about the contents of his pockets, D created a situation of danger. There may also be a battery where D inadvertently applies force to V and then wrongfully refuses to withdraw it. In Fagan,⁵⁷ where D accidentally drove his car on to a constable's foot and then intentionally left it there, the court held that there was a continuing act, not a mere omission.

There is certainly no battery where D has no control over the incident which causes the touching of V, as where D's horse unexpectedly runs away with him and into V;⁵⁸ but this might equally be explained because there is no mens rea. It might be otherwise if D foresaw, when he mounted the animal, that there was an unacceptable risk that this might happen.

16.1.5.1 Battery with or via an instrument

Most batteries are directly inflicted, for example by D striking V with his fist or an instrument, or by a missile thrown by him, or by spitting upon V. But this is not essential: there can be an indirect battery. Where D punched W causing her to drop her baby, V, he was guilty of battery on V. It was found as a fact that D was reckless whether he injured V.⁵⁹

In Martin,⁶⁰ Stephen and Wills JJ thought there would be a battery where D digs a pit for V to fall into or where he causes V to rush into an obstruction. The Divisional Court has since recognized a battery by indirect means: in DPP v K,⁶¹ D was convicted where he poured acid into a hand-drier in a toilet so that the next user sprayed himself with it.⁶²

⁵¹ This passage in the 13th edition of this book was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Nelson [2013] EWCA Crim 30, [2013] Crim LR 689. The Court of Appeal held that the judge was wrong to leave a verdict of common assault to the jury as an alternative to battery. See n 29.

⁵² Innes v Wylie (1844) 1 Car & Kir 257. ⁵³ [1983] AC 161.

⁵⁴ [2004] Crim LR 471, [2003] EWHC 2908 (Admin). ⁵⁵ [1983] AC 161.

⁵⁶ At [10]. ⁵⁷ [1969] 1 QB 439. ⁵⁸ Gibbons v Pepper (1695) 2 Salk 637.

⁵⁹ Haystead v Chief Constable of Derbyshire (2000) 164 JP 396, [2000] Crim LR 758, DC, citing the 9th edition of this work. D could, alternatively, have been held guilty of an intentional assault by reason of transferred malice: p 122.

⁶⁰ (1881) 8 QBD 54, CCR.

⁶¹ [1990] 1 All ER 331, [1990] Crim LR 321, DC, overruled on other grounds by Spratt [1991] 2 All ER 210, CA.

⁶² It has been argued (M Hirst, 'Assault, Battery and Indirect Violence' [1999] Crim LR 557) that these authorities are inconsistent with the decision of the House of Lords in MPC v Wilson ([1984] AC 242, p 696) but all that case decided was that, though the word 'inflict' does not necessarily imply an assault, an allegation of inflicting harm may do so, and assault is therefore an 'included offence'. It does not follow that no indirect injury can ever be a battery.

The courts have now interpreted ‘bodily’ harm to include psychiatric harm, and that may be inflicted without any impact on V’s body by, for example, harassment over the phone. That certainly does not involve a battery.⁶³ Where, however, D has caused an impact on V, indirectly with no fully voluntary intervening act, it is submitted that D should, subject to mens rea, be guilty of battery.⁶⁴

It is not a battery (nor an assault) for D to pull himself free from V who is detaining him, even though D uses force.⁶⁵

It is submitted that it would undoubtedly be a battery to set a dog on another.⁶⁶ If D hit O’s horse causing it to run down V, this would be battery by D.⁶⁷ No doubt the famous civil case of *Scott v Shepherd*⁶⁸ is equally applicable to the criminal law. D threw a squib (a firework) into a crowded area. First E and then F flung the squib away in order to save themselves from injury. It exploded and injured V. The acts of E and F were not ‘fully voluntary’ intervening acts which broke the chain of causation. This was battery by D.

If there is no violence at all, there is no battery; as where D puts harmful matter into a drink which is consumed by V.⁶⁹

16.1.6 Mens rea of assault and battery

It is convenient to consider the mens rea of the two offences together. They are inextricably confused in some of the leading cases but need to be kept distinct if the separateness of the two offences is to be taken seriously. It was established by *Venna*⁷⁰ in 1975 that assault and battery may be committed recklessly as well as intentionally. Venna was a case of battery occasioning actual bodily harm but dicta concerning assault were relied on and it is safe to assume that the same principles apply to both offences.

The mens rea of assault is an intention to cause V to apprehend immediate and unlawful violence, or recklessness whether such apprehension be caused.⁷¹ Technically there is an argument that D should be shown to have intended or been reckless not only as to V’s apprehension, but to have intended or been reckless that V’s apprehension would be of immediate violence. It is unlikely the courts will adopt such a sophistication.

The mens rea of battery is an intention to apply force to the body of another or recklessness whether force be so applied.

16.1.6.1 Subjective recklessness

Venna approved the test of subjective, Cunningham-style recklessness. Despite some attempts to apply the Caldwell formulation of recklessness in DPP v K,⁷² that decision was quickly overruled by the Court of Appeal in *Spratt*⁷³ which was followed by that court in Parmenter.⁷⁴ The ⁶³ cf D Ormerod and M Gunn, ‘In Defence of Ireland’ [1996] 3 Web JCLI.

⁶⁴ The criminal law is not governed by the ancient forms of action at common law which would require directness.

⁶⁵ Sheriff [1969] Crim LR 260.

⁶⁶ Murgatroyd v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [2000] All ER (D) 1742. But note the court’s caution in Dume (1986) The Times, 16 Oct, CA.

⁶⁷ Gibbon v Pepper (1695) 2 Salk 637 (obiter). ⁶⁸ (1773) 2 Wm Bl 892.

⁶⁹ Hanson (1849) 2 Car & Kir 912; but see p 713. ⁷⁰ [1976] QB 421.

⁷¹ cf Savage [1992] 1 AC 699, [1991] 4 All ER 698 at 711, HL.

⁷² [1990] 1 All ER 331, [1990] Crim LR 321, DC.

⁷³ [1991] 2 All ER 210, [1990] Crim LR 797. In Pinkney v DPP [2017] EWHC 854 (Admin) despite the fact the district judge appeared to apply an objective test, D’s conviction was upheld as Sir Wyn Williams reached the conclusion that on the facts D did commit an offence. With respect, the outcome of this case is surprising.

⁷⁴ [1992] 1 AC 699.

House of Lords was not asked to decide the point but *dicta*⁷⁵ assume that Cunningham recklessness is required; and with the overruling of Caldwell in G, the point is surely unarguable. The law is that D must actually foresee the risk of causing apprehension of immediate violence, or the application of it, as the case may be, and go on unjustifiably to take that risk.⁷⁶

16.1.6.2 Is the mens rea of assault and battery interchangeable?

Is it an offence to cause the actus reus of battery with the mens rea only of assault or the actus reus of assault with the mens rea only of battery? In principle, the answer is no.⁷⁷ D waves his fist, intending to alarm (assault) V but not to strike him and not foreseeing any risk of doing so; but V who does not see D, moves, and is hit. D creeps up behind V, intending to hit him over the head without attracting his attention (battery), but V unexpectedly turns round and moves to avoid the blow. Taking the distinction between assault and battery seriously, in the former case D does not commit a battery but is attempting to commit an assault; and in the latter he does not commit an assault but is attempting to commit a battery; and these 'attempts' to commit summary offences are not offences. It remains to be seen how seriously the courts will take the separateness of the offences.

16.1.6.3 Assault and battery by an intoxicated person

Assault and battery are classified as offences of 'basic intent'⁷⁸ so it is no defence that D had no mens rea because of his voluntary intoxication. The reason appears to be that the offences may be committed by recklessness. If the prosecution specifically allege that D has intentionally assaulted or battered, it may be that they will be required to prove a 'specific intent' and intoxication will be a defence.⁷⁹ Given the demonstrable link between alcohol and offences of violence, the courts might find this approach unpalatable.

16.2 Defences to assault and battery

16.2.1 Consent

It is clear that consent is an answer to a charge of common assault or battery (though not necessarily to the offence of assault occasioning actual bodily harm⁸⁰). It remains unclear ⁷⁵ 'Where the defendant neither intends nor advert to the possibility that there will be any physical contact at all, then the offence under s 47 would not be made out. This is because there would have been no assault, let alone an assault occasioning actual bodily harm' ([1991] 4 All ER at 707): Lord Ackner of course means 'no battery'. Other dicta show that he recognized that an assault in the strict sense suffices for an offence under s 47 if it occasions actual bodily harm.

⁷⁶ Despite the ease with which the test can be stated, cases with questionable outcomes still occur. Cf Katsonis v CPS [2011] EWHC 1860 (Admin).

⁷⁷ See also LCCP 217, Chs 3 and 5.

⁷⁸ Subject to any radical reappraisal of that concept following Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125, p 319.

⁷⁹ cf Caldwell [1982] AC 341, [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 964.

⁸⁰ There is a vast literature on this subject. Accessible discussions include LCCP 134, Consent and Offences against the Person (1994), on which see D Ormerod, 'Consent and Offences Against the Person: LCCP No 134' (1994) 57 MLR 928; and LCCP 139, Consent in Criminal Law (1995), on which see D Ormerod and M Gunn, 'Consent—A Second Bash' [1996] Crim LR 694; S Shute, 'Something Old, Something New, Something Borrowed—Three Aspects of the Consent Project' [1996] Crim LR 684. For a multifaceted analysis, see A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017). For a review of the philosophical arguments, see P Roberts, 'The Philosophical Foundations of Consent in the Criminal Law' (1997) 17 OJLS 389. On consent more generally, see D Beylveled and R Brownsword, Consent in the Law (2007).

how consent negates liability for assault or battery. Is it because the absence of consent is an essential element in the offence, as in rape;⁸¹ or is consent a defence to the charge? In Brown, Lord Jauncey, with whose reasoning Lord Lowry agreed, said that if it had been necessary to answer this question, which it was not, he would have held consent to be a defence. Lord Templeman also treated consent as a defence. Lord Mustill, on the other hand, regarded it as one factor negating an actus reus; while Lord Slynn emphatically agreed with Glanville Williams that 'It is... inherent in the concept of assault and battery that the victim does not consent.'⁸² The Law Commission regarded it as a defence.⁸³ However, Lord Woolf CJ stated that 'it is a requirement of the offence that the conduct itself should be unlawful'.⁸⁴

This view—that it is an element of the offence—is, it is submitted, the better one. The importance of the question is demonstrated by the dissent of Lords Mustill and Slynn in Brown. The majority held that the sadomasochistic defendants were guilty of assaults occasioning actual bodily harm on, and unlawful wounding of, one another, notwithstanding the defendants' enthusiastic submission to, and the pleasure which they all derived from, the sadomasochistic 'assaults'. The question the majority asked themselves was 'Does the public interest require the invention of a new defence?' This is quite different from the question the minority were answering: 'Does the public interest require the offence to be construed to include sadomasochistic conduct?' It is not surprising that they led to different conclusions.⁸⁵

While the distinction between offence and defence is fundamental in theory and in judicial law-making, in the practical functioning of the law in this area it is probably not very important.⁸⁶ It affects the evidential burden—if the absence of consent is an element of the offence, the prosecution must set out to prove it; if it is a defence, it is for the defendant to introduce evidence of it; but, in either case, the ultimate burden of proof is on the prosecution. In Shabbir,⁸⁷ S and others were acquitted by the magistrates of charges including assault. The charges arose from a prolonged violent attack in a city centre. The defendants raised the plea of consent, arguing that the Crown had the burden of proving that V had not consented to being assaulted. The magistrates found that the Crown had failed to prove that matter and acquitted. The Divisional Court held that a lack of consent could be inferred from evidence (violent attack on strangers shown on CCTV) other than the direct evidence of the victim.

Whether or not consent is properly regarded as a defence or as an element of the offences of assault and battery (and therefore as an element of the aggravated assaults discussed later), it is valuable to consider its meaning here. In recent years the courts have been forced to deal with difficult issues including defining what constitutes effective 'consent' (ie whether frauds or pressure vitiate consent) and, if such factual consent is present, whether it ought to be recognized in law. In other words, in what circumstances it is appropriate for

⁸¹ Larter [1995] Crim LR 75, see Ch 17, p 774, n 128.

⁸² G Williams, 'Consent and Public Policy' [1962] Crim LR 74, 75.

⁸³ For criticism see S Shute [1996] Crim LR 684.

⁸⁴ Barnes [2005] EWCA Crim 3246, [16], [2005] Crim LR 381.

⁸⁵ cf Wilson, p 682, where the court asked, 'Does public policy or the public interest demand that the appellant's activities [branding of wife's buttocks at her request] be visited by the sanctions of the criminal law?' and, unsurprisingly, answered, 'No.' By way of contrast see BM [2018] EWCA Crim 560, which concerned body modification such as tongue splitting by a tattooist who had no medical qualification.

⁸⁶ The Criminal Injuries Compensation Appeal Panel takes the view that the victim's consent is not determinative of whether an offence of violence has been committed: R (E) v CICA [2003] EWCA Civ 234.

⁸⁷ [2009] EWHC 2754 (Admin). Goldring LJ expressed astonishment and disappointment that such a 'wholly spurious' point would be taken on the facts of that case.

the State to apply the criminal sanction to punish conduct voluntarily engaged in by adults of full mental capacity. There are three distinct questions to address:

- (1) Was there implied or express consent?
- (2) Did the 'victim'⁸⁸ give effective consent to the act?
- (3) Was the conduct performed in a context in which the law accepts that consent be validly given?⁸⁹

16.2.1.1 Implied consent

Since the merest touching without consent is a battery, the exigencies of everyday life demand that there be an implied consent to that degree of contact which is necessary or customary in the ordinary course of daily life.

Generally speaking, consent is a defence to battery; and most of the physical contacts of ordinary life are not actionable because they are impliedly consented to by all who move in society and so expose themselves to the risk of bodily contact. So no one can complain of the jostling which is inevitable from his presence in, for example, a supermarket, an underground station or a busy street; nor can a person who attends a party complain if his hand is seized in friendship, or even if his back is (within reason) slapped. Although such cases are regarded as examples of implied consent, it is more common nowadays to treat them as falling within a general exception embracing the limited physical contact which is generally to be expected and accepted in the ordinary conduct of daily life.⁹⁰

Touching a person for the purpose of engaging his attention has been held to be acceptable⁹¹ but physical restraint is not. A police officer who catches hold of a boy, not for the purpose of arresting him but in order to detain him for questioning, is acting unlawfully.⁹² So is a constable who takes hold of the arm of a woman found soliciting in order to caution her. The fact that the practice of cautioning sex workers is recognized by statute does not imply ⁸⁸ The term 'victim' is adopted throughout this chapter, although it is acknowledged that if V has truly consented, it is illogical to view him as such.

⁸⁹ It has been argued that English law relies too much upon category-based decision-making and that a more suitable approach is the one propounded by the New Zealand Court of Appeal in Lee (2006) 22 CRNZ 568. This approach requires the court to engage with the facts of the individual case in a substantive fashion rather than simply basing its decision on the generic category of behaviour to which the facts belong. See J Tolmie, 'Consent to Harmful Assaults: The Case for Moving Away from Category Based Decision Making' [2012] Crim LR 656 and W Wilson, 'Consenting to Personal Injury' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017).

⁹⁰ Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374 at 378, per Robert Goff LJ. In F v West Berkshire Health Authority [1990] 2 AC 1, [1989] 2 All ER 545 at 563, HL, Lord Goff was more emphatic that the consent rationalization is 'artificial', pointing out that it is difficult to impute consent to those who through youth or mental disorder are unable to give it. See Mepstead v DPP [1996] Crim LR 111, DC. In Wainwright v Home Office [2003] UKHL 53, Goff LJ was described as having 'redefined' the concept, at [9].

⁹¹ Wiffin v Kincard (1807) 2 Bos & PNR 471; Coward v Baddeley (1859) 4 H & N 478. Donnelly v Jackman [1970] 1 All ER 987, [1970] 1 WLR 562, where a police officer was held to be acting in the execution of his duty although he persisted in tapping V on the shoulder when V had made it clear that he had no intention of stopping to speak, is 'an extreme case'. [1984] 3 All ER 374 at 379. See also Walker v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (2014) The Times, 16 July, CA (Civ Div) where the officer went beyond the permissible.

⁹² Kenlin v Gardiner [1967] 2 QB 510. See McKoy [2002] EWCA Crim 1628. See for more recent examples Iqbal [2011] EWCA Crim 273; Wood v DPP [2008] EWHC 1056 (Admin); Metcalfe v CPS [2015] EWHC 1091 (Admin). D may be guilty of obstructing a constable (making a lawful arrest, keeping the peace, etc) even if the officer, at some point, acts unlawfully (eg in pushing D out of the way). For discussion of whether the defences of private defence or defence of another can be pleaded in respect of these offences, see p 407.

any power to stop and detain.⁹³ But to 'detain' without any actual touching cannot be a battery. If the detention is effected by the threat of force, then it may be false imprisonment.⁹⁴ Article 5 of the ECHR has potential significance, but has been interpreted to protect against a 'deprivation of liberty not a minor restriction on freedom of movement'.⁹⁵

In H v CPS,⁹⁶ the court rejected the submission that teachers in special needs schools must by their post 'impliedly consent' to the use of violence against them by pupils. The court accepted that the teachers were accepting a heightened risk of violence but that was not the same as saying that they implicitly consented to its infliction.

For this purpose, touching the 'person' of the victim includes the clothes he is wearing.⁹⁷ It is not necessary that V should be able to feel the impact through the clothes. In Thomas,⁹⁸ where D touched the bottom of V's skirt and rubbed it, the court said, obiter, that 'There could be no dispute that if you touch a person's clothes while he is wearing them that is equivalent to touching him.' Section 79 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 defines touching for the purpose of that Act, as including touching with any part of the body, with anything else or through anything, and in *H*⁹⁹ the Court of Appeal confirmed that touching V's clothes sufficed.

In Dica,¹⁰⁰ the Court of Appeal confirmed that where V, who was unaware of D's infected state, had consented to the act of unprotected sexual intercourse she could not be said to have impliedly consented to the risk of infection from that intercourse.

16.2.1.2 Effective consent

The principal problems to address in this context are:

- what mental capacity V must possess to be capable of issuing effective consent;
- what degree of knowledge of the acts V must have to be capable of giving a valid consent to them;
- what effect on V's apparent consent a fraud by D will have; and
- whether duress or pressure from D or another will vitiate consent by V.

We are not at this point examining D's belief in V's consent, but it must be borne in mind that D's belief that V is consenting to an act for which V's factual consent would be recognized in law¹⁰¹ is a defence whether D's belief is based on reasonable grounds or not, provided D's belief is honestly held.¹⁰²

⁹³ Collins v Wilcock, n 90; see eg McMillan v CPS [2008] EWHC 1457 (Admin) (touching when steadying a drunk person).

⁹⁴ See p 717.

⁹⁵ See discussion in Emmerson, Ashworth, and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 5.02 et seq; Guzzardi v Italy (1981) 3 EHRR 333, para 92. See the discussion of Austin v MPC [2009] UKHL 12, p 718. See also R (AP) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] UKSC 24, in which it was held that when deciding if there is a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art 5 of the ECHR regard should be had to the subjective factors peculiar to the particular individual.

⁹⁶ [2010] All ER (D) 56 (Apr).

⁹⁷ Day (1845) 1 Cox CC 207. D slashed V's clothes with a knife.

⁹⁸ (1985) 81 Cr App R 331 at 334, CA.

⁹⁹ [2005] EWCA Crim 732, [2005] Crim LR 734.

¹⁰⁰ [2004] EWCA Crim 1103, [2004] Crim LR 944 and commentary. The House of Lords refused leave to appeal—see House of Lords Session 2005–06, 15 Dec 2005. See for criticism of the case: M Weait, 'Criminal Law and the Transmission of HIV: R v Dica' (2005) 68 MLR 121; M Weait, 'Dica: Knowledge, Consent and the Transmission of HIV' (2004) 154 NLJ 826; cf for a positive view of the case: JR Spencer, 'Retrial for Reckless Infection' (2004) 154 NLJ 762. See also M Davies, 'R v Dica: Lessons in Practising Unsafe Sex' (2004) 68 J Crim L 498.

¹⁰¹ Konzani [2005] EWCA Crim 706.

¹⁰² Morgan [1976] AC 182, HL; p 332; Albert v Lavin [1981] 1 All ER 628, DC.

Capacity

Those with a mental disorder or learning difficulty may lack sufficient capacity¹⁰³ to give consent,¹⁰⁴ as may someone who is temporarily incapacitated by intoxication or otherwise. Youth or immaturity is clearly also a potential impediment to the giving of effective consent.¹⁰⁵ In Burrell v Harmer,¹⁰⁶ where D tattooed boys aged 12 and 13, causing their arms to become inflamed and painful, the boys' apparent consent was held to be no defence to a charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The court took the view that the boys were unable to understand the nature of the act. But in what sense did they not understand it? The case highlights the relative superficiality of the English criminal courts' approach to such fundamental questions underlying the issue of consent.

The Mental Capacity Act 2005 provides a definition, at least for the purposes of that Act, of 'people who lack capacity'. The definition is as follows: 'a person lacks capacity in relation to a matter if at the material time he is unable to make a decision for himself in relation to the matter because of a temporary or permanent impairment of, or a disturbance in the functioning of, the mind or brain'. The section further provides that a lack of capacity cannot be established merely by reference to '(a) a person's age or appearance, or (b) a condition of his, or an aspect of his behaviour, which might lead others to make unjustified assumptions about his capacity'.

Even if the criminal courts do not adopt that definition directly in the context of offences against the person, they may be influenced in deciding whether a person lacks capacity by the 'principles' set out in s 1 of the Mental Capacity Act 2005 which include that a person: must be assumed to have capacity unless it is established to the contrary, and that a person is not to be treated as unable to make a decision merely because he makes an unwise decision.¹⁰⁷ The Act provides 'official recognition that capacity is not a blunt "all or nothing" condition, but is more complex, and is to be treated as being issue-specific. A person may not have sufficient capacity to be able to make complex, refined or major decisions but may still have the capacity to make simpler or less momentous ones, or to hold genuine views as to what he wants to be the outcome of more complex decisions or situations.'¹⁰⁸

Informed consent

In principle, V cannot consent to some form of conduct without adequate knowledge of its nature, and the degree of knowledge required should depend on the degree of harm and risk of that harm to which V is exposing himself. In offences against the person, this issue seems to have received little attention until very recently. In sexual offences, it is implicit in the statutory formulation of the more serious non-consensual offences that V must have capacity and have 'freely agreed', and that there must have been adequate information available to V to render his consent effective.¹⁰⁹ The issue overlaps with the next to be discussed—that of V's apparent consent in the face of deception by D. In sexual offences, the 2003 Act provides, ¹⁰³ LCCP 139, Part V; LC 231, Mental Capacity (1995); see E Jackson, Medical Law: Text, Cases, and Materials (4th edn, 2016) Chs 4 and 5.

¹⁰⁴ See Re MB (An Adult) (Medical Treatment) [1997] 2 FCR 541. Medical treatment in defiance of the (mentally normal) adult patient's wishes or in the case of a child in defiance of those of a parent will infringe Art 8: Glass v UK (App no 61827/00) 2000.

¹⁰⁵ See generally Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] AC 112.

¹⁰⁶ [1967] Crim LR 169 and commentary thereon. It is now an offence to tattoo a person under the age of 18, except tattooing by a doctor for medical reasons: Tattooing of Minors Act 1969.

¹⁰⁷ The Act is supplemented by a Code of Practice published in 2007. See also C [2009] UKHL 42, dealing with the offence in s 30 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, discussed at p 763.

¹⁰⁸ See Re S and another (Protected Persons) [2010] 1 WLR 1082, [53] concerning powers of attorney.

¹⁰⁹ See Ch 17.

inter alia, that it is conclusively presumed that there is no consent where D has deceived V as to the nature or purpose of D's act.¹¹⁰ In non-sexual offences against the person, it remains unclear whether V can be said to have consented without having knowledge of the purpose of D's conduct even if V is aware of its nature. The issue has arisen in relation to cases in which D has infected V with HIV¹¹¹ in the course of sexual acts.¹¹²

In Konzani,¹¹³ the Court of Appeal confirmed that if D engages in unprotected sexual intercourse with V, and D recklessly infects V with HIV, any defence of consent D seeks to advance will not be available unless V had made an informed consent to the risk of infection.¹¹⁴ As the court explained:

If an individual who knows that he is suffering from the HIV virus conceals this stark fact from his sexual partner, the principle of V's personal autonomy is not enhanced if D is exculpated when he recklessly transmits the HIV virus to V through consensual sexual intercourse. On any view, the concealment of this fact from her almost inevitably means that she is deceived. Her consent is not properly informed, and she cannot give an informed consent to something of which she is ignorant. Equally, her personal autonomy is not normally protected by allowing a defendant who knows that he is suffering from the HIV virus which he deliberately conceals, to assert an honest belief in his partner's informed consent to the risk of the transmission of the HIV virus. Silence in these circumstances not consistent with honesty, or with a genuine belief that there is an informed consent. Accordingly, in such circumstances the issue either of informed consent, or honest belief in it will only rarely arise: in reality, in most cases, the contention would be wholly artificial.¹¹⁵

Several aspects of the decision are of importance. First, to be effective, V's consent must be to the risk of HIV infection; V might well have consented to the act of sexual intercourse without consenting to the risk of HIV infection. Secondly, V cannot in law consent to intentional ¹¹⁰ See s 76, p 775. As will be discussed later, deception is also relevant when considering the general definition of consent in s 74.

¹¹¹ See also Golding [2014] EWCA Crim 889, [2014] Crim LR 686 in which D pleaded guilty to transmitting genital herpes. See also LCCP 217, Ch 6.

¹¹² For detailed examination of the appropriate uses of the criminal law to tackle HIV transmission, see S Bronniti, 'Spreading Disease and the Criminal Law' [1994] Crim LR 21; D Ormerod and M Gunn, 'Criminal Liability for the Transmission of HIV' [1996] Web JCLI; D Ormerod, 'Criminalizing HIV Transmission—Still No Effective Solutions' (2001) 30 Common L World Rev 135; M Weait and Y Azad, 'The Criminalisation of HIV Transmission in England and Wales: Questions of Law and Policy' (2005) 10 HIV/AIDS Policy & Law Rev 1. See more generally, M Weait, Intimacy and Responsibility: The Criminalisation of HIV Transmission (2007). Cf S Matthiesson, 'Should the Law Deal with Reckless HIV Infection as a Criminal Offence or as a Matter of Public Health?' (2010) 21 KLJ 123 responding to Weait; R Bennett, 'Should We Criminalise HIV Transmission' in C Erin and S Ost (eds), The Criminal Justice System and Health Care (2007) 225; L Cherkassky, 'Being Informed: The Complexities of Knowledge, Deception and Consent when Transmitting HIV' (2010) 74 J Crim L 242; J Slater, 'HIV, Trust and the Criminal Law' (2011) 75 J Crim L 309; JG Francis and LP Francis, 'HIV Treatment as Prevention: Not an Argument for Continuing Criminalisation of HIV Transmission' (2013) 9 Int'l J Crim L in Context 520; the chapters in C Stanton and H Quirk (eds), Criminalising Contagion—Legal and Ethical Challenges of Disease Transmission and the Criminal Law (2016). The CPS has a dedicated policy for prosecuting cases involving the intentional or reckless sexual transmission of infection. See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/intentional-or-reckless-sexual-transmission-infection-policy-prosecuting-cases. The policy was reviewed after one year and was found to be 'broadly effective' (para 5.1). Note that this is not limited to HIV transmission.

¹¹³ [2005] EWCA Crim 706; M Weait, 'Knowledge, Autonomy and Consent: R v Konzani' [2005] Crim LR 763 arguing that the case extends the criminal law too far by criminalizing reckless non-disclosure of HIV-positive status. See more generally M Weait, Intimacy and Responsibility: The Criminalisation of HIV Transmission (2007) arguing that the act of recklessly exposing a sexual partner to the risk of HIV infection without her consent should be decriminalized and treated as a public health issue.

¹¹⁴ For sentencing considerations in such cases, see P (SJ) [2006] EWCA Crim 2599—32 months on a plea. Darryl Rowe was sentenced to life imprisonment for intentionally transmitting HIV to a number of his sexual partners. See news reports for 18 April 2018.

¹¹⁵ At [23].

infection; V's consent is only effective if D is merely reckless as to transmission.¹¹⁶ Thirdly, the decision appears to criminalize D who suspects that he is HIV-positive, without knowing that fact, if he then goes on to have unprotected intercourse with V without her consent as to the risk of infection.¹¹⁷ This aspect of the decision has been heavily criticized for over-criminalizing.¹¹⁸ Fourthly, the decision treats D's failure to disclose his HIV-positive status to V as sufficient to preclude informed consent by V. Several commentators have been critical of this aspect of the decision, arguing that V has some responsibility for taking precautions about her sexual safety, and that by assuming that by D's concealment V is not consenting, the law ignores that responsibility on V.¹¹⁹ The question of whether D is liable where he has not informed V of his HIV status but, despite using a condom, he has infected V remains unresolved. D will surely argue that he was not reckless as to the risk of infection.¹²⁰

It was accepted in Konzani that there may be circumstances in which V will have informed consent without express disclosure from D, as where the fact of D's HIV status becomes known in the course of medical treatment. That qualification to the general principle—that informed consent depends on D's honest disclosure—also poses problems. D will be able to plead that he did not know that V was not consenting to the risk, since he had a genuine belief that she knew of his HIV status although he had not disclosed the fact to her. In addition, D may be acquitted where V has in fact consented to the risk even if D did not know that she had consented because he was unaware of her having secured knowledge of his status from other sources. If absence of consent is an element of the actus reus, D cannot be guilty in such a case because the actus reus is not complete where V has, in fact, consented. If consent is a defence, D will have actus reus (infection) and mens rea (recklessness as to infection); but can he rely on the defence of consent based on the fact of V's awareness of his infected state of which D was ignorant at the time as it derived from other sources? Does the defence require proof that D was aware of the circumstances which would render his conduct justified? Cooper and Reed¹²¹ suggest that this resurrects the problems posed by Dadson (p 34). They point to the fact that D will be relying on a justifying circumstance (V's consent) of which D was unaware at the time of the act, and that this drives 'a coach and horses' through established doctrines of informed consent.

Parliamentary clarification of the issues would be welcome, but is unlikely given the controversial nature of such legislation in terms of broader public health policies and the desire to encourage responsible sexual behaviour.¹²² The Law Commission has consulted on whether future reform of the offences against the person ought to include specific offences dealing with sexually transmitted infection.¹²³ In the subsequent Report, the Law Commission recommended that in any new statute governing offences against the person based upon the draft Home Office Bill, the offences of causing serious injury should be capable of including the intentional or (as the case may be) reckless transmission of disease. The ¹¹⁶ See later.

¹¹⁷ Some argue that D has a 'right' not to know what his HIV status is and a right to act on that lack of knowledge: Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, 247.

¹¹⁸ See S Ryan, 'Reckless Transmission of HIV: Knowledge and Culpability' [2006] Crim LR 981.

¹¹⁹ See Weait (2005) 68 MLR at 128 and [2005] Crim LR 763. See also V Munro, 'On Responsible Relationships and Irresponsible Sex' (2007) 19 CFLQ 112.

¹²⁰ There are those who argue that consent may not be D's only way of avoiding liability in cases such as these and that there is ambiguity as to whether, in the absence of disclosure, D could avoid liability by using a condom and/or demonstrating that his viral load was very low, thereby diminishing the risk of transmission. It is argued that in these circumstances D is not being reckless and so lacks the requisite mens rea. See D Hughes, 'Condom Use, Viral Load and the Type of Sexual Activity as Defences to the Sexual Transmission of HIV' (2013) 77 J Crim L 136. See also LCCP 217, Ch 2.

¹²¹ S Cooper and A Reed, 'Informed Consent and the Transmission of Sexual Disease: Dadson Revivified' (2007) 71 J Crim L 461.

¹²² See J Rogers (2005) 64 CLJ 20, 22 pointing out that no government is likely to want to legislate.

¹²³ See LCCP 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person: A Scoping Consultation Paper (2014) Ch 6.

Law Commission also recommended that if the government wished to consider the possibility of excluding criminal liability for the reckless transmission of disease, or of creating special offences for such transmission, this should follow a wider review.¹²⁴

The approach in Konzani, by which V's informed consent rests on D providing information as to the relevant risk, does not sit easily with the courts' approach in sexual offences, where it is unclear whether every fraud by D as to the purpose of his actions will vitiate consent.¹²⁵

Consent procured by fraud

In offences against the person, D's fraud as to the conduct does not necessarily negative V's consent: it does so only if it deceives V as to D's identity or the nature of the act.¹²⁶ The common law approach to frauds vitiating consent remains unsatisfactorily complex and confused.

If V agrees to X touching her in a manner amounting to a mere battery, her consent is prima facie vitiated if D impersonates X and touches her. V's autonomy includes a right (generally) to choose who touches her. In Richardson,¹²⁷ D, a registered dental practitioner who was suspended from practice, carried out dentistry on patients who said they would not have consented had they known that D was suspended. D was convicted of assault occasioning actual bodily harm, the trial judge ruling that the mistake vitiated consent, being equivalent to a mistake of identity. The Court of Appeal disagreed since that would be to strain and distort the everyday meaning of 'identity'. The fraud was not as to who she was but whether she was licensed as a dentist. There is, to date, no recognition of a principle in offences against the person whereby a fraud as to an attribute (eg being medically qualified) suffices to vitiate consent. It could be argued that there are some situations in which the status or attribute of the individual is inextricably bound up with his identity for the purposes of the specific activity he is performing. Indeed, it could be that the attribute is actually more important than the identity. For example, would a patient visiting a general practitioner and being told that a new doctor is taking the surgery be more concerned as to the 'status' of the person or his 'identity'? The same argument might apply to the attribute of being a police officer.¹²⁸

The courts have had even greater difficulty dealing with the effect of frauds as to the nature of the act, and in particular in distinguishing frauds that relate to issues that affect the nature of the act and frauds that relate to a collateral issue. It would be undesirable for the law to treat all frauds as vitiating consent; otherwise the most trivial lies about the conduct could give rise to liability.¹²⁹ In Bolduc and Bird, where D1, a doctor, by falsely pretending that D2 was a medical student, obtained V's consent to D2's presence at a necessary vaginal examination of ¹²⁴ See LC 361, Reform of Offences Against the Person (2015) Ch 6.

¹²⁵ See Jheeta [2007] EWCA Crim 1699, Assange v Sweden [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin), B [2013] EWCA Crim 823; p 776. For discussion, see A Reed and E Smith, 'Caveat Amator—The Transmission of HIV and the Parameters of Consent and Bad Character Evidence' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017) 125–130.

¹²⁶ See generally LCCP 139, Part VI.

¹²⁷ [1998] 2 Cr App R 200. Richardson now has to be read with Tabassum [2000] 2 Cr App R 328, p 673.

¹²⁸ With powers to arrest, search, etc. See Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921. It could be argued that there are circumstances in which the attribute or status of the actor is so crucial as to alter the nature of the act performed, as perhaps in a medical context. This would require the court to adopt a much wider reading of 'nature' than the orthodox interpretation which restricts the meaning to the mechanical acts, see eg Williams [1923] 1 KB 340. There is some Canadian authority supporting a wider test. See Maurantonio (1967) 65 DLR (2d) 674; Harms [1944] 2 DLR 61.

¹²⁹ In appropriate cases the law lowers the threshold of what constitutes a sufficient fraud or threat, as where the victim is mentally disordered—see Sexual Offences Act 2003, ss 30–44, p 815.

V, it was held that there was no assault because the fraud was not as to the nature and quality of what was to be done.¹³⁰ Similarly, a woman was held to have consented to the nature of the act by agreeing to the introduction of an instrument into her vagina for diagnostic purposes when the operator was secretly acting only for sexual gratification.¹³¹

One of the leading cases in this area, and one which gave rise to considerable controversy, was Clarence.¹³² D was charged with causing grievous bodily harm to his wife, V, when knowing that he was suffering from a sexually transmitted disease, he had unprotected sex with her and infected her. It was held that V had consented to intercourse with D and, although she would not have consented to the act of intercourse had she been aware of the disease from which D knew he was suffering, this was no assault. The court concluded that she had not been defrauded as to the nature of the act of intercourse (ie the physical mechanics of that act)¹³³ but merely as to the associated risk of disease. The flaw in this approach was in focusing on V's awareness of the nature of the act of intercourse. This was not a rape case where her understanding of the nature of sex might have been important. The court should have focused on the more important question: was V aware or was she deceived about the (risk of) harm which D was charged with causing—that of the infection. It was her awareness of the nature of that risk that ought to have been considered.

In the important case of Dica,¹³⁴ where D had infected two sexual partners with HIV, Clarence was regarded by the Court of Appeal as being no longer of useful application.¹³⁵ Where V, who was unaware of D's infected state, had consented to the act of unprotected sexual intercourse she could not be said to have impliedly consented to the risk of infection from that intercourse. In Dica, the court focused, appropriately it is submitted, on the question of whether D's fraud on V related to the infection—which represents the harm alleged—rather than the intercourse. The conclusion was that the victims had been defrauded as to the risk of infection and hence had not consented to bodily harm, but had not been defrauded as to the nature of the act of sexual intercourse and hence had not been raped.¹³⁶ The nature of intercourse is the same whether with an HIV-infected person or not. Where V has not consented to the risk of infection, D could be liable under s 20 of the OAPA 1861 if he was reckless as to whether he might infect V.¹³⁷ Subsequently, in *Konzani*¹³⁸ the court emphasized that 'there is a critical distinction between taking a risk of the various, potentially adverse and possibly problematic consequences of sexual intercourse and giving an informed consent to the risk of infection with a fatal disease'.¹³⁹ D will be liable if he fails to disclose or lies about his infection and is reckless whether he infects V.

Frauds as to the nature of the act (which, as Dica demonstrates, must be accurately categorized) are clearly sufficient to vitiate consent. Following Tabassum, it became unclear whether ¹³⁰ Bolduc and Bird (1967) 63 DLR (2d) 82 (Sup Ct of Canada, Spence J dissenting), reversing British Columbia CA, 61 DLR (2d) 494; cf Rosinski (1824) 1 Mood CC 19.

¹³¹ Mobilio [1991] 1 VR 339. See D Ormerod, 'A Victim's Mistaken Consent in Rape' (1992) 56 J Crim L 407.

¹³² (1888) 22 QBD 23. For an interesting historical account of the case, see K Gleeson, 'The Problem of Clarence' (2005) 14 Nottingham LJ 1.

¹³³ cf Williams [1923] KB 340.

¹³⁴ [2004] EWCA Crim 1103, [2004] Crim LR 944 and commentary. See references in n 113.

¹³⁵ The various aspects of that decision had been eroded by the courts over recent years, with R [1992] 1 AC 599 dispensing with the marital rape exemption, and Ireland and Burstow [1998] AC 147 accepting that 'infection' need not involve an assault or direct contact.

¹³⁶ The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal overturning the trial judge's ruling that the decision in Brown [1994] 1 AC 212 deprived V of the legal capacity to consent to such serious harm and that consent provided no defence. At his retrial Dica was convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to s 20 and sentenced to four-and-a-half years' imprisonment. The House of Lords refused leave to appeal—see House of Lords Session 2005–06, 15 Dec 2005.

¹³⁷ If D intended to infect V he would be liable under s 18 irrespective of consent.

¹³⁸ [2005] EWCA Crim 706. ¹³⁹ At [22].

a fraud as to the 'quality' of the act (rather than its nature) would be sufficient to vitiate consent. In that case, D had persuaded three women to allow him to examine their breasts by falsely informing them that he was medically qualified and conducting research work for a cancer charity. D's conviction for indecent assault was upheld. The court accepted that the women had been aware of the nature of the act of touching their breasts, but defrauded as to the 'quality' of the act—they believed it to be for a medical purpose—and that vitiated their consent.¹⁴⁰ This was recognized to have profound repercussions. Where D has sexual intercourse with V knowing (or possibly even being reckless as to whether) he is HIV-positive, D's fraud as to the infection could, on the Tabassum approach, be regarded as a fraud as to the 'quality' of the act. This could render V's consent to the intercourse invalid and D would be a rapist.¹⁴¹

The question of frauds as to purpose also arises. In B,¹⁴² the Court of Appeal rejected the argument that D who has intercourse with V and conceals his HIV status is defrauding V as to the 'purpose' of the act of intercourse. Under the Sexual Offences Act 2003, it is conclusively presumed that V did not consent if D has defrauded V as to the nature or purpose of his act. The court in B concluded that concealment of HIV will not be a fraud as to purpose in sex cases. It is submitted that at common law, in relation to offences against the person where the requirement is of a fraud or mistake as to the nature of the act and not merely its purpose, the court is now extremely unlikely to adopt a contrary view.

It is important to point out that the facts of B were framed as involving non-disclosure rather than fraud and the Court of Appeal treated the two as quite distinct. The outcome of the case could have been different had V specifically asked D about his HIV status and he lied to her about it. The effect of the distinction that was drawn in B, between non-disclosure and fraud, means that there is a divergence of approach depending upon whether D is charged with a non-fatal offence against the person or a sexual offence.¹⁴³

In terms of failure to disclose: D will not be liable for an offence against the person, if he discloses his HIV status and obtains V's consent to the risk of transmission.¹⁴⁴ But, in the context of sexual offences the burden is placed on the non-infected partner to ask about D's HIV status. If D says nothing and infects V, he may be guilty of inflicting GBH but not of rape.

In terms of lies: if V asks D about his HIV status and he lies, then he may be guilty of rape, and if V is infected, offences against the person. If V is not infected, then D may be guilty of rape but nothing else. At this juncture, it is worth recalling what the Court of Appeal observed in Richardson:¹⁴⁵

There is no basis for the proposition that the rules which determine the circumstances in which consent is vitiated can be different according to whether the case is one of sexual assault or one where the assault is non-sexual.¹⁴⁶

Duress

Duress may negative apparently valid consent. A threat to imprison V unless he submitted to a beating would probably invalidate V's consent to the beating. Possibly a threat to ¹⁴⁰ There is no guidance in Tabassum on what might constitute the 'quality' of a particular act.

¹⁴¹ Under the Sexual Offences Act 2003, s 76 a fraud as to the 'nature or purpose' (not quality) of the act is conclusively presumed to vitiate consent. Whether other frauds vitiate consent requires consideration to be given to the terms of the general definition of consent in s 74. See Ch 17 for discussion.

¹⁴² [2006] EWCA Crim 2945. For criticism see L Leigh, 'Two Cases on Consent in Rape' [2007] 5 Arch News 6.

¹⁴³ For further discussion, see K Laird, 'Rapist or Rogue? Deception, Consent and the Sexual Offences Act 2003' [2014] Crim LR 491.

¹⁴⁴ Unless he takes steps to avoid transmission and therefore might lack mens rea—eg where he uses a condom.

¹⁴⁵ [1999] QB 444.

¹⁴⁶ At 450.

dismiss from employment¹⁴⁷ or to bring a prosecution¹⁴⁸ would have a similar effect. It is submitted that non-criminal threats and even threats of lawful action may also be sufficient. It is unclear whether, to negative consent, the threats must be such that they would have caused a person of reasonable firmness to succumb to the violence. An alternative view would be that consent should be invalid if D knew of the particular vulnerabilities of V which caused V to succumb although they might not have caused a reasonable person to do so. If the test is whether the threat would be sufficient to overcome the will of a reasonably steadfast person, the outcome must depend to some extent on the relationship between the gravity of the threat and the act to which V is asked to submit.

Duress may be implied from the relationship between the parties—for example, where D is a teacher and V is a young pupil.¹⁴⁹ As in sexual offences,¹⁵⁰ submission is not consent. As noted, if D genuinely believes that V is consenting, even though she is in fact only submitting, D will lack mens rea.

16.2.1.3 Legal limits on the validity of consent

Having examined the circumstances in which V's apparent consent will be invalidated, we must turn to the yet more difficult question: if V has in fact given valid consent, is that consent recognized in law? Fundamental questions of morality are raised by the extent to which the State ought to use criminal sanctions to restrict an adult with full mental capacity in his consent to the infliction of harm on his person.¹⁵¹ On a public policy basis, English law restricts the validity of consent by reference to the level of harm and the circumstances in which it is inflicted. Factual consent to mere assault or battery is valid in law. Factual consent to actual bodily harm or more serious levels of harm (wounding, serious harm, death) is not legally recognized unless the activity involved is one which the courts or Parliament have recognized to be in the public interest. Thus, as a matter of public policy, it is no defence to a charge of murder for D to say that V asked to be killed. On the other hand, V's consent to D's taking a high degree of risk of killing him is effective where it is justified by the purpose of the act, as it may be in the case of a surgical operation. Where the act has some social purpose, recognized by the law as valid, it is a question of balancing the degree of harm which will or may be caused against the value of that purpose.

Three issues require elucidation: what level of harm is caused, what level of harm is foreseen or intended and whether the activity in which the harm arises is one of the exceptional categories in which consent is recognized. Unfortunately, since this is an area in which the decisions of the appellate courts are based so heavily on public policy, it is not always easy to identify clear principles.

The level of harm

Consent to an assault or battery will always be valid consent, no matter what the circumstances (eg even if it is in a sadomasochist encounter) provided the consent is effective, as discussed earlier.

If D has caused actual bodily harm—injury of more than a merely transient or trifling nature—with intent to do so,¹⁵² the factual consent of the victim will not be legally valid ¹⁴⁷ McCoy 1953 (2) SA 4 (AD) (threat to ground air hostess negating her apparent consent to being caned).

¹⁴⁸ State v Volschenk 1968 (2) PH H283 (threat to prosecute held not to negative consent on rape charge).

¹⁴⁹ Nichol (1807) Russ & Ry 130.

¹⁵⁰ See p 760. See Doyle [2010] EWCA Crim 119, and Ali [2015] EWCA Crim 1279.

¹⁵¹ See Williams [1962] Crim LR 74 and 154; LCCP 139, Part II, Appendix C; P Roberts (1997) 17 OJLS 389; J Feinberg, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law, Vol 1: Harm to Others (1984).

¹⁵² And probably also in cases where he does so recklessly. See the discussion of Dica earlier.

unless the conduct falls within one of the recognized exceptional categories discussed later. It is arguable that the law should recognize a person's consent as a valid defence to a graver level of harm than ABH. The Law Commission at one time proposed raising the level of harm to which a person is entitled to consent in general circumstances to harm falling below its proposed concept of 'serious disabling injury'.¹⁵³

The role of intention and foresight of harms

Where D has intended or has been reckless as to the causing of actual bodily harm, liability arises even if V consents, subject to the exceptional cases later. The law has struggled with cases where D has not caused that level of harm intentionally—where he intends or is reckless as to causing only assault or battery with consent, but the conduct leads to actual bodily harm. Some obiter dicta suggest that D is guilty if the harm was foreseen by D (if not intended), or even if it was objectively likely to occur. The problem flowed from an overbroad statement in the *A-G's Reference (No 6 of 1980)*¹⁵⁴ where two youths of 18 and 17 settled an argument by a fist fight and when one sustained a bleeding nose and bruises to his face, it was held that the other was guilty of assault occasioning actual bodily harm:

it is not in the public interest that people should try to cause or should cause each other actual bodily harm for no good reason. Minor struggles are another matter. So, in our judgment, it is immaterial whether the act occurs in private or in public; it is an assault if actual bodily harm is intended and/or caused. This means that most fights will be unlawful regardless of consent.¹⁵⁵

This passage was quoted with approval by all three of the majority in the leading case of Brown (discussed in the following section). It is submitted, however, that it goes too far. The difficulty is the words 'or should cause' and 'and/or'. These words imply that an offence is committed if D assaults or batters V with V's consent and D does not intend to cause bodily harm, but does so in fact. The passage suggests that D will be liable even if the bodily harm was not foreseen or even foreseeable. That seems a wholly unreasonable result. Subsequent case law is difficult to reconcile with the position, and it is submitted that the dictum no longer represents the law.

It is submitted that the following reflects the current state of the law.

- (1) D intends to cause actual bodily harm and causes that level of harm (or worse) to V with consent (or belief in V's consent). V's consent is invalid unless the harm occurs in the course of conduct within an exceptional category discussed later (pp 675 et seq). Unless it is an exceptional category case, D is liable for actual bodily harm. A good illustration is *Donovan*¹⁵⁶ where D caned V, with her consent, for their mutual sexual enjoyment: D would be liable under s 47.
- (2) D is reckless as to causing actual bodily harm and has V's consent (or belief in V's consent) to the risk of causing that level of injury which actually occurs. It is less clear whether V's consent is invalid in all cases irrespective of whether they fall within an exceptional category. Dicta in Brown and some decisions such as Dica suggest that the law treats V's factual consent as invalid only in respect of intentionally inflicted harms.
- (3) D intends only to make physical contact with V at the level of battery with V's consent (or a belief in V's consent), but in fact D causes actual bodily harm not intending or ¹⁵³ See LCCP 139. For criticisms of the proposal and its incoherence with the offences against the person, see Ormerod and Gunn [1996] Crim LR 694. Many jurisdictions adopt a much higher threshold: see LCCP 139, Appendix B. See also LCCP 217, Ch 5 in which it is noted that creating a new offence of minor injury might allow for the threshold of harm to which consent is valid to rise to the proposed new form of ABH.

¹⁵⁴ [1981] QB 715.

¹⁵⁵ A-G's Reference (No 6 of 1980) [1981] 2 All ER 1057 at 1059 (emphasis added).

¹⁵⁶ [1934] 2 KB 498.

being reckless as to that result. According to the dictum in A-G's Reference D is guilty, it being sufficient that actual bodily harm is caused.¹⁵⁷ This dictum has been rejected. The Court of Appeal in *Meachen*¹⁵⁸ concluded, correctly it is submitted, that where D intends¹⁵⁹ to cause the level of harm amounting to battery and has V's consent to that level of harm, if D then causes actual bodily harm or worse, without being reckless in doing so or intending to do so, he is not guilty. There is no unlawful battery as the foundational element of the actual bodily harm.¹⁶⁰ The facts of Meachen illustrate how this operates. On D's account he intentionally digitally penetrated V's anus with her consent for their mutual sexual gratification. D had no intention to cause any injury, nor did he see the risk of doing so. V suffered serious anal injury and required a colostomy. D's conviction for inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to s 20 (and indecent assault under the Sexual Offences Act 1956) was quashed because the trial judge had erroneously ruled that V's consent could not avail D in these circumstances.

- (4) The dictum from the A-G's Reference was also rejected in Slingsby:¹⁶¹ D and V engaged in 'vigorous' sexual activity, including D inserting his hand into V's vagina and rectum. This battery was activity to which V could lawfully, and did, consent. D was wearing a signet ring which caused internal injury to V resulting in infection which led to her death. D was charged with manslaughter by an unlawful and dangerous act. Judge J ruled that it would be contrary to principle to treat as criminal, activity which would not otherwise amount to an assault merely because an injury was caused. It is respectfully submitted that this is right.
- (5) The decision in Boyea,¹⁶² also needs to be re-evaluated in light of the decision in Meachen. In Boyea, D's act of inserting his hand into V's vagina and twisting it caused actual bodily harm. It was held that there was an assault because the act was 'likely' to cause harm and D was guilty of an (indecent) assault even if he did not intend or foresee that harm was likely to be caused. This suggests that if, objectively, D's conduct is likely to lead to actual bodily harm there can be no defence of consent, even if D does not intend or foresee any harm over and above the battery to which he has consent. The Court of Appeal in Meachen, following dicta in Dica, concluded that Boyea is best treated as a decision in which V had not consented even to the assault/battery in the circumstances in which it was inflicted.
- (6) D intends to cause actual bodily harm with V's consent (or belief in V's consent) but in fact causes only a battery. D ought not to be convicted of that offence. Consent is a valid defence to assault/battery; D has not caused actual bodily harm.¹⁶³ In Barnes,¹⁶⁴ Lord Woolf asserted that 'When no bodily harm is caused, the consent of the victim to what happened is always a defence to a charge.'¹⁶⁵ It is submitted that this is the correct approach, even though D intended a level of harm to which consent would be no defence.¹⁶⁶
- (7) D is reckless as to causing actual bodily harm with V's consent (or belief in V's consent) as to that risk, but in fact causes only a battery. Arguably, since D has caused only a battery and has consent to that level of harm, he ought to be acquitted.

¹⁵⁷ D has committed the actus reus of actual bodily harm. He has the mens rea for actual bodily harm (it being the same as for assault/battery).

¹⁵⁸ [2006] EWCA Crim 2414.

¹⁵⁹ The court did not have to consider the case where D is reckless as to that harm; see [43].

¹⁶⁰ This passage in the 11th edition was referred to in Meachen, at [36].

¹⁶¹ [1995] Crim LR 570. ¹⁶² (1992) 156 JP 505, [1992] Crim LR 574.

¹⁶³ cf the view in Donovan [1934] 2 KB 498, CCA. ¹⁶⁴ [2005] Crim LR 381.

¹⁶⁵ Para 7 (emphasis added).

¹⁶⁶ Arguably D may be liable for attempted actual bodily harm provided he has the requisite mens rea.

It need hardly be said if this analysis is correct, that the law is in a dreadfully confused and unsatisfactory state.

Type of activity involved

In Brown, a group of sadomasochistic men who had engaged in consensual beatings and genital torture which had not resulted in any participant receiving medical attention, were convicted of offences of assault occasioning actual bodily harm. The House of Lords, by a majority of three to two, upheld the convictions. In doing so, the House recognized certain categories of activity in which the law would recognize effective factual consent to injury as valid in law.¹⁶⁷

Subsequently, in Barnes,¹⁶⁸ Lord Woolf candidly admitted that whether a particular activity is regarded as one to which consent may be valid is a matter of public policy. This 'renders it unnecessary to find a separate jurisprudential basis for the application of the defence in various different factual contexts in which an offence could be committed'. This will do little to satisfy those advocating the need for a clear moral foundation to the law's approach, but is not a great surprise. This policy-based approach allows the courts to maintain the incoherent list of exceptions and to add or subtract from that list based on its perception of the social utility of particular conduct and the circumstances in which it occurs. Thus, the courts may continue to allow consensual buttock branding as akin to tattooing (Wilson)¹⁶⁹ but not sadomasochistic caning on the buttocks (Brown; Donovan). It has been argued that these cases demonstrate that criminality depends too much on an arbitrary assignment of the activity in question into one category or another and that this arbitrariness is compounded by the fact that the same activity could conceivably fall within two categories, one in which consent would provide a defence and another in which it would not.¹⁷⁰

This categorization, on grounds of perceived public utility, of activities to which consent may and may not be validly given can be illustrated by comparing the case of a fist fight and a boxing match, both of which are intended or likely to cause actual bodily harm or worse. Boxing under the Queensberry Rules is lawful. A boxer, trying to knock out his opponent, certainly has an intention to cause harm, possibly even serious harm, which is a sufficient mens rea for murder, but no prosecutions have been brought against fighters operating under the professional rules and in Brown all of their lordships accepted that boxing is lawful. According to Lord Mustill, boxing is best regarded as a special case which, 'for the time being stands outside the ordinary law of violence because society chooses to tolerate it'.¹⁷¹ Where, however, two youths decide to settle an argument by a fight with fists¹⁷² and one sustains a bleeding nose and bruises to his face, the other is guilty of assault occasioning actual bodily harm.

¹⁶⁷ On this, one of the most controversial decisions of the House of Lords in that period, see LCCP 139. D Kell, 'Social Disutility and Consent' (1994) 14 OJLS 121; M Giles, 'Consensual Harm and the Public Interest' (1994) 57 MLR 101; M Allen, 'Consent and Assault' (1994) 58 J Crim Law 183; N Bamforth, 'Sadomasochism and Consent' [1994] Crim LR 661; P Alldridge, Relocating Criminal Law (2000) 122 et seq. For an interesting analysis of the issues raised by the case that it is argued have been overlooked by many commentators, see J Herring, 'R v Brown' in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017).

¹⁶⁸ [2005] Crim LR 381.

¹⁶⁹ [1996] 2 Cr App R 241.

¹⁷⁰ J Tolmie, 'Consent to Harmful Assaults: The Case for Moving Away From Category Based Decision Making' [2012] Crim LR 656.

¹⁷¹ For a full discussion, see M Gunn and D Ormerod, 'The Legality of Boxing' (1995) 15 LS 181, and LCCP 139, XII. See also S Greenfield and G Osborn (eds), Law and Sport in Contemporary Society (2000); J Anderson, The Legality of Boxing: A Punch Drunk Love? (2007).

¹⁷² A 'prize-fight' in public is unlawful at common law as a breach of the peace tending to public disorder. Brown [1994] AC 212, [1993] 2 All ER 75 at 79, 86, 106, 119, HL. Because the whole enterprise is unlawful, consent is not a defence even to a charge of common assault against the contestants: Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534.

The court in A-G's Reference sought to catalogue the types of activity to which V will be entitled to consent in law:

Nothing which we have said is intended to cast doubt on the accepted legality of properly conducted games and sports, lawful chastisement or correction, reasonable surgical interference, dangerous exhibitions, etc. These apparent exceptions can be justified as involving the exercise of a legal right, in the case of chastisement or correction, or as needed in the public interest, in the other cases.

Exceptional categories in which consent to (intentionally inflicted)¹⁷³ harm has been recognized by the courts or Parliament to be valid include the following.

Sports

The law has long recognized the social utility of sport in enhancing the fitness of the population.¹⁷⁴ A number of principles seem to have developed. First, although by playing the sport V consents to whatever the rules permit, if the rules permit an unacceptably dangerous act, the law need not recognize the validity of V's factual consent. That is a matter of public policy. However, boxing continues to be lawful despite the life-threatening injury and participants' intention to cause grievous bodily harm. Secondly, where unlike boxing and martial arts, playing within the rules of the particular sport does not necessarily involve D causing actual bodily harm, but D intentionally inflicts actual bodily harm or worse, V's consent is irrelevant and D commits the offence: Bradshaw.¹⁷⁵ Thirdly, and most difficult in practical terms to apply, if in playing such a sport D was reckless only as to the causing of the injury, the question will be whether V impliedly consented to the risk of that level of injury in the context in which it was inflicted.

The question of whether the conduct was within the rules of the game is not the sole determinant of liability.¹⁷⁶ It would be too simplistic to suggest that V's consent is only valid for that which the rules of the game permit. V may well, as a matter of fact, impliedly consent to the risk of injury occurring in conduct outside the rules as in a late tackle in football, or an illegitimate bouncer in cricket.¹⁷⁷ It is therefore necessary to look to a broader range of factors. In Barnes, the Court of Appeal confirmed that it is appropriate to make an objective evaluation of these circumstances. The court adopted the approach in Canadian law¹⁷⁸ and advocated at one time by the Law Commission.¹⁷⁹ Relevant circumstances include the type of sport, the level at which it was being played, the nature of the act, the degree of force used, the extent of the risk of injury and D's state of mind. Prosecution is usually reserved for sufficiently grave conduct deserving to be regarded as criminal, having regard to the fact that most organized sports have their own disciplinary procedures and to the availability of civil remedies. What is accepted in one sport might ¹⁷³ See earlier. Arguably the consent defence is only invalid where D has intentionally caused harm. See further Dica discussed earlier.

¹⁷⁴ See LCCP 139, Part XII and M Cutcheon, 'Sports, Violence and the Criminal Law' (1994) 45 NILQ 267. For an analysis that questions the objective approach to consent in sports, but denying the need for a uniform approach throughout the criminal law, see B Livings, 'A Different Ball Game' (2007) 71 J Crim L 534, disputing the arguments in C Elliott and C de Than, 'The Case for a Rational Reconstruction of Consent in Criminal Law' (2007) 70 MLR 225 who call for a unitary approach to consent throughout the criminal law. More recently, see M James, 'Consent—Revisiting the Exemption for Contact Sports' in A Reed and M Bohlander (with N Wake and E Smith) (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017).

¹⁷⁵ (1878) Cox CC 83. ¹⁷⁶ ibid. ¹⁷⁷ See Moore (1898) 14 TLR 229.

¹⁷⁸ See Cicarelli (1989) 54 CCC (3d) 121.

¹⁷⁹ LCCP 134. That approach was criticized by S Gardiner, 'The Law and the Sports Field' [1994] Crim LR 513, see also S Gardiner, 'Should More Matches End in Court' (2005) 155 NLJ 998 but received generally favourable responses: LCCP 139, paras 12.6–12.23. On Barnes, see also J Anderson, 'No Licence for Thuggery: Violence, Sport and the Criminal Law' [2008] Crim LR 751. See also B Livings [2018] Crim LR 430 on the CPS policy on prosecution in such cases.

not be covered by the implied consent in another. In highly competitive sports, conduct 'outside the rules' might be expected to occur in the heat of the moment, but even if such conduct justified not only being penalized but, for example, being sent off, it might not reach the threshold required for it to be criminal.

Horseplay

This exception is not confined to organized games. Consent by children to rough and undisciplined play may be a defence to a charge of inflicting grievous bodily harm if there is no intention to cause injury.¹⁸⁰ Equally, a genuine belief in consent, even an unreasonable belief, apparently negatives recklessness: *Jones*¹⁸¹ where boys were injured by being tossed in the air by schoolmates. The decision recognizes that children have always indulged in rough and undisciplined play among themselves and probably always will; but the non-consenting child is rightly protected by the criminal law. The 'horseplay' exception seems to have been taken to extreme lengths in Aitken,¹⁸² where the 'robust games' of Royal Air Force officers at a celebration in the mess included setting fire to one another's fire-resistant clothing. Two such incidents apparently caused no harm but on a third occasion V sustained severe burns. It was held that a ruling that it was not open to the court-martial to find that the 'activities' were lawful was wrong. If V consented to them, or if D believed, reasonably or not, that V consented to them, it was open to the trial court to find that there was no offence.

The courts have emphasized that horseplay can only be relied upon where V is consenting or D genuinely believes that to be the case. In the case of A,¹⁸³ D dropped V, a non-swimmer, off a bridge into a river where V drowned. V had been fighting for this not to happen and was clearly not consenting, nor was it credible that D believed he was. D's conviction for manslaughter was upheld.

Surgery

Consent to a surgical operation¹⁸⁴ for a purpose recognized as valid by the law is effective.¹⁸⁵ This includes gender reassignment surgery¹⁸⁶ and, presumably, cosmetic surgery and organ transplants. Where an adult of full mental capacity refuses consent to medical treatment, a failure to respect that decision will render the doctor liable for criminal offences, even in circumstances in which the treatment will be life-preserving.¹⁸⁷

Body modification

Having one's hair cut is clearly lawful. Since cutting hair might amount to actual bodily harm, it is implicit that the law recognizes that consent to that activity will prevent liability: DPP v Smith.¹⁸⁸ Ritual¹⁸⁹ circumcision of males,¹⁹⁰ ear-piercing and tattooing of adults are generally assumed ¹⁸⁰ See LCCP 139. ¹⁸¹ [1987] Crim LR 123, CA.

¹⁸² [1992] 1 WLR 1006, at 1011 (C-MAC). ¹⁸³ [2005] All ER 38 (D).

¹⁸⁴ See LCCP 139, Part VIII.

¹⁸⁵ Stephen, Digest, art 310. See P Skegg, 'Medical Procedures and the Crime of Battery' [1974] Crim LR 693 and (1973) 36 MLR 370. It was held in BM [2018] EWCA Crim 560 that there is a clear difference between surgery and body modification. ¹⁸⁶ Corbett v Corbett [1971] P 83 at 99.

¹⁸⁷ St George's Healthcare NHS Trust v S [1998] 3 All ER 673. See also the discussion previously of the Mental Capacity Act 2005. ¹⁸⁸ [2006] EWHC 94 (Admin).

¹⁸⁹ ie that performed otherwise than for medical reasons. See further LCCP 139. See Brown [1994] 1 AC 212 and Re J [2000] 1 FCR 307, CA (Civ). Professor Feldman advised the Law Commission that non-therapeutic circumcision might be in breach of Art 3 of the ECHR, para 3.25; see further H Gilbert, 'Time to Reconsider the Lawfulness of Ritual Male Circumcision' [2007] EHRLR 279; PW Edge, 'Male Circumcision after the Human Rights Act' (1998) 5 J Civil Liberties 320, see also L Vickers, 'Circumcision—The Unkindest Cut of All?' (2000) 150 NLJ 1694.

¹⁹⁰ See the Female Genital Mutilation Act 2003. Amendments made by the Serious Crime Act 2015, ss 70–75 extend the extraterritorial effect of the offence. By s 72, a new s 3A creates an offence of failing to protect a girl from the risk of genital mutilation (punishable on indictment with up to seven years' imprisonment).

to be lawful.¹⁹¹ Presumably the same is true of more exotic body-piercing of adults, although the Court of Appeal has recently held that unlicensed activities such as tongue splitting and ear removal cannot be consented to. Lord Burnett CJ stated:¹⁹² we can see no good reason why body modification should be placed in a special category of exemption from the general rule that the consent of an individual to injury provides no defence to the person who inflicts that injury if the violence causes actual bodily harm or more serious injury. Even were the general rule to be revisited by Parliament or the Supreme Court and a different line drawn which allows consent to act as a defence to causing actual bodily harm and wounding, body modification causes really serious harm.

In Wilson,¹⁹³ D's branding of his initials on his wife's buttocks, at her request, in lieu of tattooing, was held to be equally lawful. The only distinction from *Donovan*¹⁹⁴ appears to be that Donovan's motive in caning V was sexual gratification whereas Wilson's was to bestow on his wife an adornment which she desired. Where the purpose of the act is one which the law condemns, consent may be no answer to the charge.¹⁹⁵ This is now the case with ear removal and tongue splitting, despite the fact the customer may desire such extreme body modification.

Coke tells us that in 1604, 'a young strong and lustie rogue, to make himself impotent, thereby to have the more colour to begge or to be relieved without putting himself to any labour, caused his companion to strike off his left hand' and that both of them were convicted of mayhem.¹⁹⁶ Maiming, even with consent, was unlawful because it deprived the king of a fighting man. In early Victorian times when soldiers, as part of their training drill, had to bite cartridges, a soldier got a dentist to pull out his front teeth to avoid the drill. Stephen J thought that both were guilty of a crime.¹⁹⁷ Denning LJ followed these instances in discussing, obiter, the legality of a sterilization operation.¹⁹⁸ His opinion (that the operation is unlawful if done only to enable the man to have the pleasure of intercourse without the responsibility) is no longer tenable,¹⁹⁹ but it illustrates the continuing and changing influence of public policy.

In circumstances where the body modification is for religious reasons, reliance on Art 9 of the ECHR guaranteeing respect for religious freedom would support the validity of consent. However, the courts have been unwilling to accommodate foreign cultural practices involving children, such as incision of cheeks.²⁰⁰ In view of the recognition that ritual male circumcision practised by Jews and Muslims is lawful, the law's approach appears incoherent.

Sadomasochism

Sadomasochism beyond that amounting to mere assault or battery is not an activity that can be consented to.²⁰¹ Public policy is also at the root of the decision in Brown. In the opinion of the majority, policy requires the conviction of men participating in consensual sado-masochistic encounters, resulting in actual bodily harm and wounding, to protect society against a cult of violence with the danger of the corruption and proselytization of young ¹⁹¹ On consent in relation to medical treatment and body modification, see T Elliott, 'Body Dismorphic Disorder, Radical Surgery and the Limits of Consent' (2009) 17 Med L Rev 149. See also See LCCP 139, Part IX.

¹⁹² BM [2018] EWCA Crim 560. See also Oversby (1990) unreported, cited in LCCP 139, para 9.7.

¹⁹³ [1996] Crim LR 573, CA.

¹⁹⁴ [1934] 2 KB 498.

¹⁹⁵ The court was also influenced by the fact that W was married to his victim, but this must be an irrelevance. If the criminal law governing consensual injury is applied differently to homosexuals and heterosexuals (or to men and women) or on the basis of marriage, this would almost certainly involve a violation of Arts 8 and 14 of the ECHR taken together.

¹⁹⁶ Co 1 Inst, 127a and b.

¹⁹⁷ Digest (3rd edn) 142.

¹⁹⁸ Bravery v Bravery [1954] 3 All ER 59 at 67, 68.

¹⁹⁹ The National Health Service (Family Planning) Amendment Act 1972 first authorized vasectomy services.

²⁰⁰ Adesanya (1974) The Times, 16 July. See S Poulter, 'Foreign Customs and the English Criminal Law' (1975) 24 ICLQ 136.

²⁰¹ See LCCP 139, Part X.

men and the potential for the infliction of serious injury: this notwithstanding that there was in fact no permanent injury, no infection and no evidence of medical attention being required.²⁰² The majority's reasoning that this was violence rather than sexual activity led to the conclusion that the activity should be unlawful.²⁰³

Public policy was invoked to justify conviction for a relatively slight degree of harm in Donovan.²⁰⁴ D, for his sexual gratification, beat a 17-year-old girl with a cane in circumstances of indecency. He was convicted of both indecent assault and common assault. The judge failed to direct the jury that the onus of negating consent was on the Crown, but the Court of Criminal Appeal held that, if the blows were likely or intended to cause bodily harm, this omission was immaterial because D was guilty whether V consented or not.²⁰⁵

In Brown, the whole House agreed that consent is a complete defence to the two offences—common and indecent assault—with which Donovan was charged. The Court of Criminal Appeal's opinion (that he could have been convicted of these offences because he was guilty of assault occasioning actual bodily harm, an offence with which he was not charged), was unacceptable in Brown to both Lord Lowry²⁰⁶ of the majority and Lord Mustill²⁰⁷ of the minority. Subsequent cases nevertheless seem to treat the dicta in Donovan as correct, but in light of the decision in Meachen discussed earlier, it is submitted that if D intended to inflict a battery, the consent he had to that level of harm should mean there is no criminal liability unless D intentionally or recklessly inflicted actual bodily harm.

The dicta in Donovan were distinguished in *Wilson*²⁰⁸ (wife's buttock branding) on the basis that Donovan was seeking sexual gratification, whereas Wilson was not—his conduct was like that of a professional tattooist who embellishes (intimate) parts at the request of their owner. In Laskey (a reference on the Brown case), the European Court distinguished Wilson because the injuries were not at all 'comparable in seriousness' with those in Brown even though they equally amounted to assault occasioning actual bodily harm.

The decision in Wilson was distinguished, and Brown followed, in a further case of sadomasochism: Emmett.²⁰⁹ D's conviction for recklessly occasioning actual bodily harm to V by, inter alia, setting fire to lighter fuel on her breasts with her consent, was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The court described the conduct as going 'beyond that which was established in Wilson'. But the charge was the same—assault occasioning actual bodily harm. Are the courts to start evaluating the validity of consent on the basis of some undeclared judicial barometer of the severity of harm? In Meachen and in Dica, Emmett appears to have been treated as a case of intentional infliction of actual bodily harm.

²⁰² The majority cited no empirical evidence to substantiate their claim that those who engage in consensual sadomasochistic cruelty are prone to have their inhibitions loosened and escalate their conduct to more harmful acts of cruelty. See J Tolmie, 'Consent to Harmful Assaults: The Case for Moving Away From Category Based Decision Making' [2012] Crim LR 656.

²⁰³ Peter Murphy argues that the real motivation for sadomasochistic acts is sexual gratification and therefore suggests it would be more appropriate to charge D with a sexual offence in such cases. See P Murphy, 'Flogging Live Complainants and Dead Horses: We May No Longer Need to Be in Bondage to Brown' [2011] Crim LR 758.

²⁰⁴ [1934] 2 KB 498. See L Leigh, 'Sado-Masochism, Consent and the Reform of the Criminal Law' (1976) 39 MLR 130.

²⁰⁵ The conviction was quashed because the question whether the blows were likely or intended to cause bodily harm was not put to the jury.

²⁰⁶ 'If the jury, properly directed, had found that consent was not disproved, they must have acquitted the appellant of the only charges brought against him' [1993] 2 All ER 75 at 97.

²⁰⁷ 'There is something amiss here' [1993] 2 All ER 75 at 112.

²⁰⁸ [1996] Crim LR 573.

²⁰⁹ (1999) The Times, 15 Oct.

Religious flagellation

In Brown, Lord Mustill accepted this as a recognized, though rarely practised, exception. The protection of religious freedoms under Art 9 of the ECHR would support such a conclusion.²¹⁰

The risk of sexually transmitted infection

The decision of the Court of Appeal in *Dica*²¹¹ is that an adult is entitled to give valid consent to the risk of being infected with a potentially lethal sexually transmitted disease such as HIV.²¹² The court distinguished between consensual acts of sexual intercourse where there might be a known risk to the health of one or other participants (consent valid) and those cases where participants were intent on spreading, or becoming infected with, disease (consent invalid). The court took the view that criminalization of consensual taking of risks would involve an ‘impracticability of enforcement’ and would undermine the general understanding of the community that sexual relationships were ‘pre-eminently private’. Such arguments had not persuaded the House of Lords in Brown, albeit that case involved intentional harm. Dica might be seen as against the trend of post-Brown cases that treat consent even to a risk of harm as invalid.²¹³ Many will find unconvincing the distinction in Dica between ‘sexual’ and ‘violent’ acts, with cases such as Emmett and Boyea treated as having ‘sexual overtones’ but being really concerned with ‘violent crime’. These cases must all be read carefully in light of Meachen. In Konzani,²¹⁴ the court confirmed that the consent will only be valid if V is informed of the risk of infection.

ECHR compatibility

The case of Brown was considered by the ECtHR in Laskey v UK,²¹⁵ with the Court unanimously holding that the prosecution, conviction and sentence did not contravene Art 8 of the ECHR.²¹⁶ It should be noted that the Court doubted whether the activities even fell within the protection of Art 8. On the assumption that they did, the Court concluded that the prosecution was necessary and proportionate to the legitimate aim of the protection of health (and possibly also the protection of morals). The Court recognized that the margin of appreciation provided national courts the scope to prescribe the level of physical harm to which the law should permit an adult to consent.

16.2.2 Lawful chastisement

It was always the common law rule that punishment was unlawful:²¹⁷

If it be administered for the gratification of passion or rage or if it be immoderate or excessive in its nature or degree, or if it be protracted beyond the child’s powers of endurance or with an instrument unfitted for the purpose and calculated to produce danger to life and limb...²¹⁸

²¹⁰ See LCCP 139, paras 10.2–10.7. However, note the conviction of Syed Mustafa Zaidi, a Shia Muslim, for child cruelty after he forced two boys (13 and 15) to whip themselves during a religious ritual using a handled implement with curved blades. See news reports for 28 Aug 2008.

²¹¹ [2004] EWCA 1103, [2004] Crim LR 944 and commentary.

²¹² For discussion of the potential criminalization of other types of infectious disease, see K Laird, ‘Criminalising Contagion—Questioning the Paradigm’ in H Quirk and C Stanton (eds), Criminalising Contagion: Legal and Ethical Challenges of Disease Transmission and the Criminal Law (2016).

²¹³ eg Emett (1999) The Times, 15 Oct but note BM [2018] EWCA Crim 560.

²¹⁴ [2005] EWCA Crim 706.

²¹⁵ (1997) 24 EHRR 39; L Moran, ‘Learning the Limits of Privacy’ (1998) 61 MLR 77. See also KA & AD v Belgium (App no 42758/98) 2005.

²¹⁶ LCCP 139, Part III.

²¹⁷ For a valuable discussion, see H Keating, ‘Protecting or Punishing Children: Physical Punishment, Human Rights and English Law Reform’ (2006) 26 LS 394.

²¹⁸ Hopley (1860) 2 F & F 202 at 206, per Cockburn CJ. Cf Smith [1985] Crim LR 42, CA.

In A v UK,²¹⁹ the rule of the common law entitling parents to inflict moderate and reasonable physical chastisement on their children was held to offend Art 3 of the ECHR, prohibiting torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In that case, a jury had acquitted a man who had caned his nine-year-old stepson. It was accepted that the law then needed reform but there was considerable disagreement as what form reform should take. The English courts continued to acknowledge the parental right to chastise: H.²²⁰ The judge had to give detailed directions to the jury to take account of the nature, context and duration of D's behaviour, the physical and mental effect on the child, the reasons for the punishment, and so on.

16.2.2.1 The Children Act 2004

Section 58 of the Children Act 2004 now provides:

- (1) In relation to any offence specified in subsection (2), battery of a child cannot be justified on the ground that it constituted reasonable punishment.
- (2) The offences referred to in subsection (1) are—
 - (a) an offence under section 18 or 20 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 (wounding and causing grievous bodily harm);
 - (b) an offence under section 47 of that Act (assault occasioning actual bodily harm); an offence under section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (cruelty to persons under 16).
- (3) Battery of a child causing actual bodily harm to the child cannot be justified in any civil proceedings on the ground that it constituted reasonable punishment.
- (4) For the purposes of subsection (3) 'actual bodily harm' has the same meaning as it has for the purposes of section 47 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861.

The effect is that reasonable and proportionate punishment amounting only to an assault or battery (that does not involve cruelty) is still protected by the defence of lawful chastisement. There is no longer a defence of lawful chastisement for punishment that involves a touching of the child and which constitutes the higher level of harm—actual bodily harm or cruelty.²²¹

Given the ambiguity of the boundary between assault and actual bodily harm, neither parents nor children have gained a clear position of their rights. Reliance on Art 9 of the ECHR by parents claiming a right to inflict corporal punishment as an aspect of their religion will not preclude prosecution.²²²

²¹⁹ [1998] TLR 578, (1999) 27 EHRR 611. See also Costello-Roberts v UK (1993) 19 EHRR 112 (seven-year-old slipped at public school); Y v UK (1992) 17 EHRR 238 (16-year-old caned at school). See generally B Phillips, 'The Case for Corporal Punishment in the UK—Beaten into Submission in Europe' (1994) 43 ICLQ 153.

²²⁰ [2002] 1 Cr App R 59. J Rogers, 'A Criminal Lawyer's Response to Chastisement in the European Court' [2002] Crim LR 98; for trenchant criticism of the present law, see C Barton, 'Hitting Your Children: Common Assault or Common Sense' [2008] Fam Law 65.

²²¹ A case may arise where, on the same facts, a charge under s 47 would be available but a prosecution for common assault would fail because of the defence.

²²² R (on the application of Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education and Employment [2002] EWCA Civ 1820. Confirmed in R (Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education [2005] UKHL 15. Baroness Hale's speech warrants close attention on these matters. See also Seven Individuals v Sweden (App no 8811/79) 29 DR 104, EComHR. The ECHR issues are discussed in Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, paras 18–19. See also the conviction of Syed Mustafa Zaidi for child cruelty after he forced two boys (13 and 15) to whip themselves during a religious ritual. See news reports for 28 Aug 2008.

The CPS reviewed a sample of cases where a child was assaulted by a parent or an adult acting in loco parentis after the coming into force of s 58 of the Children Act 2004. The report identified 12 cases where the reasonable chastisement defence was raised, which resulted in an acquittal or discontinuance. The report concluded that there is 'evidence to suggest that there have been cases where defendants charged with common assault have been acquitted or the case was discontinued, after running the reasonable chastisement defence. Of those cases, the file review suggests that it was possible that some defendants could have been charged differently.'²²³

16.2.2.2 Corporal punishment in schools

At common law, school teachers were in the same position as parents with regard to the conduct of the child at or on his way to or from school.²²⁴ Now, by s 548 of the Education Act 1996, a 'member of staff' of a school has no right, by virtue of his position as such, to administer corporal punishment to a child.²²⁵ 'Corporal punishment' does not include anything done for the purposes of averting an immediate danger of personal injury or damage to property (s 548(5)). Staff may use reasonable force to search a pupil for a prohibited item (ss 550ZA and 550ZB)²²⁶ or to restrain pupils who are violent or disruptive (s 93 of the Education and Inspections Act 2006).

16.2.3 Necessity

As noted in Ch 10, necessity may negate what would otherwise be an assault, as where D pushes V out of the path of a vehicle which is about to run him down. The fireman, the paramedic, the surgeon and nurse may all do things to a person rendered unconscious in an accident, or by sudden illness, which would ordinarily be battery (or, in the case of the surgeon, wounding or grievous bodily harm) if done without consent; but they commit no offence if they are only doing what is necessary to save life or ensure improvement, or prevent deterioration, in health.²²⁷

Perhaps this is based on the presumption that V would consent if he knew of the circumstances, a principle which excuses conduct in other parts of the criminal law.²²⁸ This is consistent with the view²²⁹ that intervention cannot be justified if it is against V's known wishes.

So it seems that a passerby who prevents V, an adult of mental capacity, from committing suicide by dragging him from the parapet of a bridge is guilty of battery.²³⁰

16.2.4 Self-help

The circumstances in which a person may use reasonable force to protect himself or his property are dealt with in Ch 10. The Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 regulates most such circumstances. *Burns*²³¹ dealt with a situation falling outside the scope of that ²²³ Reasonable Chastisement Research Report (2007), <http://dera.ioe.ac.uk/6886/10/chastisement.html>.

²²⁴ Cleary v Booth [1893] 1 QB 465; Newport (Salop) Justices [1929] 2 KB 416; Mansell v Griffin [1908] 1 KB 160.

²²⁵ As substituted by the School Standards and Framework Act 1998.

²²⁶ The powers in ss 550ZA and 550ZB apply only to schools in England. In Wales, members of staff may use reasonable force to search for weapons: s 550AA.

²²⁷ F v West Berkshire Health Authority [1990] 2 AC 1, [1989] 2 All ER 545 at 564, 566, HL, per Lord Goff.

²²⁸ eg the Theft Act 1968, ss 2(1)(b), 12(6), Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 5(2)(b).

²²⁹ F v West Berks, n 227, at 566, per Lord Goff.

²³⁰ cf Williams, TBCL, 616. Otherwise, perhaps, if V is in police custody: Kirkham v Chief Constable of the Greater Manchester Police [1990] 2 QB 283, CA.

²³¹ [2010] EWCA Crim 1023.

Act. B was not in danger or protecting himself, others or his property. B was convicted of causing actual bodily harm to a sex worker V. B had picked her up, agreed a price for sex and driven her to a secluded place. He then changed his mind about the sex act and asked her to get out of his car. She refused to get out until he drove her back to where they had met. He forcibly removed her, causing minor injury. The Court of Appeal, having referred to authority from the seventeenth century, dismissed B's argument that he was entitled to use force as V became a trespasser on his property when he asked her to leave and she refused. B had not acted in self-defence nor in defence of anyone else; he had not been defending his property against threat or risk of damage; he was not acting for any purpose within s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967. The defence was one of 'self-help'. That defence was always a last resort. It was a defence which the common law would be reluctant to extend. Lord Judge CJ added:

Recognising that to be lawful the use of force must always be reasonable in the circumstances, we accept that it might be open to the owner of a vehicle, in the last resort and when all reasonably practicable alternatives have failed, forcibly to remove an individual who has entered into his vehicle without permission and refuses to leave it. However, where that individual entered the car as a passenger, in effect at the invitation of the car owner, on the basis that they mutually understood that when their dealings were completed she would be driven back in the car from whence she had come, the use of force to remove her at the appellant's unilateral whim, was unlawful.

16.3 Assault occasioning actual bodily harm

By s 47 of the OAPA 1861, 'whosoever shall be convicted on indictment of any assault occasioning actual bodily harm shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than five years'.

16.3.1 Actus reus

16.3.1.1 Assault or battery

On its face, the section does not appear to create a separate offence but merely to provide a higher penalty for an assault at common law where actual bodily harm is occasioned, that is, caused. Consequently the offence was treated as a common law offence until the decision in Courtie,²³² and indeed for a period thereafter because it took some time for 'the penny to drop'. We now know that s 47 created a separate statutory offence²³³ or, more accurately, two offences, assault occasioning actual bodily harm and battery occasioning actual bodily harm. Confusion on this still persists. For example, Lord Ackner in *Savage*²³⁴ at one point describes the mens rea of the offence exclusively in terms of the battery and, at another, exclusively in terms of the assault. It is safe to assume that there are two offences and that their constituents, so far as the word 'assault' goes, are precisely the same as those of common assault and battery discussed previously. Most cases will involve battery, but not all. An assault occasioning actual bodily harm might be committed by words or gestures alone, without the need for any physical contact between the assailant and the body of the victim. D may cause V to apprehend immediate unlawful violence and V might injure himself in making reasonable escape attempts.

²³² [1984] AC 463, [1984] 1 All ER 740, HL, p 31.

²³³ Harrow Justices, ex p Osaseri [1986] QB 589 DC.

²³⁴ [1992] 1 AC 699, [1991] 4 All ER 698 at 707 and 711.

16.3.1.2 Occasioning

Once an assault or battery with appropriate mens rea is proved, it remains only to prove that it occasioned actual bodily harm. That is a question of causation²³⁵ not requiring proof of any further mens rea or fault. This was established in Roberts,²³⁶ where D in a moving car ‘assaulted’ V by trying to take off her coat (a battery), whereupon she jumped out and sustained injury. It was held that the only question was whether the ‘assault’ caused V’s action—only if it was something that no reasonable person could be expected to foresee would the chain of causation be broken.²³⁷ It is now firmly established that this is the law, after a remarkable series of cases had thrown the matter into doubt.²³⁸ In Savage and Parmenter, the House of Lords held that the law was correctly stated in Roberts.²³⁹

The offence may be committed in circumstances of omission where D has created a dangerous situation, as in the case of Santana-Bermudez v DPP.²⁴⁰

16.3.1.3 Bodily harm

‘Bodily harm’, according to the House of Lords in DPP v Smith,²⁴¹ ‘needs no explanation’. Since ‘Grievous means no more and no less than really serious’ it seems to follow that, under s 47, the harm need not be really serious. In Miller,²⁴² it was described as any hurt or injury calculated to interfere with the health or comfort of the victim. This is a very low threshold for an offence carrying a five-year maximum sentence in the Crown Court. It includes a temporary loss of consciousness.²⁴³ It would seem sufficient that the harm was more than merely transient and trifling.²⁴⁴ It can include the cutting of a substantial amount of hair.²⁴⁵ In DPP v Smith, the court held that having regard to the dictionary definitions, in ordinary language ‘harm’ was not limited to ‘injury’ and extended to ‘hurt’ or ‘damage’. ‘Bodily’, whether used as an adjective or adverb, was ‘concerned with the body’. It is settled law that evidence of external bodily injury, or a break in or bruise to the surface of the skin, is not required for there to be actual bodily harm. ‘Bodily’ encompasses all parts of the body including the victim’s organs, his nervous system and his brain. Physical pain consequent on an assault is not a necessary ingredient of the offence, otherwise there could be no conviction where V was unconscious. Bodily harm can occur whether the tissue is alive beneath the surface of the skin or dead tissue above the surface of the skin; thus, hair is an attribute and part of the human body. There is no need for the harm to be permanent: a bruise suffices. The fact that hair will regrow is irrelevant; cutting hair is bodily harm.

It has been held that actual bodily harm is not limited to physical injury. It includes psychiatric injury. This represents a significant judicial extension of the offence. Neurotic disorders are included because they affect the central nervous system of the body, but emotions ²³⁵ cf the view of J Gardner, ‘Rationality and the Rule of Law in Offences Against the Person’ (1994) 53 CLJ 502 at 509; J Gardner, Offences and Defences: Selected Essays in the Philosophy of Criminal Law (2007). See also J Stanton-Ife, ‘Horrific Crimes’ in RA Duff et al (eds), Boundaries of the Criminal Law (2010).

²³⁶ (1971) 56 Cr App R 95, [1972] Crim LR 27.

²³⁷ cf Williams and Davies (1991) 95 Cr App R 1.

²³⁸ In Spratt [1991] 2 All ER 210, the court, very properly overruling DPP v K [1990] 1 All ER 331, held that only Cunningham, not Caldwell, recklessness would suffice to establish the assault but then went on, not referring to Roberts, to hold there must be recklessness as to the occasioning of actual bodily harm. Savage [1991] 2 All ER 220, decided on the same day, applied the law as stated in Roberts but without reference to that case. In Parmenter [1991] 2 All ER 225, CA, the court, confronted with this conflict, preferred Spratt, again without reference to Roberts.

²³⁹ [1992] 1 AC 699, reversing Parmenter (CA) and overruling Spratt on this point.

²⁴⁰ [2003] Crim LR 471, discussed previously. ²⁴¹ [1961] AC 290 at 334.

²⁴² [1954] 2 QB 282. ²⁴³ T v DPP [2003] Crim LR 622. ²⁴⁴ ibid.

²⁴⁵ DPP v Smith [2006] EWHC 94 (Admin). Presumably the same is true if D damages V’s hair substantially by applying a permanent colouring.

such as fear and anxiety ('brain functions') are not. While physical injury is within the ordinary experience of a jury, psychiatric injury is not; so, if the prosecution wish to rely on it, they must call expert evidence to prove that the alleged condition amounts to psychiatric injury.²⁴⁶ Even where the victim can give evidence of physical and mental symptoms of psychiatric injury, expert evidence is necessary to prove causation.²⁴⁷ The Court of Appeal has declined to extend the scope of the offence: psychological injury, not amounting to an identified or recognized psychological condition, cannot amount to 'bodily harm'.²⁴⁸

The CPS Charging Standard recommends s 47 be charged for injuries which are 'serious'. In determining 'seriousness', relevant factors may include the fact that there has been significant medical intervention, or that permanent effects have resulted. Examples may include injuries requiring a number of stitches (but not superficial steri-strips) or a hospital procedure under anaesthetic. Psychological harm which involves 'more than mere emotions such as fear, distress or panic' may suffice for this offence.²⁴⁹

16.3.2 Mens rea

The only mens rea that needs to be proved is that necessary for the assault or battery.

The absence of any requirement that D intends or foresees the additional harm for which he is punished over and above an assault or battery demonstrates the lack of correspondence of actus reus and mens rea in the offence and the conflict with the general principles of subjectivism.²⁵⁰ This is a very clear example of a constructive crime.

16.4 Wounding and grievous bodily harm: OAPA 1861, s 20

Section 20 of the OAPA 1861 creates two forms of offence: wounding and inflicting grievous bodily harm. By s 20:

Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously wound or inflict any grievous bodily harm upon any other person, either with or without any weapon or instrument shall be guilty of [an offence triable either way] and being convicted thereof shall be liable to imprisonment for five years.

The two ways of committing the offence are: (a) malicious wounding, and (b) maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm.

The element of unlawfulness should not be overlooked and should always be drawn to the jury's attention.²⁵¹

²⁴⁶ Ireland [1998] AC 147, [1997] 4 All ER 225 at 230–233, HL, approving Chan-Fook [1994] 2 All ER 552, [1994] Crim LR 432. See also LCCP 217, Ch 5.

²⁴⁷ Morris [1998] 1 Cr App R 386.

²⁴⁸ Dhaliwal [2006] EWCA Crim 1139, [2006] 2 Cr App R 348.

²⁴⁹ (2005). See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/offences-against-person-incorporating-charging-standard#P189_14382.

²⁵⁰ Its constructive nature is defended on the basis that D has 'altered his normative position' towards V by choosing to assault V, and therefore must take the consequences of the further harm. See Gardner (1994) 53 CLJ 502; J Horder, 'A Critique of the Correspondence Principle in Criminal Law' [1995] Crim LR 759. Cf B Mitchell, 'In Defence of a Principle of Correspondence' [1999] Crim LR 195. See on this the important article by A Ashworth, 'A Change of Normative Position: Determining the Contours of Culpability in Criminal Law' [2008] 11 New Crim LR 232. See also I Hare, 'A Compelling Case for the Code' (1993) 56 MLR 74.

²⁵¹ Stokes [2003] EWCA Crim 2977. In Horwood [2012] EWCA Crim 253, Hooper LJ stated, 'The word there [ie unlawful] means and relates to an absence of lawful justification such as self-defence or a similar kind of defence' at [7].

16.4.1 Malicious wounding

16.4.1.1 To wound

In order to constitute a wound, the continuity of the whole skin must be broken.²⁵² Where a pellet fired by an air pistol hit V in the eye but caused only an internal rupturing of blood vessels and not a break in the skin, there was no wound.²⁵³ It is not enough that the cuticle or outer skin be broken if the inner skin remains intact.²⁵⁴ Where V was treated with such violence that his collarbone was broken, it was held that there was no wound if his skin was intact.²⁵⁵ It was held to be a wound, however, where the lining membrane of the urethra was ruptured and bled. Evidence was given that that membrane is precisely the same in character as the membrane lining the cheek and the external and internal skin of the lip.²⁵⁶ It is wrong to direct a jury that 'the surface of the skin' must be broken. On that direction a scratch would suffice which is clearly inadequate.²⁵⁷

Under a predecessor offence to s 20²⁵⁸ it was held that there was no wounding where V, in warding off D's attempt to cut his throat, struck his hands against a knife held by D and cut them;²⁵⁹ nor where V was knocked down by D and wounded by falling on iron trams.²⁶⁰ That old offence did not contain the words 'by any means whatsoever', and it is probable that these cases would now be decided differently. Even under the earlier law, D was guilty where he struck V on the hat with a gun and the hard rim of the hat caused a wound.²⁶¹ It is unclear whether there can be a wounding by omission. It was formerly held that wounding must be the result of a battery but it is probably now sufficient that the wound be directly inflicted whether by a battery or not.²⁶² In Marsh,²⁶³ D was convicted of wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm after his Staffordshire terrier attacked V and D failed to call the dog off. The judge directed the jury that they could not convict D unless he had 'set his dog on' V. The Court of Appeal rejected the argument that there was no act sufficient to constitute the actus reus of wounding, which lends weight to the proposition that this is an offence that can be committed indirectly.

It is doubtful whether this specific form of injury (or indeed others in the OAPA such as choking and throwing acid) warrants a separate offence in a modern code of offences. Some suggest that the specificity of label and the distinctions between the harms and the manner in which they are inflicted reflect important moral differences.²⁶⁴

16.4.1.2 Malice

The court in *Cunningham*²⁶⁵ quoted with approval the definition of recklessness in Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law: 'the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it'. According to that case, this definition applies whenever a statute defines a crime using the word 'malice'.

There is no doubt that malice in this context is a subjective test—Caldwell has no part to play, particularly since the decision of the House of Lords in G. It is submitted that the ²⁵² Moriarty v Brooks (1834) 6 C & P 684.

²⁵³ C (A Minor) v Eisenhower [1984] QB 331, 78 Cr App R 48, DC.

²⁵⁴ M'Loughlin (1838) 8 C & P 635. ²⁵⁵ Wood (1830) 1 Mood CC 278.

²⁵⁶ Walham (1849) 3 Cox CC 442. Contrast Jones (1849) 3 Cox CC 441.

²⁵⁷ Morris [2005] EWCA Crim 609. ²⁵⁸ 7 Will 4 & 1 Vic, c 85, s 4.

²⁵⁹ Beckett (1836) 1 Mood & R 526 (Parke B); Day (1845) 1 Cox CC 207. Cf Coleman (1920) 84 JP 112.

²⁶⁰ Spooner (1853) 6 Cox CC 392. ²⁶¹ Sheard (1837) 2 Mood CC 13.

²⁶² Wilson, p 696. Cf Taylor (1869) LR 1 CCR 194; Austin (1973) 58 Cr App R 163, CA.

²⁶³ [2012] EWCA Crim 1442.

²⁶⁴ See the illuminating account by Gardner (1994) 53 CLJ 502 and in J Gardner, Offences and Defences (2007) Ch 2.

²⁶⁵ [1957] 2 QB 396. The case is described more fully at p 102.

term 'malice' should be understood as meaning 'intentionally or recklessly' and 'reckless' should carry the definition used in G.²⁶⁶ In Brady,²⁶⁷ the Court of Appeal held that G does not require proof that D had foreseen 'an obvious and significant risk' in order to establish that he had acted recklessly. D was drunk when he climbed on railings at a nightclub and fell onto the dance floor below causing serious injuries to V. The court allowed the appeal, because the judge had failed to direct the jury as to recklessness in sufficiently clear and careful terms.

Although the definition of malice provided in Cunningham refers to D's foresight of a risk, there is no mention of the further element of the modern test of recklessness—that it is unjustifiable for D to take that risk known to him. There is no clear authority on whether malice includes that requirement under the 1861 Act. *Mowatt*²⁶⁸ and *Savage*²⁶⁹ involve discussion of intention or foresight, in accordance with Cunningham, but do not address the question whether it was justified to take the risk.²⁷⁰ The court in *Brady*²⁷¹ did not specifically discuss the point, but the approach taken seemed consistent with that rule. It is submitted that the test of malice should incorporate the G definition of recklessness in its full measure: D acts with malice if he intends or foresees a risk and takes that risk unjustifiably.

D must intend or be reckless, but what is 'the particular kind of harm' that must be intended or foreseen? As a matter of general principle, the answer might be expected to be that it is necessary that D has mens rea as to all the elements of the actus reus—including the wounding or grievous bodily harm.²⁷² The law has developed differently. The law is that it is enough that D foresaw that some bodily harm, not necessarily amounting to grievous bodily harm or wounding, might occur.²⁷³ Diplock LJ said in Mowatt:²⁷⁴

the word 'maliciously' does import upon the part of the person who unlawfully inflicts the wound or other grievous bodily harm an awareness that his act may have the consequence of causing some physical harm to some other person. That is what is meant by 'the particular kind of harm' in the citation from Professor Kenny.^[275] It is quite unnecessary that the accused should have foreseen that his unlawful act might cause physical harm of the gravity described in [s 20], ie, a wound or serious physical injury. It is enough that he should have foreseen that some physical harm to some person, albeit of a minor character, might result.

It is sufficient to prove that D foresaw that some harm might result and took the risk unjustifiably. To tell the jury that it must be proved that D foresaw that it would result is too generous to the defendant.²⁷⁶ It is not enough, however, whether the charge is one of wounding or inflicting grievous bodily harm²⁷⁷ that D intended to frighten (unless he foresaw that the fright might result in psychiatric injury).

²⁶⁶ See [1992] 1 AC 699. Savage and Parmenter [1991] 4 All ER at 721, HL, affirming Mowatt [1968] 1 QB 421.

²⁶⁷ [2006] EWCA Crim 2413. ²⁶⁸ [1968] 1 QB 421. ²⁶⁹ [1992] 1 AC 699, 750.

²⁷⁰ The leading speech in Savage describes the dissent in Caldwell v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1982] AC 341, which does refer to justification, but the final conclusion was based on Cunningham and does not adopt the dissent in Caldwell.

²⁷¹ [2006] EWCA Crim 2413, [2007] Crim LR 564. ²⁷² cf p 120. ²⁷³ See n 250.

²⁷⁴ [1968] 1 QB 421 at 426. Reiterated post-G in C [2007] EWCA Crim 1068. See also Dakou [2002] EWCA Crim 3156, oversimplifying the issue of malice in s 18. Courts continue to make errors with this—see eg DPP v W [2006] EWHC 92 (Admin), where magistrates had acquitted on the basis that D had not foreseen the level of harm V suffered.

²⁷⁵ Outlines, 211. The citation is the passage approved by the Court of Criminal Appeal in Cunningham [1957] 2 QB 396, [1957] 2 All ER 412; p 102.

²⁷⁶ Rushworth (1992) 95 Cr App R 252 at 255, cited in Pearson [1994] Crim LR 534 which nevertheless left this point in the air. Earlier dicta by Lords Diplock and Ackner are ambiguous.

²⁷⁷ Flack v Hunt (1979) 70 Cr App R 51; Sullivan [1981] Crim LR 46, CA.

16.4.2 Maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm

'Grievous bodily harm' was formerly interpreted to include any harm which seriously interferes with health or comfort;²⁷⁸ but, in Smith,²⁷⁹ the House of Lords said that the words should bear their ordinary and natural meaning.²⁸⁰ It is not always necessary for the jury to be told to look for 'really' serious harm,²⁸¹ and it is not clear precisely what that word means when it is included. The jury may take into consideration the totality of the injuries,²⁸² provided they have been inflicted in one attack or the charge accurately reflects the relevant period.²⁸³ Although the determination of whether the injury constitutes grievous bodily harm is to be assessed objectively, and not merely on the basis of the victim's perception,²⁸⁴ the characteristics of the victim may be taken into account—what is grievous bodily harm to a child might not be for an adult.²⁸⁵ There is no need for the injury to be permanent or life-threatening.²⁸⁶ Unconsciousness is capable of constituting grievous bodily harm.²⁸⁷

Grievous bodily harm may cover cases where there is no wounding as, for instance, the broken collarbone in Wood.²⁸⁸ Conversely, there might be a technical 'wounding' which could not be said to amount to grievous bodily harm—as with an injection by a needle.²⁸⁹ The absence of any clear definition of the term and the associated risk of inconsistent applications and a lack of predictability in verdicts is disappointing.²⁹⁰

It is settled that serious psychiatric injury amounts to grievous bodily harm.²⁹¹ This results in the possibility of convictions for inflicting grievous bodily harm by telephone—for example, a series of extreme obscene phone calls.²⁹² There is no legal difficulty with the actus reus—that is established simply by proving that D inflicted the serious psychiatric injury. Proof of mens rea in such a case may be more difficult. The Court of Appeal in Golding reiterated that 'the ambit of bodily harm is restricted to recognisable psychiatric illness and does not cover psychological disturbance'.²⁹³ The anguish V suffered as a result of learning that D had infected her with the genital herpes virus was therefore incapable of constituting grievous bodily harm.

Although the level of harm is ill-defined and rests on the jury's interpretation in each individual case, it has been held in Northern Ireland not to be contrary to Art 7 for want of certainty.²⁹⁴

²⁷⁸ Ashman (1858) 1 F & F 88.

²⁷⁹ [1961] AC 290; n 241; followed in Metharam [1961] 3 All ER 200.

²⁸⁰ The Court of Appeal confirmed in Golding [2014] EWCA Crim 889 that the assessment of harm done in an individual case is a matter for the jury, applying contemporary social standards. For criticism, see K Laird [2014] Crim LR 686.

²⁸¹ Janjua [1999] 1 Cr App R 91. This was reiterated more recently in Carey [2013] EWCA Crim 482.

²⁸² Grundy [1977] Crim LR 543; Birmingham [2002] EWCA Crim 2608.

²⁸³ See Brown [2005] EWCA Crim 359 (abuse of V over several days).

²⁸⁴ Brown [1998] Crim LR 484.

²⁸⁵ Bollom [2004] 2 Cr App R 50.

²⁸⁶ ibid.

²⁸⁷ Hicks [2007] EWCA Crim 1500—the issue being raised by the jury! See also Foster [2009] EWCA Crim 2214, [28] discussing the levels of unconsciousness and whether the 'Glasgow coma score' might assist in determining the severity of the unconsciousness in law.

²⁸⁸ See n 255. Lashley [2017] EWCA Crim 260 provides a vivid example, in which V was on the ground when D reversed over him with his car.

²⁸⁹ Although that is often charged under s 47. See eg Gower [2007] EWCA Crim 1655.

²⁹⁰ In Townsend [2013] EWCA Crim 771, D was convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm on the basis that he had fractured V's jawbone. It subsequently transpired, however, that V's jawbone was not in fact fractured and the Crown conceded that D's conviction therefore had to be quashed.

²⁹¹ Ireland, p 662.

²⁹² Gelder (1994) The Times, 25 May (news item).

²⁹³ [2014] EWCA Crim 889, [63] per Treacy LJ.

²⁹⁴ See Anderson [2003] NICA 12.

16.4.2.1 Inflict

In a series of cases²⁹⁵ from 1861 until 1983, it was held or assumed that the words 'inflict' and 'wound' both imply an 'assault'. D could be convicted of an offence under s 20 only if it was proved that he wounded or caused grievous bodily harm by committing an assault. *Clarence*²⁹⁶ held that D caused V harm by infecting her with gonorrhoea, but did not inflict it unless there was an assault. But a second line of cases²⁹⁷ simply ignored the requirement of an assault and upheld convictions where D so frightened V that V jumped through a window,²⁹⁸ or accidentally injured himself by putting his hand through a glass door under a 'well-grounded apprehension of violence'.²⁹⁹ In Martin,³⁰⁰ where, shortly before the end of a performance in a theatre, D put out the lights and placed an iron bar across the doorway, he was convicted of inflicting grievous bodily harm on those injured in the panic. In 1983 the House of Lords in *Wilson*³⁰¹ resolved the matter by deciding, following the Australian case of Salisbury,³⁰² that 'inflict' does not, after all, imply an assault.³⁰³

Arguably, the case decided no more than that; but Lord Roskill cited the opinion of the Australian court that 'inflict' has a narrower meaning than 'cause' (as used in s 18 discussed later) and requires 'force being violently applied to the body of the victim'. In Burstow,³⁰⁴ the House of Lords decided that 'inflict' does not bear this narrow meaning and that grievous bodily harm might be inflicted over the telephone or by other harassment, not involving the use of violence to the body or an assault. It remains necessary, as noted earlier, to prove that D foresaw that he might cause some harm, not necessarily serious psychiatric injury.

The distinction between 'cause' and 'inflict' seems then to have been substantially eliminated. The House thought that, while the words are not synonymous, there is 'no radical divergence' of meaning. Perhaps this is to be read to mean no 'material' difference.³⁰⁵ If the courts were interpreting a modern statute, the use of different words in adjacent sections might compel the conclusion that different meanings were intended; but no such inference can be drawn in the 1861 Act because it was never intended, and does not purport, to be a consistent whole.³⁰⁶ Clarence can no longer be justified on the ground that there was no assault or violent application of force or that V consented.³⁰⁷ It was not overruled but it

²⁹⁵ Yeadon and Birch (1861) 9 Cox CC 91; Taylor (1869) LR 1 CCR 194; Clarence (1888) 22 QBD 23; Snewing [1972] Crim LR 267; Carpenter (1979) 76 Cr App R 320n, cited [1983] 1 All ER 1004.

²⁹⁶ (1888) 22 QBD 23.

²⁹⁷ Halliday (1889) 61 LT 701; Lewis [1970] Crim LR 647, CA; Mackie [1973] Crim LR 54; Boswell [1973] Crim LR 307; Cartledge v Allen [1973] Crim LR 530, DC.

²⁹⁸ Halliday (1889) 61 LT 701.

²⁹⁹ Cartledge v Allen [1973] Crim LR 530.

³⁰⁰ (1881) 8 QBD 54, CCR.

³⁰¹ [1984] AC 242 at 260.

³⁰² [1976] VR 452 at 461.

³⁰³ The House nevertheless contrived to hold that a person charged under s 20 could be convicted on that indictment of a common assault by virtue of s 6(3) of the Criminal Law Act 1967—a much-criticized decision but approved by the House in Savage [1991] 4 All ER 698 at 711. See G Williams, 'Alternative Elements and Included Offences' (1984) 43 CLJ 290 and commentary at [1984] Crim LR 37.

³⁰⁴ Heard and decided together with Ireland [1998] AC 147. Arguably the case is restricted to those cases involving the infliction of psychiatric injury. This would create an undesirable confusion in the law.

³⁰⁵ Lord Hope, however, said that 'inflict' implies that the consequence of the act is something that the victim is likely to find unpleasant or harmful whereas 'cause' may embrace pleasure as well as pain. But, if that is so, the sadomasochists in Brown [1994] 1 AC 212, discussed earlier, could not have been held to have been guilty of inflicting grievous bodily harm, contrary to s 20, because everyone was having a jolly good time. This would be surprising, as they were guilty of wounding, contrary to the same subsection on the ground that consent was no defence.

³⁰⁶ CS Greaves, The Criminal Law Consolidation and Amendment Acts (2nd edn, 1862) 3–4, cited by Lord Steyn at 234.

³⁰⁷ cf p 673.

appears to have been wrongly decided.³⁰⁸ Following Dica, it now seems clear that as a matter of practice the terms can be treated as synonymous in almost every instance.³⁰⁹

In Brady, discussed earlier, the Court of Appeal questioned, obiter, whether it may be arguable that there was no actus reus, that is, no 'deliberate non-accidental conduct on the part of the accused that inflicted grievous bodily harm'. On D's account, he had deliberately perched precariously on a low railing above a crowded dance floor having consumed considerable quantities of alcohol and drugs. D argued that the act of falling was not deliberate and must, therefore, have been accidental; and that, since the actus reus of the offence contrary to s 20 required the inflicting of grievous bodily harm, the physical act of the falling that had caused the injury was not a direct assault. With respect, that argument is difficult to follow. There is no doubt that V suffered grievous bodily harm as she was rendered paraplegic. There is also no doubt that that injury was inflicted by D. The question is whether it was inflicted by D's blameworthy conduct. If the jury were satisfied that D realized that in perching as he did there was a risk of his falling and causing some injury to a person below, and that he went on unreasonably to take that risk, it is submitted that he would have committed the s 20 offence. Although the act of perching may look innocuous viewed in isolation, that is not the actus reus of the offence: the actus reus is D's whole conduct in perching and the resulting harm to the victim on the dance floor. The incident of D losing his balance and falling does not represent a break in the chain of causation; it is the very incident about which D was alleged to have been reckless/malicious. His reckless conduct in perching as he did caused the loss of balance which caused the fall and the resulting injury.³¹⁰

16.4.2.2 Coexistence of s 20 and s 47

The coexistence of s 47 with that of maliciously inflicting grievous bodily harm contrary to s 20 of the same Act, also punishable with a maximum of five years' imprisonment, makes little sense.³¹¹ The prosecutor's task is slightly easier under s 47 since it is not necessary to prove even the foresight of some bodily harm which is necessary under s 20. Proof of an assault or battery is required under s 47, but is not necessary under s 20; and s 20 no longer requires proof of a direct application of force. Section 20 is regarded in practice as the more serious offence. In Parmenter,³¹² the Court of Appeal said that:

although the sentences imposed in practice for the worst s 47 offences will overlap those imposed at the lower end of s 20, nobody could doubt that the two offences are seen in quite different terms, whether by defendants and their advisers contemplating pleas of guilty, or by judges passing sentence under s 47 on defendants whose pleas of guilty have been accepted by the prosecution, or by subsequent sentencers casting an eye down lists of previous convictions.

This is reflected in the CPS Charging Standard which recommends s 20 in cases of really serious harm such as: injury resulting in permanent disability or permanent, loss of sensory function or visible disfigurement; broken or displaced limbs or bones, including a fractured skull; compound fractures, broken cheek bone, jaw, ribs, etc; injuries which cause ³⁰⁸ The draft Bill in the Home Office Consultation Paper of Feb 1998 expressly excludes from the proposed offences recklessly (but not intentionally) causing anything by disease. See now Dica [2004] EWCA Crim 1103, p 673. See also LCCP 217, Ch 6 and LC 361 Ch 4.

³⁰⁹ The High Court of Australia in Aubrey v The Queen [2017] HCA 18 arrived at the same conclusion in respect of the equivalent legislation in New South Wales.

³¹⁰ Part of the problem in the court's analysis is that the events are all categorized as either deliberate or accidental. It is unclear what is meant by this, but it stems from the unsatisfactory way in which the case was presented.

³¹¹ cf the view of Gardner (1994) 53 CLJ 502, and Ashworth, n 250.

³¹² [1991] 2 All ER 225 at 233.

substantial loss of blood, usually necessitating a transfusion; injuries resulting in lengthy treatment or incapacity; serious psychiatric injury.³¹³

16.5 Section 18 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861

By s 18, as amended by the Criminal Law Act 1967:

Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously by any means whatsoever wound or cause any grievous bodily harm to any person with intent to do some grievous bodily harm to any person or with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person, shall be guilty of [an offence triable only on indictment], and being convicted thereof shall be liable to [imprisonment] for life.

The elements of the actus reus have been considered previously in relation to s 20. Note that under s 18 there is, technically, no need for the harm to be caused to another.

16.5.1 Mens rea

The mens rea of the offence differs slightly depending on which form of the offence is charged.

16.5.1.1 Intention

In every case the Crown must establish an ulterior intent which may be either intent to do grievous bodily harm or intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of any person. Recklessness is not enough.³¹⁴ Where the allegation is of intentionally causing grievous bodily harm, it is sufficient that D intended to cause the harm he did, irrespective of whether he personally would regard that level of harm as really serious. As noted earlier in the context of s 20, proving an intention to cause psychiatric injury may be very difficult.

Intention has the same meaning as in the law of murder.³¹⁵ The prosecution must prove either: (a) that D acted in order to cause grievous bodily harm, or, if it was not his purpose, (b) that he knew that grievous bodily harm was a virtually certain consequence of his act. In case (b), the jury may then find that he had the requisite intent.³¹⁶ The jury need not be directed on this oblique intention definition except in rare cases.³¹⁷

If D intends to cause grievous bodily harm to X and, striking at X, he accidentally wounds another person, V, he may be indicted for wounding V with intent to cause grievous bodily harm to X.³¹⁸ If D intends to cause grievous bodily harm to X, and strikes the person he aims at, who is in fact V, he may be convicted of wounding V with intent to cause grievous bodily harm to V.³¹⁹ In addition, if D intends to kill X, for example by shooting him, but misses and instead causes really serious harm to V, D can be guilty of an offence contrary ³¹³ See CPS Charging Standard, www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/offences-against-person-incorporating-charging-standard#P189_14382.

³¹⁴ Re Knight's Appeal (1968) FLR 81.

³¹⁵ Bryson [1985] Crim LR 669; cf Belfon [1976] 3 All ER 46, CA.

³¹⁶ See p 90.

³¹⁷ See Phillips [2004] EWCA Crim 112.

³¹⁸ Monger [1973] Crim LR 301, per Mocatta J holding that D could not be convicted where the indictment alleged intent to harm V. This is in accord with Ryan (1839) 2 Mood & R 213 and Hewlett (1858) 1 F & F 91 but contrary to Hunt (1825) 1 Mood CC 93 and Jarvis, Langdon and Stear (1837) 2 Mood & R 40. Cf the doctrine of transferred malice, p 122 and the comment on Monger in [1973] Crim LR 301.

³¹⁹ Smith (1855) Dears CC 559 at 560; Stopford (1870) 11 Cox CC 643.

to s 18 for the harm caused to V. Additionally, the Court of Appeal in *Grant*³²⁰ accepted the proposition that an intention to kill necessarily includes an intention to cause grievous bodily harm. The argument that the two are mutually exclusive or inconsistent was rejected.

Where the indictment specifies a particular form of the offence, the intent prescribed in that form of the offence must be proved; it is not enough to prove another variety of intent described in the section.³²¹ So D had to be acquitted where the charge was intent to do some grievous bodily harm and the jury found that the acts were done to resist and prevent D's apprehension and for no other purpose.³²² But if D intends to prevent his apprehension and, in order to do so, intends to cause grievous bodily harm, he may be convicted under an indictment charging only the latter intent. It is immaterial which is the principal and which the subordinate intent.³²³

The courts continue to create difficulties with the form of the mens rea. In Taylor,³²⁴ the judge had directed that the jury on a s 18 charge must be sure that the prosecution had proved that D had intended to cause grievous bodily harm or to wound. This was a misdirection to the jury.

An intent to wound is insufficient. There must be an intent to cause really serious bodily injury.³²⁵

There was no evidence, upon which the jury could have relied, to show that D had intended really serious injury. The conviction was quashed and was replaced with a conviction for unlawful wounding. In Purcell,³²⁶ the Court of Appeal suggested that at a trial of a person charged with causing grievous bodily harm the following direction should be given to the jury on the issue of intent:

You must feel sure that the defendant intended to cause serious bodily harm to the victim. You can only decide what his intention was by considering all the relevant circumstances and in particular what he did and what he said about it.

16.5.1.2 Malice

The meaning of malice has been considered earlier in relation to s 20.

Where, under s 18, the charge is of causing grievous bodily harm with intent to do grievous bodily harm, the word 'maliciously' obviously has no part to play. Any mens rea which it might import is comprehended within the ulterior intent. Even if 'wounding' is not foreseen, it is 'malicious'. The Court of Appeal has emphasized that generally judges ought not to give a direction on malice under s 18 in these cases.³²⁷

Where the charge is of malicious wounding or causing grievous bodily harm with intent to resist lawful apprehension, there is no difficulty in giving meaning to 'maliciously' and it is submitted that meaning should be given to that word.³²⁸ A mere intent to resist lawful apprehension should not found liability for a charge of wounding or causing grievous bodily ³²⁰ [2014] EWCA Crim 143. The court declined to consider the issue of whether D could be guilty of two or more attempted murders for a single act by which he intended to kill only one person. For criticism, see T Storey (2014) 78 J Crim L 214.

³²¹ There are numerous forms of the s 18 offence other than that commonly relied upon—grievous bodily harm with intent to do grievous bodily harm—wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm; causing grievous bodily harm with intent to do grievous bodily harm; wounding with intent to resist or prevent apprehension or detention; causing grievous bodily harm with intent to resist or prevent apprehension or detention.

³²² Duffin and Marshall (1818) Russ & Ry 365; cf Boyce (1824) 1 Mood CC 29.

³²³ Gillow (1825) 1 Mood CC 85.

³²⁴ [2009] EWCA Crim 544. See also Gregory [2009] EWCA Crim 1374. ³²⁵ ibid, [3].

³²⁶ (1986) 83 Cr App R 45, CA. ³²⁷ See Brown [2005] EWCA Crim 359, [17].

³²⁸ Morrison (1989) 89 Cr App R 17. D was seized by a WPC as she was arresting him. D dived through a window pane and the WPC was dragged with him suffering serious facial injury. D clearly intended to resist arrest, the Court of Appeal held he must also be subjectively (Cunningham) reckless as to the grievous bodily harm.

harm. It is submitted that the Court of Appeal went too far in *Mowatt*³²⁹ in saying that ‘In section 18 the word “maliciously” adds nothing.’

The indictment should spell out the alleged mens rea.³³⁰ It is clear that there must be proof that D actually foresaw the specified result. Any doubt there may have been about this was dispelled by s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967.³³¹ Mowatt was decided before the Act came into force, and certain observations in the case are therefore suspect.

If D has not admitted his malice, then it is submitted that it must be proved like every other element in the crime. The fact that the evidence appears to the judge to be overwhelming is not a good reason for not leaving it to the jury.

16.5.2 Alternative verdicts

A charge of ‘causing’ grievous bodily harm with intent contrary to s 18 has been held to include a charge of ‘inflicting’ grievous bodily harm contrary to s 20³³² which, in turn, includes a charge of assault occasioning actual bodily harm contrary to s 47.³³³ The effect is that, on an indictment for the s 18 offence, the jury may find D guilty of an offence under s 20, or under s 47; and, on an indictment for the s 20 offence, of an offence under s 47. Whether to direct the jury that if they acquit of the offence charged they may convict of a lesser included offence is a matter for the discretion of the judge. Following Coutts,³³⁴ if the possibility that D is guilty only of a lesser offence (s 20 or s 47) has been raised in the course of the evidence, the judge should leave the alternative offence to the jury, even in cases in which neither prosecution nor defence want the alternative offence to be left to the jury.³³⁵ The Court of Appeal has reiterated the importance of this.³³⁶

In Lahaye,³³⁷ the Court of Appeal’s per curiam recommendation seems to have been that a s 20 offence ought to be included in the indictment from the outset in any s 18 case, and this goes beyond what was suggested by the House of Lords (Lords Mackay, Goff and Mustill) in Mandair,³³⁸ namely that it may be desirable to include as an alternative where appropriate. Automatic inclusion of a s 20 count reduces the prosecution’s freedom to select their indictment of choice, and increases the risk of compromise verdicts but it seems that such verdicts are already the practical reality. Beatson LJ’s suggestion is, it is submitted, a sensible approach:

It is, on the authorities, the ultimate responsibility of the trial judge to leave an alternative verdict which is obviously raised by the evidence to the jury. While there is no universal rule about ³²⁹ [1968] 1 QB 421. See R Buxton, ‘Negligence and Constructive Crime’ [1969] Crim LR 112. See also Ward (1872) LR 1 CCR 356.

³³⁰ Hodgson [2008] EWCA Crim 895. ³³¹ See p 131.

³³² Mandair (1994) 99 Cr App R 250, [1994] Crim LR 666, HL.

³³³ Wilson [1984] AC 242, [1984] Crim LR 36, HL. ³³⁴ [2006] 1 WLR 2154.

³³⁵ See Ali [2006] EWCA Crim 2906; cf Foster [2007] EWCA Crim 2869.

³³⁶ Foster [2009] EWCA Crim 2214; Green [2009] EWCA Crim 2609; Mathew [2010] EWCA Crim 29; Hodson [2009] EWCA Crim 1590, [2010] Crim LR 249 and commentary. If s 20 is a realistically available verdict on the evidence, as an interpretation properly open to the jury, without trivializing the offending conduct, then the alternative should be left to the jury. The court emphasizes that it is particularly important that an alternative verdict was left to a jury where the offence charged required proof of a specific intent (s 18) and the alternative offence (s 20) did not. In Caven [2011] EWCA Crim 3239, the failure to leave the alternative offence resulted in D’s conviction for an offence contrary to s 18 being quashed. In Brown [2014] All ER (D) 176 (Oct), D was charged with an offence of wounding with intent. Expert witnesses, however, agreed that no more than mild to moderate force would have been required to inflict the wound in question, which could easily have been sustained during a struggle, rather than as a result of a deliberate stabbing action. The jury should thus have been invited to consider the unlawful wounding option, but this was not done, so D’s conviction for wounding with intent was quashed as unsafe and a conviction for the lesser offence was substituted.

³³⁷ [2005] EWCA Crim 2847. See also Hodson [2010] Crim LR 248, CA; Brown [2014] All ER (D) 176 (Oct).

³³⁸ [1995] AC 208.

including a section 20 count in the indictment where there is an allegation of a section 18 offence, the decision of this court in Lahaye states that such a count should normally be included.³³⁹

Research has suggested that the moral distinction between the s 18 and s 20 offences has been eroded by the availability of the alternative verdicts and the frequency with which they are returned. In one study, only 23 per cent of those indicted for s 18 were convicted of that offence, whilst 53 per cent were convicted of s 20 and only one in ten of the contested s 18 trials led to an outright acquittal.³⁴⁰

16.6 Reform

The case for reform of these offences against the person (assault, battery, s 47, s 20, s 18) is compelling.³⁴¹ The Law Commission has commented that the law is 'defective on grounds both of effectiveness and of justice'.³⁴² In 2014 the Commission³⁴³ published a scoping consultation paper in which it sought to assess the strength of the case for reform and in particular whether any future reform should be based on the draft Bill from the Home Office, *Consultation Paper on Violence*³⁴⁴ in 1998. That Bill proposed a structured hierarchy of offences as follows:

- 1.—(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he intentionally causes serious injury to another.
- (2) A person is guilty of an offence if he omits to do an act which he has a duty to do at common law, the omission results in serious injury to another, and he intends the omission to have that result...
- (4) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life.
- 2.—(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he recklessly causes serious injury to another . . .
- (3) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—
 - (a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 7 years;
 - (b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.
- 3.—(1) A person is guilty of an offence if he intentionally or recklessly causes injury to another . . .
- (3) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable—
 - (a) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years;
 - (b) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both.
- 4.—(1) A person is guilty of an offence if—
 - (a) he intentionally or recklessly applies force to or causes an impact on the body of another, or
 - (b) he intentionally or recklessly causes the other to believe that any such force or impact is imminent.

³³⁹ Vaughan [2014] EWCA Crim 1456, [22].

³⁴⁰ E Genders, 'Reform of the Offences Against the Person Act: Lessons from the Law in Action' [1999] Crim LR 689. See also LCCP 217, Ch 5.

³⁴¹ M Jefferson, 'Offences Against the Person: Into the 21st Century' (2012) 76 J Crim L 472; Genders [1999] Crim LR 689.

³⁴² LCCP 122, Legislating the Criminal Code: Offences Against the Person and General Principles (1992), on which see S Gardner, 'Reiterating the Criminal Code' (1992) 55 MLR 839; ATH Smith, 'Legislating the Criminal Code' [1992] Crim LR 396. See also LC 218, Offences Against the Person and General Principles (1993).

³⁴³ LCCP 217.

³⁴⁴ (1998) on which see JC Smith, 'Offences Against The Person: The Home Office Consultation Paper' [1998] Crim LR 317.

- (2) No such offence is committed if the force or impact, not being intended or likely to cause injury, is in the circumstances such as is generally acceptable in the ordinary conduct of daily life and the defendant does not know or believe that it is in fact unacceptable to the other person.
- (3) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or [an unlimited fine] or both.

15.—(1) In this Act ‘injury’ means—

- (a) physical injury, or
 - (b) mental injury.
- (2) Physical injury does not include anything caused by disease but (subject to that) it includes pain, unconsciousness and any other impairment of a person’s physical condition.
 - (3) Mental injury does not include anything caused by disease but (subject to that) it includes any impairment of a person’s mental health.
 - [(4) In its application to section 1 this section applies without the exceptions relating to things caused by disease.] (The Law Commission recommended removing this clause.)

In 2015, the Law Commission published a scoping report, in which it recommended that future reform should be based upon the draft Home Office Bill.³⁴⁵ The consequence of this is that the main injury offences would follow the correspondence principle, in which the harm required to be intended or foreseen matches the harm done. The Commission also recommended the creation of a new offence of ‘aggravated assault’, that would sit between the offence of intentionally or recklessly causing harm and the basic assault offences. It would be triable only in the magistrates’ court.

16.7 Racially or religiously aggravated assaults

The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 created a new category of racially aggravated crimes, and the Anti-terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 extended these to include religiously aggravated offences.³⁴⁶ There has been a growing concern at the rise in violent hate crime.³⁴⁷

It is possible for a judge when sentencing to take into account hostility on grounds of race, religion, sexual orientation, gender identity or disability.³⁴⁸ Some questioned, ³⁴⁵ LC 361. For commentary, see S Demetriou, ‘Not Giving Up the Fight: A Review of the Law Commission’s Scoping Report on Non-Fatal Offences Against the Person’ (2016) J Crim L 188; A Jackson and T Storey, ‘Reforming Offences Against the Person: In Defence of “Moderate” Constructivism’ (2015) 79 J Crim L 437; V Scully, ‘Reforming Offences Against the Person—Seventh Time Lucky?’ [2015] 10 Arch Rev 4.

³⁴⁶ See generally M Malik, ‘Racist Crime: Racially Aggravated Offences in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998’ (1999) 62 MLR 409; M Idriss, ‘Religion and the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001’ [2002] Crim LR 890; A Tomkins, ‘Legislating Against Terror: The Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001’ [2002] PL 205; PW Edge, ‘Extending Hate Crime to Religion’ (2003) 10 J Civ Lib 5; E Burney, ‘Using the Law of Racially Aggravated Offences’ [2003] Crim LR 28; and LCCP 213, Hate Crime: The Case for Extending the Existing Offences (2013) and LC 348, Hate Crime: Should the Current Offences be Extended (2014). For a theoretical discussion, see J Waldron, The Harm in Hate Speech (2012).

³⁴⁷ See T Fowles and D Wilson, ‘Racist and Religious Crime Data’ (2004) 43 Howard J of Crim Justice 441. See also CPS, www.cps.gov.uk/news/south-east-conviction-rates-hate-crime-amongst-highest-country. In 2016/17, there were 80,393 offences recorded by the police in which one or more hate crime strands were deemed to be a motivating factor. This was an increase of 29 per cent compared with the 62,518 hate crimes recorded in 2015/16, the largest percentage increase seen since the statistical count began in 2011/12: A O’Neill, CPS Statistical Bulletin, Hate Crime, England and Wales 2016/17 (2017).

³⁴⁸ It has been held that where D pleads to a non-aggravated form of the offence and no evidence is offered on the racially aggravated form of the offence, the judge cannot then sentence on the basis that the offence was racially aggravated: McGillivray [2005] Crim LR 484, CA. See LC 348, paras 2.65 et seq.

therefore, whether it was necessary to create offences applicable where certain categories of base offence (including many offences of violence) are committed with racial or religious hostility.

In a clear statement the House of Lords unequivocally supported such offences. Baroness Hale opined that they properly reflect the ‘qualitatively distinct order of gravity’ involved when racial hostility is demonstrated.³⁴⁹ In addition, establishing separate offences rather than leaving matters of racial aggravation purely for sentencing means that the jury must be satisfied of that distinctive stigmatizing aspect of the alleged wrongdoing.

16.7.1 The offences

Section 28(1) of the Crime and Disorder Act provides two forms which the racial and religious aggravation can take. The difference between the two is extremely important but unfortunately appears to be frequently overlooked.³⁵⁰

Offences involving a demonstration of hostility. Section 28(1)(a) applies where at the time of³⁵¹ committing the relevant offence (assault, s 47, s 20, public order offences, harassment, etc) or immediately³⁵² before or after doing so, the offender demonstrates towards the victim³⁵³ of the offence racial or religious hostility based on the victim’s membership of a racial or religious group. The question is whether, objectively, D’s words or conduct demonstrate hostility based on race or religion. D’s motivation is not relevant.

Offences motivated by hostility. Section 28(1)(b) applies where the relevant offence is motivated wholly or partly by hostility towards members of a racial or religious group based on their membership of that group. This is a subjective question. D’s motivation for the use of the words or conduct is crucial in determining whether it was racially or religiously hostile.

There are numerous offences (some public order offences, harassment, criminal damage, etc) that can be aggravated in either of these ways (by demonstrations of hostility or motivated by hostility) but for the purposes of this part of this chapter, the relevant offences are contained in s 29. A person commits an offence under s 29 if he commits:

- (1) an offence under s 20³⁵⁴ of the OAPA 1861 (malicious wounding or grievous bodily harm); or
- (2) an offence under s 47 of that Act (p 686); or
- (3) a common assault;

which is ‘racially aggravated’ for the purposes of s 29.

³⁴⁹ See note I Hare, ‘Legislating Against Hate—The Legal Response to Bias Crimes’ (1997) 17 OJLS 415 at 416–417.

³⁵⁰ See Jones v Bedford and Mid Bedfordshire Magistrates’ Court [2010] EWHC 523 (Admin). See LC 348, Ch 2.

³⁵¹ Where D uttered racist words and then attacked V several minutes later, the Court of Appeal regarded the incident as properly viewed as one in which D’s racial hostility was present throughout: Babbs [2007] EWCA Crim 2737.

³⁵² This qualifies both acts before and after—a 20-minute delay after the act before D made the racist remark demonstrating hostility was too long: Parry v DPP [2004] EWHC 3112 (Admin).

³⁵³ Who need not be present: Parry v DPP [2004] EWHC 3112 (Admin). In Valentine [2017] EWCA Crim 207, the Court of Appeal held that the trial judge had erred in presenting the child to the jury as the victim in his summing up, as it was the mother who had presented evidence of distress. The charge had therefore lacked accuracy.

³⁵⁴ There is no need for aggravation for s 18 which carries the maximum life sentence.

Offences (1) and (2) are punishable on indictment with seven years' imprisonment (compared with five years for the basic, non-aggravated offence) and offence (3) with two years, the basic offence being triable only summarily.

16.7.2 Definitions

'Race' is widely defined to include colour, nationality (including citizenship) or ethnic or national origins.³⁵⁵ The courts have taken an extremely wide and non-technical view of what constitutes a 'race' and racial group. It has been confirmed that the terms will be satisfied by non-inclusive expressions if, for example, D demonstrates hostility to V by calling him 'non-white' or 'foreign'.³⁵⁶ 'Religious group' means a group of persons defined by reference to religious belief or lack of religious belief.³⁵⁷ The Act gives no further guidance. Given the broad interpretation in Art 9 of the ECHR, it would seem likely that the domestic courts will interpret the offence as affording protection to a religion as widely understood.³⁵⁸ By analogy with the interpretation of race, non-inclusive terms will suffice, for example 'unbeliever' or 'gentile'.³⁵⁹

Racial or religious hostility can be demonstrated by D towards someone of his own racial or religious group.³⁶⁰ Note also that there is no need for D's presumption about V's race or religion to be accurate: as where D calls V a 'Paki' when V is from India. In Rogers,³⁶¹ the House of Lords confirmed that though D must have formed the view about V's racial group, the words used by D and which are alleged to demonstrate racial hostility need not refer expressly to that group to which V belongs. A racially aggravated assault might also be committed by one white person on another if the former were, for example, to call the latter 'nigger lover'.³⁶² It is submitted that this is a perfectly appropriate interpretation of the Act. There is no need for the aggravating words to be repeated, or for the intended target to hear them or be present.³⁶³

16.7.2.1 Assault and contemporaneous demonstration of hostility: s 28(1)(a)

The courts have made clear that the offence under s 28(1)(a) is not limited to cases in which D is motivated solely or even mainly by racial malevolence. It is designed to extend to cases which may have a racially neutral gravamen but in the course of which there is, objectively viewed, hostility demonstrated towards the victim based on V's race (or presumed ³⁵⁵ 'African' does not denote an ethnic, but does denote a racial, group: White [2001] Crim LR 576, but see commentary on difficulties this creates. Applying the House of Lords' approach in Rogers, both terms are capable of being construed as demonstrations of hostility based on the victim's membership of a racial group. For further analysis see MA Walters, 'Conceptualizing "Hostility" for Hate Crime Law: Minding "the Minutiae"' when Interpreting Section 28(1)(a) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998' (2014) 34 OJLS 47.

³⁵⁶ Rogers [2007] UKHL 8. See also DPP v M [2004] EWHC 1453 (Admin), [2005] Crim LR 392; A-G's Reference (No 4 of 2004) [2005] EWCA Crim 889; H [2010] EWCA Crim 1931 (question for jury whether D's repeated references to V as a 'monkey' or 'black monkey' constituted a demonstration of hostility based wholly or partly on race or whether it was mere vulgar abuse unconnected with hostility based on race).

³⁵⁷ In Hewlett [2016] EWCA Crim 673, the Court of Appeal held that Romany gypsies were capable of being recognized as a racial group. D's reference to his neighbour as a 'pikey' was capable of being seen as a pejorative reference to Romany gypsies, which meant that he had committed the offence.

³⁵⁸ See Pendragon v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 179.

³⁵⁹ DPP v M [2004] EWHC 1453 (Admin), [2005] Crim LR 392.

³⁶⁰ White [2001] Crim LR 576, CA. ³⁶¹ [2007] UKHL 8.

³⁶² DPP v Pal [2000] Crim LR 756 per Simon Brown LJ. Cf Johnson v DPP [2008] EWHC 509 (Admin).

³⁶³ Dykes v DPP [2008] EWHC 2775 (Admin).

membership of that race).³⁶⁴ So, for example, the offence applies where other bases for hostility exist—because V has, for example, taken D's car parking space, etc. In relation to s 28(1)(a), it has been held that no subjective intent needs to be proved. It is not a question of D intending to express hostility; the test is objective and the Crown merely has to show the hostile behaviour.³⁶⁵ As a matter of statutory interpretation, the key term in the section is that the hostility is 'based on' V's race. By contrast, under s 28(1)(b) the motivation behind the behaviour has to be proved—that is a requirement expressed in the section.³⁶⁶

The parliamentary debates show that this broad interpretation of s 28(1)(a) was intended, since it was felt that proving a sole racial motive for the offence would be too difficult a task for the prosecution.³⁶⁷ In consequence, s 28(1)(a) is extremely broad. Lord Monson in the debates on the Bill described the section as Orwellian in that it seeks to police people's emotions.³⁶⁸ At present, only insults relating to religion and race are criminalized in this way. This highlights the arbitrariness of the legislation. In terms of broader social objectives of the legislation, the section may be regarded as a success if it deters individuals from using racist language in any context. Whether this will be the effect or whether those convicted will bear such resentment at the stigma as to become hardened in their racist attitudes is debatable.³⁶⁹

16.7.2.2 Racially/religiously motivated assaults: s 28(1)(b)

The s 28(1)(b) offence is much narrower and less controversial, being focused on the defendant's state of mind and one of his motivations for the crime being one of racial or religious hostility, although not necessarily against the victim in person. It provides an interesting example of an offence in which the motivations rather than intentions of the defendant become crucial in substantive criminal law, and not merely as a matter of evidence.

There must be evidence of racial or religious motivation for the offence. In DPP v Howard,³⁷⁰ D chanted 'I'd rather be a Paki than a cop' at his neighbours who were white police officers. Charges were based on s 28(1)(b). The magistrates concluded that there was insufficient evidence on which they could be satisfied that the racially aggravated public order offence had been made out. They found that the evidence showed that D's hostility was ³⁶⁴ Per Maurice Kay J in Woods [2002] EWHC 85 (Admin), [11]. See also DPP v Green [2004] All ER (D) 70 (May); DPP v MacFarlane [2002] All ER (D) 78 (Mar); DPP v M [2004] EWHC 1453 (Admin), [2005] Crim LR 392.

³⁶⁵ See Jones v Bedford and Mid Bedfordshire Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 523 (Admin), the magistrates erred in applying the reasoning from s 28(1)(b) when dealing with a case that was charged under s 28(1)(a).

³⁶⁶ See Jones v Bedford and Mid Bedfordshire Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 523 (Admin). Section 28(3) provides that it is irrelevant whether in a s 28(1)(a) case D's hostility is 'also' based to any extent on another factor besides his racism. Read literally, this suggests that the section does include an examination of whether D had some racist intent in his hostility. On that interpretation, if D's hostility was exclusively based on non-racist grounds, he would not be within the s 28(1)(a) offence. The decision in Jones precludes that argument.

³⁶⁷ In Pal [2000] Crim LR 756, the Divisional Court accepted that the racial statement 'whiteman's arse licker' was not in itself sufficient to prove hostility based on racial grounds. Simon Brown LJ stated that he did 'not regard the fact that D would not have used such a term but for V's race as a sine qua non of the racial hostility'. His lordship did note that the use of racially abusive insults will 'ordinarily no doubt be found sufficient'. Pal has since been described as turning on its own facts. In Rogers, Baroness Hale suggests at [15] that the case might also have been disposed of by arguing that the racial hostility was based on the caretaker's association with whites. With respect, that argument was addressed by the Divisional Court at [12] and it is not clear that that alternative approach meets the problem—the argument could still be made that the basis for hostility was the ejection and V's conduct, not his race or affinity with members of other races.

³⁶⁸ HL, 12 Feb 1998, col 1266.

³⁶⁹ See generally E Burney and G Rose, Racially Aggravated Offences: How is the Law Working? (2002) HORS 244.

³⁷⁰ [2008] EWHC 608 (Admin).

motivated only by his intense dislike of the neighbours and not even as a result of his intense dislike of the police. There was, they concluded, insufficient evidence to establish (even in part) that the reason why those words were shouted was hostility towards Pakistani people. The Divisional Court dismissed the prosecution appeal, concluding that the magistrates were entitled to come to the conclusion they did: there was an abundance of evidence that the sole motivation for D's chanting was his hostility toward the officers personally. Moses LJ suggested that:

prosecutors should be careful not to deploy [s 28(1)(b)] where offensive words have been used, but in themselves have not in any way been the motivation for the particular offence with which a defendant is charged. It diminishes the gravity of this offence to use it in circumstances where it is unnecessary to do so and where plainly it cannot be proved.³⁷¹

It is a question of fact whether the motivation is found to be exclusively for non-racist reasons. Thus, in contrast to Howard, in *Kendall v DPP*³⁷² the magistrates were entitled to find that displaying posters of black men convicted of manslaughter with the title 'Illegal Immigrant Murder Scum' was evidence of motive even though D claimed that his purpose was to drum up support for the BNP.

Reform

The Law Commission has recommended that the offences could be extended to deal with hostility towards people on grounds of disability, sexual orientation and transgender identity. Definitions of those characteristics are based on the definitions in s 146 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003. The Commission's preferred recommendation is for a wider review to assess which if any characteristics ought to be protected by aggravated offences and which if any offences should be capable of being aggravated. The Commission also recommends a new Sentencing Council guideline to deal with hate crime and that the Police National Computer records any hostility-based sentence and whether it was an aggravated offence or a matter of sentencing uplift under ss 145 and 146 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.³⁷³

16.8 Aggravated assaults

Assault forms the basis for a number of more serious offences based on attacks on specified classes of people or in particular circumstances—we can call these aggravated assaults. Three introductory points should be noted about this. First, a person cannot be convicted of an aggravated assault unless he is guilty of assault. Subject to what was said earlier relating to consents and assault, if D has a defence to the charge of assault, he is not guilty of the aggravated assault.

This proposition is not always understood. For example, in Blackburn v Bowering,³⁷⁴ D was convicted of assaulting an officer of the court in the execution of his duty.³⁷⁵ His defence was that he did not believe V was a bailiff—he thought he was using reasonable ³⁷¹ At [12]. Cf Johnson v DPP [2008] EWHC 509 (Admin).

³⁷² [2008] EWHC 1848 (Admin).

³⁷³ For comment see C Bakalis, 'Legislating Against Hatred: The Law Commission's Report on Hate Crime' [2015] Crim LR 192. See also recently the work of M Walters et al, Preventing Hate Crime (2017).

³⁷⁴ [1994] 3 All ER 380, CA (Civ Div). The appeal came to the Civil Division because the offence was in the nature of a contempt of court. Referred to by Lord Nicholls in B v DPP [2000] 2 AC 428 at 463: 'The Crown advanced no suggestion to your Lordships that any of these recent cases was wrongly decided. This is not surprising, because the reasoning in these cases is compelling.'

³⁷⁵ Contrary to the County Courts Act 1984, s 14(1)(b). See LCCP 217, paras 2.139 et seq; LC 361 Ch 5.

force against a trespasser. D's mistake was as to the legal status of the victim. The trial judge ruled correctly that liability as to that element of the offence was strict,³⁷⁶ but he held that D's mistaken belief was no defence, remarking on the 'extraordinary situation' if that could have been a defence to common assault. D's conviction was quashed. If D was not guilty of assault because he lacked mens rea owing to a mistake, he could not be guilty of the aggravated form of the offence of assault on an officer of the court. Liability is strict as regards the status of the person assaulted, but there must still be an assault.³⁷⁷ If the assault had been proved—for example, if D had used force which was excessive even against a trespasser—it would have been no defence that he believed (even on reasonable grounds) that V was not an officer but a thug.

Secondly, this range of aggravated offences do not form a coherent scheme, let alone a nicely structured ladder of offences. Rather they form a motley collection which has evolved over time. Many of the offences are found within the OAPA 1861. Some of these were, no doubt, intended to deal with matters causing public concern at the time, and appear rather curious today. Thus, obstructing or assaulting a clergyman in the discharge of his duties in a place of worship or burial place, or who is on his way to or from such duties, is an offence triable either way, punishable on indictment with two years' imprisonment under s 36!³⁷⁸ Assaulting a magistrate or other person in the exercise of his duty concerning the preservation of a vessel in distress or a wreck is an offence punishable on indictment with seven years' imprisonment under s 37. Such provisions are rarely invoked in the modern day and need not be considered further, save to note that for some, the explicit labelling and differentiation between the offences by reference to the manner and circumstances in which they were caused reflects important moral distinctions that ought to be retained and replicated in a modern criminal code.³⁷⁹

Thirdly, these aggravated offences, including those considered in this chapter, represent some of the starkest examples of constructive crimes—those which do not respect the correspondence principle—that is, D may be convicted of an offence requiring proof of actus reus elements A and B even though he has mens rea relating only to element A.³⁸⁰

16.8.1 Assault with intent to resist arrest

By s 38 of the OAPA 1861:

Whosoever shall assault any person with intent to resist or prevent the lawful apprehension or detainer of himself or of any other person for any offence is guilty of an offence triable either way and punishable with two years' imprisonment.

It may be assumed that the section creates two offences, assault with intent and battery with intent. For each version, D must be shown to have committed all the elements of the assault/battery and that he intended to resist, etc. Thus, threatening the arrestor (V) with a weapon ³⁷⁶ Following Forbes and Webb (1865) 10 Cox CC 362 (assaulting constable). In this regard s 14 was rightly treated as akin to s 51 of the Police Act 1964 which has now replaced by s 89 of the Police Act 1996, p 704.

³⁷⁷ See p 661. This offence is an example of 'constructive crime' because the mens rea of a lesser offence, common assault, must be proved.

³⁷⁸ There was one reported instance of this offence in 2001, and one in 2002: HC Written Answer, 21 Nov 2005 (Hazel Blears). The number of prosecutions is miniscule: see the Law Commission Scoping Paper, para 2.148 and Ch 5.123.

³⁷⁹ See J Horder, 'Rethinking Non-Fatal Offences Against the Person' (1994) 14 OJLS 335 arguing that the offences serve valuable labelling functions and Gardner (1994) 53 CLJ 500 arguing that they are valuable in terms of clarity. See LCCP 217, Ch 3; LC 361 Ch 5.

³⁸⁰ Horder [1995] Crim LR 759; cf Mitchell [1999] Crim LR 195, and see references in n 250.

to make him let go of the arrestee would be the assault, poking him with it would be battery. Dragging the arrestee from V's grasp, being reckless whether this causes V to fall to the ground, will be a reckless battery with intent to resist arrest if V does fall. D has an intention to prevent 'apprehension' when he tries to prevent the arrest taking place, and an intention to prevent the 'detainer' when he tries to bring the arrest to an end. The section applies only where the arrest is 'for any offence'; so it does not apply to an arrest in civil process or for a breach of the peace not amounting to crime. It is immaterial whether the arrest is by a police officer or a citizen; but D's claim that he did not know the arrester was a plain-clothes officer may be crucial where his defence is that he believed he was being attacked by thugs.³⁸¹

The intent must be to resist 'lawful' arrest.³⁸² It is important to distinguish between D's mistakes of fact and law. If D knows of the factual circumstances which make the arrest lawful, he probably has a sufficient intent even though he believes, on the circumstances known to him, the arrest to be unlawful: for example, having read in an out-of-date law book that conspiracy is not an arrestable offence, he resists arrest for conspiracy. The law of arrest is treated as part of the criminal law for this purpose³⁸³ and his mistake or ignorance of criminal law is no defence.³⁸⁴ D's honest and, indeed, true belief that he is not, in fact, guilty of any offence is not per se a defence: the arrest may be lawful because the arrester has reasonable grounds for suspicion. But, if D makes a mistake of fact he should be judged on the circumstances as he believed them to be—in accordance with general principle. If D believes the arrester has no reasonable grounds to suspect that D is guilty, and D believes that the arrester knows he has no such grounds,—matters of fact—D should be acquitted if he resists. Whatever the true facts, D does not intend to resist lawful arrest. It may be that the principle of *Fennell*³⁸⁵ leaves D liable for common assault or battery but it would be wrong in principle to convict him of the aggravated offence when mens rea with respect to the aggravating factor is not proved.

16.8.2 Assault on, resistance to, or obstruction of constables

By s 89 of the Police Act 1996:

- (1) Any person who assaults a constable in the execution of his duty, or a person assisting a constable in the execution of his duty, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to [an unlimited] fine or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both.
- (2) Any person who resists or wilfully obstructs a constable in the execution of his duty, or a person assisting a constable in the execution of his duty, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one month or to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale, or to both.³⁸⁶

³⁸¹ Brightling [1991] Crim LR 364, CA; Blackburn v Bowering, p 702.

³⁸² Lee [2001] 1 Cr App R 293, CA, and see commentary at [2001] Crim LR 991. 'Whether or not an offence has actually been committed or is believed by the defendant not to have been committed is irrelevant', per Rose LJ.

³⁸³ cf cl 25(2)(b) of the Code Team's Draft Code (LC 143), a provision not included in the Law Commission's draft (LC 177).

³⁸⁴ Talfourd J put his decision on this ground in Bentley (1850) 4 Cox CC 406. See more recently Hewitt v DPP [2002] EWHC 2801 (Admin).

³⁸⁵ [1971] 1 QB 428. Cf Ball (1989) 90 Cr App R 378, [1978] Crim LR 580. See the quashing of the conviction in McKoy [2002] EWCA Crim 1628.

³⁸⁶ See LCCP 217, paras 2.139 and 2.145 on the volume of offending. See the Sentencing Council's revised Magistrates' Court Sentencing Guidelines (in force 24 Apr 2017) in respect of the sentencing of offenders aged 18 and older who are sentenced on or after 24 Apr 2017 in relation to s 89(2) of the Police Act 1996.

Though the section is headed 'Assaults on Constables', it contains three crimes, only one of which necessarily amounts to an assault. Resistance to a constable may occur without an assault, as where D has been arrested by V and D tears himself from V's grasp and escapes.³⁸⁷ Obstruction, as explained later, includes many situations which do not amount to an assault. On the other hand, both resistance and obstruction clearly may include assaults. The nature of assault and resistance requires no further consideration but obstruction presents problems and is examined in some detail later.

Common to all three crimes is the requirement that the constable³⁸⁸ is acting in the course of his duty. But the mens rea of assault and resistance, on the one hand, and obstruction on the other require separate consideration.

16.8.2.1 A constable acting in the execution of his duty

Identifying whether a police officer³⁸⁹ is acting in the course of his duty is a question which can give rise to difficult problems.³⁹⁰ There are numerous examples of an officer's action falling on the wrong side of the line, taking him outside his duty such that when he is assaulted this offence is not committed.³⁹¹ Police officers have no power to detain a person (in ways that go beyond levels of conduct that would be acceptable from any ordinary member of the public). If an officer does so, even briefly, without intending to exercise the power of arrest, the detention is a false arrest and amounts to false imprisonment.³⁹² A constable directing a motorist to leave the road to take part in a traffic census, before there was a statutory power to do so,³⁹³ was not acting in the execution of his duty since his right at common law to regulate traffic derives only from his duty to protect life and property.³⁹⁴ A constable who restrained D under the mistaken belief that D had been lawfully arrested by another officer was held not to be acting in the execution of his duty.³⁹⁵

Caution is required when interpreting the word duty. There are many things which a constable on duty may do (eg rescuing a stranded cat or helping to deliver a baby)³⁹⁶ which he is probably not under any 'duty' in the strict sense to do; that is, he would commit no crime or ³⁸⁷ Sheriff [1969] Crim LR 260.

³⁸⁸ ie a person holding the office, not the rank of constable. A prison officer acting as such is a constable for this purpose: Prison Act 1952, s 8 see also the extended power in s 8A (but immigration detention centre officials are not constables—Yarl's Wood Immigration v Bedfordshire Police Authority [2008] EWHC 2207 (Admin)). It is also an offence to assault a member of other police-related agencies such as the NCA.

³⁸⁹ On the duties of the police, see the discussion in S Bailey, D Harris and N Taylor, Civil Liberties, Cases and Materials (6th edn, 2009) at Ch 4(2). See also Metropolitan Police Comr, ex p Blackburn [1968] 2 QB 118 CA, and (No 3) [1973] QB 241 CA; K Lidstone, 'A Policeman's Duty Not to Take Liberties' [1976] Crim LR 617; U Ross, 'Two Cases on Obstructing a Constable' [1977] Crim LR 187.

³⁹⁰ It is for the prosecution to prove: R (Ahmad) v Bradford MC [2008] EWHC 2934 (Admin).

³⁹¹ For a recent example, see Ahmed v CPS (2017) 4 May, unreported, QBD (Admin), in which the injunction and power of arrest had erroneously cited repealed statutory provisions.

³⁹² In Walker v MPC [2014] EWCA Civ 897, it was held that if a police officer detains a person in a way that goes beyond what would be considered acceptable conduct by a member of the public, then the police officer is committing false imprisonment unless he is exercising the power of arrest. The court granted the claimant nominal damages of £5 on the basis that since in Bird v Jones (1845) 7 QB 742 the law has deemed it unacceptable for an ordinary citizen to interfere with another citizen's liberty by confining him in a doorway, no matter how short the period of time might be.

³⁹³ See now the Road Traffic Act 1988, s 35 as amended.

³⁹⁴ Hoffman v Thomas [1974] 2 All ER 233, DC. In the pursuance of that duty, a constable may require a motorist to disobey a traffic regulation: Johnson v Phillips [1975] 3 All ER 682, DC; and remove a vehicle to the police station when the driver is arrested; Liepins v Spearman [1985] Crim LR 229. Cf Saunders [1978] Crim LR 98 (Judge Heald) and commentary.

³⁹⁵ Kerr v DPP [1995] Crim LR 394.

³⁹⁶ Or assisting a landlord to expel drunk and disorderly people under the Licensing Act 2003, s 143(4) (see Simple v DPP [2009] EWHC 3241 (Admin)).

tort or even breach of police regulations by not doing it. In Coffin v Smith,³⁹⁷ the Divisional Court held that a constable could be in the execution of his duty for the purposes of this section even if he was doing something that he was not obliged to do.³⁹⁸ Officers, who had been summoned to a club to ensure that certain people left, were assaulted. It was held that the officers were there in fulfilment of their duty to keep the peace and were plainly acting in the execution of their duty. But duty surely cannot be equated with being 'on duty'.

A constable may be acting in the execution of his duty by being present, and by intervening when a breach of the peace occurs or is imminent, but acting outside his duty if he takes it upon himself to expel a trespasser.³⁹⁹ In a leading case, Waterfield,⁴⁰⁰ the Court of Criminal Appeal provided welcome clarification:

it would be difficult, and in the present case it is unnecessary, to reduce within specific limits the general terms in which the duties of police constables have been expressed. In most cases it is probably more convenient to consider what the police constable was actually doing and in particular whether such conduct was prima facie an unlawful interference with a person's liberty or property. If so, it is then relevant to consider whether (a) such conduct falls within the general scope of any duty imposed by statute or recognized at common law and (b) whether such conduct, albeit within the general scope of such a duty, involved an unjustifiable use of powers associated with the duty.

If the police officer's conduct falls within the general scope of the 'duty' to prevent crime and to bring offenders to justice, then it would seem to be within the protection of the statute, if it was lawful. The officer may ask questions of individuals whom he suspects to be involved in offending.⁴⁰¹

If, in the course of carrying out his duty to prevent crime and to bring offenders to justice, the officer exceeds his powers, then he is no longer acting in the execution of his duty for this purpose.⁴⁰²

Where the charge against D is that he assaulted or obstructed etc a police officer, V, in the execution of his duty and the assault etc occurred in the course of V performing an arrest for a criminal offence, the fact that the offence for which the officer was effecting an arrest is subsequently not prosecuted to conviction does not mean that V was not acting in the execution of his duty.⁴⁰³ However, where the constable has not arrested D and uses violence on D, D's resistance will not be an offence even if the constable would have been empowered to arrest D in the first place.⁴⁰⁴

Where D is arrested or detained by an officer unlawfully, for example where the officer has not used words of arrest or told D the grounds of arrest, the officer is not acting in the execution of his duty.⁴⁰⁵ In such a case, D cannot be liable for resisting other officers in the ³⁹⁷ (1980) 71 Cr App R 221. Cf the approval of Sedley LJ in Porter v MPC (1999) 20 Nov, unreported, CA (Civ).

³⁹⁸ The court doubted older cases: Prebble (1858) 1 F & F 325 and Roxburgh (1871) 12 Cox CC 8. See also Betts v Stevens [1910] 1 KB 1 and the 4th edition of this book, at pp 361–372. Prebble may be distinguishable as a case where the officer was doing no more than assist a citizen in the enforcement of private rights.

³⁹⁹ In Chief Constable of Devon and Cornwall, ex p Central Electricity Generating Board [1982] QB 458. On the police powers to prevent breach of the peace, see also P Thornton et al, The Law of Public Order and Protest (2010) paras 6.125 et seq.

⁴⁰⁰ [1964] 1 QB 164 at 170.

⁴⁰¹ Sekfali v DPP [2006] EWHC 894 (Admin); cf D v DPP [2010] EWHC 3400 (Admin) dealing with powers of a PCSO.

⁴⁰² Ludlow v Burgess [1971] Crim LR 238, CA; Pedro v Diss (1981) 72 Cr App R 193.

⁴⁰³ Burrell v DPP [2005] EWHC 786 (Admin). ⁴⁰⁴ Wood v DPP [2008] EWHC 1056 (Admin).

⁴⁰⁵ cf Saliu v DPP [2005] EWHC 2689 (Admin), D assaulted PC who had yet to arrest. See also Sobczak v DPP [2012] EWHC 1319 (Admin), [2013] Crim LR 516 in which the officer failed to follow s 2 of PACE by not informing D of his name, police station, the object of the search and the grounds for making it. The police officer was, however, attempting to remove B's leg from the jaws of a police dog. For that reason it was held that the police officer was acting in the exercise of his duty and D's conviction was therefore upheld.

execution of their duty when they are merely assisting the unlawful arrest.⁴⁰⁶ A constable who is not acting in the execution of his duty because he is a trespasser begins to act in the execution of his duty as soon as circumstances justifying his presence arise—as where he reasonably apprehends a breach of the peace. He does not have to leave the premises and re-enter.⁴⁰⁷ Even if an officer is not acting in the execution of his duty, for example where he is trespassing, the conduct of the defendant might nevertheless constitute a simple assault.⁴⁰⁸

Importantly, the Divisional Court in *Oraki v DPP*⁴⁰⁹ confirmed that the defences of self-defence and defence of another person are, as a matter of law, available in relation to the offence of obstructing a constable in the execution of his duty contrary to s 89(2) of the 1996 Act.

16.8.2.2 Trivial touchings by officers

A police officer investigating crime is entitled to speak to any person from whom he thinks useful information can be obtained, even though that person declares that he is unwilling to reply,⁴¹⁰ but the officer has no power to detain for questioning so the use of reasonable force to escape from such detention is not an assault;⁴¹¹ (it may be obstructing⁴¹²) and the use of excessive force, while it may be a common assault (or wounding, etc) would not be an offence under s 89.

Where the question is whether something is trivial or de minimis, it is perhaps to be expected that assessments will differ. In C v DPP,⁴¹³ the officer's taking hold of a 14-year-old girl's arm to escort her home when she was reported missing by her parents was not in the exercise of his duty and hence her boyfriend was not guilty of assaulting the officer in the execution of his duty.

Officer preventing breach of peace

Probably the most important application of s 89 is in the context of the constable's duty to prevent breaches of the peace which he reasonably apprehends.⁴¹⁴ That power is one which must be scrutinized with the utmost care since it allows an officer (and indeed a civilian) to restrain or arrest D where D has not committed, and is perhaps not even about to commit, a crime. The House of Lords confirmed that a power to arrest or take less intrusive action arises where: (a) a breach of the peace has been committed; or (b) a breach has occurred and a further breach is threatened; or (c) the officer reasonably believes that a breach will be committed imminently. If an officer reasonably believes one of the above three circumstances pertains, he is under a duty to take such steps, whether by arrest or otherwise,⁴¹⁵ as he reasonably thinks are necessary.⁴¹⁶ Where a reasonable apprehension of an imminent breach of the peace exists, the preventive action taken must be reasonable and proportionate; and there is no power to take action short of an arrest when a breach of the peace is not so imminent as would be necessary to justify arrest.⁴¹⁷

⁴⁰⁶ Cumberbatch v CPS [2009] EWHC 3353 (Admin).

⁴⁰⁷ Lamb [1990] Crim LR 58, DC.

⁴⁰⁸ See eg Syed v DPP [2010] EWHC 81 (Admin).

⁴⁰⁹ [2018] EWHC 115 (Admin). See also Wheeldon v CPS [2018] EWHC 249 (Admin). For further discussion, see p 402. See also E Cape [2018] Crim LR 388.

⁴¹⁰ Code of Practice A, code issued under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act (1984); Weight v Long [1986] Crim LR 746. See also Sekfali, p 710.

⁴¹¹ Kenlin v Gardner [1967] 2 QB 510; Ludlow v Burgess [1971] Crim LR 238; Lemsatef [1977] 1 WLR 812. Cf Daniel v Morrison (1980) 70 Cr App R 142, DC.

⁴¹² See Sekfali, p 710. ⁴¹³ [2003] All ER (D) 37 (Nov).

⁴¹⁴ Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218.

⁴¹⁵ King v Hodges [1974] Crim LR 424; Blench v DPP [2004] All ER (D) 86 (Nov). The requirement for an 'imminent' breach of the peace was interpreted very widely in Wragg v DPP [2005] EWHC 1389 (Admin).

⁴¹⁶ Piddington v Bates [1960] 3 All ER 660.

⁴¹⁷ R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire [2007] 2 WLR 46, HL.

The most difficult cases are likely to be those in which the police seek to intervene to prevent conduct which is not objectively violent nor provocative to others but which may amount to a breach of the peace. In Laporte, Lord Rodger observed that:

Sometimes lawful and proper conduct by A may be liable to result in a violent reaction from B, even though it is not directed against B. If B's resort to violence can be regarded as the natural consequence of A's conduct, and there is no other way of preserving the peace, a police officer may order A to desist from his conduct, even though it is lawful. If A refuses he may be arrested for obstructing a police officer in the execution of his duty.⁴¹⁸

Even where no breach of the peace is anticipated, a constable may be under some other duty to give instructions to members of the public—for example, to remove an obstruction from the highway⁴¹⁹—and a deliberate refusal to obey such an instruction may amount to an obstruction of the police.

A constable who makes a lawful arrest is acting in the execution of his duty even though the arrest subsequently becomes unlawful when he fails to communicate the ground to the arrestee.⁴²⁰

16.8.2.3 Mens rea in cases of assault and resistance

The only mens rea required in the case of an allegation of assaulting a constable is the mens rea for assault or battery. In a case of resisting, the mens rea is an intention to resist. A reckless battery might be inflicted by hitting or flailing arms or legs around at arresting officers or even by biting, as where D uses his teeth to try to snatch something from the hand of the officer restraining him, being aware that he might make contact with the officer's hand in the process.⁴²¹

There is no requirement to prove that D knew that the person he was assaulting was a police officer, still less that V was on duty. Liability in relation to the status of the arrestee and whether the constable was in the execution of his duty is strict. Although the original authority for this was a ruling by a recorder in a direction to a jury in Forbes and Webb,⁴²² this has now been repeatedly accepted.⁴²³ It is submitted that a better view⁴²⁴ is that D should only be liable if he was at least reckless as to whether V was a police officer in the execution of his duty when he committed the assault.⁴²⁵ Such a view avoids any difficulty arising from the fact that s 36⁴²⁶ of the 1861 Act used the words 'to the knowledge of the offender', whereas no such words were used in s 38 or its successors. Nevertheless, the present English law is that laid down in Forbes. This is implicit in McBride v Turnock,⁴²⁷ where D struck at O, who was not a constable, and hit V, who was. Although he had no

⁴¹⁸ At [78]. See R (Moos) v MPC [2012] EWCA Civ 12.

⁴¹⁹ It is in the course of a constable's duty to require pickets to move where they would otherwise obstruct lawful passage on the highway by others; Kavanagh v Hiscock [1974] QB 600, CA, applying Broome v DPP [1974] AC 587, HL. See also Austin v MPC, text accompanying n 524.

⁴²⁰ DPP v Hawkins [1988] 3 All ER 673, [1988] Crim LR 741.

⁴²¹ DPP v D [2005] EWHC 967 (Admin).

⁴²² (1865) 10 Cox CC 362, applying s 38 of the OAPA 1861.

⁴²³ In Prince (1875) LR 2 CCR 154 (six judges accepted it as correct); Maxwell (1909) 73 JP 176, (1909) 2 Cr App R 26; Mark [1961] Crim LR 173 (Judge Maxwell Turner). See also Blackburn v Bowering, p 702. See F Fairweather and S Levy, 'Assaults on the Police: A Case of Mistaken Identity' [1994] Crim LR 817.

⁴²⁴ See the dissenting judges in Reynhoudt (1962) 36 ALJR 26.

⁴²⁵ This was the view of the majority of the court in Galvin (No 2) [1961] VR 740, overruling Galvin (No 1) [1961] VR 733. Barry J thought actual knowledge necessary. Scholl J adhered to his view in Galvin (No 1) that the offence was one of strict liability. See also McLeod (1954) 111 CCC 106.

⁴²⁶ See p 703.

⁴²⁷ [1964] Crim LR 456, DC. This was also assumed to be the law in Blackburn v Bowering, p 702.

intention of assaulting V, the Divisional Court held that he was guilty of assaulting a constable in the execution of his duty. The mens rea for this crime being only that of a common assault/battery, D's 'malice' was transferable.⁴²⁸ No better illustration could be given of the unsatisfactory nature of strict liability in this context. Following the landmark decisions of the House of Lords in *DPP v B*⁴²⁹ and R v K,⁴³⁰ it is arguable that this approach deserves reconsideration.⁴³¹

If D is unaware (whether reasonably or not) that V is a constable and believes in the existence of circumstances of justification or excuse for his use of force, he should be acquitted;⁴³² he will not intend or be reckless as to an unlawful assault. If, however, D knows that V is a constable, it seems that a mistaken belief—even an honest and reasonable belief—that the constable is acting outside the course of his duty will not always be a defence. In Fennell,⁴³³ the court assumed that a father might lawfully use reasonable force to free his son from unlawful arrest by the police; but he acted at his peril and, if the arrest proved to be lawful, he was guilty.

16.8.2.4 Wilful obstruction

The meaning of obstruction

There must be obstruction in fact. If D does an act with intent to obstruct but which fails to do so he commits no offence—and it cannot be an attempt.⁴³⁴ A wide interpretation of 'obstruction' has been accepted in England.⁴³⁵ It is not necessary that there should be any interference with the officer himself by physical force or threats.

Where the police tell an offender to desist from an offence, his deliberate refusal may amount to an obstruction, as where D is obstructing the highway and refuses to obey the instructions of a constable to move.⁴³⁶ It is not necessary that the constable should anticipate a breach of the peace. But a constable has no power to arrest D for obstructing him, unless the obstruction was such that it actually caused, or was likely to cause, a breach of the peace.⁴³⁷

Equally, to give a warning to a person who has committed a crime so as to enable him to escape detection by police is enough. Thus, in Betts v Stevens,⁴³⁸ D committed the offence by warning drivers who were exceeding the speed limit that there was a police trap ahead. *Hinchliffe v Sheldon*⁴³⁹ might be thought to go further than Betts v Stevens in that it was only suspected, and not proved, that an offence was being committed; but there the warning was tantamount to a physical obstruction.⁴⁴⁰ D, a publican's son, shouted a warning to his parents that the police were outside the public house. It was 11.17 pm and the lights were on in the bar, so presumably the police suspected that liquor was being consumed after hours. There was a delay of eight minutes before the police were admitted and no offence was detected.

⁴²⁸ See p 122. ⁴²⁹ [2000] 2 AC 428, see Ch 5. ⁴³⁰ K [2002] 1 AC 462, see Ch 5.

⁴³¹ See also the criticism in LCCP 217, paras 5.123 et seq.

⁴³² Gladstone Williams (1984) 78 Cr App R 276, p 383. Mark, n 423, requiring reasonable grounds for the belief, can no longer be regarded as good law.

⁴³³ [1971] 1 QB 428, [1970] Crim LR 581 and commentary, CA; and cf Ball (1989) 90 Cr App R 378, [1989] Crim LR 579 and commentary.

⁴³⁴ Because it is triable only summarily. Cf Bennett v Bale [1986] Crim LR 404, DC and commentary.

⁴³⁵ See for an historical account, J Coutts, 'Obstructing the Police' (1956) 19 MLR 411.

⁴³⁶ Tynan v Balmer [1967] 1 QB 91; Donaldson v Police [1968] NZLR 32.

⁴³⁷ Wershof v Metropolitan Police Comr [1978] 3 All ER 540 (May J); Gelberg v Miller [1961] 1 WLR 153; Riley v DPP [1990] Crim LR 422, DC.

⁴³⁸ [1910] 1 KB 1. ⁴³⁹ [1955] 3 All ER 406, [1955] 1 WLR 1207.

⁴⁴⁰ See Coutts (1956) 19 MLR 411.

The police had a right to enter under statute⁴⁴¹ whether an offence was being committed or not; an entry under this statutory right was in execution of their duty; and their entry was obstructed. Lord Goddard CJ defined ‘obstructing’ as ‘Making it more difficult for the police to carry out their duties.’⁴⁴² This is far wider than was necessary for the decision.

Where defendants warn individuals who are about to commit offences, the courts have had difficulties. In Green v Moore,⁴⁴³ the distinction was drawn between advising a person to suspend his criminal activity, so that he will not be found out by the police (warning motorists so they do not speed until past the speed trap), which is an offence; and advising him to give it up altogether (ie never speed again)—in which case he will not be found out by the police—which is not an offence.⁴⁴⁴

Presumably it must be proved that some named officer was obstructed;⁴⁴⁵ it would hardly be enough that D warned E in general terms that if he did not stop committing an offence he would be found out.

Obstructing by not assisting

Lord Goddard CJ’s dictum defining ‘obstructing’ as ‘Making it more difficult for the police to carry out their duties’⁴⁴⁶ goes too far. Surely a solicitor who advises his client to say nothing cannot be guilty of an offence, though he undoubtedly makes things more difficult for the police; and why should a solicitor be in a different situation from anyone else? The fact that the refusal is expressed in abusive and obscene terms should, in principle, make no difference.⁴⁴⁷ If D’s language amounts to some other offence, such as that under s 4 of the Public Order Act 1986,⁴⁴⁸ he should be charged with that.

It has been held that refusal to answer a constable’s question, though it undoubtedly makes it more difficult for the police to carry out their duties, does not amount to wilful obstruction: Rice v Connolly.⁴⁴⁹ However, where there is more than a mere refusal the offence may be committed. In Sekfali v DPP,⁴⁵⁰ police officers approached the defendants who had been acting suspiciously. The officers identified themselves as such whereupon the defendants all ran off. They were convicted of wilfully obstructing police officers in the execution of their duty. The Divisional Court held that the police officers were entitled in the execution of their duty to approach the men and ask questions. The court confirmed that a citizen has no legal duty to assist the police, whilst noting that most people would accept that they have a moral and social duty to do so. The court then went on:

section 89(2) makes it an offence to willfully obstruct a police officer in the execution of his duty. The appellants would have been entitled to remain silent and not answer any questions put to them. They could have refused, if they had not been arrested, to accompany the police to any particular place to which they might have been requested by the police to go. They could have said that they had no intention of answering questions and they could, no doubt, have said that as a result they were intent on going on their way and have done so without giving rise to a case which would entitle the court to conclude that in departing they were intending to impede the police officers and ⁴⁴¹ See now Licensing Act 2003, s 180(1).

⁴⁴² [1955] 3 All ER 406 at 408.

⁴⁴³ [1982] QB 1044. Cf Moore v Green [1983] 1 All ER 663, DC. Explaining Bastable v Little [1907] 1 KB 59. See also DPP v Glendinning [2005] EWHC 2333 (Admin), holding that warning motorists of a speed trap was not necessarily sufficient to amount to the offence of obstructing a police officer in the execution of his duty unless the drivers being warned were speeding or were likely to be speeding. How fine a line is that? How will anyone know if they are likely to be?

⁴⁴⁴ What then of the maps and apps published of all speed camera sites, or the devices which warn motorists as they approach a speed trap?

⁴⁴⁵ Syde v Harrison [1981] Crim LR 110n.

⁴⁴⁶ [1955] 3 All ER 406 at 408.

⁴⁴⁷ See Marshall J in Rice v Connolly at 420.

⁴⁴⁸ See Ch 31.

⁴⁴⁹ [1966] 2 QB 414, DC.

⁴⁵⁰ [2006] EWHC 894 (Admin).

obstruct the police officers in the execution of their duty. Had they responded in that way, then it would have been for the police to have decided whether to arrest them; but they ran off, as the magistrates found to avoid apprehension. That being a wilful act, taken so as to obstruct the police, was an act capable of constituting an offence contrary to section 89(2).

Telling the police a false story is also quite different from merely remaining silent and is clearly an obstruction.⁴⁵¹ Refusing to reveal the whereabouts of a prohibited drug is not an obstruction; but burying it to hide it from an officer searching for it might be, when the officer's task is made more difficult.⁴⁵² These difficulties would not arise if the Act had been held to be limited to physical interference; and it has been held⁴⁵³ to be so limited in Scotland where 'obstruct' has been construed ejusdem generis with 'assault' and 'resist'.⁴⁵⁴ D was held not guilty when he told lies to the police to conceal an offence of which he was guilty. There is much to be said in favour of the Scottish view.⁴⁵⁵

Lawful acts as obstruction?

It is not necessary that the act relied on as an obstruction should be unlawful independently of its operation as an obstruction of the police.⁴⁵⁶ The conferment of powers and imposition of duties on the police may, impliedly, impose duties on others not to impede the exercise by the police of these powers and duties: the right of a constable to enter licensed premises where he believes an offence might be committed imposes an obligation on the licensee and others to let him in;⁴⁵⁷ the right to conduct a lawful search of premises;⁴⁵⁸ the right of a constable to require a driver in certain circumstances to provide a specimen of breath⁴⁵⁹ implies a duty on the motorist (though he has not been arrested) to remain 'there or nearby' until the constable has had a reasonable opportunity to carry out the test.⁴⁶⁰ If, when D is found to have consumed an excess of alcohol, it is the duty of a constable to remove D's car from the highway, there is an implied duty on D to hand over the keys of the car.⁴⁶¹

Whether a duty thus to cooperate with the police is to be implied depends on whether this is a compelling inference from the nature of the police duty or right. To some extent it is a question of policy—so, the courts have held there is no duty to answer police questions but there is a duty not to give misleading answers.⁴⁶² Whether D's conduct is an act rather than an omission is only one factor in determining whether there is an obstruction. Omissions may amount to obstruction even when the omission is not an offence independently of s 89.⁴⁶³ There is a separate common law offence of refusing to aid a constable who is attempting to prevent or to quell a breach of the peace and who calls for assistance.⁴⁶⁴

Mens rea for obstruction

Unlike 'assault' and 'resist', if D is charged with 'obstruction', it must be proved that that was 'wilful'. D must intend to behave in such a way as to make it more difficult for the police to ⁴⁵¹ Rice v Connolly, n 449; Mathews v Dwan [1949] NZLR 1037.

⁴⁵² See note on Syde v Harrison [1981] Crim LR 110.

⁴⁵³ Curlett v M'Kechnie 1938 JC 176.

⁴⁵⁴ The rearrangement of these offences by the Police Act precludes the application of the ejusdem generis rule; but it could have been applied when they were contained in the OAPA 1861.

⁴⁵⁵ See Coutts (1956) 19 MLR 411.

⁴⁵⁶ Dibble v Ingleton [1972] 1 QB 480. See G Williams, 'Criminal Law—The Duty Not To Obstruct Your Own Conviction' (1972) 30 CLJ 193.

⁴⁵⁷ Licensing Act 2003, s 180.

⁴⁵⁸ Sykes v CPS (Manchester) [2013] EWHC 3600 (Admin).

⁴⁵⁹ Road Traffic Act 1988, s 7.

⁴⁶⁰ DPP v Carey [1970] AC 1072 at 1097.

⁴⁶¹ Stunt v Bolton [1972] RTR 435, [1972] Crim LR 561.

⁴⁶² Rice v Connolly, n 449.

⁴⁶³ eg Stunt v Bolton, n 461. Cf Dibble v Ingleton, n 456.

⁴⁶⁴ Waugh (1976) The Times, 1 Oct 1976.

carry out their duties. His conduct need be neither hostile to, nor aimed at, the police, as some cases have suggested.⁴⁶⁵ So, in *Lewis v Cox*⁴⁶⁶ where D persisted in opening the door of a van in which X, who had been arrested, was about to be driven away, D's purpose was not to obstruct the police but to find out where X was being taken, but, since he must have known that he was preventing the police officer from driving off, the justices were bound to find that he intended to make it more difficult for them to carry out their duty.⁴⁶⁷

In Rice v Connolly,⁴⁶⁸ it was said that 'wilfully' means not only 'intentionally' but also 'without lawful excuse'. This is difficult to follow. 'Wilfully' must surely refer to the state of mind of the defendant. But whether he has a lawful excuse for what he does generally depends on D's conduct and the circumstances in which he acts.⁴⁶⁹ In that case, D would have been no more 'wilful' if he had told a false story. The difference seems to lie in the conduct which the court considers to be permissible. 'Wilfully' may of course import the absence of any belief on D's part of circumstances of lawful excuse. If the story told by D were in fact false, but D believed it to be true, the constable might be obstructed, but he would not be 'wilfully' obstructed.

As to mistakes about the status of the officer, in cases of obstruction, liability is not strict. In Ostler v Elliott,⁴⁷⁰ it was held that D's reasonable belief that the police officers were robbers was a defence to wilful obstruction. Now, since the decision in Gladstone Williams,⁴⁷¹ it is sufficient that the mistaken belief was genuinely held even if it was unreasonable.

Note also the summary offence of obstructing without reasonable excuse an emergency worker—fire and rescue personnel, paramedics, lifeboat crew, etc—under the Emergency Workers (Obstruction) Act 2006. By s 1(3), a person is responding to emergency circumstances if the person: (a) is going anywhere for the purpose of dealing with emergency circumstances occurring there; or (b) is dealing with emergency circumstances or preparing to do so. Emergency is defined in s 1(4).⁴⁷²

16.9 Ill-treatment or neglect

Section 44 of the Mental Capacity Act 2005, which has been in force since 1 April 2007, creates the offences of ill-treatment and wilful neglect.⁴⁷³ On summary conviction, D is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 12 months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or both. On conviction on indictment, D may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years or a fine or both. As is evident, the offence can be committed if D either ill-treats P or wilfully neglects P.⁴⁷⁴ In Turbill,⁴⁷⁵ the Court of Appeal held that 'wilful' denotes a subjective state of mind, but it is not equivalent to subjective recklessness. It is respectfully submitted that 'wilful' is now generally accepted to mean intention or subjective recklessness.⁴⁷⁶

⁴⁶⁵ Willmott v Atack [1977] QB 498; Hills v Ellis [1983] QB 680.

⁴⁶⁶ [1985] QB 509, [1984] 3 All ER 672. ⁴⁶⁷ cf the discussion of intention, p 90.

⁴⁶⁸ See p 710. ⁴⁶⁹ See comment at [1966] Crim LR 390.

⁴⁷⁰ [1980] Crim LR 584. Note that, if he had assaulted the officers, his reasonable belief that they were not officers would not, in itself, have been a defence to a charge of assaulting them in the execution of their duty. See commentary at [1980] Crim LR 585.

⁴⁷¹ [1987] 78 Cr App R 276, CA, p 383.

⁴⁷² The offence can include eg making hoax calls: McMenemy [2009] EWCA Crim 42.

⁴⁷³ See A Brammer, 'Carers and the Mental Capacity Act 2005: Angels Permitted, Devils Prosecuted?' [2014] Crim LR 589 evaluating whether the offence adds to the pre-existing legal framework.

⁴⁷⁴ It was confirmed in Nursing [2012] EWCA Crim 2521 that the section creates two separate offences.

⁴⁷⁵ [2013] EWCA Crim 1422.

⁴⁷⁶ See the further discussion at Ch 3 and the case comment at [2014] Crim LR 388.

Section 20 of the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 creates a new offence for care workers who ill-treat or wilfully neglect those in their care. By s 21, corporate or unincorporated care providers may be liable for negligence or neglect in the way their activities are organized which amounts to a gross breach of a duty of care owed to the individual receiving care.⁴⁷⁷

The offence in s 44 is only made out if D has care of a person who lacks, or whom D reasonably believes lacks, capacity. It is important to point out that lack of capacity is defined by reference to ss 2 and 3 of the 2005 Act. These provide a complex series of tests that purport to define the circumstances in which an individual is to be treated as if he is unable to make decisions for himself.⁴⁷⁸ The Lord Chief Justice, in Nursing, held that s 44 does not create an absolute offence and that 'actions or omissions, or a combination of both, which reflect or are believed to reflect the protected autonomy of the individual needing care do not constitute wilful neglect'.⁴⁷⁹

16.10 Administering poison

Sections 23 and 24 of the OAPA 1861 create offences, punishable with ten and five years' imprisonment respectively, with a similar actus reus.

16.10.1 Section 23

The section (as amended) provides:

Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, so as thereby to endanger the life of such person, or so as thereby to inflict upon such person any grievous bodily harm, shall be guilty of [an offence] and being convicted thereof shall be liable...to [imprisonment] for any term not exceeding ten years...

By s 25, a person charged under s 23 may be convicted of an offence under s 24.⁴⁸⁰

16.10.1.1 Actus reus

Administer, cause to be administered, cause to be taken

Lord Bingham described s 23 as providing three distinct offences: (a) administering a noxious thing to any other person; (b) causing a noxious thing to be administered to any other person; and (c) causing a noxious thing to be taken by any other person. His lordship explained:

Offence (1) is committed where D administers the noxious thing directly to V, as by injecting V with the noxious thing, holding a glass containing the noxious thing to V's lips, spraying V with acid or corrosive substances, or (as in *R v Gillard*⁴⁸¹) spraying the noxious thing in V's face. Offence (2) is typically committed where D does not directly administer the noxious thing to V but causes ⁴⁷⁷ For detailed discussion of these offences, see K Laird, 'Filling a Lacuna: The Care Worker and Care Provider Offences in the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015' (2016) 36 Stat LR 1.

⁴⁷⁸ See A [2014] EWCA Crim 299.

⁴⁷⁹ [2012] EWCA Crim 2521, [18].

⁴⁸⁰ See generally LCCP 217, paras 2.189 et seq and LC 361, Ch 7.

⁴⁸¹ Gillard (1988) 87 Cr App R 189. See also Cronin-Simpson [2000] 1 Cr App R (S) 54, D surreptitiously pouring petrol into neighbour's house through loft pipe; Potter [2005] EWCA Crim 3050—splashing petrol on V and threatening to ignite (surely better charged as a threat to kill?).

an innocent third party TP to administer it to V. If D, knowing a syringe to be filled with poison instructs TP to inject V, TP believing the syringe to contain a legitimate therapeutic substance, D would commit this offence. Offence (3) covers the situation where the noxious thing is not administered to V but taken by him, provided D causes the noxious thing to be taken by V and V does not make a voluntary and informed decision to take it. If D puts a noxious thing in food which V is about to eat and V, ignorant of the presence of the noxious thing, eats it, D commits offence (3).⁴⁸²

The words 'administer' and 'take' are to be construed by the court and not left as a question of fact to the jury.⁴⁸³ The words are disjunctive. 'Takes' assumes some 'ingestion' by the victim. It seems that the thing is not 'administered' until it is taken into the body.⁴⁸⁴ To leave the poison, intending it to be taken by an unwitting victim, may be an attempt to administer it.⁴⁸⁵ There is no requirement that the 'administration' under s 23 involves surreptitious conduct.⁴⁸⁶

In Kennedy,⁴⁸⁷ D handed to V a syringe containing heroin with which V injected himself and, in consequence, died. At his trial he was convicted of manslaughter. The Court of Appeal said, obiter, that it could see no reason why D should not have been convicted of an offence under s 23. There is a very good reason, simply that D did not administer the thing to V or cause V to take it. V, a person of full age and capacity, not labouring under any mistake, administered it to himself. Such an act breaks the chain of causation. After seemingly returning to orthodoxy in Dias, the Court of Appeal again returned to this revolutionary approach to causation in Rogers,⁴⁸⁸ and Finlay.⁴⁸⁹ In Kennedy (No 2),⁴⁹⁰ the House of Lords finally laid this heresy to rest. Where D hands V a syringe with which V injects himself, there is no administering by D. Nor is it possible to say that D is jointly responsible or jointly engaged in administering the heroin.⁴⁹¹ In Kennedy (No 2), the House of Lords also rejected the approach of the Court of Appeal in Finlay which had adopted the Empress approach to causation. Since V has voluntarily taken the decision to inject himself, his free, informed act breaks the chain of causation. It is different if D secretly puts the noxious thing into V's drink and V consumes it. V's consumption is then not a fully voluntary act—he believes he is drinking nothing but, say, coffee and has no intention to take the noxious thing. D has then 'administered' it to him or caused him to take it.⁴⁹²

Noxious

Some substances are noxious per se, as, for example, with radioactive isotope polonium-210 used to murder Russian dissident, Alexander Litvinenko. In Marcus,⁴⁹³ a case under s 24, 'noxious' was broadly interpreted. A substance which may be harmless if taken in small quantities is noxious if administered in sufficient quantity to injure, aggrieve or annoy.⁴⁹⁴ The meaning is taken to be coloured by the purpose which D may have in view. It is not ⁴⁸² Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38, [9]–[10].

⁴⁸³ Gillard (1988) 87 Cr App R 189 at 194.

⁴⁸⁴ Cadman (1825) Carrington's Supplement 237. The report to the contrary in Ryan and Moody 114 is said to be inaccurate: Harley, n 492 per Parke J: and 6 Cox CC 16 n (c). But see Walford (1899) 34 LJ 116, per Wills J.

⁴⁸⁵ Prior to the Criminal Attempts Act, a judge could tell a jury it was an attempt, as Wightman J did in Dale (1852) 6 Cox CC 14.

⁴⁸⁶ It has been prosecuted where eg D doused people with petrol and threatened to ignite it: Potter [2005] EWCA Crim 3050.

⁴⁸⁷ [1999] Crim LR 65. Cf Khan [1998] Crim LR 830.

⁴⁸⁸ [2003] Crim LR 555.

⁴⁸⁹ [2003] EWCA Crim 3868.

⁴⁹⁰ [2005] EWCA Crim 685.

⁴⁹¹ See Ch 2 for detailed comment. But see Burgess [2008] EWCA Crim 516.

⁴⁹² Harley (1830) 4 C & P 369; Dale (1852) 6 Cox CC 14. D would have been more appropriately charged with 'causing ... to be taken'.

⁴⁹³ [1981] 1 WLR 774, CA.

⁴⁹⁴ Following Hennah (1877) 13 Cox CC 547 and Cramp (1880) 5 QBD 307. Cf Marlow (1964) 49 Cr App R 49 (Brabin J).

necessary that the substance should be injurious to bodily health: “noxious” mean[s] something different in quality from and of less importance than poison or other destructive things’. The court quoted the Shorter Oxford Dictionary meaning, ‘injurious, hurtful, harmful, unwholesome’, and suggested that the insertion of the celebrated snail allegedly in the ginger beer bottle in *Donoghue v Stevenson*⁴⁹⁵ would create a noxious substance. It was held that the insertion of sedative and sleeping tablets into a bottle of milk was an attempt to commit an offence under s 24. While the tablets would cause no more than sedation or possibly sleep, they might be a danger to a person doing such normal but potentially hazardous acts as driving or crossing the street.⁴⁹⁶

The court ‘explained’ Cato,⁴⁹⁷ a case under s 23, where it was said that a thing could not be noxious merely because it was harmful if taken in large quantities. That observation was not ‘explicable’ but wrong. The actual decision, however, that heroin is a noxious thing even where it is administered to a person with a high tolerance to whom it is unlikely to do any particular harm, is right.⁴⁹⁸ Heroin is noxious because ‘it is liable to cause injury in common use’.⁴⁹⁹ It was no answer that V was experienced in taking heroin and had a high tolerance. Ecstasy has been held to be a noxious substance for these purposes.⁵⁰⁰ It has been argued that HIV could be regarded as a noxious substance capable of being administered in the course of sexual activity.⁵⁰¹ Charges under s 20 (discussed earlier) are more likely.

Whether consenting to the administration of a noxious substance that might cause grievous bodily harm or endanger life is valid consent in law must be subject to the policy on consent adopted in Brown.⁵⁰² The courts have repeatedly asserted that factual consent will not necessarily provide a legal defence to a charge under s 23.⁵⁰³ However, it must be the case that V can consent in some contexts to the administration of a noxious substance, even one that is potentially fatal. Otherwise, V could not consent to anaesthetic for surgery. The validity of consent will, it seems, turn on public policy factors, so that while informed adult consent in a medical context or in horseplay may be legally recognized, in other contexts it will not be. In Dica, it was accepted that V could validly consent to the risk of infection by HIV. The court acknowledged that in some instances a person would be willing to take that risk, for example to conceive or to respect a religious prohibition on contraception. The court held that V could not consent to an intentional infection.

Section 23 was considered by the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) in CP (A Child) v First-tier Tribunal (Criminal Injuries Compensation).⁵⁰⁴ The claimant was a child who was born with foetal alcohol syndrome after her mother drank excessively during pregnancy. CP claimed compensation from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority. It was argued on behalf of CP that her mother had maliciously administered a noxious thing to her contrary to s 23 of the OAPA 1861 whilst she was in the womb. In rejecting this contention, both Treacy LJ and Lord Dyson MR held that ‘it is well established that a foetus is not a “person;” rather it is a sui generis organism’.⁵⁰⁵ A foetus was not ‘any other person’ for the purposes of s 23, and as the harm had been inflicted on the child while she was in the womb, the child was not entitled to criminal injuries compensation.⁵⁰⁶

⁴⁹⁵ [1932] AC 562.

⁴⁹⁶ See also T [2006] EWCA Crim 2557, where D (46) plied V (14) with alcohol and amphetamines.

⁴⁹⁷ [1976] 1 WLR 110; cf Dalby [1982] 1 WLR 425, CA.

⁴⁹⁸ ‘It is not in doubt that heroin is a noxious thing, and the contrary was not contended’, per Lord Bingham in Kennedy (No 2) [2007] UKHL 38 [10].

⁴⁹⁹ [1976] 1 All ER at 268. See also MK [2008] 2 Cr App R (S) 437 (administering methadone to child).

⁵⁰⁰ See Gantz [2004] EWCA Crim 2862.

⁵⁰¹ See Ormerod and Gunn [1996] 1 Web JCLI; Bronniti [1994] Crim LR 21.

⁵⁰² [1994] AC 212.

⁵⁰³ Cato; McShane (1977) 66 Cr App R 97. Cf the CLRC Fourteenth Report, para 190.

⁵⁰⁴ [2014] EWCA Civ 1554. ⁵⁰⁵ At [39] and [62].

⁵⁰⁶ A-G’s Reference (No 3 of 1994) in relation to homicide does not undermine that conclusion.

'Thereby'

The use of the term 'thereby' in s 23 could represent a significant restriction on the offence if it is interpreted in as narrow a fashion as that term has been understood in relation to the life-endangering offences under the Criminal Damage Act 1971. If the life endangerment arises from consequences other than the noxious substance itself, it is arguable that the offence is not committed. For example, if D laces V's coffee and V then drives to work, if V's life is endangered by the manner of his driving which was affected by the noxious substance which induced drowsiness,⁵⁰⁷ but not by the noxious substance administered, it is arguable that life is not endangered thereby.

16.10.1.2 Mens rea

Under s 23, the only mens rea required is intention or recklessness as to the administration of a noxious thing. The use in the section of the word 'maliciously' makes this clear as held in the leading case of Cunningham.⁵⁰⁸ Whereas in s 24 the offence uses the expression 'with intent to', in s 23 the expression is simply 'so as thereby to'. This suggests that in s 23 no additional mens rea is required as to the element of endangering life or inflicting grievous bodily harm. That was the interpretation adopted in Cato. The requirement of 'malice' was satisfied by the deliberate injection of heroin into V's body. No mens rea was required as to the danger to life or the infliction of grievous bodily harm. In Cunningham, the Court of Criminal Appeal thought the jury should have been told that D must have foreseen that the gas he caused to be administered to V by breaking the gas pipe might cause injury to someone. The court did not say D must have foreseen that life would be endangered. This is an extraordinary result, in that a less culpable state of mind is required for the more serious offence (s 23) than the less serious (s 24).

16.10.2 Section 24

The section as amended provides:

Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously administer to or cause to be administered to or taken by any other person any poison or other destructive or noxious thing, with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy such person, shall be guilty of [an offence], and being...convicted thereof shall be liable to [imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years]...

By s 25, a person charged under s 24 may not be convicted of an offence under s 23.⁵⁰⁹

16.10.2.1 Actus reus

The elements of administration, etc have been considered earlier in relation to s 23. Section 24 might be seen as an inchoate offence, with the focus on the conduct whereas s 23 is a result-oriented crime.⁵¹⁰

It is arguable that V ought to be able to provide valid consent to the administration of a substance under s 24. However, the level of harm likely is that of injury, which seems to be on a par with the threshold at which consent is generally treated as invalid in Brown.⁵¹¹ The public policy exceptions as in Brown will apply.

⁵⁰⁷ cf Steer [1988] AC 111.

⁵⁰⁸ [1957] 2 QB 396: D tore the gas meter from the wall of an unoccupied house to steal money from it. The gas seeped into the neighbouring houses and was inhaled by V, whose life was endangered. D's conviction under s 23 was quashed because the judge directed the jury only that 'malicious' meant 'wicked'. See now Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 1(2), see Ch 29.

⁵⁰⁹ cf Stokes (1925) 19 Cr App R 71.

⁵¹⁰ See A Ashworth, 'Defining Criminal Offences without Harm' in Criminal Law Essays, 13.

⁵¹¹ cf the remarks in sentencing in Sky [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 260, [6].

16.10.2.2 Mens rea

This offence requires an ulterior intent: ‘with intent to injure, aggrieve, or annoy such person’.

When a drug is given to V with intent to keep him awake it seems that whether this amounts to an intention to injure depends on whether D has a malevolent or a benevolent purpose. If D, a paedophile, gives the drug to V, a child, with the motive of ingratiating himself with V or rendering him susceptible to sexual offences, he has an intention to injure: Hill.⁵¹² It would probably be otherwise if D’s intention was to enable V to stay awake to enjoy the fireworks or greet his father on return from work. The administration of a drug to the pilot of an aircraft to keep him awake is probably not an offence. The administration of the same drug for the purpose of carrying out a prolonged interrogation may be.⁵¹³ This casts doubt on Weatherall.⁵¹⁴ D put a sleeping tablet in V’s tea to enable him to search her handbag for letters proving that she was committing adultery. It was held that there was insufficient evidence of intent to injure, aggrieve or annoy: but there was surely evidence of a ‘malevolent’ purpose, as there would be if D gave V a sleeping tablet with intent to rape her. The test of malevolence is presumably objective. The paedophile’s belief that the drugged child will enjoy and profit from the sexual experience is never going to be regarded as capable of being a ‘benevolent’ purpose. The question of intention comes perilously close to being one of motive, and at least on orthodox approaches to mens rea, this is irrelevant.

16.10.3 Other poisoning offences

16.10.3.1 Administering substances in relation to sexual offences

The Sexual Offences Act 2003 introduced s 61—intentional administration of a substance/ causing it to be taken by V without consent with intent to stupefy/overpower to enable any person to engage in sex with V. See Ch 17.

16.10.3.2 Terrorist related poisonings

Section 38 of the Public Order Act 1986 creates what is in effect an offence of food terrorism applicable where, for example, D puts poisons or harmful objects in food products in supermarkets. Sections 113 and 114 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 create very broad offences of using or threatening to use a noxious substance or thing to cause harm and intimidate.⁵¹⁵

16.11 False imprisonment

False imprisonment, like assault and battery, is both a crime at common law and a tort.⁵¹⁶ The civil remedy is commonly invoked and most of the reported cases on this subject are civil actions, but it features as a count in many indictments. As will appear, there are some important distinctions between the crime and the tort.

⁵¹² (1986) 83 Cr App Rep 386, HL. The offence under s 61 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 will apply, see p 817.

⁵¹³ Examples taken from Hill, ibid.

⁵¹⁴ [1968] Crim LR 115 (Judge Broderick). See also A-G’s Reference (No 71 of 2012) [2012] EWCA Crim 3071 where D laced his colleagues’ coffee with amphetamine and reported them to a supervisor for drug taking.

⁵¹⁵ For discussion, see C Walker, Blackstone’s Guide to the Anti-Terrorism Legislation (3rd edn, 2014) 215–216.

⁵¹⁶ See E Peel and J Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) Ch 4. See also the discussion in LC 355, Simplification of Criminal Law: Kidnapping and Related Offences (2014).

False imprisonment is committed where D unlawfully and intentionally or recklessly restrains V's freedom of movement from a particular place without lawful justification. 'Imprisonment' is probably a wider term than, and includes, 'arrest'.⁵¹⁷

16.11.1 Article 5: deprivations of liberty and arrest

Article 5 of the ECHR provides a guarantee against arbitrary deprivation of liberty, but that has been interpreted more narrowly than the concept of 'restricting movement' which lies at the heart of false imprisonment. 'Article 5 is concerned with the deprivation of liberty and not with mere restrictions on freedom of movement.'⁵¹⁸ The distinction is not always easy to identify since the difference is 'merely one of degrees or intensity, and not one of nature or substance'.⁵¹⁹ In Gillan v MPC,⁵²⁰ the House of Lords held that a brief stop (20 mins) could not be regarded as a 'deprivation of liberty' within the meaning of Art 5; those subjected to a stop and search were merely 'detained in the sense of kept from proceeding or kept waiting'. The ECtHR disagreed, unanimously finding a violation of Art 8, that the use of coercive powers to require an individual to submit to a detailed search of his person, his clothing and his personal belongings amounted to a clear interference with the right to respect for private life: Gillan and Quinton v UK.⁵²¹ The Strasbourg Court expressly disagreed with the assessment of the House of Lords that the safeguards provided by the English legislation provided adequate protection against arbitrary interference.⁵²² In Austin v MPC,⁵²³ the House of Lords concluded that the police detention of several thousand people on Oxford Street did not amount to a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art 5.⁵²⁴ The Grand Chamber of the Strasbourg Court agreed and held that there was no violation of Art 5, basing its decision upon the exceptional facts of the case.⁵²⁵ The Court reiterated that determining whether there has been a deprivation of liberty as that term is utilized in Art 5 as opposed to a mere restriction on liberty is one of degree or intensity as opposed to nature or substance. Extraordinarily, the Grand Chamber reached its conclusion without referring to the earlier judgment in Gillan and Quinton. Given that the applicants in Austin were detained for hours as opposed to the 20-minute police stop in Gillan and Quinton, the two cases are hard to reconcile.⁵²⁶

⁵¹⁷ Rahman (1985) 81 Cr App R 349 at 353, CA. Brown [1977] Crim LR 291, CA, and commentary thereon and articles by D Telling, 'Arrest and Detention—The Conceptual Maze' [1978] Crim LR 320 and K Lidstone, 'A Maze in Law!' [1978] Crim LR 332. Care must be taken with the articles' references to powers of arrest as these have changed significantly. See LC 355, Ch 2.

⁵¹⁸ Engel v Netherlands (1976) 1 EHRR 647, para 58; Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333, para 92; Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237, para 39; HM v Switzerland (App no 39187/98), 26 Feb 2002. See generally Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, Ch 5.

⁵¹⁹ Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333, para 92; Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528, para 41; Engel v Netherlands (1976) 1 EHRR 647, paras 58–59. See also Blume v Spain (2000) 30 EHRR 632.

⁵²⁰ [2006] UKHL 12; see [2006] Crim LR 751 and commentary.

⁵²¹ (2010) 50 EHRR 45. See also R (AP) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] UKSC 24, in which it was held that when deciding if there is a deprivation of liberty within the meaning of Art 5 of the ECHR regard should be had to the subjective factors peculiar to the particular individual.

⁵²² The authorization power under the Terrorism Act 2000, s 44 required only that it be expedient to make the authorization, not that it be necessary or proportionate. See Ashworth, commentary [2010] Crim LR 415. See now: the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 dealing with the maximum length of detention without trial in terrorism cases, and stop and search under the Terrorism Act 2000. On which see E Cape, 'The Counter-Terrorism Provisions of the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012: Preventing Misuse or a Case of Smoke and Mirrors?' [2013] Crim LR 385.

⁵²³ [2009] UKHL 5, [2009] 2 WLR 372.

⁵²⁴ See Ashworth, commentary [2010] Crim LR 415.

⁵²⁵ (2012) 55 EHRR 14.

⁵²⁶ See Ashworth's criticisms at [2012] Crim LR 545.

16.11.2 Actus reus

16.11.2.1 'Imprisonment'

For the purposes of the offence of false imprisonment, the 'imprisonment' may consist in confining V in a prison,⁵²⁷ a house,⁵²⁸ even V's own house,⁵²⁹ a mine⁵³⁰ or a vehicle;⁵³¹ or simply in detaining V in a public street⁵³² or any other place.

A false imprisonment may arise for a short duration. The restraint need be only momentary, so that the offence would be complete if D tapped V on the shoulder and said, 'You are my prisoner.'⁵³³ It is not necessary that the victim be physically detained; there may be an arrest by words alone, but only if V submits. If V is not physically detained and does not realize he is under constraint, he is not imprisoned.⁵³⁴ If V agrees to go to a police station voluntarily, he has not been arrested even if the constable would have arrested him if V had refused to go.⁵³⁵ If it is then made clear to V that he will not be allowed to leave until he provides a laboratory specimen, it has been suggested that, though he has never been 'arrested', he is 'under arrest'.⁵³⁶ If this distinction is valid it would seem to be enough for false imprisonment that V is 'under arrest'.

It is enough that D orders V to accompany him to another place, and V goes because he feels constrained to do so. V is not imprisoned if, on hearing D use words of arrest, he runs away or makes his escape by a trick.⁵³⁷ An invitation by D to V to accompany him cannot be an imprisonment if it is made clear to V that he is entitled to refuse to go. Thus, Lord Lyndhurst CB thought there was no imprisonment where D asked a policeman to take V into custody, and the policeman objected, but said that if D and V 'would be so good as to go with him', he would take the advice of his superior.⁵³⁸ The distinction between a command, amounting to an imprisonment, and a request not doing so, is a difficult one.⁵³⁹ Probably Alderson B went too far in *Peters v Stanway*⁵⁴⁰ in holding that V was imprisoned if she went to the police station with a constable voluntarily but nevertheless in consequence of a charge against her.

Though some of the older authorities⁵⁴¹ speak of false imprisonment as a species of assault, it is quite clear that no assault need be proved.⁵⁴² In Linsberg,⁵⁴³ the Common Sergeant held ⁵²⁷ Cobbett v Grey (1849) 4 Exch 729; R v Governor of Brockhill Prison, ex p Evans (No 2) [2001] 2 AC 19. On the difference between positive acts of imprisonment and omissions, see Iqbal v Prison Officers Association [2009] EWCA Civ 1312.

⁵²⁸ Warner v Riddiford (1858) 4 CBNS 180.

⁵²⁹ Termes de la Ley, approved by Warrington and Atkin LJ (1920) 122 LT at 51 and 53. See also Secretary of State for the Home Department v JJ [2007] UKHL 45 considering the power to make control orders: s 1(2) of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005. See also Secretary of State for the Home Department v E [2007] UKHL 47; Secretary of State for the Home Department v MB; Secretary of State v AF [2007] UKHL 46.

⁵³⁰ Herd v Weardale Steel, Coal and Coke Co Ltd [1915] AC 67.

⁵³¹ By driving at such a speed that V dare not alight: McDaniel v State, 15 Tex Crim 115 (1942); Burton v Davies [1953] QSR 26. See also Bowell [2003] EWCA Crim 3896, single count of false imprisonment split where D detained V in the car, and detained her again when she escaped and injured herself.

⁵³² Blackstone, Commentaries, iii, 127; Ludlow v Burgess [1971] Crim LR 238; Austin v MPC, discussed earlier.

⁵³³ Simpson v Hill (1795) 1 Esp 431, per Eyre CJ; Sandon v Jervis (1859) EB & E 942, 'a mere touch constitutes an arrest, though the party be not actually taken', per Crowder J.

⁵³⁴ Alderson v Booth [1969] 2 QB 216, [1969] 2 All ER 271.

⁵³⁵ Campbell v Tormey [1969] 1 WLR 189. See Emmerson, Ashworth and Macdonald, HR&CJ, para 5.03.

⁵³⁶ ibid, per Ashworth J. ⁵³⁷ Russen v Lucas (1824) 1 C & P 153.

⁵³⁸ Cant v Parsons (1834) 6 C & P 504.

⁵³⁹ G Williams, 'Police Interrogation Privileges and Limitations under Foreign Law: England' in CR Sowle (ed), Police Power and Individual Freedom: The Quest for Balance (1962) at 43.

⁵⁴⁰ (1835) 6 C & P 737, followed in Conn v David Spencer Ltd [1930] 1 DLR 805.

⁵⁴¹ Eg Hawkins, 1 PC, c 60, s 7; Pocock v Moore (1825) Ry & M 321.

⁵⁴² Grainger v Hill (1838) 4 Bing NC 212; Warner v Riddiford (1858) 4 CBNS 180. ⁵⁴³ (1905) 69 JP 107.

that V, a doctor, was falsely imprisoned where D locked the door to prevent him leaving a woman in childbirth. A battery is not necessarily an imprisonment. In Bird v Jones,⁵⁴⁴ V was involved in 'a struggle during which no momentary detention of his person took place'.

There is little authority on the question of how large the area of confinement may be. It is not an imprisonment wrongfully to prevent V from going in a particular direction, if he is free to go in other directions. This was decided in Bird v Jones,⁵⁴⁵ where Coleridge J said: 'A prison may have its boundary large or narrow, visible and tangible, or, though real, still in the conception only;⁵⁴⁶ it may itself be moveable or fixed: but a boundary it must have...' It would be otherwise if V could move off in other directions only by taking an unreasonable risk. It could hardly be said that a man locked in a second-floor room was not imprisoned because he could have climbed down the drainpipe. It has been suggested that it would be tortious to confine V to a large country estate or the Isle of Man;⁵⁴⁷ but it could hardly be false imprisonment to prevent V from leaving Great Britain, still less to prevent him from entering. However, a person who has actually landed and is not allowed to leave an airport building is imprisoned.⁵⁴⁸ Is V also imprisoned, then, if he is not allowed to leave the ship which has docked in a British port?

Merely deciding to restrain a person if he attempts to leave does not amount to imprisonment.⁵⁴⁹ But if steps are in fact taken to prevent his leaving, as by placing a policeman at the door, he is imprisoned although he is not aware of it: *Meering v Grahame-White Aviation Co Ltd*⁵⁵⁰ where Atkin LJ said:

It appears to me that a person could be imprisoned without his knowing it. I think a person can be imprisoned while he is asleep, while he is in a state of drunkenness, while he is unconscious, and while he is a lunatic...though the imprisonment began and ceased while he was in that state.

A contrary decision⁵⁵¹ was not cited and Meering has been heavily criticized,⁵⁵² although cited with approval by the House of Lords in Murray v Minister of Defence,⁵⁵³ the arguments advanced against awarding damages in this situation are, however, not applicable to the crime. D's conduct may not be damaging to V if V knows nothing about it, but it is not necessarily any less blameworthy for, in most cases, the fact that V remains in ignorance must be a matter of mere chance.

Like other crimes, false imprisonment can be committed through an innocent agent.⁵⁵⁴ So D is responsible for the actus reus if, at his direction or request, a policeman takes V into ⁵⁴⁴ See later. ⁵⁴⁵ (1845) 7 QB 742 (Denman CJ dissenting).

⁵⁴⁶ Eg V is forbidden to move more than ten yards from the village pump.

⁵⁴⁷ (1845) 7 QB 742. But 'Napoleon was certainly imprisoned on St Helena': Winfield and Jolowicz on Torts (15th edn, 1998) 71. In Re Mwenya [1960] 1 QB 241 a writ of habeas corpus was sought for V who was confined to an area of some 1,500 square miles but he was released before it became necessary to decide whether he was imprisoned for the purpose of habeas corpus.

⁵⁴⁸ Kuchenmeister v Home Office [1958] 1 QB 496.

⁵⁴⁹ Bournewood Community and Mental Health NHS Trust, ex pL [1998] 3 All ER 289 at 298, HL; but Lord Steyn, dissenting, more realistically thought (at 306): 'The suggestion that L was free to go is a fairy tale.' Note the European Court's finding of a breach of Art 5 in HL v UK (App no 45508/99), and see the Mental Health Act 2007, ss 4 and 5. See also the discussion of Cheshire West and Chester Council v P [2014] UKSC 19 that 'deprivation of liberty' in the context of the living arrangements of a mentally incapacitated person was to be given the same meaning in domestic law as in Art 5 of the ECHR.

⁵⁵⁰ (1919) 122 LT 44, Duke LJ dissenting, where two policemen were stationed outside the door of a room to prevent V leaving. He was as effectively imprisoned as if the door had been locked. Meering was approved in Murray v Ministry of Defence [1988] 2 All ER 521 at 529, HL.

⁵⁵¹ Herring v Boyle (1834) 1 Cr M & R 377 (Court of Exchequer).

⁵⁵² G Williams in Police Power and Individual Freedom (1962) 45–46; C Witting, Street on Torts (14th edn, 2015) Ch 9.

⁵⁵³ [1998] 1 WLR 692.

⁵⁵⁴ There is no vicarious liability for false imprisonment (nor generally in criminal law for common law offences: R (Crack) v Newcastle Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 935 (Admin)).

custody,⁵⁵⁵ or he signs the charge-sheet when the police have said they will not take the responsibility of detaining V unless he does.⁵⁵⁶ However, if D merely gives information to a constable, which causes him to make an arrest, that is not a false imprisonment in tort by D, if D is acting in a bona fide way.⁵⁵⁷ A fortiori, it should not be criminal, because D will also lack mens rea. But this raises the question whether D will be guilty if he deliberately supplies false information to a constable who, acting on his own authority but relying exclusively on D's information, arrests V.⁵⁵⁸ D has surely caused the actus reus with mens rea. Note that where D is initially liable for false imprisonment, his liability ceases on the intervention of some judicial act⁵⁵⁹ authorizing the detention or on any other event, breaking the chain of causation.⁵⁶⁰ So, in the case of the false information leading to arrest, D may be liable for the act of the constable but not the judicial act of the magistrate.⁵⁶¹

Whatever the position in the law of tort,⁵⁶² it should be immaterial in the criminal law that the imprisonment was not 'directly' caused by D; and it ought to be sufficient that D caused it with mens rea—as by digging a pit into which V falls and is trapped.⁵⁶³

Another issue in the law of tort is whether, in view of the requirement of a trespass, it is possible to falsely imprison by mere omission. In Herd v Weardale Steel, Coal and Coke Co Ltd,⁵⁶⁴ V voluntarily descended into D's mine and, in breach of contract, stopped work and asked to be brought to the surface before the end of the shift. D's refusal to accede to this request was not a false imprisonment: he was under no duty to provide facilities for V to leave in breach of contract. Clearly, the result would be different if D were to take positive steps to prevent V from leaving in breach of contract,⁵⁶⁵ as by locking him in a factory. Buckley and Hamilton LJ⁵⁶⁶ thought that mere omission could not have been false imprisonment, even if it occurred when the shift was over. V's only civil remedy would have been in contract; but the House of Lords expressed no opinion on this point.

In Mee v Cruickshank,⁵⁶⁷ Wills J held that a prison governor was under a duty to take steps to ensure that his officers did not detain a prisoner who had been acquitted. In that case there were acts of imprisonment by the prison officers but they were not the servants of D, the governor, and it seems to have been D's omission which rendered him liable in tort. As the House of Lords accepted in Ex p Evans, the failure to release a prisoner on the due ⁵⁵⁵ Gosden v Elphick and Bennett (1849) 4 Exch 445. Note also the tort of procuring an arrest, see Martin v Watson [1996] 1 AC 74.

⁵⁵⁶ Austin v Dowling (1870) LR 5 CP 534. It is otherwise if D signs the charge-sheet as a matter of form, when the police are detaining V on their own responsibility: Grinham v Willey (1859) 4 H & N 496.

⁵⁵⁷ Gosden v Elphick and Bennett, n 555; Grinham v Willey, n 556; 'We ought to take care that people are not put in peril for making complaint when a crime has been committed', per Pollock CB. Cf O'Hara v Chief Constable of RUC [1997] AC 286.

⁵⁵⁸ See Hough v Chief Constable of Staffordshire [2001] EWCA Civ 39.

⁵⁵⁹ Lock v Ashton (1848) 12 QB 871. Cf Marrinan v Vibart [1963] 1 QB 528, [1962] 3 All ER 380.

⁵⁶⁰ Harnett v Bond [1925] AC 669. D's report caused V to be taken to an asylum; D was not liable for the imprisonment after the doctor at the asylum had examined V and decided to detain him. Cf Pike v Waldrum [1952] 1 Lloyd's Rep 431.

⁵⁶¹ See Austin v Dowling (1870) LR 5 C & P 534 at 540.

⁵⁶² R Clayton and H Tomlinson, Civil Actions against the Police (3rd edn, 2005) para 4-046. See also Ahmed v Shafique [2009] EWHC 618 (QB).

⁵⁶³ cf Clarence (1888) 22 QBD 23 at 36, per Wills J. ⁵⁶⁴ [1915] AC 67, HL.

⁵⁶⁵ Unless, perhaps, the contract was that V should be entitled to leave only on the fulfilment of some reasonable condition: Robinson v Balmain New Ferry Co Ltd [1910] AC 295, PC. Sed quaere whether one is entitled to restrain another from leaving even if it is a breach of contract for him to do so. The contract can hardly be specifically enforceable.

⁵⁶⁶ [1913] 3 KB at 787 and 793.

⁵⁶⁷ (1902) 20 Cox CC 210.

date gives rise to an action in false imprisonment, even if the failure was in good faith. And it ought to make no difference that D's duty to release V arises out of a contract:

If a man gets into an express train and the doors are locked pending its arrival at its destination, he is not entitled, merely because the train has been stopped by signal, to call for the doors to be opened to let him out.⁵⁶⁸

But if he is kept locked in for a day at his destination this surely ought to be false imprisonment. And even if there is no remedy in tort this is no reason why the omission should not be held to be criminal. The CLRC were of the opinion that the crime of false imprisonment is, and ought to be, capable of commission by omission.⁵⁶⁹

16.11.2.2 Unlawful restraint

The imprisonment must be 'false'; that is, unlawful. A convicted person sentenced to imprisonment may be lawfully confined in any prison and, as against prison officers so confining him in good faith, he has no 'residual liberty'. If he is subjected to intolerable conditions he may have other remedies⁵⁷⁰ but he cannot sue (or, it may be assumed, prosecute) the officers for false imprisonment.⁵⁷¹ It might, however, be false imprisonment for a fellow prisoner, or an officer acting in bad faith outside the scope of his duty, to lock him in a confined space, such as a hut, within the prison. In Iqbal v Prison Officers Association,⁵⁷² the failure to allow I, a serving prisoner, out of his cell on the day of unlawful strike action by prison officers, did not give rise to a claim for false imprisonment against the officers.

A parent may lawfully exercise restraint over a child, so long as he remains within the bounds of reasonable parental discipline and does not act in contravention of a court order,⁵⁷³ or s 58 of the Children Act 2004. Where a girl of 14 or 15 was fostered out by her father with the consent and assistance of the local authority and he abducted her against her will and with intent to take her to her country of origin, it was for the jury to say whether they were satisfied that this was outside the bounds of legitimate parental discipline and correction.⁵⁷⁴ A defendant charged with false imprisonment may rely on other justifications, such as the prevention of crime.⁵⁷⁵

The question of false imprisonment most commonly arises in connection with the exercise of powers of arrest. If such powers are exceeded, there is a false imprisonment. The principal powers are as follows.

Arrest by a constable under a valid warrant

Where a warrant is issued but the justice lacks jurisdiction to issue the warrant, the constable who arrests under the warrant is statutorily protected⁵⁷⁶ from any 'action' if he acts in ⁵⁶⁸ Herd v Weardale Steel, Coal and Coke Co Ltd [1915] AC 67 at 71, per Lord Haldane. See M Amos, 'A Note on Contractual Restraint of Liberty' (1928) 44 LQR 464; KF Tan, 'A Misconceived Issue in the Tort of False Imprisonment' (1981) 44 MLR 166.

⁵⁶⁹ Fourteenth Report, paras 253, 254.

⁵⁷⁰ See Krgozlu v MPC [2006] EWCA Civ 1691.

⁵⁷¹ Hague v Deputy Governor of Parkhurst Prison [1991] 3 All ER 733, HL. What if the conditions are so intolerable as to found a defence of necessity to a charge of escape (see Ch 10)? Is it false imprisonment to prevent such a prisoner from leaving the prison?

⁵⁷² [2009] EWCA Civ 1312.

⁵⁷³ Rahman (1985) 81 Cr App R 349, CA. Cf D [1984] AC 778, [1984] 1 All ER 574.

⁵⁷⁴ Rahman, ibid. In fact, D pleaded guilty, and his appeal was dismissed. Note s 121 of the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014 which makes it an offence to use violence, threats or any other form of coercion for the purpose of causing another person to enter into marriage and the Forced Marriage (Civil Protection) Act 2007, which creates forced marriage protection orders.

⁵⁷⁵ D acting to prevent theft relied on s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967: Bowden [2002] EWCA Civ 1279. See also Morris [2013] EWCA Crim 436, p 395; Faraj [2007] EWCA Crim 1033 (see Ch 10, p 405).

⁵⁷⁶ The Constables Protection Act 1750. See O'Connor v Isaacs [1956] 2 QB 288.

obedience to it. As the term 'action' is inappropriate to a criminal proceeding, a constable could not rely on the Act as a defence to criminal prosecution; but he would probably have a good defence on the ground of lack of mens rea.⁵⁷⁷ An arrest under warrant for a civil matter is unlawful if the arresting officer does not have the warrant in his possession.⁵⁷⁸

Arrest without warrant under PACE

The powers of police constables and others to arrest are governed by PACE. See ss 24 and 24A and the common law powers preserved under PACE.

Arrest for breach of the peace

The House of Lords held in *R (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire*⁵⁷⁹ that an arrest for an anticipated breach of the peace can only be legitimate where there is a reasonable apprehension⁵⁸⁰ of an imminent breach of the peace.⁵⁸¹ Moreover, in the absence of such an apprehension, there is no power to take preventive action falling short of arrest.

In Austin v MPC,⁵⁸² the House of Lords held that there was no false imprisonment when, in order to maintain order and public safety and to prevent the commission of offences, the police held several thousand people in a cordon on Oxford Street in London. Some of those people were not demonstrators. The containment of the individuals amounted to imprisonment, but it was not false imprisonment because the police were acting lawfully. The police action was found to be necessary in order to avoid an imminent breach of the peace (and the causing of serious injury) by some members of the crowd. The circumstances in which the police can detain V in order to avoid danger because of an imminent breach of the peace by X were said to be very strictly limited to extreme and exceptional circumstances. There is a breach of the peace whenever harm is actually done or is likely to be done to a person, or in his presence to his property, or a person is in fear of being so harmed through an assault, an affray, a riot or other disturbance.⁵⁸³ Public alarm, excitement or disturbance is not of itself a breach of the peace, unless it arises from actual or threatened violence.

16.11.3 Mens rea

Since the great majority of the reported cases are civil actions,⁵⁸⁴ there is little authority on the nature of the mens rea required for false imprisonment but, in Rahman,⁵⁸⁵ the court stated that 'false imprisonment consists in the unlawful and intentional or reckless restraint of a victim's freedom of movement from a particular place'. This was confirmed by *Hutchins*⁵⁸⁶ which held that the offence is one of 'basic intent' so that a belief caused by self-induced intoxication that the victim is consenting is no defence. The courts did not specify what kind of recklessness they had in mind; but a common law offence would naturally require Cunningham recklessness. This may be taken to be established now that it is settled ⁵⁷⁷ See later. ⁵⁷⁸ De Costa Small v Kirkpatrick (1978) 68 Cr App R 186, [1979] Crim LR 41.

⁵⁷⁹ [2007] 2 WLR 46.

⁵⁸⁰ The Court of Appeal has confirmed that on appeal it is not for the court to form its own assessment of whether a breach of the peace was imminent, rather it must evaluate the reasonableness of the apprehension of the police. See R (Moos) v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2012] EWCA Civ 12.

⁵⁸¹ This principle was affirmed in R (Wright) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2013] EWHC 2739 (QB) and R (Hicks) v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2014] EWCA Civ 3, [2014] Crim LR 681.

⁵⁸² [2009] UKHL 5, [2009] 2 WLR 372. The Grand Chamber of the Strasbourg Court dismissed the claimants' application. See (2012) 55 EHRR 14.

⁵⁸³ Howell (1981) 73 Cr App R 31 at 37. Lord Denning has said that even the lawful use of force is a breach of the peace: Chief Constable of Devon and Cornwall, ex p Central Electricity Generating Board [1981] 3 All ER 826 at 832; but this can hardly subject the person using such force to arrest.

⁵⁸⁴ Reckless indifference suffices for the tort: Muuse v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] EWCA Civ 453.

⁵⁸⁵ (1985) 81 Cr App R 349 at 353, CA, n 573.

⁵⁸⁶ [1988] Crim LR 379.

that assault requires Cunningham recklessness.⁵⁸⁷ Assault and false imprisonment are both common law offences and are so closely related that it is inconceivable that they should be governed by different principles of mens rea.

16.11.4 Reform

The Law Commission recommends the replacement of the common law offence of false imprisonment with a statutory offence entitled 'unlawful detention' but which in other respects retains the elements of the current law.⁵⁸⁸ The offence would be indictable only and carry a maximum life sentence.⁵⁸⁹

16.12 Kidnapping

Kidnapping has long been regarded as an aggravated form of false imprisonment⁵⁹⁰ so the rules of lawful excuse are, no doubt, the same. Both are common law offences, punishable with imprisonment or fine at the discretion of the court. It is generally regarded as important to have a separate offence of kidnap to reflect the distinctive wrongdoing involved in the taking or carrying away which distinguishes kidnap from false imprisonment.⁵⁹¹

In R v D,⁵⁹² the House of Lords gave what purported to be an authoritative account of the law of kidnapping:

First, the nature of the offence is an attack on, and infringement of, the personal liberty of an individual. Second, the offence contains four ingredients as follows: (1) the taking or carrying away of one person by another, (2) by force or by fraud, (3) without the consent of the person so taken or carried away and (4) without lawful excuse. Third, until the comparatively recent abolition by statute of the division of criminal offences into the two categories of felonies and misdemeanours (see s1 of the Criminal Law Act 1967), the offence of kidnapping was categorised by the common law as a misdemeanour only. Fourth, despite that, kidnapping was always regarded, by reason of its nature, as a grave and (to use the language of an earlier age) heinous offence. Fifth, in earlier days the offence contained a further ingredient, namely that the taking or carrying away should be from a place within the jurisdiction to another place outside it; this further ingredient has, however, long been obsolete and forms no necessary part of the offence today. Sixth, the offence was in former days described not merely as taking or carrying away a person but further or alternatively as secreting him; this element of secretion has, however, also become obsolete, so that, although it may be present in a particular case, it adds nothing to the basic ingredient of taking or carrying away.

⁵⁸⁷ See p 102. ⁵⁸⁸ See LC 355, para 4.238.

⁵⁸⁹ See Trifonova (Rossitza) [2017] EWCA Crim 240.

⁵⁹⁰ East, I PC, 429. On the history, see D Napier, 'Detention Offences at Common Law' in Reshaping the Criminal Law, 198. More recently, in Vu [2012] 2 SCR 411, the Supreme Court of Canada analysed the common law origins of the offence.

⁵⁹¹ See the analysis in LC 355, paras 4.66 et seq in which the Law Commission identifies the additional mischiefs in kidnap over and above those, or at least different to those, in false imprisonment, including the additional danger in which V is placed by being made to travel with D, the greater anxiety that would cause V and the enhanced wrong on D's part by demonstrating such control over V's autonomy by compelling V to remain in his continued presence. These aggravated harms and wrongs are most obvious when D uses force or threats to cause V to move with him.

⁵⁹² [1984] AC 778, [1984] Crim LR 558. Kidnapping had not previously been satisfactorily defined: see Napier, n 590. The Law Commission Draft Criminal Code, cl 81, proposed radical amendment to the offence by restricting it to cases of carrying away for ulterior purposes—to commit a serious offence.

In defining the offence in that way, Lord Brandon's attempts to consolidate earlier interpretations resulted in a considerable degree of overlap and this prompted the Law Commission to recommend a simplification of the offence in a statutory form.

Following decisions in which the Court of Appeal has struggled to identify whether the core of the offence lies in the wrong of taking and carrying away by fraud or force or the harm in terms of deprivation of liberty, the law is in a state of some confusion.⁵⁹³

In Cort,⁵⁹⁴ D had on a number of occasions stopped his car at bus stops, falsely stating to women in the queue that the bus they awaited had broken down and offered them a lift. On two occasions women got into the car. One changed her mind and asked to be let out of the car and D complied; the other was taken to her destination without being assaulted by D in any way. D was convicted of two counts of kidnapping. The Court of Appeal upheld the conviction, finding that D had defrauded VV as to the nature of the act. In this case it was held that the complainants did not consent to the events; they only consented to a ride in the car, but the ride in the car was a 'different thing' from that with which D was charged. That decision is no longer to be followed in light of the decision in Hendy-Freegard.⁵⁹⁵ H was convicted of two offences of kidnapping and a number of offences of dishonesty. H had 'an astonishing capacity to deceive', and managed to persuade three victims that he was an MI5 agent who had been investigating an IRA cell at their college. He persuaded them to leave the college and travel around the country, with periods of settlement, for a period of up to ten years. During that period, he financially exploited them. H's conviction for kidnapping was quashed as the Court of Appeal, rightly it is submitted, concluded that because H did not accompany the victims this meant that there was no kidnap. In the course of the judgment, the Lord Chief Justice emphasized that the prosecution had to establish that the victim was deprived of his or her liberty.

Confusion remains as to the relationship between the elements of: (a) the deprivation of liberty; (b) the absence of consent; (c) being taken or carried away; (d) the use of force or fraud; and (e) the absence of a lawful excuse. In particular, it is difficult to determine whether the force or fraud must be the means of carrying away (as Lord Brandon's speech and Cort suggest) or the reason for the lack of consent. A further question is whether the consent must be: (a) to the taking or carrying away; (b) the deprivation of liberty; (c) both; or (d) being taken by force or fraud.⁵⁹⁶

It is submitted that there must be an act of force or fraud which results in V being taken or carried away and that by that act of taking or carrying away without consent, V must be deprived of liberty without lawful excuse.

16.12.1 Deprivation of liberty

The definition offered in D fails to clarify whether the offence requires proof of a deprivation of liberty. Prior to D, commentators had expressly defined the offence in terms of a deprivation of liberty and carrying away from the place where the victim wanted to be.⁵⁹⁷ It is difficult to see how there could be a kidnap if V was not deprived of his liberty. It is submitted that following the decision in Hendy-Freegard, this is now reconfirmed as a core element of the offence. Whether someone is deprived of his liberty is to be determined in the same ⁵⁹³ For further analysis, see LCCP 200, Simplification of the Criminal Law: Kidnapping (2011). See also J Herring, 'What's Wrong with Kidnapping?' [2012] Crim LR 343; LC 355, para 2.10.

⁵⁹⁴ [2003] EWCA Crim 2149, [2004] Crim LR 64.

⁵⁹⁵ [2007] EWCA Crim 1236, CA.

⁵⁹⁶ These criticisms were cited with approval by the Lord Chief Justice in Kayani [2011] EWCA Crim 2871, [2012] Crim LR 232.

⁵⁹⁷ See the 5th edition of this book, at p 388; Archbold (40th edn, 1979) para 2796.

way as for the offence of false imprisonment. A deprivation of liberty is a necessary but not a sufficient basis of liability for kidnap.

It seems clear that if V has consented to the deprivation of liberty there can be no kidnapping. If V consents, for example, to being locked up (either as part of a prank or a role play in sadomasochism, etc) there is no offence of false imprisonment or of kidnap. There is consent to the deprivation of liberty.

Applying orthodox principles discussed earlier in this chapter, if D has deprived V of her liberty by deceiving her as to the nature of the act or as to his identity, there will be no valid consent. The usual difficulties will arise as to whether the fraud was as to the nature or identity. The case of *Wellard*⁵⁹⁸ might be best interpreted as involving a fraud as to identity. In Wellard, D was held to have 'taken' V when by impersonating a police officer he tricked V into his car in order to submit to a 'drugs search'. That case also suggests that there is a sufficient deprivation of liberty if V does not believe that she can move. This will usually arise because of D's deception.⁵⁹⁹

16.12.2 Taking and carrying away

There is no doubt that this is also an important element of the offence. The requirements of carrying away and the use of force or fraud seem to be the principal factors distinguishing kidnapping from false imprisonment.⁶⁰⁰ It seems that every kidnapping is also a false imprisonment but a detention without any taking away or force or fraud (eg D merely turns the key intentionally locking V in the room) is only the latter offence. Where D has taken or carried V away by force or fraud, he may be convicted of both offences.⁶⁰¹ The crime is complete when V is deprived of her liberty and carried away from the place where she wished to be.⁶⁰²

The courts have failed to define what the term 'taking or carrying away' means. Lord Brandon used the terms as alternatives, which suggests that there is some difference between them. Carried implies some movement, and as we know from Hendy-Freegard, D must accompany V. If 'takes' implies a different action, it could mean 'seizes', but if that means no more than a stationary capture of V by D, that would be difficult to reconcile with the requirement in Hendy-Freegard. It is submitted that the word 'takes' here should not be construed so as to extend the offence of kidnap to include stationary detention that would amount to no more than false imprisonment.

The courts have failed to spell out the relationship between the element of taking or carrying away and the deprivation of liberty.⁶⁰³ It is submitted that the most logical interpretation of the offence may be that the act of taking or carrying away must be the cause of the deprivation of liberty. The decision in Hendy-Freegard supports this interpretation by concluding that there is no kidnap where V is taken or carried away by force or fraud (as in Cort) if not also deprived of her liberty. In Cort, for example, it would now seem to be accepted that the passengers accepting the lifts were defrauded as to being carried away, but not deprived of their liberty since they would be free to leave at any time they wished—as demonstrated by the fact that D did let one of the women out of the car immediately when ⁵⁹⁸ [1978] 3 All ER 161. ⁵⁹⁹ See LC 355, para 4.190.

⁶⁰⁰ See also the Canadian Supreme Court's analysis of the English common law in Vu [2012] 2 SCR 411. It was observed that, 'it is the element of movement that differentiated kidnapping from the lesser included offence of false imprisonment and made kidnapping an aggravated form of false imprisonment. The underlying concern was that by carrying the victim away, the kidnappers would be taking him or her beyond the protection of the country's laws.' At [31].

⁶⁰¹ Brown [1985] Crim LR 398, CA (five years' imprisonment concurrent on both counts upheld).

⁶⁰² Wellard [1978] 1 WLR 921. ⁶⁰³ See LC 355, paras 2.4 and 4.197.

she so requested. D could be interpreted more narrowly, to require deprivation of liberty in the course of taking or carrying away.

In Hendy-Freegard, Lord Phillips CJ stated that:

We cannot see that there was justification for extending the offence of kidnapping to cover the situation in which the driver of the car has no intention of detaining his passenger against her will nor of doing other than taking her to the destination to which she wishes to go, simply because in some such circumstances the driver may have an objectionable ulterior motive. The consequence of the decision in Cort would seem to be that the mini-cab driver, who obtains a fare by falsely pretending to be an authorised taxi, will be guilty of kidnapping.⁶⁰⁴

It is clear, following Hendy-Freegard, that D must accompany V at the time that V is alleged to be taken or carried away. The Crown's expansive interpretation argued for in Hendy-Freegard would have rendered guilty the practical joker who telephoned V and induced him to attend a hospital and remain there on the pretext that his wife had been in an accident. That would clearly go too far.⁶⁰⁵

Interpreting D in light of subsequent cases, the taking and carrying away must be by force or fraud (see the following section). It is not enough, then, that D asks V to accompany him and practises no fraud and offers no menace or threat to V, even if V is then deprived of liberty at their destination. As noted previously, it is submitted that to constitute kidnapping, the taking or carrying away must also be such as will deprive V of her liberty at that time. On a narrow interpretation of D, it is not sufficient that D persuades V by some fraud to accompany him to a place where he proposes to deprive her of her liberty if, during the period of her transmission to that place, D is prepared to release her at any time she requests. That would seem to follow from the decision in Hendy-Freegard interpreting Cort.⁶⁰⁶

In D, Lord Brandon states, explicitly, that the taking or carrying away must be by force or fraud and without consent. If a deprivation of liberty is also an essential element of the offence, and a lack of consent is an integral part of that element of the offence, the question arises: what part does consent have to play in taking and carrying away? If V is not consenting to the deprivation of her liberty, D ought to be guilty of kidnap irrespective of whether the force or fraud used to take or carry V away was sufficient to vitiate V's consent to that act of being carried or taken away.⁶⁰⁷

16.12.2.1 'Force or fraud'

The formulation in D creates problems. It is necessary to prove a taking or carrying away by force or fraud and absence of consent (whether that absence of consent was because of the force or fraud or not). If D's force or fraud taking V away also causes V's lack of consent, then no problem arises. If D's force or fraud that causes V to be taken or carried away is not of such gravity that it vitiates consent (eg a deception about a peripheral matter), it must be shown that V did not consent for some other reason. More problematic still is a case where ⁶⁰⁴ At [55]. The Lord Chief Justice referred to the criticisms of Cort made in the 11th edition. Cort was also doubted by the Court of Appeal in Nnamdi [2005] EWCA Crim 74.

⁶⁰⁵ The difficulty is to identify any serious offence in such cases. If D phones V and tells her falsely that D holds X hostage and that he will kill X unless V goes to a particular venue and remains there, what crime has been committed? There is no threat to X, nor to V.

⁶⁰⁶ In Archer [2011] EWCA Crim 2252, [2012] Crim LR 292, the Court of Appeal upheld D's conviction for kidnapping when he forced D, by threatening her with serious assault, to drive V and two others to a particular location. D did not take control of the car, it was driven by V. As Ashworth notes, this amounts to a 'carrying away' if not literally a 'taking' but nevertheless falls within the mischief at which the offence is aimed. Problematically, the Court of Appeal came to this conclusion with little citation of authority.

⁶⁰⁷ That may be an assault.

D uses force or fraud and V is not consenting for a reason unconnected to force or fraud (eg a general lack of capacity). There would, on a literal reading of D, be no offence unless the taking was shown to be ‘by’ force or fraud.

Force or fraud and consent

For the reasons discussed in the previous paragraph, it is submitted that if the force or fraud vitiates the consent to the taking or carrying away and that taking or carrying away causes V to be deprived of her liberty without consent, the offence will be committed.

Force

Clearly, where D forces V by violence or threats⁶⁰⁸ of violence to be taken or carried away that should be sufficient to satisfy this element of the offence. It may be that lesser threats or trivial force ought to be sufficient for kidnapping. The Court of Appeal has suggested that the element of force sufficient to vitiate consent may be established by no more than submission.⁶⁰⁹ Presumably the same is true of force sufficient to lead to taking away. The force used must be sufficient to cause V to be taken or carried away. In addition, if it is alleged that the taking or carrying away is by force, that taking or carrying away (and hence the force used to achieve it) must be sufficient to deprive V of her liberty without her consent. The relationship between deprivation of liberty and being taken away once again arises.

Fraud

What types of fraud will suffice? The answer is, it is submitted, contained within the previous analysis. The fraud used must be sufficient to cause V to be taken or carried away. Any fraud (not just those as to identity and nature) may suffice to cause V to be carried away. There is also a question of whether V is consenting to being taken and carried away. The absence of consent may arise from D’s fraud or from some other basis (eg lack of capacity). It is possible to envisage a case in which D uses fraud on V to cause her to be carried away, but in which V is not actually deprived of her liberty by that act of taking away. This would seem to follow from Hendy-Freegard’s interpretation of Cort.

Adopting general principles to frauds vitiating consent, any fraud as to the identity of the actor should suffice. In this context, it is submitted that there is a stronger claim than in most circumstances for a fraud as to certain attributes of the actor and not just his correct name or identity being sufficient. Thus, as in Wellard,⁶¹⁰ the impersonation of a police officer should suffice to negate the consent of the person. Other examples might include impersonation of State officials, paramedics, etc.

In addition to frauds as to identity, it is recognized that frauds as to the nature of the act will vitiate consent. This is where the most significant difficulties arise, as illustrated by the cases on sexual offences discussed in Ch 17. There is also the question of whether a fraud as to the ‘purpose’ of the taking will suffice to vitiate consent. Consider D who falsely tells V that her husband is injured and he drives her home (because he enjoys her company). Or consider D, who tells his 17-year-old daughter that they are to travel abroad to visit an ailing relative when his true motive is for her to take part in an arranged marriage. The destination, manner of transport, etc are identical so the nature of the carrying away is not affected by the fraud. But note the decision in Nnamdi,⁶¹¹ in which on the facts the court did not find ⁶⁰⁸ The Court of Appeal accepted in Archer, n 606, that the reference to force in D extends to a threat of force and is not limited to the actual infliction of force. As noted earlier, there was little analysis of previous authorities.

⁶⁰⁹ See Greenhalgh [2001] EWCA Crim 1367.

⁶¹⁰ [1978] 3 All ER 161.

⁶¹¹ [2005] EWCA Crim 74.

it necessary to determine, on a charge of conspiracy to kidnap, whether telling V that she should meet D to join his modelling agency would be a sufficient fraud.

Force or fraud sufficient to vitiate consent to deprivation of liberty

On this literal approach to D, the elements of force or fraud represent routes through which the prosecution might establish the absence of consent to the fundamental question whether V was consenting to the deprivation of liberty arising from the taking or carrying away. It is an interpretation which resonates with Lord Brandon's emphasis in D that, 'the nature of the offence is an attack on, and infringement of, the personal liberty of an individual'.

16.12.2.2 Without lawful excuse

What amounts to a lawful excuse is left completely at large; and whether a taking by a parent amounts to kidnapping is likely to be resolved in the same way whether the court proceeds by the route of deciding (as the majority in *Reid*⁶¹² would), whether there is a lawful excuse or by deciding (as Lord Bridge would) whether the offence extends to those further circumstances. If a 12-year-old child refuses to return home from a visit to his grandmother's and his father forcibly carries him off, he surely commits no offence. The majority would say, presumably, because the father has a lawful excuse and Lord Bridge, because kidnapping does not extend to those circumstances. The result is the same. The question must be whether the parent has gone beyond what is reasonable in the exercise of parental authority.

Where V is not D's child and D is not acting in pursuance of any statutory authority or power of arrest, 'lawful excuse' is likely to be narrowly confined. In Henman,⁶¹³ D was guilty of attempted kidnapping when he tried to take by force an acquaintance whom he believed to be in moral and spiritual danger from a religious sect to which she belonged. There was no lawful excuse because there was no 'necessity recognized by the law as such' for D's conduct.

16.12.2.3 Who may be kidnapped?

It was held in *Reid*⁶¹⁴ that a husband may be convicted of kidnapping his wife and in D that a father may be guilty of kidnapping his child. It was recognized that, until modern times, it may be that an indictment of a father for kidnapping his child would have failed because of the paramount stature of his position in the family; but common law principles adapt and develop in the light of radically changed social conventions and conditions. Lord Bridge held that parental kidnapping includes the case (as in D) where the parent acts in contravention of the order of a competent court, leaving open the question whether a parent might be convicted in any other circumstances; but the majority preferred to hold simply that the parent is guilty where he acts 'without lawful excuse'.⁶¹⁵

In cases of fraud, the offence might be regarded as seriously deficient in protecting children. V must be deprived of her liberty without consent, and it will be possible to say that in the case of a young child⁶¹⁶ who lacks the understanding or intelligence to give consent, the absence of ⁶¹² [1973] QB 299.

⁶¹³ [1987] Crim LR 333, CA.

⁶¹⁴ [1973] QB 299.

⁶¹⁵ In Kayani [2011] EWCA Crim 2871, Lord Judge CJ observed that simply because a child has been taken by a parent, it no longer necessarily follows that for policy reasons a charge of kidnapping must always be deemed inappropriate. The court invited the Law Commission to address the question whether cases in which children are removed from one parent by the other should be treated as kidnapping offences. See now LC 355, Ch 5.

⁶¹⁶ In the case of an older child, it is a question of fact for the jury whether (a) the child has sufficient understanding and, if so, (b) it in fact consented. Lord Brandon thought that a jury would usually find that a child under 14 lacked sufficient understanding to give consent; but this surely underestimates the capacity of the modern child. Reliance might be placed on the Mental Capacity Act 2005, discussed earlier. Cf Cooper [2009] UKHL 42 on the capacity concept in consent in sex cases (p 763).

consent is a necessary inference. However, the present definition requires there to be a carrying or taking away by force or fraud. In the case of a young child, D may not need to use force or fraud (unless those words are very broadly construed) to succeed in taking V away, as where a toddler is persuaded by true statements ('I'll buy you sweets') to accompany D. Arguably, such cases need not be kidnapping since they constitute false imprisonment which is equally punishable so, though it looks a little odd if a baby cannot be kidnapped,⁶¹⁷ no great harm is done.

16.12.2.4 Reform

The Law Commission has recommended that the common law offence be abolished and a simple statutory offence of kidnapping be created. The offence would be committed where D: (a) without lawful authority or reasonable excuse; (b) intentionally uses force or threats of force; (c) in order to take V or otherwise cause V to move with him. The offence would be indictable only and carry a maximum life sentence.⁶¹⁸

16.13 Other abduction offences

16.13.1 Abduction of children

The Child Abduction Act 1984, as amended including by the Children Act 1989, creates two offences of abduction of a child under the age of 16. The offences encompass a broad spectrum of criminal behaviour, as Lord Judge CJ recognized in Kayani.⁶¹⁹

16.13.1.1 Abduction by parents/guardians

The first offence, under s 1, arises where a child is taken or sent out⁶²⁰ of the UK 'without the appropriate consent'.

Takes or sends

There is a clear lacuna since as the Divisional Court held in Nicolaou that the expression 'takes or send out of the United Kingdom' relates to the removal of the child from the jurisdiction, not to the position once the child has left the country. The issue is whether the appropriate consent existed at the time the child left the jurisdiction. The court rejected the submission that the phrase connotes a continuing activity. The Law Commission has recommended that the lacuna be closed and that the offence apply to detaining⁶²¹ as well as taking and sending.

⁶¹⁷ See G Williams, 'Can Babies be Kidnapped?' [1989] Crim LR 473. See the comments of Munby LJ in Re HM [2010] EWHC 870 (Fam) calling for law reform in this area.

⁶¹⁸ LC 355, para 4.231.

⁶¹⁹ [2011] EWCA Crim 2871, [2012] Crim LR 232. His lordship stated that: 'Child abduction, like every other offence, can take many forms. It may include the abduction of a child for a few days, or even a week or two, followed by the child's return, effectively undamaged, and, more important, although the parent from whom the separation was effected has suffered distress and anxiety in the meantime, with the loving relationship between parent and child quite unharmed. At the other extreme there are offences of forced marriage which ultimately culminate in what in reality is rape, or cases like the present, where the child is deliberately taken abroad and separated from one of its parents for many years, and the ordinary loving relationship which each should enjoy with the other is irremediably severed.' At [2]. Kayani [2012] 2 Cr App R (S) 38 and SB [2012] 2 Cr App R (S) 408 and 'a number of other decisions of this court' were considered in RH [2016] EWCA Crim 1754.

⁶²⁰ In R (Nicolaou) v Redbridge Magistrates' Court [2012] EWHC 1647 (Admin). Given the fact that the purpose of the offence is the protection of children, such a narrow interpretation of s 1 is somewhat surprising. For further criticism see [2013] Crim LR 54.

⁶²¹ See LC 355, Ch 5.

Connection with the child

The offence may be committed as a principal⁶²² only by a person 'connected with' the child. A person 'connected with' a child is: (a) the child's parent; (b) in the case of a child whose parents were not married at the time of birth, a man in respect of whom there are reasonable grounds for believing him to be the father; (c) a guardian; (d) a special guardian;⁶²³ (e) a person in whose favour 'a residence order'⁶²⁴ is in force with respect to the child; or (f) a person having custody.

The 'appropriate consent' is the consent of each of the child's mother, the child's father if he has 'parental responsibility'⁶²⁵ for him, any guardian, any special guardian, any person in whose favour a residence order is in force with respect to the child and any person having custody of him; or the leave of the court under the Children Act 1989,⁶²⁶ or, in the case of any person having custody, the leave of the court which awarded custody.

The offence is not committed where a person in whose favour a residence order is in force takes or sends the child out of the UK for a period of less than one month or if he is a special guardian of the child and he takes or sends the child out of the UK for a period of less than three months unless, in either case, this is a breach of an order under Part II of the Children Act 1989.

The Act provides defences for which D bears an evidential burden and the prosecution the burden of proof where:

- (1) D believes that he has the appropriate consent or that he would have it if the person or persons whose consent is required were aware of all the relevant circumstances; or
- (2) he has taken all reasonable steps to communicate with those persons but has been unsuccessful; or
- (3) the other person has unreasonably refused to consent.

The Court of Appeal held in *S(C)*⁶²⁷ that necessity cannot be pleaded as a defence to a charge under s 1. The court reasoned that it would be inimical to the aims of the legislation for individuals to avoid liability by pleading such a defence. Whether this is true of other common law defences remains to be seen, but it is submitted that the court's reasoning applies with equal force to duress of circumstances. It may therefore be the case that the only defences that can be pleaded to a charge of child abduction are those that exist within the legislative scheme.

16.13.1.2 Abduction otherwise than by parents/guardians

The second offence, which arises under s 2, requires an intentional or reckless taking or detention of a child under the age of 16.⁶²⁸ It is committed where a person who is:

- (1) not the mother of 'the child in question';⁶²⁹ or ⁶²² A person who is not 'connected with' the child may be convicted as a secondary party or conspirator: Sherry and El Yamani [1993] Crim LR 537.

⁶²³ As inserted by the Adoption Act 2002.

⁶²⁴ As defined in s 8(1) of the Children Act 1989.

⁶²⁵ As defined in s 3 of the Children Act 1989.

⁶²⁶ Note the amendments under the Adoption and Children Act 2002, s 139(1).

⁶²⁷ [2012] EWCA Crim 389, [2012] Crim LR 623.

⁶²⁸ D will not be guilty if he had a genuine belief that V was over the age of 16: s 2(3)(b). The court emphasized in Heys and Murtagh [2011] EWCA Crim 2112 that the belief need not be reasonable.

⁶²⁹ This means the child actually taken: Berry [1996] 2 Cr App R 226, [1996] Crim LR 574 where D, the father of S1, took S2, believing she was S1. For criticism, see the commentary by JC Smith in [1996] Crim LR 386.

- (2) where the parents were married at the time of the birth, his father or guardian, custodian or a person in whose favour a residence order is in force, takes or detains the child without lawful authority or reasonable excuse:
- (a) so as to remove him from the lawful control of any person having lawful control of him; or
 - (b) so as to keep him out of the lawful control of any person entitled to lawful control of him.

There are therefore four ways in which the offences can be committed.

‘Detaining’ is defined in s 3 to include causing the child to be detained or inducing the child to remain with the accused or another person. ‘Taking’ is defined in s 3 so as to include causing or inducing the child to accompany the accused or any other person or causing the child to be taken. ‘Remove’ does not require any ‘geographical’ removal—it is not the removal of the child but removal of control of the child which is material. ‘Lawful control’ is not defined in the Act and the courts have declined to define it. The concept varies according to the person said to have control—for example, parent, schoolteacher or nanny. A relevant question is whether the child was deflected by D from doing that to which his lawful controller had consented into some other activity. Has D substituted his authority or will for that of the lawful controller? There was evidence on which a jury could find that D had taken control where he persuaded a 14-year-old boy on his way home from school to go to D’s flat,⁶³⁰ and where he persuaded children to go with him to look for a bicycle which he said had been stolen.⁶³¹

It is immaterial that the child consented to the lawful removal from the lawful control.⁶³² In the case of X,⁶³³ D was convicted of abducting a child, V, contrary to s 2(1)(b). D, a woman, was a drug addict and sex worker and had befriended V aged 13. V was dressed in a manner suggesting she was soliciting.⁶³⁴ V persistently ran away from home. V was found in the company of D in the red light district. V said in her evidence that she had no intention of returning to her mother whether she was with D or not. On those facts, it was debatable whether the conduct of D was any cause at all of V’s absence, but the Court of Appeal held that the issue was rightly left to the jury.⁶³⁵

The words ‘so as to’ are ambiguous. Two conflicting decisions added to the confusion. In Mousir, the Court of Appeal held that the words import an element of actus reus (that D’s conduct had the objective consequence of removing the child from lawful control) but not mens rea (that D intended to remove lawful control) but in the extradition case of *Re Owens*⁶³⁶ the Divisional Court, without being referred to Mousir, concluded that proof of mens rea was required. The Divisional Court in *Foster*⁶³⁷ favoured the conclusion in Mousir.

In Mousir, the court held that D’s conduct had to bring about a sufficient degree of interference with the lawful control of the child,⁶³⁸ but that the concept of control did not require an assessment of the individual child’s maturity. The conclusion that the words import such an ⁶³⁰ Mousir [1987] Crim LR 561.

⁶³¹ Leather (1993) 98 Cr App R 179. See also Norman [2008] EWCA Crim 1810 (D unfit to plead on facts).

⁶³² A [2001] Cr App R 418. ⁶³³ [2010] EWCA Crim 2367.

⁶³⁴ The judge’s direction on recklessness was appealed but, although unnecessary on the facts, was held not to be in error following, as it did, Foster v DPP [2005] 1 WLR 1400 discussed later.

⁶³⁵ See also R v A [2000] 2 All ER 177.

⁶³⁶ [2000] 1 Cr App R 195.

⁶³⁷ [2004] EWHC 2955 (Admin), [2005] Crim LR 639. Cf Wakeman [2011] EWCA Crim 1649. See also Hunter [2015] All ER (D) 196 (Jan): the crime is one of basic intent. The judge had correctly explained that the prosecution had to prove their allegation that the defendant had deliberately encouraged the complainant to get into his car, following which she had been raped by his co-defendants.

⁶³⁸ Where, as in that case, the charge is one of attempt, the issue is whether the acts are more than merely preparatory to that effect.

element of actus reus seems, with respect, to be correct in principle. The natural meaning of the term ‘so as to’ is ‘with the effect of’ removing the child from lawful control. It introduces a causal element additional to the actus reus of ‘taking’ or ‘detaining’.⁶³⁹ Owens does not contradict this. Simon Brown LJ stated that ‘the words “so as to” mean “with the intention of” rather than merely with the effect of’.⁶⁴⁰ In Re Owens, the Divisional Court expressly held that D must ‘intend’ to interfere with another person’s lawful control of the child.⁶⁴¹ The court in Mousir had accepted counsel’s concession that the phrase did not import an element of mens rea—that D had knowledge as to the effect of his conduct being the removal of the child from lawful control. Since the offence charged in that case was one of attempt, the element of intention would be required separately under the Criminal Attempts Act 1981.

In Foster,⁶⁴² the court concluded that the emphasis on mens rea in Owens was unnecessary to reach the result in that case, suggesting that Owens should have been treated as a case in which D had a lawful excuse rather than one in which she lacked mens rea. The court stated that the mens rea for the s 2 offence is:

an intentional or reckless taking or detention of a child under the age of sixteen, the effect or objective consequence of which is to remove or to keep that child within the meaning of section 2(1)(a) or (b).

The Divisional Court considered the scope of the offence is Shepherd v CPS.⁶⁴³ The appellant had been served with a Child Abduction Warning Notice informing him that a mother had not given him permission to communicate with her daughter or allow her daughter to enter or stay in his home or be in his company. The daughter, who was 14 years old at the time, went to the appellant’s house and asked if she could come in to make a roll-up cigarette. The appellant allowed her in and he was charged with detaining a child without lawful authority. It was submitted on behalf of the appellant that the child had voluntarily entered his home and that he had therefore done nothing to cause her to be detained so as to be out of her mother’s lawful control. The Divisional Court, in dismissing his appeal, held that the wishes of the child were irrelevant to whether the appellant had committed the offence. There was an inducement by the appellant’s positive act of allowing the child to remain. Furthermore, the appellant’s action in allowing the child to enter and remain in his house was sufficient to constitute the keeping of a child who was under the control of her mother.

Note that Art 8 of the ECHR—the right to respect for private life—may impose positive obligations on the State to respect family life. This may include an obligation on the State to provide safeguards against abduction.⁶⁴⁴

16.14 Harassment

16.14.1 Background

Prior to 1997, the criminal law struggled to provide protection for those who suffered at the hands of so-called ‘stalkers’.⁶⁴⁵ It was difficult for the law to tackle an activity which was in ⁶³⁹ It is possible that D might remove or detain a child without lawful excuse but without causing him to be removed from lawful custody where D also removed or detained the lawful custodian.

⁶⁴⁰ Emphasis added, at 201. ⁶⁴¹ [2000] 1 Cr App R 195. ⁶⁴² [2004] EWHC 2955 (Admin).

⁶⁴³ [2017] EWHC 2566 (Admin).

⁶⁴⁴ Iglesias Gil and AIU v Spain (App no 56673/00) 2003; Maire v Portugal (App no 48206/99) 2003; D (A Child) (Abduction: Rights of Custody) [2006] UKHL 51. See also Ljungqvist v Sweden [2014] ACD 173(60), DC.

⁶⁴⁵ See R Babcock, ‘The Psychology of Stalking’ in P Infield and G Platford, The Law of Harassment and Stalking (2000); N Addison and T Lawson-Cruttenden, Harassment Law and Practice (1998). The offence is further amended by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, s 125.

part an infringement of privacy,⁶⁴⁶ in part an offence against the person, with some forms of the conduct also having a public order dimension. The use of tortious remedies to tackle behaviour which amounted to stalking was severely curtailed by the decision of the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf.⁶⁴⁷ The Lords held that only those who had a right to exclusive possession of the land could sue in nuisance. Recourse was had to the criminal law and prosecutors relied on offences of public nuisance, specific offences relating to malicious communications or telecommunications where possible, or public order offences and offences against the person. These efforts to combat what was perceived as a growing social menace were assisted by the courts' acceptance that psychiatric injury was a sufficient basis for a finding of actual or grievous bodily harm⁶⁴⁸ and by the House of Lords' acceptance that assault could be committed by words alone or even by a silent telephone call.⁶⁴⁹ These extended interpretations were not always well received⁶⁵⁰ but led to convictions.

Parliament nevertheless felt that a specific offence was needed and, following consultation⁶⁵¹ and an unseemly rush through Parliament, the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 was enacted.⁶⁵² The draftsman faced a formidable difficulty in defining 'stalking' without over-criminalizing. The conduct complained of as harassing behaviour may include acts of apparent kindness, such as repeated sending of flowers or seemingly innocuous conduct, such as walking by the victim's house. As the minister stated:

Stalkers do not stick to activities on a list. Stalkers and other weirdos [sic] who pursue women, [sic] cause racial harassment and annoy their neighbours have a wide range of activity which it is impossible to define.⁶⁵³

As Wells observes, the Act follows a pattern all too common in recent years of 'addressing a narrowly conceived social harm with a widely drawn provision, often supplementing and overlapping with existing offences'.⁶⁵⁴ The flexibility allows for the offence to be used in respect of stalking, persistent protestors, bullying,⁶⁵⁵ etc.

In Smith,⁶⁵⁶ the Court of Appeal defined 'harassment' as follows: 'Essentially, it involves persistent conduct of a seriously oppressive nature, either physically or mentally, targeted at an individual and resulting in fear or distress.' The definition was considered more recently in N.⁶⁵⁷ At trial the judge defined harassment by reference to s 7(2), but equated harassment with alarm or distress, rather than directing the jury that harassment includes alarm or distress. The Court of Appeal held that this was a misdirection. The danger of equating harassment with alarm or distress, according to the court, is that not all conduct, even though it may be unattractive, unreasonable and does in fact cause alarm or distress, will be ⁶⁴⁶ See Allridge, Relocating Criminal Law, Ch 4.

⁶⁴⁷ [1997] 2 All ER 426. See also Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2003] 3 All ER 932, CA.

⁶⁴⁸ Chan Fook [1994] 2 All ER 552, CA; Burstow [1998] AC 147.

⁶⁴⁹ Ireland [1998] AC 147.

⁶⁵⁰ C Wells, 'Stalking the Criminal Law Response' [1997] Crim LR 463.

⁶⁵¹ See Home Office, Stalking: The Solutions (1996).

⁶⁵² See the analysis by E Finch, The Criminalisation of Stalking (2001); M Allen, 'Look Who's Stalking' [1996] Web JCLI. For a comparative review of stalking laws, see B Clarke and L Meintjes-Van der Valt (1998) 115 South African LJ 729.

⁶⁵³ D MacLean, Home Office Minister, HC, 17 Dec 1996, col 827.

⁶⁵⁴ C Wells [1997] Crim LR 463 at 464.

⁶⁵⁵ See A Gillespie, 'Cyber-Bullying and Harassment of Teenagers: The Legal Response' [2006] JSWFL 123; N Geach, 'Regulating Harassment: Is the Law Fit for the Social Networking Age?' (2009) 73 J Crim L 241. The House of Lords in Majrowski v Guy's and St Thomas' Hospital [2006] UKHL 34, [2007] 1 AC 224, held that the Act applies in the workplace and that employers may be vicariously liable for failing to take appropriate preventative action to prevent employees being bullied. Note also the powers inserted by the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, in respect of restraining orders in domestic violence cases.

⁶⁵⁶ [2012] EWCA Crim 2566, [24].

⁶⁵⁷ [2016] EWCA Crim 92.

sufficient to justify the sanction of the criminal law. The judge's direction to the jury failed to include a reference for the need to be sure that D's conduct was oppressive. The court held that the requirement of oppression serves as a yardstick that helps the law to draw a sensible line between, 'the give and take of daily life and conduct which justifies the sanctions of the criminal law'.⁶⁵⁸ The definition provided by s 7 is clearly inclusive and not exhaustive. 'Harassment' is generally understood to involve improper oppressive and unreasonable conduct that is targeted at an individual and calculated to produce the consequences described in s 7. By s 1(3) of the Act, reasonable and/or lawful courses of conduct may be excluded.

The CPS has issued guidance on prosecuting harassment.⁶⁵⁹ The CPS introduces the guidance by stating:

This legal guidance addresses behaviour which is repeated and unwanted by the victim and which causes the victim to have a negative reaction in terms of alarm or distress. Cases involving stalking and harassment can be difficult to prosecute, and because of their nature are likely to require sensitive handling, especially with regard to victim care. The provision of accurate and up-to-date information to the victim throughout the life of the case, together with quality support, and careful consideration of any special measures requirements are essential factors for the CPS to consider.

16.14.2 Harassment defined

- 1.—(1) A person must not pursue a course of conduct—
 - (a) which amounts to harassment of another, and
 - (b) which he knows or ought to know amounts to harassment of the other.
- (1A) A person must not pursue a course of conduct—
 - (a) which involves harassment of two or more persons, and
 - (b) which he knows or ought to know involves harassment of those persons, and
 - (c) by which he intends to persuade any person (whether or not one of those mentioned above)—
 - (i) not to do something that he is entitled or required to do, or
 - (ii) to do something that he is not under any obligation to do.
- 2.—(1) A person who pursues a course of conduct in breach of section 1(1) or (1A) is guilty of an offence.⁶⁶⁰

16.14.2.1 Course of conduct

The offences under the Act are dependent on proof of a course of conduct, which is merely an element of each offence and not a crime in itself.

By s 7:

- (1) A 'course of conduct' must involve—
 - (a) in the case of conduct in relation to a single person (see section 1(1)), conduct on at least two occasions in relation to that person, or
 - (b) in the case of conduct in relation to two or more persons (see section 1(1A)), conduct on at least one occasion in relation to each of those persons.

⁶⁵⁸ At [32]. In the subsequent case of Tan [2017] EWCA Crim 493, D's conviction was upheld on the basis that despite the fact the judge did not use the word 'oppression', his direction nevertheless accurately conveyed to the jury the threshold that must be crossed before an offence is committed.

⁶⁵⁹ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/stalking-and-harassment.

⁶⁶⁰ Section 1A was added by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, s 125.

- (3A) A person's conduct on any occasion shall be taken, if aided, abetted, counselled or procured by another—
- (a) to be conduct on that occasion of the other (as well as conduct of the person whose conduct it is); and
 - (b) to be conduct in relation to which the other's knowledge and purpose, and what he ought to have known, are the same as they were in relation to what was contemplated or reasonably foreseeable at the time of the aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring.

The course of conduct is at the core of both crimes (and the tort). The provision is far from clear, with little further elaboration other than that words are sufficient (s 7(4)). One of the major problems under the Act has been in determining when two incidents are sufficiently closely associated to constitute a course of conduct. Although seeking to identify the idea of 'persistence' that lies at the heart of stalking, Parliament refrained from attempting further to define the proscribed behaviour. In debates on the Bill, Michael Howard, then Home Secretary, referred to the lack of definition, but regarded harassment as a concept 'interpreted regularly by the courts since 1986'.⁶⁶¹ It is extremely wide in scope and applies to protest and neighbourhood disputes⁶⁶² as well as what might more usually be regarded as stalking.

It has been accepted that D's conduct can amount to a course of conduct even where that involves some action by V. In James v CPS,⁶⁶³ D was receiving care from a social services team in his area. D repeatedly phoned the services team to complain about his care. The team manager, V, returned D's calls as she was duty-bound to do and D was abusive to her. That pattern of behaviour was repeated. The Divisional Court held that the fact that V returned the calls was irrelevant. As Elias LJ observed:

If I am continually abusive to someone who comes within my vicinity, that may still be capable of constituting a course of conduct, even if the victim chooses to come within my vicinity. The fact that he or she chooses to do so might arguably be relevant to the question of whether there is harassment, but not to the question of whether there is a course of conduct.⁶⁶⁴

As the court observed in Curtis,⁶⁶⁵ s 7 of the Act does not provide an exhaustive definition of harassment. There will be conduct which might alarm or distress someone without being harassing.⁶⁶⁶

One act or two?

Is there a 'course of conduct' when an individual engages in one continuous activity—for example, sitting outside V's house for a whole day? In Hills,⁶⁶⁷ it was stressed that it is not just enough to count the incidents, nor to direct the jury in such terms.⁶⁶⁸ In Kelly v DPP,⁶⁶⁹ D, who had just been released on licence after conviction for harassing V, made three abusive and threatening telephone calls to a mobile telephone belonging to V between 2.57 am and 3.02 am. V did not answer any of the calls at the time and they were recorded on her voicemail. V subsequently listened to the messages one after the other, without pause. It was held that the closeness of time within which the calls were made was only a factor to be taken into account when determining whether there had been repetitious behaviour for the purposes of proving the commission of an offence of harassment. The case raises questions ⁶⁶¹ HC, 17 Dec 1996, vol 287, col 784.

⁶⁶² Inciting a dog to bark is sufficient to form part of a course of conduct: Tafurelli v DPP [2004] EWHC 2791 (Admin).

⁶⁶³ [2009] EWHC 2925 (Admin).

⁶⁶⁴ At [12].

⁶⁶⁵ [2010] EWCA Crim 123.

⁶⁶⁶ In that case repeated incidents of domestic violence.

⁶⁶⁷ [2001] Crim LR 318.

⁶⁶⁸ Patel [2005] Crim LR 649, [2004] EWCA Crim 3284.

⁶⁶⁹ [2003] Crim LR 43, DC.

about where the courts will draw the line. Consider D who telephones V, V answers the call and immediately she identifies D and terminates the call. D calls back immediately. V sees that D's number appears on the 'caller ID' facility. Is this a course of conduct? In Loake v CPS, D was convicted of harassment after sending her husband, from whom she was separated, a very large number of text messages over a period of time.⁶⁷⁰

In Hills, Latham LJ stated that repetition was a significant factor in determining whether there is a course of conduct, but there is no requirement that acts be similar or repeated. Any combination of bouquets of flowers, menacing calls or letters, loitering outside the victim's home, etc will suffice. As was suggested in Lau,⁶⁷¹ the question of whether there is a course of conduct should be determined by whether there is a sufficient nexus between the two acts, taking account of all of the circumstances. The courts have acknowledged that the question is a difficult one.⁶⁷² In DPP v Hardy,⁶⁷³ the court accepted that 95 phone calls made over a 90-minute period were capable of constituting harassment, especially since they included threats to continue that behaviour all night.⁶⁷⁴

One actor or two?

Section 7(3A)⁶⁷⁵ ensures that where A performs a harassing act towards V aided by B, and subsequently A alone commits a further act of harassment towards V, the two acts may be regarded as a course of conduct. This extension of the scope of a 'course of conduct' was enacted to deal with protestors. A campaign of collective harassment by two or more people can amount to a 'course of conduct'. The knowledge and purpose of the aider, abetter, counsellor or procurer is judged at the time that the conduct was planned and not when it is carried out. The provision seeks to pre-empt a defence by A that when he counselled B to commit a second act towards V, A was unaware that his first act towards V had caused distress. Since it is enough that A ought to have known that the act would cause distress at the time that the subsequent act was commissioned, he will be liable.

The offence can be committed by D communicating with X which causes harassment to V.⁶⁷⁶

One victim or two?

The course of conduct under s 1(1) must relate to 'another'. In DPP v Williams,⁶⁷⁷ D had put his hand through a bathroom window startling the occupant V1 who was showering. She then informed V2, her flatmate, who was scared by the event as reported to her. Two days later D peered through the bedroom window, this time frightening V2 directly. The magistrates convicted, holding that 'another' could be read as 'others'. The Divisional Court decided the case on the basis that V2 had been distressed on both occasions and therefore the offence was made out. The interpretation was rightly criticized for extending the offence considerably and for giving rise to practical problems.⁶⁷⁸ In Caurti v DPP,⁶⁷⁹ it was held that ⁶⁷⁰ [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin).

⁶⁷¹ [2000] Crim LR 580 and commentary.

⁶⁷² See Buckley [2008] EWHC 136 (Admin) graveside altercation and spitting at V in cemetery car park.

⁶⁷³ [2008] All ER (D) 315 (Oct).

⁶⁷⁴ D had called an employment agency to request information about why he had been rejected for a job, so his calls had been legitimate to begin with, but they had clearly escalated into conduct that was capable of constituting harassment.

⁶⁷⁵ As inserted by the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001.

⁶⁷⁶ C v CPS [2008] EWHC 148 (Admin).

⁶⁷⁷ DPP v Williams (DC, 27 July 1998, Rose LJ and Bell J).

⁶⁷⁸ A charge under the 1997 Act, s 1(1), might be bad for duplicity where it names two complainants when they are members of a 'close knit identifiable group': Mills v DPP (1998) 17 Dec, DC.

⁶⁷⁹ [2002] Crim LR 131 and commentary.

in relation to the more serious s 4 offence (causing fear of violence, see later) the course of conduct must have its impact on one complainant, even where it is aimed at another.

Under s 1(1A), it is clear that the harassment can be to two or more persons, provided the additional element of intention in s 1(1A)(c) can be established. The provision will prove useful in criminalizing, for example, the conduct of protestors who target people connected with animal breeding and vivisection organizations.⁶⁸⁰ Section 1(1A) will catch threats and intimidation intended to force an individual or individuals to stop trading.

The complainant must be an individual and not a corporate body:⁶⁸¹ s 7(5) of the Act provides that references to a 'person' are references to 'a person who is an individual'. But a company can commit the offence.⁶⁸²

No need for temporal proximity or similarity

Is there a course of conduct where different acts are separated by a considerable period of time? For example, are two acts separated by one year, say, two birthday cards, a 'course of conduct'? In Lau v DPP,⁶⁸³ two incidents four months apart were held to be capable of amounting to a course of conduct. The court observed that 'one can conceive of circumstances where incidents, as far apart as a year, could constitute a course of conduct'. The example given was of racial harassment outside a synagogue on the Day of Atonement. In Baron v CPS,⁶⁸⁴ it was accepted that the less proximate in time and the more limited in number the incidents, the less likely that there was a course of conduct. In Pratt v DPP,⁶⁸⁵ D threw water over his estranged wife and three months later chased her through the matrimonial home swearing and questioning her constantly. The magistrates found these to be a course of conduct and the Divisional Court did not find this to be an irrational decision. However, it was noted that prosecuting authorities should be cautious in bringing charges for the offence of harassment in circumstances where only a small number of incidents had occurred. The prosecution should ensure not merely that two or more incidents had occurred, but that such repetitious behaviour had caused harassment to the other person.⁶⁸⁶ Examples of prosecution agencies overusing harassment charges persist. In Curtis,⁶⁸⁷ D had in the course of a relationship with V, a fellow police officer, engaged in conduct including minor assaults on V and pulling the handbrake of a car V was driving, causing it to skid. This was charged as harassment. The court quashed the conviction. The court defined harassment as 'tormenting a person by subjecting them to constant interference or intimidation'. The conduct had to be oppressive, unreasonable and unacceptable to a degree that would sustain criminal liability. Although D's conduct had been deplorable and the incidents had been far from trivial, it could not be concluded that, in the course of a volatile relationship where there had been aggression on both sides, the six incidents over a nine-month period amounted to a course of conduct amounting to harassment within the meaning of the Act. Reference was made to Majrowski (see earlier)⁶⁸⁸ where it was emphasized that:

Courts are well able to recognise the boundary between conduct which is unattractive, even unreasonable, and conduct which is oppressive and unacceptable. To cross the boundary from the ⁶⁸⁰ See the Home Office document: Animal Welfare: Human Rights—Protecting People from Animal Rights Extremists (2004). See the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, s 145.

⁶⁸¹ DPP v Dziurzynski (2002) 166 JP 545; cf Daiichi UK Ltd and others v Huntingdon Animal Cruelty and others [2003] EWHC 2337 (QB): person does not include a limited company as a victim.

⁶⁸² See Kosar v Bank of Scotland [2011] EWHC 1050 (Admin).

⁶⁸³ [2000] Crim LR, [2000] 1 FLR 799.

⁶⁸⁴ (2000) 13 June, unreported.

⁶⁸⁵ [2001] EWHC 483 (Admin).

⁶⁸⁶ Note that the CPS acknowledges that the Act is 'widely drafted, and could incorporate many minor forms of behaviour'. Reference should be had to Home Office Circular 34/1997, making it clear that the Act is not intended to supplant existing powers to deal with incidents that do not reach the threshold of harassment.

⁶⁸⁷ [2010] EWCA Crim 123.

⁶⁸⁸ [2007] 1 AC 224 per Lord Nicholls at [30].

regrettable to the unacceptable the gravity of the misconduct must be of an order which would sustain criminal liability under section 2.

Baroness Hale observed⁶⁸⁹ that the definition had been deliberately left wide open and it had been left to the wisdom of the courts to distinguish between the ordinary banter and badinage of life and genuinely offensive and unacceptable behaviour. It cannot be a requirement that each of the acts alleged to constitute part of the course of conduct is itself criminal.⁶⁹⁰

It is submitted that the events making up the 'course of conduct' under the Act require a nexus, as is implicit within the expression, which suggests a 'series' of events with some connection. The main connecting factor will be that the acts are aimed at a particular victim, but that will not of itself be sufficient, in the same way that two visits to the hospital by the same patient would not necessarily be described as a course of treatment. There must be something more connecting them—in the case of the treatment, one would expect it to be for the same ailment. The mere fact that D made two harassing calls to the same victim a year apart will not necessarily constitute a course of conduct. If the calls were made on a particular anniversary, there would be a greater nexus and the course of conduct would be more likely to be established. The question must turn on all the circumstances of the case.

When does the course of conduct begin?

In many instances, D will be involved in what might be considered to be, initially at least, neutral conduct towards V. Does his course of conduct only begin when he is aware of the distress he is causing V, or when it causes V harassment or when the reasonable person would see it as harassing? In King v DPP,⁶⁹¹ the alleged harassment was by offering the victim a plant, writing letters to her, rummaging in her rubbish, stealing her discarded underwear from refuse bags and filming her secretly. The Divisional Court held that 'repeated offers of unwelcome gifts or the repeated sending of letters could well amount to harassment, nevertheless, the single offer of a gift of modest value and the sending of one innocuous letter in the circumstances of this case cannot amount to harassment within the meaning of the 1997 Act. Nor could the letter and the gift be treated as the first stage or the first two stages of a course of conduct amounting to harassment...' The magistrates were wrong to treat these incidents as forming part of a course of conduct. The decision is difficult to square with the terms of the section. There is no limitation as to the types of conduct amounting to harassment in the statute.

A victim may be held to be aware of a course of conduct through indirect knowledge, as where V is told that D has been calling her, provided there is evidence on the basis of which the court can properly conclude that D was pursuing a course of conduct with the necessary mens rea.⁶⁹²

Mens rea as to the course of conduct

There is no requirement that the harasser intended or directed his conduct to harass V, it is sufficient that 'a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct amounted to harassment of another'.⁶⁹³ The leading case is that of *Colohan*⁶⁹⁴ where it was held that the test is entirely objective.⁶⁹⁵ In that case it was held that D's schizophrenia could not be taken into consideration in evaluating whether the reasonable person would have realized that the conduct was harassing. On the facts, it was unclear whether D ⁶⁸⁹ ibid., [66]. ⁶⁹⁰ See R (Jones) v Bedfordshire MC [2010] EWHC 523 (Admin), [27].

⁶⁹¹ 20 June 2000, DC. ⁶⁹² Kellett v DPP [2001] EWHC 107 (Admin).

⁶⁹³ Section 1(2). ⁶⁹⁴ [2001] EWCA Crim 1251, [2001] Crim LR 845. See Ch 4.

⁶⁹⁵ Affirmed more recently by the Divisional Court in R (Aylesbury Crown Court) v CPS [2013] EWHC 3228 (Admin). Note that in Loake v CPS [2017] EWHC 2855 (Admin) the Divisional Court confirmed that insanity is available as a defence to harassment. See p 304.

was denying that he knew what he was doing in writing the allegedly harassing letters, or denying that he knew that the letters constituted a course of harassing conduct, or was claiming simply that the harassment was reasonable. Given the clear policy behind the legislation, it is not surprising that the court rejected the defence claims. The prosecution of mentally disordered individuals under this offence not only ensures the protection for victims of stalking, but also increases the chances of the offender receiving psychiatric assessment and treatment.

To be liable under s 1(1A), D must also intend to persuade the person(s) to refrain from something that they are entitled or to do something they are not; for example, for an animal breeding unit to stop trading with a vivisection lab.

In possession of the same information

Section 1(2) is unusual in requiring that the person whose course of conduct is in question ought to know that it amounts to harassment of another if a reasonable person 'in possession of the same information' would do so. The section is designed to endow the reasonable person with knowledge of circumstances that would render otherwise seemingly innocuous conduct harassing (eg when D knows that previous advances towards V have been rejected and continues to send gifts). In such cases D's inculpatory state of mind is taken into account. Should the reasonable person also be possessed with knowledge about D's exculpatory states of mind in order to assess whether the conduct is harassment? This is not the same as asking whether a reasonable person with the characteristics of D would regard it as harassment, particularly where the characteristic inhibits cognition of the wrongdoing. In Colohan, the strong policy grounds of protection on which the Act is founded justified the court's rejection of any attempt to diminish the purely objective stance. In Pelham,⁶⁹⁶ D was charged under the racially aggravated form of the offence and denied that she had the mens rea on the basis that she was of low IQ and lacked an understanding of the racial nature of her comments. The court refused to allow expert evidence as to this aspect of the mens rea, in line with the general rule against expert evidence being permitted on mens rea issues.

Defences justifying the course of conduct

Section 1 provides:

- (1) Subsection (1) or (1A) does not apply to a course of conduct if the person who pursued it shows—
 - (a) that it was pursued for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime;
 - (b) that it was pursued under any enactment or rule of law or to comply with any condition or requirement imposed by any person under any enactment, or
 - (c) that in the particular circumstances the pursuit of the course of conduct was reasonable.

Paragraph (a) seems clear, although debate might arise over whether it is restricted to State officials engaged in criminal investigations or whether investigative journalists might also be able to rely on this defence.⁶⁹⁷ It might apply to the busybody Neighbourhood Watch coordinator, although the courts have suggested that s 1(3)(a) was framed with law enforcement agencies and not private individuals in mind. If a private individual relies on s 1(3)(a) he must show some rational basis for his conduct, judged on an objective basis.⁶⁹⁸

⁶⁹⁶ [2007] EWCA Crim 1321.

⁶⁹⁷ Note also s 12 providing that the Secretary of State may issue certificates that render conduct of specified individuals conclusively reasonable (eg security service operatives). Note Trimingham v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2012] EWHC 1296 (QB), where Tugendhat J referred to Thomas v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1233 to hold that journalism amounting to a course of conduct is reasonable under s 1(3)(c) unless, in the particular circumstances of the case, the course of conduct is so unreasonable that under Art 10 of the ECHR it is necessary proportionately to prohibit or sanction it under Art 10(2) including the protection of the rights of others.

The Supreme Court considered what the appropriate standard ought to be in Hayes v Willoughby,⁶⁹⁹ a civil case. Lord Sumption, who delivered the judgment of the majority, held that the word 'purpose' connotes a subjective state of mind.⁷⁰⁰ Section 1(3)(a) does not, therefore, embody a wholly objective test. His lordship further stated, however, that Parliament could not have intended for there to be no limits placed on the pursuit of the course of conduct, no matter how irrational D's state of mind. It was held that the necessary control mechanism is found in the concept of rationality. His lordship distinguished rationality from reasonableness, which was characterized as an 'external, objective standard applied to the outcome of a person's thoughts or intentions'. Rationality, on the other hand:

applies a minimum objective standard to the relevant person's mental processes. It imports a requirement of good faith, a requirement that there should be some logical connection between the evidence and the ostensible reasons for the decision, and (which will usually amount to the same thing) an absence of arbitrariness, of capriciousness or of reasoning so outrageous in its defiance of logic as to be perverse.⁷⁰¹

In future, therefore, before an alleged harasser can be said to have had the purpose of preventing or detecting crime, he must have sufficiently applied his mind to the matter. He must have thought rationally about the material suggesting the possibility of criminality and formed the view that the conduct said to constitute harassment was appropriate for the purpose of preventing or detecting it. Lord Sumption stated explicitly that the court should not test D's conclusions against the standard of what a reasonable person in D's circumstances would have concluded. Lord Reed dissented on the basis that Parliament did not specify that D's pursuit of the course of conduct had to be rational; the statute should not be construed as extending beyond the limits which Parliament itself made clear in its enactment; and that criminal liability should not turn on the subtle distinction between what is unreasonable and what is irrational. It is submitted that there is considerable force in Lord Reed's three points. The most pertinent one is, however, his lordship's third point. Formulating a new test of rationality adds an additional layer of uncertainty. It is submitted that not only might judges find it difficult to direct juries on how they ought to approach the test of rationality, judges themselves might have difficulty in delineating between the various states of mind now demanded by the Supreme Court's judgment when determining whether the defence ought to be left. A better approach, it is submitted, would be the one suggested by Lord Reed, namely a wholly subjective test. This would not necessarily lead to specious defences being pleaded successfully, as the jury could still conclude that D did not have as his purpose the prevention or detection of crime.

Paragraph (b) is uncontroversial. It protects the right of free speech and expression. In a civil case which was one of the first cases under the Act, Eady J commented that the Act was not intended to be used to stifle discussion of public interest on public demonstrations.⁷⁰² ⁶⁹⁸ Howlett v Holding (2006) The Times, 8 Feb, QBD (D conducted a campaign against the V, a local councillor, by flying banners from his aircraft referring to her in derogatory and abusive terms).

⁶⁹⁹ [2013] UKSC 17.

⁷⁰⁰ The Supreme Court did not reach a conclusion on whether preventing or detecting crime must be the sole purpose, or whether the dominant purpose will suffice. His lordship did intimate, however, that he favoured the latter formulation. The Commercial Court in the subsequent case of Starbev GP Ltd v Interbrew Central European Holdings [2014] EWHC 1311 (Comm) stated that the relevant purpose is the dominant one.

⁷⁰¹ At [14].

⁷⁰² Huntingdon Life Sciences v Curtin (1997) The Times, 11 Dec, [1998] Env LR D9. See also Bayer Crop Science Ltd [2009] WL 4872821.

More difficult is the defence under para (c), particularly in cases where D claims that his action was part of a campaign of legitimate protest. In Baron v DPP,⁷⁰³ the court emphasized that:

a line must be drawn between legitimate expression of disgust at the way a public agency has behaved and conduct amounting to harassment. The right to free speech requires a broad degree of tolerance in relation to communications. It is a legitimate exercise of that right to say things which are unpleasant or possibly hurtful to the recipient.

The defence under s 1(3)(c) does not involve the question whether the reasonable person regards the course of conduct as harassment, but whether it is reasonable harassment.⁷⁰⁴

It seems to arise only where it is accepted that the course of conduct is harassing. Furthermore, the question is whether the conduct was, as a whole, 'reasonable' which suggests a purely objective assessment. In some cases involving protest campaigns the courts may face difficult issues of evaluating the reasonableness of a form of protest. These may involve arguments based on rights of freedom of expression under Art 10 of the ECHR.⁷⁰⁵

The burden is on the defendant to prove, on the balance of probabilities,⁷⁰⁶ that the conduct is reasonable. It has been held that pursuit of conduct in breach of an injunction will preclude a defence under s 1(3)(c).⁷⁰⁷

16.14.2.2 The s 2 offence

2.—(1) A person who pursues a course of conduct in breach of section 1(1) or (1A) is guilty of an offence.

(2) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or [an unlimited] fine, or both.

The offence is based on the course of conduct and it has been held that prosecutions are not therefore time-barred if at least one of the incidents forming part of the course of conduct occurs within the six-month limitation period for the laying of informations in the magistrates' court.⁷⁰⁸

The s 2 offence requires two or more acts by D constituting a course of conduct. There need be only one result from their cumulative effect—the harassment of the victim. Section 7(2) provides that 'harassing a person' includes 'alarming the person or causing the person distress' and this has been treated as a non-exhaustive definition.⁷⁰⁹ There is no requirement that any violence is threatened (or feared) for the offence under s 2. The section criminalizes conduct such as that in *Chambers and Edwards v DPP*⁷¹⁰ where protestors persistently but non-violently blocked the surveyor's theodolite beam, since the Divisional Court held that such conduct would amount to harassment for the purposes of the Public Order Act 1986. In many cases the section has been used successfully in respect of 'classic' stalking behaviour.⁷¹¹

⁷⁰³ (2000) 13 June, unreported.

⁷⁰⁴ Nothing that involves cultural or racial differences should be taken into account, unless it is relevant and supported by proper evidence: C v CPS [2008] EWHC 148 (Admin).

⁷⁰⁵ See Debnath [2006] 2 Cr App R (S) 25, where a restraining order against D prohibiting any publication against V whether true or not was upheld.

⁷⁰⁶ See p 23, on the appropriateness of the burden under the HRA 1998 and Art 6(2).

⁷⁰⁷ DPP v Mosely (1999) The Times, 23 June.

⁷⁰⁸ DPP v Baker [2004] EWHC 2782 (Admin).

⁷⁰⁹ DPP v Ramsdale (2001) The Independent, 19 Mar.

⁷¹⁰ [1995] Crim LR 896.

⁷¹¹ For critical comment on the scope of the offence, see E Finch, 'Stalking the Perfect Stalking Law: An Evaluation of the Efficacy of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997' [2002] Crim LR 702. See also J Harris, Home Office Research Study No 203, An Evaluation of the Use and Effectiveness of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (2000).

16.14.2.3 Causing a fear of violence: s 4

Section 4 provides:

- (1) A person whose course of conduct causes another to fear, on at least two occasions, that violence will be used against him is guilty of an offence if he knows or ought to know that his course of conduct will cause the other so to fear on each of those occasions.
- (2) For the purposes of this section, the person whose course of conduct is in question ought to know that it will cause another to fear that violence will be used against him on any occasion if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct would cause the other so to fear on that occasion.
- (3) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under this section to show that—
 - (a) his course of conduct was pursued for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime,
 - (b) his course of conduct was pursued under any enactment or rule of law or to comply with any condition or requirement imposed by any person under any enactment, or
 - (c) the pursuit of his course of conduct was reasonable for the protection of himself or another or for the protection of his or another's property.

Section 4 is triable either way, carrying a maximum sentence on indictment of ten⁷¹² years' imprisonment, or a fine or both. This is a high maximum sentence for a negligence-based offence. A judge who rules that there is no case to answer on a charge under s 4 may allow the jury to consider an alternative verdict under s 2.⁷¹³

The essential difference between this offence and that in s 2 (and the tort in s 3) is that the victim must be caused to fear on at least two occasions, that violence will be used 'against him'. The other important difference is that the only defence available to this charge is that the harasser proves that his conduct was for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime, was lawfully authorized or was reasonable for the protection of himself or another or of property.⁷¹⁴

Section 4 has been criticized as being too narrow because of this requirement.⁷¹⁵ Whereas s 2 explicitly requires, inter alia: (a) a course of conduct (b) which must amount to harassment of another, s 4 requires that the victim is caused, by the course of conduct, to fear violence on at least two occasions. In Curtis, the court concluded that the s 4 offence requires proof also that the course of conduct has to amount to harassment.⁷¹⁶ Section 4 does not expressly require that the course of conduct which causes the victim to fear violence constitutes harassment. Section 4 contains the stricter limitation that the course of conduct has to cause fear (it being insufficient even to frighten the victim as to what might happen (Henley)). Arguably, s 4 represents a distinct offence focused not on harassment but on the graver wrong of creating fear of violence. However, the court's preferred interpretation is one which construes s 4 in the broader context of the Act and sits more comfortably with the fact that s 2 is an included alternative offence.⁷¹⁷ Interpreting s 4 so as not to require the ⁷¹² See s 175 of the Policing and Crime Act 2017 (in force from 3 Apr 2017).

⁷¹³ Livesey [2006] EWCA Crim 3344.

⁷¹⁴ A failure to direct on these defences may well render a conviction unsafe—Wilkes [2004] EWCA Crim 3136.

⁷¹⁵ See Finch [2002] Crim LR 702, n 711, suggesting a new offence of intentional harassment to bridge the gap between the narrow s 4 and the wide and overused s 2.

⁷¹⁶ Curtis was followed in the subsequent case of Widdows [2011] EWCA Crim 1500. Although these authorities ultimately bound it as a matter of precedent, the Court of Appeal in Haque [2011] EWCA Crim 1871 stated that it applied them 'reluctantly'. The court took cognizance of the scepticism expressed in the comment at [2011] Crim LR 959.

⁷¹⁷ Furthermore, it is consistent with the approach that seems to have been taken in previous authorities holding that the victim has been put in 'fear of violence by harassment', such as Patel [2004] EWCA Crim 3284 (emphasis added).

course of conduct to constitute ‘harassment’ would only be of practical significance if there are circumstances in which two or more incidents with a sufficient nexus caused a fear of violence without also being harassing. That would seem unlikely.

Section 4 has no requirement of immediacy as in assault. In Qosja,⁷¹⁸ Carr J stated that:

In our judgment, a plain and natural reading of the wording of section 4A(1)(b)(i) of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 reveals that the section is wide enough to look to incidents of violence in the future and not only to incidents giving rise to a fear of violence arising directly out of the incident in question. Nor is there any requirement for the fear to be of violence on a particular date or time in the future, or at a particular place or in a particular manner, or for there to be a specific threat of violence. There can be a fear of violence sufficient for the statute where that fear of violence is of violence on a separate and later occasion. The position can be tested simply by reference to the example of somebody saying ‘I’ll come back and get you’. On [counsel for D’s] interpretation that would be insufficient fear to fall within the scope of the section; that is not a position that we consider to be correct.⁷¹⁹

It is submitted that this interpretation of the offence is in keeping with the broad approach intended by Parliament and that it ought to apply equally to the offence in s 4(1).

Unlike s 8 of the Public Order Act 1986, no definition of violence is provided in the 1997 Act. In Henley,⁷²⁰ H’s harassment of the complainant and her family included threats to kill. He was charged under s 4. The trial judge failed properly to direct the jury, wrongly suggesting that to ‘seriously frighten her’ would suffice and failed to clarify that the person must himself fear violence, not violence towards others. It was emphasized that a direction on the mens rea under s 4(2) should be routinely given. It is ‘good practice’ for the judge to direct the jury to consider whether the incidents about which they were sure were so connected in type and in context as to justify the conclusion that they could amount to a course of conduct.⁷²¹

A fear of violence may be inferred from threats and behaviour other than explicit threats of violence issued to the victim in person (eg threats to his dog), but the victim must fear that violence will be used against himself.⁷²² Threats to burn down the family house will suffice.⁷²³

16.14.2.4 Racially and religiously aggravated harassment

The Crime and Disorder Act 1998, as amended by the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, provides racially and religiously aggravated offences of harassment and putting people in fear of violence.

Section 32:

(1) A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he commits—

(a) an offence under s 2 of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (offence of harassment); or

(b) an offence under s 4 of that Act (putting people in fear of violence), which is [racially or religiously aggravated] for the purposes of this section.

An aggravated offence under s 32(1)(a) is triable either way and punishable on indictment with a maximum sentence of two years’ imprisonment. An offence under s 32(1)(b) is triable ⁷¹⁸ [2016] EWCA Crim 1543. ⁷¹⁹ At [31].

⁷²⁰ [2000] Crim LR 582. See also Curtis [2010] EWCA Crim 123.

⁷²¹ Sahin [2009] EWCA Crim 2616.

⁷²² R v DPP [2001] Crim LR 396; Henley [2000] Crim LR 582; Caurti v DPP [2002] Crim LR 131 and commentaries.

⁷²³ R (A) v DPP [2005] ACD 61.

either way and carries a maximum 14 years' imprisonment on conviction on indictment. The nature of racial and religious aggravation is discussed earlier.⁷²⁴

16.14.2.5 Harassment in the home

Section 126 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 introduced a new offence into s 42A of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001. This offence is triable summarily only⁷²⁵ and carries a maximum sentence of six months' imprisonment or a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale, or both. 'Dwelling' has the same meaning as in s 8 of the Public Order Act (see Ch 31).⁷²⁶

Regard should also be had to s 1(3)–(3A) of the Protection from Eviction Act 1977. In short, it is an offence to do acts likely to interfere with the peace or comfort of the residential occupier or members of his household, or persistently withdraw or withhold services reasonably required for residential occupation with intent to cause the residential occupier either: (a) to give up the occupation or (b) to refrain from exercising any right or pursuing any remedy in respect of the premises.

16.14.2.6 Stalking

In February 2012 the report of the Independent Parliamentary Inquiry into Stalking Law Reform was published.⁷²⁷ The report concluded that the current legislative regime was inadequate and in need of reform. Sections 111 and 112 of the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 amend the 1997 Act with the effect that stalking is, for the first time in England and Wales, a criminal offence in its own right. These provisions have been in force since November 2012 and amend ss 2 and 4 of the 1997 Act in the following ways: s 2A(1) contains the offence of stalking; s 4A(1)(b)(i) creates the offences of 'stalking causing fear of violence'; and s 4A(1)(b)(ii) creates the offence of 'stalking causing serious alarm or distress'. As was stated earlier, conduct constituting 'stalking' as that term is commonly understood already falls within the terms of the 1997 Act.⁷²⁸ What these new provisions do, therefore, is to label explicitly conduct of this nature as 'stalking', rather than harassment. Section 2A(2) provides:⁷²⁹

- (2) For the purposes of subsection (1)(b) (and section 4A(1)(a)) a person's course of conduct amounts to stalking of another person if—
- (a) it amounts to harassment of that person,
 - (b) the acts or omissions involved are ones associated with stalking, and
 - (c) the person whose course of conduct it is knows or ought to know that the course of conduct amounts to harassment of the other person.

The legislation provides some guidance as to what is meant by the requirement that D's 'acts or omissions ... are ones associated with stalking'. The legislation does not, however, provide a definition of stalking. Section 2A(3) gives the following examples:

- (a) following a person,
- (b) contacting, or attempting to contact, a person by any means,

⁷²⁴ Note also the Law Commission recommendations to extend the aggravated offences to protect characteristics of disability, sexual orientation and transgender identity. See text at n 373.

⁷²⁵ Section 42A(4). ⁷²⁶ Section 42A(7).

⁷²⁷ The Justice Unions' Parliamentary Group, 'Independent Parliamentary Inquiry into Stalking Law Reform: Main Findings and Recommendations' (2012).

⁷²⁸ For an analysis of whether the new provisions will deal with the phenomenon of 'cyberstalking', see N MacEwan, 'The New Stalking Offences in English Law: Will They Provide Effective Protection From Cyberstalking?' [2012] Crim LR 767.

⁷²⁹ By virtue of s 2(A)(4) this is a summary only offence.

- (c) publishing any statement or other material—
 - (i) relating or purporting to relate to a person, or
 - (ii) purporting to originate from a person,
- (d) monitoring the use by a person of the internet, email or any other form of electronic communication,
- (e) loitering in any place (whether public or private),
- (f) interfering with any property in the possession of a person,
- (g) watching or spying on a person.

D cannot be guilty unless his conduct first constitutes harassment. It is important that this element of the offence is considered separately from whether D's acts or omissions are ones associated with stalking. The list of examples provided in the legislation is not exhaustive and it is possible for an act or omission not included on the list to constitute an act or omission associated with stalking.

Section 4A(1)(b)(i) and (ii) creates the aggravated offences of 'stalking causing fear of violence' and 'stalking causing serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse impact on day-to-day activities'.⁷³⁰ These are either way offences. Section 4A provides:

4A Stalking involving fear of violence or serious alarm or distress

- (1) A person ('A') whose course of conduct—
 - (a) amounts to stalking, and
 - (b) either—
 - (i) causes another ('B') to fear, on at least two occasions, that violence will be used against B, or
 - (ii) causes B serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on B's usual day-to-day activities, is guilty of an offence if A knows or ought to know that A's course of conduct will cause B so to fear on each of those occasions or (as the case may be) will cause such alarm or distress.
- (2) For the purposes of this section A ought to know that A's course of conduct will cause B to fear that violence will be used against B on any occasion if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct would cause B so to fear on that occasion.
- (3) For the purposes of this section A ought to know that A's course of conduct will cause B serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on B's usual day-to-day activities if a reasonable person in possession of the same information would think the course of conduct would cause B such alarm or distress.
- (4) It is a defence for A to show that—
 - (a) A's course of conduct was pursued for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime,
 - (b) A's course of conduct was pursued under any enactment or rule of law or to comply with any condition or requirement imposed by any person under any enactment, or
 - (c) the pursuit of A's course of conduct was reasonable for the protection of A or another or for the protection of A's or another's property.

This offence is similar to the one in s 4. There are, however, a number of important differences. First, D's course of conduct must amount to stalking. Secondly, in addition to D causing ⁷³⁰ By virtue of s 4(A)(5)(a) a person convicted is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or a fine, or both. On summary conviction, the maximum term of imprisonment is six months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum.

another, B, to fear on at least two occasions that violence will be used against her, D can also be guilty if he ‘causes another serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on her usual day-to-day activities’.⁷³¹ None of these terms are defined.⁷³² It submitted that this is a subjective question, so irrespective of whether B’s ‘usual day-to-day activities’ are idiosyncratic, if they are substantially adversely affected then that will suffice. Section 4A(3) makes clear that D commits the offence if a reasonable person with the same information as D would think the course of conduct would have a substantial adverse impact on B’s day-to-day activities. Therefore D cannot escape liability by claiming that he did not realize that his conduct would have this effect; the test is an objective one. It is also clear that the legislation imposes a threshold, as D will not be guilty unless he causes B serious alarm or distress that has a substantial adverse effect on her usual day-to-day activities. If tried on indictment, the maximum sentence for this offence is ten years’ imprisonment and/or a fine.⁷³³ If tried summarily, the maximum sentence is six months’ imprisonment and/or a fine.

16.15 Offensive weapons

Legislation regulating the possession and use of firearms and offensive weapons is of major importance in the prevention of offences against the person. In earlier editions of this book⁷³⁴ an account was given of the principal offences under the Firearms Act 1968 and other legislation. This is omitted from the present edition and the reader is referred to Blackstone’s Criminal Practice (2018) Part B12 and Archbold (2018) Ch 24.⁷³⁵ Consideration is, however, given here to an important offence of general interest, created by the Prevention of Crime Act 1953.

16.15.1 The Prevention of Crime Act 1953

The Prevention of Crime Act 1953 is, according to its long title, ‘An Act to prohibit the carrying of offensive weapons in public places, without lawful authority or reasonable excuse.’

The Act provides:

- 1.—(1) Any person who without lawful authority or reasonable excuse, the proof whereof shall lie on him, has with him in any public place any offensive weapon shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable—
 - (a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding [the statutory maximum], or both;
 - (b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding four years or a fine, or both.

⁷³¹ Home Office Circular 018/2012 states that the offence ‘is designed to recognize the serious impact that stalking may have on victims, even where an explicit fear of violence is not created by each incident of stalking behaviour’. Available at www.gov.uk/government/publications/a-change-to-the-protection-from-harassment-act-1997-introduction-of-two-new-specific-offences-of-stalking.

⁷³² This is recognized in the circular. The Home Office does, however, give some examples of what it considers will constitute ‘substantial adverse effect’: the victim changing their routes to work, work patterns or employment; the victim arranging for friends or family to pick up children from school (to avoid contact with the stalker); the victim putting in place additional security measures in their home; the victim moving home; physical or mental ill-health; the victim’s deterioration in performance at work due to stress; the victim stopping/or changing the way they socialize.

⁷³³ The maximum sentence was increased from five years by s 175(1)(b) of the Policing and Crime Act 2017.

⁷³⁴ See the 6th edition, at pp 416–422.

⁷³⁵ The Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006 introduced further offences in relation to imitation firearms, minding a weapon for a person, etc. The legislation has recently been further amended by Part 6 of the Policing and Crime Act 2017.

- (2) Where any person is convicted of an offence under subsection (1) of this section the court may make an order for the forfeiture or disposal of any weapon in respect of which the offence was committed.

16.15.1.1 Offensive weapons

‘Offensive weapon’ is defined by s 1(4), as amended by the Public Order Act 1986, to mean ‘any article made or adapted for use for causing injury to the person, or intended by the person having it with him for such use by him or by some other person’.

It will be noted that this definition is narrower than that of ‘weapon of offence’ in s 10(1)(b) of the Theft Act 1968. It does not include, as the Theft Act does, articles made, adapted or intended for incapacitating a person.⁷³⁶

According to the Court of Appeal in Simpson,⁷³⁷ there are three categories of offensive weapon.

- (1) Articles made for causing injury would include a rifle or bayonet, a revolver, a cosh, a truncheon,⁷³⁸ a knuckle-duster,⁷³⁹ a pair of ‘sand gloves’,⁷⁴⁰ a dagger, swordstick⁷⁴¹ or flick knife.⁷⁴² It has been held that the fact that rice flails are used as weapons is sufficient evidence that they are made for that purpose⁷⁴³ but this seems doubtful. Whether an article is ‘made for’ causing injury requires the jury to consider whether it is of a kind which is, generally speaking, made for such use.⁷⁴⁴ Categorization is a matter of fact, although judicial notice has been taken of the fact that flick-knives and butterfly knives are offensive per se.⁷⁴⁵ The judge is entitled to direct the jury that this element of the offence is established, but never to direct a conviction per se.⁷⁴⁶
- (2) Articles adapted for causing injury would include razor blades inserted in a potato or a bottle broken for the purpose, a chair leg studded with nails and so on. ‘Adapted’ probably means altered so as to become suitable.⁷⁴⁷ It has been held that unscrewing a pool cue so that the butt end could be used for violence might amount to adapting

⁷³⁶ See p 1022. Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, Ch 9.

⁷³⁷ [1983] 1 WLR 1494. See also Samuels [2016] EWCA Crim 1876.

⁷³⁸ Houghton v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester (1986) 84 Cr App R 319.

⁷³⁹ ‘... bludgeons, properly so-called, clubs and anything that is not in common use for any other purpose but a weapon are clearly offensive weapons within the meaning of the legislature’ (the Smuggling Acts): (1784) 1 Leach 342 n (a). In DPP v Christof [2015] EWHC 4096 (Admin), the Divisional Court held that a leather belt which, when disassembled, was found to incorporate a detachable buckle in the form of a knuckleduster, was an offensive weapon.

⁷⁴⁰ ie gloves into which iron powder is inserted to give weight and protect the knuckles: R v R (2007) 15 Nov, unreported, CA (Crim).

⁷⁴¹ Butler [1988] Crim LR 695.

⁷⁴² An offensive weapon per se because judicially noticed as such: Simpson [1983] 3 All ER 789, [1983] 1 WLR 1494; cf Gibson v Wales [1983] 1 All ER 869, [1983] Crim LR 113, DC and commentary; and DPP v Hynde [1998] Crim LR 72, DC (butterfly knife). In Vasili [2011] EWCA Crim 615, the Court of Appeal rejected the submission that an article that was both a flick-knife and a lighter was not ‘made ... for causing injury to the person’. It was just as much an offensive weapon and potentially dangerous if the lighter function was not present.

⁷⁴³ Copus v DPP [1989] Crim LR 577 and commentary. It was conceded at the trial in Malnik [1989] Crim LR 451 that a rice flail was an offensive weapon.

⁷⁴⁴ Warne [1997] 7 Arch News 2. A petrol bomb is an offensive weapon per se: Akhtar [2015] EWCA Crim 176.

⁷⁴⁵ See also the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Offensive Weapons) Order 1988, SI 1988/2019.

⁷⁴⁶ Wang [2005] UKHL 9; Dhindsa [2005] EWCA Crim 1198.

⁷⁴⁷ cf Davison v Birmingham Industrial Co-operative Society (1920) 90 LJBK 206; Flower Freight Co Ltd v Hammond [1963] 1 QB 275; and Herrmann v Metropolitan Leather Co Ltd [1942] Ch 248, [1942] 1 All ER 294; Maddox v Storer [1963] 1 QB 451; Formosa (1990) 92 Cr App R 11, [1990] Crim LR 868, CA.

it, but this seems to be taking things too far.⁷⁴⁸ It is not certain whether the intention of the adaptor is relevant.⁷⁴⁹ Is an accidentally broken milk bottle 'adapted for use for causing injury to the person'? It is submitted that it is not and that if the article was not adapted with intent, it can only be an offensive weapon in the third category.

- (3) It is very important to distinguish the third category of articles which are neither made nor adapted for causing injury, but are carried for that purpose. Whether D carried the article with the necessary purpose is a question of fact.⁷⁵⁰ Articles which have been held to be carried with such intent include a cricket bat,⁷⁵¹ a sheath-knife,⁷⁵² a shotgun,⁷⁵³ a razor,⁷⁵⁴ a sandbag,⁷⁵⁵ a pick-axe handle,⁷⁵⁶ a stone⁷⁵⁷ and a drum of pepper.⁷⁵⁸ Any article is capable of being an offensive weapon; but if it is of such a nature that it is unlikely to cause injury when brought into contact with the person, then the onus of proving the necessary intent will be very heavy.

Articles adapted or intended by the carrier to injure himself

It was held by the Crown Court in *Bryan v Mott*⁷⁵⁹ that a bottle broken for the purpose of committing suicide is 'adapted' for causing injury to the person. In Fleming,⁷⁶⁰ on the other hand, the judge ruled that a large domestic carving knife carried by D to injure himself was not 'intended' for causing injury to the person: though the Act does not say 'another person', that is what it means. The view of the judge in Fleming is to be preferred. The question is whether the thing is 'an offensive weapon' and since 'offensive' implies an attack on another the injury which the adaptor or carrier must contemplate must be injury to another. The cases may, however, be distinguishable if 'adapt' does not imply any intention on the part of the adaptor. Breaking the milk bottle in fact makes it more suitable for injuring others, even if the adaptor intends injury only to himself. But such a distinction does not seem justified in principle.

Burdens of proof

In the case of articles 'made or adapted', the prosecution have to prove no more than possession in a public place.⁷⁶¹ D will then be convicted unless he can prove, on a balance of probability, that he had lawful authority or reasonable excuse.⁷⁶² But if the article falls into the third category the onus is on the prosecution to show that it was carried with intent to injure.⁷⁶³ The prosecution must satisfy the jury that the article is either offensive per se (made or adapted) or, if it is not, that D had it with him with intent. If some of the jury think it is the one, and some the other, the case, it is submitted, is not made out.⁷⁶⁴

⁷⁴⁸ Sills v DPP [2006] EWHC 3383 (Admin); the case is better seen as one of purposive carrying.

⁷⁴⁹ Maddox v Storer [1963] 1 QB 451, [1962] 1 All ER 831.

⁷⁵⁰ Williamson (1977) 67 Cr App R 35, [1978] Crim LR 229. See also Dhindsa [2005] EWCA Crim 1198 (ring with name of appellant across several fingers wrongly treated by judge as a weapon when matter should have been left to jury).

⁷⁵¹ Tucker [2016] EWCA Crim 593. ⁷⁵² Woodward v Koessler [1958] 3 All ER 557.

⁷⁵³ Gipson [1956] Crim LR 281; Hodgson [1954] Crim LR 379.

⁷⁵⁴ Petrie [1961] 1 All ER 466; Gibson v Wales [1983] 1 All ER 869.

⁷⁵⁵ ibid.

⁷⁵⁶ Cugullere [1961] 2 All ER 343.

⁷⁵⁷ Harrison v Thornton (1966) 68 Cr App R 28, [1966] Crim LR 388, DC.

⁷⁵⁸ 120 JP 250. Also, no doubt, a stiletto heel, which can be a very dangerous weapon: (1964) The Times, 25 Sept.

⁷⁵⁹ (1975) 62 Cr App R 71. The point was not decided by the Divisional Court.

⁷⁶⁰ [1989] Crim LR 71 (Judge Fricker QC). ⁷⁶¹ Davis v Alexander (1970) 54 Cr App R 398.

⁷⁶² See L v DPP [2003] QB 137. ⁷⁶³ Petrie [1961] 1 All ER 466; Leer [1982] Crim LR 310.

⁷⁶⁴ Flynn (1985) 82 Cr App R 319, [1986] Crim LR 239 and commentary.

The requisite intention

The question in *Woodward v Koessler*⁷⁶⁵ was whether D intends to 'cause injury to the person' if he intends merely to frighten or intimidate by displaying a knife rather than by making physical contact. It is now established that he does not. If there is no intention to cause physical injury, the offence is only committed if there is an intention to cause injury by shock, a psychiatric injury—and only in very exceptional circumstances could evidence of such an intention be found.⁷⁶⁶ Recklessness as to use will not be sufficient mens rea for the offence.⁷⁶⁷ A conditional intention to use the article is sufficient but it must be an intention to use the article in the future. If D sets out from Berkshire intending, if the occasion arises, to use a domestic knife for causing injury in Cornwall, the knife is an offensive weapon so long as it is carried in a public place and the intention continues. Once D believes that there is no possibility of the knife being used for causing injury—because, for example, his purpose has been accomplished—it ceases to be an offensive weapon.⁷⁶⁸ It may, therefore, be no offence to carry the knife—whether or not it had been used—from Cornwall back to Berkshire.

Offences of carrying, not using

After some hesitation, the courts have construed the Act in the light of its long title. It is aimed at the carrying of offensive weapons in public places. It is not aimed at the actual use of the weapon, which can invariably be adequately dealt with under some other offence. Possession of a weapon does not necessarily lead to an offence against the person, but that does not mean that possession offences are not justified.⁷⁶⁹ It has been suggested that there are a growing number of possession-type offences which are acquiring a greater significance in the criminal law.⁷⁷⁰ They are often easy to detect and prove and can carry substantial sentences.⁷⁷¹

In Jura,⁷⁷² D was holding an air rifle at a shooting gallery when, on being suddenly provoked, he shot and wounded a woman. It was held that he had a reasonable excuse for carrying the rifle though not, of course, for using it in that way. But he had committed one offence, not two. It was as if a gamekeeper at a shooting party were suddenly to lose his temper and shoot at someone. The position is therefore that if D is lawfully in possession of the article, whether it be an offensive weapon per se or not, his decision unlawfully to use, and immediate use of it, does not amount to an offence under the Act. In Dayle,⁷⁷³ D took a car jack from the boot of his car and threw it at V in the course of a fight. In Ohlson v Hylton,⁷⁷⁴ D, a carpenter, took a hammer from his tool bag in the course of a fight and struck V. In neither case was D guilty of an offence under the Act. It seems that if D is not in possession ⁷⁶⁵ [1958] 3 All ER 557.

⁷⁶⁶ Edmonds [1963] 2 QB 142; Rapier (1979) 70 Cr App R 17; Snooks [1997] Crim LR 230. See more recently Ali [2012] EWCA Crim 934 in which it was conceded by the Crown that the judge's summing up was defective as it invited the jury to convict on the basis that D had used the weapon in question only to frighten.

⁷⁶⁷ See Byrne [2003] EWCA Crim 3253, [2004] Crim LR 582 and commentary.

⁷⁶⁸ Allamby [1974] 3 All ER 126, CA. Cf Ellames [1974] 3 All ER 130.

⁷⁶⁹ See on this D Husak, 'The Nature and Justifiability of Non-Consummate Offences' (1995) 37 Ariz LR 151.

⁷⁷⁰ See eg the offences under the Terrorism Acts and see C Walker, Blackstone's Guide to the Anti-Terrorism Legislation (3rd edn, 2014) Ch 6. For an interesting account of possession offences, see MD Drubber, 'The Possession Paradigm' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 91.

⁷⁷¹ The CPS has published its policy on prosecuting those who carry weapons: www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/offensive-weapons-knives-bladed-and-pointed-articles; see also www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/offences-against-person-incorporating-charging-standard.

⁷⁷² [1954] 1 QB 503, CA.

⁷⁷³ [1973] 3 All ER 1151. See also Sundas [2011] EWCA Crim 985.

⁷⁷⁴ [1975] 2 All ER 490, DC. See also Police v Smith [1974] 2 NZLR 32 (guest in restaurant using table knife offensively); Humphreys [1977] Crim LR 225, CA (penknife).

of the article until an occasion for its use arises and he then takes it up for immediate use, he commits no offence under the Act.⁷⁷⁵ The law was so stated in Ohlson v Hylton.⁷⁷⁶

To support a conviction under the Act the prosecution must show that the defendant was carrying or otherwise equipped with the weapon, and had the intent to use it offensively before any occasion for its actual use had arisen.⁷⁷⁷

This interpretation avoids the formidable difficulty which would otherwise arise where D picks up an article in the course of a fight, allegedly for self-defence. The onus of proving that this was an unreasonable step for the purposes of self-defence is on the Crown but, if it was capable of being an offence under the Act, it would be for D to prove he had a reasonable excuse.

Duration of offence

An 'occasion' has a beginning and it must also have an end.⁷⁷⁸ If D picks up a glass to defend himself in the course of a pub brawl he does not commit an offence under the Act; but suppose, when the fight is over, he declines to put the glass down and insists on carrying it home through two miles of streets? Probably the 'occasion' has come to an end, and the question is whether D has a reasonable excuse to carry the article.

16.15.1.2 Lawful authority or reasonable excuse

It may be that the existence of lawful authority is a pure question of law, whereas whether there is a reasonable excuse is a question of fact, subject to the usual judicial control.⁷⁷⁹

The term 'lawful authority' presents difficulties. Before the Act, it was presumably generally lawful to be in possession of an offensive weapon in a public place—otherwise there would have been no necessity for the Act. Now it is generally unlawful. 'Lawful authority' suggests some legal exception to the general rule of the Act; yet none is provided for and the words themselves are certainly not self-explanatory. In Bryan v Mott, Lord Widgery CJ said⁷⁸⁰ that 'lawful authority' refers to those 'people who from time to time carry an offensive weapon as a matter of duty—the soldier with his rifle and the police officer with his truncheon'. It seems that the 'duty' must be a public one—an employer cannot authorize his employees to carry offensive weapons simply by getting them to contract to do so.

Whether there is a reasonable excuse is said to depend on whether a reasonable person would think it excusable to carry the weapon,⁷⁸¹ and, in Butler,⁷⁸² D's argument that he had a reasonable excuse because he never considered whether the swordstick he was carrying was an article made or adapted for causing injury was left to the jury; but that may have been too generous. What did he suppose a swordstick was for, if not injuring people? A possible answer is that he thought it was made as a curio or 'collector's item'. Generally the courts have construed the provision strictly and exercised close control over magistrates and juries. It is not enough that D's intentions for use of the article were entirely lawful.⁷⁸³ All of the circumstances must be considered, so, for example, it was a reasonable excuse for a male stripper to possess a truncheon as part of his uniform.⁷⁸⁴

⁷⁷⁵ A point seemingly overlooked in Byrne [2004] Crim LR 582.

⁷⁷⁶ [1975] 2 All ER 490 at 496. The requirement that the intention to use the weapon has to be formed before the occasion of its use was reaffirmed in Veasey [1999] Crim LR 158 and C v DPP [2002] Crim LR 202 and commentaries.

⁷⁷⁷ Powell [1963] Crim LR 511, CCA, and Harrison v Thornton [1966] Crim LR 388, DC, therefore appear to be wrongly decided.

⁷⁷⁸ cf Giles [1976] Crim LR 253 (Judge Jones).

⁷⁷⁹ Peacock [1973] Crim LR 639; Leer [1982] Crim LR 310, CA.

⁷⁸⁰ (1975) 62 Cr App R 71 at 73, DC.

⁷⁸¹ Bryan v Mott, ibid.

⁷⁸² [1988] Crim LR 695.

⁷⁸³ Bryan v Mott, n 780.

⁷⁸⁴ See Frame v Kennedy 2008 HCJAC 25 (K performed as 'Sergeant Eros').

A belief, however reasonable and honest, that an extendable baton (an offensive weapon) is an aerial or some other innocent article is not a reasonable excuse.⁷⁸⁵ It is not necessarily a reasonable excuse that the weapon is carried only for self-defence. D must show that there was 'an imminent'^[786] particular threat affecting the particular circumstances in which the weapon was carried'.⁷⁸⁷ One who is under constant threat it is said, must resort to the police. He commits an offence if he regularly goes out armed for self-defence.⁷⁸⁸ So, there was held to be no excuse for carrying around an iron bar, though D had reasonable cause to fear and did fear that he would be violently attacked and intended to use the bar for defence only.⁷⁸⁹ It is not reasonable for an Edinburgh taxi driver to carry two feet of rubber hose with a piece of metal inserted at one end, though he does so for defence against violent passengers whom taxi drivers sometimes encounter at night.⁷⁹⁰ It has been held that possession of a broken milk bottle (an article adapted for causing injury) is not excused by the fact that D intended to use it to commit suicide.⁷⁹¹ It is an offence for security guards at clubs to carry truncheons 'as a deterrent' and as 'part of the uniform'.⁷⁹²

Unlawful possession may become lawful if circumstances change so as to give rise to a reasonable excuse. When a person is attacked he may use anything that he can lay his hands on to defend himself, so long as he uses no more force than is reasonable in the circumstances. It may, then, be reasonable to use an offensive weapon that he is unlawfully carrying. When Butler⁷⁹³ was viciously attacked, his use of the swordstick to defend himself was justified, so possession of it must have become lawful, but that could not undo the possession offence already committed.⁷⁹⁴ The narrow interpretation of reasonable excuse may qualify the important principle that a person cannot be driven off the streets and compelled not to go to a public place where he might lawfully be because he will be confronted by people intending to attack him.⁷⁹⁵ If he decides that he cannot go to that place unless armed with an offensive weapon, it seems that he must stay away. He commits an offence if he goes armed.⁷⁹⁶ The effectiveness of the legislation in preventing the carrying of arms would be seriously impaired if anyone who reasonably feared that he might be attacked was allowed to carry a weapon.⁷⁹⁷

Where D had an explanation for possession of the weapon, for example by putting it in his work trousers and forgetting 'that he was wearing those trousers' and was found in possession in public, the defence of a reasonable excuse ought still to have been left to the jury.⁷⁹⁸ Forgetfulness alone is not a sufficiently good reason, but coupled with other factors

⁷⁸⁵ Densu [1998] 1 Cr App R 400, [1998] Crim LR 345.

⁷⁸⁶ But this word does not appear in the statute and should not be elevated to such: McAuley [2009] EWCA Crim 2130 decided under the 1988 Act, s 139.

⁷⁸⁷ Evans v Hughes [1972] 3 All ER 412 at 415, DC; Evans v Wright [1964] Crim LR 466. The case was misapplied by the trial judge in Archbold [2007] EWCA Crim 2125, where D had phoned the police to report that V was attacking D's home and car and D had then gone in search of him with a knife. The trial judge's direction gave the jury no opportunity to apply a defence of reasonable excuse if D was facing imminent attack. See also McAuley [2009] EWCA Crim 2130 decided under the 1988 Act, s 139, emphasizing that the matter should be left to the jury.

⁷⁸⁸ For a comparative view, see D Lanham, 'Offensive Weapons and Self-Defence' [2005] Crim LR 85.

⁷⁸⁹ Evans v Hughes, n 787. See also Bradley v Moss [1974] Crim LR 430, DC; Pittard v Mahoney [1977] Crim LR 169, DC.

⁷⁹⁰ Grieve v MacLeod 1967 SLT 70.

⁷⁹¹ Bryan v Mott, n 780. See also Bown [2003] EWCA Crim 1989, [2004] 1 Cr App R 13, decided under the 1988 Act, s 139. See also Miller [2007] EWCA Crim 1891, possession of butterfly knife having confiscated from girlfriend with history of self-harm.

⁷⁹² Spanner [1973] Crim LR 704. ⁷⁹³ See n 782.

⁷⁹⁴ Smith, Justification and Excuse, 117–123. ⁷⁹⁵ Field [1972] Crim LR 435.

⁷⁹⁶ Malnik v DPP [1989] Crim LR 451, DC.

⁷⁹⁷ Salih [2007] EWCA Crim 2750. See Deyemi [2007] EWCA Crim 2060 and Zahid [2010] EWCA Crim 2158 on this approach with firearms.

⁷⁹⁸ Bird [2004] EWCA Crim 964.

may be and should be left to the jury.⁷⁹⁹ In Jolie, the court offered two examples of facts on which there might be a valid good reason based on forgetfulness: a parent who, having bought a kitchen knife, put it in the glove compartment of a car out of the reach of a child (reason 1), forgetting (reason 2) later to retrieve it. Similarly, in Glidewell,⁸⁰⁰ a taxi driver discovered weapons left by a passenger (reason 1), and forgot to remove them because he was busy (reason 2).

The imposition of a burden of proof on D can cause great difficulty where he is charged in a second count with another offence which imposes no such burden. In Snooks and Sergeant,⁸⁰¹ DD were also charged with possessing an explosive, contrary to s 64 of the OAPA. They relied on self-defence. For s 64, the onus was on the prosecution, under the 1953 Act the onus is on DD. The jury have an impossible task.

16.15.1.3 A 'public place'

Section 1(4) of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 provides:

'public place' includes any highway and any other premises or place to which at the material time the public have or are permitted to have access whether on payment or otherwise.

This is very similar to the interpretation which has been placed upon s 192 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 and to the definition of public place, etc in other Acts. It should always be borne in mind that the same term may bear different meanings according to the context in which it is used and that whether a place is public is a question of fact.⁸⁰²

A public place could not include land adjoining that to which the public had access even if D could have inflicted harm from such land.⁸⁰³ A householder impliedly invites persons having legitimate business to walk up his garden path to the door, but this does not render the garden a 'public place'. The class of persons invited to enter is too restricted for them to constitute 'the public'.⁸⁰⁴ On the other hand, the communal landing of a block of flats has been held to be a public place on the ground that the public had access in fact, whether or not they were permitted to have it.⁸⁰⁵ In the absence of a notice restricting entry, there was evidence on which justices could find that the unrestricted access of the public to a local authority housing estate extended to the stairways and landings of the flats.⁸⁰⁶ The jury are, of course, entitled to draw reasonable inferences; so that where D produced an air pistol in a private dwelling-house which he was visiting, it was open to them to infer that he brought it to or took it away from the house through the public street.⁸⁰⁷ Possession of an article (truncheon) in a car on a public road is possession in a public place.⁸⁰⁸

16.15.1.4 Possession and mens rea

It must be proved that D 'has with him' the article. The prosecution must prove the minimum mental element which is necessary to constitute possession and, in addition, the 'closer contact' than mere possession which the phrase 'has with him' implies.⁸⁰⁹ The question then is ⁷⁹⁹ Jolie [2004] EWCA Crim 1543; Tsap [2008] EWCA Crim 2679; Chahal v DPP [2010] EWHC 439 (Admin).

⁸⁰⁰ (1999) 163 JP 557. ⁸⁰¹ [1997] Crim LR 230. ⁸⁰² Theodolou [1963] Crim LR 573.

⁸⁰³ Roberts [2004] 1 Cr App R 16, [2003] EWCA Crim 2753 (garden 1m wide).

⁸⁰⁴ Edwards and Roberts (1978) 67 Cr App R 228, [1978] Crim LR 564 (a case under s 5 of the Public Order Act 1936).

⁸⁰⁵ Knox v Anderton (1982) 76 Cr App R 156, [1983] Crim LR 114, DC, and commentary. But a public place is not synonymous with a place from which the public are not excluded: Harriott v DPP [2005] EWHC 965 (Admin).

⁸⁰⁶ See also Hanrahan [2004] All ER (D) 144 (Nov) (rehabilitation centre to which access gained through intercom).

⁸⁰⁷ Mehmed [1963] Crim LR 780. ⁸⁰⁸ Ellis [2010] EWCA Crim 163.

⁸⁰⁹ McCalla (1988) 87 Cr App R 372 at 378.

whether the offence is one of strict liability or whether any mens rea is required. The case law is in disarray. Some cases suggest that the prosecution must prove D knowingly 'has with him': Cugullere,⁸¹⁰ Russell,⁸¹¹ Subsequent decisions (Martindale,⁸¹² and *McCalla*⁸¹³) have erroneously treated Russell as simply a decision, and therefore a wrong decision, on the meaning of possession. The prevailing view, following McCalla, is that the offence is one of strict liability; but the better opinion is that Russell, though treated as overruled, should be regarded as the binding authority.⁸¹⁴

In Jolie,⁸¹⁵ D was found in possession of a knife in a car he was driving and claimed that he had forgotten it was there, although he admitted putting it there as he had used it to start the broken ignition. Kennedy LJ suggested that in the cases of McCalla, Martindale and Buswell it had been clear that the article had remained under D's control. His lordship suggested that the jury should be directed that they may find possession if either D was aware of the presence of the weapon or he was responsible for putting it where it was mislaid.⁸¹⁶

As regards the relevant mens rea as to the offensiveness of the weapon, in Densu,⁸¹⁷ counsel abandoned an argument before the Court of Appeal that the ruling of the trial judge was wrong insofar as it suggested that the proof that D 'has with him' is satisfied on proof that D knew that he had the weapon (a baton) with him but did not know that it was a weapon. The prevailing view is that liability is strict.

16.15.1.5 Articles with blades or points

The Prevention of Crime Act is supplemented by an offence triable either way, punishable on summary conviction by six months', and, on indictment, by four years' imprisonment⁸¹⁸ under s 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, of having with one in a public place an article 'which has a blade^[819] or is sharply pointed except a folding pocket knife^[820] [with a cutting edge not exceeding three inches⁸²¹}'. The article need not be made or adapted for causing injury, nor intended by D for such use. The fact that a blade might be used for other functions than as a weapon (eg a Swiss Army knife) does not mean that it is not prima facie a bladed article within s 139.⁸²² Otherwise, the constituents of the offence are similar to those required by the 1953 Act. It is a defence for D to prove that he had good reason or lawful authority for having the article with him. In Jolie, the court regarded the words 'good reason' in the 1988 Act as intended to be narrower than 'reasonable excuse' in the 1953 Act.

⁸¹⁰ [1961] 2 All ER 343. Arguably the court was concerned only with the question of possession.

⁸¹¹ (1984) 81 Cr App R 315. ⁸¹² (1986) 84 Cr App R 31. ⁸¹³ See n 809.

⁸¹⁴ See commentary on Wright [1992] Crim LR 596.

⁸¹⁵ [2003] EWCA Crim 1543, [2003] Crim LR 730.

⁸¹⁶ See also Hilton [2009] EWHC 2867 (Admin) on the importance of distinguishing whether D knew he had something with him and whether he had a good reason for possessing it (decided under s 139).

⁸¹⁷ [1998] 1 Cr App R 400.

⁸¹⁸ Increased from two years by the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006, s 42.

⁸¹⁹ This probably means a blade which has a cutting edge. A screwdriver, even if it may be properly described as having a blade, is not within the section: Davis [1998] Crim LR 564. However, in Brooker v DPP (2005) 169 JP 368, a butter knife with no cutting edge and no point was held to be a bladed article.

⁸²⁰ Which means a knife which is 'readily and indeed immediately foldable at all times, simply by the folding process': Fehmi v DPP (1993) 96 Cr App R 235, DC, so that a pocket knife which locks into position is not 'folding': Deegan [1998] 2 Cr App R 121, [1998] Crim LR 562.

⁸²¹ On the difficulties on proving length where the weapon is lost, see Banton [2009] EWCA Crim 240.

⁸²² Giles [2003] All ER (D) 68 (Feb). A grapefruit knife qualifies: R (on the application of Windsor and Maidenhead RIBC) v East Berkshire Justices [2010] EWHC 3020 (Admin).

The court concluded that the words 'good reason' do not generally require a judicial gloss in directing the jury.⁸²³

Self-defence against an anticipated imminent attack may be a good reason.⁸²⁴ In Davis,⁸²⁵ the court thought that the section imposed 'a very significant limitation on the citizen's freedom. It should not be assumed that it has been achieved except by the use of clear words.' It is specifically provided that it is a defence for D to prove that he had the article with him for use at work,⁸²⁶ religious reasons⁸²⁷ or as part of national costume. It is necessary to prove that he had it with him for a specific reason in public on this occasion.⁸²⁸

A new s 139A was inserted by the Offensive Weapons Act 1996, creating offences of having on school premises (a) an article to which s 139 applies (punishable on indictment with four years' imprisonment⁸²⁹) and (b) an offensive weapon within the meaning of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 (punishable on indictment with four years' imprisonment). It is a defence to both offences to prove 'good reason or lawful authority'.

Under the Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012 the offence was extended further: a person is guilty of an offence if he (a) has an article to with him or her in a public place or on school premises; (b) unlawfully and intentionally threatens another person with the article; and (c) does so in such a way that there is an immediate risk of serious physical harm to that other person.⁸³⁰ In the Crown Court it carries a mandatory minimum sentence of six months. Note also that s 28 of the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015 introduces a minimum custodial sentence for a second (or further) conviction for possession of a knife or offensive weapon.

⁸²³ See Chahal v DPP [2010] EWHC 439 (Admin); Hilton [2009] EWHC 2867 (Admin). In Clancy [2012] EWCA Crim 8, the Court of Appeal accepted that fear of attack would constitute a 'good reason' within the meaning of s 139(4). The court held that D's state of mind is not wholly irrelevant, but it is not determinative either. For criticism see [2012] Crim LR 549. See also Smith v Shanks 2014 SLT 626.

⁸²⁴ Emmanuel [1998] Crim LR 347.

⁸²⁵ [1998] Crim LR 564. Contrast the attitude of the court in Deegan, n 820.

⁸²⁶ A question of fact for the jury: Manning [1998] Crim LR 198 (knife carried to do repairs to D's own car). This can include casual or part-time work: Chahal v DPP [2010] EWHC 439 (Admin).

⁸²⁷ Which must be the dominant reason: Wang [2003] EWCA Crim 3228. D must show that the religion was the reason for his possession on this occasion, ie that he was to use it in some religious connection. The court acknowledged, per curiam, that Art 9 of the ECHR might require the State authorities to allow persons to carry bladed instruments in public in pursuit of their religious beliefs.

⁸²⁸ Giles, n 822.

⁸²⁹ Increased from two years by the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006, s 42.

⁸³⁰ Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 139AA(1) (s 139AA added by Legal Aid, Sentencing and Punishment of Offenders Act 2012, s 142(2)).

Sexual offences

17.1 Introduction

The Sexual Offences Act 2003 (SOA 2003)¹ came into force on 1 May 2004.² The Act represents the most comprehensive and radical overhaul of the law relating to sexual offences ever undertaken in England and Wales. Previously, most of the relevant law was contained in the Sexual Offences Act 1956, but that was itself merely a consolidation of various statutes dating back to the late nineteenth century, and the 1956 Act had been amended incrementally to tackle numerous specific problems.³ The 2003 Act redefines many of the offences found in the old legislation, but introduces scores of new ones. It is not, however, a complete codification of sexual offences; some regulation remains elsewhere—for example, that relating to prostitution⁴

¹ See generally on the Act: P Rook and R Ward, Sexual Offences: Law and Practice (5th edn, 2016); K Stevenson, A Davies and M Gunn, Blackstone's Guide to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (2004); R Card, M Hirst and A Gillespie, Sexual Offences (2008). See also for an interesting comparison, Scottish Law Commission Discussion Paper No 131, Rape and Other Offences (2006). For a discussion of the Scottish proposals, see P Ferguson, 'Reforming Rape and Other Sexual Offences' (2008) Edinburgh L Rev 302.

² Where the prosecution has not demonstrated whether the events constituting the charge occurred before or after this date, it was held that the prosecution cannot continue: Newbon [2005] Crim LR 738 (HHJ Glenn); C [2005] EWCA Crim 3533. The government responded by introducing s 55 of the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006. In short, s 55 applies if the offence now charged is an offence under the SOA 2003 and the conduct alleged amounts to an offence under one of the repealed offences listed in subs (2), and the only thing preventing D being found guilty is that it cannot be proved beyond reasonable doubt whether the conduct took place before or after the commencement of the SOA 2003. If so, where the maximum penalty of imprisonment available was lower under the old law that will be conclusively presumed to apply. If the penalties are the same, then it shall be conclusively presumed that the conduct took place after the commencement of the SOA 2003. The section presents difficulties: how can it be known that the 'only thing' preventing the accused being guilty is that the date has not been proved? Many other issues will determine guilt. It is also potentially unfair: why should it not be that the version of the offence (not penalty) which is more favourable to the defendant is adopted? In C [2009] EWCA Crim 52 it was held that for s 55 'to have been relied upon each offence should have been charged in the alternative under the new regime and the old'. This is still not always understood by prosecutors. See also F [2008] EWCA Crim 994.

³ For the previous law see the 10th edition of this book, Ch 16.

⁴ The Home Office consultation process on prostitution: Paying the Price (2004) (see on this B Brooks Gordon, 'Clients and Commercial Sex' [2005] Crim LR 425; M Madden Dempsey, 'Rethinking Wolfenden' [2005] Crim LR 444) led to the new offences in the Policing and Crime Act 2009: s 14 created a new offence of paying for sexual services of a prostitute who is subject to exploitation; s 16 amends the Street Offences Act 1959, s 1. A new offence of soliciting was created by s 19 of the 2009 Act, which inserted s 51A into the SOA 2003; this offence effectively replaces the offences under the Sexual Offences Act 1985. See TK Paz and N Levenkron (2009) 29 LS 438.

and indecent images.⁵ Parliament continues to add new sexual offences and to amend those in the 2003 Act.⁶

It is worth pointing out that the 2003 Act was result of a fundamental review: the Home Office Review of sex offences, *Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sex Offences*⁷ and the Review of Part 1 of the Sex Offenders Act 1997.⁸ Following consultation, these led to a Government White Paper, Protecting the Public: Strengthening Protection Against Sex Offenders and Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences.⁹ The laudable aims of these reviews cannot be criticized. Unfortunately, whilst trying to achieve some of those aims, such as a measure of gender neutrality¹⁰ and modernization of the language, the Act creates numerous difficulties, many of a significant and substantial nature.

17.2 Recurring fundamental concepts in the 2003 Act

17.2.1 Consent

At the core of some of the most serious offences in the 2003 Act is the element of consent.¹¹ It has long been recognized that determining the consent of the complainant is not restricted to ascertaining whether there has been the use or threat of force,¹² nor whether the sexual acts were against his or her will.¹³ However, beyond these negative observations the law has struggled to define, in positive terms, the scope of consent.¹⁴ It is important to remember that the absence of consent is an element of the actus reus, not an element of a defence. As Duff points out,¹⁵ the description of the conduct must be descriptive of the proscribed wrong, and if consent was part of the defence, sexual intercourse would have to be the wrong.¹⁶

⁵ See the Protection of Children Act 1978, s 1; and s 160 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 as amended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008. See generally A Gillespie, Child Pornography: Law and Policy (2011); S Ost, Child Pornography and Sexual Grooming: Legal and Societal Responses (2009); M Taylor and E Quayle, Child Pornography: An Internet Crime (2003).

⁶ See eg the possession of extreme image offences discussed in Ch 30 and the amendments in the Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006, the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, the Coroners and Justice Act 2009 and the Policing and Crime Act 2009.

⁷ (2000). See N Lacey, 'Beset by Boundaries' [2001] Crim LR 3; J Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process (2nd edn, 2002), 60–67.

⁸ (2001). Described by Lord Ackner in the Debates as a 'pamphlet': HL, 13 Feb 2003, col 846.

⁹ (2002) Cm 5668.

¹⁰ cf the Gender Recognition Act 2004 relating to gender-specific offences. On the importance of gender neutrality, see P Rumney and M Morgan-Taylor, 'Recognising the Male Victim: Gender Neutrality and the Law of Rape' (1997) 26 Anglo-American LR 198.

¹¹ For discussion of a multitude of issues surrounding consent, see A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017).

¹² Until relatively recently judges continued erroneously to direct juries that the use of force by the defendant and resistance by the complainant were essential ingredients of the offence of rape. See Dimes (1912) 7 Cr App R 43; Harling [1938] 1 All ER 307, and Howard [1965] 3 All ER 684.

¹³ Camplin (1846) 1 Cox CC 220: Tindal CJ and Parke B were of the view that rape was ravishing a woman 'where she did not consent' and not ravishing her 'against her will'.

¹⁴ See generally the discussion in the Law Commission Policy Paper appended to Setting the Boundaries. For more philosophical analysis, see eg H Hurd, 'The Moral Magic of Consent' (1996) 2 Legal Theory 168; J McGregor, 'Why When She Says No She Doesn't Mean Maybe and Doesn't Mean Yes' (1996) 2 Legal Theory 175.

¹⁵ See Duff, Answering for Crime, 208–211.

¹⁶ For an argument that it is prima facie wrong to penetrate a vagina or anus see M Madden Demsey and J Herring, 'Why Sexual Penetration Requires Justification' (2007) 27 OJLS 467. See also J Wall, 'Sexual Offences and General Reasons Not to Have Sex' (2015) 35 OJLS 777.

Defining consent was acknowledged to be one of the major difficulties under the 1956 Act,¹⁷ where the leading authority of *Olugboja*¹⁸ simply left the question to the jury to apply their common sense, giving consent its 'ordinary meaning'. This approach prompted stringent academic criticism: Glanville Williams regarded it as 'one more manifestation of the deplorable tendency of the criminal courts to leave important questions of legal policy to the jury'.¹⁹

Remedying this shortcoming was one of the most important objectives of the law reform. Setting the Boundaries emphasized the need for clarity in 'the most private and difficult area of sexual relationships ... so that the boundaries of what is acceptable, and of criminally culpable behaviour, are all well understood'.²⁰ It was stressed that this is particularly important because in sexual activity consent often involves 'verbal and non-verbal messages [which] can be mistaken and where assumptions about what is and is not appropriate can lead to significant misunderstanding'.²¹ Given such determination to clarify the law of consent, echoed as forcefully as it was by ministerial statements,²² the provisions in the 2003 Act are rather disappointing. Although there is greater clarity than under Olugboja, the jury is still left with considerable discretion since the statutory definitions are not as clear or as comprehensive as they could be. In particular, it is doubtful whether the Act succeeds in providing any solution to some of the more frequently encountered difficulties such as the complainant who was, at the time of the sexual act, voluntarily and heavily intoxicated²³ or who succumbed to threats or pressure short of violence, or to deceptions.²⁴

17.2.1.1 'Definition' of consent

Three sections in the Act seek to clarify what is meant by consent. Under s 76, where the defendant, A,²⁵ deceives the complainant, B, as to the nature or purpose of the act or his identity, it is conclusively presumed that there is a lack of consent and that A has no reasonable belief in consent. Under s 75, six specified circumstances give rise to a rebuttable presumption that there was no consent and that A did not have a reasonable belief in B's consent. Finally, s 74 provides a general definition of consent which may be relevant in combination with ss 75 and 76 in appropriate cases, and independently governs all other situations. It is unclear whether the three-tiered approach to consent reflects a hierarchy of circumstances in which consent is absent.²⁶ ¹⁷ For a review of circumstances in which consent was held to be absent under the old law, see Setting the Boundaries, para 2.2.2.

¹⁸ [1981] 3 All ER 443.

¹⁹ Williams, TBCL, 551. Although see S Gardner, 'Appreciating Olugboja' (1996) 16 LS 275 for a defence of this approach emphasizing that it focused correctly on the issue of the victim's autonomy. See also G Dingwall, 'Addressing the Boundaries of Consent in Rape' (2002) 13 KCLJ 31.

²⁰ Home Office Consultation Paper, Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences (2000) paras 2.7.2 and 2.10.1.

²¹ ibid. See on this D Husak, The Philosophy of Criminal Law (2009) Ch 9. See also P Rumney, 'The Review of Sex Offences and Rape Law Reform: Another False Dawn' (2001) 64 MLR 890 emphasizing that consent should involve a dialogue between the parties.

²² See Lord Falconer speaking of the need for 'crystal clarity', HL Deb, 13 Feb 2003, col 772. See also Protecting the Public, para 30.

²³ See Bree [2007] EWCA Crim 804 and discussion at p 765.

²⁴ See Jheeta [2007] EWCA Crim 1699 discussed at p 778.

²⁵ Throughout this chapter 'A' will be used to denote the principal defendant and 'B' the complainant reflecting the distinctive drafting style in the 2003 Act.

²⁶ See the influential article by J Temkin and A Ashworth, 'Rape, Sexual Assaults and the Problems of Consent' [2004] Crim LR 328. See also J Miles [2008] 10 Arch News 5, suggesting that s 74 should be construed subject to s 76. This seems to be a strained reading of the sections and, as will be discussed, it is not one the courts have found favourable. For analysis, see K Laird, 'Rapist or Rogue? Deception, Consent and the Sexual Offences Act 2003' [2014] Crim LR 492.

These 'deeply ambiguous'²⁷ definitions apply throughout Part I of the Act (in particular for the non-consensual offences of rape, assault by penetration, sexual assault and causing a person to engage in sexual activity without consent). One very significant failure of the drafting of the Act was not to extend ss 75 and 76 beyond the substantive offences, to inchoate forms of those offences.²⁸

In H,²⁹ the Court of Appeal rightly emphasized that it is not necessary in every case for the judge to direct on all aspects of the law of consent when they do not arise on the facts. There will, however, be more difficult cases in which a careful direction will be needed. As the analysis that follows will demonstrate, one of the most intractable difficulties is the approach the judge ought to take when it is alleged that A has deceived B, in circumstances in which the deception does not fall within s 76.

Section 74

Section 74 provides that 'a person consents if he agrees by choice, and has the freedom and capacity to make that choice'. This definition, based on 'free agreement', is intended to emphasize that the absence of the complainant's protest, resistance or injury does not necessarily signify his consent. Although the Act is silent as to the precise moment at which B's consent or agreement must be present, it is clear that the relevant time is that of the alleged sexual wrongdoing. This may present problems where, for example, B has indicated to A his willingness to engage in sexual activity later that evening, but then becomes so heavily intoxicated that at the time of the sexual act B is incapable of making any coherent decision.³⁰ A fortiori where B initially indicates his disinclination to engage in sexual activity but later does so when voluntarily intoxicated.

'Freedom', it is submitted, is too loose a word to use in defining this crucial element of such serious offences. Freedom is a term which is heavily context-dependent and always implies 'freedom from' something.³¹ The jury will have to address the existence and weight of this 'other' pressure from which B might have been acting freely. It may therefore be desirable for the jury to address the question of freedom by reference to proportionality. The greater the 'pressure' facing B, the less 'freedom' she has to make her choice to engage in sexual activity. This may involve the jury in a difficult assessment of a wide range of factors when the degree of freedom is inhibited by, for example, A's threat to terminate B's employment unless she has sex. This may lead to further difficulties such as the source of the pressures, particularly where the defendant is not directly responsible for bringing them to bear. Beyond freedom from physical pressure, it is unclear what degree of freedom is envisaged to validate consent. In particular, issues may arise as to B's economic freedom, as where B, an underprivileged employee of a wealthy businessman, agrees to his sexual advances to retain her position. Other examples might involve B's religious freedom as where a dependent young member of a strict religion agrees to sexual activity with an elder whom in all other respects she has been taught never to question.³² The answer to what level of pressure negates freedom will depend on a whole range of factors and will be decided on a ²⁷ See Tadros (2006) 26 OJLS 521.

²⁸ See HHJ Rodwell, 'Problems with the Sexual Offences Act 2003' [2005] Crim LR 290.

²⁹ [2006] EWCA Crim 853. See also Taran [2006] EWCA Crim 1498, where B was raped at gunpoint and there was no need to explain to the jury the intricacies of ss 75 and 76, discussed later.

³⁰ See also the Law Commission's Policy Paper appended to Setting the Boundaries, para 4.54. See generally Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, 90–116.

³¹ As Temkin and Ashworth point out, n 26, freedom is only used to rule out the suggestion of some or all of its antitheses; see p 336 of Temkin and Ashworth, citing JL Austin, 'A Plea for Excuses' in H Morris (ed), Freedom and Responsibility (1961) 8.

³² Difficulties also arise because A will claim that he had a reasonable belief in B's consent.

case-by-case basis. It is helpful to consider some of the cases to identify examples of how the Court of Appeal views the position.

In the case of Kirk,³³ it was accepted by the Court of Appeal that the homeless teenage complainant, B, who had been sexually abused for years by A, had not consented to sex with A where she had done so to gain £3.25 from him in order to buy food. It cannot be said that B has truly 'agreed by choice' if she has been groomed or frightened into submission by A. A further instructive case on this issue is C,³⁴ where the question was whether A had sexually abused B between the ages of 5 and 15 and then raped her after she was 16. Once the jury found that A had sexually abused B when she was under 16, it was open to them to conclude that her consent to the sexual acts that occurred after she turned 16 was indeed apparent and not real. This was the effect of the dominance and control that A had exerted over B from a young age. C illustrates that the impression of consent can be negated by A's dominance and control over B.

This question of interpreting freedom also raises the difficult relationship between 'consent' and 'submission', which continues to feature in the courts' analysis. Under the 1956 Act, in *Olugboja*³⁵ the court placed considerable emphasis on the difference between consent and submission, but never fully identified what the distinction was. For example, B may reluctantly submit to sexual intercourse only because her fiancé threatens that he will break off their engagement if she does not. Such a case is very far removed from rape but it seems to be one of submission. At the other extreme, B may submit because A is holding a knife to her throat. This is plainly rape; there is no consent.³⁶ In both cases B yields because a threat is made; it is not easy to see how the term 'submission' helps to distinguish them. The confusion in addressing these terms was in part a result of the dictum of Coleridge J in Day:³⁷ 'every consent involves a submission; but it by no means follows that a mere submission involves consent'. It is submitted that this is wrong. B who joyously embraces her reluctant lover, A, undoubtedly consents to the acts that follow but it would seem inappropriate, to put it mildly, to say that B 'submits' to the sexual activity that she clearly wants. On the other hand, B who 'gives in' to threats from her fiancé does in fact agree, although not freely. Whether any useful distinction can be drawn in this context between threats ('do this or I will sack you') and promises ('do this and I will give you a pay rise') is debatable.

The language of submission and consent was used in Kirk (earlier in this section), and the Court of Appeal addressed this issue directly in *Doyle*³⁸ where A had used violence against his ex-partner (holding her head under water and tying her up) before demanding sex. B refused, protesting until he had penetrated her; she then ceased to resist, explaining at trial that she 'just let him get on with it'. A's conviction for rape was upheld.³⁹ There was no consent. The court acknowledged that there would be circumstances where a jury would require assistance with the distinction between (a) reluctant but free exercise of choice, especially in a long-term loving relationship, and ³³ [2008] EWCA Crim 434 (under the old law).

³⁴ [2012] EWCA Crim 2034, [2013] Crim LR 358.

³⁵ (1981) 73 Cr App R 344.

³⁶ This may now give rise to a presumption of non-consent under s 75(2)(a).

³⁷ (1841) 9 C & P 722 at 724.

³⁸ [2010] EWCA Crim 119.

³⁹ The judge directed that 'submission to do something which she did not want to happen does not amount to consent. In deciding if [B] consented or whether she merely submitted to something which she did not want, you should apply your combined good sense, your experience, and your knowledge of human behaviour and modern behaviour to all the relevant facts, including, obviously, their relationship and what you have heard about that. The law does not require a complainant to have resisted physically, and nor is it necessary to show that a woman's submission was induced by force or fear, although obviously, in this case, as you know, the prosecution evidence is that [B] did say no, and physically resisted until the defendant penetrated her.'

(b) unwilling submission due to fear of worse consequences, but the instant case did not call for such assistance.⁴⁰

In Robinson,⁴¹ Elias LJ reaffirmed that the division between consent and submission is a matter for the jury, applying its common sense, experience and knowledge of human behaviour. In reaching this conclusion his lordship cited Olugboja with approval. Olugboja was also cited with approval in the more recent case of Ali,⁴² in which the prosecution alleged that the defendants groomed young girls from troubled backgrounds. The prosecution contended that, as a result of such grooming, the girls become sexually compliant and that any apparent consent on their part was not genuine. Upholding the defendants' convictions, Fulford LJ stated that, 'one of the consequences when vulnerable people are groomed for sexual exploitation is that compliance can mask the lack of true consent on the part of the victim'.⁴³ It was observed that individuals in circumstances such as these may have been manipulated to the extent that they are unaware of, or confused about, the distinction between acquiescence and genuine agreement. His lordship held that evidence of exploitation is a factor the jury can take into account when deciding whether or not there was genuine consent. The distinction the law has traditionally drawn between consent and submission seems to have been called into question in Watson.⁴⁴ In this case, Burnett LJ, as he then was, stated, obiter, that 'it is possible for a person to submit to a demand which he or she feels unable to resist, but without lacking the capacity or freedom to make a choice'.⁴⁵ His lordship characterized this as being an example of 'reluctant consent'. If an individual truly feels unable to resist a demand for sex, then it is difficult to see how he or she has the freedom to make a choice. Surely this is an example of submission rather than consent? To the extent that it calls into question the existence of a distinction between consent and submission, the dictum in Watson is contrary to the weight of Court of Appeal authority. Indeed, in Ali the distinction between consent and submission was described as being 'critical'. The continued reliance on the approach in Olugboja is somewhat problematic, however, given that s 74 was enacted with the express intention⁴⁶ that consent would not simply be a matter for the jury's common sense.

Section 74 also uses the term 'choice' as a factor in determining consent. Choice presupposes that B has options from which to choose and that, in turn, surely presupposes B is possessed of adequate information about each to make an 'informed' choice between them.⁴⁷ In R (on the application of F) v DPP,⁴⁸ Lord Judge CJ held that 'choice' is crucial to the issue of consent. His lordship stated that the evidence relating to choice and freedom to make a choice ought to be approached in a 'broad commonsense way'. Again, s 74 fails to offer any guidance as to the necessary degree of information about the activity (eg penetration) that B is to engage in and this will be a particularly difficult issue in cases in which it is alleged that B's consent has been procured by deception. One of the most controversial areas in which this issue arises is in cases where A is HIV-positive and has not informed B of that fact. The Court of Appeal has confirmed that a complainant's consent to the risk of ⁴⁰ In cases where a direction on submission is needed, the old JSB Direction 53 offers an illustration taken from Pill J's ruling in Zafar: 'V may not particularly want sexual intercourse on a particular occasion, but because it is her husband or her partner who is asking for it, she will consent to sexual intercourse. The fact that such consent is given reluctantly or out of a sense of duty to her partner it is still consent.'

⁴¹ [2011] EWCA Crim 916.

⁴² [2015] EWCA Crim 1279.

⁴³ At [57].

⁴⁴ [2015] EWCA Crim 559.

⁴⁵ At [34].

⁴⁶ Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the Law on Sexual Offences, Vol I, para 2.10.2.

⁴⁷ Tadros argues that there is a paradox in the present law in that it is possible for B to agree by choice while lacking freedom or capacity: if one lacks capacity and freedom one cannot agree by choice at all: (2006) 26 OJLS 521.

⁴⁸ [2013] EWHC 945 (Admin).

contracting HIV has to be an informed consent.⁴⁹ However, it is important to reiterate⁵⁰ that the current position in English law is that if A who is HIV-positive fails to inform B of that fact before having unprotected intercourse, A will not commit rape. The appropriate charge is under the OAPA 1861. Indeed, it has been held that A's failure to disclose his HIV status did not affect the issue of consent in rape where there were no allegations that A had deceived B. In B,⁵¹ it was held that the evidence of A's HIV status should have been excluded: the fact that a defendant may not have disclosed his HIV status is not relevant to the issue of consent under s 74.

A different approach may be appropriate if B asks A whether he is HIV-positive and A lies. In McNally,⁵² the Court of Appeal distinguished B on the basis that it was a case concerning non-disclosure. Leveson LJ stated that non-disclosure could not be equated with active deception. His lordship held that it was possible for the latter to vitiate consent within the meaning of s 74.⁵³ It is submitted, therefore, that the position in relation to this issue is as follows. If A fails to disclose his HIV-positive status and does not infect B, he is guilty of nothing. If A fails to disclose and he does infect B, then he may be guilty of an offence under the OAPA 1861. If, on the other hand, B asks A about his HIV status and he lies to her, A may be guilty of rape and, if B becomes infected, A may additionally be guilty of an offence under the 1861 Act. Whether A is guilty of rape will require the jury to evaluate the extent to which A's deception deprived B of the freedom to choose whether to engage in sex with him. As is evident, there is a lack of consistency between the approach to consent that has been adopted in the context of sexual offences on the one hand and non-fatal offences against the person on the other. In relation to the latter, the burden of disclosure is placed upon A, whilst in the context of the former A can avoid liability by saying nothing. Whether the current state of the law is satisfactory is surely debatable.⁵⁴

The element of 'capacity' is similarly not further defined. It is clearly 'integral to the concept of choice'.⁵⁵ In this context it is clearly intended to mean mental capacity. It is submitted that the crucial issue should be whether B has the capacity to choose to perform the specified act with A on the occasion in question.⁵⁶ The test is not one focusing on B's status—that is, whether B has a particular mental disability or not. The question is focused on B's capacity to make the decision about engaging in this sexual act with this person. Determining B's capacity is necessarily a contextually sensitive issue. The Court of Appeal has stated that

⁴⁹ Konzani [2005] EWCA Crim 706. ⁵⁰ See the full discussion in Ch 16.

⁵¹ [2006] EWCA Crim 2945. ⁵² [2013] EWCA Crim 1051.

⁵³ The distinction between active deception and non-disclosure is one that Sharpe characterizes as 'morally problematic'. See A Sharpe, 'Criminalising Sexual Intimacy: Transgender Defendants and the Legal Construction of Non-Consent' [2014] Crim LR 207 and more recently A Sharpe, 'Expanding Liability for Sexual Fraud Through the Concept of "Active Deception": A Flawed Approach' (2016) 80 J Crim L 28. For further discussion of the deception/disclosure bifurcation, see A Reed and E Smith, 'Caveat Amator—Transmission of HIV and the Parameters of Consent and Bad Character Evidence' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017).

⁵⁴ In Richardson [1999] QB 444, 450 the court stated that as a matter of principle: 'There is no basis for the proposition that the rules which determine the circumstances in which consent is vitiated can be different according to whether the case is one of sexual assault or one where the assault is non-sexual.' As a result of the interpretation that has been given to s 74, there is now a divergence of approach as to how the respective areas of the law deal with consent. It is important to point out that the Court of Appeal in Richardson was interpreting the law prior to the enactment of the 2003 Act. Arguably, however, the principle remains the same.

⁵⁵ Per Sir Igor Judge P in Bree [2007] EWCA Crim 804 at [23].

⁵⁶ C Elliott and C de Than, 'The Case for a Rational Reconstruction of Consent in Criminal Law' (2007) 70 MLR 225 argue that the test of capacity should focus on whether B was capable of understanding at the material time the nature and reasonable foreseeable consequences of the act and able to communicate her consent effectively, at 242.

the process is, 'largely visceral rather than cerebral, and owes more to instinct and emotion rather than to analysis'.⁵⁷

The leading authority on the concept of capacity to consent under the 2003 Act is Cooper in which the House of Lords considered that term in the context of the offence under s 30: sexual activity with a person with a mental disorder impeding choice.⁵⁸ Some aspects of the decision inform a general understanding of consent. B was a 28-year-old woman with a history of serious mental disorders manifesting themselves in episodes of impulsive and aggressive behaviour, delusions, hallucinations, depression or manic episodes. She developed irrational concerns for her safety. A befriended her, gave her crack cocaine and made her perform oral sex on him and a co-defendant. B said that she had performed the acts out of fear of violence. A argued that B's capacity was only impaired and that she did not lack capacity to choose in the sense of lacking sufficient understanding of the nature of the act or its consequences. In short, A argued that B knew what oral sex was and that was sufficient for her to have capacity to consent. The judge directed the jury that if B had an irrational fear or confusion of mind arising from her mental disorder she may lack capacity to choose whether to agree to sexual touching. The Court of Appeal⁵⁹ took a much narrower view of capacity and held that an irrational fear that prevents the exercise of choice cannot be equated with a lack of capacity to choose. The House of Lords unanimously held that this approach was wrong. In a welcome judgment delivered by Baroness Hale,⁶⁰ it was stressed that the law on capacity recognizes that to be able to make a decision:

- (1) a person must be able to understand the information relevant to making it, and
- (2) must be able to weigh that information in the balance to arrive at a choice.⁶¹

A mentally disordered person might appreciate the sexual nature of the act but not be able to weigh the information in the balance so as to be able to arrive at a choice. The capacity to choose under the 2003 Act is situation- and person-specific. 'One does not consent to sex in general. One consents to this act of sex with this person at this time and in this place.'⁶² These general sentiments in relation to capacity are important in construing s 74.

The law is still in a state of development and there appeared to be some divergence of approach between the criminal law and the civil law. Baroness Hale stated in Cooper that the applicable test in the civil law when considering capacity to consent to marriage and sexual intercourse did not include an evaluation of the complainant's ability to use and weigh the relevant information. In Re M,⁶³ the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) emphasized that the focus of the criminal law will be on a particular specific past event, with any issue relating to consent being evaluated in retrospect. The focus of the civil law when assessing ⁵⁷ A [2014] EWCA Crim 299, [28]. Citing with approval Re M [2014] EWCA Civ 37.

⁵⁸ Technically these comments might be seen as obiter on the scope of capacity in s 74 since the appeal dealt with the meaning of the words 'unable to communicate' a choice in s 30(2). By s 30(2), a person is unable to refuse if—(a) he lacks the capacity to choose whether to agree to the touching (whether because he lacks sufficient understanding of the nature or reasonably foreseeable consequences of what is being done, or for any other reason), or (b) he is unable to communicate such a choice to the alleged offender.

⁵⁹ [2008] EWCA Crim 1155. For critical comment see T Elliott [2008] 6 Arch News 5. The Court of Appeal relied heavily on Munby J in X City Council v MB [2006] EWHC 168 (Fam).

⁶⁰ The central issue was the scope of s 30. The issue of capacity under that section is made clear by the Act. As the House concluded under s 30(2)(a), a person is unable to refuse if she lacks the capacity to choose to agree to the touching whether because she lacks sufficient understanding of the nature or reasonably foreseeable consequences of what is being done 'or for any other reason'.

⁶¹ [2009] UKHL 42, [24].

⁶² At [27] per Baroness Hale. Such an approach is in keeping with the concept of autonomy in matters of private life guaranteed by Art 8 of the ECHR.

⁶³ [2014] EWCA Civ 37.

capacity may be general and may not relate to a particular partner, time and place. The Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) in A⁶⁴ cited this judgment with approval and held that ‘the difference in definition of capacity in the civil and criminal jurisprudence is a difference without a distinction’.

In short, at present there appear to be the following categories relevant to whether V is lacking capacity in relation to sexual conduct under the 2003 Act:

- B lacks mental capacity to make the choice—no consent;
- B lacks ability to refuse because of mental disorder—unable to refuse; if the inability also amounts to inability to choose B also gives no consent;
- B lacks ability to refuse for reasons unrelated to mental disorder—if inability amounts to inability to choose (eg being heavily intoxicated) also gives no consent;
- B has mental capacity to choose, but mentally (not physically)⁶⁵ incapable of communicating choice to this defendant—unable to refuse; arguably⁶⁶ also lacking consent.

The Court of Appeal has confirmed that where capacity to consent is at issue in criminal proceedings, the burden of proving incapacity falls upon the party asserting it.⁶⁷ This will, inevitably, be the prosecution. The prosecution must discharge this burden to the criminal standard; they must make the jury sure that B did not have the capacity to consent. If the jury cannot be sure, then Macur LJ stated that they must assume that B did have the capacity to consent. Her ladyship then went on to state that:

The issue for them then will be an examination of all the facts and circumstances to determine whether or not the complainant consented to the act or acts in question and whether the alleged assailant knew they did not consent or did not believe that they did so or were unreasonable in their belief that there was consent.⁶⁸

If capacity is in issue, then it may be necessary to call an expert to provide evidence that would not otherwise be within the common experience of the jury. Her ladyship emphasized, however, that the expert evidence must only deal with the matter in issue, namely capacity. In the instant case, the expert strayed beyond her remit and gave her own interpretation of the facts as to whether B was consenting or not.

Intoxicated consent

A engages in sexual activity with B who is intoxicated.⁶⁹ How intoxicated must B be to lack capacity for the purposes of the 2003 Act? This has provoked controversy and a number of high-profile appeals. In the 2002 White Paper, Protecting the Public, the Home Secretary, when stating the government’s intention to create a set of evidential presumptions, indicated that these would not cover voluntary intoxication leading to incapacity falling short of sleep or a lack of consciousness:

I have rejected the suggestion that someone who is inebriated could claim they were unable to give consent—as opposed to someone who is unconscious for whatever reason, including because of alcohol—on the ground that we do not want mischievous accusations.

⁶⁴ [2014] EWCA Crim 299, [25]. The court did state, however, that similarity of definition did not dictate the same standard of proof. Macur LJ observed that the adjudications of the Court of Protection will look to the future in generality, whereas the criminal law looks retrospectively to specific acts of the past.

⁶⁵ B lacks physical ability to communicate consent to this defendant—presumptively no consent (s 75).

⁶⁶ Stevenson et al, above n 1, regard these as all non-consensual cases.

⁶⁷ A [2014] EWCA Crim 299. ⁶⁸ At [29].

⁶⁹ If B is involuntarily intoxicated by A’s conduct, s 75(2)(f) might be applicable: presumption of no consent. Note also the offence under s 61, p 817.

In Dougal,⁷⁰ the trial judge directed the jury to enter a 'not guilty' verdict when the prosecutor informed the judge that he did not propose to proceed further because the prosecution were unable to prove that the complainant had not given consent because of her level of intoxication.⁷¹ The decision to drop the case was controversial since all that B had said was that she 'could not remember'. Following the furore over that case the government raised the issue in a Consultation Paper, Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims,⁷² asking 'Does the law on capacity need to be changed. Should there be a statutory definition of capacity?' Subsequently, the Court of Appeal has sought to pre-empt the need for further legislative intervention by encouraging trial judges to leave the issue to the common sense of the jury where there is evidence that B might not have been consenting owing to intoxication.⁷³ That is likely to lead to inconsistency of decisions, but is a pragmatic response to a seemingly intractable problem.

In Bree,⁷⁴ A aged 25, and B, aged 19, had both voluntarily consumed a large amount of alcohol and it was accepted by both parties that sexual intercourse had taken place. A was charged with rape on the basis that B had effectively been unconscious throughout most of the sexual activity. B gave evidence that she was not unconscious. It was a fundamental part of A's case that B had been conscious throughout and had in fact consented. A claimed that B's intoxication did not mean that she had lacked the capacity to consent, indeed, she had removed her own pyjamas and responded to questions such as whether she had a condom. A was convicted, but the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. In cases of rape arising after voluntary⁷⁵ consumption of alcohol, the question was whether the evidence proved that A had had sexual intercourse with B without her consent. On the proper construction of s 74, where B had voluntarily consumed alcohol but remained capable of choosing whether or not to have intercourse, and in her drunken state agreed to do so, that would not be rape.⁷⁶ However, if, through drink or some other reason, B had temporarily lost her capacity to choose whether to have intercourse on the relevant occasion, she was not consenting and, subject to questions about A's mens rea, if intercourse took place, that would be rape.⁷⁷ The question is not whether the alcohol had made either or both less inhibited than they would have been if sober, nor whether either or both might afterwards have regretted what had happened and indeed wished that it had not.⁷⁸ The court remarked pithily that the 'capacity

⁷⁰ [2005] Swansea Crown Court.

⁷¹ This CPS decision was criticized in Bree [2007] EWCA Crim 804. ⁷² (2006).

⁷³ On jury attitudes to intoxicated rape complainants, see also E Finch and V Munro, 'Breaking Boundaries; Sexual Consent in the Jury Room' (2006) 26 LS 303.

⁷⁴ [2007] EWCA Crim 804. See for critical comment on the case, P Rumney and R Fenton, 'Intoxicated Consent in Rape: Bree and Juror Decision-Making' (2008) 71 MLR 279 calling for better guidance and S Wallerstein, 'A Drunken Consent is Still a Consent—Or Is It?' (2009) 73 J Crim L 318 arguing that the law does not go far enough and that a drunken consent is not consent. Wallerstein proposes a two-step test: (a) was B drunk so as to make her incapable of giving a valid consent; and, if so, (b) was there pre-intoxication consent? If the answer to (b) is yes, there is consent. If not, there is no consent. See also G Firth, 'Not an Invitation to Rape: The Sexual Offences Act 2003, Consent and the Case of the "Drunken" Victim' (2011) 62 NILQ 99, in which it is argued that the decision in Bree fails to take proper account of how legal rules are not always applied by juries free of entrenched attitudes and that the Court of Appeal failed to take the opportunity to clarify the definition of capacity. Firth argues that the Court of Appeal's decision in Bree is similar to the one in Olugboja, in that both place the jury in a position of authority. For more recent discussion, see C de Than and J Elvin, 'Capacity and Consent' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017).

⁷⁵ See D Warburton (2007) 71 J Crim L 394 on whether the decision is restricted to cases of voluntary intoxication.

⁷⁶ In Kamki [2013] EWCA Crim 2335, the Court of Appeal held that as long as the relevant issues are explained to the jury, it is unnecessary for the judge to use the precise phrase 'a drunken consent remains a consent'. For further discussion, see D Warburton, 'Intoxication and Consent in Sexual Offences' (2014) 78 J Crim L 207.

⁷⁷ Per Sir Igor Judge P at [34]. See also the valuable commentary by Ashworth [2007] Crim LR 903.

⁷⁸ Moreover, it was not a question of whether either or both might have a very poor recollection of precisely what had happened. That might be relevant to the reliability of their evidence.

to consent can evaporate well before unconsciousness occurs'.⁷⁹ The court also emphasized that the jury should in such cases be given assistance with the meaning of 'capacity'. The court has made clear in Kamki that judges need to consider the following issues in drafting suitable directions for the jury:⁸⁰

- a. A person consents if he or she agrees by choice and has the freedom and capacity to make that choice,
- b. When a person is unconscious, there is no such freedom or capacity to choose,
- c. Where a person has not reached a state of unconsciousness and experiences some degree of consciousness, further considerations must be applied,
- d. A person can still have the capacity to make a choice and have sex even when they have had a lot to drink (thereby consenting to the act),
- e. Alcohol can make people less inhibited than when they are sober and everybody has the choice whether or not to have sex,
- f. If through drink a [person] has temporarily lost the capacity to choose to have sexual intercourse, she would not be consenting,
- g. Before a complete loss of consciousness arises, a state of incapacity to consent can nevertheless be reached. Consideration has to be given to the degree of consciousness or otherwise in order to determine the issue of capacity,
- h. ... the jury would have to consider the evidence of B to determine what her state of consciousness or unconsciousness was and to determine what effect this would have on her capacity to consent,
- i. If it is determined that the complainant did have the capacity to make a choice, it would then have to be considered whether she did or may have consented to sexual intercourse.

In Hysa,⁸¹ the defence argued that, first, the fact that the intoxicated 16-year-old complainant rejected the advances of two men accompanying A meant that she clearly had capacity to consent. The Crown's case was that she could not remember whether or not she had consented: the Crown simply could not exclude the possibility that the complainant had said 'yes'. The Court of Appeal, in an interlocutory appeal by the Crown, concluded that the judge erred in withdrawing the case from the jury. The pre-2003 Act case of *Malone*⁸² was referred to as authority for the proposition that:

there is no requirement that the absence of consent has to be demonstrated or that it has to be communicated to the defendant for the actus reus of rape to exist... . It is not the law that the prosecution in order to obtain a conviction for rape have to show that the complainant was either incapable of saying no or putting up some physical resistance, or did say no or put up some physical resistance.

The court was critical of the defence submissions which were 'based to a large extent on the premise that because the complainant cannot remember if she consented or not, that is fatal to the prosecution'. That was, in the court's words 'expressly disavowed' in Bree.⁸³

⁷⁹ At [32]. The language echoes that of the law on intoxicated defendants, but the analogy is flawed: see Wallerstein, n 74.

⁸⁰ See also Evans [2012] EWCA Crim 2559.

⁸¹ [2007] EWCA Crim 2056. Bree was distinguished in Wright [2007] All ER (D) 267 (Nov) where B had been so heavily intoxicated as to be unconscious.

⁸² [1998] 2 Cr App R 447.

⁸³ Hallett LJ emphasized that it would be a rare case indeed where it would be appropriate for a judge to stop a case in which, on one view, a 16-year-old girl, alone at night and vulnerable through drink, is picked up by a stranger who has sex with her within minutes of meeting her and she says repeatedly she would not have consented to sex in these circumstances. At the recommenced trial the jury took just 40 minutes to convict.

In *Seedy Tamedou*⁸⁴ B stated that she would not have consented to having sex with A, but because of her intoxicated condition on the night in question, she was unable to say categorically that she did not consent. The judge rejected A's submission of no case and he was convicted. The Court of Appeal dismissed A's appeal. It was held that the jury had been entitled to consider the issue of the absence of consent and to distinguish it from absence of memory. B's evidence that she could not remember was insufficient for the judge to remove the case from the jury.

The courts have yet to tackle the problem case of B who agrees when sober to have sex with A, and whether her consent given when sober is lost when she is heavily intoxicated.⁸⁵

Consent induced by deception

One issue that generated controversy when the 2003 Act was enacted centred on the nature of the relationship between ss 74 and 76, specifically whether deception perpetrated to induce consent is capable of falling within the scope of s 74.⁸⁶ The applicability of s 76 is limited to those categories of deception listed within it, whilst s 74 makes no mention of deception. Commentators took divergent views on whether s 76 was intended to be exhaustive,⁸⁷ but the courts have now settled the matter conclusively. In Assange v Sweden,⁸⁸ Sir John Thomas P stated that, 's 76 deals simply with a conclusive presumption in the very limited circumstances to which it applies. If the conduct of the defendant is not within s 76, that does not preclude reliance on s 74.' This outcome was reached as a matter of statutory construction, as his lordship stated that, 'It would, in our view, have been extraordinary if Parliament had legislated in terms that, if conduct that was not deceptive could be taken into account for the purposes of s.74, conduct that was deceptive could not be.' The language of the provision aside, his lordship's reluctance to rely upon s 76 is understandable, given the draconian nature of conclusive presumptions.⁸⁹

Assange was relied upon in the subsequent case of R (on the application of F) v DPP. In that case, A knew that B's consent to sex was contingent upon his either wearing a condom or withdrawing before ejaculation. A intentionally ejaculated inside B, who sought judicial review of the CPS's decision not to prosecute him for rape. In allowing the claim, Lord Judge CJ placed significant reliance upon the terms of s 74 and in particular the concepts of freedom and choice. His lordship held that evidence relating to choice and freedom ought to be approached in a 'broad, commonsense way'. The evidence demonstrated that A deemed B subservient to his control and that what he did was his method of asserting that control. Importantly, Lord Judge stated that B was deprived of choice relating to the crucial feature on which her original consent to sex was based and for that ⁸⁴ [2014] EWCA Crim 954.

⁸⁵ See Ashlee (2006) 212 CCC (3d) 477 where the Alberta Court of Appeal held that consent becomes vitiated on unconsciousness. See also JA and the AG of Canada [2011] 2 SCR 440.

⁸⁶ For further background, see K Laird, 'Rapist or Rogue? Deception, Consent and the Sexual Offences Act 2003' [2014] Crim LR 492. For discussion of the how the internet has facilitated this form of deception, see A Gillespie, 'The Electronic Spanish Prisoner: Romance Frauds on the Internet' (2017) 81 J Crim L 217.

⁸⁷ Temkin and Ashworth took the view that s 76 was not exhaustive, [2004] Crim LR 328, while Miles opined that it was, [2008] 10 Arch News 5.

⁸⁸ [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin).

⁸⁹ Rogers argues that this decision is wrong because the purpose of the non-consensual offences is to protect a person's sexual autonomy, not their health or desire not to have a child. He states that it is a mistake to conflate concerns about sexual health/pregnancy with sexual autonomy. Sexual autonomy means one's willingness to be used to provide sexual stimulation and, it is argued, given the presence of that willingness here, there was no violation of sexual autonomy and it ought to follow no liability either. See J Rogers, 'The Effect of "Deception" in the Sexual Offences Act 2003' [2013] 4 Arch Rev 7.

reason her consent was negated. Therefore the circumstances of the case fell within the statutory definition of rape.

These judgments beg the question whether there is any limit to what is capable of constituting a ‘crucial feature’ for the purposes of s 74. The Court of Appeal shed some light on this in McNally.⁹⁰ A was biologically female but identified as male. A joined a social networking site and listed her status as male. A began a relationship with B and the evidence demonstrated that B was unaware of the fact A was in fact biologically female. A penetrated B’s vagina on a number of occasions. B’s mother began to have suspicions about A’s gender and confronted her. Once it emerged that she was biologically female, A was charged with six counts of assault by penetration, contrary to s 2(1) of the 2003 Act. A pleaded guilty, but sought to vacate her plea on the basis that she had received inaccurate legal advice as to the interpretation of the relevant provisions of the 2003 Act. In dismissing A’s appeal, Leveson LJ conceptualized the case as one concerning active deception rather than a failure to disclose.⁹¹ As has already been discussed, it is only the former that can come within the scope of s 74. His lordship placed reliance upon Assange and F as authorities that substantiated the proposition that s 76 is not exhaustive. Importantly, his lordship observed that:

In reality, some deceptions (such as, for example, in relation to wealth) will obviously not be sufficient to vitiate consent. In our judgment, Lord Judge CJ’s observation that ‘the evidence relating to “choice” and the “freedom” to make any particular choice must be approached in a broad commonsense way’ identifies the route through the dilemma.

It was accepted that, in a physical sense, the acts of assault by penetration of the vagina are the same whether perpetrated by a male or a female, but that the sexual nature of the act is different where the complainant is deliberately deceived into believing that the person performing those acts is male. This led Leveson LJ to the conclusion that A’s deception had deprived B of the freedom to choose to have sexual encounters with a boy, in addition to her freedom to choose whether to have sex with a girl.⁹² Had she known the truth, B may have consented to being penetrated by A, but the latter’s deception deprived her of that choice.

McNally is important as it confirms that only active deception (and not failure to disclose) falls within the scope of s 74, although the distinction between these two might be difficult to draw.⁹³ This brings ss 74 and 76 closer together, given that s 76 explicitly requires intentional deception whilst s 74 is obviously silent on this issue (it does not mention deception at all). The judgment also confirms the limited applicability of s 76, although this is merely another demonstration of the judicial aversion to the conclusive presumptions. Although the judgment offers clarification on some points, there are some fundamental ones that remain unresolved.

⁹⁰ [2013] EWCA Crim 1051.

⁹¹ Sharpe vigorously contests the conclusion that the case concerned active deception, on the basis that transgender people are not engaging in a form of pretence. See A Sharpe, ‘Criminalising Sexual Intimacy: Transgender Defendants and the Legal Construction of Non-Consent’ [2014] Crim LR 207; A Sharpe, ‘Expanding Liability for Sexual Fraud Through the Concept of “Active Deception”: A Flawed Approach’ (2016) 80 J Crim L 28.

⁹² Sharpe, n 91, states that this argument casts doubt on the authenticity of the gender identities of transgender people.

⁹³ Rogers states that it is unclear whether reliance was in fact placed upon s 74 as opposed to s 76. With respect, given Leveson LJ’s invocation of Assange and F, it seems clear beyond doubt that the outcome was dictated by the terms of s 74. See J Rogers, ‘Further Developments Under the Sexual Offences Act’ [2013] 7 Arch Rev 7.

The most intractable is whether deception as to any condition has the potential to fall within s 74 and vitiate consent. Leveson LJ suggests that deception as to wealth would obviously be insufficient to vitiate consent. What, however, in s 74 precludes deception as to wealth from potentially vitiating consent? In F, upon which Leveson LJ placed reliance, it will be recalled that Lord Judge CJ held that B was deprived of choice relating to the crucial feature on which her original consent to sex was based. If B's original consent to sex was based upon A's wealth, when it transpires that A is in fact not wealthy, does this not suffice to vitiate B's consent? Of course, a jury might be sceptical about whether B in fact based her consent on A's wealth, but suppose there are other features which B says influenced her that juries might find more important than wealth, such as religion.⁹⁴ The next controversy for the courts to grapple with, therefore, is whether there ought to be a limit placed on those features capable of vitiating consent⁹⁵ or whether this is something that is best left for juries to determine, applying the broad commonsense approach advocated by Lord Judge.⁹⁶ One simple way of dealing with this issue would be for Parliament to re-enact s 3 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. This section made it an offence to procure sexual intercourse by false representations and had it been re-enacted would have given prosecutors the option of charging A with an offence other than rape in cases involving deception. Both the Law Commission and the Sexual Offences Review recommended that this offence be re-enacted in a more modernized form, but the government failed to implement this proposal. The 2003 Act therefore repealed, but did not replace, this offence. As we noted immediately after the Act,⁹⁷ this was an obvious lacuna. It has since been characterized by Spencer as 'glaring and obvious';⁹⁸ and has arguably led to the difficulties examined in this section.

Section 75: evidential presumptions

If A is proved to have performed the relevant act⁹⁹ for the offence in question (eg penile penetration for rape), and it is proved that any of the circumstances listed in s 75(2) exists and A knows¹⁰⁰ it exists, B is taken not to have consented and A not to have a reasonable belief in B's consent unless sufficient evidence is adduced to raise the issue.

⁹⁴ A good example arose in a civil case: AJA v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2013] EWCA Civ 1342. The claimants were political activists who engaged in sexual relationships with a man, P, who purported to be an activist passionate about the same causes as them. In fact, P was an undercover police officer the respondent had ordered to infiltrate the organization of which the claimants were members. The claimants' evidence was that they never would have consented to sex with P had they known his true identity. The High Court noted ([2013] EWHC 32 (QB)) that the claimants did not allege that they had been deceived within the meaning of s 76, but could it not be argued that P's deception deprived them of the freedom to choose within the meaning of s 74? One of the claimants gave a newspaper interview in which she stated that she felt she had been 'raped by the state'. See C McCartney and N Wortley, 'Raped by the State' (2014) 78 J Crim L 1.

⁹⁵ See A Sharpe, 'Criminalising Sexual Intimacy: Transgender Defendants and the Legal Construction of Non-Consent' [2014] Crim LR 207 for the argument that there are policy reasons for why every material fact ought not to be capable of vitiating consent. The example given is the anti-Semite who does not want to have sex with people who are Jewish. Sharpe asks whether that person ought to be able to give effect to their prejudice by invoking the criminal law. The arguments are also made that the right to sexual autonomy is not an unlimited right and that prosecution produces inconsistency.

⁹⁶ Whether this is best left to juries is questionable. Spencer has made the valid point that the practical distinction between deceptions that vitiate consent and those that do not is 'murky and uncertain', in JR Spencer, 'Sex by Deception' [2013] 9 Arch Rev 6.

⁹⁷ See the 11th edition of this book, Ch 18.

⁹⁸ JR Spencer, 'Three New Cases on Consent' (2007) 66 CLJ 490.

⁹⁹ See s 77.

¹⁰⁰ Knowledge means 'true belief' as we have been reminded by the House of Lords in a different context: Saik [2006] UKHL 18.

The circumstances in s 75(2) are:

- (a) any person was, at the time of the relevant act or immediately before it began, using violence against the complainant or causing the complainant to fear that immediate violence would be used against him;
- (b) any person was, at the time of the relevant act or immediately before it began, causing the complainant to fear that violence was being used, or that immediate violence would be used, against another person;
- (c) the complainant was, and the defendant was not, unlawfully detained at the time of the relevant act;
- (d) the complainant was asleep or otherwise unconscious at the time of the relevant act;
- (e) because of the complainant's physical disability, the complainant would not have been able at the time of the relevant act to communicate to the defendant whether the complainant consented;
- (f) any person had administered to or caused to be taken by the complainant, without the complainant's consent, a substance which, having regard to when it was administered or taken, was capable of causing or enabling the complainant to be stupefied or overpowered at the time of the relevant act.

Although A has to know that 'those circumstances existed',¹⁰¹ the requirement is in fact only that his knowledge of any one circumstance is proved.¹⁰² The Act is silent on whether this must be proof by the prosecution.¹⁰³ There is no requirement that the existence of the circumstances listed in (a) to (f) caused B's lack of consent.¹⁰⁴ The absence of consent is simply presumed. Controversially, s 75 relates to both the issue of consent and the issue of A's belief in consent. Section 75 creates a rather odd set of presumptions since A can raise evidence sufficient to rebut the presumption without challenging the actual circumstance on which the presumption arises. So, for example, where the prosecution allege that B was asleep, A might raise evidence which will rebut the effect of the Crown's evidence without denying the fact that B was asleep. A can claim that he believed, reasonably, that despite being asleep B was consenting (based on their previous sexual practices).¹⁰⁵ A is obliged not to rebut the fact giving rise to the presumption, but the legal consequences of that presumption.

If the prosecution prove the three elements—the relevant act, A's knowledge and the circumstance giving rise to the presumption—A is obliged to raise sufficient evidence to rebut the issue. This can be done by calling evidence, testifying or by cross-examination of a Crown witness.¹⁰⁶ The obligation on A is to satisfy the judge, from the evidence, that there is a real issue about consent that is worth putting to the jury. If there is such evidence, it will be for the jury to determine whether they accept it. This means that the section is more likely ¹⁰¹ Section 75(1)(c). ¹⁰² Section 75(1)(b).

¹⁰³ What if D2 seeks to prove the existence of the circumstance in the course of showing that he lacked knowledge of it but D1 did not?

¹⁰⁴ cf the proposals in Setting the Boundaries, para 2.10.9.

¹⁰⁵ Note, however, that in P [2009] EWCA Crim 1110, Hughes LJ stated that 'We have no doubt that ... there is no real prospect of a jury considering that a belief in consent might be reasonably based on the proposition that because a defendant has had sexual intercourse on a number of previous occasions with a comatose or unconscious or asleep complainant, who after discovery of those occasions has not overtly objected, that this gives rise to an advance consent which the defendant could reasonably rely upon in the future to indulge in like sexual activity whenever she was in a similar condition.' At [29].

¹⁰⁶ Note that an earlier version of the Bill specifically stated that cross-examination of the complainant would not be sufficient to raise the issue as to V's consent unless the equivalent of an admission of consent.

to withstand ECHR challenge¹⁰⁷ than the original version in the Bill which incorporated reverse burdens for A's belief in consent.¹⁰⁸ Creating such presumptions has an important symbolic value,¹⁰⁹ and was widely welcomed in principle.¹¹⁰ The Canadian courts have interpreted similar provisions as requiring that any claims by the defence have an 'air of reality'.¹¹¹ In the leading English case of Cicarelli,¹¹² A met B at a party and touched her sexually when he found her unconscious at the end of the night. A was charged with sexual assault and sought to argue that despite B's unconsciousness he had a reasonable belief in consent on the basis of a single sexual advance he alleged she had made at the beginning of that evening. The trial judge ruled that there was insufficient evidence to rebut the presumption and directed the jury accordingly. The Court of Appeal agreed and held that, in order to rebut the presumption once it has arisen, A must adduce some evidence that is more than merely speculative or fanciful. The Lord Chief Justice emphasized that the issue of A's reasonable belief will only be considered by the jury provided that there is evidence which is sufficient to raise that issue. This language requires the judge to evaluate carefully the relevant evidence. It was concluded that the judge in this case had engaged in such an exercise and that her conclusion was justified. Given the factually sensitive nature of evaluating whether A has adduced sufficient evidence to cross the threshold imposed by s 75, it is unsurprising that the Court of Appeal was reluctant to interfere with the trial judge's ruling. Although it has been confirmed that A must adduce evidence that is more than merely speculative, it is submitted that it should not render it necessary for the defence to produce corroborative independent evidence, in the formal sense, to rebut the presumption.¹¹³

A jury should not ordinarily be directed as to s 75 at all unless the trial judge decides that there has been no evidence capable of rebutting s 75.¹¹⁴ If there is evidence that is capable of establishing consent (including A's testimony to that effect), s 75 ceases to have any application and the jury have no need to hear of s 75. In White,¹¹⁵ A sent B a photo of him digitally penetrating her vagina. They had been in a sexual relationship. A claimed he took the image with her consent. B claimed he must have taken it while she slept. The Court of Appeal quashed the conviction where the judge had directed on s 75 in a confusing manner.¹¹⁶ Under s 75, A is to be taken not to have reasonably believed that B consented unless sufficient evidence is adduced to raise an issue as to whether A reasonably believed it. The Court of Appeal stated:

There must be some foundation in the evidence and it must not be merely speculative or fanciful for there to be sufficient evidence. However, it is vital to understand that if the trial judge decides (presumably at the close of the evidence) that there is sufficient evidence to raise an issue as to whether the complainant consented and/or the accused reasonably believed that the complainant was consenting, then the judge will put the issues to the jury in accordance with the key sections ¹⁰⁷ cf the views expressed in Stevenson et al, Blackstone's Guide to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (2004) para 2.4.3.

¹⁰⁸ HL, 2 June 2003, cols 1062–1063 (Lord Thomas of Gresford).

¹⁰⁹ See HC Standing Committee B, 15 Oct 2002, col 26 (Beverley Hughes).

¹¹⁰ See Home Affairs Committee, Fifth Report 2002–03, HC 639.

¹¹¹ A striking example cited by P Rook and R Ward, Sexual Offences: Law and Practice (5th edn, 2016), is of Filice (1999) Carswell Ont 1262 where evidence that B had (as was her custom) taken out her false teeth before sex was sufficient to give the claim an air of reality. See further Pappajohn [1980] 2 SCR 120 discussed by Lord Steyn in R v A (No 2) [2002] 1 AC 67. For discussion on this, see Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, 132.

¹¹² [2011] EWCA Crim 2665.

¹¹³ Osolin [1993] 4 SCR 595; Park [1995] 2 SCR 836.

¹¹⁴ The use of s 75 is often misunderstood—see eg Tamanda K [2013] EWCA Crim 560.

¹¹⁵ [2010] EWCA Crim 1929.

¹¹⁶ The court approved the recommendation in Blackstone's Criminal Practice. See now Blackstone's Criminal Practice (2018) B3.

(ie 74 and 1(2)), and the section 75 route is barred. In the relatively rare cases where the judge decides that there is not sufficient evidence on one or both of the issues, a section 75 direction must be given on that issue.¹¹⁷

If the judge has ruled that s 75 has no part to play, the jury should then be directed to deal with the issue of consent under the general guidance in s 74. If sufficient evidence of consent has not been raised and there is no other defence available to A, the jury will be bound to find A guilty. Judges must avoid directing the jury to convict.¹¹⁸

In view of the complexity of the s 75 provision, it is perhaps no surprise that there are few reported instances in which it has been relied on.¹¹⁹ Section 75 will clearly have an impact on the process of the trial. In practical terms it will render it more likely that A will testify.¹²⁰ In addition, it will have a significant impact on the way that sexual offences are investigated and on the manner of police interviews. If the complainant alleges that one of the s 75(2) circumstances was present, the suspect will be under considerable pressure to offer an explanation in interview and advance his defence at an earlier stage.

Aside from these general concerns about creating presumptions, the individual circumstances listed in s 75(2) also pose problems.

Threats of violence

The use/threats of immediate violence need not emanate from A before they are treated, presumptively, as vitiating B's consent. This is a welcome extension of the law. Section 75(2) (a) will operate in circumstances such as those in Dagnall,¹²¹ where A had grabbed B and dragged her off the road telling her that he would rape her. Under threat, B told A that he could 'do what he liked as long as he did not harm her'. A was apprehended before penetrating B and convicted under the 1956 Act of attempted rape.¹²² The fact that B had explicitly assented to sexual acts did not in these circumstances mean that she was consenting. However, there are difficulties with s 75(2)(a). It is unclear why the requirement is one of 'immediate' violence. Arguably, it should be sufficient that A threatens B that he will 'make her suffer one day' unless she has sex with him at once. It may be that the concept of 'immediacy' is interpreted expansively by the courts.¹²³ Of course, even without the presumption, in a case of threats of a non-immediate nature B's consent might still be absent when applying the general test of free agreement under s 74.

Although it might appear sensible for a threat of violence to give rise to a conclusive presumption of non-consent, it is clear that in some circumstances even the most explicit threats of violence to B might not vitiate consent as, for example, where A and B are sado-masochists.¹²⁴ The rebuttability of the presumption provides for this scenario.

¹¹⁷ Emphasis added.

¹¹⁸ Mba [2012] EWCA Crim 2773.

¹¹⁹ There are occasional examples. In addition to the cases already discussed, see eg Zhang [2007] EWCA Crim 2018 in which the Court of Appeal rejected the submission that the trial judge's summing up had inadvertently elevated the rebuttable presumptions in s 75 to conclusive ones.

¹²⁰ See Explanatory Notes Sexual Offences Act 2003, Ch 42, which makes it clear that evidence given by the defendant himself may constitute 'sufficient evidence'. This must be read in light of subsequent case law confirming that a mere assertion from the defendant that is unsubstantiated by evidence is insufficient. There is a threshold the defendant's evidence must cross before the jury will be permitted to consider the reasonableness of his belief. See Cicarelli, n 112.

¹²¹ [2003] EWCA Crim 2441.

¹²² See also Low [1997] Crim LR 692 where B performed oral sex on A after persuading him not to rape her vaginally as she was pregnant. Note that there is a potential problem with applying the s 75 presumption to attempts. See HHJ Rodwell QC [2005] Crim LR 290.

¹²³ See the interpretation of 'immediate' in assault, p 661. The court did not tackle the issue in the case of C [2007] EWCA Crim 378 where the threats were to mother and child. Counsel had wrongly advised as to whether s 75 could apply to allow the Crown to rely on earlier threats which lacked immediacy.

¹²⁴ See N Bamforth, 'Sado-Masochism and Consent' [1994] Crim LR 661.

'Violence' is not defined. It is clear from the parliamentary debates that it was intended to be limited only to violence to the person, but that does not appear on the face of the statute. Where A threatens to damage B's property unless she engages in sexual activity, s 75 does not apply and the jury are left to determine the question of B's consent by reference to the criteria in s 74.

It is lamentable that the 2003 Act provided no replacement for the offence under s 2 of the 1956 Act, despite contrary recommendations in Setting the Boundaries. Section 2 provided an offence of procuring sexual intercourse by threats. A broader gender-neutral version of causing sexual activity by threats would have provided a useful backstop offence for cases in which the threats fall short of violence so that the jury were not sure there was a lack of consent, but considered the conduct criminally blameworthy. For example, in *Olugboja*¹²⁵ reference was made to an unreported case in which Winn J held that a constable had no case to answer where he induced B to consent to sexual intercourse by threatening to report her for an offence; whereas in Wellard,¹²⁶ A was said to have a previous conviction for rape (for which he was sentenced to six years' imprisonment) by masquerading as a security officer and inducing a girl to consent by threatening to report to her parents and the police that she had been seen having intercourse in a public place. Other examples are easy to envisage: A threatens that if B does not consent he will: (a) tell the police of a theft she has committed; (b) tell her relatives/employer of her previous misconduct; (c) dismiss her from her present employment; (d) not give her a rise in salary; (e) never take her to the cinema again.¹²⁷ Clearly, a line must be drawn somewhere, but the boundary of consent in such cases is difficult to draw and the Act ought to have provided more guidance in s 74.

Section 75(2)(b) also relates to threats of violence, applying where B is caused to fear that violence was being used, or that immediate violence would be used, against another person. This is an extremely broad presumption, but it has been welcomed as 'clarifying the common law regarding the fear of violence to third parties'.¹²⁸ There is no requirement that A is in any way involved in the causing of the complainant's fear. So, in theory, A who is aware that B, an immigrant, has heard on the TV of ongoing violent atrocities against the population of her homeland, who then performs a relevant sexual act with B is presumed to have done so without consent. Although this may seem like a fanciful example which is unlikely to present problems in practice, because of the ease with which the presumption could be rebutted, it demonstrates the unsatisfactory nature of the overbroad drafting.

Unlawful detention

Section 75(2)(c) seems to be an uncontroversial provision. Where, for example, B has been kidnapped, and A is aware of B's detained status, it is legitimate to presume that B is not consenting to sexual activity. This arises where, for example, A kidnaps his former lover and sexually assaults her.¹²⁹ Although there are instances of hostages forming a sexual bond with their kidnappers, it is unlikely that A will be able easily to rebut this presumption.

Unconsciousness

The presumption in s 75(2)(d) requires proof that A knows that B is unconscious.¹³⁰ At common law, it was held that unconsciousness (including lack of consciousness through ¹²⁵ [1982] QB 320 at 347–348.

¹²⁶ (1978) 67 Cr App R 364 at 368. See p 726. The court made no comment on the propriety or otherwise of the conviction.

¹²⁷ Note that in the case of mentally disordered complainants, ss 34–37 provide offences based on 'inducement, threat or deception' where the degree of threat is not limited—it could include a threat to break friends with the complainant.

¹²⁸ Temkin and Ashworth [2004] Crim LR 328.

¹²⁹ eg David T [2005] EWCA Crim 2668.

¹³⁰ cf the view expressed in Stevenson et al, Blackstone's Guide to the Sexual Offences Act 2003, para 2.4.1.3.

sleep) was sufficient to vitiate consent.¹³¹ There are numerous cases of sexual activity when the complainant was asleep resulting in a conviction.¹³² Indeed, this seems to be more commonplace than many might imagine.¹³³ Arguably, the presumption in s 75(2)(d) provides less protection than had been afforded at common law where consent was conclusively rebutted. It is arguable therefore that this circumstance of 'unconsciousness' ought to give rise to a conclusive presumption of non-consent by B.¹³⁴ However, if B is unconscious and A is aware of that fact, there may be circumstances in which A will be readily capable of rebutting a presumption of non-consent. For example, A, who performs a relevant sexual act (note that the presumption applies to offences of touching and not just penetrative acts) on his sleeping partner as a gesture of intimacy to wake her, ought not to be conclusively presumed guilty.

There is no stipulation as to the cause of the lack of consciousness; it could arise from self-induced intoxication. At common law, if a complainant, through alcohol or drugs, was not capable of exercising a judgement on consent, she was not consenting.¹³⁵ Such circumstances now only give rise to a presumption of a lack of consent. It is clear that the Sexual Offences Review envisaged that consent would be lacking in such a case.¹³⁶

Inability to communicate owing to physical disability

At common law, and under the 1956 Act, there was no requirement that the absence of consent has to be demonstrated or communicated to A.¹³⁷ As a matter of logic it is unclear why the physical inability to communicate should be seen as presumptive of a lack of consent. The statutory formula seems to presuppose that B has the capacity to make the choice of free agreement, but merely lacks the physical ability to communicate to this defendant. The Act makes specific provision for those with mental disorders who are unable to communicate (ss 30–44).¹³⁸

It is notable that the presumption only applies if B's physical disability inhibits his communication with this defendant. This may be significant if B has a particular speech or sign pattern that can be understood by some individuals.

Causing to be taken by the complainant, without consent, a substance capable of causing or enabling the complainant to be stupefied or overpowered at the time of the relevant act

This provision was introduced late in the Bill's progress as a response to the growing concern over 'drug assisted rape'.¹³⁹ The Act seeks to combat this problem by the presumption in this section and the introduction of the new offence in s 61.¹⁴⁰ The presumption of non-consent applies to both sexes and to sexual acts other than intercourse.

Although targeted at drugs which induce states of incapacity such as Rohypnol and GHB (gamma hydroxyl butyrate acid), there is no statutory limitation on the type of substance which will trigger the presumption. Alcohol is certainly capable of satisfying the ¹³¹ See Larter and Castleton [1995] Crim LR 75; Howard [1966] 1 WLR 13.

¹³² See Johnston [2003] All ER (D) 266 (Jun).

¹³³ See eg Garvey [2004] EWCA Crim 2672; Blacklock [2006] EWCA Crim 1740; Ekatette [2008] EWCA Crim 3137 where X filmed A having sex with unconscious B.

¹³⁴ See eg Temkin and Ashworth [2004] Crim LR 328.

¹³⁵ Malone [1998] 2 Cr App R 454. See Bree [2007] EWCA Crim 804 and the discussion earlier. See also Zhang [2007] EWCA Crim 2018.

¹³⁶ See Setting The Boundaries, 18, paras 2.10.7 et seq.

¹³⁷ Malone [1998] 2 Cr App R 447, [1998] Crim LR 834.

¹³⁸ See Cooper [2009] UKHL 42. In particular note Lord Rodger at [30] distinguishing physical inability to communicate and other bases.

¹³⁹ For comprehensive analysis, see E Finch and V Munro, 'Intoxicated Consent and the Boundaries of Drug Assisted Rape' [2003] Crim LR 773 and 'The Sexual Offences Act 2003: Intoxicated Consent and Drug Assisted Rape Revisited' [2004] Crim LR 789.

¹⁴⁰ See p 817.

definition,¹⁴¹ so A who surreptitiously laces B's soft drink with spirits will be caught. Similarly, there is no limitation on the manner of the administration. Unless it is established that A knew or believed that the substance was capable of rendering B stupefied or overpowered, the presumption will not apply. This will depend on the type of drug involved. The section does not apply to the 'seductive blandishments to have "just one more drink"'.¹⁴²

The presumption will also apply where A 'caused [the substance] to be taken by the complainant'; this includes A deceiving B into self-administration of the substance as where the substance is mixed with an innocuous one (laced drinks). If B's consumption is purely voluntary and fully informed the presumption does not apply.¹⁴³

The section makes clear that it is irrelevant who administers or causes B to take the substance, provided that one is administered and that B is therefore presumed not to consent. The presumption would apply where X administers in the company of A who performs a sexual act on B.

In those cases in which the presumption applies, A can argue that although he administered the drug being aware of its effects, B nevertheless consented to the sexual acts that finally ensued. If, for example, B indicated at the beginning of the date that she would not have sex with A, and A surreptitiously laces B's drink with potent alcohol, it may be that B later willingly engages in sexual activity with him (not being unconscious nor stupefied); her inhibitions having been lowered.

Section 75(2)(f) will increase the pressure on A to testify and strengthen the hand of the police in interview since they can inquire why A thought that B was consenting given the circumstance of his administering the substance. It will also render prosecution far easier in some circumstances.

Section 76: conclusive presumptions

If it is proved that A performed the relevant act¹⁴⁴ and any one of the circumstances specified in s 76(2) existed, it is to be conclusively presumed that the complainant did not consent to the relevant act, and that A did not believe that the complainant consented. There is an important labelling issue here: if A engages in these forms of conduct (deceiving the complainant) and commits the relevant act, he is conclusively proved to be a sexual offender; this is not merely a matter of evidence.¹⁴⁵ It is questionable whether, since these are conclusive presumptions, they are intended by Parliament to represent the worst forms of non-consent. It seems doubtful that they outrank the sexual offence in the course of a violent attack, but some would argue that the element of deception renders the position more serious because of the potential guilt felt by the complainant in being tricked.¹⁴⁶

The circumstances giving rise to a conclusive presumption are:

- (1) the defendant intentionally deceived the complainant as to the nature or purpose of the relevant act;
- (2) the defendant intentionally induced the complainant to consent to the relevant act by impersonating a person known personally to the complainant.

¹⁴¹ See HC Standing Committee B, 14 Oct 2002, col 54 (Beverley Hughes).

¹⁴² Per Igor Judge P in Bree, at [24].

¹⁴³ See eg Abbess [2004] EWCA Crim 1813 where no trace of GHB was found.

¹⁴⁴ Section 77.

¹⁴⁵ See Tadros (2006) 26 OJLS 515.

¹⁴⁶ Similar arguments led the Sexual Offences Review to conclude that stranger rape was not worse per se than acquaintance rape where the complainant may feel an element of self-blame in misjudging her attacker. Temkin and Ashworth [2004] Crim LR 328, 337, cf the debate on theft regarding the relative seriousness of being deceived into acting as opposed to actions being performed against the will. See also C Gallavin, 'Fraud Vitiating Consent to Sexual Activity: Further Confusion in the Making' (2008) 23 NZLR 87.

It is sufficient that any one of the deceptions is proved. In both instances, the section goes further than the common law. The provisions are open to challenge on the basis that it is unclear why these are conclusive of anything beyond A's absence of a belief in consent.¹⁴⁷ These are also arguably objectionably wide as conclusive presumptions especially since they apply in relation to offences other than one of penetration, for example, touching.

There are many well-established difficulties in drawing a line between the kinds of fraud which ought to be treated as a matter of conclusive presumption that B is not consenting. Should they be based on frauds which would render a contract invalid, should they relate only to the nature or purpose or identity, etc? Suggestions have been made to move towards a more coherent approach to the issue in offences against the person and in sexual offences.¹⁴⁸

Nature or purpose

At common law, a fraud as to the nature of the act vitiated consent.¹⁴⁹ Thus, there was no consent where B was unaware that she was submitting to sexual intercourse because, for example, she had been persuaded by A that he was performing a surgical operation as in Flattery.¹⁵⁰ She was deceived as to the very nature of the act, believing it was surgery rather than sexual intercourse. Similarly, in Williams,¹⁵¹ A persuaded his voice pupil that he was opening an air passage to improve her singing voice when he was having sex with her.¹⁵² In that case, B was unaware of sexual matters and was held not to have consented. When analysing what 'nature' means in this context it is important to note that in each of these cases, B was deceived as to the physical mechanics of what A was about to do to her. She had no idea of what sexual intercourse involved. Neither was a case in which B understood the mechanics of sex, that is, penile penetration of the vagina, but did not understand its significance because she believed it was also a cure for fits/for a singing exercise. If that had been the case one might argue that B was deceived as to the purpose of the act (understanding it was sex but deceived also into thinking the act will also cure fits/improve vocal range).

Under the 2003 Act, where B has been defrauded as to the nature or purpose of the acts A performs, s 76 creates a conclusive presumption that B is not consenting.¹⁵³

It is important to note that s 76 applies only in cases of intentional deceptions by A. Where A has not intentionally deceived B, s 76 has no application—as where B has unilaterally formed a false understanding as to the nature, purpose or identity.¹⁵⁴ In such cases, B's mistake, even if A is aware of it but has not intentionally caused it, will be relevant to the ¹⁴⁷ cf Stevenson et al, Blackstone's Guide to the Sexual Offences Act 2003 who regard this as unarguable, para 242.

¹⁴⁸ See eg R Williams, 'Deception Mistake and the Vitiating of the Victim's Consent' (2008) 124 LQR 132.

¹⁴⁹ See Flattery (1877) 2 QBD 410. For discussion, see R Williams, 'R v Flattery' in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017). See also Williams [1923] 1 KB 340.

¹⁵⁰ (1877) 2 QBD 410, CCCR.

¹⁵¹ [1923] 1 KB 340, CCA. G Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law (2nd edn, 1983) 561–562 thinks Williams 'clearly wrong' because it was not proved that B did not know the facts of life and may merely have been persuaded that sexual intercourse improves breathing. If that were all, it was not rape; but Hewart LCJ said that the girl never consented to sexual intercourse but only a necessary operation.

¹⁵² Did she understand the mechanics of the act but misunderstand whether the act would improve her voice or simply misunderstand what he was about to do to her, having no idea about what sexual intercourse entailed?

¹⁵³ Read literally there is no need to establish that there was no consent. It is sufficient that A has deceived B about the nature/purpose of the act. This is another example of the poor drafting in the 2003 Act.

¹⁵⁴ This seems to be underplayed in the radical proposals offered by J Herring, 'Mistaken Consent' [2005] Crim LR 511. Cf M Bohlander, 'Mistaken Consent to Sex, Political Correctness and Correct Policy' (2008) 71 J Crim L 412. Bohlander suggests that Herring's approach demeans rape. It has been argued that criminalizing sex by deception has difficult implications. See J Rubinfeld, 'The Riddle of Rape-by-Deception and the Myth of Sexual Autonomy' (2013) 122 Yale LJ 1372. For Herring's response, see J Herring, 'Rape and the Definition of Consent' (2014) 26 NLSI Rev 62.

consideration under s 74 of whether B is consenting.¹⁵⁵ It will be likely that B is not consenting within s 74 if the mistake is as to any of these matters listed in s 76.

Nature Three further problems have arisen under s 76. First, there is the question of what the 'nature' of sexual intercourse means. Can the 'nature of the act' be read widely so as to render A guilty of rape under s 76 for deceiving B as to whether he will use a condom in penetrative sex? There is an argument that unprotected intercourse is different in nature from protected intercourse so that s 76 is engaged and A is conclusively presumed guilty of rape in such a case. Such a wide reading would not have been likely under the old law, but some argued that it should be under the new. In Assange v Sweden,¹⁵⁶ the Divisional Court acknowledged this argument, citing the 12th edition of this work. Sir John Thomas P ultimately held, however, that the materiality of wearing a condom to the presence of consent is one that ought to be considered under s 74. His lordship stated that s 76 ought to be given a narrow interpretation, given that it contains conclusive presumptions.

Restricting the applicability of s 76 to near vanishing point has been a trend of the case law examining this issue.¹⁵⁷ This trend is also evident from McNally, in which it was held that A deceived B as to her gender. Again, the court concluded that s 76 was inapplicable¹⁵⁸—the deception was not as to the nature of the act—but consent was vitiated under s 74. Leveson LJ stated that while in a physical sense the act of sexual penetration is the same irrespective of whether it is done by someone who is male or female, the sexual nature of the act will differ.¹⁵⁹ The outcome in these cases is attributable to the judiciary's aversion to conclusive presumptions that mandate guilt. This is understandable given the seriousness of the offences under consideration. It is submitted that the appropriate course, therefore, is to err on the side of caution and rely upon s 74, rather than attempt to invoke s 76 in circumstances where it might not be applicable.

Quality Secondly, there is a question as to how s 76 deals with frauds as to 'quality' rather than the nature of the act. Under the old law, it was unclear whether a deception as to 'quality' as opposed to the 'nature' of the act would be sufficient to vitiate consent. In Tabassum,¹⁶⁰ A, who was not medically qualified, persuaded women to allow him to measure their breasts by representing (perhaps truthfully) that he was doing so for the purpose of a breast cancer database he was preparing for doctors. His convictions for indecent assault were upheld, although the women were fully aware of the nature of the acts to be done because (a) they would not have consented to these acts if they had not believed that he had medical qualifications and (b) the defendant knew that this was so. Following Tabassum, it seemed that although the complainant was aware of the nature of the act, her consent may be negated if she was mistaken as to its quality. This appeared to be a new distinction for which there ¹⁵⁵ The Court of Appeal in McNally [2013] EWCA Crim 1051 held that only active deception will be sufficient to vitiate consent for the purpose of s 74, so A's potential liability will depend upon whether A's awareness of the mistake is sufficient to constitute active deception, as opposed to mere non-disclosure. Given the facts of McNally, it is likely that this would suffice. Whether there is a clear delineation between these two is debatable.

¹⁵⁶ [2011] EWHC 2849 (Admin).

¹⁵⁷ The same approach was adopted in R (on the application of F) v DPP [2013] EWHC 945 (Admin).

¹⁵⁸ Rogers questions whether the court did place reliance upon s 74 as opposed to s 76. J Rogers, 'Further Developments Under the Sexual Offences Act' [2013] 7 Arch Rev 7. With respect, the court's reliance upon s 74 seems beyond doubt.

¹⁵⁹ It has been argued that gender history should not be deemed capable of vitiating consent on the basis that it casts doubt upon the authenticity of the gender identities of transgender people. See A Sharpe, 'Criminalising Sexual Intimacy: Transgender Defendants and the Legal Construction of Non-Consent' [2014] Crim LR 207; A Sharpe, 'Expanding Liability for Sexual Fraud Through the Concept of "Active Deception": A Flawed Approach' (2016) 80 J Crim L 28. Once it was held that deception is capable of coming within s 74, there is nothing in the language of that section to constrain what forms of deception are capable of vitiating consent.

¹⁶⁰ [2000] 2 Cr App R 328, [2000] Crim LR 686, CA.

was no prior authority.¹⁶¹ The concept of a deception as to 'quality' has not been explicitly included in the Act, but the inclusion of 'purpose' in s 76(2)(a) confirms that the legislation is designed to extend the protection of the law. In any event, evidence of A's deception as to the quality of the act should be available to the jury in determining whether consent was present under s 74.

Purpose Thirdly, there is the question of how widely the concept of 'purpose' should be construed under the Act. Deceptions as to the 'purpose' of the act are most likely to arise in relation to sexual touching and non-penile penetration, although it is possible that a deception as to the purpose of the act of intercourse will arise.¹⁶² The presumptions apply in respect of male and female complainants. They would operate, for example, in cases such as Green,¹⁶³ where a doctor had conducted bogus medical examinations of young men, including wiring them to monitors while they masturbated, allegedly so that he could assess their potential to become impotent.¹⁶⁴ The men understood the nature of the acts they were performing but were deceived as to the purpose for doing so. The issue is not one of A's motive, nor what the complainants thought, but whether the act (masturbation) was being performed for a different purpose than that which A alleged. The purpose of the act of masturbation was different in Green since it was not for a medical reason, it was for sexual gratification. Green is a relatively easy case.

A slightly more difficult example is Piper,¹⁶⁵ where A's touching of B when measuring her for a bikini was a sexual assault given that he had invited B on the basis that he was running a modelling agency. A pleaded guilty. He had sexually touched the women wearing their bikinis. The purpose which A alleged was that this was for the purpose of assessing her modelling statistics, etc. The true purpose was for his sexual gratification.

The question then arises whether s 76 permits a wider approach so as conclusively to presume guilt in cases such as Linekar.¹⁶⁶ In that case, A procured a prostitute to have intercourse with him by promising to pay her £25. He never intended to pay. It was held under the 1956 Act that this was not rape. The deception did not go to the 'nature' of the act, since the prostitute knew the nature of the conduct of intercourse. Under the 2003 Act, it might be argued that the deception as to payment alters the 'purpose' of the act for the prostitute. On this interpretation, A would as a result of a conclusive presumption, be classified as a rapist.

The Court of Appeal in *Jheeta*¹⁶⁷ has taken a clear line against overextending the scope of s 76. In this bizarre case, A's deception to B was that she must have intercourse with him

¹⁶¹ Setting the Boundaries gave the example of a false representation of a medical examination, para 2.10.9 at 19.

¹⁶² eg where A claims it is to procreate but really it is for his gratification.

¹⁶³ [2002] EWCA Crim 1501.

¹⁶⁴ This passage was cited with approval in Jheeta [2007] 2 Cr App R 34.

¹⁶⁵ [2007] EWCA Crim 2151.

¹⁶⁶ [1995] 2 Cr App R 49, [1995] Crim LR 320. See A Reed, 'Analysis of Fraud Vitiating Consent in Rape Cases' (1995) 59 J CrimL 310.

¹⁶⁷ [2007] EWCA Crim 1699. The pressure to treat such conduct as rape is increased because the Act fails to include any provision analogous to s 3 of the 1956 Act, criminalizing procuring sexual intercourse by false pretences (short of those which would vitiate consent, namely deception as to the nature of the act and the identity of A). John Spencer (2007) 66 CLJ 490 has suggested that the framers of the 2003 Act assumed that instances of behaviour that would have constituted an offence under s 3 of the 1956 Act would fall within s 4 of the 2003 Act, ie causing another to engage in sexual activity without consent. A similar view was expressed in Dica in which Judge LJ stated that s 4 re-enacts the s 3 offence, 'in slightly different terms', at [36]. It is submitted, however, that it is far from obvious that this is what was intended. Eg the separate deception offence that the Sexual Offences Review recommended was confined to cases where A obtained consent to sexual penetration by deception, whereas the offence in s 4 applies to causing any sexual activity without consent. In addition, it makes no reference to deception. For further discussion, see K Laird, 'Rapist or Rogue? Deception, Consent and the Sexual Offences Act 2003' [2014] Crim LR 492.

to avoid being fined by the police and to avoid his committing suicide. That did not engage s 76. B knew what the act of intercourse entailed and agreed. It will no doubt be suggested by some that the Court of Appeal is taking too narrow a view of 'purpose', restricting it to almost the same meaning as 'nature'. In Jheeta, the complainant was not deceived as to the nature of the mechanics of intercourse (ie vaginal penetration with a penis). Nor, it is submitted, was she deceived as to the purpose. She understood it to be for sexual gratification which is what it was for. It is submitted that this is the correct approach to limiting the draconian conclusive presumption provision in s 76. The question of A's deceptions can be left to the jury in their consideration of consent under s 74.

A more difficult case is Devonald.¹⁶⁸ B was a 16-year-old boy who had been in a relationship with A's daughter. The relationship had broken down and, believing B to have treated his daughter badly, A sought to teach B a lesson by deliberately embarrassing him. A set up a fake email account pretending to be a young woman. A then corresponded with B and persuaded B to masturbate in front of a webcam. A was convicted, having changed his plea to guilty following a ruling by the judge, of an offence of causing a person to engage in sexual activity without consent. The trial judge ruled that s 76(2)(a) applied. The Court of Appeal dismissed an application for leave to appeal, holding that it was open to the jury to conclude that B had been deceived as to the purpose of the act. Was B deceived as to A's purpose? It was 'difficult to see how the jury could have concluded otherwise than that B had been deceived into believing that he was indulging in sexual acts with, and for the sexual gratification of, a young woman with whom he was having an online relationship'. B's act was undoubtedly sexual, A's purpose in causing B to engage in it was not to secure sexual gratification. A's purpose was to cause B to engage in a sexual act. It is submitted that the decision is out of step with that in Jheeta.¹⁶⁹

There are dangers in taking a wider reading of 'purpose'. If 'purpose' is read widely, many bigamists and adulterers would become rapists on the basis of a conclusive presumption. The Court of Appeal took cognizance of this danger in Bingham.¹⁷⁰ The facts of this case were similar to those in Jheeta and just as bizarre. A met B through a social networking site using a false name and purporting to be someone by the name of G. B sent A topless photographs of herself at A's request. A then threatened to publish the topless photographs online if B did not engage in further sexual acts over a webcam. B capitulated. A then contacted B purporting to be someone else, C. B performed further sexual acts over a webcam, in response to more threats by A to publish the photographs. A's scheme was uncovered and he was charged with seven counts of causing a person to engage in sexual activity without consent, contrary to s 4(1) of the 2003 Act. The prosecution sought to rely upon s 76 on the basis that A had deceived B as to the purpose of the act, drawing an analogy with Devonald. Counsel for A, relying upon Jheeta, argued that s 76 was inapplicable. The judge ruled in favour of the prosecution. Delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, Hallett LJ noted how, in the 13th edition of this work, it was argued that there was an inconsistency between Jheeta and Devonald. Her ladyship pointed out that the 2003 Act does not provide a definition of 'purpose' and that the courts have therefore been left to define it. It was noted that this is a far from straightforward task, given that it may be difficult to ascertain what the purpose of a sexual act was and that a sexual act may have had more than one purpose. Further, her ladyship pointed out that s 76 does not specify whose purpose matters and that sexual partners may have different purposes when engaging in sex. For these reasons, it was held that there exists a danger that purpose will be defined too widely and that a wide definition would bring within the remit of s 76 situations never contemplated by Parliament.

¹⁶⁸ [2008] EWCA Crim 527; see also the comment by J Rogers (2008) 72 J Crim L 268.

¹⁶⁹ Was there a deception as to the identity of a person known to B if that person (Cassie on the internet) did not really exist? See B Fitzpatrick (2008) 72 J Crim L 11 discussing this in the context of Jheeta.

¹⁷⁰ [2013] EWCA Crim 823.

Given that s 76 embodies a conclusive presumption that effectively removes from the defendant his only line of defence to a serious criminal charge, it was held that the normal rules of statutory construction dictated that it ought to be construed strictly. Hallett LJ held that, to the extent that there does exist a conflict between Jheeta and Devonald, the former ought to be followed. In Bingham, B had never been asked what her purpose was or what her understanding of A's purpose of the sexual acts was. B could have been in no doubt from what A coerced her into doing that the motive was at least in part sexual gratification. For this reason it was observed that, on one view, there was no deceit as to purpose. Nevertheless, the Court of Appeal accepted the submission of counsel for A that if s 76 is relied upon the judge ought to direct the jury's attention specifically to the evidence that is relevant to deception as to the purpose of the relevant act.¹⁷¹ Given the accumulation of these factors, A's conviction was quashed and a retrial was ordered.

This decision, it is submitted, is a welcome one. As has already been observed, conclusive presumptions such as those contained in s 76 are draconian. Narrowing the applicability of s 76 will ensure that cases in which A is deprived of a defence due to a conclusive presumption will be rare. This is welcome considering the gravity of the offences to which s 76 applies. Further, there is no injustice done to complainants, given that the issue of whether there was consent can still be evaluated with reference to the general definition of consent in s 74. As Hallett LJ pointed out, the prosecution in Bingham needed to look no further than s 74. Given A's persistent threats to post the topless pictures of B online, it could be argued that she lacked the freedom to choose whether to engage in sexual activity over the webcam.

While s 76(2)(a) has not been rendered wholly obsolete, it remains uncertain when it would be appropriate for the prosecution to rely upon it. Some fundamental ambiguities persist, for example whether there must be deception as to the dominant purpose or whether deception as to one purpose suffices. If B thinks the purpose is solely sexual gratification, whereas A's purpose is sexual gratification and humiliation, would this be sufficient to fall within s 76(2)(a)? This issue remains unresolved despite Bingham, as Hallett LJ did not provide a definition of purpose beyond stating that the term ought to be construed narrowly. It would be wise, therefore, to err on the side of caution and rely upon s 74. Section 74 is available in all cases, given that it has been confirmed that deceptions perpetrated to induce consent to sex are capable of vitiating consent under the general definition of consent. Of course, the important difference is that under s 74 A can argue that he had a reasonable belief that B was consenting, despite the fact that he deceived her. It will be for the prosecution to prove that A lacked a reasonable belief in consent, although a jury might be inclined to conclude that because A believed he had to deceive B in order to obtain her consent to sex, a fortiori, he lacked a reasonable belief in consent.

Perhaps the principal circumstances in which s 76(2)(a) will be engaged will be where A tells B that the purpose of the relevant act is medical, when in fact it is solely for A's sexual gratification. There are other circumstances in which s 76(2)(a) may be successfully relied upon, however. Once such case is M.¹⁷² A told B that he was making a pornographic film and that any sexual activity would be simulated. This was not the case, however, and sexual activity in fact took place. The prosecution successfully argued that s 76(2)(a) applied on the basis that A had deceived B as to the sexual purpose of the activity that was due to take place. A therefore pleaded guilty. The Court of Appeal rejected A's application to vacate his guilty plea. Irwin J, as he then was, stated: 'The ostensible purpose of the activity, on the facts as presented by the Crown and accepted by the defence, was not sexual pleasure but simulated sexual pleasure for commercial reasons.' This form of deception was sufficient for the conclusive presumption to apply.

¹⁷¹ The difficult question left by the sections on consent and s 77 on what is a relevant act is 'has A deceived B as to the nature or purpose of A intentionally causing B to engage in sexual activity?'; another illustration of the unduly complex drafting.

¹⁷² [2015] EWCA Crim 162.

Some commentators have argued for an extremely broad reading of s 76. Writing before the case law limiting the applicability of s 76, Herring went so far as to suggest that where B has made a mistake about a matter relating to the sexual conduct with A, including a mistake about A's state of mind, which, had she known the truth, she would not have agreed to, there is no consent and if A knows or *ought to have known*¹⁷³ that B was mistaken and would not have consented had she known the truth, he is guilty. This is frightening in its ramifications: where B discovers that she made a mistake about A's marital status, wealth, sexual prowess or love for her, A becomes a rapist. The results are unrealistic in practical application.¹⁷⁴ The breadth of the proposal is striking since it includes a unilateral mistake by B as to a state of mind held by A. Of course, such a radical approach could not be brought within s 76 since it is based on B's mistakes when the 2003 Act is founded on A's deceptions.¹⁷⁵

In practice, s 76 might have little scope for application with penile penetration. It is difficult to conceive of many cases in twenty-first-century England where an adult is deceived as to the nature of penile penetration, or indeed its primary purpose.¹⁷⁶ With other sexual conduct, there is a much stronger argument for relying on s 76—A may tell B he is digitally penetrating her for a medical purpose. She is not defrauded as to the 'nature' of the action (ie a finger entering her vagina), but is as to purpose. She thinks it is for a medical purpose and it is actually for a sexual one. Arguably, this should trigger a conclusive presumption of lack of consent.

Difficulties may arise in all cases of deceptions where A acts with more than one purpose. As has already been mentioned, it is possible for A to have multiple purposes, only some of which are legitimate and about which the accused has been honest with B. What for example, of A, a doctor performing a necessary intimate medical examination of B, with the additional aim of allowing his friend, X, to watch for his sexual ¹⁷⁴ Herring himself now appears to take a contrary view—that sex is unlike the activities to which contractual rules can apply in criminal law (n 154). Cf Peter Alldridge's proposal that consent should be vitiated if without mistake, consent would not have been given and the person to whom it was given knew: 'Sex Lies and the Criminal Law' (1993) 44 NILQ 250. It has been argued that the standard of consent that applies in contractual cases may be inappropriate in the context of the criminal law: J Stannard, 'The Emotional Dynamics of Consent' (2015) 79 J Crim L 422. See also Sharpe's criticisms of Herring in 'Criminalising Sexual Intimacy: Transgender Defendants and the Legal Construction of Non-Consent' [2014] Crim LR 207. Sharpe has three objections to Herring's approach in relation to transgender people: (a) it is potentially discriminatory; (b) the right to sexual autonomy does not necessarily trump the right to privacy; and (c) there are compelling public policy concerns. In relation to the final point, Herring has argued that individuals should not fall outside the law's protection simply because others do not agree with the reasons behind their sexual decisions. See J Herring, 'Rape and the Definition of Consent' (2014) 26 NLSI Rev 62.

¹⁷³ J Herring, 'Mistaken Sex' [2005] Crim LR 511. As Hyman Gross makes clear in his powerful response ('Rape, Moralism and Human Rights' [2007] Crim LR 220) why should A be liable on that basis for a mistake he has not induced?

¹⁷⁵ With mistakes unilaterally formed by B, it is doubtful whether in such circumstances there is any legal obligation on A to disabuse B of his misconception, although if A admits to being aware of B's confusion, this may assist the prosecution in proving his mens rea—that he did not reasonably believe in B's consent to that sexual act. Cf Miles [2008] 10 Arch News 5, arguing that if B makes a mistake of a type governed by s 76 there is no consent and that if B makes a mistake other than one of the type within s 76 there is consent even if A induced the mistake. This seems to reduce the operation of s 74 too much. See Rook and Ward, Sexual Offences: Law and Practice, para 1.207.

¹⁷⁶ Unless a much broader view of purpose is adopted so that, eg, sex for procreation is treated as purposively different from that for recreation.

gratification?¹⁷⁷ It is submitted that on these facts there is a deception as to the 'purpose' and, even after B, A would be guilty.

Section 76(2)(b): identity fraud?

By s 142(3) of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, it was rape for a man to induce a woman to have intercourse with him by impersonating her husband. At common law, this was extended to include impersonation of long-term heterosexual partnerships.¹⁷⁸ Section 76(2)(b) extends the law beyond any particular category or duration of relationship; it also extends beyond the offence of rape to other acts of penetration and sexual activity. This is a welcome extension.

The conclusive presumption in s 76(2)(b) is more limited than that in para (a) since it is not sufficient for A to have lied about his identity, or even to have lied successfully and deceived B, it must be by that impersonation that B is induced to consent. The prosecution must prove this causal link.

The section poses other difficulties in interpretation, particularly regarding the limitation expressed in the formula 'known personally to' the accused. This is clearly intended to prevent the presumption arising when A claims to be a celebrity with whom B has no personal acquaintance, but for whom B may be expected to hold an attraction. Are all people B has ever met 'known personally to' him? Is it only those with whom B has had some greater degree of intimacy? Can a person be known personally to B by email correspondence? Consider the couple who arrange to meet after internet dating. X gets cold feet and decides he cannot face meeting B. A, his friend, steps in. Is there a conclusive presumption that B was not consenting to any sexual acts which follow?

Disappointingly, despite Law Commission recommendations to the contrary,¹⁷⁹ the Act does not deal expressly with the problem of deception as to the defendant's attributes (eg A claiming to have a medical qualification, be a police officer, etc) or other personal authority to perform the act.¹⁸⁰ Thus, the position in cases such as *Richardson*¹⁸¹ remains unchanged. In that case the defendant had continued to practise as a dentist although suspended. Patients claimed that they would not have allowed her to treat them if they had known of her suspension. She pleaded guilty to assault after the trial judge ruled that her deception had vitiated consent. The defence submission that the patients had consented to treatment despite their ignorance as to the circumstances was rejected. The Court of Appeal quashed her conviction, refusing to accept the prosecutor's argument that the concept of the identity of a person extended to cover the qualifications or attributes of the practitioner on the basis that the patients only consented to treatment by a qualified and not a suspended one. The court felt that this would be straining and distorting the definition of identity.

17.2.2 Sexual: s 78

Most offences in the Act involve proof of 'sexual' activity of one kind or another. The concept of 'sexual' is therefore of great significance, and the Act seeks to define it in a fashion similar to that propounded in the House of Lords in the pre-Act case of Court:¹⁸²

¹⁷⁷ cf Bolduc and Bird (1967) 63 DLR (2d) 82.

¹⁷⁸ Elbekkay [1995] Crim LR 163.

¹⁷⁹ The Law Commission Report Consent in Sex Offences submitted to the Home Office, Sex Offences Review (2000) para 5.25. The Commission concluded 'that it should be open to a jury to decide that, for the purposes of a particular act, the "identity" of the actor included the possession of a professional qualification or other authority to do the act in question, and that if the defendant had no such authority then he or she did it without consent'.

¹⁸⁰ See Richardson [1999] Crim LR 62.

¹⁸¹ [1998] 2 Cr App R 200.

¹⁸² [1989] AC 28. See on this G Williams, 'The Meaning of Indecency' (1990) 12 LS 20; GR Sullivan, 'The Need for A Crime of Sexual Assault' [1989] Crim LR 331.

[P]enetration, touching or any other activity is sexual if a reasonable person would consider that—

- (a) whatever its circumstances or any person's purpose in relation to it, it is because of its nature sexual, or
- (b) because of its nature it may be sexual and because of its circumstances or the purpose of any person in relation to it (or both) it is sexual.

The first limb requires consideration only of the nature of the act divorced from its circumstances. Where the nature of the activity is unambiguously sexual¹⁸³ (eg penile penetration, oral sex, etc) the activity is sexual irrespective of the defendant's purpose. Even this limb may be difficult to apply.¹⁸⁴

The second limb deals with cases where the nature of an activity is ambiguous. Such actions are only 'sexual' if the circumstances or the defendant's purpose render them such. The leading case is that of *H*¹⁸⁵ in the Court of Appeal. B was walking across some fields, when A said to her 'Do you fancy a shag?' She ignored that remark and continued walking. A then grabbed her tracksuit bottoms by the fabric, attempted to pull her towards him and, without succeeding, attempted to place his hand over her mouth. She broke free and escaped. A was convicted of sexual assault, contrary to s 3. It had been submitted that nothing had occurred which a reasonable person might regard as being 'sexual' within the meaning of s 78. According to the Court of Appeal in H, the approach should be as follows:

- 1. If the conduct is unambiguously sexual in the eyes of reasonable people, s 78(a) applies and the conduct is sexual irrespective of what A claims.
- 2. If the conduct is not unambiguously sexual in the eyes of reasonable people, the jury must ask themselves
 - (i) whether they as 12 reasonable people considered that the conduct in the particular circumstances before them because of its nature might be sexual and^[186]
 - (ii) whether they, as reasonable people considered that in view of the circumstances or the purpose of the person in relation to the conduct or both it was in fact sexual.

The court's approach to s 78 has the effect of extending the potential scope of the offences dependent on proof of 'sexual' conduct well beyond the former offences in which the requirement was of indecency. In more general terms, the fact that jurors remain sole arbiters of what is 'sexual' is not conducive to the development of a consistent jurisprudence on a fundamental statutory term. Can a jury really be expected to keep the two questions under s 78(b) separate? Taking a shoe fetishist touching B's foot as an example, is there not a danger that the jury will, in answering (i), conclude that the conduct is capable of being sexual by referring, illegitimately, to A's secret motive, particularly when viewed against the backdrop of B having complained?

Few problems arise in relation to s 78(a) in practice where A's conduct is inherently sexual (eg oral sex). The difficulty with s 78(a) is that it might be regarded as overly strict. For ¹⁸³ The unambiguous nature of the indecency is relevant to whether a proved assault is indecent. It is not relevant to the question whether there is an assault in the first place. Tabassum [2000] 2 Cr App R 328, n 160, is surely wrong in this respect.

¹⁸⁴ What of A who pulls B's head towards his naked penis. It looks unambiguously sexual, but what if A claims he is confirming to B, his partner, that he has not recently had sex. We are grateful to Sally O'Neill QC for the example.

¹⁸⁵ [2005] EWCA Crim 732. See also A Gillespie, 'Indecent Images, Grooming and the Law' [2006] Crim LR 412.

¹⁸⁶ In relation to this first question, evidence as to the circumstances before or after the conduct was irrelevant.

example, on facts such as those in Court,¹⁸⁷ A, an assistant in a shop, pulled a girl aged 12 who was in the shop across his knee and spanked her on her clothed bottom. When asked why he did it, he said ‘buttock fetish’. The House held (Lord Goff dissenting) that because the act was ambiguous, it was necessary to prove an indecent intention. Under the 2003 Act, on facts such as those in Court, if A had pulled down B’s shorts, the case may well fall immediately into s 78(a), with the nature of the act rendering it unambiguously sexual. What, however, if in pulling down B’s shorts, A had a merely (admittedly bizarre) disciplinary motive? Arguably there should be an opportunity for A’s explanation, but that only arises if the case is decided under s 78(b).¹⁸⁸ Conversely, there may be some acts of an unambiguously sexual nature where A’s purpose is to perpetrate an act of violence not sex, but A’s purpose is irrelevant.

The more significant aspect of the section is s 78(b). Examples of the operation of s 78(b) might include where A induces B to remove clothing, or an intimate examination involving digital penetration of the vagina or anus. If performed by a doctor for a medical purpose, and in appropriate medical circumstances, these would be non-sexual; A’s purpose may make them sexual. As interpreted in H, s 78(b) catches a wide range of conduct as sexual. It is submitted that practically any seemingly innocuous conduct may be capable of being regarded by a reasonable person as being sexual. Fetishism knows no bounds.¹⁸⁹ The s 78(b) test could give rise to difficulties in practice. Take the case of *Pratt*¹⁹⁰ as an example: A made two young boys strip and point a torch at each other’s genitals while he watched. A claimed that he was looking for cannabis. Under s 78, if the jury believed A’s explanation for his actions it will be treated as a non-sexual purpose, and provided they do not conclude that the act is sexual per se (category (a)) A will be acquitted.

Section 78 also creates difficulties with odd sexual fetishes. In George,¹⁹¹ A attempted to remove a girl’s shoe from her foot because this gave him sexual gratification. Streathfield J, rejecting an argument that A’s indecent motive made this an indecent assault, held that there were no circumstances of indecency. This decision was not followed under the 2003 Act in H. Stroking a woman’s shod foot is not unambiguously sexual (leaving aside the extreme cases): s 78(a) does not apply. However, assuming a reasonable person would consider that stroking a woman’s foot ‘may be’ sexual, A’s purpose would render it such: s 78(b). The less overtly sexual the fetish, the less likely the reasonable jury might regard it as being sexual and the less likely it will be caught by the section.

The significant shift from the 1956 Act offences based on ‘indecent’ conduct to the 2003 Act focus on ‘sexual’ conduct fails to address other difficulties. For example, in the case of *CW*¹⁹² it was questioned whether A’s touching of a 13-year-old’s ‘belly bar piercing’ was ‘indecent’ under the 1956 Act. It is no clearer whether this is sexual under the 2003 Act than whether it was indecent under the old law. More commonly occurring questions might be whether a kiss is inherently sexual and if not then its categorization would depend on the circumstances and purpose of the kisser (thus, not where a hairy old aunt issues a slobbering greeting to a reluctant nephew). Distinguishing on the basis of whether the kissing involved

¹⁸⁷ [1989] AC 28.

¹⁸⁸ A similar argument is developed by I Bantekas, ‘Can Touching Always be Sexual When There is No Sexual Intent?’ (2008) 72 J Crim L 251.

¹⁸⁹ For criticism of this interpretation see Gallavin, n 146.

¹⁹⁰ [1984] Crim LR 51. Note that he is not guilty of sexual assault since he does not touch the boys; the charge would be under s 4. See Thompson (Andrew) [2014] EWCA Crim 836 where A’s drying off naked boys after swimming was ambiguous.

¹⁹¹ [1956] Crim LR 52. Such cases are not uncommon: see Price [2004] 1 Cr App R 12, [2003] EWCA Crim 2405, where A stroked B’s leg and boot and admitted it was because he had a shoe fetish.

¹⁹² R v CW [2004] EWCA Crim 340, CA.

is 'deep'¹⁹³ or otherwise is not an accurate basis of distinction. In Davies,¹⁹⁴ a 22-year-old woman kissing an 11-year-old girl on the mouth with an open mouth was sufficient for the s 7 offence—sexual touching of a child under 13.

Does an act which is seemingly sexual lose that quality if it is performed exclusively for reasons of violence in A's mind? In AJ,¹⁹⁵ A was convicted of sexual touching of B (his 19-year-old stepdaughter) whom he had tied up (wrists and feet) and pinned down while he told her she needed to 'do more' around the house, that being part of an ongoing argument between them. B claimed that she thought that he was going to rape her. Her tracksuit bottoms 'fell down' in the course of the struggle with him. He did not touch her genitals.¹⁹⁶ In Deal,¹⁹⁷ A was convicted of two counts of sexual touching, one being for the act of standing behind a female police officer and rubbing her arms with his hands, whilst making comments to her which she was unable to hear. It might even be argued in an extreme case that an act of penetration is not sexual: in Hill,¹⁹⁸ A had, in the course of a violent argument with his partner, 'forcefully inserted his finger in her vagina' as the Court of Appeal described it: 'without her consent and . . . as some form of aggressive humiliation rather than a sexual act'.¹⁹⁹ A nevertheless pleaded guilty to a 'sexual' penetration.

17.2.3 Touching: s 79(8)

Under the 1956 Act, the offences other than those of intercourse centred predominantly on acts involving 'assault' as explained in the Court of Appeal in Court:²⁰⁰

The offence . . . included both a battery, or touching, and psychic assault without touching. If there was touching, it was not necessary to prove that the victim was aware of the assault or of the circumstances of indecency. If there was no touching, then to constitute an indecent assault the victim must be shown to have been aware of the assault and of the circumstances of indecency.

The 2003 Act creates offences based on 'touching' which includes touching:

- (1) with any part of the body;²⁰¹
- (2) with anything else;
- (3) through anything.²⁰²

and in particular includes touching amounting to penetration.

As elsewhere in the Act, there is no further definition of any of the terms, and this may lead to a regrettable inconsistency in the application of the law.

The leading case is H (above) where the question was whether A's touching of B's tracksuit bottoms alone constituted a 'touching' of another person within the meaning of s 79(8). Although s 79(8) offers an extended and non-exhaustive interpretation of that term, including 'touching through anything', some commentators had suggested that the Act required physical contact with B's body.²⁰³ The Court of Appeal held that where a person was wearing ¹⁹³ See Williams (1990) 10 LS 29 (presumably his definition turns on whether tongues are involved).

¹⁹⁴ [2005] EWCA Crim 3690. ¹⁹⁵ [2006] EWCA Crim 2956.

¹⁹⁶ Evidence was admitted that D had spent the previous hour viewing online pornography.

¹⁹⁷ [2006] EWCA Crim 684. ¹⁹⁸ [2006] EWCA Crim 2575. ¹⁹⁹ ibid, [4].

²⁰⁰ [1987] 1 All ER 120 at 122.

²⁰¹ Note that under s 79(3) surgically reconstructed body parts are included as parts of the 'body' with which touching can occur.

²⁰² This covers D who engages in frottaging (rubbing his genitals against a fellow passenger on public transport): see eg Tanylidiz [1998] Crim LR 228.

²⁰³ Card suggested that 'lightly touching an outer garment so thick that no physical contact is made with B's body would not suffice'. R Card, Sexual Offences: The New Law (2003), para 2.32.

clothing, touching of that clothing constituted touching for the purposes of the Act. It was unnecessary for there to be some form of pressure brought against the body of the individual who was alleged to have been assaulted for touching to occur for the purposes of s 3.²⁰⁴ This is consistent with the decisions in relation to battery generally. For example, in Thomas,²⁰⁵ A had touched the bottom of B's skirt and the court said obiter that 'There could be no dispute that if you touch a person's clothes while he is wearing them that is equivalent to touching him.' There are numerous instances of convictions for sexual assault through clothing under the Act. For example, in Swinscoe,²⁰⁶ A approached an eight-year-old and asked to see her knickers before touching her through her underwear (s 7).

The shift from 'assault' under the 1956 Act to 'touching' under the 2003 Act is significant. Although assault did not require any element of hostility,²⁰⁷ 'touching' might appear to be broader than even a non-hostile assault. It is submitted that as with the old law, there is no room for any 'de minimis' exception.²⁰⁸ In other circumstances it seems that the law has been narrowed. Thus, sexual words do not constitute a touching but might well have been assaults. Similarly, where A walks towards B with his penis exposed,²⁰⁹ this could have been an assault: the old law did not require any apprehension of indecent touching.²¹⁰ Note that it is enough that A makes contact and the act is sexual; B need not be aware that there is a touching or, presumably, that the act is sexual.²¹¹ So, in Farrar,²¹² A committed the offence by blindfolding a child, B, and masturbating on him. There is still the question whether it is sufficient that A ejaculates on B without touching B in the process.²¹³ Surely this is sufficient.

It is unclear whether there can be a touching by omission. What, for example, of cases such as Speck,²¹⁴ where A's failure to remove B's hand, which she had voluntarily placed on his penis, caused it to become erect? Does this constitute a touching? There is a touching between A and B, but it is more difficult to describe A as touching B. Is it a sexual touching if the sexual element derives from B and not A? It is submitted that it is capable of being sexual.²¹⁵

17.3 Non-consensual offences

17.3.1 Rape

Rape was an offence at common law. Although placed on a statutory basis in s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, there was no statutory definition of the offence, and this position ²⁰⁴ Interestingly, A's counsel's argument had been that A had pulled the shorts away from B not touching her at all. Our thanks to Ian West for this point.

²⁰⁵ (1985) 81 Cr App R 331 at 334. ²⁰⁶ [2006] EWCA Crim 2412.

²⁰⁷ Although cf the House of Lords in Brown [1994] 1 AC 212 and p 678. More recently, in B [2013] EWCA Crim 3, Hughes LJ stated that: 'The element of assault frequently and usefully described as hostility is a means of conveying to the jury that some non-hostile contact is an ordinary incident of life to which we all impliedly consent', at [44].

²⁰⁸ Ananthanarayanan (1994) 98 Cr App R 1 at 5, per Laws J. See Mills [2003] EWCA Crim 3723, two-second touching of barmaid's breasts by customer.

²⁰⁹ Rolfe (1952) 36 Cr App R4.

²¹⁰ Sargeant (1996) 161 JP 127, [1997] Crim LR 50, where the assault was a threat with a knife and the circumstance of indecency was A's demand that B masturbate into a condom in a public place.

²¹¹ Bounekhla [2006] EWCA Crim 1217 (A secretly ejaculating over B while dancing closely with her in a nightclub).

²¹² [2006] EWCA Crim 3261.

²¹³ The Scottish legislation specifically provides that such conduct is an offence: s 3(2)(d) of the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 2009.

²¹⁴ [1977] Crim LR 689. See also B [2004] EWCA Crim 319 where A had allowed B to touch his genitals and where B had placed A's hand on her genitals.

²¹⁵ cf the s 4 case of Aveya [2009] EWCA Crim 2640 where A forced B's hand onto A's penis and moved it.

continued until the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976²¹⁶ introduced a partial definition of the mens rea requirement and the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 extended the offence to include anal rape. There had been sustained calls for reform of the offence, particularly the mental element and the opportunity for an acquittal on the basis of a mere honest belief in the complainant's consent since the controversial decision in Morgan.²¹⁷ The need for this issue to be addressed and for clearer definition of this the most serious sexual offence were significant catalysts for reform, as was the low conviction rate for rape: by 1999, only one in 13 alleged rapes led to conviction.²¹⁸

The 2003 reform prompted several radical suggestions for rape to be subdivided into different categories of offence. One suggestion was to distinguish between cases on the basis of whether there was a previous relationship between the accused and complainant (acquaintance rape) and the more stereotypical but far less common stranger rape. This was rejected. There is no doubt that rape by an acquaintance, including as it does an abuse of trust, can be as traumatic as stranger rape. The Court of Appeal has accepted that, in sentencing terms, there is in general no difference between a stranger rape and an acquaintance rape.²¹⁹ The 2003 Act also rejected the possibility of structuring different offences of rape based on the extent of mental fault.²²⁰

Despite the rejection of these more radical proposals, the new rape offence represents a significant change from the 1956 Act. It provides:

- (1) A person (A) commits an offence if—
 - (a) he intentionally penetrates the vagina, anus or mouth of another person (B) with his penis,
 - (b) B does not consent to the penetration, and
 - (c) A does not reasonably believe B consents.
- (2) Whether a belief is reasonable is to be determined having regard to all the circumstances, including any steps A has taken to ascertain whether B consents.

Rape is triable only on indictment (except for certain cases where there is provision for trial in the Youth Court).²²¹ The maximum penalty is life imprisonment.²²²

17.3.1.1 Actus reus

Penile

The Sexual Offences Review team wanted the offence of rape to reflect the general public's understanding of the term, and concluded that although it would perpetuate gender

²¹⁶ The Sexual Offences Act 1956, s 1(1), simply provided 'It is a felony for a man to rape a woman', whilst s 1(2) provided 'A man who induces a married woman to have sexual intercourse with him by impersonating her husband commits rape.'

²¹⁷ [1976] AC 182; see p 332. For discussion, see L Farmer, 'DPP v Morgan' in P Handler, H Mares and I Williams (eds), Landmark Cases in Criminal Law (2017).

²¹⁸ Home Office, Rape and Sexual Assault of Women, Findings from the BCS (2002).

²¹⁹ See also the Sentencing Advisory Panel's advice to the Court of Appeal, Foreword by the Chairman, 1 May 2002, paras 32–35. On the court's controversial qualification of this, see P Rumney, 'Progress at a Price: The Construction of Non-Stranger Rape in the Millberry Sentencing Guidelines' (2003) 66 MLR 870.

²²⁰ See Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, Ch 3, H Power, 'Towards a Redefinition of the Mens Rea of Rape' (2003) 23 OJLS 379, a view also considered by the Heilbron Committee, Report of the Advisory Group on the Law of Rape (1975) paras 79–80. For a proposal to subdivide the offence into categories based on the reason for the absence of consent (eg intoxicated, under threat of violence, etc) see Tadros (2006) 26 OJLS 515.

²²¹ Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, s 24, as amended by the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 165(1) and Sch 9, para 64.

²²² SOA 2003, s 1(4).

inequality, penile penetration should nevertheless remain an essential element of the offence. The Review considered that penile penetration was a distinctive act, carrying as it can risks of pregnancy and disease transmission, and that it should, therefore, be treated separately from other penetrative assaults. This strong commitment to the principle of fair labelling is especially important in sexual offences where the stigma of conviction is most acute. If jurors are to apply the offences appropriately it is also important that the offences reflect society's general understanding of the wrongdoing involved. By restricting rape to penile penetration,²²³ s 1 reflects this principle.

Because the offence requires penetration by a penis, rape remains one of the few offences capable of being committed only by a male (as a principal offender).²²⁴ However, in a welcome extension of the offence, a post-operative transsexual can commit rape with her reconstructed penis²²⁵ (hence, presumably, the drafting in terms of 'a person' rather than 'a man').²²⁶ A female can aid and abet the offence²²⁷ as where she encourages or assists a male, A, to penetrate B without B's consent. It may be possible for the female aider and abettor to be convicted even though A is acquitted of rape on the basis of his lack of mens rea.²²⁸ In such circumstances, a female can also be charged with an offence under s 4—causing a person to engage in sexual activity (see later).

The conclusive presumption that boys under 14 were incapable of sexual intercourse was abolished by s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1993 for acts done after 20 September 1993. It has been held that a boy under ten years old cannot commit an offence and so cannot be procured to commit rape,²²⁹ but this reasoning seems flawed.²³⁰

Penetration

Penetration is not defined in the Act, although s 79(2) provides that it is a continuing act, thus putting on a statutory footing the decisions of the Privy Council in *Kaitamaki*²³¹ and the Court of Appeal in Cooper and Schaub.²³² Penetration continues until withdrawal,²³³ and A can be convicted of rape where, having initially penetrated B with consent, B subsequently withdraws that consent and A, being aware of that retraction of consent, does not remove his penis.²³⁴ Presumably, A will not commit the offence until he either knows or could reasonably be expected to know that consent had been withdrawn.

The Act does not provide any clarification of the degree of penetration necessary. Presumably the common law rule applies so that the slightest degree of penetration will suffice. In relation to vaginal rape, this will include any penetration of the vulva,²³⁵ and thus, the common law rule that it is not necessary to show that the hymen was ruptured ²²³ Setting the Boundaries, Ch 2, para 2.8.4.

²²⁴ The Sexual Offences Act 1993 removed the common law presumption that boys under the age of 14 are incapable of intercourse. In a prosecution for historic offences pre-20 March 1993, a defendant cannot be guilty of charges involving acts of sexual intercourse perpetrated when he was aged under 14. See R v W [2003] 10 Arch News 2, PF [2017] EWCA Crim 983 and D Ormerod, 'A Presumption of Intercourse' [2003] 1 Arch News 2.

²²⁵ Under s 79(3).

²²⁶ Section 79(3). See Setting the Boundaries recommendation at para 2.8.4.

²²⁷ Ram (1893) 17 Cox CC 609; Lord Baltimore's case (1768) 1 Black, W 648.

²²⁸ Cogan and Leak [1975] 2 All ER 1059. ²²⁹ DPP v K and C [1997] 1 Cr App R 36 at 42.

²³⁰ See commentary in [1997] Crim LR 121, and see n 224. See also C [2005] EWCA Crim 2817.

²³¹ [1985] AC 147. ²³² [1994] Crim LR 531.

²³³ For criticism of Kaitamaki see the 10th edition of this book, where it was emphasized that the offence requires penetration without consent as an essential part of the actus reus of rape and this act of penetration must be accompanied by the mens rea.

²³⁴ See Leaver [2006] EWCA Crim 2988 and under the previous law also Tarmohammed [1997] Crim LR 458; Greaves [1999] 1 Cr App R (S) 319.

²³⁵ Section 79(3).

remains.²³⁶ In F,²³⁷ 'vagina' was held to be used in the general sense of the female genitals, not in its strict anatomical sense.²³⁸ There is no express provision making clear that rape is complete upon penetration without ejaculation,²³⁹ but this must surely still represent the law. The fact that the Act creates numerous other offences of non-penile penetration supports this view.

If the prosecution fail to establish that there was penetration by a penis, a verdict of attempted rape may be returned if A's conduct amounted to more than mere preparation to penile penetration.

Of the vagina, anus or mouth

'Vagina' is to be interpreted as including the vulva.²⁴⁰ Section 79 of the Act provides further relevant definition, including welcome confirmation that penetration of a surgically reconstructed vagina suffices.²⁴¹ At common law, rape protected only against penetration of the vagina, indeed historically it was an offence protecting virginity.²⁴² Section 142 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 introduced the offence of anal rape. The 2003 Act extends the offence of rape yet further by including non-consensual penile penetration of the mouth. The Sexual Offences Review acknowledged that non-consensual oral sex is as 'abhorrent, demeaning and traumatising' as vaginal and anal penetration by the penis.²⁴³ There is no doubt that this form of conduct deserves appropriate condemnation by the law in terms of labelling and sentence, but some argued that it would have been more appropriately dealt with as non-consensual penetration under s 2 (which also carries a life sentence). There may, of course, be greater forensic difficulties in establishing oral sex as opposed to vaginal or anal penetration, although that in itself should not militate against it being classified as rape.²⁴⁴ The Court of Appeal has confirmed that sentencing should not distinguish between the orifice(s) penetrated.²⁴⁵

Without consent

The critical element of rape remains the absence of consent. Without that, penile penetration is not merely not criminal, it is an explicit expression of intimacy. The Act's approach to consent is discussed earlier.

17.3.1.2 Mens rea

Intentional penetration

The requirement that the defendant intentionally penetrate the relevant orifice should not give rise to difficulty in practice. One circumstance in which A might realistically claim that penile penetration was 'accidental' might include those where A intended to penetrate B's vagina with her consent, but accidentally penetrated her anus, for which act he knew he did ²³⁶ Hughes (1841) 9 C & P 752; Lines (1844) 1 C & K 393; Allen (Henry) (1839) 9 C & P 31; M'Rue (1838) 8 C & P 641.

²³⁷ [2002] EWCA Crim 2936. ²³⁸ cf Holland (1993) 117 ALR 193, High Ct of Aust.

²³⁹ cf s 44 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956. ²⁴⁰ Section 79(9).

²⁴¹ Section 79(3). This puts on a statutory footing the ruling in Matthews, Oct 1996, unreported. See also M Hicks and G Branson, 'Transsexual Rape—A Loophole Closed?' [1997] Crim LR 526.

²⁴² Temkin, Rape and the Legal Process, 57.

²⁴³ Setting the Boundaries, para 2.8.5. See the government response to the Home Affairs Committee Fifth Report.

²⁴⁴ In its Definitive Guideline, the Sentencing Council does not draw distinctions based upon the orifice penetrated, p 10.

²⁴⁵ Ismail [2005] EWCA Crim 397.

not have consent, or to which he could not reasonably believe that he had consent (whether from previous knowledge or from B's expression of non-consent once A penetrated her anally).²⁴⁶ It has been held that to charge A with rape where the allegation is that he penetrated either B's vagina or her anus is not to allege two offences.²⁴⁷ Nevertheless, if A has a reasonable belief in consent to vaginal sex and unintentionally penetrates B's anus, it is submitted that he has not raped B.

Despite this element of the offence being expressed in terms of intention, it would seem, following Heard,²⁴⁸ that a mistake of this nature induced by voluntary intoxication cannot be relied upon.²⁴⁹ The offence is one of basic intent.

Mens rea as to consent

One of the most dramatic changes under the 2003 Act was to redefine the mens rea for rape. Under s 1(1) of the Act, the prosecution have to prove that A intentionally penetrated the vagina, anus or mouth of B, and that A did not have a reasonable belief that B was consenting.

In 1975 the House of Lords in Morgan held that rape was not proved if the man may have honestly believed that the woman was consenting, even if that belief was unreasonable. Lord Hailsham held that the mens rea required an 'intention of having intercourse, willy-nilly, not caring whether the victim consents or not'.²⁵⁰ Another way of putting this was to ask, 'Was A's attitude one of "I could not care less whether B is consenting or not, I am going to have intercourse with her regardless"?'²⁵¹ Thus, the mens rea under the old law required proof that A intentionally had sexual intercourse with B: (a) knowing that B did not consent or (b) being aware that there was a possibility that B did not consent.

Following widespread public concern with this approach, the Heilbron Committee²⁵² reviewed the position and, while endorsing Morgan, recommended some statutory clarification. The Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 provided that the jury was to consider the presence or absence of reasonable grounds for such a belief as relevant matters, in considering whether A believed he had consent. This was largely a public relations provision explaining the jury's role in evaluating a defendant's mistaken beliefs of facts; it did not enact any rule peculiar to rape.

There was little empirical evidence that Morgan defences were successfully run, so jurors were presumably not readily believing defendants' spurious claims. Even if generally unsuccessful, the plea was easy to run and difficult to disprove, and sent an undesirable message to society—that it is acceptable to take unreasonable risks as to your partner's consent to sexual conduct.²⁵³ Unsurprisingly, many submissions to the Sexual Offences Review were highly critical of the approach. Setting the Boundaries regarded this 'defence' as in direct conflict with the ordinary perceptions of contemporary society. A more objective approach to the issue of mens rea as to consent was desirable, or even necessary, but further difficulty lay in determining the appropriate degree of objectivity.

One key issue of the reform agenda became whether the mens rea (for rape in particular) ought to be rendered wholly objective (would a reasonable person have realized that B was not consenting?). Although the general trend of English criminal law had been increasingly ²⁴⁶ See eg Pigg [1983] 1 WLR 56 and discussion by S White, 'Three Points on Pigg' [1989] Crim LR 539.

²⁴⁷ K [2008] EWCA Crim 1923. ²⁴⁸ [2007] EWCA Crim 125.

²⁴⁹ cf Woods (1981) 74 Cr App R 132. See now Grewal [2010] EWCA Crim 2448.

²⁵⁰ [1976] AC 182 at 215. See also the Heilbron Report of the Advisory Group on the Law of Rape (1975) Cmnd 6352, para 77.

²⁵¹ Taylor (1984) 80 Cr App R 327; Haughian (1985) 80 Cr App R 334.

²⁵² (1975) Cmnd 6352. See [1976] Crim LR 97.

²⁵³ See the Law Commission's Policy Paper in Setting the Boundaries (2000) vol 2.

favouring subjective approaches to mens rea—even in serious sexual offences²⁵⁴—there are powerful arguments against adopting a purely subjective approach in this context. When the conduct in question is of a sexual nature, the ease with which the defendant can ascertain the consent of his partner, coupled with the catastrophic consequences for the complainant if the defendant acts without consent, militate strongly against the purely subjective approach. The generosity the law extends to accepting a defendant's genuine but unreasonable mistakes in, for example, matters of self-defence need not be replicated in sexual cases because the conduct in question calls for a qualitatively different degree of vigilance on his part.²⁵⁵

The government took a strong stance on this aspect of the reform.²⁵⁶ In early versions of the Sexual Offences Bill, it was proposed that the defendant would bear a legal burden (on the balance of probabilities) to show that he did believe that the complainant consented. This may well have been in breach of Art 6(2) of the ECHR. The final version as enacted is less objective, and although to be welcomed for extending the mens rea, the Act is not as clear as it might be, and may still leave the opportunity for Morgan-type pleas to be run (although they will be even less likely to succeed).

The mens rea in rape and the other non-consensual offences (ss 1–4) comprises two elements:

- (1) A does not reasonably believe B consents.
- (2) Whether a belief is reasonable is to be determined having regard to all the circumstances, including any steps A has taken to ascertain whether B consents.

The provisions do not render the test wholly objective.²⁵⁷ The defendant's personal characteristics and beliefs remain important, but both the concluded belief as to consent and the manner by which A reached it are to be assessed by reference to some objective criteria.

A does 'not reasonably believe'

This encompasses cases in which: (a) A's purpose is to act without B's consent; (b) A is aware that B might not be consenting; (c) A has no belief whether B is consenting or not; (d) A holds a belief that B is consenting but that is an unreasonable belief. What is not made completely clear is whether in (d) the question is as to (i) A's purely subjective belief about consent measured against a standard of reasonableness applied by the jury or magistrate, or (ii) A's assessment that his own belief as to consent was reasonable. It is submitted that the correct interpretation is that in (i).²⁵⁸ The dilution of the purely objective test originally proposed to accommodate those with limited capacity has not been that substantial. A, with a learning disability,²⁵⁹ who believes B is consenting will have the mens rea if the reasonable juror concludes that the belief was an unreasonable one, irrespective of the fact that the basis for belief is understandable, given A's limited capacity.

²⁵⁴ See K [2001] UKHL 41; DPP v B [2000] 2 WLR 452.

²⁵⁵ This passage was cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in B [2013] EWCA Crim 3. See generally on this issue J Horder, 'Cognition, Emotion and Criminal Culpability' (1990) 106 LQR 469, 477; T Pickard, 'Culpable Mistakes' (1980) 30 U Toronto LJ 75; C Wells, 'Swatting the Subjectivist Bug' [1982] Crim LR 209. There have been suggestions for strict liability rape offences. For discussion see K Huigens, 'Is Strict Liability Rape Defensible' in Duff and Green, Defining Crime, 196 discussing a hypothetical case where B was under the self-imposed mistaken belief that A was a serial rapist, so she acquiesced in all A did. A was unaware and thought B was consenting.

²⁵⁶ See HL, 31 Mar 2003, col 1089 (Lord Falconer).

²⁵⁷ See Ch 4 for discussion of negligence.

²⁵⁸ HC, col 639 refers ambiguously to the 'focus on the defendant's belief', at para 23.

²⁵⁹ Under the old law, A's Asperger's was relevant: see Tipu Sultan [2008] EWCA Crim 6.

In B,²⁶⁰ the Court of Appeal stated unequivocally that a belief in consent induced by psychotic illness or personality disorder could not be reasonable. Hughes LJ observed that a delusional belief in consent would, by definition, be irrational and thus unreasonable.²⁶¹ In this case A was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia and had sex with B, who did not consent. It was held that the trial judge was correct to direct the jury to ignore A's condition when evaluating whether his belief in consent was reasonable. It would only be relevant if A sought to plead insanity. A caveat was, however, added to this general proposition. Hughes LJ stated that it did not follow that there will never be a case in which the personality or abilities of A might be relevant to whether his belief in consent was reasonable. His lordship gave the example of a situation in which the reasonableness of a belief in consent depends upon A's ability to read subtle social signals. In these circumstances it was held that A's impaired ability would be relevant to the reasonableness of his belief. His lordship stated that a situation such as this one could be distinguished from the facts of the instant case, because such a belief in consent might not be irrational and might not be unreasonable, despite the fact that it is a belief that would not be held by most members of society. It is submitted that while the decision is in keeping with Parliament's intention to make the mens rea for the non-consensual sexual offence more objective, difficulties might arise in future. A's mental condition must only be left out of the equation when the belief it leads him to form can be classified as being wholly irrational. If it is not wholly irrational, then it may be taken into consideration when determining whether A's belief in consent was reasonable. There is scope for the exercise of a great deal of judicial discretion in determining what types of mental condition will fall into this latter category.²⁶² The further issue, it is submitted, is that judges may be reluctant to make the initial determination that A's belief was irrational, since that would seem to lead inexorably to a conviction, unless A seeks to plead insanity.²⁶³ If this is an accurate assessment of the situation, then the scope of the dicta in B will be greatly diminished, but this remains to be seen.

Reasonable having regard to all the circumstances including the steps taken

The reasonableness test does not oblige the defendant to have taken any specific steps to ascertain consent; the government was keen to emphasize that there would be no need to have 'blank consent forms by the bedside'. However, where steps have been taken they must be taken into account by the jury in deciding whether the defendant's claimed belief in consent was reasonable.²⁶⁴ Also, importantly, the issue of the reasonableness of belief will now be worth pursuing in police interviews with the suspect. The objective test has an impact on the evidential provisions regarding cross-examination of sexual complainants.²⁶⁵

Ministerial statements²⁶⁶ suggested that the expression 'all the circumstances' in s 1(2) will allow juries, when determining the reasonableness of the belief, to take account of any relevant characteristics of the defendant. Ministers rejected the idea that the very narrow ²⁶⁰ [2013] EWCA Crim 3, [2014] Crim LR 312.

²⁶¹ Although it did not reach a conclusion on the matter, this issue was alluded to by the Court of Appeal in the earlier case of MM [2011] EWCA Crim 1291.

²⁶² In MM [2011] EWCA Crim 1291, the expert concluded that A's bipolar state caused him to misinterpret ambiguous messages that he received from B and her family, eg that he was described as being her boyfriend. Whether this evidence would be left to the jury after B is questionable.

²⁶³ It has been suggested that if A has a delusional belief that B is consenting, he should be denied any access to the statutory claim of reasonable belief and be instructed that he is raising a defence of insanity. See J Child and GR Sullivan, 'When Does the Insanity Defence Apply? Some Recent Cases' [2014] Crim LR 788.

²⁶⁴ HC, 3rd reading, 17 June 2003, col 669.

²⁶⁵ See Bahadour [2005] EWCA Crim 396 and J McEwan, 'I Thought She Consented' [2006] Crim LR 961.

²⁶⁶ HC, 2 June 2003, col 1073 (Lord Falconer of Thoroton); HC, 17 June 2003, col 674 (Baroness Scotland of Asthal).

interpretation of similar provisions in New Zealand might be followed, creating a purely objective test.²⁶⁷ It is clear, then, that the defendant's age; general sexual experience; sexual experience with this complainant;²⁶⁸ learning disability; and any other factor that could have affected his ability to understand the nature and consequences of his actions, and particularly the ability to appreciate the risk of non-consent, may be relevant depending on the circumstance of the particular case. What weight will attach to these characteristics will be a matter for judicial direction.

Several difficulties flow from the breadth of this provision. First, there is the question as to which characteristics of the defendant might be excluded from the jury's deliberation. On the basis of the long-established position that rape is a crime of basic intent, the jury should not be able to take into account the defendant's self-induced intoxication by drink or drugs.²⁶⁹ What of other characteristics, such as those which are inherently unreasonable in the context of sexual conduct? For example, what of A who claims that women who invite him for coffee are automatically agreeing to sex? Or that dressing in a short skirt is an invitation to be touched in a sexual manner?²⁷⁰ Ministers reassured Parliament that the jury would not be asked to take into account such characteristics.²⁷¹ The crucial question for the courts is in defining the limits on which less strikingly unreasonable characteristics are legally relevant. This created difficulty elsewhere in the law, particularly with provocation.²⁷² Careful judicial direction is critical. Once again, it is disappointing that such an important issue is not resolved by clearer policy and drafting in the Act.

Secondly, and related to this point, the statute does not expressly preclude the most objectionable of the Morgan-type pleas from being advanced. A could claim that he had taken reasonable steps to ascertain the consent of the complainant by asking her friends, or by seeking the confirmation of her husband (as in Morgan). Could A also claim that it was reasonable for him to ignore B's explicit 'no' since he believes that all women sometimes say 'no' and mean 'yes'?²⁷³ Such pleas are never likely to be considered to be 'reasonable' by any right-thinking jury. Nevertheless, the 2003 Act provisions allow for the plea to be run adding to the distress of the complainant. It should be noted that Setting the Boundaries recommended a significantly wider list of circumstances presumptively vitiating consent including where a person has agreement given for them by a third party.²⁷⁴ This was rejected because of concerns that a person with a learning disability, A, might be easily ²⁶⁷ HC, 17 June 2003, col 674 (Baroness Scotland of Asthal).

²⁶⁸ McAllister [1997] Crim LR 233.

²⁶⁹ Grewal [2010] EWCA Crim 2448; Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125; Fotheringham (1988) 88 Cr App R 206.

²⁷⁰ The disturbing report of Amnesty International revealed that one-third of the UK population believe that women who had flirted were wholly or partially responsible for a sexual assault on them. See the Home Office Report, Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims (2006). Cf H Reece, 'Rape Myths: Is Elite Opinion Right and Popular Opinion Wrong?' (2013) 33 OJLS 445.

²⁷¹ Lord Falconer of Thoroton stated: 'Introducing a requirement that all of the personal characteristics of the defendant should be taken into account would mean that the jury would be asked to take into account characteristics that should not absolve him from his guilt: for example, the fact that he has a quick temper or that the sight of a girl in a mini-skirt will always turn him on and make him unable to resist her. That cannot be the intention.' HL, 17 June 2003.

²⁷² Especially in relation to provocation. Guidance may be derived from the Court of Appeal's approach in self-defence cases where D has a belief formed owing to a psychiatric condition: Canns [2010] EWCA Crim 2264; Press and Thompson [2013] EWCA Crim 1849.

²⁷³ See also Husak, n 21, Ch 9. Note, however, that in P [2009] EWCA Crim 1100 the court observed that 'Any counsel accordingly advising a defendant facing a charge of rape, whose instructions are that he had a genuine belief in consent, will have to advise him as to the likelihood of a jury nonetheless concluding that in the circumstances the belief was unreasonable.'

²⁷⁴ Setting the Boundaries, 20, para 2.10.9.

deceived by X and have sex with B believing her to be consenting on the basis of X's false statement.²⁷⁵

As the Court of Appeal noted in Taran (Farid):²⁷⁶

A direction upon absence of reasonable belief clearly falls to be given when, but only when, there is material on which a jury might come to the conclusion that (a) the complainant did not in fact consent, but (b) the defendant thought that she was consenting. Such a direction does not fall to be given unless there is such material. It is, of course, the fact, as all trial judges know well, that a direction of this kind, as of many other kinds, may have to be given even when it is not the case of either the Crown or the defendant that it arises . . . Reasonable belief in consent on an indictment for rape can certainly be [an] example, but only where there is material on which a jury may think that there might have been a misunderstanding, that is to say that the complainant did not in fact consent but that the defendant may have thought that she did.²⁷⁷

Mistakes as to the identity of B

What is the liability of A who claims that he thought on reasonable grounds that X would be consenting to the sexual act which he then mistakenly performed on B? Can A claim he has a reasonable belief in consent? In Whitta,²⁷⁸ A had agreed with X that they would have sex later after the party they were both attending. Both A and X were adults but drunk. A, having removed his glasses, later entered a bedroom and digitally penetrated B, the sleeping 51-year-old mother of the party host. B was also very drunk. A desisted as soon as he realized his mistake. The trial judge ruled that mistake as to the identity in this context was irrelevant—liability was strict. The judge's approach draws support from the peculiar drafting of the sections with their reference to A and B. The Court of Appeal disagreed with this analysis of the sections. The effect of the judge's ruling was that it is not a defence to a charge if the defendant has made a mistake, however reasonable, as to the identity of the person to whom the sexual activity is directed. That is not the law. It would mean that A who kissed his wife's identical twin sister would be liable for sexual assault irrespective of the reasonableness of his mistaken belief that he was kissing his wife. It is submitted that the correct question is whether A's belief was a reasonable one.

17.3.2 Assault by penetration: s 2

A person, A, commits an offence if he intentionally penetrates the vagina or anus of another person (B), sexually, with a part of his body or anything else, where B does not consent to the penetration, and A does not reasonably believe that B consents. This offence introduced in the 2003 Act carries a maximum life sentence. It is designed to reflect the seriousness of non-consensual penetration with objects other than the penis. Acts of penetration with bottles, knives, fingers, etc are caught by s 2. Such acts would have been charged as indecent assault under the old law, and thus lacked a sufficiently accurate or stigmatizing label and sentencing power.²⁷⁹ The Court of Appeal has made clear that long sentences may be appropriate for some acts of digital penetration.²⁸⁰ The offence has proved useful where B cannot recall, could not tell or lacks the capacity to tell whether the penetration was by a penis or other object.²⁸¹

²⁷⁵ See Temkin and Ashworth [2004] Crim LR 328, 339.

²⁷⁶ [2006] EWCA Crim 1498.

²⁷⁷ At [12]. See also Saad [2009] EWCA Crim 2781.

²⁷⁸ [2006] EWCA Crim 2626.

²⁷⁹ A maximum ten years.

²⁸⁰ Corran [2005] EWCA Crim 192.

²⁸¹ See eg Minshull [2004] EWCA 2673 (B severely disabled); and Lyddaman [2006] EWCA Crim 383.

17.3.2.1 Actus reus

Penetration is discussed earlier. Unlike rape, the penetration need not be by a penis; where it is, the charge ought to be under s 1. Where there is doubt as to with what the complainant was penetrated the charge should be under s 2. The offence can be committed by a person of either sex on a person of either sex. The act of penetration is regarded as continuing until withdrawal. Since the degree of penetration need only be slight, and 'vagina' includes 'vulva',²⁸² oral sex is caught by s 2. An allegation that A penetrated B's vagina or anus is not an allegation of two offences.²⁸³ The requirement that the penetration is 'sexual' (as discussed earlier) excludes from the scope of the offence medical examinations, intimate body searches, etc. If the prosecution cannot establish the 'sexual' element, there is no actus reus, and the offence is not committed even if the complainant is not consenting to the penetration. Such acts should be charged as offences against the person.

The absence of consent is an element of the actus reus and if B has consented to the acts of penetration with any form of object, provided A's intention is only to perform acts amounting to a battery, his penetration of B will not render him liable for an offence of violence if injury is in fact caused. Where the act of penetration is intended or likely to cause actual bodily harm or worse and is performed for a sexual purpose, A may be liable for an offence against the person, even if B consents.²⁸⁴

17.3.2.2 Mens rea

The penetration must be intentional; there is no crime of reckless sexual penetration.²⁸⁵ However, following Heard,²⁸⁶ the voluntarily intoxicated defendant cannot rely on his intoxicated state to support his claim that his penetration of V with an object/part of his body was not intentional. Such circumstances are, however, unlikely to be commonplace. The mens rea regarding consent is determined in accordance with the principles discussed at p 790. Sections 75 and 76 relating to presumptions on consent apply.

It remains unclear whether there is an element of mens rea as to the 'sexual' nature of the penetration. As a matter of principle, each element of the actus reus ought to have a corresponding element of mens rea. The fact that this element of actus reus (sexual) is to be determined by the jury does not of itself preclude a corresponding requirement of mens rea.²⁸⁷ If this additional mens rea element is required, A might claim, for example, that his penetration of B's vagina with an object such as a bottle was motivated solely by a desire to cause injury, being performed with a violent and not a sexual intent. It is doubtful that such a plea would be successful, and A would, in any event, have thereby admitted an offence against the person.²⁸⁸ There are bizarre instances of penetrative conduct that would appear to be motivated by such non-sexual motives.²⁸⁹ It may be that penetrative acts would be dealt with, additionally, as offences against the person where performed as acts of torture.²⁹⁰

²⁸² Section 79.

²⁸³ P [2010] EWCA Crim 164, following K [2008] EWCA Crim 1923 in relation to rape.

²⁸⁴ See Meachen [2006] EWCA Crim 2414, discussed at p 677. Cf P Murphy, 'Flogging Live Complainants and Dead Horses: We May No Longer Need to be in Bondage to Brown' [2011] Crim LR 758.

²⁸⁵ See Phillips [2008] EWCA Crim 2830 where A claimed to have digitally penetrated B while he, A, was asleep.

²⁸⁶ [2007] EWCA Crim 125.

²⁸⁷ The definition of grievous bodily harm is left to the jury but D must still be proved to have intended it for a s 18 charge under the OAPA 1861.

²⁸⁸ See Hill [2006] EWCA Crim 2575—penetration with fingers in forceful manner. OAPA 1861, s 18.

²⁸⁹ In C [2001] 1 Cr App R (S) 533, D paid a prostitute to fellate him and surreptitiously inserted live maggots into her vagina while she did so.

²⁹⁰ In Aydin v Turkey (1997) 25 EHRR 251 it was recognized that rape by a State official could constitute torture.

17.3.3 Sexual assault: s 3

Under the law prior to the 2003 Act there were separate offences of ‘indecent assault’, protecting males and females.²⁹¹ For the want of anything more specific, these offences dealt with all non-consensual conduct: non-penile penetrations of the vagina and anus, oral sex; the merest touching in an indecent manner; and even technical assaults (where A caused B to apprehend immediate unlawful force on her body) in circumstances of indecency. The label on conviction did not differentiate between the vastly different forms of conduct and their disparate gravity.²⁹² Many of the activities dealt with previously as indecent assaults would now be rape (oral sex) or s 2 (most commonly digital penetration of the vagina).

The 2003 Act introduces a much wider offence with greater ambiguity stemming from the broad definition of the central elements of ‘sexual’ and ‘touching’.

A commits an offence if he intentionally touches another person (B), sexually, and B does not consent to the touching, and A does not reasonably believe that B consents. The maximum sentence of imprisonment is ten years on indictment; and six months summarily.

17.3.3.1 Actus reus

The elements of ‘sexual’ and ‘touching’ have been discussed previously. In combination, the terms render the offence very broad indeed. There is no element of hostility required; a kiss could be sufficient provided it is regarded as sexual, as could A stroking B’s clothing without her awareness. Although described as ‘sexual assault’ there is no need for a technical assault or battery; a touching is what is needed. As such, conduct that constitutes a psychic assault will not satisfy the actus reus.²⁹³ If the touching is in non-sexual circumstances there is no sexual offence—for example, where a police officer pats down a suspect, or a rugby player grabs the testicles of an opponent in the scrum. If the complainant is not consenting to such touching the conduct should be charged, if at all, as an offence against the person.

The sexual touching must be proved to be without consent. The presumptions in ss 75 and 76 (discussed earlier) apply. Given the breadth of the activity covered, there is a potential for problems with the conclusive presumptions. What, for example, of Dr A who tells B, accurately, that a breast examination is necessary, but who also nurses a secret sexual purpose in performing it? Is there a deception as to ‘purpose’?²⁹⁴

17.3.3.2 Mens rea

The touching must be intentional. Applying the established interpretation of Majewski, on a charge such as that under s 3 with the requirement of an ‘intentional’ touching, it was at least arguable that the crime is one of specific intent.²⁹⁵ However, following the decision in Heard, the offence should be treated as one of basic intent: it is no excuse for A to rely on his voluntary intoxication as an excuse that he did not intend to touch the complainant in a sexual manner. As noted,²⁹⁶ on its facts, Heard should never have given rise to problems. A had, while drunk, exposed his penis and rubbed it against the thigh of a police officer, B. A’s plea was that he had no recollection of the incident. That is never a basis for a plea of intoxication and that should have been the end of the matter. However, A relied on his voluntary intoxication as negating his mens rea of an intention to touch for the purposes of s 3(1)(a).

²⁹¹ Sections 14 and 15 of the Act.

²⁹² Temkin (2000) 150 NLJ 1169, 1170 described them as ‘mindless’ (meaning that they did not describe the essence of the wrongdoing, particularly in serious cases).

²⁹³ cf Rolfe (1952) Cr App R 4, n 209. ²⁹⁴ See p 778.

²⁹⁵ R Card, Sexual Offences: The New Law (2003) para 1.31; Rook and Ward, Sexual Offences: Law and Practice, para 2.82.

²⁹⁶ [2007] EWCA Crim 125. See p 319.

The trial judge ruled that the intentional touching element of the offence required proof of a basic intent, and that it followed that voluntary intoxication was not a defence. The Court of Appeal concluded that A could not rely on that voluntary intoxication to negative mens rea. The full implications are considered in Ch 9. On policy grounds, the court was clearly entitled to assume that Parliament had not intended to change the law (although it should be noted that under the pre-2003 law, the offence of indecent assault was not always a basic intent crime).

A claim that a touching was not intended to be 'sexual', but rather was an act of pure violence could in some circumstances form the basis of a plausible plea, certainly more so than in circumstances of penetration under s 2 discussed previously. It remains unclear whether the courts will entertain such a plea in any circumstances.

17.3.4 Intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity: s 4

A commits an offence if he intentionally causes another person (B) to engage in an activity, the activity is sexual, B does not consent to engaging in the activity and A does not reasonably believe that B consents.

This was an entirely new and potentially very useful offence, which has as one of its purposes criminalizing the actions of women who compel or procure men to penetrate them. Under the old law this conduct would have been prosecuted as indecent assault only. Examples of other types of conduct caught by this offence would include requiring a person to masturbate him/herself²⁹⁷ or to masturbate another person.²⁹⁸ It is an extremely broad offence and could also include A who, for example, causes B to act as a sex worker.

Aggravated versions of the offence (which attract a maximum of life imprisonment rather than the standard maximum ten years on indictment/six months summarily) are created by subs (4). These involve penetration of B's anus or vagina; penetration of B's mouth with a person's penis; penetration of a person's anus or vagina by B with his body or otherwise; or penetration of a person's mouth with B's penis. Applying Courtie,²⁹⁹ there are separate offences created and this must be reflected in the indictment.

17.3.4.1 Actus reus

The offence can be committed by words alone, and there is no explicit requirement that A is present when B engages in the activity nor that A participate in the activity. It is commonly prosecuted for indecent text messaging where A causes B to have sex with him.³⁰⁰ The offence could also involve a third party, who might also be a victim if neither the third party nor B consents.³⁰¹ However, this is not a preliminary offence: the sexual activity must take place for A to be guilty. Although A must 'cause' the action, following orthodox principles of causation³⁰² it appears to be sufficient for A to be 'a' cause of the sexual activity without being the 'sole' cause. It is doubtful that an omission to prevent sexual activity occurring is a sufficient actus reus.³⁰³

The presumptions regarding consent in ss 75 and 76 (discussed earlier) apply.

²⁹⁷ As in Sargeant [1997] Crim LR 50; see Devonald [2008] EWCA Crim 527, p 779.

²⁹⁸ See Basherdest [2009] EWCA Crim 2883 where A forced B and C to engage in sex together while he filmed them.

²⁹⁹ [1984] AC 463.

³⁰⁰ eg A [2006] EWCA Crim 2103; Hinton-Smith [2005] EWCA Crim 2575. Note the new offence introduced by s 67 of the Serious Crime Act 2015 where the sexual communication is to someone under 16.

³⁰¹ As in Basherdest [2008] EWCA Crim 2883. ³⁰² Discussed in Ch 2.

³⁰³ See Clarkson and Carroll [1971] 3 All ER 344. Card, Sexual Offences, n 295.

17.3.4.2 Mens rea

As with rape, discussed previously, the reasonableness of belief is determined by reference to ‘all the circumstances’ including ‘any steps A has taken to ascertain B’s consent’.

There is a requirement of ‘intention’, which in this context would apparently include oblique intention—foresight by A that B’s engaging in the sexual activity is a virtually certain consequence of A’s action, even though it might not be his ‘direct intention’.³⁰⁴

Despite the requirement of intention to cause B to engage in the activity, following Heard, s 4 creates a basic intent offence. A who in a voluntarily intoxicated state jokingly encourages B to strip might claim that there was no such intent, but drunken intent is still intent.

17.4 Offences against children under 13 (ss 5–8)

The offences in ss 5 to 8³⁰⁵ are very similar to those in ss 1 to 4, except that they relate only to offences against children under 13, and there is no requirement to prove the absence of consent.

- Section 5 criminalizes penile penetration of the vagina, anus or mouth of a child under 13.
- Section 6 criminalizes sexual penetration of the vagina or anus of a child under 13.
- Section 7 criminalizes sexual touching of a child under 13.
- Section 8 criminalizes causing or inciting a child under 13 to engage in sexual conduct.

Under the old law a child under 16 could not consent to indecent assault, but could consent to sexual intercourse.³⁰⁶ Determining whether a child consented to sexual intercourse involved an assessment of her understanding of the activity.³⁰⁷ Consent is no longer an issue. This shift proved to be very controversial as the legislation progressed through Parliament. The commendable underlying policy of the offences is to protect the child from the ‘predatory’ older offender, and to guard against exploitation of young people, but the breadth of the offences raises a number of problems.

First, the legislation makes no attempt to distinguish between exploitative sexual activity against a child under 13 (whether by an older individual or not) and that of fully informed consensual sexual experimentation between children under that age.

Secondly, denying the relevance of the factual consent of the under-13-year-old clashes with the law’s willingness to accept their capacity to consent to, for example, invasive medical procedures. The Home Secretary stated in a press release on the Act receiving Royal Assent that there would be no prosecution for sexual activity between children under the age of 16 where the activity is genuinely consensual. This rather begs the question why the Act is not drafted so as to include a requirement of an absence of consent.³⁰⁸

³⁰⁴ See Ch 3, p 90.

³⁰⁵ See generally F Bennion, ‘Criminalizing Children under the Sexual Offences Bill’ (2003) 167 JP 784; JR Spencer, ‘Child and Family Offences’ [2004] Crim LR 347; L Hoyano and C Keenan, Child Abuse: Law and Policy (2007) 192–215 dealing with comparative materials. For sentencing guidance, see Corran [2005] EWCA Crim 192. See also L James, ‘Children Who Commit Sex Offences’ (2007) Howard Jnl 493. The Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 extends the territorial reach of a number of offences under the Act in relation to children: s 72 of the SOA 2003 as substituted by s 72 of the 2008 Act.

³⁰⁶ It was arguable that since all acts of intercourse must include an indecent assault, the law was irremediably incoherent.

³⁰⁷ Howard [1966] 1 WLR 13.

³⁰⁸ See the Home Office, The Sexual Offences Act 2003: A Stock take of the Effectiveness of the Act since its Implementation (2006) 9.

Thirdly, this gave rise to challenges under the ECHR. In the controversial case of G,³⁰⁹ the defendant who was aged 15, pleaded guilty to rape of a child under 13 (s 5). G's basis of plea was that V consented and that he reasonably believed her to be older than 13, because she had so informed him. One ground of appeal was that the offence was incompatible with Art 8 since G claimed he should have been charged under ss 9 and 13 (sexual activity with a child under 16), if at all. The charge and conviction under s 5 (sex with child under 13) breached his right to respect for private life by labelling him publicly as a child rapist, subjecting him to a maximum penalty of life imprisonment and attracting sexual offender notification requirements.³¹⁰ Compliance with the proportionality requirement in Art 8 would, he argued, mean that no prosecution should ensue;³¹¹ or prosecution should be under ss 9 and 13, with its lower maximum penalty of five years and limited notification requirements. The House of Lords (Lords Hope and Carswell dissenting) held that s 5 was compatible with Art 8. Convicting G of rape contrary to s 5 even in circumstances where the agreed basis of plea established that his offence fell properly within the ambit of s 13 did not infringe Art 8. The issue drew some striking comments from the Law Lords.³¹² Baroness Hale doubted whether Art 8 was engaged at all but, if it was, held that there was no breach.³¹³ Similarly, Lord Mance accepted that Art 8 might be engaged, but that prosecution was justified to protect children. In the minority, Lord Hope concluded that the prosecution ought not to have pursued a s 5 conviction once G's basis of plea was accepted. His lordship did not go as far as to say that it was disproportionate to use s 5 even in cases where children had mutually agreed to have sex. Lord Carswell agreed, deprecating the 'crude generalisation' involved in using the term 'statutory rape'.³¹⁴ In G v UK,³¹⁵ the ECtHR accepted that Art 8 was engaged by G's conviction. Despite the fact the court accepted that the Member States' margin of appreciation is narrow where intimate aspects of private life are concerned, G's application was declared inadmissible on the basis that Art 8(2) was satisfied, given the powerful countervailing interests in protecting young people from premature sexual activity, exploitation and abuse.³¹⁶

There is no additional restraint on prosecution such as a requirement for the DPP's prior consent. In R,³¹⁷ the Administrative Court doubted whether criminal prosecution was always appropriate where the conduct is less serious conduct between children; that case concerned two children with learning disabilities with A touching B's breast over her clothes. In R (S) v DPP,³¹⁸ the prosecutor did abandon the s 5 charge against a boy of 15 in favour of proceeding under s 13 when it appeared that the conduct had been consensual. Challenges to such decisions to prosecute will be rare: R (Tolhurst) v CPS.³¹⁹

³⁰⁹ [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818 with a valuable commentary by Andrew Ashworth.

³¹⁰ See now the decision of the Supreme Court in R (F) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2010] UKSC 17.

³¹¹ The government had given an assurance that consensual sexual activity between minors would not inevitably be prosecuted, but relied on prosecutorial discretion to achieve the correct balance, and this was not a satisfactory protection for rights. Cf the position in Ireland: CC v Ireland [2006] IESC 33 (Irish Supreme Court) and C O'Sullivan, 'Protecting Young People from Themselves' (2009) Dublin Uni LJ 386.

³¹² Lord Hoffmann opined that 'This case is another example of the regrettable tendency to try to convert the whole system of criminal justice into questions of human rights', at [10]. Lord Hoffmann went as far as to suggest that Convention rights have nothing to do with prosecutorial policy. This was denied by Lord Hope at [34]. See the discussion by R Buxton, 'Private Life and the English Judges' (2009) 29 OJLS 413.

³¹³ At [54]. ³¹⁴ At [60]. ³¹⁵ (2011) 53 EHRR SE 25.

³¹⁶ As Ashworth points out in his commentary, what both the ECtHR and the House of Lords failed to discuss was the impact of this conviction on someone who was himself a child. Ashworth states that the real issue is whether a decision to prosecute a child for an offence under s 5 is necessary in a democratic society, given the availability of the lesser alternative in s 9. See [2012] Crim LR 47.

³¹⁷ [2007] EWHC 1842 (Admin). ³¹⁸ [2006] EWHC 2231 (Admin).

³¹⁹ [2008] EWHC 2976 (Admin).

The final general point to note is that the breadth of the new offences means that in cases of consensual sexual activity between 12-year-olds they will both commit an offence—for example, as penetrator (s 5) and penetrated (s 9). In this context, the drafting undermines the principle in *Tyrrell*³²⁰ whereby a child ‘victim’ could not be convicted as a participant in the offence. The gloss that the Supreme Court placed on the Tyrrell principle in *Gnango*³²¹ adds an extra layer of difficulty. The Supreme Court held that the ‘victim rule’ is only applicable when the offence in question is one that is intended to protect an identified class. This suggests that in the case of consensual sexual activity between 12-year-olds, neither ought to be prosecuted, given that they are both within the class that the offences are intended to protect, namely children. It remains to be seen how the Supreme Court’s reformulation of the principle in Tyrrell will impact upon these offences. As noted, challenges under Art 8 of the ECHR were mounted by consenting 15-year-olds.³²²

The degree of overlap of ss 9 to 10 and s 13 (dealing with children under 16) with ss 5 to 8 is notable. For example, a person guilty of s 5 could be guilty of s 9 or s 13 also (‘touching’ including penetration). The sections have considerable sentencing discrepancy—s 5 carries a maximum of life, s 9 (over 18s) a maximum 14 years, s 13 (under 18s) a maximum five years on indictment/six months if summary.

In relation to an adult defendant committing offences under ss 5 to 8, the CPS guidance³²³ is that ‘a prosecution will usually take place unless there are public interest factors tending against prosecution which clearly outweigh those tending in favour’. In relation to child defendants, the CPS emphasizes that the ‘overriding public concern is to protect children. It was not Parliament’s intention to punish children unnecessarily or for the criminal law to intervene where it is wholly inappropriate.’³²⁴ Prosecutors are to have regard to various factors including the age and understanding of the offender, the complainant’s willingness to enter into the sexual activity, the parties’ emotional and physical development and the nature of the acts. This may include whether the offender has been subjected to any exploitation, coercion, threat, deception, grooming or manipulation by another which has led him or her to commit the offence. The relative ages of the parties are also important.³²⁵

It is recognized that ‘it is not in the public interest to prosecute children who are of the same or similar age and understanding that engage in sexual activity, where the activity is truly consensual for both parties and there are no aggravating features, such as coercion or corruption’. The abolition of the doli incapax defence renders the position more strict for young children.³²⁶

³²⁰ [1894] 1 QB 710. For a catalogue of the circumstances in which the Act ignores the Tyrrell principle, see M Bohlander, ‘The Sexual Offences Act 2003 and the Tyrrell Principle Criminalising Victims’ [2005] Crim LR 703.

³²¹ [2011] UKSC 59.

³²² See G [2008] UKHL 37; G v UK (2011) 53 EHRR SE25, n 315. Cf the view in E v DPP [2005] EWHC 147 (Admin), in which it was held that Art 8 was not infringed by s 6 of the 2003 Act.

³²³ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/rape-and-sexual-offences-chapter-17-sexual-offences-act-2003-principal-offences-and.

³²⁴ The Guidance emphasizes the need to gather as much information as possible from sources, such as the police, and any professionals assisting those agencies about the defendant’s home circumstances and the circumstances surrounding the alleged offence, as well as any information known about the complainant.

³²⁵ In G [2008] UKHL 37, Lord Hope concludes that ‘The context suggests however that a child under 18 ought not to be prosecuted under section 5 for performing a sexual act with a child under 13 of the kind to which that section applies unless the circumstances are such as to indicate that it plainly was an offence of such gravity that prosecution under section 13 would not be appropriate. It suggests that a child under 18 (and more especially a child as young as 15) should not be prosecuted under section 5 (rape of a child under 13) if the complainant says that he or she consented to sexual intercourse.’ At [23]. (See also Baroness Hale at [48].)

³²⁶ See JTB [2009] UKHL 20, and see Ch 10. The defence remains important in some historic cases.

17.4.1 Rape of a child under 13: s 5

There had been much discussion of the merits of a ‘statutory rape’ offence, commonly found in the United States, and s 5 introduces one: a person commits an offence if he intentionally penetrates the vagina, anus or mouth of another person with his penis, and the other person is under 13.

As noted earlier, the Sexual Offences Review was anxious for the offence of rape to continue to reflect everyday conceptions of that term, hence the requirement of penile penetration. In this instance, the unique stigma of ‘rape’ has been applied to conduct which seems to be lacking the most important aspect of the everyday conception of the offence—an absence of consent. The maximum sentence is one of life imprisonment.³²⁷ Given that it is rape, it will be more difficult for the CPS to declare that it is not in the public interest to prosecute, particularly in the face of pressure from the complainant’s parents.³²⁸

17.4.1.1 Actus reus

Each element of the actus reus—penetration, with a penis, of the vagina, anus or mouth—has already been discussed in the section on rape. The additional element of the actus reus is that B is aged under 13. Given the significance of B’s age, it is crucial that this element is proved strictly via the usual mechanisms. The defendant may be of any age, although criminal liability as an offender arises at the age of ten.³²⁹ It has already been noted that this is a very broad offence: B, aged 12, who willingly performs oral sex on her 12-year-old boyfriend thereby renders him a rapist (and she arguably commits offences under ss 7 and 9). The absence of any requirement of consent means that it is less likely that a complainant will face the ordeal of giving evidence.

17.4.1.2 Mens rea

Penetration must be intentional, as discussed earlier. There is no opportunity for a plea of consent, and thus no plea of mistaken belief as to consent, however reasonable.³³⁰ Similarly, there is no scope for a plea of mistake, however reasonable, as to the age of the complainant.

In G,³³¹ G, who was aged 15, pleaded guilty to rape of a child under 13, where B consented and he reasonably believed her to be older than 13, because she had so informed him. The House of Lords confirmed that s 5 creates an offence of strict liability; belief in consent or the age of the victim is irrelevant.³³² The presumption of mens rea is negated by necessary implication, arising from the contrast of the express references to reasonable belief that a child was over 16, in other sections—s 9 of the 2003 Act—and the absence of any such ³²⁷ On the relevance of mistake as to age on sentence, see A-G’s Reference (No 74 of 2007) [2007] EWCA Crim 2550. In the sentencing case of C [2011] EWCA Crim 2153, [2012] Crim LR 723 the Court of Appeal held that the imposition of immediate custodial sentences upon the six co-defendants was inappropriate in circumstances in which the sex with the 12-year-old girls had been consensual and the boys had thought that the girls were 16.

³²⁸ See HC Standing Committee B, 11 Sept 2003, col 107 (MrMalins). In G [2008] UKHL 37, Lord Hope noted that ‘The creation of an offence of this kind, carrying the stigma and maximum sentence of life as it does, applicable as it is to child defendants places a “heavy responsibility” on the prosecuting authorities, where both parties are of a similar young age, to distinguish the consensual experimentation from the exploitative’, at [14].

³²⁹ See Ch 10 on defences. ³³⁰ See the discussion in Ch 5.

³³¹ [2008] UKHL 37, [2008] Crim LR 818.

³³² The Supreme Court in Brown [2013] UKSC 43 held that the same analysis applied to the equivalent offences in Northern Ireland.

reference in relation to children under 13. This was Parliament's 'deliberate choice'.³³³ The consequence is, as Lord Hoffmann put it:

The policy of the legislation is to protect children. If you have sex with someone who is on any view a child or young person, you take your chance on exactly how old they are.³³⁴

The House of Lords also confirmed that s 5 as a strict liability offence is compatible with Art 6.³³⁵ G sought to argue before the ECtHR that his conviction infringed Art 6. The complaint was, however, declared inadmissible. It was held that Parliament's decision not to make available a defence based on reasonable belief that the complainant was aged 13 or over did not give rise to an issue under Art 6(1) or (2).³³⁶

17.4.1.3 Defences for secondary liability

Concern was expressed in Parliament as to the potential for such broad offences to criminalize the actions of teachers and health-care workers who advise young people about sex education and safe sexual practices in general. For example, there was concern that the doctor who provided contraceptives to the 12-year-old girl to protect her in her consensual sexual acts with her partner would be aiding and abetting her 'rape'. To meet this difficulty, s 73 of the Act provides that there is no liability for aiding and abetting or counselling if the purpose of the actor is to protect the child from sexually transmitted diseases or pregnancy or to protect physical safety or promote emotional well-being, unless the actor's purpose is to gain sexual gratification or to cause or encourage the relevant sexual act.

17.4.2 Assault of a child under 13 by penetration: s 6

It is an offence for a person intentionally to penetrate the vagina or anus of a person under 13 with a part of the body or anything else where that penetration is sexual.

This is identical to that in s 2, except that there is no requirement that the complainant is not consenting. Again, there is no scope for a plea of mistaken belief in consent or mistaken reasonable beliefs as to the age of the victim. This is a very broad offence which criminalizes consensual sexual (eg digital) penetration between 12-year-olds. As with the offence under s 5, there is no liability for aiding and abetting or counselling if the purpose of the assistance is to protect the child unless the actor's purpose is to gain sexual gratification or to cause or encourage the relevant sexual act.³³⁷ Section 6 is triable on indictment only and carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

17.4.3 Sexual assault of a child: s 7

It is an offence intentionally to touch a person under 13, where that touching is sexual. This offence is identical to that in s 3 (discussed earlier), except that there is no requirement that the complainant is not consenting. There is no scope for a plea of mistaken belief in consent or mistaken reasonable belief as to the age of the victim. This is an excessively broad offence which criminalizes consensual kissing between 12-year-olds.³³⁸ It also applies, of course, where the adult offender preys on children.³³⁹ The defence applicable to abetting or counselling applies as under ss 5 and 6.³⁴⁰

³³³ Lord Hope at [21]. ³³⁴ At [3]. (See also Baroness Hale at [45]–[48].)

³³⁵ Art 6 is concerned with procedural protection not the substantive law. (See Lord Hope at [27].) See Ch 5.

³³⁶ (2011) 53 EHRR SE25, [2012] Crim LR 47. ³³⁷ Section 73.

³³⁸ Section 7 is triable either way. The maximum sentence is 14 years on indictment; six months summarily.

³³⁹ See for an unusual example PE [2007] EWCA Crim 231 where A, a scout leader, tied up young boys—clothed—and video-recorded the incidents. A derived sexual gratification from the acts.

³⁴⁰ Section 73.

17.4.4 Causing or inciting a child under 13 to engage in sexual activity: s 8

It is an offence intentionally to cause a person under 13 to engage in an activity, which is sexual. It is also an offence intentionally³⁴¹ to incite a person under 13 to engage in a sexual activity. These are broader than the offence under s 4 discussed earlier. Separate offences carrying a maximum of life imprisonment (rather than the standard 14 years on indictment/six months summarily) are created under s 4(4) if the activity involves causing or inciting:

- (a) penetration of B's anus or vagina;
- (b) penetration of B's mouth with a person's penis;
- (c) penetration of a person's anus or vagina by B; or
- (d) penetration of a person's mouth with B's penis.

17.4.4.1 Actus reus

The offence can be committed by causing B to engage in sexual activity, in which case it is identical to that under s 4 except that there is no requirement that B is not consenting. A, who persuades his 12-year-old girlfriend to touch herself sexually, commits the actus reus of this offence.

In addition, there is an offence of 'incitement' of B. It is submitted that the word incitement should carry its technical legal meaning.³⁴² The inclusion of a specific offence of incitement enables a prosecution where the child incited would not herself commit an offence (and would not be liable under a common law charge of incitement). This offence is much broader and does not require that any sexual activity occurs. It covers the case where A, the friend of B, aged 12, encourages B to have oral sex with B's boyfriend C. The Court of Appeal has taken a very wide interpretation of s 8 and of the concept of incitement in this context. In Walker,³⁴³ the Court of Appeal rightly held that s 8 created two offences:³⁴⁴ (a) intentionally causing and (b) intentionally inciting a child under 13 to engage in sexual activity. The allegation was centred on the concept of incitement and the court held that it was not a necessary ingredient for incitement of sexual activity that A had intended that sexual activity would take place. So, when A said over the phone to a child he was watching in a nearby public telephone booth, 'show us your fanny' there was no need for proof that he ever intended her to do anything sexual. But how can there ever be an incitement without intention from A that the act by B will occur? The Court of Appeal would no doubt defend the interpretation on the basis that the wrong targeted by the offence is making that kind of sexual suggestion to a child irrespective of whether there is any intent or likelihood of it influencing the child. The new offence of sending sexual messages to children, in s 67 of the Serious Crime Act 2015, will meet that mischief more directly.

The Court of Appeal took an equally broad interpretation of the s 8 offence in Jones. The defendant wrote graffiti on train and station toilets seeking girls aged eight to 13 for sex in return for payment. He gave a mobile telephone number for them to contact. Following a complaint by a journalist, the police began an undercover operation using an officer pretending to be aged 12. The defendant was charged with attempting to incite her to sexual activity.

At trial the defendant alleged that the charge disclosed no offence known to law, because the defendant did not intend to incite any actual person under the age of 13 (the officer ³⁴¹ See also Rae [2013] EWCA Crim 2056.

³⁴² See Ch 11.

³⁴³ [2006] EWCA Crim 1907.

³⁴⁴ See Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299.

being older) and therefore could not have had the requisite intent. He was convicted. The Court of Appeal held that s 8 of the 2003 Act did not require incitement of an identified or identifiable child.³⁴⁵ The criminality at which the offence was directed was the incitement. It mattered not that this was directed at a particular child, a very large group of children or whether they could be identified or not. There was no significance in the use of the term ‘another’ in s 8 as opposed to ‘any other’; they meant the same. Therefore, the offence could have been charged without identifying a particular person, and it could not be said that the police created the offence. A who leaves messages on a children’s website³⁴⁶ or scribbled on the walls of a children’s play area inciting sex commits the s 8 offence. Whilst this may seem like a desirable result in terms of protection of under-13s, it presents problems. If it is unnecessary for A to be targeting the message at a particular individual, whenever A sends a message capable of being read by under-13s, the charges can now be brought under s 8. In other words, unless A targets a child over 13, he will always be at risk of prosecution for the more serious s 8 offence. What of A who leaves a message on a blog: ‘sex is great: I recommend trying it with your first girlfriend/boyfriend’? This might have been intended only for consumption by older children, but, assuming it amounts to a sufficient encouragement to constitute incitement, it is now caught by s 8. Following G, liability is strict. The charge under s 10 discussed later allows A an excuse if he has a reasonable belief that the person is 16 or over (unless V is under 13). In cases of untargeted messages such as the blog example above, A will be denied the opportunity to rely on that excuse because he cannot know the age of those who might read his message.

The offence is used where A incites B to have sex with him.³⁴⁷ Unlike ss 5 to 7, there is no defence for ‘abetting or counselling’ to protect the child.³⁴⁸ Thus, teacher A, approached by B, 12, who asks whether she should engage in full sex with her boyfriend X as he would like, commits the offence if A incites her by suggesting that since she and X are only 12 they should stick to other intimate activities short of sex (even perhaps just kissing). The offence applies where A causes or incites sexual activity abroad (see p 824).³⁴⁹

17.5 Sexual offences against children aged 13 to 15

The legal age of consent remains at 16.³⁵⁰ Under the pre 2003 law the protection afforded to children under 16 years included specific offences which had been incrementally amended and lacked coherence.

³⁴⁵ The defendant’s acts were more than merely preparatory and done with the intention of committing the offence. The fact that commission of the actual offence was on the true facts impossible because the police substituted an adult for a child did not mean that there was a defence in law to the charge. That is uncontroversial.

³⁴⁶ ie many of the offences are by text or social media, see Butcher [2009] EWCA Crim 1458.

³⁴⁷ eg A [2006] EWCA Crim 2103; Hinton-Smith [2005] EWCA Crim 2575, or even to cause B to show him her bra strap: Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299.

³⁴⁸ Section 73.

³⁴⁹ See eg Charnley [2010] All ER (D) 127 (Jun). A had used the internet to procure and watch the rape of children in the Philippines.

³⁵⁰ Setting the Boundaries, recommended that age of consent remain at 16—para 3.5.7 (recommendation no 17); the age of consent is lower in most other European countries—para 3.9.9. For discussion of the age of consent and its purpose, see A Gillespie and S Ost, ‘The “Higher” Age of Consent and the Concept of Sexual Exploitation’ in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017). Somewhat anomalously, although an individual is legally capable of consenting to sex once they reach the age of 16, they cannot consent to being photographed naked. By virtue of s 1 of the Protection of Children Act 1978, it is an offence to make an indecent photograph of someone under the age of 18. See M [2011] EWCA Crim 2752, [2012] Crim LR 789.

The 2003 Act created a series of specific offences targeting a wider range of sexual activity with children under 16. These reflect the Act's stated policy of protecting children from sexual exploitation. There is no time limit on prosecution as there was under some of the 1956 Act offences, which reflects the growing awareness of frequent delays in disclosing childhood sexual abuse.³⁵¹

Widespread public concern that the Act criminalized consensual sexual activity between children produced ministerial assurances that the use of these offences in prosecuting children will be limited:

The creation of such broad ranging offences raises a number of difficulties. There are no convictions at present [for kissing]. The guidelines [for the CPS] will be strong and I do not think that there will be prosecutions in the future for less serious consensual activity between children.³⁵²

Parliament expressly rejected the approach in other jurisdictions whereby liability for consensual sexual activity with those under 16 would be criminal only where one of the parties was older than the other by a specified amount—for example, two years as in Canada.³⁵³ One of the principal reasons for rejection was the recognition that many offences against children are committed by children.³⁵⁴

17.5.1 Sexual activity with a child: s 9

It is an offence intentionally to touch a person, B, where that touching is sexual and either:

- (1) B is under 16 and A does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over; or
- (2) B is under 13.

The offence under s 9 can be committed by a person aged 18 or over.³⁵⁵ The maximum sentence is 14 years' imprisonment. Sexual touching in these circumstances committed by offenders below 18 is criminalized in identical terms by s 13.³⁵⁶

A separate offence³⁵⁷ is created by subs (2) where the touching involves (a) penetration of B's anus or vagina, (b) penetration of B's mouth with a person's penis, (c) penetration of a person's anus or vagina by B, or (d) penetration of a person's mouth with B's penis. This offence carries a maximum penalty of 14 years' imprisonment and is triable on indictment only.

17.5.1.1 Actus reus

The elements of 'touching' and 'sexual' are discussed earlier in the chapter. There is no requirement that B is not consenting. A, 18, kissing/touching his consenting 15-year-old girlfriend is guilty if his conduct is 'sexual touching' which is to be decided by the jury. Passionate embracing and kissing suffices.³⁵⁸ The offence can, of course, be committed by women on young boys.³⁵⁹

³⁵¹ See the problems created by J [2004] UKHL 42; Cottrell [2007] EWCA Crim 2016; and K [2009] EWCA Crim 2117.

³⁵² See HC, 3 Nov 2003, col 622 (Paul Goggins). ³⁵³ Criminal Code 1985, s 150.1.

³⁵⁴ E Lovell, Children and Young People who Display Sexually Harmful Behaviour (2002) NSPCC.

³⁵⁵ On the difficulties in charging when it is unclear whether B is under 13 and therefore whether the offence should be charged under s 9 or eg s 8, see Rae [2013] EWCA Crim 2056.

³⁵⁶ The sentence is six months' imprisonment summarily, five years on indictment: s 13.

³⁵⁷ See earlier in chapter. ³⁵⁸ Lister [2005] EWCA Crim 1903.

³⁵⁹ See Angela C [2006] EWCA Crim 1781 (43-year-old having sex with 14-year-old boyfriend of her daughter) in which numerous cases of this nature are reviewed.

17.5.1.2 Mens rea

The touching must be intentional as discussed previously in relation to s 3. If B is under 13 there is no other element of mens rea. A's pleas of honest (and reasonable) belief in consent or age are irrelevant. Liability is strict.³⁶⁰ If B is under the age of 16, but over the age of 13, A must also be proved not to have had a reasonable belief that B was aged over 16.³⁶¹ Belief in consent remains irrelevant in such a case.

17.5.1.3 Defences

As with ss 5 to 7, the defence under s 73 applies to aiding and abetting or counselling for the child's protection. A marriage defence was deleted in the final stages of the Bill.

17.5.2 Causing or inciting a child to engage in sexual activity: s 10

It is an offence intentionally to cause and an offence intentionally to incite a person under 16, B, to engage in a sexual activity, if either B is under 16 and A does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over, or B is under 13.³⁶²

A separate offence is created by s 10(2) for penetrative touching (as in s 9 discussed earlier). That offence carries a maximum penalty of 14 years and is triable on indictment only. These offences can be committed by a person under the age of 18, in which case the sentence is one of six months summarily, five years on indictment: s 13. These are extremely broad offences, technically capable of criminalizing much schoolyard banter. Section 10 is commonly used to prosecute the sender of explicit text messages by mobile phone.³⁶³ It has also proved useful as an offence supporting that of 'grooming' under s 15.³⁶⁴

17.5.2.1 Actus reus

There are two offences: an act 'causing' B to engage, and any conduct 'inciting' B to engage in the activity. The relevant elements are discussed earlier in relation to s 8. The offences are very broad. A, 18, who begs his 15-year-old girlfriend to strip for him, commits an offence whether she declines or willingly assents. Examples of inciting sexual activity might include the conduct in DPP v B where the defendant invited the girl to give him 'a shiner' (perform oral sex on him). It includes A causing/inciting B to engage in sexual activity with a third party. Following the decision in Walker,³⁶⁵ incitement is construed so broadly as to include circumstances in which A has no intention that the act will be carried out. Following Jones, where A has not targeted a specific child or age range, it will always be possible to prosecute him for the more serious offence under s 8.

The breadth of the actus reus in terms of causing or inciting leaves no room for the application of the defence under s 73.

³⁶⁰ This represents a direct reversal of the House of Lords' decisions in DPP v B [2000] AC 428 and K [2002] 1 AC 462.

³⁶¹ This is a more generous defence than the 'young man's defence' under the 1956 Act which was limited to cases where D faced his first charge of this nature and was under 24. See Kirk and Russell [2002] EWCA Crim 1580.

³⁶² See the unusual case of B (Piara) [2010] EWCA Crim 315 where a Bangladeshi-born mother who spoke no English arranged a 'marriage' by custom (but not recognized in law) between her 15-year-old daughter and a man in his late 30s who abused her sexually. The mother claimed not to know about the age of consent in England.

³⁶³ See eg Howell [2007] EWCA Crim 1863. See eg Morell [2012] EWCA Crim 1410; Brocklebank [2013] EWCA Crim 1813. See now s 67 of the Serious Crime Act 2015.

³⁶⁴ See A Gillespie, 'Indecent Images, Grooming and the Law' [2006] Crim LR 412.

³⁶⁵ See n 343.

17.5.2.2 Mens rea

A must 'intend' to cause or incite. It is submitted that in this context intention extends to oblique intention. There is no scope for a plea of consent. If B is under 13 there is no other element of mens rea. A's pleas of honest (and reasonable) belief in consent or age are irrelevant. Liability is strict. If B is aged between 13 and 15, A must also be proved not to have had a reasonable belief that B was aged over 16. Belief in consent remains irrelevant in such a case.

17.5.3 Engaging in sexual activity in the presence of a child: s 11

It is an offence intentionally to engage in sexual activity, when a person under 16, B, is present or is in a place from which A can be observed, where for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification A engages in it knowing or believing that B is aware, or intending that B should be aware, that he is engaging in it, and either B is under 16 and A does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over, or B is under 13.³⁶⁶

This was another entirely novel offence introduced in 2003. It covers much of the activity that might previously have been charged as gross indecency. It is triable either way. The maximum sentence is ten years' imprisonment on indictment/six months summarily. The offence can also be committed by a person under 18, for which the sentence is one of six months summarily, five years on indictment: s 13.

17.5.3.1 Actus reus

A must engage in a sexual³⁶⁷ activity. B's position is far from clear. There is no requirement that B is actually witnessing the act, merely that B is present or in a position from which A can be observed. Since observation includes viewing directly or viewing an image,³⁶⁸ the offence can be committed via a webcam.³⁶⁹ To that extent, it is unclear what degree of physical proximity B must have to A. There is also no guidance as to whether the observation has to be in real time. There is no requirement that B is aware of the sexual activity, but B must actually be under 16; an undercover officer witnessing the event will not suffice. B's consent to being present or witnessing the events is irrelevant.

The offence is directed primarily at the defendant who masturbates in front of a child but it has the potential to criminalize a much wider range of conduct. Sexual thrill seekers ('doggers' as they are called) who have sex in public places might commit the offence by having sex in a park visible from a nearby children's play area.³⁷⁰

17.5.3.2 Mens rea

There are four elements of mens rea: (a) A must intentionally engage in the sexual activity; (b) A must have as his 'purpose' (which is presumably narrower than his intention and is restricted to 'direct' intention)³⁷¹ to derive sexual³⁷² gratification from B's presence. It remains unclear whether A's sole purpose must be to derive sexual pleasure from B's watching. A and C will not commit the offence if their child, B, walks in on their sexual activity in ³⁶⁶ See eg Chevron [2005] All ER (D) 91 (Feb), masturbating in sight of 12-year-old on beach.

³⁶⁷ As defined in s 78 and discussed at p 782. ³⁶⁸ Section 79(4) and (5).

³⁶⁹ See eg W [2013] EWCA Crim 1475.

³⁷⁰ See Vaiculevicius (Andrius) [2013] EWCA Crim 185 where D was convicted of outraging public decency for sex in a park in the presence of children. See also the case of WT [2005] EWCA Crim 2448. Husband and wife convicted of taking photos of 14-year-old daughter naked and of having their nine-year-old daughter photograph them in acts of intercourse and in posed lewd positions.

³⁷¹ And renders the offence one of specific intent following Heard [2007] EWCA Crim 125.

³⁷² Section 78 (see earlier).

the parental bedroom; (c) A must 'know or believe' that B is aware or 'intend' that B should be aware of the activity; (d) in the case of B being between 13 and 16, A must be shown not to have had a reasonable belief that B is 16 or over.

17.5.4 Causing a child to watch a sexual act: s 12

It is an offence intentionally to cause another person under 16, B, to watch a third person engaging in an activity, or to look at an image of any person engaging in a sexual activity, where A acts for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, and is aware that B is under 16 and does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over, or B is under 13.

This offence was included to supplement that in relation to grooming discussed later. Research suggests that paedophiles often diminish the sexual inhibitions of children by exposing them to explicit pornography to facilitate subsequent sexual acts. The offence under s 12 is wider than that under s 11 because the activity/image B is watching is not restricted to one involving A. It is a very wide offence: A aged 18 who shows his willing 15-year-old girlfriend a pornographic film for their mutual sexual enjoyment commits the offence. The obvious cases of application will be where an adult gets a child to watch sexual DVDs, etc. It applies to causing a child to read explicit text messages or other social media.³⁷³

The offence is triable either way and carries a maximum ten-year sentence on indictment. By s 13 it can be committed by a child under the age of 18, in which case the maximum sentence is five years' imprisonment.

17.5.4.1 Actus reus

A must cause B to watch the activity/image. Ordinary principles of causation apply here as elsewhere. Omitting to prevent B from watching the activity/image will not ground liability, as where a parent A turns a blind eye to B watching a pornographic film. In such a case, A would also lack the mens rea of acting for the purpose of sexual gratification. 'Image' is widely defined to include moving or still images however produced and 3D images.³⁷⁴ The broadest definition possible was created to include, for example, cartoons and 'etchings' as well as video and computer-generated pseudo-images. The image must be sexual as defined in s 78. B must watch the activity or image. This involves using the visual sense. It must be proved that B was under 16; again, an undercover officer being caused to watch an act will not suffice.

In Abdullahi,³⁷⁵ the Court of Appeal held that the act must be done 'for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification'—but the gratification need not be contemporaneous; so A is guilty if his act is done in order to 'groom' a child with a view to sexual activity later. A caused the 13-year-old complainant, whom he plied with drink and drugs, to watch a pornographic film depicting heterosexual and homosexual sexual activity. Subsequently, in his room, A touched B's penis. A was charged with offences under ss 12 and 14. It was sufficient that A showed the images for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, either by enjoying seeing the complainant looking at the images or with a view to engaging in sexual activity with B later.

17.5.4.2 Mens rea

The elements of mens rea are that A must (a) intend to cause B to watch, and (b) act for the 'purpose' of sexual gratification. As in s 11, 'purpose' is to be narrowly construed. If A has ³⁷³ L [2006] EWCA Crim 2225 where images of the offender masturbating were sent by phone to B.

³⁷⁴ Section 79(4). ³⁷⁵ [2006] EWCA Crim 2060.

a dual purpose, for example to explain sexual matters to B, but also to derive some sexual gratification from the activity, it is submitted that A commits the offence.

Although there is no explicit element of mens rea in relation to the 'sexual' nature of the activity in s 12(1)(b), the courts might imply a requirement of knowledge. This could create problems. Since what is 'sexual' is to be defined retrospectively by the jury, A might claim that he did not realize it was sexual when he caused B to watch the image. In particular, this argument might be advanced when the images are regarded as 'art'.

17.5.5 Arranging or facilitating commission of a child sex offence: s 14

It is an offence for A intentionally to arrange or facilitate something that A intends to do, intends another person to do or believes that another person will do, in any part of the world, and doing it will involve the commission of an offence under any of ss 9 to 13 (discussed earlier).

This is a controversial 'sweeper' provision. It is a form of inchoate offence and can be committed in a number of ways. Its breadth in the original Bill caused consternation among youth and health-care workers (and teenage magazine advice columnists) anxious that by giving legitimate advice to teenagers about safe sexual practices they would expose themselves to prosecution. As a result, the offence is markedly narrower than its original draft.

17.5.5.1 Actus reus

The element of 'arranging' is not defined. The Home Office provides as an example the case where A approaches an escort agency and requests a 15-year-old girl for sex.³⁷⁶ In R,³⁷⁷ A asked an adult sex worker whether she knew of any young girls, aged 12 or 13, who were sex workers. She said that she did not. A then sent text messages to her asking whether she had 'got the 12-year-old sorted yet?' The sex worker reported the matter to the police and A was prosecuted under s 14. The trial judge ruled that there was no conduct amounting to that offence or an attempt to commit it. The Crown appealed. The Court of Appeal reversed the trial judge's decision. The court held that s 14 does not require any 'agreement'.³⁷⁸ A asked the sex worker to arrange things for him, but she did not do so and therefore A could not be said to have done more than attempt to commit the s 14 offence. On the facts there was a possible attempt. Whether A's acts went beyond mere preparation for the purposes of an attempt would be a question of fact for the jury. Moses LJ suggested that:

The section does not require an agreement or arrangement. It does not require the consent or acquiescence of anyone else. An arrangement may be made without the agreement or acquiescence of anyone else. A defendant may take steps by way of a plan with the criminal objective identified in the section without involving anyone else and the mere fact that no-one else is involved would not necessarily mean that no arrangement was made. In those circumstances, we reject the submission . . . that, absent any agreement, formal or informal, there can be no arrangement.

Section 14 was acknowledged to be wider than attempt because it does not require proof of any act that is 'more than merely preparatory' to one of the relevant child sex offences. The section 'does not limit the stage at which criminal liability is imposed to what would hitherto be regarded as an attempt; in other words, to a proximate stage before the commission of the full offence. The section widens liability to steps taken with the requisite criminal intent by way of preparation.’

³⁷⁶ See eg Jordan [2006] EWCA Crim 3311 where A asked a sex worker to get him an under-age girl. See also R (2008) 16 Jan, unreported, CA (Crim Div).

³⁷⁷ [2008] EWCA Crim 619.

³⁷⁸ Since A's request had not been acted on by the sex worker it seems difficult to regard his conduct as amounting to 'arranging or facilitating' any ulterior offence.

The case went back for trial and A was convicted. He appealed successfully on the basis that the judge had this time directed in such a way that the jury were bound to convict.³⁷⁹ On a retrial he was convicted and appealed, again seeking to distinguish the two earlier appeal decisions, in his own case. In this third appeal the Court of Appeal held that the agreement was not necessary for the offence of arrangement to be concluded.³⁸⁰

The offence is extremely broad. A, 18, who agrees with his willing 15-year-old girlfriend to meet later for sex commits the offence. It is particularly wide since it governs arranging or facilitating acts anywhere in the world; it seems that A who arranges to marry B, 14, in her native country in which the age of consent is 14 commits the offence.

‘Facilitating’ is not defined. It is intended to cover the case where A lets his room to C so that C can have sex with B aged 15. This is also an overbroad offence. It applies also to suppliers of pornography which might be used in ss 11 and 12 offences. A, the father of a 15-year-old girl who would rather she had sex with her boyfriend at home than elsewhere, appears to facilitate that action (although he may have a defence under s 14(3)(b) discussed later).

17.5.5.2 Mens rea

A must intend the activity. In this context it would seem that oblique intention would be sufficient. However, the offence is limited in the sense that A must intend that an offence under ss 9 to 13 will be committed.

17.5.5.3 The exceptions

In view of the overbroad terms of the offence, the statutory exceptions provided in s 14 are extremely important. These provide:

- (2) A person does not commit an offence under this section if—
 - (a) he arranges or facilitates something that he believes another person will do, but that he does not intend to do or intend another person to do, and
 - (b) any offence within subsection (1)(b) would be an offence against a child for whose protection he acts.
- (3) For the purposes of subsection (2), a person acts for the protection of a child if he acts for the purpose of—
 - (a) protecting the child from sexually transmitted infection,
 - (b) protecting the physical safety of the child,
 - (c) preventing the child from becoming pregnant, or
 - (d) promoting the child’s emotional well-being by the giving of advice, and not for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification or for the purpose of causing or encouraging the activity constituting the offence within subsection (1)(b) or the child’s participation in it.

These are designed to safeguard the health-care worker who provides condoms and sex education and the teacher who advises children under 16 on sexual matters. Although well intentioned, major ambiguities remain, in particular in defining ‘emotional well-being’ in s 14(3)(d). The courts are left to flesh out these issues.

³⁷⁹ [2008] EWCA Crim 2912.

³⁸⁰ [2009] EWCA Crim 1472. See A Gillespie (2009) 73 J Crim L 378.

17.5.6 Meeting a child following sexual grooming, etc: s 15

Paedophiles and others intent on sexually exploiting children and young people often use the internet, in particular 'chat rooms', to contact and 'groom' children before meeting them with a view to committing sexual acts. This is acknowledged as a widespread problem.³⁸¹ Under the pre-2003 law, the principal offences available were those of attempt which required the investigating authorities to wait until confident that the offender had gone beyond acts of mere preparation to the substantive sexual offence.³⁸² This was unsatisfactory since it exposed the child to a risk of harm. In response, the government created the much publicized 'grooming' offence. The seriousness with which this risk is considered by the government is evidenced by the maximum sentence of ten years' imprisonment on indictment/six months summarily. The definition as amended³⁸³ is:

15.—(1) A person aged 18 or over (A) commits an offence if—

- (a) A has met or communicated with another person (B) on one or more occasions and subsequently—
 - (i) A intentionally meets B,
 - (ii) A travels with the intention of meeting B in any part of the world or arranges to meet B in any part of the world, or
 - (iii) B travels with the intention of meeting A in any part of the world,
- (b) A intends to do anything to or in respect of B, during or after the meeting mentioned in paragraph (a)(i) to (iii) and in any part of the world, which if done will involve the commission by A of a relevant offence,
- (c) B is under 16, and
- (d) A does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over.

The offence can be committed by an adult where a child under 16 travels to meet the adult or the adult agrees to meet the child in any part of the world, following at least one communication and the adult intends to commit a relevant sexual offence during or after the meeting.

In one of the first reported cases under the provision, Mansfield,³⁸⁴ Sir Douglas Brown explained the paternalist nature of the provision: 'The law is there to protect young girls against their own immature sexual experimentation and to punish much older men who take advantage of them.'³⁸⁵ The offence also protects boys of course.³⁸⁶

17.5.6.1 Actus reus

There must be at least one communication. There is no restriction on the manner of communication. There is no requirement that the messages are sexual in nature.³⁸⁷ The offence is headed 'meeting a child following sexual grooming etc' but that is rather misleading. The phrase 'sexual grooming' does not appear in the section.³⁸⁸ The aim of the section is to ³⁸¹ On the scale of this type of activity, see A Gillespie, 'Child Protection on the Internet—Challenges for Criminal Law' (2002) 14 CFLQ 411. The offence was amended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, s 73.

³⁸² For a comprehensive analysis of the old law and its failings, see A Gillespie, 'Children, Chatrooms and the Law' [2001] Crim LR 435.

³⁸³ By the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, s 73 and Sch 15 and by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, s 36.

³⁸⁴ [2005] EWCA Crim 927. ³⁸⁵ Endorsed in Mohammed [2006] EWCA Crim 1107.

³⁸⁶ See eg A-G's Reference (No 91 of 2007) unreported.

³⁸⁷ Gaviria [2010] EWCA Crim 1693, citing this para in the 13th edition with approval.

³⁸⁸ See Rook and Ward, Sexual Offences Law and Practice, para 4.211, noting that the government resisted amendments to the Bill to restrict the offence in that way.

penalize those who use relationships to break down a child's inhibitions before arranging a meeting with a view to sexual offending. The initial communication(s) need therefore not be sexual. They may well be seemingly innocuous precisely in order to win the child's confidence. An offence is committed whether or not a meeting actually takes place. It is enough that having communicated with B before, A travels with the intention of meeting B or arranges to meet B or B travels with the intention of meeting A. What is crucial is proving A's intention to engage in a child sex offence on B during or after the meeting.

It is not enough that, during the course of a meeting, started without any such intention, A then decides to take advantage of the situation and commit an offence: the crime then will be the commission of or the attempt to commit that offence. The offence contained within s. 15 is not engaged.³⁸⁹

Moreover, there is no clear limit on the period of time between the previous meeting/communication and the planned meeting. This raises the problem at what point must A believe B to be over 16—in the course of communication or at the time of the proposed meeting? What if B turns 16 in the interim?

Despite its laudable aims, anxieties must be raised by the breadth of the offence. A, 18, writes love letters to B, 15, arranging to meet at the local club. A might commit the offence depending on his mens rea.³⁹⁰

Arguably, however, the offence is too narrow. An elderly man, A, who is a paedophile, posts internet messages to B, believing her to be 15. She is X, an undercover woman police officer aged over 16. No substantive offence is committed. A might be liable for an attempt.

17.5.6.2 Mens rea

There is a requirement of intention. It is submitted that given the lack of any requirement for manifest wrongdoing in communicating and setting out to meet B, this element should be very strictly construed by the courts. In lobbying Parliament during the passage of the Bill, the offence was likened to a 'thought-crime' because of the absence of any tangible harm.³⁹¹

17.5.7 Sexual communication with a child: s 15A

Section 67 of the Serious Crime Act 2015 inserts a new s 15A into the SOA 2003. This new offence, entitled 'sexual communication with a child', is committed where A, aged 18 or over, intentionally communicates with a person, B, who is aged under 16, for the purposes of sexual gratification when the communication is sexual or is intended to encourage the recipient to make a communication that is sexual and the offender does not reasonably believe that B is 16 or over.³⁹² In respect of the s 15 offence, even if A were discovered to have been communicating sexually with a person under the age of 16, he would not commit an offence until he and B actually met or at least arranged to meet. This new offence closes what was perceived by many to be a lacuna. The offence is triable either way. On summary conviction, the maximum sentence is 12 months' imprisonment and/or a fine. On conviction on indictment, the maximum sentence is two years' imprisonment and/or a fine.

³⁸⁹ Gaviria [2010] EWCA Crim 1683 per Leveson LJ at [17].

³⁹⁰ ie if he hopes that the evening may involve sexual conduct with B, he commits the offence when he travels to the club.

³⁹¹ See Liberty and Criminal Bar Association responses to the government's White Paper, Protecting the Public.

³⁹² For further discussion, see K Laird, 'Parts 5 and 6 of the Serious Crime Act 2015—More than Mere Miscellany' [2015] Crim LR 789.

17.6 Offences of abuse of trust

The Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000³⁹³ created new offences of abuse of a position of trust.³⁹⁴ The 2003 Act replaced them with four offences where A (aged over 18) in a position of trust to B (under 18): sexually touches B (s 16);³⁹⁵ causes or incites B to engage in sexual activity (s 17);³⁹⁶ engages in sexual activity in B's presence for the purpose of sexual gratification (s 18); or causes B to watch a sexual image or activity for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification.

The most notable feature of the offences is that they criminalize consensual conduct with those under 18. Although 16- to 18-year-olds may consent to sexual activity in other circumstances, they cannot do so with those who regularly 'look after' them.³⁹⁷ This reflects the Act's theme of preventing exploitation. The category of those in positions of trust is widely defined and includes, for example, pupils and students, but is not all-embracing; there is no specific inclusion of categories such as clergy and non-professional carers such as scout leaders. Individuals in these positions may fall within the terms of the offences depending on the circumstances of their responsibility for B.³⁹⁸

The offences place a burden on A, where his position of trust arises in an institutional setting, to present evidence that he did not know nor could he reasonably be expected to know that he was in a position of trust towards B. This may well be a difficult plea to raise unless A and B are in a large institution.

No offence is committed where A has a reasonable belief that B is aged over 18 (unless B is under 13). There is a defence for A to prove that he was lawfully married³⁹⁹ to B (aged 16 or over) or that immediately before the position of trust arose there existed a lawful sexual relationship between them. This covers cases where, for example, A and B had a sexual relationship before A became a teacher at B's school.

17.7 Family offences

The 2003 Act creates two sets of offences to deal with offences within the family. In relation to children, ss 25 and 26 criminalize the same forms of activity as ss 9 and 12 (see earlier): sexual touching and causing a child to engage in sexual activity. These are welcome extensions, protecting vulnerable individuals against acts other than sexual intercourse. Sections 25 and 26 differ from ss 9 and 12 in two important respects: B must be under 18 and A must be a family member. Family membership is defined in very broad terms in the Act (and has been further extended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, Sch 15), extending well beyond blood relationships to reflect the diverse structures

³⁹³ See Burnside [2001] Crim LR 425.

³⁹⁴ See the 10th edition of this book, at p 478.

³⁹⁵ eg a teacher's kiss to a 6th former at the leavers' ball: Lamb [2007] EWCA Crim 1766; Wootton [2005] EWCA Crim 2137, teacher engaged in sex with 15- and 16-year-olds; Wilson [2007] EWCA Crim 2762.

³⁹⁶ See eg Vallente [2011] EWCA Crim 294.

³⁹⁷ As defined in ss 21 and 22. The requirement of regularity may be unduly restrictive. Does it catch the supply teacher?

³⁹⁸ It has been argued that a better approach would be to focus on whether the actual relationship between A and B is exploitative. See A Gillespie and S Ost, 'The "Higher" Age of Consent and the Concept of Sexual Exploitation' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Consent—Domestic and Comparative Perspectives (2017).

³⁹⁹ 'Person who is married' includes a person who is married to a person of the same sex: see Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013, Sch 3, para 1(1)(c), (2), (3).

of modern families. It protects, for example, the stepchild,⁴⁰⁰ foster child⁴⁰¹ and adopted child.⁴⁰² Family members include adoptive relationships,⁴⁰³ wider family members who live, or have lived, in the same household as the child or who are, or have been, regularly involved in caring for, training or supervising or being in sole charge of the child⁴⁰⁴ and others who are living in the same household as the child and who hold a position of trust or authority in relation to the child at the time of the alleged offence.⁴⁰⁵ The breadth of the extended family⁴⁰⁶ caught by the Act reflects the shift in emphasis in the legislation from a blood relationship-based offence of heterosexual intercourse (incest)⁴⁰⁷ to one based on gender-neutral exploitation of sexual vulnerability in the home environment.

There are defences in s 28 where A is lawfully married to B⁴⁰⁸ at the time of engaging in the sexual activity, and under s 29 where A proves that a lawful sexual relationship existed between A and B immediately before the familial relationship arose.⁴⁰⁹

The 2003 Act also creates controversial sexual offences involving consenting adult relatives. Section 64 makes it an offence for A aged 16 or over to intentionally penetrate sexually (anally, vaginally or orally) a relative B who is aged 18 or over if he knows or could reasonably have been expected to know that B is his relative. The converse offence is provided for in s 65: A aged 16 or over commits an offence by consenting to being penetrated sexually by a relative B aged 18 or over if he knows or could reasonably have been expected to know that B is his relative. The concept of a 'relative' is broadly defined.⁴¹⁰ Where the prosecution establish that A is related to B, A will be taken to have known or to have reasonably been expected to know that they were related in that way unless A raises sufficient evidence as to whether he knew or could reasonably have been expected to know. These are broad, gender-neutral offences. They have been heavily criticized.⁴¹¹ Both offences are triable summarily

⁴⁰⁰ See eg R (Danny) [2005] EWCA Crim 1296 where A asked his 12-year-old stepdaughter to allow him to perform oral sex on her; DA [2012] EWCA Crim 1825 where A engaged in a sexual relationship with his 16-year-old stepdaughter that resulted in her giving birth to his child.

⁴⁰¹ Thomas (Robert) [2005] EWCA Crim 2343.

⁴⁰² Section 27 of the 2003 Act, as amended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, Sch 15, para 3.

⁴⁰³ Parents, current or former foster parents, grandparents, brothers, sisters, half-brothers, half-sisters, aunts and uncles.

⁴⁰⁴ Step-parents, cousins, stepbrothers and stepsisters, current or former foster siblings.

⁴⁰⁵ This offence will not be committed if A has a lawful sexual relationship with the child after the familial relationship has ceased, even where the child is under 18.

⁴⁰⁶ This is so wide that it has been argued that sports coaches will be caught: C Brackenridge and Y Williams, 'Incest in the "Family" of Sport' (2004) 154 NLJ 179. See the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Act 2006.

⁴⁰⁷ Founded historically in part at least on eugenics arguments: V Bailey and S Blackburn, 'The Punishment of Incest Act 1908: A Case Study in Law Creation' [1979] Crim LR 708; S Wolfram, 'Eugenics and the Punishment of Incest Act 1908' [1983] Crim LR 308; J Temkin, 'Do We Need a Crime of Incest?' (1988) 44 CLP 185; HHJ Peter Bowsher, 'Incest—Should Incest Between Consenting Adults be a Crime?' [2015] Crim LR 208.

⁴⁰⁸ Note the amended definition in the Civil Partnerships Act 2004.

⁴⁰⁹ eg two 16-year-olds are in a sexual relationship and the girl's father and boy's mother subsequently marry. As amended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, Sch 15, para 4.

⁴¹⁰ Parent, grandparent, child, grandchild, brother, sister, half-brother, half-sister; and blood relationships of uncle, aunt, nephew or niece. Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, Sch 15 provides that adopted child/parent relationships are caught where A is over 18. The Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Parental Orders) Regulations 2010, SI 2010/985, amended the Sexual Offences Act, ss 64 and 65, so that references to an adoptive relationship include references to the comparable relationship under a parental order.

⁴¹¹ See Bowsher [2015] Crim LR 208. JR Spencer, 'Child and Family Offences' [2004] Crim LR 347, doubts that they could ever be properly used. But what of the situation where eg X aged 17 penetrates his 19-year-old sister, Y, having secured her agreement with a threat which is not sufficient to vitiate consent under s 74? This constitutes an offence under s 64, but not any other serious offence, and it may well be proper to prosecute it. X commits the s 64 offence (X being over 16 and Y being over 18), but not the child offences (Y is over 16), nor the family offences (Y being over 18).

or on indictment and have a maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment. Together, ss 64 and 65 make both parties to sexual activity guilty, so who is the law trying to protect? Will this be found to be compatible with Art 8 of the ECHR for consenting adults? In Stubing v Germany,⁴¹² the ECtHR accepted that a legal ban on sexual intercourse with the applicant's willing sister was an interference with his right to respect for his private life. The court went on to find, however, that the ban fell within Art 8(2) as being necessary in a democratic society. The State's decision to criminalize sexual intercourse between even consenting adult relatives was held to fall within the margin of appreciation.⁴¹³

17.8 Offences involving mental disorder

The Act provides three specific groups of offences to protect those with a mental disorder.⁴¹⁴ In each category the types of behaviour criminalized are roughly the same as those in relation to children. In short, the activities prohibited are:

- sexual touching of B;
- causing or inciting sexual activity by B;
- engaging in sexual activity in B's presence;
- causing B to watch sexual activity.

In the offences dealing with children, the Act has decreed that it is sufficient to prove that one of these activities is intentionally performed; liability as to the factor of vulnerability—that is, age—is strict. Applying strict liability would be too harsh in the present context⁴¹⁵ since there may not necessarily be physical signs that the adult complainant is a vulnerable person. Thus, only when these activities arise in an exploitative context are they criminalized. The three prohibited contexts for such activity are:

- ss 30 to 33 where B is mentally disordered and 'unable to refuse';⁴¹⁶
- ss 34 to 37 where B is mentally disordered and the activity is caused by 'threats or deception or inducement' which need not vitiate consent under s 74;
- ss 38 to 41 where B is mentally disordered and A is 'in a relationship as a carer'.⁴¹⁷

There are numerous welcome improvements in the 2003 Act scheme. Creating specific offences produces much fairer labelling—defendants are convicted of offences that better ⁴¹² [2013] 1 FCR 107.

⁴¹³ For criticism, see JR Spencer, 'Incest and Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights' (2013) 72 CLJ 5.

⁴¹⁴ For criticism see J Stanton-Ife, 'Mental Disorder and Sexual Consent' in DJ Baker and J Horder, The Sanctity of Life and the Criminal Law (2013). Stanton-Ife examines four legal tests for attempting to set the threshold at which a severely mentally disordered person can give valid consent to sexual activity and concludes that the test utilized in the 2003 Act focuses too much upon B's cognitive state, which may lead to a result that is not in her best interests. See also IM v LM [2014] EWCA Civ 37.

⁴¹⁵ Setting the Boundaries, para 4.6.4.

⁴¹⁶ In Hulme v DPP [2006] EWHC 1347 (Admin), the Divisional Court considered the offence under s 30, concluding that on the facts a magistrates' court was entitled to reach the decision that a woman suffering from a mental disorder was unable to refuse to be touched sexually. The defendant, a 73-year-old, had touched the complainant, a cerebral palsy sufferer with a low mental age. B was unable to refuse because she did not know what to say or how to say it. She was physically capable of speaking, but was too confused and scared to do so. This was held to be an inability to refuse. The conviction was upheld despite the magistrates having been incorrectly advised as to the interpretation of s 30.

⁴¹⁷ This is broadly construed as where B was suffering from postnatal depression and was in a vulnerable state when her social worker had sexual intercourse with her: Bradford [2006] EWCA Crim 2495.

describe their actions. The language has been modernized, and gender specificity has been removed. This is not mere window dressing; for example, one result is that mentally disordered men are protected against heterosexual abuse. The offensive terminology of the 1956 Act was replaced by the appropriate (but technical) language of the Mental Health Acts. The Mental Health Act 2007 adopts broader definitions and produces yet wider offences. ‘Mental disorder’ under the 2007 Act means any disability or disorder of the mind and includes conditions such as autism and bipolar disorder.

As elsewhere in the Act, there is tremendous prolixity. Many of the definitions are complex and their interrelationship with other provisions in the Act exacerbates this problem. For example, the relationship between the s 30 offence of sexual touching with a person with mental disorder impeding the ability to refuse and the general offence of non-consensual sexual touching in s 3 is confusing.⁴¹⁸ Thus, s 30(2) provides:

B is unable to refuse if:

- (a) he lacks the capacity to choose whether to agree to the [activity] (whether because he lacks sufficient understanding of the nature or reasonably foreseeable consequences of what is being done, or for any other reason), or
- (b) he is unable to communicate such a choice to A.

The definition of ‘inability to refuse’ includes cases where B lacks capacity: in such cases there is clearly no consent. Inability to refuse includes, in the alternative, an inability to communicate a choice to this defendant. The House of Lords in *C*⁴¹⁹ confirmed that s 30(2)(b) did not require that a complainant was physically unable to communicate by reason of her mental disorder. There is considerable overlap with the offences under ss 1 to 4.

It is arguable that too much discretion lies in the hands of the CPS which faces an especially difficult task in deciding whether to prosecute in cases where, for example, A and B are both mentally disordered, or where a carer claims that the actions were performed for the appropriate sex education of an individual with learning disability. In many instances it will still be necessary to determine the capacity of the complainant and this will involve her giving evidence—albeit under the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 special measures regime.

Symbolically it was very important for the Act to criminalize exploitative behaviour, but the message is confused when it over-criminalizes and potentially inhibits the appropriate sexual behaviour of those with a learning disability.⁴²⁰

Note that the offences involving mental incapacity do not have to be charged where the complainant has such a disability. It is possible to rely on the straightforward non-consensual offences of rape, penetration, etc.⁴²¹

⁴¹⁸ This issue was alluded to in A [2014] EWCA Crim 299. The Court of Appeal was extremely critical of the decision to charge A with rape and sexual assault instead of one of the offences found in s 30. Macur LJ stated that: ‘it behoves us to say that “charging” decisions in relation to the prosecution of offences concerning complainants where there is or may be an issue of capacity to consent, would benefit from a measured consideration of the full array of offences created by section 30, and following, of the 2003 Act and which incorporate the full range of criminal sexual activity’. At [32].

⁴¹⁹ C [2009] UKHL 42.

⁴²⁰ The Twelfth Report of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights (2003) (HL 199; HC 765) concluded that the provisions were probably compatible with ECHR obligations under Art 8.

⁴²¹ See eg Wragg [2006] EWCA Crim 2022 (A touched B, who was a cerebral palsy sufferer, in a community home). Note the comments by Macur LJ in A, however.

17.9 Other sexual offences

17.9.1 Prostitution and pornography

The Act provides specific protection against the sexual exploitation of children in a number of contexts. Section 47 provides an offence of paying (as widely defined) for the sexual services of a child⁴²² and s 48 provides wider supporting offences of causing or inciting child sexual exploitation or pornography, being designed to catch those who recruit vulnerable children into such activities.

Further broadly defined offences provide protection against child sexual exploitation⁴²³ and arranging or facilitating the sexual exploitation of a child.⁴²⁴

Provisions to deal with adult sexual exploitation were strengthened with a range of offences introduced to deal with causing or inciting⁴²⁵ or controlling prostitution for gain.⁴²⁶ The rise in trafficking for prostitution was combated by offences of trafficking into, within and outwith the UK, but these have been repealed and replaced with the relevant offences found in the Modern Slavery Act 2015.

17.9.2 Indecent photographs of children

There are offences of taking, making, permitting to take, distributing, showing, possessing with intent to distribute and advertising indecent photographs or pseudo-photographs of children under 18.⁴²⁷ There is a defence if the child is aged 16 or over and A proves that he and the child were married or living together as partners in an enduring family relationship, that the child consented to the image being taken and that the image shows no one other than B (and A).⁴²⁸ This is an area of considerable controversy.

The strictness of the offences has given rise to concern in some cases, particularly as regards the definition of creation, which can occur by the act of downloading an image to view it on the screen of a computer and then immediately deleting it without consciously saving it. Because of the strictness of liability in relation to age, other difficulties arise where A downloads images of teenagers claiming that he was led by the website to believe the models to be older. There are also broader concerns about freedom of expression.⁴²⁹ Existing offences were extended by s 69 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008: these are considered briefly in Ch 30.

17.9.3 Preliminary offences

17.9.3.1 Administering drugs

The Act introduces three important new preliminary sex offences. Section 61 introduces an offence of intentional administration of a substance/causing it to be taken by B without consent with intent to stupefy/overpower to enable any person to engage in a sexual activity ⁴²² See Y [2014] EWCA Crim 413.

⁴²³ Section 49. The Serious Crime Act 2015, s 68 renamed these offences 'sexual exploitation' instead of 'child prostitution and pornography'.

⁴²⁴ Section 50.

⁴²⁵ Section 52.

⁴²⁶ Section 53.

⁴²⁷ On the prevalence of this activity, see B Gallagher, K Christmann, C Fraser and B Hodgson, 'International and Internet Child Sexual Abuse and Exploitation—Issues Emerging from Research' (2003) 15 CFLQ 353.

⁴²⁸ On the complex and unsatisfactory nature of the offences, see A Gillespie, 'The Sexual Offences Act 2003: (3) Tinkering With 'Child Pornography'' [2004] Crim LR 361.

⁴²⁹ See I Cram, 'Criminalising Child Pornography—A Canadian Study in Freedom of Expression and Charter-Led Judicial Review of Legislative Policy Making' (2002) 66 J Crim L 359 on the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Sharpe [2001] 1 SCR 45.

that involves B.⁴³⁰ This is a further response to the problem of drug-assisted rape (see also s 75(2)(f) discussed earlier).⁴³¹ The offence is much wider than that in s 4 of the 1956 Act, being gender-neutral and relating to all sexual activity rather than just sexual intercourse. The offence covers A spiking B's drinks⁴³² as well as administering drugs such as GHB and Rohypnol. It does not extend to A encouraging B to get drunk so that A could more readily persuade B to have sex.

Section 61 applies where A himself administers the substance to B, and where A causes the substance to be taken by B, by for example persuading C to administer it to B. There is no requirement that the intended sexual activity involve A. It is a preliminary offence in the sense that there is no requirement that B actually is involved in any sexual activity. It is unclear whether those who manufacture or supply the drugs will be liable as aiders and abettors, or under the SCA 2007, or for offences under s 61.

17.9.3.2 Committing an offence with intent to commit a sexual offence

Section 62 introduces an offence of 'committing an offence with intent to commit a sexual offence'. The offence was designed primarily to tackle cases where A kidnaps B so that he can rape her or assaults B to subdue her.⁴³³ The offence as drafted is much wider: there is no requirement that the preliminary offence is directed at B, the person against whom the substantive sexual offence is committed.⁴³⁴ A, 18, speeding in his car to B, 15, to have consensual sex with her commits the offence. Stalking under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 will suffice as the preliminary crime.⁴³⁵ It will also apply in the more commonplace cases such as those of a physical assault by A in preparation for a sexual assault or rape.⁴³⁶

At common law it was uncertain whether the offence of assault with intent to rape exists. There is no doubt that an indictment for assault with intent to rape would lie at common law but it is not certain whether it was a specific offence or an example of a wider common law offence of assault with intent to commit a felony. If the latter, it ceased to exist with the abolition of felonies by the Criminal Law Act 1967 and the repeal of the words in s 38 of the OAPA 1861 which provided that assault with intent to commit a felony was punishable with two years' imprisonment. The better view is that there was no general offence of assault with intent to commit a felony at common law, and that assault with intent to rape was, and is, a specific offence which was not abolished by the 1861 Act or by the repeal of the general statutory offence. Most significantly, it was treated by the draftsman of the 1861 legislation, CS Greaves, as continuing to exist after the 1861 Act.⁴³⁷ Most cases of assault with intent to rape will amount to attempted rape under the Criminal Attempts Act 1981 but there will be instances where the assault is a 'merely preparatory' act.⁴³⁸ In such cases the most obvious charge is that under s 62.

⁴³⁰ See Wright [2006] EWCA Crim 2672; Spall [2008] 1 Cr App R (S) 250.

⁴³¹ cf the offences of poisoning under ss 23 and 24 of the OAPA 1861. See also Coomber [2005] EWCA Crim 1113 (scout leader drugging boys to abuse them when asleep). On the prevalence of intoxicated complainants, see M Horvath and J Brown, 'The Role of Drugs and Alcohol in Rape' (2006) 46 Med Sci Law 219 concluding that the complainant's state of intoxication is more significant than the defendant's.

⁴³² As in the case of W [2014] EWCA Crim 2232 where B suffered a seizure as a result of being drugged by A.

⁴³³ See the first sentencing case on the offence: Wisniewshi [2004] EWCA Crim 3361. See also Vageesan S [2008] EWCA Crim 346 (assault prior to rape) and Fairweather [2011] EWCA Crim 1783.

⁴³⁴ Little [2012] EWCA Crim 3099.

⁴³⁵ Where the preparatory offence is kidnapping or false imprisonment, the offence is triable on indictment only, and has a maximum penalty of life imprisonment. In all other cases, the offence is triable summarily or on indictment and has a maximum penalty of ten years on indictment.

⁴³⁶ See Seevaratnarajah [2008] EWCA Crim 346.

⁴³⁷ CS Greaves (ed), Russell on Crime (4th edn, 1865) 927.

⁴³⁸ See Ch 9.

17.9.3.3 Trespass with intent to commit a sexual offence

The third preliminary offence is that under s 63: ‘trespass with intent to commit a sexual offence’. This is committed where A intends to commit a sexual offence whilst he is on any premises as a trespasser, either knowing or being reckless⁴³⁹ as to whether he is trespassing. A person is a trespasser if he is on any premises without the owner’s or occupier’s consent, or other lawful excuse. This replaces the offence under s 9 of the Theft Act 1968, in relation to burglary with intent to rape. It is clearly wider since it involves any trespass and includes sexual offences beyond rape.⁴⁴⁰ It is not necessary for the Crown to specify which sexual offence the trespasser was intent on committing. In *Pacurar*⁴⁴¹ the Court of Appeal held that it was sufficient for the Crown to allege in the particulars of offence that P was going to commit one of a specified number of offences against specific individuals at an identified time and place.

17.9.4 Miscellaneous sexual offences

17.9.4.1 Exposure

Section 66 creates an offence if A intentionally exposes his or her genitals with the intention that another person will see them and be caused alarm or distress. This extends the previous law to include female exposure, although that is a particularly rare phenomenon. It is not necessary that anyone should have seen the genitals or have been caused alarm or distress. In addition to the commonplace incidents of flashing, and more serious examples,⁴⁴² the offence has been used to tackle the more unusual expositors: see the case of Bullen,⁴⁴³ where A went to a women’s dress shop and exposed himself when trying on clothes.⁴⁴⁴ There was much controversy over the offence when originally introduced since it was feared that it would criminalize naturism.⁴⁴⁵ As finally enacted, the offence would not apply to a naturist unless his exposure is with intention to cause alarm or distress. Similarly, it is unlikely that ‘streakers’ at sports events will be prosecuted. For many people, the distress caused is by the disruption to play not by the exposure of genitals.⁴⁴⁶ There is an overlap between the statutory offence and the common law offence of outraging public decency.⁴⁴⁷ For further analysis of the latter see Ch 30.

17.9.4.2 Voyeurism

Section 67 creates an offence where A, for the purposes of sexual gratification,⁴⁴⁸ observes another person doing a ‘private act’ in the knowledge⁴⁴⁹ that the other person does not consent ⁴³⁹ This is one of the few offences in the 2003 Act that includes a reckless mens rea element.

⁴⁴⁰ See eg H [2007] EWCA Crim 2622. The offence is triable summarily or on indictment and has a maximum penalty of ten years. See Ch 25.

⁴⁴¹ [2016] EWCA Crim 569.

⁴⁴² eg Nicholson [2014] EWCA Crim 2710 (D on suicide watch in prison summoning women officers to watch him masturbate).

⁴⁴³ [2006] EWCA Crim 1801.

⁴⁴⁴ See also Whitton [2006] EWCA Crim 3229 (A masturbating and exposing himself to child pedestrians as he drove).

⁴⁴⁵ See eg Lindsky [2009] All ER (D) 263 (Nov) where A was convicted having been naked in his own garden.

⁴⁴⁶ The offence is triable summarily or on indictment with a maximum penalty of two years’ imprisonment.

⁴⁴⁷ In Hardy [2013] EWCA Crim 2125, the Court of Appeal observed that, since there exist no sentencing guidelines for the offence of outraging public decency, the guidelines applicable to s 66 could be relied upon instead.

⁴⁴⁸ In B [2012] EWCA Crim 770, it was held that the use in s 67(1)(b) of the terms ‘his’ and ‘he’ indicates that the purpose of the deliberate observation by A must be his own ‘sexual gratification’ and not someone else’s.

⁴⁴⁹ In B, this was interpreted as importing the requirement to prove actual knowledge that the other person does not consent to being deliberately observed for the specific purpose of A obtaining sexual gratification from that observation.

to being observed for that purpose. The Court of Appeal in *B*⁴⁵⁰ stated that the social mischief that the new offence of voyeurism was created to tackle is ‘the anti-social nature of deliberate observation by a person of another doing intimate acts in private, where the purpose of the observation is to obtain sexual gratification for the observer and, secondly, the fact that this activity has been linked to more serious offending behaviour by the observer’. The offence extends beyond simple peeping Toms looking through keyholes.⁴⁵¹ Subsection (2) creates an offence of A ‘operating equipment’ with the intention of enabling another person, C, for their sexual gratification, to observe B doing a ‘private act’ in the knowledge that B has not consented to this being done for another person’s sexual gratification. This provision was enacted in response to the numerous instances reported in the news of people setting up illicit cameras. In Vigon v DPP,⁴⁵² surreptitious viewing of customers changing into swimwear in a market stall cubicle was held capable of being ‘insulting behaviour’ for the purposes of s 5 of the Public Order Act 1986.⁴⁵³ The common law offence of outraging public decency was also prayed in aid when a defendant secretly filmed women urinating in a supermarket toilet. ‘Disgusting conduct’ was held to be that which fills an onlooker with loathing or extreme distaste or causes the onlooker extreme annoyance: Choi.⁴⁵⁴ That offence is considered in Ch 30, and it has been put to recent use in relation to conduct including ‘up skirting’ (filming illicitly up women’s skirts).⁴⁵⁵

The Law Commission in its report Public Nuisance and Outraging Public Decency (2015) recognized the continued value of that common law offence in relation to upskirting. It recommended creating a statutory form of the outraging public decency offence.⁴⁵⁶

Section 67(3) makes it an offence for a person A to record B doing a ‘private act’ with the intention that A or a third person will, for the purposes of sexual gratification, look at the recorded image, when it is known that B does not consent to being recorded for that purpose.⁴⁵⁷ Finally, s 67(4) creates an offence for a person to install equipment, or to construct or adapt a structure,⁴⁵⁸ with the intention of enabling himself, or another person, to commit an offence under s 67(1).⁴⁵⁹

For each of these offences a ‘private act’ is defined in s 68 as ‘an act done in a place and in circumstances where the person would reasonably expect privacy and either the person’s genitals, buttocks or female⁴⁶⁰ breasts are exposed or covered only by underwear,⁴⁶¹ or the person is using a lavatory or the person is doing a sexual act that is not of a kind ordinarily done in public’. There is much scope for judicial interpretation.⁴⁶²

⁴⁵⁰ [2012] EWCA Crim 770, [63].

⁴⁵¹ Or placing mirrors under changing room cubicles: Sayed [2009] EWCA Crim 1922.

⁴⁵² [1998] Crim LR 289, DC.

⁴⁵³ It was then sufficient that the defendant was aware that his conduct may be insulting, so there was no need to prove that he intended to insult the customer—it is no defence that he concealed the camera.

⁴⁵⁴ [1999] 8 Arch News 3.

⁴⁵⁵ See A Gillespie, ‘Upskirting and Down-Blouses: Voyeurism and the Law’ [2008] Crim LR 370 on whether a voyeurism-based offence such as that in New Zealand should be adopted here.

⁴⁵⁶ LC 358, paras 3.178–3.181.

⁴⁵⁷ See the case of Sippings [2008] EWCA Crim 46 where A had video-recorded from his kitchen window B, his neighbour’s teenage daughter, undressing in her bedroom when she left the curtains open.

⁴⁵⁸ ‘Structure’ includes ‘a tent, vehicle or vessel or other temporary or movable structure’.

⁴⁵⁹ The offence is triable summarily or on indictment with a maximum penalty of two years’ imprisonment.

⁴⁶⁰ See Bassett [2008] EWCA Crim 1174.

⁴⁶¹ See the Northern Ireland case of PSNI v MacRitchie [2008] NICA 26 holding that a bikini was not underwear when worn by B in a changing cubicle at the local swimming pool. A had sought to video her changing in her own cubicle while he remained in his.

⁴⁶² See the sentencing cases of Henderson [2006] EWCA Crim 198 (filming in public toilets); Turner [2006] EWCA Crim 63 (sports centre manager filming changing rooms); IP [2004] EWCA Crim 2646 (filming 24-year-old stepdaughter in shower); McCann [2006] EWCA Crim 1078 (surveillance camera hidden in neighbour’s bathroom).

The leading case is Bassett.⁴⁶³ A was convicted of voyeurism. He used a video camera hidden in a bag in men's changing rooms at a public swimming pool, to film B, a man, who was in the shower in his trunks. The showers were open to the general view of the changing room. A had 'observed' B for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, and B did not consent to that. The judge ruled that B was in a place in circumstances which would reasonably be expected to provide privacy. The Court of Appeal disagreed and allowed the appeal. The case is important in emphasizing the centrality of the privacy expectation element of the offence. A will escape liability even if he observes B in a state of nakedness, derives sexual gratification from doing so and lacks B's consent to being observed for the purpose of sexual gratification unless it is also proved that there is a reasonable expectation of privacy. The reason that no offence was committed in Bassett is that although it is possible to have a reasonable expectation of privacy without being wholly enclosed, there was no reasonable expectation of privacy in the circumstances. Hughes LJ remarked that it was 'normally inevitable' that users must expect to be observed unclothed by other users of public swimming pools and changing facilities in sports and leisure complexes. It is to be left to the jury to determine if there is reasonable expectation of privacy. In determining whether there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in the circumstances, the court suggests that there A's purpose may be relevant but it is 'the nature of the observation rather than the purpose of the observer which may be relevant to the expectation of privacy'.⁴⁶⁴ Presumably, then, a casual glance at B naked in the communal shower from which A derives a sexual thrill is not enough, but determined ogling might be, a fortiori if A starts filming. In the subsequent case of B,⁴⁶⁵ the Court of Appeal held that the use of the verb 'observes' connotes a deliberate decision on the part of A to look at someone doing a 'private act'. Aikens LJ stated, obiter, that this excludes both the careless and the reckless perception. It was also held that the question of whether A's purpose is sexual gratification entails an evaluation of his thought process; it is thus a subjective question. Whether A actually obtains sexual gratification is largely irrelevant, although it was observed that proof that he had would be evidence of the purpose of deliberate observation.

It is worth noting the position in relation to consent in such cases. It will not excuse A that B impliedly consented to being viewed in a state of nakedness in a place in which privacy would be expected if B has not consented to being observed for the purposes of sexual gratification.⁴⁶⁶

17.9.4.3 Bestiality

Section 69 creates an offence for A intentionally to penetrate the vagina⁴⁶⁷ or anus of a living animal with his penis where he knows or is reckless as to whether that is what he is penetrating.⁴⁶⁸ It also creates an offence for A intentionally to cause or allow her vagina or his or her anus to be penetrated by the penis of a living animal where he or she knows or is reckless as to whether it is the penis of a live animal that is penetrating him/her. Note also the offences of extreme pornography discussed in Ch 30.

⁴⁶³ [2008] EWCA Crim 1174.

⁴⁶⁴ At [11].

⁴⁶⁵ [2012] EWCA Crim 770.

⁴⁶⁶ See Sippings [2008] EWCA Crim 46 in which A pleaded guilty to observing from his kitchen window V (aged 14–19) over a five-year period when she was undressing in her bedroom in a neighbouring house with the lights on and the curtains open. Is there a reasonable expectation of privacy in a room with the lights on and curtains open?

⁴⁶⁷ The reference to vagina or anus in this context is further explained at s 79(9) and (10). References to 'vagina' include vulva and in relation to an animal, references to the vagina or anus include references to any similar part.

⁴⁶⁸ For criticisms of the offence, see I Jones, 'A Beastly Provision: Why the Offence of "Intercourse With an Animal" Must be Butchered' (2011) 75 J Crim L 75. NB Boyd [2013] EWCA Crim 2384 in which D had trained his dog to have sex with humans.

17.9.4.4 Necrophilia

Section 70 makes it an offence for A intentionally to penetrate sexually⁴⁶⁹ any part of the body of a dead person B with A's penis, any other body part or any other object, knowing or being reckless as to whether A is penetrating any part of a dead body.⁴⁷⁰ A commits no offence if B dies during intercourse unless A realizes and continues to penetrate B.⁴⁷¹ The penetration must be sexual but it remains unclear whether A must have any mens rea in relation to that element of the actus reus. As a matter of principle, that would be desirable.

17.9.4.5 Sexual activity in a public lavatory

Section 71 creates an offence for A to engage in sexual activity⁴⁷² in a public lavatory.⁴⁷³ There is no requirement that any person is alarmed or distressed by the activity. This is the only offence in the Act which is triable summarily only.⁴⁷⁴ Section 320 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 made the common law offence of 'outraging public decency' triable summarily as well as on indictment. The offence under s 71 is wider since there is no need for the act to have shocked, disgusted or revolted a member of the public.

17.10 Overarching problems with the 2003 Act

17.10.1 Undue complexity

In terms of technicality and complexity there are several problems with the Act.⁴⁷⁵ First, it takes 80 sections to set out the many new offences, and these often contain numerous sub-categories of offence. For example, many involve aggravated versions for penetrative acts, and since these are indictable only and carry a different sentence, following *Courtie*⁴⁷⁶ each represents a separate offence. Although it might be argued that it is better to have too many offences than too few in an area dealing with serious matters such as these, it is questionable whether tighter drafting and structure could have achieved adequate protection. This is not just a criticism levelled at the length of the Act; practical problems arise when there are too many charging options.⁴⁷⁷ It produces confusion and inhibits optimal development of case law, with no guarantee that similar conduct will be treated consistently by the CPS and by ⁴⁶⁹ Hence pathology staff will not commit the offence by penetrating the corpse with a finger or instrument for medical purposes.

⁴⁷⁰ The offence is triable summarily or on indictment and has a maximum penalty of two years. It could be charged in some extreme cases: eg Mark Dixie who claimed to have performed sex with the corpse of, but not to have killed, his victim: <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/england/london/7254628.stm>. He was convicted of murder.

⁴⁷¹ The offence is triable summarily or on indictment and has a maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment.

⁴⁷² An activity is sexual if a reasonable person would, in all the circumstances, but regardless of any person's purpose, consider it to be sexual.

⁴⁷³ 'Public lavatory' is defined as a lavatory to which the public or a section of the public has or is permitted to have access, whether on payment or otherwise. See C Ashford, 'Sexuality, Public Space and the Criminal Law: The Cottaging Phenomenon' (2007) 71 J Crim L 506.

⁴⁷⁴ It carries a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment or a fine.

⁴⁷⁵ See JR Spencer, 'The Drafting of Criminal Legislation: Need It Be So Impenetrable?' (2008) 67 CLJ 585.

⁴⁷⁶ [1984] AC 463.

⁴⁷⁷ See Grout [2011] EWCA Crim 299. In some instances, it would appear that the objective in including a new crime is to trigger the availability of possible sexual offender orders under Part 2 of the Act.

courts. Recognizing the extent of the options available to prosecutors, the CPS guidelines⁴⁷⁸ state that:

prosecutors should choose the most appropriate charge to fit the circumstances of the case, taking account of the courts' sentencing powers. As a general rule, where the circumstances of a case match a particular offence specified in the Act, that offence should be charged. For example section 25 (familial child sex offence) where the victim is 14 should be charged rather than section 9 (sexual activity with a child), so long as all the elements can be proved.

Parliament's decision to create so many offences is especially ironic given that the Sexual Offences Review was described as seeking to 'focus the law more sharply' and 'to abolish the unnecessary and useless offences which have accumulated over the years'.⁴⁷⁹

Secondly, the complexity is also exacerbated by the obsession with detail and with describing the manner in which the offence is committed rather than with the harm caused: whilst this shows commendable respect for the principles of fair labelling and maximum certainty, it creates confusion and density⁴⁸⁰ in the legislation which renders it less accessible than it ought to be.⁴⁸¹ An example of this detail can be seen in s 67 (voyeurism): A, for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, observes or records or enables another to observe (with equipment or otherwise) B doing a 'private act' knowing B does not consent to observation for that purpose. By s 68 'private acts' are those 'in a private structure in which one would expect privacy and B's genitals, buttocks or [female] breasts are exposed or covered only with underwear, or B is using the lavatory, or B is doing a sexual act not of a kind ordinarily done in public'. This obsession with exhaustive definition is sadly lacking in some of the key definitions of fundamental issues such as 'consent'.

Finally, the number of offences and the minute definition of many elements produce some glaring examples of incoherence. One of the most striking is that although a person can engage in sexual activity at 16, it is still illegal to have a sexual relationship with his carer until over 18, or to engage in sexual conduct with certain members of the extended family even though he could marry them. Similarly, whilst it is legal for A to have intercourse with B aged 16, consensually taking or possessing her nude photo will not be legal unless A is married to her, or living with her in an enduring family relationship.

17.10.2 Over-criminalization?

In addition to the volume and complexity of the offences, there are many examples of the Act providing what are arguably overbroad offences. One obvious example is s 62: 'committing an offence with intent to commit a sexual offence'. This contains no limitation to the types of offence and no requirement that the preliminary offence is directed at the person who will be the victim of the sex offence.⁴⁸² The offence has been used diversely to prosecute acts such as committing criminal damage with intent to commit a sexual offence where A wrote graffiti on trains inciting underage girls to text him for sex.⁴⁸³ Ironically, despite the ⁴⁷⁸ See CPS guidance at www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/rape-and-sexual-offences-chapter-17-sexual-offences-act-2003-principal-offences-and.

⁴⁷⁹ Temkin (2000) 150 NLJ 1169.

⁴⁸⁰ See the definition of foster siblings at s 27 for an example, p 814.

⁴⁸¹ Other memorable examples include the degree of detail in defining offences such as intercourse with an animal, where the Act goes so far as to extend the definition to the 'vagina or anus' to include references 'to any similar part' in animals—eg those functionally equivalent body parts in amphibians and crustaceans.

⁴⁸² A, 18, criminally damaging the condom machine to gain condoms to have consensual sex with B, 15, commits the offence.

⁴⁸³ Jones [2007] EWCA Crim 1118, p 803.

detail and number of other offences in the Act, this section has proved important in making up for the shortfalls in drafting elsewhere.⁴⁸⁴

A further argument that the Act over-criminalizes can be based on the jurisdictional reach of the offences. As amended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, many of the offences (including ss 1–4, 5–8, 10–19, 25, 26, 30–41) can be prosecuted in England and Wales even if performed abroad if the victim was under 18 and the offender is a UK national or UK resident.⁴⁸⁵ In the case of a UK national, it is no defence that the conduct was not criminal in the country in which it took place.

A further controversial aspect of the Act is the heavy reliance on strict liability in many contexts—most notably the offences committed against children under 13. There is, of course, a clear and legitimate objective in providing protection against sexual exploitation of young people. However, the criminal law should be reserved for the clearest cases of wrongdoing. The offences in relation to children impose strict liability as to age and can be committed irrespective of the age of the offender, his reasonable belief in the age of the victim or whether the acts were in a consensual or exploitative environment. Lord Millett's observations in the House of Lords only two years previously in K went unheeded: 'the age of consent has long ceased to reflect ordinary life, and in this respect Parliament has singularly failed to discharge its responsibility for keeping the criminal law in touch with the needs of society'.⁴⁸⁶

Some of the offences introduced demonstrate the clashes of principle which arise when criminal law seeks to regulate activities such as sexual behaviour. Examples include the difficulty in providing adequate protection for children and those with learning or mental disability without denying them an opportunity to express their sexual behaviour in non-exploitative relationships. The government claimed that it was not seeking to prosecute consensual conduct between youths that was not previously prosecuted. Given that the 2003 Act criminalizes a broader range of consensual sexual activities (eg watching sexual activity), this is doubtful. Moreover, even if the new offences were no broader and not prosecuted more frequently, this is not an adequate justification for creation of offences criminalizing consensual sexual activity (short of penetration) between minors and carrying a maximum of 14 years. The Act is supposed to modernize the law and to reflect the sexual mores of the twenty-first century. Implementing broad offences in the context of sexual conduct also poses a danger of sending conflicting messages to young members of society. In general, the new Act seeks to encourage and re-educate people about the significance of respecting the autonomy of individuals by obtaining their consent.⁴⁸⁷ But with children under 16 that message may be undermined by a starker one—even if you do act responsibly and seek and gain consent in your sexual experimentation you will still commit a serious offence.

Parliament received repeated ministerial assurances that the volume, strictness and breadth of the offences would not lead to over-criminalization in practice because the CPS

⁴⁸⁴ See the importance of this as noted by Woolf LCJ in H, p 783 and its use for kidnap cases, eg Royle [2005] EWCA Crim 279 (D kidnapped V at roadside and forced her to undress, she then escaped).

⁴⁸⁵ Section 72 as amended by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008.

⁴⁸⁶ [2001] UKHL 41, [44]. On the House of Lords' approach to strict liability and age in sexual offences, see J Horder, 'How Culpability Can and Can't be Denied in Under Age Sex Crimes' [2001] Crim LR 15. See also A Ashworth, Positive Obligations in Criminal Law (2013) 120–122.

⁴⁸⁷ On the criminal law's role in facilitating conditions in which autonomy can be promoted, see N Lacey, Unspeakable Subjects (1998) 151. Rubenfeld argues that rape should not be conceptualized as a violation of sexual autonomy and in fact it is a 'red herring'. He argues that a better approach is to compare rape to slavery and torture, which are violations of an individual's fundamental right to self-possession. See J Rubenfeld, 'The Riddle of Rape-by-Deception and the Myth of Sexual Autonomy' (2013) 122 Yale LJ 1372. For a defence of autonomy, see J Herring, 'Rape and the Definition of Consent' (2014) 26 NLSI Rev 62.

would exercise their discretion not to prosecute.⁴⁸⁸ Aside from the fact that the Act leaves some very hard decisions to be made, in terms of principle, it is undesirable that such significant issues are a matter of discretion, not law. As the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights observed in the Twelfth Report.

Creating catch all offences and then relying on the prosecutor's discretion to sort things out satisfactorily undermines [the rule of law]. It leaves prosecutors to do the job that Parliament should be doing, and gives them discretion to prosecute (or not to prosecute) people who ought never to have been within the scope of criminal liability in the first place.⁴⁸⁹

Another unfortunate feature of the Act is that it perpetuates the growing trend of creating 'quasi-crimes'—civil orders that are backed by a criminal sanction for breach. These have become a common feature—Criminal Behaviour Orders, Football Banning Orders, exclusion orders, etc—and they pose many problems.⁴⁹⁰ The 2003 Act introduced new orders including FTOs (Foreign Travel Orders), SHPOs (Sexual Harm Prevention Orders, as they are now) and RSHOs (Risk of Sexual Harm Orders).⁴⁹¹

17.10.3 ECHR issues

In ECHR terms, the Act is only a partial success. Although succeeding in removing several incompatible offences (gross indecency, buggery, etc), it creates new problems of ECHR incompatibility. One of the most obvious and heavily criticized examples is the criminalization of sexual conduct between consenting children, particularly those aged 13 to 16.⁴⁹² The Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights⁴⁹³ suggested that some sections of the Act were overbroad in criminalizing all sexual touching between children. The decision of the House of Lords in G is disappointing.

⁴⁸⁸ The CPS policy is available from www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/rape-and-sexual-offences.

⁴⁸⁹ Para 2.11.

⁴⁹⁰ See generally A Ashworth, 'Social Control and Anti-Social Behaviour: The Subversion of Human Rights?' (2004) 120 LQR 263.

⁴⁹¹ See S Shute, 'New Civil Preventative Orders: Sexual Offences Prevention Orders; Foreign Travel Orders; Risk of Sexual Harm Orders' [2004] Crim LR 417. In relation to England and Wales, the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, s 113 and Sch 5 abolished these orders and replaced them with 'Sexual Harm Prevention Orders' and 'Sexual Risk Orders' from 8 Mar 2015.

⁴⁹² See G discussed earlier. Laskey v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 39; Sutherland v UK (1997) 24 EHRR CD22; note also the Northern Irish case of S [2006] NICA 34 in which the Court of Criminal Appeal concluded that A lacked status as a victim and inclined to the view that the offence was justifiable to protect young girls from themselves.

⁴⁹³ Twelfth Report, 2002–3, Scrutiny of Bills: Further Progress Report, 2003 (HL 119; HC 765).

18

Theft

18.1 Interpreting the Theft Acts

The law governing dishonesty-related offences is to be found in the Theft Acts 1968 and 1978, the Theft (Amendment) Act 1996 and the Fraud Act 2006.¹ These Acts are not a restatement of the common law and its numerous statutory additions. They provide a code of the most important offences of dishonest dealing with the protection of property (with the notable exceptions of forgery and the common law offence of conspiracy to defraud), based on a fundamental reconsideration of the principles by the Criminal Law Revision Committee (CLRC)² and the Law Commission.³

The law of theft is concerned with infringements against the proprietary interests of others but the law of property is not to be found explained in any detailed fashion in the Theft Acts. It is a matter of civil law. The Theft Acts assume its existence. The criminal courts, including the appellate courts, have sometimes shown impatience with arguments based on ‘the finer distinctions in civil law’,⁴ but many of the fundamental issues of criminal liability turn on these civil law concepts. For example, whether property ‘belongs to another’ for the purposes of theft ‘is a question to which the criminal law offers no answer and which can only be answered by reference to civil law principles’.⁵ Equally, the Acts provide no definition of what constitutes ‘a proprietary right or interest’ for the purposes of s 5 of the 1968 Act. Theft offences sometimes necessarily involve consideration of ‘the finer distinctions in civil law’.⁶ It follows, of course, that changes in the civil law may affect the scope of the criminal law.⁷ The Acts, by protecting property rights per se, also serve to protect the vitally important mechanisms for creating and exchanging property rights.⁸

Unfortunately, the interpretation of the Theft Acts has produced a great deal of complex case law. In interpreting the Acts, the courts have usually aimed to give words and

¹ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft; Griew, Theft; Smith, Property Offences; for a more theoretical analysis, see Green, 13 Ways.

² Eighth Report, para 7. And see Thirteenth Report (1977) Cmnd 6733.

³ See especially LC 276, Fraud (2002).

⁴ Baxter [1971] 2 All ER 359 at 363, CA; Morris [1984] AC 320, HL.

⁵ Dobson v General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp’n plc [1989] 3 All ER 927 at 937, CA, per Bingham LJ.

⁶ See Shadrokh-Cigari [1988] Crim LR 465, CA, p 865; Wheeler (1990) 92 Cr App R 279, CA, p 843. See also JC Smith, ‘Civil Law Concepts in the Criminal Law’ (1972B) 31 CLJ 197; GR Williams, ‘Theft, Consent and Illegality’ [1977] Crim LR 127 and 205; G Treitel, ‘Contract and Crime’ in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 81.

⁷ See discussion of Floyd v DPP, p 860.

⁸ See A Simester and GR Sullivan, ‘On the Nature and Rationale of Property Offences’ in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 173–183.

expressions their ordinary meaning so as to avoid undue technicality and subtlety. This is a sensible approach, but it has led to the practice of leaving the interpretation of 'ordinary' words and expressions to the jury.⁹ The interpretation, even of ordinary words, must sometimes be a matter for the court to maintain respect for the rule of law and to ensure certainty, consistency and clarity in the definition and interpretation of the law. To leave interpretation in the hands of the juries (or more frequently the magistrates) is to risk their taking different views on indistinguishable facts. Even such ordinary words in the Theft Act as 'dishonesty', 'force', 'building', etc may involve definitional problems on which a jury may require guidance if like is to be treated as like. This poses potential problems of compatibility with Art 7 of the ECHR which protects against retrospective criminalization, and includes a requirement that crimes are defined with sufficient certainty and predictability.

One final aspect of the interpretation of the Theft Acts should also be emphasized from the outset. The appellate courts have demonstrated a distinct willingness to uphold the convictions of those found to have been dishonest even though there are fundamental errors with the conviction in other respects.¹⁰ This has not generated the level of clarity and certainty of principle in the law that is desirable. In addition, such an approach places a degree of emphasis on the concept of dishonesty, which as we shall see, it is ill-suited to bear.¹¹ The Supreme Court has recently endorsed a new approach to the interpretation of the concept of dishonesty. We consider that in detail later and the extent to which it may have an impact in practice.

The offence of theft is an extremely broad one as will soon be appreciated. In an empirical study Green and Kugler questioned the merits of having such a broad single offence which fails to distinguish the different harms and wrongs involved in various activities which all result in the same outcome—D acquiring V's property.¹² In Green's most recent work, he uses this empirical data to argue that the law of theft took a wrong turn with the enactment of the 1968 Act. Green's thesis is that abolishing the array of common law offences and replacing them with a single offence of theft fails to capture the gradations of moral culpability inherent in different kinds of conduct.¹³

18.2 The offence of theft

By s 1(1) of the Theft Act 1968:

A person is guilty of theft if he dishonestly appropriates property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it; and 'thief' and 'steal' shall be construed accordingly.

⁹ See G Williams, 'Law and Fact' [1976] Crim LR 472; DW Elliott, 'Law and Fact in Theft Act Cases' [1976] Crim LR 707. See also Brutus v Cozens [1973] AC 854, cf Chandler v DPP [1964] AC 763, HL and DW Elliott, 'Brutus v Cozens, Decline and Fall' [1989] Crim LR 323.

¹⁰ See eg Lord Steyn in Hinks, at 844, discussed at p 834.

¹¹ See further Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 1.

¹² The study involved students ranking relative blameworthiness of D acquiring V's bike by theft, robbery, embezzlement, fraud, burglary, blackmail, etc. See SP Green and M Kugler, 'Community Perceptions of Theft Seriousness: A Challenge to Model Penal Code and English Theft Act Consolidation' (2010) 7 J Empirical Legal Studies 511.

¹³ Green, 13 Ways, Ch 1.

The maximum sentence is now seven years (s 7) on indictment.¹⁴ The Sentencing Council has produced revised guidance.¹⁵

The vast majority of thefts can be dealt with without further difficulty by applying the straightforward meaning of the terms in the section. This is worth emphasizing before turning to detailed consideration of the elements of the offence.

18.3 Actus reus

The actus reus of theft consists: (a) in the appropriation of (b) property (c) belonging to another.

18.3.1 Appropriation

By s 3 of the Theft Act 1968:

- (1) Any assumption by a person of the rights of an owner amounts to an appropriation, and this includes, where he has come by the property (innocently or not) without stealing it, any later assumption of a right to it by keeping or dealing with it as owner.
- (2) Where property, or a right or interest in property is or purports to be transferred for value to a person acting in good faith, no later assumption by him of rights which he believed himself to be acquiring shall, by reason of any defect in the transferor's title, amount to theft of the property.

The CLRC did not provide a full definition of 'appropriation'¹⁶ because they rather optimistically¹⁷ assumed that people would realize that it was simply a different label for what they saw as the 'familiar concept of [the tort of] conversion . . .'.¹⁸ Appropriation was preferred because it aptly describes the kind of conduct in question and was felt broad enough to describe various types of conduct that had been separate offences under the previous law.¹⁹

Three basic problems in interpreting 'appropriation' have arisen, each having a significant impact on the scope of the offence:

- (1) Is there an appropriation if D assumes only a right of the owner, not all the rights of that owner?
- (2) Can D 'assume' rights when the alleged assumption is an act done with the consent of the owner?

¹⁴ Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 26. Originally it was ten years, but few people ever received sentences over seven years, although there were even some theft sentences as high as the maximum. We are grateful to Simon Price for pointing this out. Section 22A of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, added by the Anti-social Behaviour, Crime and Policing Act 2014, s 176, as amended by the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, s 52 provides that low-value shoplifting (goods not in excess of £200 in value) will be triable only summarily unless the defendant is 18 or over and elects trial in the Crown Court. For discussion of this provision, see Maxwell [2017] EWCA Crim 1233, [2018] Crim LR 60. Under the Penalties for Disorderly Behaviour (Amount of Penalty) Order 2002, SI 2002/1837 (as amended), a fixed penalty may be awarded.

¹⁵ The guidelines will apply to the full range of theft offences, such as shop theft, pick-pocketing, handling stolen goods, stealing by employees or care workers, and abstraction of electricity. These came effect on 1 Feb 2016, see www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/publications/item/theft-offences-definitive-guideline/.

¹⁶ For early comment on this element, see L Koffman, 'The Nature of Appropriation' [1982] Crim LR 331; D Stuart, 'Reform of the Law of Theft' (1967) 30 MLR 609.

¹⁷ 'Conversion' is a complex tort and not even all criminal lawyers have a full understanding of the concept. See A Dugdale, M Jones and M Simpson (eds), Clerk and Lindsell on Torts (22nd edn, 2017) Ch 17.

¹⁸ Eighth Report, para 34.

¹⁹ Larceny, embezzlement, conversion.

- (3) Can there be an appropriation when the effect is that the entire proprietary interest in the thing then belongs indefeasibly to the alleged thief?

Controversially, all three questions were answered in the affirmative by the House of Lords: the first two in Gomez,²⁰ and the third in Hinks.²¹

18.3.1.1 Assumption of 'a' right: Morris

The section requires an assumption of 'the rights of an owner' which seems prima facie to mean all the rights, not one, or some, of the rights of the owner in question. But in Morris Lord Roskill nevertheless held that it is an appropriation if D assumes a single right. But surely, if D assumes a right to the thing, he treats it as his, something in which he owns all the rights. It is hard to see how a reference to 'rights' can point to a conclusion that the assumption of 'a right' is sufficient, but that is now the law.

Many think Lord Roskill's conclusion was obviously wrong,²² but it formed an element in the ratio decidendi of Morris. It was endorsed by the House of Lords in Gomez. We must take it that the law is settled: any assumption of any of the rights of an owner amounts to an appropriation. This extends the scope of the offence so that D's acts, which might naturally be regarded as mere preparation or attempts because they involve the assumption of a single right, constitute the actus reus of the full offence.

Morris was concerned with a formerly common scenario where D switches the labels on two articles displayed on the shelves of a supermarket with the intention of buying the more expensive article for the price of the less expensive one. The right to label the goods is a right of the owner, so the label-switching amounted to an appropriation and theft. D, of course, intended to deceive the cashier and to obtain the goods by deception.²³ On the interpretation in Morris, D has appropriated the goods as soon as he switches the label even if D abandons the venture and leaves the goods with the switched labels safely on the shelf. It is important to remember that on these facts, to be guilty of theft D must be shown to have mens rea—the intention permanently to deprive and dishonesty; there would not necessarily be a completed theft where D moves articles in a supermarket as a prank or protest.

18.3.1.2 Appropriation with consent: Gomez

Section 3 is not drafted in terms of requiring a 'misappropriation'. In Morris, Lord Roskill, for a unanimous House, said, 'In the context of s 3(1), the concept of appropriation involves not an act expressly or impliedly authorized by the owner but an act by way of adverse interference with or usurpation of those rights.'²⁴ This, however, was obiter, because the label-switching was plainly unauthorized by the shop and there was no need to say anything about authorized acts. In Gomez, the House held that the Lord Roskill's dictum was wrong: there can be an appropriation even if D acts with V's consent in relation to the property.

²⁰ [1993] AC 442, HL, [1993] Crim LR 304 and commentary. On which see also M Davies, 'Consent after the House of Lords: Taking and Leading Astray the House of Lords' (1993) 13 LS 308; S Cooper and M Allen, 'Appropriation After Gomez' (1993) 57 J Crim L 186.

²¹ [2000] 4 All ER 833. On which see especially: JC Smith [2001] Crim LR 162; ATH Smith, 'Theft or Sharp Practice: Who Cares Now?' (2001) 60 CLJ 21; J Beatson and A Simester, 'Stealing One's Own Property' (1999) 115 LQR 372; S Shute, 'Appropriation and the Law of Theft' [2002] Crim LR 445.

²² See E Melissaris, 'The Concept of Appropriation and the Offence of Theft' (2007) 70 MLR 581 for support of the decision.

²³ At that time probably an offence under s 15 of the 1968 Act, and now an offence of making a false representation under ss 1 and 2 of the Fraud Act 2006.

²⁴ [1983] 3 All ER at 292. See LH Leigh, 'Some Remarks on Appropriation in the Law of Theft after Morris' (1985) 48 MLR 167.

Gomez followed an earlier House of Lords decision in Lawrence,²⁵ in which D, a taxi driver, was convicted of stealing from V, an Italian who spoke little English. V showed D a note bearing an address and tendered £1 to be taken there. The authorized fare was about 50p but D indicated that £1 was not enough and took from V's still open wallet a £1 note and a £5 note. V permitted him to do so. D was convicted of theft. On appeal D argued that he took the money with V's consent. This was rejected. One of the questions certified for the House was whether the offence of theft was to be construed as if it contained the words 'without the consent of the owner'. The answer was, rightly, an emphatic 'no'. The definition of theft was based on certain offences in the Larceny Act 1916 which had been replaced by the Theft Act.²⁶ Those offences did not include the phrase, 'without the consent of the owner' and it had never been suggested that someone acting with consent could be guilty of those offences. The CLRC intended no change in the law in that respect when it drafted the Theft Act.

Gomez, the assistant manager of a shop, persuaded the manager to sell goods to the value of £17,000 to his accomplice, X, and to accept payment by two cheques. The cheques, as Gomez and X knew, were stolen and worthless. They should have been charged with obtaining the goods by deception, contrary to s 15 of the 1968 Act;²⁷ but, for some reason, they were charged with theft. The Court of Appeal, following Morris, quashed their convictions.²⁸ The court declined to follow Dobson v General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp'n plc,²⁹ a decision of the Civil Division, which applied Lawrence. In Dobson, the plaintiff had been deceived by a rogue, R, into accepting a worthless cheque when selling his expensive watch and ring. Dobson brought an action in civil law to recover from his insurers the value of the watch and ring. The policy covered only loss by theft. It was not enough for Dobson to prove (this being a civil case) that his property had been obtained by deception (as it undoubtedly had). The insurers argued that there was no theft.³⁰ Parker LJ held that the making of the contract over the phone days before the delivery constituted the act of appropriation—it was an assumption of ownership by R.³¹ There was an appropriation even if Dobson had consented to R's conduct.

The House of Lords in Gomez, relying heavily on the judgment of Parker LJ in Dobson, restored the convictions holding that, on the issue of the effect of consent, Lawrence and Morris were irreconcilable. The proposition in Lawrence was ratio decidendi, that in Morris an obiter dictum: Lawrence prevailed.

18.3.1.3 Theft where consent is given without deception by D

The point of law of general importance certified for the decision of the House in Gomez was whether there is an appropriation where 'consent has been obtained by a false representation', as occurred in that case. It was not necessary for the House to go beyond that and ²⁵ [1972] AC 626, HL. For defence of Lawrence on pragmatic grounds, see P Glazebrook, 'Thief or Swindler: Who Cares?' (1991) 50 CLJ 389.

²⁶ The offences of fraudulent conversion and larceny by a bailee. On the value of these distinct offences, see A Steele, 'Taking Possession: The Defining Element of Theft?' (2008) 32 Melbourne University L Rev 1030.

²⁷ It would now be a straightforward case under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006.

²⁸ For consideration of when ownership passed, see R Heaton, 'Deceiving without Thieving' [2001] Crim LR 712.

²⁹ [1990] 1 QB 274.

³⁰ Ownership passed when a contract of sale was made over the telephone two days before delivery so that R, when he collected the goods, was taking delivery of his own property.

³¹ On the insurance implications of the definition of theft generally, see M Wasik, 'Definitions of Crimes in Insurance Contracts' [1986] J Bus Law 45.

consider cases in which no deception was involved.³² Nevertheless, the House chose to confirm explicitly that there could be an appropriation even where D has practised no deception on V. This was illustrated by their example of a label-switcher in the supermarket. Their lordships were in no doubt that D in that scenario appropriates property when he touches the article on the shelf, although he has, as yet, practised no deception.³³

The conclusion in Gomez that an appropriation can occur with the owner's consent, irrespective of that consent being induced by deception, is further illustrated by the overruling of Fritschy.³⁴ The owner of some Krugerrands (a South African gold coin with a portrait of President Kruger on the obverse) instructed Fritschy to take them to Switzerland, F did so and then took them for himself as he planned all along. Since everything F did in England was with the consent of the owner, F committed no appropriation and therefore no theft within the jurisdiction. The House of Lords in Gomez held that that was wrong. Fritschy committed theft the moment he first got his hands on the property in England with intent to steal it, although there was no finding of any deception.

Gomez also overruled Skipp.³⁵ There D, 'posing as a genuine haulage contractor' (presumably that was itself an operative deception), collected three loads from different places in London with instructions to deliver them in Leicester. D deviated from the route to Leicester and transferred the goods to an accomplice, as he had planned all along. The court held that though D may have had mens rea—a dishonest intention permanently to deprive at the time he received each of the three loads—he had done nothing inconsistent with the rights of the owners until he diverted the goods from their proper destination. According to the court in Skipp, that was the point at which D stole. Since Gomez it is now clear that he committed three thefts, one when he collected each load.³⁶

18.3.1.4 Appropriation of indefeasible title to property: Hinks

It was argued that despite the incredible breadth of the concept of appropriation as interpreted in Gomez, there remained one necessary limitation to that concept. In all the decided cases, any proprietary right acquired by D's appropriation was voidable:³⁷ the owner was entitled to rescind the transaction and get his property back. Following Gomez these appropriations could nevertheless constitute theft. In contrast, where D gets an absolute, indefeasible right to the property, he has the right to retain the property. It was thought by some to be unacceptable—impossible even—for a criminal court to hold that a transaction which resulted in D obtaining such a right amounted to a theft of the property by him. If D has a right to retain the property, or even to recover it from the alleged victim, it could hardly be ³² There was powerful, though, it is submitted, mistaken, academic support suggesting that there can be an appropriation where the consent was by a false representation. See G Williams, 'Theft and Voidable Title' [1981] Crim LR 666, and see the reply by JC Smith at [1981] Crim LR 677. See also a letter by GV Hart [1982] Crim LR 391.

³³ Arguably he commits the general fraud offence contrary to s 1(2)(a) and s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006 in relation to both items as soon as he switches the labels. There is a false representation as to the more expensive item and by that representation D intends to cause loss to the shopkeeper. The cheaper item is now falsely represented to have a higher price. If D's intent is that X will pay that amount for it he intends to cause loss to X; if it is his intent that no one will, but it remains at its inflated price, he commits fraud against the shopkeeper because he intends the keeper to be exposed to the risk of loss on the sale of that item.

³⁴ [1985] Crim LR 745. A charge of obtaining property by deception was withdrawn from the jury.

³⁵ [1975] Crim LR 114.

³⁶ Each theft being also an offence of obtaining property by deception which existed at that time.

³⁷ Where one party to a transaction is acting under a fundamental mistake the transaction is void and no property passes. Where, in contrast, the party is acting under a non-fundamental mistake, the transaction is voidable and property does pass.

held to be theft for him to take and keep it.³⁸ This argument underestimated the determination of some judges including, as it happened, a majority of a particular committee of the House of Lords, to uphold convictions of those found by a jury to be dishonest.

In each of a series of three cases, D received a substantial gift from V, a person of a vulnerable mental state, over whom D had acquired some influence. In each case V was of sufficient mental capacity in law to make a gift of property.³⁹ On those facts in civil law, in each case there was a valid gift to D.⁴⁰ The Court of Appeal adopted different approaches but in the last of the three, Hinks,⁴¹ the Court of Appeal held that it was immaterial whether there was a valid gift; the only question was whether D, the recipient of the gift, was dishonest—and the jury had found that she was. The House, Lords Hutton and Hobhouse dissenting, upheld the conviction.

The conduct of the accused in all these cases was despicable.⁴² They were, as the jury must have found in each case, dishonestly taking an unfair advantage of a person with failing mental powers. If the donors were mentally incapable of making a valid gift owing to their diminished mental capacity, the cases were unanswerable. But the prosecutions were not made on the basis that the victims lacked mental capacity to make decisions to give their property away. We must assume they were capable and had done so. It should be reiterated at this point that the offence of theft was drafted with the purpose of protecting property rights, not protecting against exploitation per se.⁴³ Farmer has recently suggested that the aims of property offences have not shifted. Rather than protecting property rights ‘as defined in the civil law’, the key concern is now to protect ‘the interests of the vulnerable against conduct which poses a threat to the security of property and the securing of confidence in institutions such as the market in which property is transferred’.⁴⁴ With the advent of the fraud offence of abusing a position of financial trust,⁴⁵ which is explicitly designed to criminalize exploitative dishonest conduct, there is a yet stronger argument that the courts should reconsider the actus reus of theft to return it to acceptable limits based on the protection of property rights.⁴⁶

The result of the decision of the House of Lords in Hinks is that the recipient of a valid gift may now be guilty of stealing it—provided that a jury is satisfied that his mind was dishonest in the sense to be considered later. As Professor Smith commented, ‘At its outer reaches ³⁸ If it were theft by D, the civil law would be assisting D to enjoy, or to recover, the fruits of his crime by providing protection through the law relating to conversion!

³⁹ The gift might, in civil law, have been voidable because of the exercise of undue influence by D, but the juries were not asked to consider that question, so we must take it that it was not.

⁴⁰ For the argument that it is difficult to determine with certainty whether the civil law would in fact provide a remedy in circumstances such as these, see SP Green, ‘Theft and Conversion—Tangibly Different?’ (2012) 128 LQR 564.

⁴¹ [1998] Crim LR 904. The court derived ‘some comfort’ from Simon Gardner’s article, ‘Property and Theft’ [1998] Crim LR 35.

⁴² All would now likely be guilty of the offence of fraud under s 4 of the Fraud Act 2006.

⁴³ cf AL Bogg and J Stanton-Ife, ‘Protecting the Vulnerable: Legality, Harm and Theft’ (2003) 23 LS 402. See also S Shute, ‘Appropriation and the Law of Theft’ [2002] Crim LR 445. Green also defends the decisions of the House of Lords in Lawrence, Gomez and Hinks. Green relies extensively upon Peter Westen’s work on consent to argue that the victims in these three cases did not truly consent to the taking of their property. He uses the cases to illuminate the role that lack of consent plays in defining the moral content of theft crimes. See Green, 13 Ways, 105–108.

⁴⁴ L Farmer, Making the Modern Criminal Law: Civil Order and Criminalization (2016) 223.

⁴⁵ See p 959.

⁴⁶ It has been argued that it is wrong to assume that a general fraud offence is fit for the purpose of penalizing exploitation. See J Collins, ‘Exploitation of Persons and the Limits of the Criminal Law’ [2017] Crim LR 169.

theft becomes something akin to “thought crime”.⁴⁷ Aside from creating an astonishingly broad offence of theft, this creates numerous problems.

First, although there is a theft there are sometimes no stolen goods because the donor never has any right to restitution:⁴⁸ the property belongs absolutely to D for ever.

Secondly, there is the problem of the relationship between civil and criminal law.⁴⁹ There are principled arguments for the criminal law not extending beyond the civil law, in particular in the area of theft where the criminal law is necessarily developed on the foundations of civil law concepts of property, ownership, etc. The majority of the House in Hinks acknowledged, with surprising equanimity, that their decision creates a conflict between the civil and the criminal law. D who has V’s consent to appropriate the property will commit no civil law wrong and, indeed, will be able to rely on the civil law to enforce the transfer of property, but will be exposed to prosecution for theft. In Hinks, Lord Steyn states, however, that ‘it would be wrong to assume on a priori grounds that the criminal law rather than the civil law is defective’ in creating this conflict. If we were constructing a new code of civil and criminal law, it would certainly be open to the legislator to prefer a principle of the criminal law to one of the civil law, but that is not the position. The Theft Acts assume the existence of the civil law of property rights and the criminal courts are, or should be, bound to take it as they find it.

The implications of the decision are significant. Suppose that D is selling a painting of Salisbury Cathedral. V becomes very excited on seeing the painting and, thinking he is about to get a bargain, offers D £100,000 for it. D realizes that V thinks the painting is by Constable, but D knows that it was painted by his sister and is worth no more than £100. He accepts V’s offer. D has made an enforceable contract and he is entitled to recover and to retain the money.⁵⁰ Similarly, if a buyer, D2, knew that a picture was in fact by Constable and bought it for a very small sum from a seller, V2, who, as D2 was aware, did not know its provenance, a jury might well regard the conduct in these examples as dishonest—and, of course, V would not have consented in either case, had he known the true facts. The effect of Hinks is that if the jury is satisfied that these defendants were dishonest, they are guilty of stealing the property—property to which they are absolutely entitled in civil law.

A third problem with the decision in Hinks is with the requirement that at the time of appropriation there must be property belonging to another. In the trilogy of cases Mazo, Hopkins and Kendrick and Hinks, the property belonged to the donor, V, until the instant when the dishonest act of receiving the gift (appropriation) was done. D’s acquisition of the ⁴⁷ ‘Theft or Sharp Practice Who Cares Now?’ (2001) 60 CLJ 21, 22. For a view that even after Hinks the argument is still open that a valid gift cannot be dishonest, see Arlidge and Parry on Fraud (5th edn, 2016) paras 2.035 and 2.049.

⁴⁸ See s 24(3) of the Theft Act 1968, p 1036. Assuming a valid gift, the goods were never out of lawful custody or possession and the donor never had a right to restitution. Hinks was ordered to pay £19,000 compensation to Dolphin. Compensation for what? For keeping a gift which she was entitled to keep? The jury’s verdict did not decide that she did not have an indefeasible title to the property. Was the judge entitled to decide that her title was defeasible?—for misrepresentation, undue influence, or what? Could Hinks have an argument that the order was contrary to her right to peaceful enjoyment of her possessions under Art 1, Protocol 1 to the ECHR?

⁴⁹ See on this more generally: Smith (1972B) 31 CLJ 197; Williams [1977] Crim LR 127 and 205; ATH Smith, ‘Gifts and the Law of Theft’ (1999) 58 CLJ 10.

⁵⁰ cf Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597 (sale of oats enforceable by seller although he knew that the buyer thought they were old oats, new oats being useless to him, and that the oats were in fact new). Another example may be the case where a finder has in law a better right to the thing found than the landowner: p 857. However dishonest the finder may be, he should not be guilty of theft by appropriating that which the law says he may appropriate.

entire proprietary interest and the appropriation were simultaneous. If, however, D acquires the entire interest first and then, after an interval, does the act alleged to be an appropriation, it seems he cannot, even after Hinks, be guilty: he has not then appropriated property belonging to another—it is already his.⁵¹ For example, consider a case where V, infatuated by a wealthy man, D, sends a valuable gift to D's house where it arrives while D is absent abroad. When D comes home, he treats it as his own—which it is. However dishonest a jury might think his conduct at that point in time, this cannot be theft. The property is already D's.

18.3.1.5 The consequences of the House of Lords' interpretation of appropriation

In the trilogy of cases—Morris, Gomez and Hinks—the House has adopted an interpretation of appropriation at odds with that intended and with very significant ramifications.⁵²

Overextending the scope of the offence

The effect of the overbroad reading of the element of appropriation is to render the offence of theft an extraordinarily wide one, embracing conduct which would more naturally be regarded as merely preparatory acts, not even amounting to an attempt to steal. Where V is the absolute owner of property, the general principle in civil law is that only he has any right to do anything to or with it. Anyone else who does anything to or with it is therefore exercising a right of the owner. If V has consented to or authorized the exercise of that right by D we would not, it is submitted, ordinarily describe that exercise as an 'assumption' or 'appropriation'; but, since it has been decided that consent and authority are immaterial, it is both. And since the assumption of any one of the owner's rights in the property is an appropriation of the property itself, this amounts to theft if done dishonestly and with an intention permanently to deprive.

Theft might now be defined as follows:

Anyone doing anything whatever to property belonging to another, with or without his consent, appropriates it; and, if he does so dishonestly and with intent by that, or any subsequent act, permanently to deprive, he commits theft.

Prosecutors may, as a result of the broad interpretation, find it easier to secure convictions for theft in most cases, but problems may arise in identifying the precise time and place of the act which constitutes the appropriation. Astonishing though it may sound, despite the incredible breadth of the offence as currently interpreted, prosecutors may well be advised to prefer the offence of fraud in many cases since that is even wider and requires no proof of loss, gain, appropriation or intention permanently to deprive.⁵³ It is obvious that the combination of the interpretation of theft and the offences of fraud provide English criminal law with some of the most wide-reaching dishonesty offences imaginable.

⁵¹ See Lord Hobhouse at [2000] 4 All ER 855f–g.

⁵² E Meliassaris, 'The Concept of Appropriation and the Offence of Theft' (2007) 70 MLR 581 has suggested that appropriation should be understood as occurring only when D develops a 'proprietary subjectivity' for the property, ie thinks of the property as his own. This might produce results which are as unpalatable as under the present law. Eg in Fritschy, as with other bailments, appropriation may be at the time of taking physical control of the goods even if within the terms of the bailment. The donee of a gift could, on this test, be held to have appropriated it, as in Hinks. See also on the interpretation of appropriation, N Weinrich, 'German Cures For English Ailments? Appropriation Versus Taking Away—Significance and Consequences of Conceptual Differences Between the English and the German Law of Theft' (2005) 69 J Crim L 427.

⁵³ See Ch 22.

Overemphasis on mens rea

By reducing the actus reus almost to vanishing point, theft becomes (too) dependent on mens rea, placing additional emphasis on dishonesty. It loses what Fletcher would describe as its 'manifest criminality'.⁵⁴ It should be noted that a minority of academics welcomed this shift. For example, Gardner regarded the decision in Gomez as 'unimpeachable' in following the decision in Lawrence, and 'desirable from first principles . . . [since] the quality of the dishonest conduct is not necessarily altered by the victim's consent'.⁵⁵

The overlap with obtaining property by deception under s 15

The effect of Gomez was that virtually⁵⁶ all offences of obtaining property by deception contrary to s 15 were also theft (except obtaining land, which, the Act provides, cannot be stolen). The creation of this degree of overlap made life much easier for prosecutors, but was not what the Act's drafters intended,⁵⁷ which was to maintain a difference between offences of obtaining ownership by deception and theft.⁵⁸

The distinction between obtaining possession of property and obtaining outright ownership had troubled the courts for years. The old law had separate offences: one to deal with cases where D by deception caused V to transfer possession (larceny by trick) and one where D by deception caused V to transfer ownership (obtaining by false pretences).⁵⁹ The two offences were complex in application but generally thought to be mutually exclusive.⁶⁰

The CLRC, when drafting the Theft Act, decided to create an offence of obtaining property by deception (s 15) to cover all cases of conduct that would have been larceny by a trick or obtaining by false pretences. So, under the Theft Act as enacted, the prosecutor could not go wrong if he charged s 15 whenever D had obtained any interest in property—whether possession or ownership—by any kind of trick or false pretence. Some cases in which D obtained possession of the property with consent but had not obtained ownership would be theft, as well as obtaining by deception, but the intention was that if a deception was involved, s 15 should be charged.⁶¹

⁵⁴ G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 82. See M Giles and S Uglow, 'Appropriation and Manifest Criminality in Theft' (1992) 56 J Crim L 179 and see Steele (2008) 32 Melbourne University L Rev 1030.

⁵⁵ S Gardner, 'Appropriation in Theft: The Last Word' (1993) 109 LQR 194. See also P Glazebrook, 'Revising the Theft Acts' (1993) 52 CLJ 191 pointing out that D's moral blameworthiness is as great in these cases where V consents.

⁵⁶ R Heaton, 'Deceiving without Thieving' [2001] Crim LR 712, describes cases where the obtaining of goods may still not amount to theft, including eg goods delivered under a mail order contract.

⁵⁷ Strikingly, in Briggs [2004] 1 Cr App R 34, the Court of Appeal resisted a wide reading of appropriation, by relying on an argument that to do otherwise would mean that there was too great an overlap between theft and deception. This is precisely the reasoning that had on three occasions failed to persuade the House of Lords against creating an almost total overlap between the offences. For an illustration of how the overlap caused courts to be too lax in their scrutiny of the allegations, see Clarke v CPS [2007] EWHC 2228 (Admin).

⁵⁸ This is quite distinct from the expressly intended overlap between, eg, theft and robbery, where all robberies must contain a theft. This point undermines the argument in S Gardner, 'Appropriation in Theft: The Last Word' (1993) 109 LQR 194.

⁵⁹ See G Ferris, 'The Origins of Larceny by Trick and Constructive Possession' [1998] Crim LR 17. On the moral differences between the types of dishonest conduct and public perceptions of such, see SP Green and M Kugler, 'Community Perceptions of Theft Seriousness: A Challenge to Model Penal Code and English Theft Act Consolidation' (2010) 7 J Empirical Legal Studies 511.

⁶⁰ On the moral differences between the types of dishonest conduct and public perceptions of such, see Green and Kugler (2010) 7 J Empirical Legal Studies 511.

⁶¹ cf Smith, Property Offences, para 5.17. See the confusion where both theft and deception were available: Clarke v CPS [2007] EWHC 2228 (Admin). The repeal of the deception offences means that the overlap will now be with the Fraud Act 2006.

Unfortunately, some prosecutors and judges failed to recognize the distinction in the 1968 Act. Lawrence, the dishonest taxi driver, should have been charged with obtaining by deception⁶² but the argument was not properly presented to the House of Lords in that case.⁶³ Gomez should also have been charged with obtaining by deception. In Gomez, the appellant invited the House to look at the Report of the CLRC to discover the way the 1968 Act was intended to operate. The majority declined as it would 'serve no useful purpose' to do so. Lord Lowry, dissenting, demonstrated convincingly that reference to the Report would have shown that there was no intention for theft to include cases where D obtained ownership with V's consent. The law should have been as stated in the dictum in Morris, not the decision in Lawrence (on this point); and Gomez was wrongly convicted of theft. Some may think that there would have been 'a useful purpose' in looking at the CLRC Report.

In terms of labelling, 'theft' and 'deception' reflect separate moral wrongs.⁶⁴ The judicial blurring of such distinctions undermines the coherence of the Act's scheme of offences.

Creating confusion in the lower courts

The initial reaction of the Court of Appeal to Gomez seemed initially to have been one of incredulity. In Gallasso,⁶⁵ an appeal heard on the very day that judgment was given in Gomez, the court said that although a taking with consent may be an appropriation, 'there must still be a taking' (in that case the theft was by a nurse caring for a vulnerable person). That would have imposed drastic limitations on theft, but it is an untenable opinion. There is no requirement for 'appropriation' to include a physical taking. Gallasso appears indistinguishable from Fritschy and must be taken as wrongly decided.

The Court of Appeal's apparent disbelief at the breadth of the offence of theft in the wake of Gomez and Hinks continues to manifest itself. In Ashcroft,⁶⁶ D, a haulier, was alleged to have conspired to steal items from sealed containers in transit. The court regarded as 'some way removed from reality' D's argument that the theft occurred when D originally took possession of the goods in his lorries (in Scotland). Having referred to Atakpu (discussed below), the court commented that in this case 'there never was in any ordinary sense of the word an "appropriation" of the stolen goods until the conspirators removed them from the containers . . .'.⁶⁷ True enough, but since Gomez, the word appropriation does not bear the 'ordinary' meaning that its drafters had intended.⁶⁸ It is difficult to distinguish the case from Skipp or Fritschy, neither of which was cited by the court.

The greater importance of timing

In some cases there will be a greater significance on the precise time at which the appropriation occurs. Consider Dip Kaur v Chief Constable for Hampshire.⁶⁹ While in a shop D found ⁶² He obtained ownership of the excessive fare by deception, since V permitted him to take the money only because D had told him, falsely, that £1 was not enough.

⁶³ For an opinion as to the questions which the House ought to have been asked, see [1971] Crim LR 53, 54.

⁶⁴ See in particular S Shute and J Horder, 'Thieving and Deceiving: What is the Difference' (1993) 56 MLR 548, 'the thief makes war on a social practice from the outside, the deceiver is the traitor within'; C Clarkson, 'Theft and Fair Labelling' (1993) 56 MLR 554. See, for a more pragmatic view, Glazebrook (1991) 50 CLJ 389 and (1993) 52 CLJ 191. Shute and Horder suggest that the true distinction lies in the voluntariness of the transfer. This test, it is submitted, carries its own substantial difficulties, some of which are addressed by Clarkson.

⁶⁵ [1993] Crim LR 459. See also [1993] Crim LR at 307. Griew, Theft, para 2.89 thinks the 'strange judgment' may 'defy rationalisation'; and Smith, Property Offences, para 5.56, concludes that it is 'simply wrong'.

⁶⁶ [2003] EWCA Crim 2365. ⁶⁷ At [45].

⁶⁸ For an early discussion of the two senses of the word 'appropriation', see A Halpin, 'The Appropriate Appropriation' [1991] Crim LR 426 and A Halpin, Definitions in the Criminal Law (2004) 166–181.

⁶⁹ [1981] 2 All ER 430, DC. D was probably guilty of obtaining by deception by representing that the authorized price was £4.99 when she knew it was £6.99.

a pair of shoes one of which was labelled £6.99 and the other £4.99. These were in a rack of shoes which she knew to be properly priced £6.99 a pair. She took the pair to the cashier, and, as she hoped, the cashier saw the lower and not the higher price. She paid £4.99 and left the shop with the shoes. Her conviction for theft was quashed on the ground that the cashier had authority to accept D's offer to buy at the lower price and the ownership passed to D. It now seems clear, in the light of Gomez, that D was guilty of theft as soon as she did anything with the shoes with a dishonest intent—probably when she picked them up and noticed the price discrepancy and decided to act on it, certainly not later than when she tendered them to the cashier.

Jurisdictional matters

The significance of the timing of the appropriation can be important if there is a cross-jurisdictional aspect to the crime. The House of Lords' decision in Gomez was therefore applied, with great reluctance, by the Court of Appeal in Atakpu.⁷⁰ D and E hired cars in Germany and Belgium and drove them to England intending to sell them to bona fide purchasers. They were detained in Dover and charged with conspiracy to steal. The trial judge, applying the Court of Appeal's decision in Gomez, held that there was no theft outside the jurisdiction (ie England and Wales) because everything that was done there (Germany and Belgium) was done with the consent of the owner. The judge went on to hold that theft would have been committed in England when D and E retained the cars after the expiration of the hire period with the dishonest intention of permanently depriving the owners.⁷¹ However, by the time Atakpu reached the Court of Appeal, the House of Lords had allowed the appeal in Gomez. The Court of Appeal felt bound to conclude that theft was committed outside the jurisdiction when the cars were obtained irrespective of the consent of the owner which D and E had induced by their deception. The court concluded that while theft may continue as long as the thief is 'on the job', and that this is a question for a jury, no jury could reasonably decide that these thefts were continuing days after D and E had first obtained the cars. Theft is a finite act and this theft ended outside the jurisdiction of the English courts. There was a conspiracy (now under s 1 and s 1A of the Criminal Law Act 1977⁷²) in England to steal in Germany and Belgium, but not to steal in England.⁷³

Conflict with the civil law

Glanville Williams argued that no act should amount to theft unless it is contrary to the civil law. Nearly all thefts do amount to the civil wrongs of trespass, conversion or breach of trust but it does not follow that civil unlawfulness is a necessary constituent of the offence.⁷⁴ The definition of theft does not use the word 'unlawfully' nor does it say 'mis appropriate'.⁷⁵

⁷⁰ [1994] QB 69.

⁷¹ This was Fritschy in reverse. D and E were guilty of conspiracy to steal in England.

⁷² See p 460. See further M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) para 2.26.

⁷³ See G Sullivan and C Warbrick, 'Territoriality, Theft and Atakpu' [1994] Crim LR 650 at 659 for an argument that the court was misled by the phrase 'theft abroad is not triable in England' and that so-called 'theft abroad' is not theft under English law; D and E had come by the cars without stealing them so their later assumption of a right to the cars in England would have amounted to an appropriation; the cars were to be stolen in English law for the first time when appropriated in England. For a counter-argument see the 12th edition of this book.

⁷⁴ '... the aims and purposes of the civil law are not co-extensive with the criminal', Smith, Property Offences, para 5.06; but see also paras 5.11–5.52.

⁷⁵ Although this is regarded as 'the very essence of the offence' by Simester and Sullivan in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 173.

The courts are extremely reluctant to admit consideration of civil law into criminal cases, even where it is inevitable, and these arguments have not been judicially accepted.⁷⁶ After Gomez and Hinks,⁷⁷ the arguments appear untenable. The removal of goods from the shelves of a supermarket is not a civil wrong merely because the act is done with a secret dishonest intent, but it is now theft. Fritschy committed no civil wrong by carrying out his employer's instructions to take the Krugerrands to Switzerland, but we are now told he was a thief.

In Hinks, the House of Lords recognized that the decision led to a conflict, but took comfort from Gardner's argument that the criminal law can 'float free' of the civil law in this context. It is submitted that this ignores the underlying purpose of the offence of theft and others in the Theft Acts being designed to protect property—a civil law concept.⁷⁸ Shute suggests an alternative argument; dishonest conduct such as that in Hinks might not constitute a civil law wrong, it 'may nonetheless have a tendency to undermine property rights either directly by attacking the interests that they protect, or indirectly by weakening an established system of property rights and so threatening the public good that the system represents'.⁷⁹ It is submitted that such vague concepts of harm do not form a sufficiently clear or solid foundation for an offence that is serious, commonplace and for which a clear rationale—protecting property rights—has existed since its inception. The consequence of accepting the arguments supporting the Hinks proposition is, of course, that the offence becomes almost entirely dependent on the concept of dishonesty. It becomes an offence protecting against exploitation not property rights.⁸⁰

18.3.1.6 Theft without loss

The offence of theft does not require proof of loss. This is illustrated by Chan Man-sin v A-G of Hong Kong.⁸¹ A company accountant drew a forged cheque on the company's bank account. He was guilty of stealing the 'thing in action' consisting in the company's credit balance, or its contractual right to overdraw from the bank. This was theft even though applying settled banking law, the company, on discovering the unauthorized debit, was entitled to have it reversed and would lose nothing. In law, D's actions were wholly ineffective, the company was never a penny the worse off; but it was held that there was an appropriation—because D assumed the rights of an owner over the credit balance—and an intent permanently to deprive—because he intended to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the company's rights.⁸²

⁷⁶ A partner has been held guilty of theft of the partnership property, even though his act did not amount to the tort of conversion. The court did not think it necessary to look for any other civil wrong—in fact, the act must have been a breach of contract: Bonner [1970] 2 All ER 97n.

⁷⁷ See Lord Hobhouse at [2000] 4 All ER 865b.

⁷⁸ See also J Beatson and A Simester, 'Stealing One's Own Property' (1999) 115 LQR 372. It is a decision described by Simester and Sullivan in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes as 'subversive', at 179.

⁷⁹ Shute [2002] Crim LR 445, 455.

⁸⁰ Simester and Sullivan in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 180. See also SP Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing: A Moral Theory of White Collar Crime (2006) Ch 6: recognizing that to steal is to violate 'in some fundamental way, another's rights of ownership [or possession]', at 89–90. For a more substantive (and compelling) account of the wrongfulness of theft, see Green, 13 Ways, 91–131. At the risk of oversimplifying Green's sophisticated argument, it is that theft has both a primary wrong and a secondary wrong. The primary wrong is the wrong that is the consequence of depriving someone of his property rights. The secondary wrong is the means by which that deprivation is effected. Green argues that it is this secondary wrong that has been blunted by the abolition of the various common law offences and their replacement with a monolithic offence of theft.

⁸¹ [1988] 1 All ER 1.

⁸² Presumably the same principle applies to tangible property.

The Privy Council has subsequently endorsed the broad effect of Hinks, rejecting an argument that there is a requirement of loss to V⁸³ in Wheatley v Commissioner of Police of the British Virgin Islands.⁸⁴ As Lord Bingham observed:

it is certainly true that in most cases of theft there will be an original owner of money or goods who will be poorer because of the defendant's conduct. But in one of the two cases in Morris the defendant was arrested before paying the reduced price for the goods, so that the supermarket suffered no loss, and, in R (A) v Snaresbrook Crown Court,^[85] it was accepted that the alleged theft was carried out for a purpose which could financially benefit the company.⁸⁶

18.3.1.7 Appropriation by 'keeping' and 'dealing'

Section 3 provides that there can be an appropriation not only by assuming the right of an owner as discussed so far in this chapter, but also by keeping or dealing with property as owner. It is difficult to conceive of D being held to be 'dealing' with the property where he has done nothing at all in relation to the goods, even though he has made up his mind to steal them.⁸⁷ Arguably, however, 'keeping' is somewhat broader.

Suppose that D, having borrowed V's bike for a week, resolves at the end of the week to keep it. It would clearly be an appropriation, at the end of the week, to refuse to return it on demand,⁸⁸ or to deny V access to it or for D to claim it as his own. Such conduct shows that he is keeping it as owner. It would also constitute appropriation if D were to use the bike after the end of the week because that use would be an assumption of one of the owner's rights. But what if D, on the expiry of the loan, merely leaves the bike where it is in his garage, hoping that V will forget about it, and intending to keep it? Literally, the case falls within s 3 since D is 'keeping . . . it as owner' and there is no justification for giving the words other than their plain meaning. Of course, it would be very difficult to prove D's mens rea in the form of the intention permanently to deprive, but he satisfies the appropriation requirement of keeping as owner. Proof would be even more difficult in the case of some forms of property. As the court has underlined in Gresham,⁸⁹ "keeping" as owner in relation to a bank account may be difficult to prove in a case where [D] does no more than refrain from bringing the mistake to the attention of the bank'.⁹⁰ Some positive act such as making out a cheque on the account may be necessary.

18.3.1.8 Appropriation: requirement of a positive act towards the property by D?

Theft requires proof of an 'act' by D towards the property that belongs to another, subject to what was said in the previous section about 'keeping' and 'dealing'. As appropriation is defined in terms of an 'assumption' of the right(s) of another that seems to require conduct on D's part demonstrating such an assumption. What of cases in which D induces V to hand over property to him? Can there be an appropriation before the point in time at which D first has physical contact with, possession or control of the property?

In Hilton,⁹¹ where D, who had direct control of a bank account belonging to a charity, gave instructions for the transfer of the charity's funds to settle his personal debts, it was held that he stole the property⁹² belonging to the charity. Hilton might be regarded

⁸³ [2006] UKPC 24, [2006] 2 Cr App R 21. ⁸⁴ ibid. ⁸⁵ [2001] All ER (D) 123, [25].

⁸⁶ At [11]. ⁸⁷ But see A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1983) [1985] QB 182, CA.

⁸⁸ cf Wakeman (1912) 8 Cr App R 18. ⁸⁹ [2003] EWCA Crim 2070.

⁹⁰ Approving the statements in Ngan [1998] 1 Cr App R 331 at 336, Gresham, [22].

⁹¹ [1997] 2 Cr App R 445, [1997] Crim LR 761 and commentary.

⁹² A thing in action representing the charity's right to payment of that sum from its bank.

as a straightforward case since D always had control of the bank account and instructed his agent (the bank) to act in relation to the property. D acted in relation to the property. Arguably it is different where D, by deception, induces, V, the owner and controller of the bank account, to transfer funds from it. Although in such a case V's property⁹³ has gone, D did not 'appropriate' it.⁹⁴ The Court of Appeal affirmed this view in *Briggs*⁹⁵ where D had, by deception, induced her elderly relatives to transfer to her proceeds of their house sale. The Court of Appeal quashed a conviction for theft.⁹⁶ The court held that the word 'appropriation' connoted a physical act rather than a more remote action triggering the payment that gave rise to the charge.⁹⁷ The court relied heavily on Sir John Smith QC's commentary on Caresena:

It is true that D procures the whole course of events resulting in V's account being debited; but the telegraphic transfer is initiated by V and his voluntary intervening acts break the chain of causation. It is the same as if V is induced by deception to take money out of his safe to pay to D. D does not at that moment 'appropriate' it—V is not acting as his agent. D commits theft only if and when the money is put into his hands.

It is submitted that while this approach remains correct after Gomez and Hinks, those cases do make it very much harder to draw any clear distinction between: (a) D's direct acts towards V's property, with V's fraudulently obtained consent (appropriation); and (b) D's acts causing V to transfer his property with V's fraudulently obtained consent (no appropriation until D acquires it). The distinction seems to be that V's act of transfer in (b) breaks the chain of causation.⁹⁸ D can, of course, be liable for theft if he induces another party to conduct a transfer on his behalf. If D uses an innocent agent, E, to effect the transfer of V's property, or to extinguish it, there would be no difficulty in establishing a theft charge at the moment that E assumes any right in relation to V's property. Similarly, where D deceives V as to the nature and quality of the act of transfer (as where V is naive or vulnerable) that would suffice. The fact that V has the authority to act in this way by transferring the property and to consent is, according to Gomez and Hinks, irrelevant. By setting in motion the transaction D could, in that circumstance, be regarded as having started the continuing act of appropriation.⁹⁹ 18.3.1.9 Offers to sell as an act of appropriation?

Before 1968, D could be liable for larceny by offering to sell property belonging to another. Under the 1968 Act, on a charge of theft, the question would now be whether he appropriated the property offered for sale. It has been argued that a purported sale of V's property by D might not be an assumption of a right of another.¹⁰⁰ The better view is that although D may lawfully contract to sell V's property to X at some future date (D hoping that he will be ⁹³ The thing in action in the form of his credit balance, or part of it.

⁹⁴ Caresana [1996] Crim LR 667; Naviade [1997] Crim LR 662. See also JC Smith [1996] 9 Arch News 4.

⁹⁵ [2004] EWCA Crim 3662, [2004] Crim LR 455. This issue still arises, as Darroux [2018] EWCA Crim 1009 confirms.

⁹⁶ There was some confusion as to what D was alleged to have stolen. It appears to be the credit balance representing the proceeds of the sale.

⁹⁷ Despite the court's approving reference to the Oxford English Dictionary definition of appropriation involving a 'taking', it is submitted that a physical 'taking' or 'touching' is only a sufficient but not a necessary element of the offence, otherwise there would be no protection for intangible property.

⁹⁸ cf R Heaton, 'Cheques and Balances' [2005] Crim LR 747.

⁹⁹ We are grateful to Tony Shaw QC for discussion. Cf Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, para 9.107.

¹⁰⁰ Smith, Property Offences, 'whereas the owner has a right against others that they shall not deliver his property to third persons (because that involves a tortious interference) he has no general right that they shall not contract to sell it, or purport to pass ownership in it', at para 5.49.

able to buy it from V in order to sell it to X in the meantime),¹⁰¹ a purported present sale to a bona fide purchaser seems to be an appropriation. The property D offered for sale nearly always continues to belong to the original owner, so theft generally has no effect on the owners' rights, as such.

Even in the light of Gomez, the earlier case of Pitham remains difficult to justify. D, knowing that V was in prison, took Pitham to V's house and offered to sell V's property to Pitham. It was held that the offer amounted to a completed theft of V's property.¹⁰² Pitham, the buyer, knew that D had no authority to sell V's property and D knew that Pitham knew that. D did not purport to be the owner or have the owner's authority to sell the property. It was not really an offer to sell at all, but a proposal for a joint theft of the property.¹⁰³

18.3.1.10 Continuing appropriation

An offence that is complete at a particular moment may nevertheless continue being committed for some time thereafter.¹⁰⁴ It is often important to know how long a particular theft continued. A person may be guilty of a theft by aiding and abetting it while it is being committed by another, but he cannot aid and abet once the theft is over. A person may be guilty of robbery if he uses force while theft is being committed but not by using force when the theft is at an end. A person may be guilty of the offence of handling stolen goods only if he does a proscribed act 'otherwise than in the course of the stealing'. A person may use reasonable force in preventing a crime, in this case theft, while it is being committed.¹⁰⁵

Theft may certainly be committed in an instant, so that D could be convicted of the offence even if he was immediately arrested. It does not follow that the offence is over in an instant, though that seems to have been the opinion of the court in Pitham.¹⁰⁶ In Atakpu,¹⁰⁷ after a careful review of the pre-Gomez authorities, Ward J summarized the law as follows:¹⁰⁸

(1) theft can occur in an instant by a single appropriation but it can also involve a course of dealing with property lasting longer and involving several appropriations before the transaction is complete; (2) theft is a finite act—it has a beginning and it has an end; (3) at what point the transaction is complete is a matter for the jury to decide upon the facts of each case; (4) though there may be several appropriations in the course of a single theft or several appropriations of different goods each constituting a separate theft as in R v Skipp, no case suggests that there can be successive thefts of the same property . . .

The court thought that, on a strict construction, Gomez left 'little room for a continuous course of action'. The court did not welcome that consequence of the Gomez decision and preferred the view that appropriation continues so long as the thief can sensibly be regarded as in the act of stealing, or in more understandable words, so long as he is 'on the job'.¹⁰⁹ In ¹⁰¹ cf Sale of Goods Act 1979, s 5.

¹⁰² This was significant because it meant that when the goods were delivered to Pitham he received them 'otherwise than in the course of the stealing' and was therefore guilty of handling stolen goods: see Ch 26.

¹⁰³ The jury acquitted Pitham of theft although 'The evidence that they had bought property knowing that it was stolen, arose from the fact that they said they had bought considerably under price', (1976) 65 Cr App R 45 at 47. How can a buyer knowing that the seller by selling the property is stealing it, not be guilty of theft? See also Williams, TBCL, 764; Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 2.103.

¹⁰⁴ G Williams, 'Appropriation: A Single or Continuous Act' [1978] Crim LR 69.

¹⁰⁵ See Bowden [2002] EWCA Crim 1279, where D claimed a defence under s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 when detaining youths whom he believed to have stolen car keys. The Court of Appeal held that the judge was right to leave to the jury the issue of whether the youths' crime of theft of the keys was still continuing at the time of D's actions. See also Morris [2013] EWCA Crim 436.

¹⁰⁶ See n 102. ¹⁰⁷ See p 837. ¹⁰⁸ [1993] 4 All ER 215 at 223.

¹⁰⁹ As it was put in the 7th edition of this book, at p 513.

Atakpu, it was not necessary for the court to decide the matter because no jury could have reasonably concluded that the theft of the cars in Frankfurt or Brussels in that case was continuing when the cars were brought, days later, into England. It is thought that this is the better view and that to treat appropriation simply as an instantaneous act would be inconsistent with the provisions of the Act relating to robbery and handling, which presuppose that there can be a course of stealing.

18.3.1.11 Appropriation: when and where?

Where the thief and the property are in different places does the theft take place where and when D acts, or where and when his act affects the property? The problem usually arises in relation to the theft of things in action—intangible property—but it is equally possible with tangible property. D, in England, may dishonestly assume V's rights of ownership over goods in a warehouse in Scotland by selling, or purporting to sell, them to E.¹¹⁰ The cases have not all taken a consistent approach to the problem. In Tomsett,¹¹¹ the Court of Appeal accepted without argument that the theft occurred at the location of the property in question. Similarly, in Kohn,¹¹² Lane LJ said, obiter, that where D had drawn cheques to himself on V's bank account, the theft did not take place until the account was debited. In extradition cases, the courts took different views. In Ex p Osman,¹¹³ Osman, in Hong Kong, sent a telex assuming the rights of the owner of a bank account in New York. It was held that this could be theft in Hong Kong. In Ex p Levin,¹¹⁴ the court held that a computer operator in Russia committed theft in the United States by operating on magnetic discs on a computer server in the United States.

In Ngan,¹¹⁵ a large sum intended for V had been mistakenly paid into D's bank account in England. By virtue of s 5(4) of the 1968 Act (discussed later) this property was to be regarded as belonging to V. D dishonestly signed blank cheques on the account and sent them to her sister in Scotland who presented them there for payment. The court, equating the presentation of the cheque with the sending of the telex in Osman, held that the theft took place in Scotland. The act of presenting the cheque was the point of appropriation. The signing and issuing of the cheques were preparatory acts to the theft, but the appropriation occurred before the account was debited.

These problems are less likely to arise since the bringing into force of Part 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1993 and s 1A of the Criminal Law Act 1977, but they are still significant and require resolution. In the light of the broad notion of appropriation followed since Gomez, it may be that the theft is committed where and when D does some act which only the owner could properly do; but that it continues to the time when and place where it affects the property.

18.3.1.12 The exception in favour of bona fide purchasers: s 3(2)

The definition of appropriation in s 3 includes an important exception:

Where property or a right or interest in property is or purports to be transferred for value to a person acting in good faith, no later assumption by him of rights which he believed himself to be acquiring shall, by reason of any defect in the transferor's title, amount to theft.

¹¹⁰ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 2.108.

¹¹¹ [1985] Crim LR 369. D, a telex operator, had transferred funds from V bank to an account in Geneva. The theft occurred in Geneva. His conviction for conspiracy was quashed. This would not be so today. See Criminal Law Act 1977, s 1A.

¹¹² (1979) 69 Cr App R 395, p 844.

¹¹³ Governor of Pentonville Prison, ex p Osman [1989] 3 All ER 701, DC. This issue was not discussed in the House of Lords: [1997] AC 741. The Divisional Court comprised of Lloyd LJ and French J, both members of the court in Tomsett.

¹¹⁴ Governor of Brixton Prison, ex p Levin [1997] QB 65, DC.

¹¹⁵ [1998] 1 Cr App R 331. The availability of theft charges was accepted in Ali [2009] EWCA Crim 1131.

The CLRC explained this exception as follows:¹¹⁶

A person may buy something in good faith, but may find out afterwards that the seller had no title to it, perhaps because the seller or somebody else stole it. If the buyer nevertheless keeps the thing or otherwise deals with it as owner, he could . . . be guilty of theft. It is arguable that this would be right; but on the whole it seems to us that, whatever view is taken of the buyer's moral duty, the law would be too strict if it made him guilty of theft.

The exception operates in favour only of a person acquiring his interest (eg by buying the property from D or by acquiring other rights over it) in good faith and for value—a 'BFP'. The 'BFP' who discovers that the property is stolen is not guilty of handling if he disposes of it to an innocent person.¹¹⁷ But the property in the hands of the 'BFP' continues to belong to the owner from whom it was stolen. If the 'BFP' sells it and represents himself as having title to the property, he may be guilty of fraud.¹¹⁸

18.3.2 Property

Those types of property which may be stolen are defined in s 4 of the Theft Act 1968.¹¹⁹ The broad effect of the section is that all property may be stolen subject to certain exceptions in relation to land, things growing wild and wild creatures. It is important to note that the offence of theft is founded on orthodox civil law concepts of property.¹²⁰

Legal conceptions of property are constantly evolving to reflect developments in society, and in recent years the particular concern has been for the law to reflect the rapid developments in information technology and the way in which data is stored and accessed. There have been calls to expand the definition of property to provide protection in this area.¹²¹ More radically, there is pressure for the law to recognize a diverse range of rights and interests as species of property (eg environmental rights and welfare rights).¹²² Irrespective of the validity of this re-conceptualization of property, it is submitted that the law of theft is certainly not the most appropriate mechanism for securing protection of these rights under the criminal law. Empirical research has also called into question whether thefts of different forms of property, even when equal in value, ought to be treated alike. Green and Kugler distinguish between 'thefts' of items of equal monetary value but different physical and legal form.¹²³ Subjects consistently ranked the theft of tangible goods as more blameworthy than the theft of intangibles, and the theft of intangible goods as more blameworthy than the theft of services.

¹¹⁶ Eighth Report, para 37. But this exception may now be neutralized by the money laundering legislation, p 1056.

¹¹⁷ See p 1038.

¹¹⁸ See Wheeler (1990) 92 Cr App R 279, CA. D did not obtain by deception in selling stolen goods to V but only because the sale, though not the delivery, took place before D became aware that they were stolen.

¹¹⁹ For a sophisticated theoretical analysis about what types of property ought to be capable of being stolen, see Green, 13 Ways, Ch 4. To help to determine what ought to count as property for the purposes of the law of theft (as opposed to the civil law), Green relies upon the economic concepts of commodifiability, rivalrousness, excludability and zero-sumness.

¹²⁰ It has been argued that the criminal law takes a more robust definitional and practical approach to the interference with intangible items of property, such as choses in action, than the civil law. See S Green, 'Theft and Conversion—Tangibly Different?' (2012) 128 LQR 564.

¹²¹ See eg J Lipton, 'A Revised Property Concept for the New Millenium' (1999) 7 Int'l J L & IT 171.

¹²² See N Lacey, C Wells and O Quick, Reconstructing Criminal Law (4th edn, 2010) 399.

¹²³ These were: tangible good (a book in their example); an intangible good (a computer file downloaded from a website); a supply of a service which was not limited (attendance at a full lecture) and a service the supply of which was limited (attendance at a lecture in which the hall was half empty). See Green and Kugler (2010) 7 J Empirical Legal Studies 511. For further analysis, see Green, 13 Ways, Ch 4.

Under the 1968 Act, the definition of property is extremely broad, and coupled with the breadth of the definition of appropriation this renders the actus reus minimal. The structure of the Act avoids defining offences by distinctions based on the type of property involved, and focuses instead on the manner of the harm being caused. Section 4(1) provides the general definition:

‘Property’ includes money and all other property, real or personal, including things in action and other intangible property.

The definition is wide enough to include property which is unlawful or illegal or prohibited. D can therefore be guilty of stealing from V the drugs V unlawfully possesses.¹²⁴ There are specified exceptions relating to land, animals and plants to be discussed later.

18.3.2.1 Things in action

The one limitation on the generality of the definition of property, apart from the specified exceptions, is that the property must be capable of appropriation. Intangible property may be appropriated by any assumption of any of the rights of an owner over it.¹²⁵ This is best illustrated by reference to one of the most commonplace forms of intangible property—bank accounts.

Where a bank account is in credit, the relationship between banker and customer is that of a debtor and creditor. In law, the customer, V, does not have ‘money in the bank’;¹²⁶ there is no specific pile of money that is designated as his. The property that he has is a ‘thing in action’, a right to payment by the bank of the sum of money it owes him.¹²⁷ Thus, if D dishonestly causes a bank to debit V’s account, D does not appropriate V’s money, he appropriates a thing in action belonging to V (V’s right to payment of that sum from the bank) and may be guilty of theft of that property.¹²⁸ D has reduced or, if he has reduced the credit to zero, extinguished V’s right to that payment from the bank. Where V has an overdraft with the bank, V has a right to payment from the bank of the sum up to the limit of that agreed overdraft, and that is property—a thing in action—that D may steal by dishonestly causing the bank to debit V’s account. The operation of this aspect of the law of theft is illustrated by Kohn.¹²⁹ D, an accountant employed by a company to write cheques to pay the company’s debts, wrote cheques on the company’s account to pay his own debts and was held guilty of theft of the thing in action.

Care must always be taken to ascertain the state of V’s account at the time of the alleged theft by D. If V is overdrawn and has no overdraft facility, D’s drawing of a cheque on V’s account cannot amount to theft because there is no property to steal—V has no contractual right to any payment from the bank. D’s action might amount to attempted theft, like an attempt to steal from an empty pocket.

¹²⁴ See Smith [2011] EWCA Crim 66, citing Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, 80, with approval.

¹²⁵ See Storror and Poole [1983] Crim LR 332.

¹²⁶ ‘Although we talk about people having money in the bank, the only person who has money in the bank is the banker’, Davenport [1954] 1 All ER 602, 603, per Goddard LCJ.

¹²⁷ As Sarah Green points out, although the Act distinguishes between things in action and money, there is a diminishing difference between the two in practical terms. See S Green, ‘Theft and Conversion—Tangibly Different?’ (2012) 128 LQR 564.

¹²⁸ Chan Man-sin v A-G for Hong Kong [1988] 1 All ER 1, PC, p 838; Ex p Osman [1989] 3 All ER 701, DC; Williams [2001] 1 Cr App R 362.

¹²⁹ [1997] 2 Cr App R 445, [1997] Crim LR 761 and commentary. As discussed at p 840, it may be different where D, by deception, induces V, the owner and controller of the bank account, to transfer funds from it. V’s credit balance, or part of it, has gone, but arguably D did not ‘appropriate’ it until he took control/possession of the property: Caresana [1996] Crim LR 667; Naviede [1997] Crim LR 662; Briggs [2004] Crim LR 455.

In terms of conduct by D in relation to bank accounts over which he has control, care must also be taken. In Hilton,¹³⁰ discussed earlier, where D, who had direct control of a bank account belonging to a charity, gave instructions for the transfer of the charity's funds to settle his personal debts, it was held that he stole the thing in action belonging to the charity. On the other hand, D does not steal from his own bank where he uses his banker's card to make a purchase, knowing that his own account is overdrawn and that his authority to use the card has terminated.¹³¹ The bank is obliged to meet the cheque and its own funds will be thereby diminished. D has caused the bank to become indebted but he has not assumed a right over any specific property of the bank. If D withdraws money from an ATM at his bank in excess of his overdraft and without authorization, he may commit theft of the cash.¹³²

Stealing or obtaining cheques

Where a cheque (ie the piece of paper from a chequebook) is alleged to have been stolen, a different problem arises.¹³³ A cheque is a piece of paper which, if given for consideration, creates a thing in action—it gives the person in whose favour it is made out a right to sue the person who made out the cheque for the sum stated. So, where V writes a cheque payable to D, as well as obtaining the piece of paper into his physical possession, D also obtains a thing in action—a right to sue V's bank for the sum specified on the cheque. However, it is crucial to note that the particular thing in action obtained by D is not an item of property that previously belonged to V; the thing in action D obtains is D's right to sue V's bank. This is a new item of property, distinct from that which V owned before he wrote the cheque to D; the previous item of property was V's right to sue his bank. In Preddey,¹³⁴ the House accepted this to be the correct state of the law. Preddey confirms that the thing in action D obtains belonged from the instant of its creation to him. It never belonged, or could belong, to V. A chose in action is, remember, a right to sue someone, and D could not sue himself!

Where D dishonestly induces V to write out a cheque in D's favour and D attempts to cash the cheque, he would at that point commit fraud contrary to s 1 of the Fraud Act 2006. If D presents the cheque for the credit of his own account, he is at that point guilty of theft of a different thing in action which does belong to V, namely V's credit balance (or right to overdraw if such a facility exists) at his bank.¹³⁵ On presenting the cheque,¹³⁶ D has assumed V's right to destroy that part of V's property.¹³⁷

D also acquires the cheque itself, the physical thing in the form of the piece of paper. Preddey did not decide whether D might be guilty of obtaining this item of property. Lord Goff noted that it does belong to V but said that D would not be guilty because he had no

¹³⁰ Navvabi [1986] 1 WLR 1311, CA.

¹³¹ (1979) 69 Cr App R 395, CA. See further EJ Griew, 'Stealing and Obtaining Bank Credits' [1986] Crim LR 356.

¹³² See Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWCA Crim 2673 (Admin); Chodorek v Poland [2017] ACD 244(82), QBD, [2017] EWHC 995 (Admin); Adamczewski v District Court in Jelenia Gora Poland [2014] EWHC 2958 (Admin) (at [11] et seq).

¹³³ See JC Smith, 'Obtaining Cheques by Deception or Theft' [1997] Crim LR 396, 'Stealing Tickets' [1998] Crim LR 723 and commentaries on Horsman [1998] Crim LR 128 and Aston [1998] Crim LR 498; see also Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, paras 9.20–9.21.

¹³⁴ [1996] AC 815.

¹³⁵ Burke [2000] Crim LR 413, and Williams (Roy) [2001] 1 Cr App R 362, [2001] Crim LR 253.

¹³⁶ Ngan [1998] 1 Cr App R 331.

¹³⁷ Prior to the Fraud Act coming into force (15 Jan 2007) D committed no offence of obtaining property by deception because D's increased credit balance (a thing in action belonging to D—his right to sue his bank) was never 'property belonging to another', Burke [2000] Crim LR 413, applying Preddey. See also White [2014] EWCA Crim 714.

intention permanently to deprive—he knew that the cheque form (ie the piece of paper) would, after presentation, be returned to V via his bank (or at least be available for V's collection).¹³⁸ It is submitted that this was obiter (as well as wrong) but the Court of Appeal in *Graham*¹³⁹ treated it as ratio and in *Clark*¹⁴⁰ held that it was bound by that decision. So at present a cheque form (piece of paper) cannot be stolen if D intends to present it for payment. A cheque is still a piece of paper and can be stolen if D intends merely to retain the piece of paper. For example, D might steal from V a cheque which V has never cashed because it was signed by someone famous and V had retained it as a souvenir.¹⁴¹

So far the discussion has concluded that D does not obtain a thing in action from V (the thing in action D acquires has never belonged to V), and D does not steal the cheque form (ie the paper). There is an argument that D could also be convicted of theft of the cheque not as a piece of paper, but as a 'valuable security'. A cheque is recognized as a 'valuable security' by s 20 of the 1968 Act. This is a highly technical area of law explored elsewhere¹⁴² but it is easy enough to understand that a cheque is special—not just any piece of paper which will cause, say, a bank clerk to hand over £1,000; but a cheque will do that. Of course the cheque is (a) a piece of paper which (b) creates a thing in action but it is also (c) a valuable security. A valuable security is an item of property that may be stolen; and that means, not the theft of the thing in action, nor a mere piece of paper, but the instrument, the physical thing with certain writing on it.¹⁴³ The Supreme Court of Victoria in *Parsons*¹⁴⁴ accepted this argument. The English Court of Appeal found it 'highly persuasive' but, unlike the Victorian court, was unable to follow it. The question of D's liability for theft may still be open to argument.¹⁴⁵ D will, of course, be liable under the Fraud Act if he makes any false representation relating to the account, the cheque form or his right to use them, provided he also has the relevant mens rea.

A final point to note is that a cheque creates a thing in action only if it is given for valuable consideration.¹⁴⁶ If D induces V to make him a gift of a cheque for £50, that cheque does not create a thing in action—but it is still a cheque and, it is submitted, a valuable security. Unless V stops it, the cheque will enable D to deprive V of £50. When D gets his hands on it, he has a valuable, tangible, thing in his possession. It is submitted that such a cheque is a valuable security capable of being stolen.

¹³⁸ This assumes the cheques (as pieces of paper) will all be retained for V; modern banking practice is not to do so. D may intend to return the piece of paper, but not the valuable security: see later. That may make an allegation of theft of the valuable security an attractive one.

¹³⁹ [1997] 1 Cr App R 302. ¹⁴⁰ [2001] Crim LR 572, [2001] EWCA Crim 884.

¹⁴¹ See Roach [2011] EWCA Crim 918 (blank cheque D never going to present).

¹⁴² 'A cheque is not a piece of paper and no more . . . It is a piece of paper with certain special characteristics', Kohn (1979) 69 Cr App R 395 at 409, per Lord Lane CJ.

¹⁴³ Arnold [1997] 4 All ER 1, [1997] Crim LR 833. D was convicted of stealing a valuable security, a bill of exchange, signed by V, creating a thing in action which V could never own but was nevertheless property belonging to him. But cf Horsman, n 133.

¹⁴⁴ [1998] 2 VR 478; affd 73 ALJR 27, High Ct of Aust.

¹⁴⁵ A point of law of general importance was certified; the House refused leave on the ground that the offence of obtaining a money transfer by deception and other offences are adequate. That is not correct. In Marshall, considered at p 856, it was argued that if a cheque cannot be stolen from the person who made out the cheque on his account, a ticket cannot be stolen from the company issuing it. The court dismissed this argument as impossible, but it is submitted that it is right. The cheque and the ticket are both papers which create and embody a thing in action against the issuer. In neither case can the thing in action be stolen or obtained from the person issuing it—it cannot belong to him—but that is no reason why the paper, which does belong to him and which is a valuable thing, cannot be stolen from him. For an argument against this approach relying on the valuable security, see Arldige and Parry on Fraud, para 9.154–9.156.

¹⁴⁶ ie any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract or an antecedent debt or liability: Bills of Exchange Act 1882, s 27(1).

18.3.2.2 Other intangible property

The reach of the law of theft is extended yet further by s 4(1) beyond things in action to include ‘other intangible property’.¹⁴⁷ An illustration is provided by A-G of Hong Kong v Chan Nai-Keung.¹⁴⁸ The export of textiles from Hong Kong was prohibited except under licence, and exports were regulated by a quota system. An exporter who, in a given year, could not meet his quotas could sell his surplus export quotas to an exporter who could meet them, and there was a flourishing market in these quotas. D, a director of the A exporting company, without the authorization of the A company, sold surplus quotas at a gross undervalue to the B exporting company in which D had an interest as a director. It was held that the quotas, though they were not things in action, were nevertheless ‘other intangible property’—the quotas were things of value which could be bought and sold and by knowingly selling them at an undervalue D had appropriated them.¹⁴⁹

The definition of property is so broad that it is easier to focus on the things that do not constitute property for the purposes of the Act. Some of these limitations on what constitutes property are contained in the Act (land, wild animals, electricity) and some are the result of case law—for example, confidential information. Each merits consideration.

18.3.2.3 Limitations on the theft of land

It would have been technically possible to make land generally stealable (eg where D moves his boundary fence a few inches into V’s garden), since rights over land are just as capable of appropriation as rights in goods. But the decision not to do so was made for reasons of policy. In drafting the Theft Act, the CLRC considered that there were numerous reasons¹⁵⁰ for not treating this as theft, including: that appropriating land by encroachment was rare and could be dealt with adequately by civil remedies;¹⁵¹ and it might create conflict with the civil law (D could get good title by occupation for 12 years and it would be odd if he remained even theoretically guilty of theft for ever afterwards). Section 4(2) therefore limits the scope of theft of land, and provides:

A person cannot steal land, or things forming part of land and severed from it by him or by his directions, except in the following cases, that is to say—

- (a) when he is a trustee or personal representative, or is authorised by power of attorney, or as liquidator of a company, or otherwise, to sell or dispose of land belonging to another, and he appropriates the land or anything forming part of it by dealing with it in breach of the confidence reposed in him; or
- (b) when he is not in possession of the land and appropriates anything forming part of the land by severing it or causing it to be severed, or after it has been severed; or
- (c) when, being in possession of the land under a tenancy, he appropriates the whole or part of any fixture or structure let to be used with the land.¹⁵² ¹⁴⁷ For extensive theoretical analysis, see Green, 13 Ways, 234–269. Green distinguishes between intangibles and semi-intangibles, analysing each separately. An example of the latter would be wi-fi.

¹⁴⁸ [1987] 1 WLR 1339, [1988] Crim LR 125, PC. The law of theft in Hong Kong was identical in this respect to the law of England.

¹⁴⁹ Pilgram v Rice-Smith [1977] 2 All ER 658, DC; Bhachu (1976) 65 Cr App R 261, CA.

¹⁵⁰ Eighth Report, paras 40–44. Cf Smith, Property Offences, paras 3.32–3.33, 3.38.

¹⁵¹ But the Committee observed (ibid, para 42) that moving boundaries was a ‘real problem, especially in crowded housing estates’. Rarity did not prevent the CLRC creating the offence under s 11 (p 903) which seems to owe its origin to three known instances of its occurrence.

¹⁵² For the purposes of this subsection ‘land’ does not include incorporeal hereditaments (eg easements); ‘tenancy’ means a tenancy for years or any less period and includes an agreement for such a tenancy, but a person who after the end of a tenancy remains in possession as statutory tenant or otherwise is to be treated as having possession under the tenancy; and ‘let’ shall be construed accordingly.

(1) *Appropriation by trustees etc.*¹⁵³ Exceptionally, land, or things forming part of the land, are capable of being stolen by trustees, etc. A trustee may appropriate land held in trust by an unauthorized disposition. Of course, an unauthorized dealing is not, of itself, theft since the other elements of the offence must be present. If, for example, a trustee is authorized to sell the land only to A and he sells it to B because B is offering a much better price, the unauthorized sale by the trustee might not be dishonest.

(2) Appropriation by persons not in possession. It is not theft for D to appropriate land without severing it, as where he moves his boundary fence so as to incorporate a strip of V's land into his own.¹⁵⁴ However, a person not in possession can steal anything forming part of the land by severing it or by appropriating it after it has been severed. So, if D helps himself to the topsoil in V's garden, or to a gate, or to rose bushes or even to growing grass, it may be theft.¹⁵⁵ In each case the appropriation is complete upon severance,¹⁵⁶ but where the thing is already severed, as where the gate is lying in V's yard for repair, the appropriation would be complete, at the latest, when D takes control of it.

(3) Appropriation of fixtures by tenants. A tenant cannot steal the land which he possesses by virtue of the tenancy, nor of things forming part of the land. If D, a tenant, removes topsoil from the premises, say to sell it to a neighbour, he is appropriating property of another (the landlord) but he is not guilty of theft. A tenant may be guilty of theft, however, where he appropriates (and here severance is not required) any fixture or structure let to be used with the land. A fixture here means something annexed to land for use or ornament, such as a washbasin, cupboards or a fireplace, and a structure seems to mean some structure of a moveable or temporary character, such as a garden shed or a greenhouse. A house would not be a structure in this sense.

(4) Appropriation by persons not in possession. In contrast if D, who is living with the tenant, removes the topsoil to sell it D would be guilty of theft because he is not 'in possession' of the land although he happens to live there.

To determine potential liability for theft, it may, therefore, be important to determine whether a particular article forms part of the land. Generally, appropriation will involve severance, so non-possessors will be caught by s 4(2)(b) while tenants are caught by s 4(2)(c). But if a licensee in possession appropriates a structure, it is vital to know whether it forms part of the land. This is a question of land law and the answer depends on the degree of annexation and the object of annexation.¹⁵⁷

¹⁵³ See R Brazier, 'Criminal Trustees?' (1975) 39 Conv (NS) 29. Such individuals would be liable for fraud under s 4 of the Fraud Act 2006.

¹⁵⁴ The arguments for and against making land the subject of theft are summarized in the Eighth Report, 21–22.

¹⁵⁵ By human hand or by grazing cattle: McGill v Shepherd, unreported; M Williams and C Weinberg, The Australian Law of Theft (3rd edn, 1986) 116. In 1972, a man was prosecuted at Leeds Crown Court for stealing Cleckheaton railway station by dismantling and removing it. He was acquitted on the merits, the jury accepting that on this bold enterprise he was acting under a claim of right. But railway stations are stealable by severance.

¹⁵⁶ Note that if D is caught in the act of severing he is guilty only of an attempt. By attempting to sever D is, of course, assuming the rights of an owner and in other circumstances (p 829) this alone constitutes a complete appropriation. But in this case the effect of the subsection is to insist upon severance to complete the theft.

¹⁵⁷ See Elitestone Ltd v Morris [1997] 1 WLR 687, HL. The chattel must be actually fixed to the land, not for its more convenient use as a chattel, but for the more convenient use of the land. Compare Elitestone v Morris [1997] 1 WLR 687, HL—timber bungalow on concrete stand on land only removable by destroying part of land, held to be part of land; cf Chelsea Yacht and Boat Club v Pope [2001] 2 All ER 409—houseboat secured to river-bed pontoon and river walls by mooring ropes is not part of land. For more recent analysis, see Tristmire Ltd v Mew and others [2011] EWCA Civ 912.

18.3.2.4 Limitations on the theft of things growing wild

There is a long-standing cultural tradition in Britain of picking fruits from the land for consumption.¹⁵⁸ Section 4(3) of the Act provides some limited protection from theft charges in such circumstances:

A person who picks mushrooms growing wild on any land, or who picks flowers, fruit or foliage from a plant growing wild on any land, does not (although not in possession of the land) steal what he picks, unless he does it for reward or for sale or other commercial purpose.

For the purposes of this subsection, ‘mushroom’ includes any fungus and ‘plant’ includes any shrub or tree.¹⁵⁹

In some ways it might be thought that s 4(3) is rather unnecessary. It exempts from liability for theft someone who picks wild mushrooms, or one who picks flowers, fruit or foliage ‘from a plant’ (thus a person who takes the whole plant may be convicted of theft)¹⁶⁰ growing wild on land unless done for sale or other commercial purpose. Picking holly branches around about Christmas time for the purpose of sale may amount to theft, as may picking elderberries for making wine if the purpose is to sell the wine. The whole matter might have been left to the common sense of the prosecutor who would hardly institute proceedings where the appropriation was trivial. However, the CLRC thought that, ‘a provision could reasonably be criticized which made it even technically theft in all cases to pick wild flowers against the will of the landowner’.¹⁶¹

In some instances liability might also arise under the Criminal Damage Act 1971.

18.3.2.5 Limitations on the theft of wild creatures

Section 4(4) of the Act provides:

Wild creatures, tamed or untamed, shall be regarded as property; but a person cannot steal a wild creature not tamed nor ordinarily kept in captivity, or the carcase of any such creature, unless either it has been reduced into possession by or on behalf of another person and possession of it has not since been lost or abandoned, or another person is in course of reducing it into possession.

It is possible, therefore, to steal wild creatures where these have been tamed or are ordinarily kept in captivity. A tiger may be stolen from a zoo, and if it has escaped it may be stolen while at large because it is ‘ordinarily’ kept in captivity.

Wild animals while at large are not owned by anyone, nor does a landowner have a proprietary interest in such animals even where they constitute game. The landowner has, however, the right to take wild animals, and once a wild animal is caught or killed it immediately becomes the property of the landowner where this takes place. The taker (ie the killer, trapper, etc) would be guilty of theft were it not for the protection afforded by s 4(4). He is guilty instead of a minor offence of poaching.¹⁶² Poaching may amount to an offence under a variety of enactments¹⁶³—the Game Act 1831¹⁶⁴ as amended by the Game Laws ¹⁵⁸ See M Welstead, ‘Season of Mists and Mellow Fruitfulness’ (1995) 150 NLJ 1499.

¹⁵⁹ For discussion of the legal protection of trees, see Palm Developments Ltd v Secretary of State for Communities and Local Govt [2009] EWHC 220 (Admin).

¹⁶⁰ This raises interesting possibilities in the case of GM protestors who remove seedlings.

¹⁶¹ Eighth Report, para 47. The Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 makes it an offence to kill, possess or sell certain creatures; and to pick, uproot or destroy certain wild plants.

¹⁶² See K Cook, Wildlife Law: Conservation and Biodiversity (2004).

¹⁶³ See generally the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, ss 1, 9 and Sch 5. As amended by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 (England and Wales) (Amendment) Regulations 2016/127, reg 2(2).

¹⁶⁴ Section 24 protects (in England and Wales) against the destruction or taking of game eggs. Section 23 of the Game Act 1831 made it an offence to kill game without a game certificate. This section was repealed by art 2(h) of the Regulatory Reform (Game) Order 2007, SI 2007/2007, removing various licensing requirements to kill or take game.

(Amendment) Act 1960, and the Poaching Prevention Act 1862.¹⁶⁵ Deer are protected by the Deer Act 1991.

The CLRC recommended¹⁶⁶ that poaching should be theft when done ‘for reward or for sale or other commercial purpose’. Parliament rejected that proposal. Poaching is unlawful but it was felt that it would be going too far, even in such cases, to turn this traditional country pastime into theft.

Wild animals may be stolen when they are in the process of being reduced into possession by or on behalf of another. A lazy poacher who picks up the pheasants shot from the skies by V is a thief, as is a gamekeeper who keeps for himself a pheasant which he shot for his employer. And if V, having shot a pheasant, cannot find it in the brush and gives up the search, a subsequent appropriation by D makes him a thief from the landowner.¹⁶⁷

In Cresswell v DPP,¹⁶⁸ the Divisional Court considered whether badgers which had been enticed into traps set by officials from DEFRA had become ‘property’ for the purposes of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 (identically worded in this respect to the Theft Act). The defendants who had destroyed the traps sought to argue that the badgers were property and they had a defence to destruction of the traps on the basis that they were protecting property—the badgers. Keene LJ, rejecting the argument, stated that ‘merely to entice a wild animal, whether it be a badger or a game bird or a deer, to a particular spot from time to time by providing food there, even with the objective ultimately of killing it in due course, does not form part of the course normally of reducing it into possession. If the creature were thereby to become the property, say, of the landowner providing the food, it would mean that it could not then be lawfully shot by the adjoining landowner on or over whose land it passed.’¹⁶⁹ Walker J was more hesitant, declining to express a concluded view on what constitutes property.¹⁷⁰

18.3.2.6 Electricity

On the face of it all property is capable of appropriation, but there were formerly doubts whether electricity was capable of appropriation.¹⁷¹ The dishonest use, wasting or diverting of electricity was a separate offence under the Larceny Acts and the position was preserved by s 13 of the Theft Act. The CLRC observed that, ‘This has to be a separate offence because owing to its nature electricity is excluded from the definition of stealing in . . . [s] 1(1) of the [Act].’¹⁷² The Committee’s view was endorsed in *Low v Bleasdale*¹⁷³ where it was held that, electricity not being property capable of appropriation, D could not be convicted of burglary in entering premises and making a telephone call from them.¹⁷⁴ Heat is a thing of value, as anyone paying the heating bill well knows, but it seems that it would not be theft to assume ¹⁶⁵ Which protects, inter alia, game eggs. ¹⁶⁶ Eighth Report, para 52.

¹⁶⁷ As to abandonment, see p 301. ¹⁶⁸ [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin). ¹⁶⁹ At [11].

¹⁷⁰ His lordship examined, at [38], whether an animal is to be regarded as wild or domestic.

¹⁷¹ Ofgem conducted a review into electricity ‘theft’, which it was estimated costs the industry approximately £250m annually. The review concluded that electricity providers were not doing enough to detect this behaviour and that consumers were bearing the cost. To ameliorate the problem, Ofgem proposed changes to the regulatory framework governing the provision of electricity. No changes to the criminal law were recommended. The material produced by Ofgem refers to electricity theft, but electricity cannot in fact be stolen. See www.ofgem.gov.uk/electricity/retail-market/market-review-and-reform/electricity-theft.

¹⁷² Eighth Report, para 85. See further Griew, Theft, paras 2.162–2.165; Williams, TBCL, 736–737; Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, Ch 11.

¹⁷³ [1975] Crim LR 513, DC. Cf Flack v Baldry [1988] 1 WLR 214, treating electricity as a ‘noxious thing’ for the purposes of Firearms Act 1968, s 5(1)(b).

¹⁷⁴ See P (2000) 11 Aug, CA, No 0003586 Y5, where D entered his neighbour’s property as a trespasser and made phone calls to premium-rate sex chatlines.

the right to heat belonging to V, by diverting V's hot water so as to warm D's premises.¹⁷⁵ The heat is energy (as is electricity) but is not property.

Section 13 of the Theft Act 1968 provides:¹⁷⁶

A person who dishonestly uses without due authority, or dishonestly causes to be wasted or diverted, any electricity shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

This provision will ordinarily be applied to the case where D dishonestly¹⁷⁷ uses some device to bypass an electricity meter, but beyond that it is capable of some curious applications.¹⁷⁸ It has recently been used to prosecute commuters who charge their mobile phones on the London Underground. Applied strictly there might be an offence under this section where D borrows an electrically driven vehicle such as an environmentally friendly car, golf buggy or disabled person's scooter, though there would be no theft of the vehicle, nor an offence of taking a conveyance under s 12.¹⁷⁹ But proceedings under s 13 in such a case are perhaps very unlikely. There might be some reluctance to prosecute when the substance of what D does is not criminal, even though there is technically some incidental offence.¹⁸⁰

In terms of actus reus, it is enough under s 13 that D causes electricity to be wasted or diverted; he need not be shown to have made any use of the electricity for himself. An employee who, out of spite for his employer, puts on all the lighting and heating appliances in the office would commit the offence; but a fellow employee, or even a stranger, who, knowing what D has done, chooses to stay in the office to enjoy the warmth, would not: 'use' implies some consumption of electricity which would not occur but for the accused's acts.¹⁸¹ The offence extends only to the abstraction of electricity, whether from the mains or a battery source. Gas and water, if dishonestly appropriated, can form the subject of a theft charge. Despite the upsurge in using more environmentally friendly energy sources (solar and wind, etc) the s 13 offence only protects against the dishonest abstraction of these forms of power once converted.¹⁸²

The mens rea of s 13 is dishonesty. The partial definition of dishonesty in s 2 (see later) does not apply; the test of dishonesty does.¹⁸³ Although it has been held in cases of electricity meter tampering that the defendant must be shown to have an intention not to pay, this ¹⁷⁵ Clinton v Cahill [1998] NI 200. Nor is it theft of the hot water, unless all, or substantially all, of the heat is exhausted, so as to deprive the water of its 'virtue'.

¹⁷⁶ For recent use of the offence, see Handford [2016] EWCA Crim 1838.

¹⁷⁷ See Boggeln v Williams [1978] 2 All ER 1061, [1978] Crim LR 242, DC, p 877. Care must be taken when the offence alleged is against a number of occupants of a property in which the meter has been bypassed—Hoar and Hoar [1992] Crim LR 606; Collins and Fox v Chief Constable of Merseyside [1988] Crim LR 247.

¹⁷⁸ cf Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 2.176. It has been prosecuted where, eg, D has wired his house to run appliances from the nearby council street lamp.

¹⁷⁹ See Ch 20.

¹⁸⁰ Prosecutions have been brought for stealing the petrol consumed where D has borrowed a motor vehicle, but this was never regarded as satisfactory, and the offence of taking motor vehicles was introduced. Cf Low v Bleasde, n 173, where it was apparently assumed that a dishonest user of a telephone may commit the offence under s 13. See also R v Sui-Tak-Chee (1984) unreported, in which abstracting electricity valued at one-eighth of a Hong Kong cent by using a computer without authorization led to a conviction; referred to in S Fafinski, 'Access Denied' (2006) 70 J Crim L 424.

¹⁸¹ This sentence was approved in McReadie and Tume (1992) 96 Cr App R 143, [1992] Crim LR 872, CA.

¹⁸² There are strong policy arguments for saying that if D prevents V's solar panels from working by blocking the sun over his property or deprives V's turbines of wind, V's remedy should be through the civil law, and not the criminal law.

¹⁸³ Melwani [1989] Crim LR 565, CA, applying Ghosh [1982] QB 1053, but now the appropriate test would be that in Ivey [2017] UKSC 67, [74].

is too generous to the defence; it is one factor to be considered in the overall question of dishonesty.¹⁸⁴ There is a potential problem with mens rea: D may plausibly claim that he did not consider the fact that he was causing the electricity to be used, and thus lacks the necessary mens rea, as, for example, where D makes unauthorized use of a telephone. It was perhaps for these reasons that the law was amended by the Theft Act 1968¹⁸⁵ to create the specific offence of dishonestly using a communication system with intent to avoid payment.¹⁸⁶ This provides an appropriately labelled charge and avoids the prosecution appearing strained.

Parliament has created specific offences to deal with dishonesty in relation to particular conduct involving electronic equipment including, for example, receiving programmes broadcast via satellite and cable,¹⁸⁷ reprogramming,¹⁸⁸ or offering or agreeing to change or interfere with, or offering or agreeing to arrange for another person to change or interfere with mobile phone SIM cards.¹⁸⁹

18.3.2.7 Confidential information

It has been held¹⁹⁰ that confidential information, though it has a value and can be sold, is not property within s 4(1). Accordingly, an undergraduate was not guilty of theft where he unlawfully acquired an examination paper and returned that original piece of paper after he had read its contents.¹⁹¹ The 'theft' of information is a serious problem, particularly in the form of industrial espionage, for which the civil law arguably provides inadequate remedies. However, as Griew observes,¹⁹² the Theft Act is not the appropriate instrument to deal with this specialized kind of mischief. Examining the issue from a more theoretical perspective, Green argues that while it would be conceptually possible for intangibles such as confidential information to fall within the scope of the law of theft, caution ought to be exercised. Green makes the point that not every appropriation of information ought to be capable of constituting theft, especially if it does not deprive its owner of substantial use of it. The practical consequence of this, Green argues, is that prosecutors and juries might find it difficult to identify when a given instance of information appropriation ought to constitute theft.¹⁹³ The Law Commission has reviewed the possibility of introducing a specific offence of the ¹⁸⁴ See Collins and Fox v Chief Constable of Merseyside [1988] Crim LR 247; Griew, Theft, para 2.164.

¹⁸⁵ Sch 2, Part 1, para 8, see now Communications Act 2003, s 125: dishonestly obtaining an electronic communications service with intent to avoid payment of a charge applicable to that service. In Mariusz Mikolajczak v District Court in Kalisz, Poland [2013] EWHC 432 (Admin), Keith J suggested, obiter, that this might be the appropriate offence to charge when an individual obtains mobile phone credit by charging the cost to another user. But this does not cover 999 calls since no payment is involved; it is, however, an offence under s 5(2) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 to cause any wasteful employment of the police.

¹⁸⁶ Punishable, on summary conviction, by six months' imprisonment and/or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum; and, on indictment, by two years' imprisonment. As to the intent, cf Corbyn v Saunders [1978] Crim LR 169, DC.

¹⁸⁷ Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, s 297(1) and s 297A inserted by the Conditional Access (Unauthorised Decoders) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/1175. See Mainwaring [2002] FSR 20. On the spate of prosecutions relating to unauthorized viewing of premiership football matches, see S Clover, 'Confused Signals—Satellite Broadcasting and Premiership Football' [2007] Ent LR 126.

¹⁸⁸ Mobile Telephones (Re-programming) Act 2002.

¹⁸⁹ Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006, s 62 amending the 2002 Act.

¹⁹⁰ Oxford v Moss (1978) 68 Cr App R 183, [1979] Crim LR 119.

¹⁹¹ But see commentary at [1979] Crim LR 119.

¹⁹² Griew, Theft, para 2.25. See further R Hammond, 'Theft of Information' (1984) 100 LQR 252; JT Cross, 'Protecting Confidential Information under the Criminal Law of Theft and Fraud' (1991) 11 OJLS 264; AL Christie, 'Should the Law of Theft Extend to Information?' (2005) 69 J Crim L 349; A Coleman, Intellectual Property Law (1994). See also L Weinreb, 'Information and Property' (1988) 38 UTLJ 117, and the Canadian Supreme Court in Stewart (1988) 50 DLR 1.

¹⁹³ Green, 13 Ways, Ch 4.

misuse of trade secrets,¹⁹⁴ and in view of the significance and prevalence of the problem, legislation would seem desirable. The Law Commission's proposal was to criminalize non-consensual use or disclosure of another's trade secrets.

18.3.2.8 Services

Services do not constitute property, so it is not theft for D dishonestly to walk off without paying for his haircut.¹⁹⁵ Specific offences were originally included in the Theft Act 1978 to deal with this problem, and now the Fraud Act 2006 provides an offence of dishonestly obtaining services which was described by the Law Commission when drafting it as 'akin to theft'.¹⁹⁶

18.3.3 Belonging to another

The third element of the actus reus of theft is that the property which D appropriates must belong to another.

18.3.3.1 The general rule

Section 5(1) of the Theft Act 1968 provides:

Property shall be regarded as belonging to any person having possession or control of it, or having in it any proprietary right or interest (not being an equitable interest arising only from an agreement to transfer or grant an interest).

The onus is on the prosecution to prove that the property in question belonged to someone.¹⁹⁷ Frequently this is self-evident and not disputed at trial, but not always.

In the ordinary case, property is stolen from someone who both owns and possesses it, by someone who has no interest in the property whatever, as where V's wallet is stolen by a stranger, D. Section 5(1) covers this case, of course, but it goes much further. Two partners both own the whole of the partnership property; but if one of them dishonestly makes off with it to the exclusion of the other, he steals it from the other.¹⁹⁸ As a further example of the breadth of s 5(1), suppose that V lends a book to X and that X is showing the book to Z when D snatches the book from Z's hands and makes off with it. Here D has stolen the book from Z (who has control of it), and X (who has possession of it), and V (who also has a proprietary interest—ownership—in it).

Moreover, under s 5(1) D can still be guilty of stealing an item of property if he has an interest (ie possession or control) in that property, provided someone else, V, also has a proprietary interest in it at the same time and it is D's intention dishonestly to deprive V permanently of his interest. So, in the above illustration, if Z were dishonestly to appropriate the book he would steal it from both V and X,¹⁹⁹ and if X were dishonestly to appropriate ¹⁹⁴ See LCCP 150, Legislating the Criminal Code: Misuses of Trade Secrets (1997), and the reviews by J Hull, 'Stealing Secrets: A Review of the Law Commission Consultation Paper' [1998] Crim LR 246; A Trenton and C Steele, 'Trade Secrets: The Need for Criminal Liability' (1998) 20 EIPR 188. For a recent review of the criminal law's general protection for intellectual property, see C Davies, 'Protection of Intellectual Property—A Myth?' (2004) 68 J Crim L 398.

¹⁹⁵ Green argues that a distinction ought to be made between public and private services. This distinction has consequences for whether the service in question ought to be capable of being stolen. See Green, 13 Ways, 230–234.

¹⁹⁶ See p 966.

¹⁹⁷ The person to whom the property belongs will usually be known and identified in the charges, but if the owner is unknown D may be charged with stealing the property of a person unknown provided that this does not result in D being unable to ascertain the nature of the case he has to meet. Cf Gregory [1972] 2 All ER 861 at 866, CA (handling property of person unknown).

¹⁹⁸ Bonner [1970] 1 WLR 838.

¹⁹⁹ cf Thompson (1862) Le & Ca 225. D made off with a sovereign [coin] which V handed him to buy a ticket for her because she was unable to make her way through the crowd before a ticket office. This would be theft by D. Cf Rose v Matt [1951] 1 KB 810, DC.

the book he would steal it from V. Even an owner may steal his own property. So, if A owns a book, and lends it to B, while the book is in B's possession it belongs to B for the purposes of s 5(1). When A appropriates it, there is 'another' who has a proprietary interest: B. It is important to note that s 5 does not place any limitations on the class of persons who may steal. It is possible for a person to steal property even where he has a better proprietary claim than the victim. So D can be liable for theft of his book on loan to V even though D is the owner and V has mere possession of it.

Of course, it will be rare for D's appropriation of his own property to amount not just to an appropriation but to a complete theft because D will be unlikely to possess mens rea: he may easily be able to plead a claim of right,²⁰⁰ or be unlikely to be found dishonest generally. But consider Turner (No 2).²⁰¹ D had left his car with V for repair, promising to pay for the repairs when he returned to collect the car the following day. D, however, returned a few hours later and surreptitiously took back his car using the spare keys. Although D claimed that he was entitled to do as he did, it was clear from the circumstances that he was acting dishonestly, and his conviction for stealing the car from V was affirmed. At first sight this seems obviously right because D was out to cheat V of his right to retain the property until the debt for the service work was satisfied (technically known as his 'lien'). V had a proprietary right or interest in the property and, even as against the owner, D, the car could be properly regarded as belonging to V so long as he had his lien. Unfortunately, the trial judge told the jury to disregard the question of the lien. Thus, the case is authority for a much broader proposition: that D may steal his own property from V who is D's 'bailee at will' (ie where D is entitled to terminate the bailment at any time). It is obvious that so long as V remains in possession of D's property he has a 'proprietary right or interest' as against third parties. Should X have come along and taken Turner's car while it was in V's possession, there would be no difficulty in saying X stole it from V. But it seems odd to regard V as having a 'proprietary interest' as against D, when D could take back his property as he is entitled to do.

Turner is difficult to justify.²⁰² A better decision is that of Judge da Cunha in Meredith.²⁰³ D surreptitiously removed his car from a police pound where it had been lawfully placed by the police for causing an obstruction. It was held that D could not be convicted of stealing the car. The police were lawfully in possession of it so that a third party could have stolen it from them. But, they had no right to retain it from D: they had a right to enforce the statutory charge for its removal from the compound, but not to retain it from him. It is useful to compare the position of the police and the repairer in Turner (No 2). There are differences,²⁰⁴ but, if the police were not liable in Meredith, Turner should not have been liable (ignoring the repairer's lien as the courts in that case did).

²⁰⁰ See p 873. ²⁰¹ [1971] 2 All ER 441, CA.

²⁰² Insofar as Turner decided that V's possession need not be lawful, it is obviously right and was approved on this point in Kelly [1998] 3 All ER 741 at 750. It may be theft to take the stolen property from a thief; the law protects his possession. But the point in Turner is that D (in the absence of a lien) had every right to take his own property back. If the owner takes his property from a thief who is unlawfully detaining it, does he steal it if he mistakenly thinks it is someone else's property?

²⁰³ [1973] Crim LR 253.

²⁰⁴ The police were not bailees of the car (they came into possession by a statutory power to take the car).

18.3.3.2 Possession or control

Possession and control may overlap, and it is not important to pursue any possible distinction between them because property is treated as belonging to V if he has either possession or control. It is the limits of these concepts which are important, not the difference between them.

Possession requires both an intention to possess and some degree of control in fact. If V and D both see a wallet on the pavement, both may have the same intent to possess it, but until one of them seizes it neither has possession. Once V seizes it he has both possession and control. If he hands it to D just to show D what he has got, it would normally be said that V retains possession while D has control.

Possession and control are not, however, always as clear-cut as in this illustration where V's intent existed in respect of a specific article (wallet) and he reduced it into his actual control—he had it in his hands. But it is not necessary to have, or ever to have had, control of a thing in this sense in order to have possession. A drinks vending-machine supplier may have possession of the coins inserted in the machine without knowing at any given moment how many coins, if any, are in the machine.²⁰⁵ Similarly, a householder normally has possession of the whole contents of his house even though he cannot itemize all his goods.

It is not, then, essential that V's intent to possess should exist in respect of a specific thing; it may be enough for V's intent to exist in respect of all the goods situated about his premises. In Woodman,²⁰⁶ V owned some disused business premises. V sold all the scrap metal on the premises to X; X removed most of it but left some as being too inaccessible to be worth the expense of removal. D then entered the premises to take some of this scrap and was held to have been rightly convicted of theft from V. V continued to control the site and by erecting fences and posting notices V showed that he intended to exclude others; that was enough to give V control of the scrap which he did not wish to remove.

This principle was exemplified in the cases involving the theft of golf balls from lakes and water features on courses with a view to the balls being resold (reportedly producing a £15,000 to £30,000 annual turnover). In Rostron,²⁰⁷ the Court of Appeal confirmed that the issue was whether there was evidence that golf balls hit into a lake were property belonging to another—the club owning the course.²⁰⁸ It remains necessary for the prosecution to prove that the golf ball retrievers were acting dishonestly in order to sustain a theft conviction, and that may be no easy task. Possibly a finder who was not trespassing—a visitor playing a round of golf or a person crossing the course under a public right of way—would have a better right than the club to the ball. If so (and it is a question of civil law turning on whether they had exercised control over the course to assert title to the property on it), it is submitted that he could not be guilty of theft.

²⁰⁵ cf Martin v Marsh [1955] Crim LR 781 (electricity meters). But see [1956] Crim LR 74.

²⁰⁶ [1974] QB 754, CA. See also Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 2 KB 142, DC (theft of golf balls 'lost' on club premises) criticized by R Hickey (2006) 26 LS 584 for its 'cavalier' reasoning, at 600; Williams v Phillips (1957) 41 Cr App R 5, DC (theft of refuse from dustbins).

²⁰⁷ [2003] EWCA Crim 2206.

²⁰⁸ See L Toczek, 'Never Plead Guilty!' (2002) 146 SJ 455. See also the detailed analysis by Hickey, n 206, considering whether it would matter if the balls were in the ground (in a water feature or embedded, etc) or on the ground, and suggesting that the criminal courts ought to follow the civil law where the property is found on the land—asking whether the landowner had evidenced an intention to control the land and anything on it. Where the item is found in the land, title should be with the landowner.

Dependence on civil law

In some instances the question of who has a proprietary interest will turn on technical issues of civil law. In Marshall,²⁰⁹ D obtained part-used Underground tickets and travel cards from members of the public passing through railway barriers and resold them to other potential customers, so depriving London Underground Ltd (LUL) of the revenue it would have gained from the potential customers. D was convicted of theft of the part-used tickets from LUL. The court assumed that those tickets, though in the possession of the passengers, continued to belong to LUL because there was a contract term to that effect on the reverse of each ticket.²¹⁰ If reasonable efforts had been made by LUL to bring that term to the passenger's notice, the passenger was merely in possession of a ticket belonging to LUL. It could be stolen from him and from LUL.²¹¹ If sufficient notice of the term was not given to the passenger, the ticket belonged only to the passenger who had originally purchased it, LUL had no proprietary interest in it and D could not properly be convicted of stealing from LUL. The availability of the theft charge turns on the application of the law of contract. (See also later in relation to equitable interests.)

18.3.3.3 Proprietary interests and treasure trove

At common law, the rules of treasure trove governed whether the Crown owned articles of gold or silver whose original owner or successors in title could not be found.²¹² The Treasure Act 1996 abolished the law relating to 'treasure trove', replacing it by a wide concept of 'treasure' including, as well as any object which would previously have been treasure trove, other specified objects at least 300, or in some cases 200, years old.²¹³ When 'treasure' is found it vests in the Crown. The finder of treasure, D, who takes it for himself commits the actus reus of theft: he has appropriated property belonging to the Crown. To prove theft from the Crown, in addition to the usual mens rea it has to be shown that D knew the Crown was, or at least might be,²¹⁴ the owner, which can be difficult depending on the item found. It is possible instead to charge D with theft from the landowner on whose land the treasure was found. D's knowledge of the proprietary interest of the landowner (ie his dishonesty and mens rea) is easier to prove.²¹⁵ In Waverley Borough Council v Fletcher,²¹⁶ F, using a metal detector in a public park belonging to the council, found a mediaeval gold brooch. A coroner's inquest decided that it was ²⁰⁹ [1998] 2 Cr App R 282, discussed by JC Smith, 'Stealing Tickets' [1998] Crim LR 723. For consideration of the case and offences that may have been committed, see also K Reid and J MacLeod, 'Ticket Touts or Theft of Tickets and Related Offences' (1999) 63 J Crim L 593.

²¹⁰ Even if such a term existed, it is for the jury to determine whether LUL had taken reasonable steps to bring that condition to the notice of the 'buyer'—as the passenger probably thought himself to be: see the contract case of Parker v South Eastern Rly Co (1877) 2 CPD 416, CA.

²¹¹ He was a buyer of the right to travel on the railway, a thing in action.

²¹² See Hancock (1989) 90 Cr App R 422, [1990] Crim LR 125 and the discussion in earlier editions of this work.

²¹³ See generally EM Paintin, 'The Criminal Offence under the Treasure Act' (2001) Art Antiquities & Law 101 and J Marston and L Ross, 'Treasure and Portable Antiquities in the 1990s still Chained to the Ghosts of the Past: The Treasure Act 1996' [1997] Conv 273, criticizing the Act for offering only piecemeal protection.

²¹⁴ 'Might be' because the finder may be aware that 'reasonable steps' might reveal that the find was of silver and that it had been concealed, not lost: Theft Act 1968, s 2(1)(c), p 873.

²¹⁵ Under the doctrine of 'transferred malice', D's intention dishonestly to deprive the landowner of the property may be treated as an intention dishonestly to deprive the Crown. If the property turns out to be treasure, D may be guilty of stealing it both from the landowner and from the Crown. On the legal position of those who take property washed ashore, see the Merchant Shipping Act 1995 and, in relation to England and Wales, the Protection of Wrecks Act 1973. See M Salter and C Bryden, 'Finders, Keepers and Illegal Sweepers' (2007) 151 SJ 1018.

²¹⁶ [1995] 4 All ER 756.

not treasure trove and returned it to F. It was held that the council was entitled to a declaration that the brooch was its property. Auld LJ helpfully stated two principles:

- (1) where an article is found in or attached to land, the owner or possessor of the land has a better title than the finder;²¹⁷
- (2) where an article is found unattached on land, the owner or possessor of the land has a better title than the finder only if he exercised such manifest control over the land as to indicate an intention to control the land and anything that might be found on it.²¹⁸

18.3.3.4 Any proprietary right or interest

Property is also to be regarded as belonging to any person having in it 'any proprietary right or interest'. Obviously, then, property may be stolen from the owner although at the time of the appropriation the owner is not in possession or control, as where V lends his library book to X and D steals the book from X. Furthermore, property may be stolen from the owner even though he may never have been in possession or control. If X sells goods to V (ownership passing to V) but X remains in possession of them until V has collected, if D dishonestly appropriates them, he steals from both X and V.²¹⁹ Moreover, on those facts if X, after he has sold the goods to V, dishonestly appropriates them (eg by selling them to Y) X steals the property from V even though X was still in possession of the property; X has usurped V's proprietary right in the property. Similarly, if V dishonestly removed from X's premises the property he has bought (with intent to avoid paying for the property), then V steals from X because he usurps X's remaining interest in the property.²²⁰

D may appropriate property which belongs to V in any of the senses described in s 5(1). It does not matter that V's interest is precarious or that it may be short-lived; wild birds reared by V may belong to V although they may 'betake themselves to the woods and fields' as soon as they are old enough to fly,²²¹ and flowers left on a grave remain the property of the leaver.²²² Nor does it matter that someone exists who has a better right to the property than V: a thief may steal from a thief.²²³ This is a well-established principle. It does not matter that it is impossible for the victim (the original thief) to assert his title in a civil court: public policy which prevents the wrongdoer from enforcing a property right should have no application to criminal proceedings brought in the name of the Crown. The criminal law is concerned with keeping the Queen's peace, not vindicating individual property rights.²²⁴

²¹⁷ In Rowe (1859) 8 Cox CC 139, R was convicted of larceny from a canal company of iron found in the bed of a canal when it was drained. The true owner of the iron was unknown but the canal company had a sufficient proprietary interest in it. Rowe was followed by Chitty J in Elwes v Brigg Gas Co (1886) 33 Ch D 562, and in South Staffordshire Water Co v Sharman [1896] 2 QB 44. Cf Woodman (1974) 59 Cr App R 200, CA, p 855.

²¹⁸ In Parker v British Airways Board [1982] QB 1004, a passenger who found a gold bracelet in a British Airways executive lounge was held to have a better right to it than British Airways. On the other hand, in Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 2 KB 142, a trespasser on a golf course was held guilty of larceny of balls lost by golfers from the secretary and members of the golf club. He was aware of the intent of the club to exclude him as a 'pilferer' of lost balls, so the case is distinguishable, cf Rostron [2003] EWCA Crim 2206. See further the discussion by Hickey (2006) 26 LS 584, n 206.

²¹⁹ Frequently the thief will have no idea of the identity of the owner, or owners, of the property; it suffices that he knows the property belongs to another.

²²⁰ cf Rose v Matt [1951] 1 KB 810, DC (D pawned a clock and dishonestly retook it from pawnbroker).

²²¹ cf Shickle (1868) LR 1 CCR 158.

²²² According to Bustler v State, 184 SE 2d 24 (1944) (SC of Tennessee). Cf Edwards and Stacey (1877) 13 Cox CC 384.

²²³ cf Clarke, referred to at [1956] Crim LR 369–370; Meech [1974] QB 549, and see Rose [2008] EWCA Crim 239.

²²⁴ Smith [2011] EWCA Crim 66, citing this work and Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft on the point.

18.3.3.5 Equitable interests

The term ‘any proprietary right or interest’ in s 5 extends to both legal and equitable proprietary interests. Where property is subject to a trust it belongs to both the trustee (legal interest) and beneficiary (equitable interest) and it may be stolen from either. The question whether V has an equitable interest in property alleged to have been stolen from him may involve difficult issues of civil law as, for example, in Clowes (No 2),²²⁵ where the criminal court had to consider various Chancery decisions and to rely on the principles of equity relating to tracing into mixed funds to determine whether there was property belonging to another. The criminal law becomes dependent on the civil law here, and if the scope of the civil law’s definition of who has a ‘proprietary interest’ changes, that affects the scope of the criminal law. See the discussion of s 5(4) later.²²⁶

Under s 5(1) property is not to be regarded as belonging to a person who has an equitable interest arising only from an agreement to transfer or grant an interest. A specifically enforceable contract to sell property may give the intending buyer an equitable interest in the property²²⁷ and the provision makes it clear that the seller cannot commit theft by reselling the property to another, however dishonest this may be thought to be.

18.3.3.6 Trust property

Section 5(2) of the Theft Act 1968 provides:

Where property is subject to a trust, the persons to whom it belongs shall be regarded as including any person having a right to enforce the trust, and an intention to defeat the trust shall be regarded accordingly as an intention to deprive of the property any person having that right.

In the ordinary case, appropriation of trust property²²⁸ by a trustee is covered not only by this subsection but also by s 5(1) because the beneficiary ordinarily has a proprietary interest and accordingly the trust property belongs to another—the beneficiary—within s 5(1). In Sanders,²²⁹ D, the executor of a will, appropriated £100,000 of the legacy. He admitted doing so and admitted that he did so dishonestly. He argued that this was not theft since subsequently it had come to light that there was a second will naming him as the beneficiary. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction. Once probate had been granted a trust was established, and if D had discovered that he was the beneficiary under a second will he ought to have sought an amendment of probate. As the court noted, in some cases there would be a ground for arguing that D was not dishonest in such action.

In some exceptional circumstances there will be no ascertained beneficiary. This occurs in the case of ‘purpose’ trusts, whether charitable²³⁰ or private,²³¹ where the object is to effect some purpose rather than to benefit ascertainable individuals. To meet such cases s 5(2) goes further than s 5(1) by providing that the property is to be treated as belonging to anyone who has a right to enforce the trust.²³² As far as charitable trusts are concerned, the trustees are the legal owners of the charity’s funds but, if they misappropriate the money, ²²⁵ [1994] 2 All ER 316. See also MC Davies, ‘After R v Clowes No 2: An Act of Theft Empowered—A Jury Impoverished’ (1997) 61 J Crim L 99 commenting that with a trial based on complex legal issues the effect is to reduce the issues that fall to be determined by the jury, potentially displacing the importance of, eg, s 2(1)(a) of Theft Act 1968.

²²⁶ See p 863.

²²⁷ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, para 2.196.

²²⁸ Brazier (1975) 39 Conv (NS) 29.

²²⁹ [2003] EWCA Crim 3079.

²³⁰ eg where money is given to D in trust for the improvement of schools in a particular locality.

²³¹ eg where money is given to D in trust for the maintenance of a tomb, or for the upkeep of animals.

²³² In these examples this would be, respectively, the A-G and the person entitled to the residue of the estate.

they steal not from the donors to that charity, but from the Attorney General who has the right to enforce the trust.²³³

18.3.3.7 Property received for a particular purpose

Section 5(3) of the 1968 Act provides that:

When a person receives property from or on account of another, and is under an obligation to the other to retain and deal with that property or its proceeds in a particular way, the property or proceeds shall be regarded (as against him) as belonging to the other.

If there is no legal obligation on D to retain and deal with the property in a particular way, it is his to do as he likes with, and it cannot be theft for him to do what he is entitled to do. But where there is such an obligation, it seems right that the property should be capable of being stolen by D. A straightforward example would be where D agrees to do certain work for V and V makes an advance payment of £100. D's failure to do the work or return the £100 will be a breach of contract but no criminal offence.²³⁴ But if V had given D the money for a specified purpose, such as to buy materials for the job, that would create the obligation on D to retain and deal, so that D's dishonest disposal of the money for some other purpose would be theft under s 5(3).

Breadth of application

Section 5(3) covers a very wide range of cases. Every bailment seems to be included. So does every trust. Section 5(1) is so wide that in many cases it is unnecessary to rely on s 5(3). So where D has received property from or on account of V in the circumstances described in the subsection, V will usually have a legal or equitable interest in the property or proceeds.²³⁵

Should D dishonestly appropriate the property, he will be stealing it from V who has retained a proprietary right or interest. The case is covered by s 5(1) and so s 5(3) is, strictly speaking, unnecessary, but it is useful because it allows the prosecution to make out their case more easily, without the need to resort to the technical question whether V retains an interest.

'From or on account of another'

The section applies only where the property is 'received from or on account of another'. This creates a difficulty where the property is credited to D's account by a bank transfer.²³⁶ Preddy decides that since the credit is new property, a thing in action which belongs to D and has never belonged to anyone else, D could not be guilty of obtaining property belonging to another by deception. The property has only ever been D's. On one interpretation, D has not 'received' the property from another or on account of another. The property of the other, V, was the thing in action—V's right to sue his bank—and that was extinguished when D's new item of property was created. On that interpretation, s 5(3) does not apply and D can be guilty of theft only if the person whose bank account has been debited retains an equitable interest in the new property owned by D. An alternative interpretation is to suggest that ²³³ Dyke and Munro [2002] Crim LR 153, [2002] 1 Cr App R 404.

²³⁴ Of course, if D never intended to do the work, he would be guilty of fraud under s 2 of the 2006 Act and, since Gomez, of theft of it. But if he was acting honestly at the time he received the money, once he had received it he was the absolute owner of it and there was nothing belonging to another for him to steal.

²³⁵ cf Klineberg and Marsden [1999] Crim LR 419 and commentary in the Crim LR. Klineberg was straightforward, since the money was paid to D on the understanding that it would be 'safeguarded by trusteeship'.

²³⁶ Though it is commonly called a bank transfer, in law it is not a 'transfer' at all.

D has received the thing in action that never previously existed and never belonged to anyone other than him. On that interpretation, s 5(3) would apply. The issue may be academic since D may be guilty of a Fraud Act offence in such cases.

'Obligation'

It is settled that an 'obligation' to retain and deal with property in a certain way in s 5(3) (and (4) to be discussed later) means a legal, not a merely moral or social, obligation. That much is straightforward; determining whether there is such an obligation is far less so. Where the relevant transaction which allegedly creates the obligation is wholly in writing, it is for the judge to decide as a matter of law whether it does create the legal obligation and to direct the jury accordingly.²³⁷ Where the obligation is alleged to have been created wholly or partly by word of mouth, or by conduct, the judge should direct the jury that if they find the necessary facts (which he must refer them to specifically) proved, there is an obligation—not that it is 'open to them' to find that there is an obligation.²³⁸ Aside from the correct procedure for determining whether a legal obligation existed, the substance of that question will often involve complex issues of civil law.²³⁹

Obligation owed to V

It is plain that the obligation must be owed by D to V. It is not enough that D is under an obligation to a third party to deal with the property for the benefit of V. The case of *Floyd v DPP*²⁴⁰ is difficult to square with this principle. D collected money in weekly premiums from colleagues who had ordered goods from a Christmas hamper company—V Ltd. She failed to pay the money to V Ltd and her conviction for stealing it from V Ltd was upheld in reliance on s 5(3). The court said it was unnecessary to show that V Ltd had any legal or equitable interest in the money. D may have had a contract with her colleagues (V was not privy to that) but now, under the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999²⁴¹ D's contract with colleagues may 'purport to confer a benefit' on V, resulting in D having an obligation to V: s 5(3) then applies.

Examples of s 5(3) in operation

If D is under no legal obligation to retain and deal with property which has been delivered to him, he can lawfully do what he likes with it and it is incapable of being stolen, as are its proceeds. This is ordinarily the position where money is lent. It is not always easy to determine whether D was under an obligation to retain and deal or at liberty to dispose of the property entirely as he wished. It is, to underline the point, a question of civil law.

Advance payments

As noted earlier, this includes if V has given D money for a specified purpose, as an advance such as to buy materials for the job. That would create the obligation on D to retain and deal, so that D's dishonest disposal of the money for some other purpose would be theft.

Deposits

If V were to pay a deposit to D, a trader, for goods to be supplied D's liability under s 5(3) will depend on whether D is under an obligation to deal with that deposit in a particular way.

²³⁷ Clowes (No 2) [1994] 2 All ER 316, holding that a brochure inviting the payment of money for investment in gilts was a contractual document creating a trust.

²³⁸ Dubar [1995] 1 All ER 781, following Mainwaring (1981) 74 Cr App R 99 and disapproving dicta in Hall [1972] 2 All ER 1009 at 1012 and Hayes (1976) 64 Cr App R 82 at 85 and 87.

²³⁹ See eg Breaks and Huggan [1998] Crim LR 349 (contractual obligations of insurance brokers placing insurance with Lloyds).

²⁴⁰ [2000] Crim LR 411, DC.

²⁴¹ Applying to contracts made on or after 11 May 2000.

The difficulties in application are well illustrated by Hall.²⁴² D, a partner in a firm of travel agents, had received money from V and others as deposits for flights to the United States. The flights never materialized and the deposits, which had been paid into the firm's general trading account, were never returned to V and other customers. The Court of Appeal had no difficulty in accepting the jury's verdict that D had acted dishonestly in spending this money, but quashed D's conviction for theft on the ground that D had not received the money under an obligation to deal with it in a particular way. The court reached this conclusion with obvious reluctance (as ever when there has been a finding of dishonesty).²⁴³

The case shows that if D owes money to V and he dishonestly disposes of his assets so that when the time comes for payment to V he has no funds from which to meet his debts, he will not be under an obligation for the purposes of s 5(3). Moreover, it makes no difference, as far as the law of theft is concerned, that D has acted in this way in order to defeat his creditors. A liability to pay V is accordingly not enough under s 5(3) unless D is obliged to keep in existence a fund representing that property.

This issue was also considered in *Foster*²⁴⁴ in which D collected sums of money from work colleagues for the purpose of pooling them to place large bets on sporting events. D pooled those funds with others, not subject to any such restriction, and drew on the global fund for his own purposes. D was convicted of theft on the basis that he dishonestly appropriated over £1.4 million of the investors' property for his own purpose and benefit. D appealed and argued that s 5(3) did not apply to the sum he had appropriated for his own benefit.

Citing Hall, the Court of Appeal stated that the crucial issue was whether the property was given to D in circumstances where he had to retain or deal with it or its proceeds in a particular way. It was held that this was a matter for the jury and that the judge had been right to leave it to them to evaluate whether there was such a legal obligation. The problem, however, was that on the facts of the case there were around 8,500 individuals who had invested in D's scheme and it was impossible to say which investors had imposed which obligations on the monies. All of the monies had been placed into a mixed fund, which made the task even more difficult. D's conviction was quashed on the basis that it was impossible to tell whether the monies he had used for his own purposes were subject to an obligation that they be used for a particular purpose.

Foster makes clear that even if D is under an obligation to deal with some of the funds in a particular way, within the meaning of s 5(3), if these are pooled with funds that are not subject to the obligation or there is doubt about whether there is such an obligation, then D cannot be guilty if it is funds from this mixed pool it is alleged that he has used for his own purpose. Of course, if D has separated the funds such that it is possible to determine whether he has only used those funds subject to the obligation for his own purposes, the position will be different. As the Court of Appeal observes, however, this is an unlikely scenario and indeed D now has an incentive to pool the funds.

Breaches of contract

Section 5(3) may apply to cases of mere breach of contract not covered by s 5(1). For example, D who buys a non-transferable ticket may become the owner of the ticket, but be under a contractual obligation to 'retain and deal with it in a particular manner' in the sense of 'not dealing' with it.²⁴⁵ In the case of a rail ticket, such as that in Marshall, his ownership of the ticket involved his contractual obligation not to assign it to another. But note that the ²⁴² [1972] 2 All ER 1009, CA, and see Hayes (1976) 64 Cr App R 82.

²⁴³ [1972] 2 All ER 1009 at 1011. See Re Kumar [2000] Crim LR 504, DC, where there was such an obligation.

²⁴⁴ [2011] EWCA Crim 1192.

²⁴⁵ cf Smith [1998] Crim LR 723 at 726. It is pointed out that this is not theft of the thing in action, but whether it is theft of the thing in possession (the ticket) is not considered.

property must be 'received'. Where D enters into a contract to deal with his own property in his own possession the subsection does not apply.²⁴⁶

Charity sponsorship

A common situation in which s 5(3) is used is where D receives property from V for onward transmission to, or for the benefit of, E. The required obligation may be imposed on D either by D's relationship with V, or his relationship with E, or both. After a strange decision in Lewis v Lethbridge,²⁴⁷ the court in *Wain*²⁴⁸ rightly held that where D obtained sponsorships in favour of a charity (E) and received money from sponsors (V), D is under an obligation and guilty of theft if he disposes of the property dishonestly.

Obligations imposed by statute

It is possible for the obligation to be imposed on D by statute. No doubt when the State pays housing benefit to D to enable D to pay his rent, the expectation is that D will use that money to pay his landlord, but it was held in *Huskinson*²⁴⁹ that D was not guilty of theft where he spent some of the money received as housing benefit on himself. There was nothing in the relevant legislation suggesting that D was bound to pay that money or its proceeds to the landlord. D could have met his legal obligation to pay the rent from any source, such as an unexpected win on the lottery, and spent the benefit as he chose.

Obligations and agency

An obligation to deal with property in a specified way may be imposed on D in civil law through the acts of his agents. However, if D is unaware of the facts giving rise to that obligation, the prosecution cannot rely on s 5(3).²⁵⁰ Moreover, if D knew the facts but owing to his mistake of civil law believed that there was no obligation and that the money was his to do as he liked with, he would not be dishonest and should be acquitted on that ground.

If D receives a bribe in contravention of his duty to his principal, V, the principal may recover the amount of the bribe in a civil action; and D can steal the amount of the bribe. This is a complex question of civil law that has only relatively recently been resolved. In Lister & Co v Stubbs,²⁵¹ the Court of Appeal held V has no proprietary interest in the money; but in A-G for Hong Kong v Reid,²⁵² the Privy Council disagreed and held that a bribe should be treated as being held on constructive trust for V from the moment it is received.²⁵³ In *FHR European Ventures LLP v Cedar Capital Partners LLC*²⁵⁴ the Supreme Court addressed the conflict between the two cases. It was held that V does have a proprietary interest in the money. This decision substantially enlarges the scope of the criminal law²⁵⁵ and for that ²⁴⁶ It may, however, create an equitable interest. Cf commentary on Arnold [1997] Crim LR at 834. The case involved an odd application of s 5(3).

²⁴⁷ [1987] Crim LR 59, DC. D not guilty for spending £54 charity money he raised.

²⁴⁸ [1995] 2 Cr App R 660, following Davidge v Bunnett [1984] Crim LR 297, DC, where, by agreement between flatmates to share the costs of gas, etc, D received money from the others for the gas bill and spent it on Christmas presents. Domestic arrangements are commonly not intended to give rise to legal relationships but here the parties were not members of the same family and presumably intended their agreement to be legally binding. Equally doubtful is the case where a woman was held guilty of stealing money entrusted to her by her cohabitee to buy food, etc for their household: Cullen, No 968/C74 of 1974, unreported.

²⁴⁹ [1988] Crim LR 620, DC.

²⁵⁰ Wills (1990) 92 Cr App R 297.

²⁵¹ (1890) 45 Ch D 1. See also Cullum (1873) LR 2 CCR 28; CLRC, Eighth Report, para 38; Williams, TBCL, 756; ATH Smith, 'Constructive Trusts in the Law of Theft' [1977] Crim LR 395; JC Smith (1956) 19 MLR 39, 46. It has been said that in none of the cases in which a fiduciary has been held liable to account for profits did the question arise whether the defendant was a trustee as opposed to being merely accountable: J Glister and J Lee, Hanbury and Martin, Modern Equity (20th edn, 2015).

²⁵² [1994] 1 AC 324, [1994] 1 All ER 1, PC.

²⁵³ See A Hudson, Equity & Trusts (6th edn, 2010) 519–520.

²⁵⁴ [2014] UKSC 45. For critical comment, see W Gummow, 'Bribes and Constructive Trusts' (2015) 131 LQR 21.

²⁵⁵ See JC Smith, 'Contracts—Mistake, Frustration and Implied Terms' (1994) 110 LQR 400.

reason it is important that criminal practitioners and those who administer the criminal law recognize its impact.

For s 5(3) to apply, it is not necessary that the fiduciary duty arises out of the transaction between D and the person delivering the property to him; it is enough that D's fiduciary duty arises out of a relationship with a person other than the person delivering the property.

18.3.3.8 Property got by mistake

Section 5(4) of the Theft Act provides:

Where a person gets property by another's mistake, and is under an obligation to make restoration (in whole or in part) of the property or its proceeds or of the value thereof, then to the extent of that obligation the property or proceeds shall be regarded (as against him) as belonging to the person entitled to restoration, and an intention not to make restoration shall be regarded accordingly as an intention to deprive that person of the property or proceeds.

This provision was enacted to deal with the problem encountered in the case of Moynes v Cooper.²⁵⁶ D was given an advance on his pay by his employer, V. Later that week, unaware that an advance had been made, V's wages' staff paid D the full weekly wage. D dishonestly kept all of the money. The difficulty in treating this as theft by D is that in law the whole of the full weekly wage belonged to D. Under the pre-Theft Act law D was acquitted. The wages staff made a mistake of course, but that mistake was not such as would prevent ownership of all the money passing to D. This type of case is now covered by s 5(4): D steals the excess payment if he dishonestly appropriates it. Although D becomes the owner of the full weekly wage he is under a legal obligation, at the very least, to repay the value of the excess payment.

Section 5(4) was applied in these circumstances in A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1983).²⁵⁷ D's salary was paid into her bank account by direct debit and on one occasion her employers mistakenly overpaid her by £74.74. Section 5(4) was held to apply. The 'money in the bank' was entirely hers to do with as she liked, but she was under an obligation to repay an equivalent sum (the value) to her employers. On these facts, subject to proof of dishonesty, her failure to do so meant she was guilty of theft.

The law is clear as to V's position in circumstances of making a mistaken payment: if, owing to a mistake of fact, V believes that he is legally obliged to make a payment and he does so, he is entitled in civil law to recover the equivalent of the sum he mistakenly paid.²⁵⁸ It is less clear what D's civil law position is where he has received a payment made in error. The issue whether D was under a legal obligation to repay the value was resolved in the A-G's Reference (No 1) without difficulty, but it will be appreciated that it will not always be so straightforward.

The law of unjust enrichment²⁵⁹ is one of complexity and subtlety which has developed considerably in recent years in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council,²⁶⁰ and Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC.²⁶¹ D's liability for theft may turn upon a consideration of fine points of civil law remote from the central question of D's dishonesty. There was no evidence in the A-G's Reference (No 1) that D had spent the money that was overpaid or that she had done any act in relation to it. To meet a possible argument that in ²⁵⁶ [1956] 1 QB 439. See also the discussion in W Swadling, 'Rescission, Property and the Common Law' (2005) 121 LQR 123 at 135.

²⁵⁷ [1985] QB 182, CA.

²⁵⁸ Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Ltd v William H Price Ltd [1934] AC 455.

²⁵⁹ See R Goff and G Jones, The Law of Unjust Enrichment (9th edn, 2016).

²⁶⁰ [1999] 2 AC 349, followed in a number of other decisions, including Deutsche Morgan Grenfell v IRC [2006] UKHL 49, [2007] AC 558.

²⁶¹ [1996] AC 669.

doing nothing D cannot intend permanently to deprive the owner, s 5(4) further provides that an intention not to make restoration shall be regarded as an intention permanently to deprive.²⁶²

A further difficulty with cases such as this follows from the decision in Preddy and the need to identify which item of property is in issue. In Gresham (discussed later), D's mother had been in receipt of pension payments from her former employer which were made by automatic transfers to her bank account. D failed to inform her former employer (the Department of Education) and the bank of his mother's death. The payments continued to be credited for ten years after her death and D having had the power of attorney to act for her when she was alive, continued to use this power to cash cheques drawn on her account. The cheques drawn by D reduced the credit balance in his mother's account. D was convicted of theft and obtaining a money transfer by deception (contrary to the offence then in force under s 15A of the 1968 Act). The credit balance that D diminished by drawing cheques was not an item of property that belonged to the Department of Education within the terms of s 5(1). The prosecution relied instead on the fact that the payments had been by mistake and that s 5(4) applied. The court upheld convictions for theft on this basis, rejecting an argument that s 5(4) has no application where D has induced V's mistake by deception as 'eccentric'.

Is s 5(4) superfluous?

The foregoing discussion of s 5(4) assumes, as seemingly did the CLRC, that the entire proprietary interest in the money mistakenly paid passes to D, who is no more than a debtor. That is the position at law. Section 5(4) was felt to be necessary to vest a fictitious interest in V who had paid money by mistake. However, some cases have now held that as a matter of equity, where V pays money by mistake to D, V retains an equitable interest. If that is right, V has a proprietary right or interest under s 5(1) in such cases and there would be no need for s 5(4).

In Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd,²⁶³ the X bank by mistake paid $2 million.²⁶⁴ Goulding J held that V who pays money (or, presumably, delivers any property) to D under a mistake of fact retains an equitable interest²⁶⁵ in the money and the conscience of D is subject to a fiduciary duty to respect V's proprietary right.²⁶⁶ The reasoning underpinning this decision was disapproved by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in *Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC*²⁶⁷ but his lordship commented obiter that stolen monies should be treated as being held on constructive trust by the thief, and therefore would be traceable by the original owner of those monies. Having regard to the decision in Kleinwort,²⁶⁸ it now seems that a mistake of fact or law may ground a claim in unjust enrichment, and so an obligation to make restitution may arise where the mistake caused the payment to be made (or other benefit to be transferred). Adopting that approach, in ²⁶² 'Keeping' is a sufficient appropriation. See p 839.

²⁶³ [1981] Ch 105—doubted, but not so as to affect its application in criminal cases, by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669 at 715. Westdeutsche has been followed in Bank of America v Arnell [1999] Lloyd's Rep 399; Clark v Cutland [2003] EWCA Civ 810. For a helpful discussion see G Virgo, Principles of the Law of Restitution (3rd edn, 2015) 598–602.

²⁶⁴ The payment was from the X bank to the Y bank for the account of the Z bank which subsequently went into liquidation. The X bank was, of course, entitled to a dividend in the liquidation but it sought to recover the whole of its loss.

²⁶⁵ Section 5(1) extends to equitable interests, see p 853.

²⁶⁶ Accordingly, the X bank was entitled to the restoration of the whole of the money mistakenly paid and was not relegated to claiming a dividend in the liquidation.

²⁶⁷ [1996] AC 669. ²⁶⁸ See p 863.

Moynes v Cooper, V retained an equitable interest in the money overpaid and D, on these facts, could now be convicted of theft even if s 5(4) had not been enacted.

The Chase Manhattan principle was relied on by the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) in Shadrokh-Cigari.²⁶⁹ The O bank had, in error, credited a child's account at the V bank with £286,000 instead of £286! D, the child's guardian, got the child to sign authority for the V bank to issue banker's drafts, and when D was arrested only £21,000 of the £286,000 remained in the account. Upholding D's conviction for theft from the V bank, the court said that the drafts belonged to the bank and although legal ownership passed to D by delivery, the bank retained an equitable interest by virtue of the Chase Manhattan principle and D had appropriated property belonging to another (V) within the broad terms of s 5(1). It was accordingly not necessary to rely on s 5(4) though that subsection provided an alternative route to conviction.²⁷⁰ Subsequent decisions have applied Shadrokh-Cigari without hesitation. In Webster,²⁷¹ the Court Martial Appeal Court upheld D's conviction for theft of a medal which he had sold on eBay. The medal was sent in error to Captain X (it was an unsolicited duplicate). X gave it to D, his admin officer, to deal with. There was some confusion as to what the procedure was for the issue and return of medals, but the court had no doubt that medals are akin to gifts from the sovereign, and that in this case there had been a fundamental error by the Ministry of Defence in supplying a duplicate. The Crown retained an interest in that medal, it was property belonging to another as against D.²⁷²

Identifying the property got by mistake

Section 5(4), or the Chase Manhattan principle, applies though only part of the property is got by mistake. In Moynes v Cooper,²⁷³ D appropriated only the amount by which he was overpaid. In such a case it would be impossible to identify the coins which represented the overpayment but the prosecution are not required to do so because the relevant property is sufficiently identified if it is proved to be part of an identifiable whole. This principle was applied in Davis.²⁷⁴ By a computer error, D was sent two cheques a month in respect of housing benefit when he was entitled to only one. It was held that where D had cashed these cheques he could be convicted of stealing the proceeds (the cash) of one of the cheques and it was not necessary for the prosecution to establish which proceeds he had stolen and which he had not.²⁷⁵

Requirement of legal obligation

It will be evident from the discussion above that 'obligation' in s 5(4) can only refer to a legal obligation imposed by the civil law. This is confirmed by Gilks,²⁷⁶ though the case has its complications. V, a bookmaker, mistakenly believing that D had backed a winning horse, overpaid D on the bets he had placed and D, aware of the error, dishonestly decided not to return the overpayment. Since V had made no mistake either as to the amount or the ²⁶⁹ [1988] Crim LR 465, CA. See further G MacCormack, 'Mistaken Payments and Proprietary Claims' [1996] Conv 86.

²⁷⁰ See also the statements in Gresham [2003] EWCA Crim 2070.

²⁷¹ [2006] EWCA Crim 2894.

²⁷² Was this not obvious? Was there not also X's proprietary interest? He had not authorized the sale, and after Gomez that would not matter in any event. See also the comments of the Administrative Court in Re Holmes [2004] EWHC 2020 (Admin) expressing the provisional view that the property which D had fraudulently transferred by automated process from a German to a Dutch bank was subject to a constructive trust. Cf Ngan [1998] 1 Cr App R 331 in which s 5(4) was not discussed.

²⁷³ See p 863.

²⁷⁴ (1988) 88 Cr App R 347, CA.

²⁷⁵ On the civil law position for tracing into mixed funds, see Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC [1996] AC 669.

²⁷⁶ [1972] 1 WLR 1341, CA.

recipient, ownership of the money passed to D. The court was clear that s 5(4) was inapplicable. As this was a betting transaction, as a matter of civil law, as the law then stood V had no right of restitution in respect of the overpayment, so D could be under no legal obligation to make restoration. But the court went on, relying upon an antique and questionable authority under the law of larceny,²⁷⁷ to uphold D's conviction on the ground that since V would not have made the overpayment but for his mistake, ownership in the money did not pass to D. This is at odds with the civil law and the decision needs to be reconsidered. It is a further example of the courts striving to uphold the convictions of those found to be dishonest, at the expense of clarity and principle in the definition of the Theft Act offences. After Westdeutsche Landesbank v Islington LBC (discussed earlier), it is clear under civil law that if D was aware that a part of the money had been mistakenly overpaid to him, then D would be required to hold that overpayment on constructive trust for the payer, V.

18.3.3.9 Property of corporations

A corporation such as a limited company is, in law, a person distinct from its members. It can own property and be the victim of theft and other offences under the Theft Acts. A member of the corporation can be guilty of stealing the property of the corporation—it is property belonging to another: the company. If a director, D, of a limited company misappropriates the company's property the injury is suffered by the company's shareholders (or, if it is insolvent, its creditors); but the property D has appropriated does not belong to the directors and D is guilty of theft, not from them, but from the company.²⁷⁸ This is straightforward where D is misappropriating the property because he is acting without authority. The matter is more difficult if the alleged theft from the company is, say, an act authorized by the board of directors at a properly constituted meeting. Although it exists as a separate legal person, a company can act only through its human controlling officers and, in some contexts at least, they are identified with the company—their acts are the company's acts.²⁷⁹ If company directors resolve to use the company's assets for their personal advantage instead of for the company's proper purposes, and if this act is the company's act (ie the company authorizes it (albeit by the directors' decision)), it might be thought difficult to characterize it as theft; no one can steal from himself. It is different if the act is ultra vires the company because then it is not the company's act at all; but the courts seem to have regarded the question of ultra vires as irrelevant.

The problem is most acute where the directors, say, D and E, are also the sole shareholders. If D and E, as the controlling mind of the company, C, agree that C shall pay them money for their personal use, have they stolen the money from C? Judicial opinion, before Gomez, was divided about this situation. One view was that this was theft from the company.²⁸⁰ The other was that an act done with the authority of the company cannot in general amount to an appropriation.²⁸¹ Since Gomez it is clear that this is wrong. A dishonest appropriation is now theft, even if the owner consents. In Gomez, Lord Browne-Wilkinson (with whom three judges, including Lord Lowry who dissented on the main issue, agreed) said that their lordships' decision rendered 'the whole question of consent by the company irrelevant'.

D and E in the example above might object, saying they were not merely acting with the consent of the company: they were the company. If I give away all my property with the intention of defrauding my creditors, it is impossible to hold that I have committed theft

²⁷⁷ Middleton (1873) LR 2 CCR 38.

²⁷⁸ R (on the application of A) v Snaresbrook Crown Court (2001) 165 JPN 495.

²⁷⁹ See Ch 8.

²⁸⁰ A-G's Reference (No 2 of 1982) [1984] QB 624; Phillipou (1989) 89 Cr App R 290.

²⁸¹ McHugh and Tringham (1988) 88 Cr App R 385, CA at 393. See also Roffel [1985] VR 511, discussed by JC Smith (1985) 9 Crim LJ 320.

because I have not appropriated something belonging to another. However, Lord Browne-Wilkinson also said that even if consent was relevant to appropriation, there would still be a theft.²⁸²

Where a company is accused of a crime the acts and intentions of those who are the directing minds and will of the company are to be attributed to the company. That is not the law where the charge is that those who are the directing minds and will have themselves committed a crime against the company.

It must now be conceded, following Gomez, that in these cases D appropriates property belonging to another, but there is still difficulty in seeing how it can be a dishonest appropriation.²⁸³ The act is not dishonest vis-à-vis the shareholders because they are the appropriators and therefore it is unreal to say that it is dishonest with respect to the company, which exists for the benefit of the shareholders. It may well be dishonest with respect to the company's creditors, but the property does not belong to them.²⁸⁴ The illogicality of the position is demonstrated further when comparison is made with the position of partnership property. If D and E were not the directors of a company but the sole members of a partnership, they could not be guilty of theft of the partnership's assets, even if they disposed of them in riotous living with intent to defeat their creditors.²⁸⁵ There does not seem to be any difference in substance.

18.3.3.10 Ownerless property

A person cannot be guilty of stealing property that is not owned by another at the time of the appropriation. If there is no person to whom the property belongs in any of the senses set out in s 5, that property cannot be stolen. Property that is capable of belonging to another may be ownerless because it has never been made the subject of ownership. D can commit no offence where, for example, he takes a swarm of bees not presently owned by another.

18.3.3.11 Property it is unlawful to possess

There is nothing to stop a theft charge where the property in question was held by V, someone who had no lawful right to it. A thief can steal from a thief. Equally, it does not matter whether the property is of a type that V was not lawfully permitted to possess. In Smith,²⁸⁶ D was convicted of robbery having appropriated V's heroin by force. Initially D and others were charged with robbery of cash (£50) but the indictment was amended to charge robbery of drugs to the value of £50. D argued that the prohibited drugs did not amount to property within the meaning of the Theft Act 1968. In particular that they could not be guilty of theft (and hence of robbery) if the article that had been taken was unlawfully in the possession of V. Moreover, it was argued that there could be no appropriation of the rights of the owner where the owner had no rights of possession because possession was prohibited by law. The Court of Appeal rejected these arguments. On settled law, the sole question was whether the owner had possession or control of the property. There was no ground whatever for qualifying the words 'possession or control', in any way. It was sufficient that the person from ²⁸² [1993] 1 All ER 1 at 40.

²⁸³ DW Elliott, 'Directors' Thefts and Dishonesty' [1991] Crim LR 732; Griew, Theft, paras 2.86–2.87.

²⁸⁴ GR Sullivan, Letters to the Editor [1991] Crim LR 929 argues that the interests of the creditors of an insolvent or doubtfully solvent company are the interests of the company, and as such D and E are rightly guilty of theft in such circumstances. But it is not clear that this is an established principle or that it is the foundation of the cases holding that the sole director may steal the company's property.

²⁸⁵ Note the offence of fraudulent trading by a sole trader under s 9 of the Fraud Act 2006.

²⁸⁶ [2011] EWCA Crim 66.

whom the property was taken, or to use the words of the Act, appropriated, was at the time in fact in possession or control of the property. The criminal law is concerned with keeping the Queen's peace, not with protecting private property rights.²⁸⁷

18.3.3.12 Corpses and living body tissue

The common law rule was that there is no property in a corpse or part of a corpse.²⁸⁸ Executors or administrators or others with a legal duty to inter a body have a right to custody and possession of it until it is buried; but it seems the corpse is incapable of being stolen from them. In Doodeward v Spence,²⁸⁹ the High Court of New South Wales (having examined the English authorities) held that a proprietary interest could be acquired by one who expended work and skill on the corpse with a view to its preservation on scientific or other grounds. This decision was applied in Kelly,²⁹⁰ where parts of bodies preserved as anatomical specimens and taken from the Royal College of Surgeons were held to have been stolen.

In Yearworth v North Bristol NHS Trust,²⁹¹ the Court of Appeal (Civil Division) has moved away from this principle that recognized property rights in body tissue only on the basis of expended skill. The claimants who were undergoing cancer treatment had stored their sperm with the defendant hospital for potential future use; they sought damages when the hospital failed to store the sperm properly. One issue at trial was whether each man's sperm was 'property' belonging to him. It was removed from his body but unlike most other removed tissue was capable of performing the same function it had when in the body. The Court of Appeal, accepting that the men had ownership of the tissue for the purposes of the claim, acknowledged that developments in medical science require a re-analysis of the common law's treatment of ownership of body products.²⁹² The Lord Chief Justice accepted that the storage of sperm in liquid nitrogen represented 'an application to the sperm of work and skill', but regarded Doodeward as illogical:

we are not content to see the common law in this area founded upon the principle in Doodeward, which was devised as an exception to a principle, itself of exceptional character, relating to the ownership of a human corpse.²⁹³

The Human Tissue Act 2004²⁹⁴ provides a framework for issues of donation, storage and use of body parts, organs and tissue. The Act is a response to the concerns raised by events at Alder Hey Children's Hospital and the Bristol Royal Infirmary.²⁹⁵ Many difficult issues relating to proprietary interests in body parts arise in other areas of the law and these may ²⁸⁷ If the argument of S in this case was accepted, it would, nevertheless, be an offence to steal drugs from the exhibit room in court or from a police officer.

²⁸⁸ See ATH Smith, 'Stealing the Body and its Parts' [1976] Crim LR 622 and Property Offences, paras 3.03–3.06; P Skegg, 'Criminal Liability for the Unauthorized Use of Corpses for Medical Education and Research' (1992) 32 Med Sci L 51; M Pawlowski, 'Dead Bodies as Property' (1996) 146 NLJ 1828; A Maclean, 'Resurrection of the Body Snatchers' (2000) 150 NLJ 174.

²⁸⁹ (1908) 95 R (NSW) 107.

²⁹⁰ [1998] 3 All ER 741. Cf Dobson v North Tyneside Health Authority [1996] 4 All ER 474, CA (Civ Div).

²⁹¹ [2009] EWCA Civ 37. See M Quigley (2009) 17 Med L Rev 457; C Hawes, 'Property Interests in Body Parts: Yearworth v North Bristol NHS Trust' (2010) 73 MLR 130; M Quigley, 'Property in Human Biomaterials—Separating Persons and Things?' (2012) 32 OJLS 659; S Douglas and I Goold, 'Property in Human Biomaterials: A New Methodology' (2016) 75 CLJ 478, who argue that the Court of Appeal sidestepped the established rules of acquisition of property rights.

²⁹² See the discussion at [31]–[45]. ²⁹³ At [45].

²⁹⁴ The Human Tissue Act 2004 provides safeguards and penalties in relation to improper retention of tissue and organs without consent. See also J Herring, Medical Law and Ethics (6th edn, 2016) Ch 8.

²⁹⁵ See Department of Health guidelines: The Removal, Retention and Use of Human Organs and Tissue from Post-Mortem Examination (2001).

have an impact on future interpretations of s 5. For example, in *L v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority*²⁹⁶ it was doubted whether there was anyone who had authority to remove or authorize removal of gametes from a deceased person without effective advance consent.

18.3.3.13 Property of the deceased

In Sullivan and Ballion,²⁹⁷ the defendants had appropriated the £50,000 they found on their friend who had died of natural causes in their company the night before. The deceased was a drug dealer and the money represented his takings. They were charged with theft of the money. Dismissing the charges, the trial judge ruled that the property did not 'belong to another' when it was taken.²⁹⁸ As pointed out in the commentary to the case, the property must have belonged to someone other than the thieves (who had no rights to it). Since there may be a conviction of theft of property of a person unknown, it follows that it is enough to show that the property must have belonged to someone and that the defendants knew it belonged to someone other than themselves. The money did not belong to those who had purchased drugs from the deceased (in this case a group known as 'The Firm') because, as the judge held, they had parted with their entire proprietary interest in the money; but the proprietary interest can hardly have vanished into thin air—it passed to the deceased or, if he was acting as an agent, his principal. At the time of the alleged theft, the money must have belonged either to the deceased's principal, if any, or to those entitled under his (or their) will or intestacy; or, if they did not exist, to the Crown as bona vacantia.²⁹⁹ There remains the difficulty in establishing the defendants' mens rea. If the defendants supposed, or may have supposed, that the property belonged to no one and could be taken by the first person to come across it, then they are not guilty. But if they knew it must belong to someone other than themselves, it is immaterial that they did not know who that person was.

18.3.3.14 Abandonment

Property which has at one time been owned may become ownerless by abandonment.³⁰⁰ But abandonment is not something to be lightly inferred: property is abandoned only when the owner is indifferent to any future appropriation of the property by others. It is not enough that V had no further use for the goods. A farmer who buries diseased animals has no further use for them but he would clearly intend that others should not make use of them and retains ownership of the carcasses.³⁰¹ It is legitimate for magistrates to conclude that ²⁹⁶ [2008] EWHC 2149 (Fam). ²⁹⁷ [2002] Crim LR 758.

²⁹⁸ Hale, I PC, 514: 'If A dies intestate, and the goods of the intestate are stolen before administration committed, it is felony, and the goods shall be supposed to be bona episcopi de D. ordinary of the diocese, and if he made B his executor the goods shall be supposed bona B tho he hath not proved the will, and they need not show specifically their title as ordinary or executor because it is of their own possession, in which case a general indictment as well as a general action of trespass lies without naming themselves as executor or ordinary, and so for an administrator.' See also East, II PC, 652 and Russell on Crime (2nd edn, 1843) ii, 99 stating the law in similar terms.

²⁹⁹ A suggested direction for such cases is supplied in the commentary, n 297.

³⁰⁰ On abandonment, see AH Hudson, 'Is Divesting Abandonment Possible at Common Law' (1984) 100 LQR 110 and 'Abandonment' in N Palmer and E McKendrick (eds), Interests in Property (1993). See also the interesting article discussing the civil and criminal law approaches to abandonment: R Hickey, 'Stealing Abandoned Goods: Possessory Title in Proceedings for Theft' (2006) 26 LS 584. On the potential for theft charges against 'freegans'—those who take food from supermarket refuse areas when it has been discarded because it has passed its sell by date—see the detailed analysis by S Thomas, 'Do Freegans Commit Theft' (2010) 30 LS 98. The argument advanced in that article that the goods are not abandoned may not be likely to persuade the courts, but the argument based on mens rea is, it is submitted, a stronger one.

³⁰¹ cf Edwards and Stacey (1877) 36 LT 30.

a person who leaves bags of goods outside a charity shop has not abandoned the items.³⁰² When D takes the bags he can be convicted of theft—subject to his mens rea. The person leaving the bags does so with the intention of making a legitimate donation and has attempted to effect delivery.³⁰³ Whether the charity shop had either kept and resold those items or disposed of them, they still would have come within its possession and control but the shop did not have possession or control when D appropriated. Importantly, then, a householder who puts rubbish in his dustbin has no further use for the rubbish, but he puts it there to be collected by the authorized refuse collectors and not as an invitation to all-comers to help themselves.³⁰⁴

In *Toleikis*³⁰⁵ D was convicted of handling stolen goods when he was found in possession of several bags of clothes that had been intended for charity. Householders left the clothes in clearly marked bags outside their homes for the charity to collect, but they instead ended up in D's van. One of the issues on appeal was whether the clothes constituted property belonging to another. Sir John Thomas P held that the correct approach was that the clothes did belong to the charity in question on the application of the law of gift. Even though the bags of clothes had not yet been collected by the charity, the President held that a gift could be completed by delivery. Given that this was the case, the bags of clothes constituted property belonging to another. It is submitted that Toleikis simply applies the principle that was confirmed earlier by the Divisional Court in Ricketts. The homeowners left the bags of clothes outside their homes with the intention of conferring the proprietary interest in them to the charity. Given this intention, the clothes were not abandoned and could therefore be stolen.

A shipowner who runs aground and whose cargo is cast onto the land has not lost his proprietary interest in the cargo.³⁰⁶ Nor is property abandoned because the owner has lost it and has given up the search.³⁰⁷ A husband may have lost his wedding ring and long since given up the search but will not have abandoned it.

18.4 Mens rea

Theft requires an intention to appropriate property belonging to another,³⁰⁸ and that the appropriation be dishonest. As the Law Commission stated in its Consultation Paper No 155, 'in theft . . . dishonesty is now the principal determinant of criminality'.³⁰⁹

³⁰² R (Ricketts) v Basildon Magistrates' Court [2010] EWHC 2358 (Admin).

³⁰³ That gift would be complete when the shop took possession of the items. Until then, the donor has not relinquished ownership. D faced a second count of theft of bags left by the charity shop in its dustbin. The property was deemed to belong to the shop at the time of appropriation by D. See also Rostron [2003] EWCA Crim 2206. At trial, it would of course be important to deal fully with D's belief that he was not acting dishonestly, under s 2 of the Act and under Ivey [2017] UKSC 67, and that he lacked an intent to deprive.

³⁰⁴ cf Williams v Phillips (1957) 121 JP 163. The availability of theft charges in such circumstances is important in dealing with those who rummage through the refuse of celebrities for information to sell to tabloid newspapers, and those who appropriate confidential industrial or financial information from refuse. There is a specific offence under s 60 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 of interfering with waste receptacles.

³⁰⁵ [2013] EWCA Crim 600.

³⁰⁶ R Glover, 'Can Dishonesty be Salvaged? Theft and the Grounding of the MSC Napoli' (2010) 74 J Crim L 53; J Lowther, R Glover and M Williams, 'Salvage, Pollution or Looting? The Stranding of the Napoli's Cargo' (2009) 15 J Int'l Maritime Law 65.

³⁰⁷ Hibbert v McKiernan [1948] 1 All ER 860, DC, discussed in (1972B) 31 CLJ at 213–215 (lost golf balls not abandoned), and see the references in n 300.

³⁰⁸ Ingram [1975] Crim LR 457, CA (absent-minded taking a defence to charge of shoplifting). Small [1987] Crim LR 777, CA (D who believes, reasonably or not, that property has been abandoned, does not intend to appropriate property belonging to another (or, ex hypothesi, permanently to deprive)).

³⁰⁹ Para 3.2.

18.4.1 View to gain immaterial

Section 1(2) of the 1968 Act provides, 'It is immaterial whether the appropriation is made with a view to gain, or is made for the thief's own benefit.'

This section is designed to defeat arguments such as that which might be made by D, a shop worker who charged a friend, E, for only some of the goods in E's trolley. The fact that the gain was for E does not prevent D stealing from the shop owner. Similarly, the section renders prosecution easier in cases of D causing only loss to V, without a corresponding gain to himself. Thus, if D takes V's letters and puts them down a lavatory or throws V's iPad off a cliff, he is guilty of theft notwithstanding the fact that he intends only to cause loss to V and not gain for himself or anyone else. It might be thought that these instances could safely and more appropriately have been left to other branches of the criminal law—criminal damage to property, for instance. But there are cases where there is no such damage or destruction of the property which would be sufficient to found a charge under another Act. For example, D takes V's diamond and flings it into a deep pond. The diamond lies unharmed in the pond and a prosecution for criminal damage would fail. It seems clearly right that D should be guilty of theft.³¹⁰ As Lord Bingham observed, 'In providing that an appropriation may be dishonest even where there is a willingness to pay, [the section] shows that the prospect of loss is not determinative of dishonesty.'³¹¹

18.4.2 Dishonesty

The concept of dishonesty in theft needs to be approached in two stages:

- (1) By understanding the statutory situations in which it is made clear that certain conduct is not to be regarded as dishonest. These exclusions from dishonesty are not found in all dishonesty offences—they apply only to theft.
- (2) By understanding the common law definition of dishonesty. This has changed significantly following the Supreme Court's recent decision in Ivey.³¹² It is submitted that the test adopted by the Supreme Court in Ivey should apply to all offences in which the term dishonesty is used. It is now reasonably clear that the same principle applies throughout the Theft Acts, the Fraud Act 2006 and the common law of conspiracy to defraud as well as other statutory offences,³¹³ such as fraudulent trading under the Companies Act 2006. There is one test of dishonesty in English criminal law and Ivey should not be taken to have undermined this principle.³¹⁴

This approach to defining dishonesty raises interesting questions about the role that the element has to play in the offence of theft generally. Dishonesty operates both as a peg on which to hang claims of an exculpatory nature—that is, as equivalent to an element of unlawfulness or lack of blameworthiness—and also as a positive element of mens rea. Professor Horder describes dishonesty as a concealed excuse, 'taking the form of a morally open textured mental element'.³¹⁵ This overlap between 'dishonesty' as a state of mind (requiring ³¹⁰ An alternative solution would be to consider creating an offence of unlawfully depriving the owner of the use of his property.

³¹¹ Wheatley and Penn v Commissioner of Police of the British Virgin Islands [2006] UKPC 24.

³¹² [2017] UKSC 67. For comment, see K Laird, 'Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd (t/a Crockfords)' [2017] Lloyd's Law Reports: Financial Crime 576; [2018] Crim LR 395. M Dyson and P Jarvis, 'Poison Ivey or Herbal Tea Leaf?' (2018) 134 LQR 198.

³¹³ eg benefit fraud offences under the Social Security Acts: Department for Work and Pensions v Costello [2006] EWHC 1156 (Admin).

³¹⁴ As a result of Ivey, the same test is now also applicable in the criminal law and the civil law.

³¹⁵ J Horder, Excusing Crime (2004) 49. See A Steel, 'The Harms and Wrongs of Stealing: The Harm Principle and Dishonesty in Theft' (2008) 31 UNSWLJ 712.

a factual inquiry from the jury) and as a concept describing the wrong done (requiring a moral evaluation by the jury) is perpetuated by the case law. A further complexity with the element of dishonesty (beyond the law of theft per se) has been described by the Law Commission:

In some crimes, such as conspiracy to defraud, the other elements of the offence are not prima facie unlawful, so dishonesty renders criminal otherwise lawful conduct. However, in deception offences the other elements of the offence, if proved, would normally be unlawful in themselves. If someone has practised a deception in order to gain a benefit their conduct is prima facie wrongful. Therefore dishonesty can be raised to rebut the inference that conduct was in fact wrongful . . . The former type of crime [can be described] as having a positive requirement of dishonesty, and the latter as having a negative requirement.³¹⁶

It is regrettable that there is no statutory definition of dishonesty, particularly since the common law definition which supplements s 2 is so vague, and as noted earlier, dishonesty has assumed an elevated importance following the excessively broad interpretations of the actus reus elements of the offence.³¹⁷

18.4.2.1 Statutory circumstances which are NOT dishonest

The CLRC thought that ‘dishonesty’ could probably be left undefined and they did not define it but merely sought to clarify its meaning in certain respects.³¹⁸ By s 2 of the Act:

- (1) A person’s appropriation of property belonging to another is not to be regarded as dishonest—
 - (a) if he appropriates the property in the belief that he has in law the right to deprive the other of it, on behalf of himself or of a third person; or
 - (b) if he appropriates the property in the belief that he would have the other’s consent if the other knew of the appropriation and the circumstances of it; or
 - (c) (except where the property came to him as trustee or personal representative) if he appropriates the property in the belief that the person to whom the property belongs cannot be discovered by taking reasonable steps.
- (2) A person’s appropriation of property belonging to another may be dishonest notwithstanding that he is willing to pay for the property.³¹⁹

It will be noticed that this section specifies three situations in which an appropriation of property belonging to another is not to be regarded as dishonest, and one in which it may be. By this negative approach, the section assists somewhat in defining the meaning of dishonesty, but the section does not specify any state of mind that must be regarded as dishonest.

Belief in the right to deprive

D is not dishonest if he believes, whether reasonably or not,³²⁰ that he has the legal right³²¹ to do the act which is alleged to constitute an appropriation of the property of another. The ³¹⁶ LC 276, Fraud (2002) para 5.12. For criticism of this as unhelpful, see P Kiernan and G Scanlon, ‘Fraud and the Law Commission: The Future of Dishonesty’ (2003) 24 Comp Law 4.

³¹⁷ cf the Law Commission’s subsequent view that no definition is possible: LC 276, Part V.

³¹⁸ See also Smith, Property Offences, Ch 7; Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, Ch 2; LC 276, Part V.

³¹⁹ Care must be taken when considering the concept of dishonesty since s 2 is not applicable to all of the offences under the Theft Acts.

³²⁰ See Terry [2001] EWCA Crim 2979.

³²¹ It is irrelevant that no such right exists in law. A dictum to the contrary in Gott v Measures [1948] 1 KB 234, is irreconcilable with the decision in Bernhard [1938] 2 KB 264. The belief need not relate to a ‘property’ right: Wood [1999] Crim LR 564 and commentary.

prosecution must disprove any belief in such a right that D claims to have held.³²² The Act refers specifically to a belief in a right in law as inconsistent with dishonesty. This does not necessarily mean that a belief in a merely moral right will be insufficient to negative dishonesty.³²³ The common law position was that taking another's property was not justifiable, even where it is necessary to avoid starvation, and that suggests that even the strongest moral claim to deprive another is not enough to rebut dishonesty. However, under the 1968 Act it is now a jury question. There is nothing in the Act to say that a belief in a moral right does not rebut dishonesty, and a jury would be likely to find that a truly starving person was not dishonest.

D's belief in the legal right of another, X, will also negative D's dishonesty. Thus, in Close,³²⁴ an employee, who took his employer's property without consent because he was owed money by the employer, was apparently held not to be dishonest by a jury. Where D specifically pleads a belief in a claim of right, the jury ought, it is submitted, to be directed in relation to s 2 and not left to deal with the issue under the general test of dishonesty (discussed later).³²⁵

Belief that the owner would consent

It is sufficient that D holds a mistaken though genuine belief that the person to whom the property belonged would have consented had he known of the circumstances. Thus, D will not be dishonest where he helps himself to his flatmate's milk from the fridge if he holds a belief that this would be consented to. Numerous appropriations of this nature occur every day and a specific provision dealing with the matter precludes capricious prosecutions. Following Hinks, the issue of mistaken beliefs will be of particular importance in cases in which D claims that he was acting with the owner's consent.³²⁶

Belief that the person to whom the property belongs cannot be discovered by taking reasonable steps

Though the Act makes no reference to 'finding', this provision is obviously intended to preserve the substance of the common law rule relating to finding. The finder who appropriates property commits the actus reus of theft (assuming that the property does belong to another and has not been abandoned) but is not dishonest unless he believes the owner can be discovered by taking reasonable steps. There is no requirement that D's belief about the traceability of the owner is reasonable; merely that his belief about the steps necessary to trace the owner is reasonable. This will depend on the nature of the property in question.³²⁷

If D's initial appropriation of lost property is innocent (either because he does not believe that the owner can be discovered by taking reasonable steps or because he intends to return the thing to the owner when he takes it), a dishonest later assumption of a right

³²² There must be some evidence of the belief in a claim of right to be left to the jury before the judge is obliged to leave it: Hall [2008] EWCA Crim 2086.

³²³ A belief in a moral right was not a defence to larceny: Harris v Harrison [1963] Crim LR 497, DC. Cf Williams, CLGP, 322.

³²⁴ [1977] Crim LR 107.

³²⁵ See Rostron [2003] EWCA Crim 2206, where D believed that he had a legal right to collect 'lost' golf balls. Cf Smith (Paul Adrian) [1997] 7 Arch News 4, CA. On charges to which s 2 does not apply the test enunciated in Ivey must perform the function.

³²⁶ See p 831. See especially Lord Hutton's dissent focusing on dishonesty and the question of whether D can be convicted if he has a claim of right—consent, but not if he has a mere belief in a claim of right—under s 2(1)(a). See the discussion in relation to freegans taking from supermarket rubbish bins: Thomas, n 300.

³²⁷ See eg the implausible defence in Sylvester (1985) CO/559/84 where D alleged that the car he was stripping of parts in a car park was abandoned and therefore s 2(1)(c) applied.

to it by keeping or dealing with it as owner will be theft by virtue of s 3(1).³²⁸ While this provision was intended primarily for the case of finding, it is not confined to that case and there are other instances where it would apply. Suppose that V arranges with D that D shall store V's furniture in D's house without payment. V leaves the town and D loses touch with him. Some years later D, needing the space in his house and being unable to locate V, sells the furniture.³²⁹ This is undoubtedly an appropriation of the property of another and D is liable to V in conversion; but he appears to be saved from any possibility of conviction of theft by s 2(1)(c). Though the purchase money probably belongs to V, D's immunity under the Act for lack of dishonesty must extend to the proceeds of sale.

Where property has come to D as a trustee or personal representative and he appropriates it, he may be dishonest even though he believes that the person to whom the property belongs cannot be discovered by taking reasonable steps. This seems to provide a particularly strict approach.

Dishonest appropriation, notwithstanding payment

Section 2(2) is intended to deal with the kind of situation where D takes bottles of milk from V's doorstep but leaves in its place the full price. Certainly D has no claim of right and he intends to deprive V permanently of his property. Doubts had, however, arisen as to whether this was dishonest. This subsection resolves them. The mere fact of payment does not negate dishonesty but the jury are entitled to take into account all the circumstances and these may be such that even an intention to pay for property, let alone actual payment, may negate dishonesty. The fact of payment, or intention to pay, may be cogent evidence where D's defence is that he believed V would have consented, as where D takes milk bottles from V's unattended delivery van and leaves the price, claiming that he assumed that V would have been very happy to sell him the milk had he been there, but that he had not time to wait for V to return. If D is believed—and the fact of repayment would be persuasive evidence—it would seem that he has no dishonest intent. The section is important in emphasizing that D's willingness to pay the market value for appropriated property will not necessarily negate dishonesty, otherwise there would be no theft where D takes V's original work of art that he has long coveted, leaving its listed valuation price.

18.4.2.2 Dishonesty as an element of the offence

In the legislation before the Theft Act, the term used was 'fraudulently'. Under the Larceny Act, it was probably for the judge to say whether D's state of mind was to be characterized in law as 'fraudulent' subject to the jury finding given facts.³³⁰ When drafting the 1968 Act, the CLRC seem to have overlooked the limited role that word had in the Larceny Act.³³¹ In their Eighth Report³³² and in drafting the 1968 Act, the CLRC used 'dishonestly' rather ³²⁸ See p 839. ³²⁹ cf Sachs v Miklos [1948] 2 KB 23; Munro v Wilmott [1949] 1 KB 295.

³³⁰ Williams [1953] 1 QB 660, CCA; Cockburn [1968] 1 All ER 466, CA.

³³¹ Commentators on the Larceny Act 1916 disagreed as to the function, if any, of the word 'fraudulently' (which was the precursor to 'dishonesty'). JWC Turner (writing as editor of Russell on Crime (12th edn, 1964) 996), concluded that the word added nothing to 'without a claim of right' (now found in s 2(1)(a)). Others thought it had the limited function of exculpating the taker who believed the owner would have consented if it had been possible to ask him—a case now expressly covered by s 2(1)(b) of the 1968 Act: see Wing-Commander Lowe, 'The Fraudulent Intent in Larceny' [1956] Crim LR 78. Others that it exculpated the taker of money or other 'fungibles' (substitutable property) who intended to, and had no doubt that he could, return, not the identical thing, but an equivalent (a case which is not expressly provided for in the 1968 Act): JC Smith, 'The Fraudulent Intent in Larceny: Another View' [1956] Crim LR 238. See also the analysis by A Steel, 'The Meanings of Dishonesty in Theft' (2009) 38 Common L World Rev 103.

³³² Para 39. On the CLRC intentions, see also DW Elliott, 'Dishonesty in Theft: A Dispensable Concept' [1982] Crim LR 395 at 405.

than ‘fraudulently’, not because the meaning was any different but because they thought it to be more easily understood:

‘Dishonestly’ seems to us a better word than ‘fraudulently’. The question ‘Was this “dishonest”?’ is easier for a jury to answer than the question ‘Was this “fraudulent”?’ ‘Dishonesty’ is something which laymen can easily recognize when they see it, whereas ‘fraud’ may seem to involve technicalities which have to be explained by a lawyer.

This passage suggests that it is for jurors to decide whether ‘this’ (D’s conduct) is dishonest. Of course, it is for jurors to decide all questions of fact, including the state of mind of the defendant—what was his intention and belief, including his belief as to his legal rights. But, that was not how fraudulently was interpreted. The CLRC unwittingly made a significant change to the law. This was one factor which led Lord Hughes in Ivey, below, to adopt a new interpretation of the concept of dishonesty.

Interpreting dishonesty

How have the courts interpreted the concept of dishonesty? After initial confusion and inconsistency the law became very settled, based on the case of Ghosh. Despite considerable academic criticism of that test,³³³ it was rarely challenged on appeal and had attracted little adverse comment in practice for 35 years. In 2017, the Supreme Court, in a civil case, Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club), overruled the decision in Ghosh.³³⁴ The test for dishonesty in all criminal offences which require proof of such an element is therefore:

When dishonesty is in question the fact-finding tribunal must first ascertain (subjectively) the actual state of the individual’s knowledge or belief as to the facts. The reasonableness or otherwise of his belief is a matter of evidence (often in practice determinative) going to whether he held the belief, but it is not an additional requirement that this belief must be reasonable; the question is whether it is genuinely held. When once his actual state of mind as to knowledge or belief as to facts is established, the question whether his conduct was honest or dishonest is to be determined by the fact-finder by applying the (objective) standards of ordinary decent people. There is no requirement that the defendant must appreciate that what he has done is, by those standards, dishonest.³³⁵

Although this is a new development, it is unlikely to generate many difficulties in application in theft as the Ghosh direction, which is replaced by Ivey, rarely needed to be given in practice. Presumably this will continue to be the case. Furthermore, it does not generate any risk of appeals out of time since the previous test in Ghosh was more generous to defendants.³³⁶

Before examining that test in more detail, it is worth examining the evolution of the law on dishonesty over the last 50 years since the Theft Act was enacted.

There are in simple terms three ways in which the courts could have construed the concept.

- (1) As a subjective test—did D believe his conduct was dishonest? The danger of such a test is obvious—the more warped the moral standards of D, the more likely he will escape liability since he will not believe his conduct to be dishonest.
- (2) As an objective test—was D’s conduct dishonest by the standards of reasonable and honest people? This was the test first adopted in a case called Feely, rejected in Ghosh, but reaffirmed as correct by the Supreme Court in Ivey.

³³³ Examined later.

³³⁴ [2017] UKSC 67. In truth the outcome was not surprising as the Court of Appeal seemed to have been keen to overturn Ghosh for some time. See Starglade [2010] EWCA Civ 1314 and Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500.

³³⁵ At [74].

³³⁶ This was a point made by Gross LJ in Pabon [2018] EWCA Crim 420. See later for discussion.

- (3) As a hybrid test involving objective and subjective elements. This was the approach settled in Ghosh which reigned for 35 years until being overturned in Ivey.

A subjective approach

Perhaps not surprisingly, the courts rarely applied a purely subjective test based on whether D thought what he did was dishonest. A rare instance was Gilks,³³⁷ where D kept the over-payment made by a bookmaker, the judge invited the jury to ‘try and place yourselves in [D’s] position at that time and answer the question whether in your view he thought he was acting dishonestly’. The Court of Appeal thought this was a proper and sufficient direction, agreeing apparently that if D may have held the belief he claimed, the prosecution had not established dishonesty. This applied not the standards of ordinary decent people, but the defendant’s own standards, however deplorable they might be. The present law certainly, and we suggest correctly, rejects the idea of a purely subjective test.

An objective approach

Possibly influenced by the approach in the CLRC Report, the Court of Appeal in *Feely*³³⁸ held that it is for the jury in each case to decide not only what the defendant’s state of mind was but also, subject to s 2, whether that state of mind is to be categorized as dishonest.

Jurors, when deciding whether an appropriation was dishonest can be reasonably expected to, and should, apply the current standards of ordinary decent people. In their own lives they have to decide what is and what is not dishonest. We can see no reason why, when in a jury box, they should require the help of a judge to tell them what amounts to dishonesty.

Only a moment’s comparison with the approach to other mens rea requirements is needed to illustrate how much of a departure from the pre-1968 Act law and from orthodoxy this is. For example, in a case involving recklessness, the judge defines that concept and directs the jury to determine whether, on the facts as they find them to be, D’s state of mind is within that legal definition. The jury are not invited to decide for themselves what recklessness means.

The court in Feely was heavily influenced by the opinion of the House of Lords in *Brutus v Cozens*³³⁹ that the meaning of an ordinary word of the English language is not a question of law for the judge but one of fact for the jury. ‘Dishonestly’ is such a word and so it should be for the jury to attribute to it such meaning as they thought proper. Feely did at least provide a standard—that of ‘ordinary decent people’, as understood by the jury—against which the defendant’s intentions and beliefs were to be tested.

A hybrid approach: Ghosh

Concerns about the bluntness of a purely objective or purely subjective test led the court in *Ghosh*³⁴⁰ to adopt a hybrid test:

- (1) Was what was done dishonest according to the ordinary standards of reasonable and honest people? If no, D is not guilty. If yes:
- (2) Did the defendant realize that reasonable and honest people regard what he did as dishonest?³⁴¹ If yes, he is guilty; if no, he is not.

³³⁷ See p 865; [1972] 3 All ER 280 at 283. On the very early cases, see DW Elliott, ‘Dishonesty Under the Theft Act’ [1972] Crim LR 625.

³³⁸ [1973] QB 530, [1973] Crim LR 193 and commentary.

³³⁹ [1973] AC 854.

³⁴⁰ [1982] QB 1053.

³⁴¹ The Court of Appeal held in Chitatie [2014] EWCA Crim 1744 that the judge did not misdirect the jury by deviating slightly from this formulation.

If there was any evidence to suggest that D's attitude was, 'Whatever others may think, I did not consider this dishonest', the direction had to be given. Where there was no such evidence, it was probably unnecessary. Where this direction was necessary, the exact form of words had to be used.

This got away from the extreme and unacceptable subjectivism of Gilks. It addressed the concern expressed in Boggeln v Williams that D's state of mind was relevant to the test. In that case, the court expressly rejected an argument that D's belief as to his own honesty was irrelevant and held that, on the contrary, it was crucial. D, whose electricity had been cut off, reconnected the supply through the meter. He knew that the electricity company did not consent to his doing so, but he notified them and believed, not unreasonably, that he would be able to pay at the due time. It was held that the question was whether he believed that what he did was honest.

Following Ghosh, D was not to be judged exclusively by his own standards of honesty. Ghosh attempted a compromise between a purely objective Feely-type test which some regarded as too harsh, and a purely subjective test such as that in Gilks which would create a thief's charter.

Ghosh generated considerable criticism.³⁴² The principal concern, and the one which led to Ghosh being overruled, was that in seeking to achieve a compromise between objective and subjective elements, Ghosh introduced unnecessary confusion in the form of the second limb. Why should the jury inquire into whether D believed that his conduct was dishonest by the standards of honest and reasonable people? Campbell³⁴³ cogently argued that this additional limb is superfluous if under the first limb the jury is properly directed to take account of all the circumstances. Taking the oft-quoted example of D who fails to pay a travel fare because he is new to the country and is accustomed to free public transport at home, it should not be necessary to rely on the second limb to conclude that D is not dishonest. A properly directed jury would so conclude under the first limb. As Lord Hughes noted in Ivey:

In order to decide whether this visitor was dishonest by the standards of ordinary people, it would be necessary to establish his own actual state of knowledge of how public transport works. Because he genuinely believes that public transport is free, there is nothing objectively dishonest about his not paying on the bus.³⁴⁴

In Ivey, Lord Hughes identified the following problems with the Ghosh direction, and particularly the second limb. It is respectfully submitted that some of the arguments are not as convincing as they might at first appear:

- (1) the more warped the defendant's standards of honesty, the less likely was a conviction—that is not a strictly accurate representation of the Ghosh test. The Ghosh test required an analysis of what D thought the reasonable person would think was dishonest; an ³⁴² EJ Griew, 'Dishonesty—The Objections to Feely and Ghosh' [1985] Crim LR 341; M Wasik, 'Mens Rea, Motive and the Problem of Dishonesty in the Law of Theft' [1979] Crim LR 543; Elliott [1982] Crim LR 395 at 398. Elliott's solution is to dispense with the word 'dishonestly' altogether but to add a new s 3(2): 'No appropriation of property belonging to another which is not detrimental to the interests of the other in a significant practical way shall amount to theft of the property.' In Cornelius [2012] EWCA Crim 500, a five-member court was convened as it was initially thought that the case gave rise to an issue about the validity of the Ghosh test. The issue did not, however, arise.

³⁴³ K Campbell, 'The Test of Dishonesty in Ghosh' (1994) 43 CLJ 349, where Campbell suggests that if the aim is to provide this hybrid test it should be: whether a reasonable jury, applying ordinary standards of honesty, is prepared to excuse D's failure to recognize that his own behaviour would be regarded as dishonest by the standards of ordinary people.

³⁴⁴ [2017] UKSC 67, [60].

entirely warped belief would not suffice unless (the jury believed) it prevented D from appreciating that the jury would realize his conduct was dishonest;

- (2) the rule was not necessary to preserve the principle that dishonesty had to depend on the defendant's actual state of mind—Lord Hughes convincingly demonstrates this is the case by suggesting that the defendant's state of mind should be considered as part of limb (1) under the reformulated test;
- (3) it set a test which jurors often found puzzling—in arriving at this conclusion, his lordship relied on his own vast experience and the anecdotal evidence of many judges, but no empirical evidence was adduced to substantiate it;
- (4) it had led to a divergence between the test for dishonesty in criminal and civil cases—this is clearly the case, but in other areas of theft the appellate courts have been happy for the criminal law to 'float free' of the civil law.³⁴⁵ In addition, the civil law and the criminal law have different purposes, which means that it was not necessarily unprincipled for the test for dishonesty to be framed in different terms depending upon the context in which it was being invoked;
- (5) it represented a significant departure from the pre-1968 Act law, when there was no indication that such a change had been intended; and it had not been compelled by earlier authority—this is accurate, but it is at least arguable that the force of this criticism had diminished 50 years after the enactment of the Theft Act and 35 years after the Court of Appeal set the law on a steady course in Ghosh.

As a result of these factors, as is discussed in detail later, the Supreme Court in Ivey held that the second stage should not represent the law and directions based on it should no longer be given.

Three other criticisms of the Ghosh test are worth noting. First, it had been recognized from the outset that the attempted compromise in Ghosh was argued to fail in its intended purpose—to prevent the 'Robin Hood defence'. That defence is where D claims that the activity was not dishonest. It was not clear that Ghosh did prevent it because the defendant would have to be acquitted 'if the jury thought either (a) that what Robin Hood did (rob the rich to feed the poor) was not dishonest or (b) that Robin Hood thought the reasonable and honest man would not consider what he did as dishonest'.³⁴⁶ Take the more modern example of a peace protestor who takes from an army depot armaments destined for a war zone because he thinks they are being used against civilians. He would certainly not regard his own conduct as dishonest and so would escape under the rule as stated in Gilks. He might have been acquitted under Ghosh.³⁴⁷ A jury of pacifists would be likely to agree with him; and it might be difficult to satisfy any jury that the defendant did not believe that all right-thinking people would agree with him. Peace protestors probably do so believe. But this surely should be theft. One who deliberately deprives another of his property should not be able to escape liability because of his disapproval, however profound and morally justified, of the lawful use to which that property was being put by its owner. In deciding whether a certain state of mind should be regarded as dishonest, it is not irrelevant to consider how the matter will be regarded by the ordinary decent citizen who is the victim of the offence. The owners of the armaments will certainly consider that their property has been stolen, even though they are fully aware of the state of mind of the takers. The law fails in one of its purposes if it does not afford protection to a person against what he quite reasonably regards as a straightforward case of theft. Ivey ensures that this is more likely to be regarded as theft.

³⁴⁵ See the discussion of Hinks earlier.

³⁴⁶ Such examples contradict the view of some commentators that apart from 'morons and lunatics' the only people likely to rely on a claim that they did not realize that ordinary honest people would regard their conduct as dishonest are business people who assert that their activities are the norm in that context, Arlidge and Parry on Fraud (2nd edn, 1996) para 1.027. This phrase is not found in the most recent edition.

³⁴⁷ This is an instance in which it appears motive, which is generally regarded as irrelevant to mens rea in practice, assumes an importance. The defendant's character may also take on an elevated significance: Bailey [2004] EWCA Crim 2530.

Secondly, Ghosh had not been universally accepted in other jurisdictions. Before Ghosh, the Supreme Court of Victoria had refused to follow Feely, when construing the identical provision in Victorian legislation. In Salvo,³⁴⁸ Fullagar J, with whom Murphy J seems to have agreed in substance, held that it was the duty of the judge to explain to the jury what ‘dishonestly’ meant; and he should tell them that it means ‘with disposition to defraud, that is with disposition to withhold from a person what is his right’. There are, however, two difficulties about this interpretation: (a) it seems to add nothing to what is expressly stated in s 2(1)(a)—that is, a person who has a claim of legal right is not dishonest—and leaves no function for the word ‘dishonestly’;³⁴⁹ (b) it seems too narrow as a matter of policy.³⁵⁰ Such an approach leads to the conviction of D who, knowing that he has no right to do so, takes V’s money with intent to spend it but with the certainty (in his own mind) that he will be able to replace it before it is missed, so that V will never know anything about it and suffer no detriment whatever.³⁵¹ Finally, the test impacted adversely on criminal procedure. As has already been explained, perhaps the most trenchant critic of the Ghosh test was Professor Griew,³⁵² who catalogued its numerous deficiencies. Griew suggested that the test confused the state of mind with the concept of dishonesty;³⁵³ led to more trials as defendants have little to lose by pleading not guilty and hoping that the dishonesty element is not made out; and led to longer trials as the dishonesty issue is a ‘live’ one in all cases.

The current law: Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd (t/a Crockfords)

The test adopted in the Supreme Court (which we anticipate the criminal courts will follow) is as follows:

- (1) What was D’s knowledge or belief as to the facts (a subjective test; the reasonableness of the belief is a matter of evidence of the belief being genuinely held)?
- (2) In light of the conclusion in relation to question (1), was D’s conduct honest or dishonest applying the (objective) standards of ordinary decent people?

³⁴⁸ [1980] VR 401.

³⁴⁹ Williams, TBCL, 730.

³⁵⁰ See Elliott [1982] Crim LR at 406.

³⁵¹ In Australia, the Salvo approach was followed in R v Bonollo [1981] VR 633 (the full court of the Supreme Court of Victoria), Love (1989) 17 NSWLR 608 and Condon (1995) 83 A Crim R 335. In Peters v The Queen (1998) 192 CLR 493, the majority of the High Court distinguished Salvo, but declined to adopt the Ghosh test, preferring that the jury be directed by the standards of ordinary decent people—a test seemingly akin to Ivey. The High Court’s conclusion was that there is no obligation for the Crown to show that D realized that his acts were dishonest by the current standards of honesty: McLeod [2003] HCA 24, [100]. The test is wholly objective. In Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 22, the High Court noted that: ‘As a matter of ordinary understanding, and as reflected in the criminal law in Australia, a person may have acted dishonestly, judged by the standards of ordinary, decent people, without appreciating that the act in question was dishonest by those standards.’ In SAJ v The Queen [2012] VSCA 243, the issue for the Court of Appeal of Victoria was whether the legislature’s adoption of the Ghosh test in a statutory offence meant that a jury had to be directed in accordance with Ghosh rather than Peters. The court took cognizance of the criticisms made of the objective test adopted in Peters, but nevertheless held that it was binding. New Zealand did not follow the Ghosh test. See Williams [1985] 1 NZLR 294. For an illuminating review of the law in common law countries, see A Steel, ‘The Meanings of Dishonesty in Theft’ (2009) 38 Common L World Rev 103.

³⁵² Author of The Theft Acts 1968 and 1978 (7th edn, 1995) and ‘Objections to Feely and Ghosh’ [1985] Crim LR 341.

³⁵³ See also K Campbell, ‘The Test of Dishonesty in Ghosh’ (1994) 43 CLJ 349 at 354 criticizing Ghosh for confusing the state of mind and the defendant’s standards of honesty.

Ivey: the facts

The claimant, a professional gambler, used a technique called 'edge sorting' to give himself a competitive advantage when playing a card game called Punto Banco. By noting minute physical differences on the edges of the cards, the claimant was able to increase his odds of winning. To do so, however, he needed to ensure that the deck of cards was not changed. The claimant pretended to be superstitious, and persuaded the croupier to use the same pack of cards and to turn 'lucky' cards around, enabling him to predict which cards would emerge from the shoe. By virtue of this technique, the gambler was able to increase his odds of winning and ultimately won £7.7 million. The casino discovered that the claimant used 'edge sorting' to win and refused to pay him his winnings. As a matter of fact, the trial judge found that although the gambler was genuinely convinced that what he had done was not cheating, he had in fact and law cheated, thus breaching the implied term against cheating in his contract with the casino. The claimant argued that the test of what was cheating was the same for the implied contractual term as for the criminal offence of cheating at gambling, contained in s 42 of the Gambling Act 2005. Furthermore, it was argued that cheating necessarily involved dishonesty, which had not been demonstrated in his case, meaning that the claimant was entitled to recover his winnings.

Ivey: the decision

In a unanimous judgment delivered by Lord Hughes, it was held that s 42 leaves open the question of what is and what is not cheating. Although it was sensible to interpret the concept of cheating contained in s 42 in light of the meaning given to cheating over many years, his lordship held that it made no sense to interpret cheating by reference to dishonesty, an expression introduced into the criminal law for different purposes in 1968. 'Cheating', in the context of games and gambling, carried its own inherent stamp of wrongfulness. Although 'honest cheating' was an improbable concept, it was held that it did not follow that all cheating ordinarily attracted the description 'dishonest' or that anything was added to the legal concept of cheating by an additional legal concept of dishonesty. Lord Hughes held that, as an element of a criminal charge, dishonesty was not a defined concept. His lordship stated that it is not a matter of law but a jury question of fact and standards. Except to the limited extent that s 2 of the 1968 Act required otherwise, judges must not attempt to define it. Likewise, whether conduct amounted to cheating, given the nature of the game, is a jury question. The addition of the legal element of dishonesty would unnecessarily complicate the question. The judge's conclusion that the gambler's actions amounted to cheating was unassailable. The key factor in this determination was the fact that the claimant had contrived a situation that enabled him to know whether the next card was of a high or low value. He had therefore taken positive steps to fix the deck. In a game which depended on the random delivery of unknown cards, it was held that such conduct was inevitably cheating.

The crucial aspect of the Supreme Court's judgment for present purposes is its restatement of the test for dishonesty. The court held that, when dishonesty is an issue, the fact-finding tribunal first has to ascertain, subjectively, the actual state of the individual's knowledge or belief as to the facts. The reasonableness of that belief is a matter of evidence going to whether the defendant held the belief, but it is not an additional requirement that the belief had to be reasonable; the question is whether it was genuinely held. When the defendant's state of mind has been established, the question of whether his conduct was honest or dishonest is to be determined by applying the objective standards of ordinary decent people. There is no requirement that the defendant must appreciate that the conduct was dishonest by those standards.

Adopting Ivey in the criminal courts

Despite the obiter nature of the Supreme Court's analysis of the test for dishonesty in the criminal law, it is submitted that the judgment in Ivey ought to be treated as authoritative. In the subsequent case of Patterson, Sir Brian Leveson P stated that, 'Given the terms of the unanimous observations of the Supreme Court expressed by Lord Hughes, who does not shy from asserting that Ghosh does not correctly represent the law, it is difficult to imagine the Court of Appeal preferring Ghosh to Ivey in the future.'³⁵⁴ This is a clear indication that directions based upon Ghosh should no longer be given. The reasons the Supreme Court gave for why Ghosh should no longer be followed are analysed at p 877.

A critique of the law as stated in Ivey

Ivey is a civil case and did not concern the concept of dishonesty in the criminal law at all. It is less than ideal that a change to the criminal test for dishonesty occurred in the context of a purely civil case. Nevertheless, we anticipate that Ivey will be followed. It is submitted that there are the following additional problems with the judgment.

(i) The lack of definition of the concept: Adopting an objective test of this nature presents some difficulties. One major difficulty about this view is that juries—and magistrates—are likely to give different answers to question (2) on facts which are indistinguishable. This creates very obvious injustices that risk bringing the criminal law into disrepute. It also raises the potential for challenges to the law under Art 7 of the ECHR³⁵⁵ on the basis of lack of certainty. In relation to the offence of theft, the elements of actus reus—that there must be an appropriation of property belonging to another—are likely to be held to be sufficient, even after the extensive interpretation in Gomez and Hinks, to ensure that the offence of theft is not incompatible with Art 7. It is not yet an offence based solely on the concept of dishonesty (despite the best efforts of the House of Lords in Morris, Gomez and Hinks). It had been held at first instance that dishonesty under Ghosh was not itself incompatible with Art 7.³⁵⁶ Given that the test for dishonesty under Ivey is now more objective, an individual could be convicted even though he may genuinely have had no idea that reasonable and decent people would consider his conduct to be dishonest. Even if he sought legal advice, in marginal cases it would be impossible to advise such an individual with certainty on whether a jury would consider his conduct to be dishonest. Whether the Ivey test will be challenged on this basis remains to be seen, but there is certainly scope for arguing that the compatibility of the more objective test with Art 7 is questionable.

This issue is perhaps more acute when it comes to the other offences for which dishonesty is the mens rea, such as fraud and conspiracy to defraud. As other chapters discuss, the actus reus of these offences is extremely broad indeed and the conduct involved often lawful but for dishonesty. To mitigate the potential harshness of the Ivey test as it applies to those offences, it will be important to direct the jury to pay close attention to limb (1), which requires them to ascertain the facts or circumstances as the defendant believed them to be.

³⁵⁴ DPP v Patterson [2017] EWHC 2820, [16]. See also Pabon [2018] EWCA Crim 420 and Wingate v SRA [2018] EWCA Civ 366.

³⁵⁵ Art 7 guarantees not only against retrospective criminalization in strict terms, but also that 'legal provisions which interfere with individual rights must be adequately accessible, and formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct', G v Federal Republic of Germany (1989) 60 DR 252 at 262. So vague are the elements of dishonesty under Ghosh that LCCP 155 provisionally took the view that a Home Secretary could not safely be advised to make a statement of compatibility in relation to a Bill creating a general dishonesty offence. Subsequently, the Law Commission reversed its opinion in LC 276, Fraud (2002).

³⁵⁶ Pattni [2001] Crim LR 570.

(ii) The assumptions made about jurors' approaches to dishonesty: One of the most detailed studies of the concept of dishonesty was that by Professor Griew. Many of the criticisms he made of Ghosh remain pertinent in relation to the test pronounced in Ivey since they are effectively criticisms of the failure to provide a definition in law of the concept of dishonesty. The objective question (the first limb of Ghosh and the second limb of Ivey): assumes a community norm within the jury in that they must agree on the ordinary standards of honesty; assumes that jurors are honest, or at least that they can apply ordinary standards of honesty even if they do not adhere to them in their personal lives; and is unsuitable in specialized cases such as complex commercial frauds where the 'ordinary' person is unlikely to understand the honesty or otherwise of the activities;³⁵⁷ and leaves a question of law to the jury³⁵⁸ which may lead to inconsistent decisions with the potential for different juries to reach different verdicts on identical facts, thus presenting acute problems in respect of Art 7 of the ECHR.

The Ivey approach endorses the CLRC's view of dishonesty relying on the common sense of members of society and a consensus about the appropriate benchmarks for protecting private property. As Norrie³⁵⁹ points out, however, this view of private property might not be an accurate reflection of current values, particularly in relation to specific types of misappropriation—for example, petty pilfering from the workplace and omissions from tax returns. A national survey in 2007 found that more than 33 per cent of people admitted that they had paid in cash to a cleaner, plumber or other tradesman to avoid paying tax, 20 per cent had taken something from work; just under one-third, if handed too much change in a shop or business transaction, would just keep it, and one in ten avoids paying their television licence. About 6 per cent of people have 'padded out' an insurance claim³⁶⁰ and one in four people admit not paying for at least one item when they use a self service checkout in a shop, leading to a loss to retailers of £3.2 billion per year.³⁶¹ Of course, it might well be that people do not generally assume their own moral standards when sitting as jurors.

(iii) The significance of the dishonesty concept in the criminal law: In terms of principle, the criticisms levelled at the failure to provide a clear definition of dishonesty are rendered all the more cogent for several reasons. First, the test applies in a great volume of cases in English courts—all those involving an element of dishonesty, which includes all Theft Act, Fraud Act and common law conspiracy to defraud cases, and many other offences under specific legislation (although it seems that dishonesty does not create enormous problems in practice).³⁶² Secondly, broad interpretations of the elements of actus reus have left dishonesty as the principal determinant of criminality in theft. As the Law

³⁵⁷ On the suitability of dishonesty in these cases, see also DW Elliott, 'Directors' Thefts and Dishonesty' [1991] Crim LR 732 arguing that insufficient attention has been paid to the issue of dishonesty in cases of sole traders committing theft from the company. See Hayes [2015] EWCA Crim 1944.

³⁵⁸ For an argument in support of leaving such issues to the jury, see R Tur, 'Dishonesty and the Jury Question' in A Phillips Griffiths (ed), Philosophy and Practice (1985). The Law Commission provisionally concluded that 'the circumstances in which such conduct may be found to be non-dishonest cannot be circumscribed by legal definition. Where dishonesty is a positive element, it must be open to the fact-finders to find that particular conduct is not dishonest, even if the legislation does not say so.' LCCP 155, Legislating the Criminal Code: Fraud and Deception (1999) para 5.6.

³⁵⁹ At 42. See also N Lacey, C Wells and O Quick, Reconstructing Criminal Law (4th edn, 2010) 399.

³⁶⁰ See The Times, 24 June 2007; S Karstedt and S Farrall, Law Abiding Majority? The Everyday Crimes of the Middle Classes (2007). The report found that 61 per cent of 1,807 people in England and Wales aged between 25 and 65 had committed at least one of a number of offences against business, government or their employers.

³⁶¹ 'Self-scan shoplifters stealing £3bn a year', The Times, 27 Dec 2017.

³⁶² See eg Magistrates' Association response to LCCP 155, reported in LC 276, para 5.14. And see the Commission's conclusion at para 5.18.

Commission commented, 'where the conduct elements of an offence are morally neutral [as, for example, appropriation may be], the element of dishonesty has to do more than simply exclude specific types of conduct which, though prima facie wrongful, do not deserve to be criminal'.³⁶³

Despite these academic criticisms of the lack of definition, in practice, few problems arose under the Ghosh approach of leaving to the jury the question whether conduct is dishonest by the standards of reasonable and honest people. One rare example was Gohill in which magistrates were held to have been wrong to regard as not dishonest the conduct of the accused manager of a tool hire shop who allowed customers to borrow items for a very short period of time for no payment (sometimes receiving a personal tip) as he would alter the company records to show that the item had been returned as faulty or incorrectly chosen.³⁶⁴

(iv) The degree of objectivity required by the test: At the heart of the Ivey test is the objective question, but how objective is that test in application? The Court of Appeal had a rare opportunity to consider the objective limb of dishonesty in *Hayes*³⁶⁵ (as part of the Ghosh test). D was accused of conspiring dishonestly to manipulate the LIBOR lending rate. He argued that his behaviour was not dishonest by the standards of those working in that market. It was submitted on his behalf that the objective aspect of the dishonesty direction (then under Ghosh) must sometimes be modified so as to invite the jury to consider not just the standards of honest and reasonable people generally, but the standards set by the particular market or business in which the defendant was operating. The trial judge rejected that submission and the Court of Appeal upheld the conviction. Lord Thomas CJ stated:

Not only is there is no authority for the proposition that objective standards of honesty are to be set by a market, but such a principle would gravely affect the proper conduct of business. The history of the markets have shown that, from time to time, markets adopt patterns of behaviour which are dishonest by the standards of honest and reasonable people; in such cases, the market has simply abandoned ordinary standards of honesty. Each of the members of this court has seen such cases and the damage caused when a market determines its own standards of honesty in this way. Therefore to depart from the view that standards of honesty are determined by the standards of ordinary reasonable and honest people is not only unsupported by authority, but would undermine the maintenance of ordinary standards of honesty and integrity that are essential to the conduct of business and markets.³⁶⁶

Some argued that the decision in Hayes had unwittingly changed the test in Ghosh by limiting the factors the jury can take into consideration when assessing whether D's conduct was dishonest.³⁶⁷

It has been clear for decades that the objective limb of the test (as the first limb under Ghosh and now the second limb under Ivey) should not be altered to accommodate the particular context or market in which the alleged acts occurred. In Robertson,³⁶⁸ for example, it was wrong to amend the objective test by reference to 'reasonable and honest people engaged in business'.³⁶⁹ There is no separate first limb test for commercial fraud or market standards or market ethos, standard practice in an industry or any common understanding amongst employees. That would dilute the test since within certain sectors practices can develop that would be regarded as dishonest by all reasonable people even though they are adopted within the sector.

³⁶³ LCCP 155, para 5.6.

³⁶⁴ Gohill v DPP [2007] EWHC 23 (Admin).

³⁶⁵ [2015] EWCA Crim 1944.

³⁶⁶ At [32].

³⁶⁷ N Dent and A Kervick, 'Ghosh: A Change in Direction?' [2016] Crim LR 553.

³⁶⁸ [2006] EWCA Crim 1289.

³⁶⁹ See also Lockwood [1986] Crim LR 244.

(v) What element of subjectivity is there in the Ivey test? The Court of Appeal in Hayes confirmed that evidence of the kind D wanted to adduce was relevant to the second, subjective limb of the Ghosh test. Since Ivey has abolished that subjective limb of the Ghosh test, it remains to be seen what relevance, if any, evidence of the practices in a particular market or sector now has. Presumably it is now relevant to the first limb of the Ivey test, which requires the tribunal of fact to determine the actual state of the individual's knowledge or belief as to the facts.

It is unclear, however, what impact the Supreme Court envisages this limb having on the jury's or magistrates' assessment of whether the defendant's conduct was dishonest. The Supreme Court stated in unequivocal terms that the defendant's conduct cannot be evaluated against his own dishonest standard, so the first limb of the Ivey test cannot have the effect of diluting the objective nature of the assessment. In the vast majority of cases, this will not be a problem. In cases like Hayes, however, the question is whether the defendant will be entitled to adduce evidence that a practice was prevalent in a particular sector and, if so, what impact, if any, that will have on the assessment of whether what the defendant did was objectively dishonest. Even if such evidence can be adduced under the first limb of the Ivey test, it is unlikely that it will add anything to the jury's assessment of whether the defendant was dishonest. The example given by the court of when this limb will make a difference, the tourist who genuinely believes that public transport is free, is discussed earlier. Factual scenarios such as these will be rare, however. The more likely scenario is where D is involved in selling complex financial products that are far removed from the average juror's experience. It is disappointing that the impact of the new test in cases such as these was not considered by the Supreme Court.

(vi) The practical impact of the decision in Ivey rejecting Ghosh: The Court of Appeal has frequently stressed that it is not necessary for the jury to be given a direction in every case.³⁷⁰ It is unnecessary where D's claim is a lack of dishonesty owing to forgetfulness.³⁷¹ Nor is it necessary where, for example, D, a shopworker, simply denies taking the property and does not claim, for instance, that he borrowed it from the till.³⁷² It will be necessary where D's claim is that the ordinary person would not regard it as dishonest.³⁷³ The Supreme Court confirmed in Ivey that in most cases a direction will continue to be unnecessary.

Reform

The Law Commission commented that it found the criticisms of Ghosh 'compelling'.³⁷⁴ In the light of the volume and strength of such criticisms, it was not surprising, therefore, that numerous reform proposals have been advanced. Professor Elliott went so far as to suggest the removal of the element of dishonesty from the definition of theft. His proposal was to leave s 2 to deal with the bulk of cases and to add a further exculpatory element to the definition of the offence for conduct 'not detrimental to the interests of the owner in a significant practical way'.³⁷⁵ It is unclear that such a proposal would offer any greater degree ³⁷⁰ See in particular Roberts (1985) 84 Cr App R 177; Price [1990] Crim LR 200. Cf A Halpin, 'The Test for Dishonesty' [1996] Crim LR 283 at 291.

³⁷¹ Atkinson [2004] Crim LR 226.

³⁷² Cobb [2005] EWCA Crim 1549.

³⁷³ Wood [2002] EWCA Crim 832, CA where D claimed that his trespassing into empty premises, to remove the entire stock of curtain fabric, was not dishonest since he believed it to be abandoned.

³⁷⁴ LCCP 155, para 5.32.

³⁷⁵ See Elliott [1982] Crim LR 395. See also Elliott [1991] Crim LR 732. Cf G Williams, 'Innocuously Dipping into Trust Funds' (1983) 5 LS 183. This solution would require legislation and that seems very unlikely. Why should the taking of £20 from Bill Gates' wallet not amount to theft?

of certainty and promote any greater degree of consistency than the present law. There have been many other proposals, each with their strengths and defects.³⁷⁶

One attractive solution would be a provision that a person appropriating property belonging to another is to be regarded as dishonest unless one of the three existing exemptions (in s 2) apply or, fourthly:

he intends to replace the property with an equivalent and believes that no detriment whatever will be caused to the owner by the appropriation.

This would excuse the employee who ‘borrows’ £5 from the till when closing the shop on Saturday afternoon, having no doubt that he will be able to replace it when he opens up on Monday morning, only to be robbed and rendered penniless on his way home from the pub on Saturday night.³⁷⁷ His actions would be unlawful (in civil law) although not dishonest. It probably would not save the postmaster who ‘borrows’ from the post office till to keep his ailing grocery business going, in the hope that business will improve.

This test might, however, be thought too severe, leaving no escape route for hard cases such as the parents taking food for their starving children. But perhaps the concept of dishonesty is not the right vehicle for such cases. Suppose that the person breaks a window to get at the food and is charged with criminal damage. The definition of criminal damage does not require dishonesty. It would not make much sense to acquit the parent of theft and convict instead of criminal damage. They should stand or fall together. The parent might claim he had a ‘lawful excuse’ for the doing the damage—that is, the general defences of necessity or duress of circumstances—and this is the right approach for theft. If dishonesty were defined appropriately as a state of mind, exculpatory claims would be dealt with under the general defences which are applicable equally to theft and criminal damage. It is important, of course, to distinguish elements of unlawfulness and dishonesty. D may be acting unlawfully (and be aware that he is), and yet not be aware that he is acting dishonestly.

Although the judgment of the Supreme Court in Ivey addresses some of the criticisms that were made of the Ghosh test, it does not address the broader problems associated with placing reliance upon the undefined concept of dishonesty.

18.4.3 Intention permanently to deprive

The Theft Act preserves the rule of the common law and of the Larceny Act 1916 that appropriating the property of another with the intention of depriving him only temporarily of it is not stealing. There is no general offence in English law of stealing the use or enjoyment of a chattel or other property. The taking of motor vehicles and of articles from public places are exceptions, considered later. Apart from those cases, the 1968 Act left the law substantially unchanged; so that, if D takes V’s iPad without authority and uses it for an afternoon, a week or a month, he commits no offence under the 1968 Act if he has an intention to return the iPad at the end of this period.³⁷⁸ This is a mens rea requirement. It is not a question of whether V was in fact deprived permanently of the property.

³⁷⁶ See, inter alia, Glazebrook (1993) 52 CLJ 191 who provides a list of excepted circumstances that are not dishonest. This approach is developed by A Halpin, ‘The Test for Dishonesty’ [1996] Crim LR 283 at 294—‘1. The treatment by a person of the property of another is to be regarded as dishonest where it is done without a belief that the other would consent to that treatment if he knew of all the circumstances, unless the person believes that the law permits that treatment of the property. 2. The treatment by a person of the property of another is not to be regarded as dishonest if done (otherwise than by a trustee or personal representative) in the belief that the person to whom the property belongs is unlikely to be discovered by taking reasonable steps.’ See further, A Halpin, Definition in the Criminal Law (2004) 162–166, and Green, 13 Ways, Ch 5. Green does not suggest a model theft statute, but instead drafts a list of principles that he says ought to inform future efforts to reform the law of theft.

³⁷⁷ This proposal goes back substantially to the explanation offered many years ago for the meaning of ‘fraudulently’ in the Larceny Act 1916 and to that made by JC Smith in the first two editions of Law of Theft.

18.4.3.1 Deprivation of persons with limited interests

As we have seen, theft may be committed against a person having possession or control of property or having any proprietary right or interest in it. The element of permanence relates to the intended deprivation of V, not to the proposed benefit to D. Where V has an interest less than full ownership, it appears that an intention by D to deprive him of the whole of that interest, whatever it might be, is sufficient.³⁷⁹ Thus, if as D knows, V has hired a car from X for a month, and D takes it, intending to return it to X after the month has expired, this appears to be theft from V, who is permanently deprived of his whole interest in the property, but it is not theft from X. The question is one of intention; so, if in the above example, D, when he took the car, believed V to be the owner, he would apparently not commit theft from V (because he intended to return it) even though V was, in fact, deprived of his whole interest.

18.4.3.2 Section 6 and the common law

Under the law before the 1968 Act the phrase ‘intention permanently to deprive’ was held to include the cases where:

- (1) D took V’s property with intention that V should have it back only by paying for it—for example, he took V’s property so that, pretending that it was his own, he could sell it to V³⁸⁰ (‘ransom’ cases).
- (2) D took V’s property intending to return it to V only when he had completely changed its substance—for example, D, being employed by V to melt down iron, took an axle belonging to V and melted it down in order to increase his output and consequently his earnings;³⁸¹ or D wrongfully fed V’s oats to V’s own horses;³⁸² or took V’s horse intending to kill it and to return the carcass.³⁸³
- (3) D took V’s property and pawned it, intending to redeem and restore it to V one day but with no reasonable prospects of being able to do so.³⁸⁴

The draft Bill proposed by the CLRC contained no definition or elaboration of the phrase ‘intention of permanently depriving’. The Committee assumed that the old law would be applied without any difficulty under that expression. The government had other ideas and introduced a clause which, after much amendment, became s 6.³⁸⁵

Section 6(1) provides:

A person appropriating property belonging to another without meaning the other permanently to lose the thing itself is nevertheless to be regarded as having the intention of permanently depriving the other of it if his intention is to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other’s ³⁷⁸ Neal v Gribble [1978] RTR 409 (taking of a horse), p 913.

³⁷⁹ cf Smith, Property Offences, para 6.05.

³⁸⁰ Hall (1849) 1 Den 381. See also Raphael [2008] EWCA Crim 1014 (discussed later).

³⁸¹ Richards (1844) 1 Car & Kir 532.

³⁸² Morfit (1816) Russ & Ry 307.

³⁸³ cf Cabbage (1815) Russ & Ry 292.

³⁸⁴ Phetheon (1840) 9 C & P 552; Medland (1851) 5 Cox CC 292. Cf Trebilcock (1858) Dears & B 453 and Wynn (1887) 16 Cox CC 231, which are inconclusive on the point.

³⁸⁵ See JR Spencer, ‘The Metamorphosis of Section 6 of the Theft Act’ [1977] Crim LR 653. See more recently A Steele, ‘Permanent Borrowing and Lending: A New View of Section 6 Theft Act 1968’ (2008) 17 Nottingham LJ 3.

rights, and a borrowing or lending of it may amount to so treating it if, but only if, the borrowing or lending is for a period and in circumstances making it equivalent to an outright taking or disposal.

As Spencer has written,³⁸⁶ and the Court of Appeal was inclined to agree,³⁸⁷ s 6 ‘sprouts obscurities at every phrase’.

On one view s 6 was intended to cover the cases that had been included under the old law and no more. In Lloyd,³⁸⁸ the Court of Appeal approved academic opinions that s 6 only need be referred to in exceptional cases and then the question for the jury should not be ‘worded in terms of the generalities’ of the section but be related to the particular facts. The court cited the opinion of Edmund Davies LJ,³⁸⁹ that ‘Section 6 . . . gives illustrations, as it were, of what can amount to the dishonest intention demanded by s 1(1). But it is a misconception to interpret it as watering down s 1’, and concluded, ‘we would try to interpret the section in such a way as to ensure that nothing is construed as an intention permanently to deprive which would not prior to the 1968 Act have been so construed’.

However, before and since Lloyd, courts have given the words of the section their wider ordinary meaning; Downes,³⁹⁰ Chan Man-sin,³⁹¹ Re Osman,³⁹² Bagshaw.³⁹³

The current judicial opinion seems to be that s 6 is to be given its wider ordinary meaning (whatever that may be) and is not necessarily restricted to the scope of the common law meaning of the concept. The court in *Raphael*³⁹⁴ expressly doubted whether the statutory framework created by the Act should always be restrictively interpreted by reference to the previous law. This was reiterated in more explicit terms by the Court of Appeal in Vinall.³⁹⁵ Pitchford LJ stated that there was nothing in s 6(1) or (2) that indicated the governing and general words in subs (1) were intended to be limited to specific common law exceptions. Section 6 certainly has to be applied to situations which did not arise at common law, like the theft or obtaining of a thing in action.³⁹⁶ Subject to that, it is submitted that in view of the acknowledged obscurity of s 6, the better opinion is that it should, in general, be treated as a narrow restatement of the common law.³⁹⁷

18.4.3.3 Disposal of the property as one’s own

Adopting the broader meaning of s 6 presents some difficulties. It is submitted that an intention merely to use the thing as one’s own is not enough, and that ‘dispose of’ is used in the sense given by the Shorter Oxford Dictionary: ‘To deal with definitely; to get rid of; to get done with, finish. To make over by way of sale or bargain, sell.’³⁹⁸ In DPP v Lavender,³⁹⁹ however, the Divisional Court seems to have held D’s intention to treat the thing as his own, regardless of the owner’s rights, as crucial and to have minimized the importance of ‘to dispose of’. D, a council tenant, without authority removed two doors from another property belonging to the council to replace doors in the council property he occupied. Did he not, in fact, treat the doors as the property of the council, like the rest of the premises he occupied? If an officer worker surreptitiously swaps his keyboard for the similar model ³⁸⁶ Spencer [1977] Crim LR 653.

³⁸⁷ Lloyd [1985] QB 829 at 834.

³⁸⁸ [1985] QB 829.

³⁸⁹ Warner (1970) 55 Cr App R 93 at 97.

³⁹⁰ (1983) 77 Cr App R 260, [1983] Crim LR 819 and commentary.

³⁹¹ [1988] 1 All ER 1, [1988] Crim LR 319, PC.

³⁹² [1988] Crim LR 611.

³⁹³ [1988] Crim LR 321.

³⁹⁴ [2008] EWCA Crim 1014.

³⁹⁵ [2011] EWCA Crim 6252, [2012] Crim LR 386.

³⁹⁶ Since the thing in action is often extinguished and replaced by another (eg V’s bank credit being extinguished and D’s being created), there can only be permanent deprivation of that item of property belonging to V. The question is of D’s mens rea as to that deprivation.

³⁹⁷ cf Grew, Theft, para 2.103.

³⁹⁸ This passage was cited in Cahill [1993] Crim LR 141.

³⁹⁹ [1994] Crim LR 297.

operated by a colleague (because he believes it works better), does he steal the keyboard from his employer? He may well steal it from his colleague whom he does intend to deprive permanently of his limited interest.

It is submitted that, on a similar basis, there is no reason why there should not be a conviction for theft (rather than having to rely on s 11) in a case like that of the taker of the Goya from the National Gallery: 'I will return the picture when £X is paid to charity.' Substantially, the taker is offering to sell the thing back and his case is, in principle, the same as those contemplated by s 6(1). Nor should it make any difference that the price demanded is something other than money. 'I will return the picture when E (who is imprisoned) is given a free pardon'—this should be sufficient evidence of an intention permanently to deprive. The general principle might be that it is sufficient that there is an intention that V shall not have the property back unless some consideration is supplied by him or another; or, more generally still, unless some condition is satisfied.

The Court of Appeal commented that it was hard to find a better example of an intention on the part of the thief to 'treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights'⁴⁰⁰ than on the facts of Raphael.⁴⁰¹ D had stolen V's car using violence and then contacted V offering to sell the car back to him.

18.4.3.4 Borrowing or lending

Where money or anything which is consumed by use—like petrol—is 'borrowed', the dishonest 'borrower' has an intention permanently to deprive even though he intends to replace the money or the article with another which is just as good. He intends to deprive the owner of the specific thing he has appropriated.⁴⁰² In the case of a true borrowing it appears that there can be no theft, however dishonest the borrower may be, because, by definition, he does intend to return the specific thing taken. Yet by s 6(1), if the borrowing 'is for a period and in circumstances making it equivalent to an outright taking . . .' the borrower may be regarded as having the intention of depriving the owner permanently. This is a rather puzzling provision, because it would seem, prima facie, that borrowing cannot be an 'outright taking'. Clearly, however, this part of the subsection is intended to do something and, therefore, certain borrowings are to be treated as the equivalent of outright takings. Once this is accepted, it is not difficult to identify the kind of borrowings which are intended to be covered: they are those where the taker intends not to return the thing until the virtue is gone out of it: D takes V's non-rechargeable battery, intending to return it to V when it is exhausted; or V's season ticket, intending to return it to V when the season is over. Similar in principle are those cases where D intends to return the thing only when it is completely changed in substance.⁴⁰³

Where property belonging to another has been entirely deprived of an essential characteristic, which has been described as its 'virtue', the matter seems reasonably clear as, for example, with a person stealing a ticket which will be returned only after it has been used. What if the virtue has not been entirely eliminated—but very nearly? D takes V's season ticket for Arsenal's matches intending to return it to him in time for the last match of the season. Is this an 'outright taking' so as to amount to theft of the ticket? If it is, is it theft if D intends to return the ticket in time for two matches?—or three, four, five or six—where should the line be drawn? The difficulty of drawing a line suggests that it should not be theft of the ticket unless D intends to keep it until it has lost all (or, at least, substantially all) of its virtue.⁴⁰⁴ (The difficulty might satisfactorily be overcome in this particular case by holding that the right to see each match is a separate thing in action, of which V is permanently deprived once that match is over.) This means, of course, that if D takes V's car and keeps it for ten years, he will not be guilty of theft if, when, as he intended all along, he returns it to V, it is still a roadworthy vehicle, though the proportion of its original value which it retains is very small. If it can no longer be described as a car, but is scrap metal, then, if D intended to return it in this state, he has stolen it.⁴⁰⁵

⁴⁰⁰ At [47]. ⁴⁰¹ [2008] EWCA Crim 1014. ⁴⁰² Velumyl [1989] Crim LR 299.

⁴⁰³ See cases cited earlier. Dicta in Bagshaw [1988] Crim LR 321 concerning the 'virtue' test seem inappropriate to the facts of that case.

The provision regarding lending appears to contemplate the situation where D is in possession or control of the property and he lends it to another, X. If D knows that the effect is that V will never get the property back again, he clearly has an intention permanently to deprive V. Similarly, if D knows that when V gets the property back again the virtue will have gone out of it, this is equivalent to an outright disposal. The examples of the non-rechargeable battery, season ticket, etc are applicable here, though they seem less likely to arise in the context of lending than of borrowing.

18.4.3.5 Parting with property under a condition as to its return

Section 6(2) provides:

Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above, where a person, having possession or control (lawfully or not) of property belonging to another, parts with the property under a condition as to its return which he may not be able to perform, this (if done for purposes of his own and without the other's authority) amounts to treating the property as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights.

This is clearly intended to deal with the kind of case which gave difficulty under the old law, where D, being in possession or control of V's goods, pawns them. If D had no intention of ever redeeming the goods, there was no problem—he was guilty of larceny and he would now clearly be guilty of theft, apart from s 6(2). But what if D does intend to redeem? The answer now is that if he knows that he may not be able to do so, he is guilty of theft. The subsection does not seem to allow any distinction to be drawn between the case where D knows that the chances of his being able to redeem are slight and the case where he believes the chances are high; in either case, the condition is one which he knows he may not be able to perform.

The common law cases suggested that it was theft, notwithstanding an intention to redeem the goods, if the person pawning them had no reasonable prospects of being able to redeem them.⁴⁰⁶ It is submitted, however, that the question under the Theft Act is a purely subjective one: D must intend to dispose of the property regardless of the other's rights, and s 6(2) merely describes what he must intend. If then D is in fact convinced, however unreasonably, that he will be able to redeem the property, he does not come within the terms of s 6(2) because he intends to dispose of it under a condition which he will be able to perform.⁴⁰⁷

⁴⁰⁴ cf Chan Wai Lam v R [1981] Crim LR 497.

⁴⁰⁵ cf DPP v J [2002] EWHC 291 (Admin), holding that the magistrates were wrong to accept a submission of no case where D had taken V's headphones, snapped them and returned them.

⁴⁰⁶ Phetheon (1840) 9 C & P 552; Medland (1851) 5 Cox CC 292. Trebilcock (1858) Dears & B 453 and Wynn (1887) 16 Cox CC 231 are inconclusive.

⁴⁰⁷ cf A Steele (2008) 17 Nottingham LJ 3 in a comprehensive review of the case law suggests that an intention permanently to deprive is established: 1. Automatically if D pawns V's property subject to a condition that D cannot control. There is no need to prove any intent in such cases; 2. If D's borrowing V's property is objectively equivalent to an outright taking but where D intends that it will be returned; 3. Where D lends V's property to X and D does not intend that V's property will be returned to him; 4. In all other cases the subjective intention of D must be proved.

This is not necessarily conclusive, however, for s 6(2) is without prejudice to the generality of s 6(1); and it might reasonably be argued that even the person who is convinced, when pawning the goods, of his power to redeem them intends to treat the goods as his own to dispose of, regardless of the other's rights. This would be equally true if the person pawning the goods in fact had power to redeem; and, since pawning is not 'lending', there is no need to prove that it was equivalent to an outright disposal.⁴⁰⁸

On the whole it would seem that the better approach is to hold that D who is certain of his ability to redeem does not have an intention permanently to deprive. Such a person, in some circumstances, may well be found by the jury not to be dishonest. For example, D, a tenant for a year of a furnished house, being temporarily short of money, pawns the landlord's clock, knowing that he will certainly be able to redeem it and intends to do so before the year expires. A prosecution for theft of the clock could fail on the grounds both that he is not dishonest and that he has no intent permanently to deprive. If D does not know that he will be able to redeem the clock, then the situation will be different. In the extradition case of Balint v Municipal Court in Prague, Czech Republic, Jackson LJ reiterated that, 'The fact that a defendant hopes that he may one day be in a position to repay the money taken is not a defence to theft.'⁴⁰⁹

18.4.3.6 Abandonment of property

Early nineteenth-century cases on the taking of horses decided that there was no intention permanently to deprive, even though D turned the horse loose some considerable distance from the place where he took it. In the conditions of those times it might be supposed that D must have known that there was a substantial risk that V would not get his horse back. This lenient attitude may be contrasted with that adopted in the pawning cases, and the right course would seem to be to attach no importance to these old decisions in the interpretation of the Theft Act.

The case where the property is abandoned is not within s 6(2) for D does not part with the property under a condition. He might, however, be regarded as having an intention to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights. If D borrows the thing and then leaves it where he knows the owner or someone on his behalf will certainly find it, he clearly does not have an intention permanently to deprive. But if he abandons the thing in circumstances such that he knows that it is quite uncertain whether the owner will ever get it back, then it would not be unreasonable to hold that he has an intention to treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights.

Care must be taken with arguments that property has been abandoned and that D has therefore demonstrated an intent to deprive permanently. In Mitchell,⁴¹⁰ D was charged with robbery having been one of four men who had seized V's vehicle having crashed their own vehicle in a police chase. They abandoned V's car and took another one which they subsequently abandoned and burnt out.⁴¹¹ The trial judge ruled that there was sufficient evidence from the taking of the first car and abandoning capable of amounting to an intention to dispose of property regardless of owner's rights pursuant to s 6(1) of the Act. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal confirming that s 6(1) was not intended to dilute the definition of theft in s 1(1). None of the earlier authorities extended the scope of s 6 to a case, even of violent taking of a car for its brief use before abandoning it where it could easily be discovered.

⁴⁰⁸ The difficulty about this interpretation is that it makes it very difficult to see why s 6(2) is there at all; if D's disposition of property under a condition which he is able to perform is theft under subs (1), why refer specifically to the case of a condition which he may not be able to perform?

⁴⁰⁹ [2011] EWHC 498 (Admin), [45].

⁴¹⁰ [2008] EWCA Crim 850.

⁴¹¹ It was conceded by the prosecution that the second vehicle had not been stolen.

By analogy to the pawning case discussed earlier, it would seem that it should be immaterial whether D believes that the chances of V's getting the property back are large or small; it is sufficient that he intends to risk the loss of V's property. In Fernandes,⁴¹² Auld LJ concluded that 'section 6 may apply to a person in possession or control of another's property who dishonestly and for his own purpose deals with that property in such a manner that he knows he is risking its loss'.⁴¹³ The Court of Appeal cited this passage with approval in Vinall.⁴¹⁴ Pitchford LJ stated that what s 6(1) requires is a state of mind in D which Parliament regards as the equivalent of an intention permanently to deprive, namely an 'intention to treat the thing as one's own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights'. His lordship went on to observe that:

The subsection does not require that the thing has been disposed of, nor does it require that the defendant intends to dispose of the thing in any particular way. No doubt evidence of a particular disposal or a particular intention to dispose of the thing will constitute evidence of the defendant's state of mind but it is, in our view, for the jury to decide upon the circumstances proved whether the defendant harboured the statutory intention.

His lordship accepted that if the Crown cannot establish an intention permanently to deprive at the moment of the taking, it may nevertheless establish that D later exercised such a dominion over the property that it can be inferred that at the time of the taking he intended to treat the property as his own to dispose of regardless of the owner's rights. Therefore, it now appears to be relatively settled that subsequent disposal of property may be evidence either of an intention at the time of the taking or evidence at the time of the disposal. When the allegation is one of theft, this later appropriation will suffice. In Vinall, the Court of Appeal held that it was open to the judge to invite the jury to consider whether D's later abandonment of V's bicycle was evidence from which it could be inferred that, at the time of the taking, he intended to treat it as his own to dispose of regardless of V's rights. If, however, D is charged with robbery, then this later appropriation will be insufficient because there will be no coincidence of theft and force.⁴¹⁵

18.4.3.7 Other things to be returned—but for a price

A problem arises with the theft of a railway ticket or any other ticket which entitles the holder to services or goods when he returns it.⁴¹⁶ If D takes the ticket from another passenger, V, there is no difficulty. D intends to deprive V permanently not only of the piece of paper but also of the thing in action (the contractual right to travel) which it represents; but if he takes the ticket from the rail company intending to use it, he may well intend to give it up at the end of the journey.⁴¹⁷ The rail company own the piece of paper but they cannot own the contractual right to travel. As with a cheque,⁴¹⁸ it may be said that D intends to return a different thing, a cancelled ticket with a hole punched in it; it has lost its virtue.

An alternative explanation is that D intends that the rail company shall have the ticket only by paying for it—through the provision of a ride on their train. That should be enough.

⁴¹² [1996] 1 Cr App R 175. Cf Mitchell [2008] EWCA Crim 850 in which D was not guilty of robbery where he had taken a car by force and abandoned it. Relying upon Fernandes, it was emphasized in Balint v Municipal Court in Prague, Czech Republic [2011] EWHC 498 (Admin).

⁴¹³ At [188].

⁴¹⁴ [2011] EWCA Crim 2652, [2012] Crim LR 386.

⁴¹⁵ See Ch 19.

⁴¹⁶ cf Marshall [1998] 2 Cr App R 282, p 856.

⁴¹⁷ At one time, everyone knew that all tickets had to be given to the collector at the end of the journey but, in these days of 'open stations', this is not necessarily so. If I am travelling to London Euston (an open station) I expect (and intend) to retain my ticket; but if I am travelling to Leeds (a closed station), I expect (and intend) to give it up.

⁴¹⁸ See p 845.

This explanation has the advantage that it extends to things which are intended to be returned (but only for value) in an unchanged form. For example, D takes tokens from a coffee shop intending to return them in exchange for his espresso; or gaming chips from the proprietor of a gaming club, intending to return them in exchange for the right to play.⁴¹⁹ In all these cases there is probably a conditional intention permanently to deprive in the literal sense. The ticket, tokens and chips will probably not be returned at all if the taker realizes that he is not going to receive the value they represent.

18.4.3.8 Conditional intention to deprive

Consider a case where D takes V's bag, intending to take anything of value which he finds in it. Is such a 'conditional' intention sufficient? In Easom,⁴²⁰ the Court of Appeal held, controversially, that 'a conditional appropriation will not do'. A difficulty with this proposition is that all intention is conditional, even though the condition is unexpressed and not present to the mind of the person at that time. In that case, D picked up a woman's handbag in a cinema, rummaged through the contents and put it back having taken nothing. The handbag was attached by a thread to a policewoman's wrist. D's conviction for stealing the handbag and the specified contents—tissues, cosmetics, etc—was quashed because D never had any intention of permanently depriving V of any of those things. It followed that he was not guilty of attempting to steal any of them. No doubt he intended to steal things which were not there—presumably money—and might have been convicted of attempting to steal on a suitably worded indictment.⁴²¹ D had no intention permanently to deprive and, consequently, he was not guilty of attempting to steal the handbag, or the specified contents either.

In Hussey,⁴²² DD opened the door of a van in which there was a holdall containing valuable sub-aqua equipment. They were charged with attempted theft of the equipment. The judge directed the jury that they could convict if DD were about to look into the holdall and, if its contents were valuable, to steal it. The Court of Appeal, following Easom, held that this was a misdirection: 'it cannot be said that one who has it in mind to steal only if what he finds is worth stealing has a present intention to steal'. In Re A-G's References (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979),⁴²³ the Court of Appeal held that these words were applicable only to an indictment which alleged an intention to steal a specific object, such as sub-aqua equipment. If the indictment had charged an attempt to steal 'some or all of the contents of the holdall' or, in Easom, of the handbag, there would be no problem. Yet, in Hussey the sub-aqua equipment was the contents of the holdall—there were no other contents; so, according to the court, D was not guilty of attempting to steal the equipment if it was described as such, but he was guilty if it was described as the 'contents of the holdall'. At that time it was clear law that there could be no conviction for attempting to steal a thing that was not there—it was the sub-aqua equipment or nothing. Since the Criminal Attempts Act 1981,⁴²⁴ this is no longer so. A person looking for money in an empty handbag might now be convicted of attempting to steal money.

The real problem in cases of this kind is the form of the charges. The formula approved in the A-G's References is not satisfactory because, in these cases, the defendant did not intend (or it was not proved that he intended) to steal any of the contents. But he undoubtedly intended to steal something—something which was not 'all or any of the contents'.⁴²⁵ The charge would be accurate if it alleged simply that D attempted to steal from the handbag, ⁴¹⁹ cf correspondence in [1976] Crim LR 329 and commentary on Pick [1982] Crim LR 238 which should have been read in the light of the Gaming Act 1968, s 16 which was overlooked.

⁴²⁰ [1971] 2 QB 315 at 319. ⁴²¹ Discussed later.

⁴²² (1977) 67 Cr App R 131n, [1978] Crim LR 219 and commentary; discussed at [1978] Crim LR 444 and 644.

⁴²³ [1980] QB 180, [1979] Crim LR 585 and commentary. ⁴²⁴ See p 495.

⁴²⁵ cf Bayley and Easterbrook [1980] Crim LR 503 and commentary.

or holdall.⁴²⁶ This is so whether or not there is anything there that D would have stolen. D's intention to steal anything he finds which he thinks worth stealing is a present intention to steal, at least so far as the law of attempts is concerned. The failure to specify any subject matter cannot be an objection since the Criminal Attempts Act 1981.⁴²⁷

It is submitted that the better view is that an assumption of ownership, which is conditional because there is an intention to deprive only in a certain event, is theft. For example, D takes V's ring intending to keep it if the stone is a diamond, but otherwise to return it. He takes it to a jeweller who says the stone is paste. D returns the ring to V. It is submitted that he committed theft when he took the ring. The fact that he returned it is relevant only to mitigation in sentence. A similar problem may arise where D takes the property of V, say a ring, intending to claim a reward from V for finding it. If he intends to return the ring in any event and hopes to receive the reward, he is not guilty of stealing the ring though he is of fraud and of an attempt to steal the reward. But if he intends to retain the ring unless he receives the reward, he seems to be in substantially the same situation as the taker who sells the property back to the owner. It might be said, however, that in this example, the taker is not treating the property as his own. There are two possible answers to this: the assertion of a better right to possession might be regarded as treating the property as one's own; or, s 6 not providing an exclusive definition, this might be regarded as an analogous case falling within the general principle.

18.5 Corporations and their officers

As far as offences under the Theft Acts generally are concerned, the liability of corporations for them falls to be determined in accordance with the general principles applicable to the liability of corporations for crime.⁴²⁸ Where a corporation commits a crime it must be the case that the crime has been committed by a person, or persons, in control of the corporation's affairs.⁴²⁹ Such persons are, of course, liable in accordance with the ordinary principles governing liability for crime.

18.6 Liability of spouses and civil partners for Theft Act offences

For many purposes husband and wife and, since the Civil Partnership Act 2004 those in a civil partnership, occupy a special position under the law and have special rules relating to them.⁴³⁰

⁴²⁶ cf Smith and Smith [1986] Crim LR 166 and commentary.

⁴²⁷ As with the law of burglary, this is an instance in which it appears motive, which is generally regarded as irrelevant in mens rea in practice, assumes an importance, p 101. It may be different where the charge is theft. A lorry driver was held (in a civil action) not guilty of theft of the goods loaded on his lorry when he drove off intending to steal the load 'if and when the circumstances were favourable': Grundy (Teddington) Ltd v Fulton [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep 16, CA; but he had assumed a right of the owner (cf Gomez) and the only question is whether the conditional intention was enough.

⁴²⁸ See Ch 8.

⁴²⁹ A corporation may, of course, be vicariously liable for crimes even though the crime is not committed by a person in control of its affairs: see p 266. But vicarious liability would not apply in connection with offences under the Theft Act 1968.

⁴³⁰ The reference to a 'spouse' includes a party to a same-sex marriage: Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013, s 11 and Sch 3, Pt 1.

Section 30 of the Theft Act 1968 makes spouses and civil partners liable in respect of offences against each other's property as though they were not married.⁴³¹ It is clear that a spouse may steal property belonging exclusively to the other, it is equally clear that a spouse/partner may steal property jointly owned with the other spouse/partner, since one co-owner may steal from another.⁴³²

By s 30(2), one spouse may prosecute the other for any criminal offence whether that offence is committed by a spouse on the person or property of the other, or whether by a spouse against a third party. That is subject to s 30(4), which provides that where the offence consists of 'stealing or doing unlawful damage to property which at the time of the offence belongs to that person's wife or husband or civil partner' proceedings may not be instituted except by or with the consent of the DPP.⁴³³ Neither a wife nor a police officer, then, would need the DPP's leave to institute proceedings for an assault on the wife by the husband, nor to prosecute the husband in respect of any offence committed by him on a third party. A wife might, for example, prosecute her husband for stealing property belonging to a child of the marriage or for assaulting his mother-in-law. There are further exceptional situations provided for in s 30(4) where either the spouses are jointly charged or where the spouses are, by order, no longer bound to cohabit.

18.7 Reform

Over the last century the central focus of acquisitive crimes has shifted from protecting the possession of tangible goods against transportation to the protection of ownership of property (as broadly construed) against misuse. Those interests being protected, and which form essential elements of the actus reus—property and ownership—have expanded. The constant concept has been that of mens rea—fraud or dishonesty. So it seems that it will be in the future. It may be that the actus reus of the offences will disappear almost to vanishing point as the interests the law seeks to protect become more diffuse, diverse and indefinable.

There is also a growing pressure to use the criminal law to protect other 'interests' from misuse—trade secrets being a strong example. The law may need to be more forward-thinking by protecting 'rights' and 'interests' such as the 'use' and 'value' derived from 'having access' to facilities. As these interests are harder to define, the mental element of dishonesty offences will become ever more important.

Although the Theft Acts have generated some complex and controversial case law, one view is that there is not very much wrong with them if properly handled.⁴³⁴ An alternative view is that the Acts are now in need of some radical reappraisal since they represent a pragmatic but unprincipled patchwork of overlapping and technical offences.

⁴³¹ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 14.4; Griew, Theft, Ch 1.

⁴³² See Ch 8.

⁴³³ By the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, s 1(7). The consent may be given by a Crown Prosecutor.

⁴³⁴ See JC Smith, 'The Sad Fate of the Theft Act 1968' in W Swadling and G Jones (eds), The Search for Principle, Essays in Honour of Lord Goff of Chieveley (1999) 97. See also JC Smith, 'Conspiracy to Defraud: Some Comments on the Law Commission's Report' [1995] Crim LR 210 (a view shared by the Model Criminal Code Committee of the Attorney-General's Department, Australia, Final Report (1995) Chs 3, 6) and JC Smith, 'Reforming the Theft Acts' (1996) 28 Bracton LJ 27. See also DW Elliott, 'Dialogues on the Theft Act' in Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law, 287.

Robbery

19.1 Robbery under the Theft Act 1968

Robbery was a common law offence, and was put on a statutory footing in s 8 of the 1968 Act:

- (1) A person is guilty of robbery if he steals, and immediately before or at the time of doing so, and in order to do so, he uses force on any person or puts or seeks to put any person in fear of being then and there subjected to force.
- (2) A person guilty of robbery, or of an assault with intent to rob, shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.

Robbery¹ is an extremely serious offence, carrying a maximum life sentence, and attracting substantial sentences in practice.² It is triable only on indictment. In recent years there has been enhanced media attention focused on street ‘muggings’ (especially for mobile phones),³ carjacking and robberies of people using ATM machines.⁴

The offence is very broad, applying to thefts in many circumstances ranging from the work of sophisticated gangs⁵ and armed bank robbers,⁶ to extreme forms of playground bullying.⁷ There have been cogent calls for reform to subdivide the offence into categories based on the gravity of the threat or use of violence involved.⁸ This would provide offences which would have more appropriate labelling and sentencing.

Since the offence necessarily includes theft,⁹ and will usually also involve an offence against the person,¹⁰ it might be thought that a separate offence of robbery is otiose and

¹ See generally Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 7; J Andrews, ‘Robbery’ [1966] Crim LR 524; Griew, Theft, Ch 3; Smith, Property Offences, Ch14.

² The Definitive Guideline was published by the Sentencing Council on 28 Jan 2016 and came into effect on 1 Apr 2016. Available at www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/publications/item/robbery-definitive-guideline-2/.

³ See A-G's References Nos 4 and 7 'Q' [2002] 2 Cr App R (S) 345. By criminalizing offers to reprogram mobile phones it is hoped to reduce phone thefts and robberies: Violent Crime Reduction Act 2006, s 62, modifying s 1(1) of the Mobile Telephone (Re-programming) Act 2002.

⁴ For a review of police data, see J Smith, The Nature of Personal Robbery (2003).

⁵ See M Gill, Commercial Robbery (2000).

⁶ Armed robbery attracts very high sentences. See generally on armed robbery: I O'Donnell and S Morrison, ‘Armed and Dangerous: The Use of Firearms in Robbery’ [1997] 36 Howard Jnl 305. A count for a relevant firearms offence ought to be added to such indictments: Murphy [2002] Crim LR 674. See generally Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 7.26, R Matthews, Armed Robbery (2003).

⁷ See FA and others [2003] 2 Cr App R (S) 84.

⁸ See A Ashworth, ‘Robbery Reassessed’ [2002] Crim LR 851. See also Green, 13 Ways. Green notes that under the US Model Penal Code only those thefts involving the infliction or threat of immediate ‘serious bodily injury’ are treated as robbery.

⁹ Guy (1990) 93 Cr App R 108, CA.

¹⁰ Robbery is not an offence of violence per se: Baker [2000] Crim LR 700, CA.

that the combination of the two charges would cater adequately in terms of labelling and sentencing powers. Despite the overlap, it is submitted that a specifically labelled offence of robbery is desirable, not least because in cases of a theft with a threat of violence, unless the threat is to kill, the only offence against the person likely to have been committed will be that of assault.¹¹ In short, with robbery the whole is greater than the sum of the parts.

19.1.1 Requirement of theft

As defined, robbery is essentially an aggravated form of theft; and if there is no theft, or attempted theft, there can be no robbery or attempted robbery. All of the elements of theft must be proved. So it would not be robbery where D by force takes a bag from V in the belief that he has the legal right to it (no dishonesty);¹² or where D is merely begging for money;¹³ or where D by force takes a car from V not intending to deprive V permanently of it. In the first case D may be guilty of an assault,¹⁴ and in the last of both an assault and an offence under s 12 of the Theft Act (taking a motor vehicle without authority), but in neither case is he guilty of robbery.

The requirement of an intention permanently to deprive has generated considerable case law. In Raphael,¹⁵ R had been convicted of conspiracy to rob V by forcibly taking his car and then offering V the opportunity to buy it back. The Court of Appeal referred to s 6 (see the previous chapter) and concluded that this was clearly capable of amounting to robbery. In contrast, in *Mitchell*¹⁶ DD took V's car as a getaway car and abandoned it later with no attempt to conceal it: no intention permanently to deprive was found and, hence, no theft and therefore no robbery. The same result occurred in *Vinall*¹⁷ and Zerei.¹⁸ In these latter two cases, the Court of Appeal accepted that D's later abandonment of the property was evidence from which the jury could infer an intention permanently to deprive. It was critical that the jury were directed that D could only be guilty of robbery if they were sure there was an intention permanently to deprive at the moment the property was appropriated by force. In both cases, the Court of Appeal reiterated the need for the judge to draw a distinction between the requirement of an appropriation and an intention permanently to deprive. If the two issues are conflated, this may be fatal to the safety of any ensuing conviction. Robbery does not require that D keeps the property, rather only that he has the intention permanently to deprive V at the time of the appropriation, as where D takes V's headphones by force, snaps and returns them in 'useless' form.¹⁹

Problems can arise in relation to indirect threats. In Waters,²⁰ D had been with a group in a park and they had approached V. A mobile phone was taken from V, and D had said to V that the phone would be returned if another named man, X, could be persuaded to come and talk to them. The judge directed the jury that, if D had made it clear that the phone would be returned if he was able to talk to X, it would still constitute the 'intention ¹¹ Ashworth [2002] Crim LR 851 at 863.

¹² cf Skivington [1968] 1 QB 166; Robinson [1977] Crim LR 173, CA; Forrester [1992] Crim LR 793, CA; Hall [2008] EWCA Crim 2086—some evidence of the belief in right to the property is needed before the judge must leave it to the jury.

¹³ cf Codsi [2009] EWCA Crim 1618.

¹⁴ D's claim that he believes himself to be entitled to the property appropriated does not of itself legitimate his use of force. The fact that V unlawfully possesses the property does not preclude a robbery conviction if D takes it by force: Smith [2011] EWCA Crim 66.

¹⁵ [2008] EWCA Crim 1014, [2008] Crim LR 995 and commentary.

¹⁶ [2008] EWCA Crim 850.

¹⁷ [2011] EWCA Crim 2652.

¹⁸ [2012] EWCA Crim 1114.

¹⁹ Magistrates wrong to accept submission of no case: DPP v J [2002] EWHC 291 (Admin).

²⁰ [2015] EWCA Crim 402.

to permanently deprive' element of the offence of theft. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The jury might have been left with the erroneous impression that even if X could be found in the near future and it was likely that the phone would be soon returned, nonetheless there had been an intention to permanently deprive in respect of the phone. That was not a correct conclusion. The court did not refer to the 'ransom' cases. As the Court of Appeal made clear in Lloyd,²¹ it is theft and therefore can be robbery if:

a defendant takes things and then offers them back to the owner for the owner to buy if he wishes. If the taker intends to return them to the owner only upon such payment, then, on the wording of section 6(1) that is deemed to amount to the necessary intention permanently to deprive . . .²²

It makes no difference if the ransom demand is for action rather than money. In short, the jury needed to be sure that D intended to 'treat the thing as his own to dispose of regardless of the other's rights'.

The offence of robbery is complete when the theft is complete, that is when the appropriation is complete. Following recent interpretations of that concept,²³ a robbery can now be completed much earlier than at common law, and than the drafters of the Theft Act intended. So, in Corcoran v Anderton,²⁴ where D and E sought to take V's handbag by force, it was held that the theft was complete when D snatched the handbag from V's grasp, though it then fell from D's hands and the defendants made off without it. It is now arguable that the theft in such a case is complete when D first touches the handbag, for by that conduct he is assuming a right of an owner.

For robbery, the appropriation element of theft will normally be by D 'taking' V's property since it is difficult to imagine realistic situations in which robbery might arise by appropriation without taking.²⁵ One possibility is where D has borrowed V's property and refuses to return property to V, and backs this refusal with a threat of force. Taking a different scenario, it is unclear whether D can be said to have completed the robbery where he issues a threat to V and demands that V hand over his property and V is in the process of doing so, but D has not yet touched it.²⁶ A safer course is to charge an attempted robbery in such circumstances.²⁷

19.1.2 Use or threat of force

Any use or threat of 'force' against the person suffices. 'Force' is wider than the concept of 'violence' used at common law, and might be regarded as a more neutral word. The courts have not defined it, and treat it as an ordinary English word, which should be left to the jury to determine.²⁸ It is submitted that no jury could reasonably find that the slight physical contact that might be involved where D picks V's pocket would amount to a use of force.²⁹ However, very little may be required to turn a case of theft into one of robbery; to push or ²¹ [1985] QB 829. ²² At 836.

²³ Discussed in Ch 18. The significance of when robbery ends can be important in sentence in a murder case where D is alleged to have killed for gain: see Sch 21, para 5 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003 and Cullen [2007] 2 Cr App R (S)394.

²⁴ (1980) 71 Cr App R 104, [1980] Crim LR 385.

²⁵ See Andrews [1966] Crim LR 524, for possible instances.

²⁶ cf Briggs [2004] Crim LR 495. Cf Farrell (1787) 1 Leach 332. D apprehended before V handed over the property.

²⁷ For an example of a case in which such an approach was upheld by the Court of Appeal, see Dyer [2011] EWCA Crim 900.

²⁸ Dawson and James (1976) 64 Cr App R 170, CA.

²⁹ See eg Monaghan and Monaghan [2000] 1 Cr App R (S) 6 where 'jostling' to pick V's pockets was charged as theft.

nudge the victim so as to cause him to lose his balance is capable of being a use of force.³⁰ If D causes a substance to come into contact with V, in an effort to incapacitate V in order to facilitate theft, then it is submitted that D would be guilty of robbery.

The offence can be committed in one of three ways.

- Where D uses force. This poses few problems. It is no defence that V was unaware that D was using force, as where D strikes V from behind rendering V unconscious so that D can steal from him.
- Where D 'puts' any person in 'fear' of being then and there subjected to force. Here, the language of the section does leave some ambiguity. Is it a requirement of robbery that (a) V is put in 'fear' or (b) is it sufficient that he apprehends³¹ that force may be used if he resists? The Divisional Court confirmed in *R v DPP*³² that robbery does not require proof that V was actually put in fear. It is submitted that this must be correct, otherwise the commission of the offence would turn on the courage of the victim. That case does not, however, answer the question whether it is necessary for the victim to apprehend that force will be used.³³ In this form of the offence, it would seem to be a necessary element. Support for that proposition is derived from Grant v CPS,³⁴ although the court in R v DPP cast doubt on that case.
- Where the allegation is that D seeks to put V in fear of force. Here, there is no need for V to be in fear, nor it seems to apprehend force; the offence turns solely on D's intention. It is important to emphasize that it is sufficient that D's intent is to produce a state of mind where V apprehends force; it is not necessary for D to intend that V will be afraid. Hence, D cannot plead that he thought V was macho enough not to be afraid of the threats. Tennant makes clear that D may threaten a use of force and satisfy the requirement of the offence of robbery although V is not made to apprehend the immediate infliction of force on him which is necessary to constitute an assault.³⁵

A threat of force may be implied as well as express. Where D threatens V with force unless V complies with D's demands and at a later stage D takes property from an unprotesting V, D may be convicted of robbery if he intends, and V understands, the threat to continue even though D's original threats were not made for the purpose of taking V's property.³⁶ This might be a common occurrence where D threatens V who subsequently escorts D to V's bank ATM and withdraws cash to hand over to D.

³⁰ Dawson and James, n 28. See Williams, TBCL, 825, suggesting a distinction based on 'gentle force' used to take by stealth as opposed to force used to overcome resistance. See also Griew, Theft, para 3.05; Smith, Property Offences, para 14.10.

³¹ Clearly a different state of mind from fear as is obvious from the law in relation to assault, see p 661.

³² [2007] EWHC 739 (Admin).

³³ Interestingly, in B (JJ) [2012] EWCA Crim 1440, the Court of Appeal observed that robbery could be committed without any force actually being used on V. It was held that the consequence of this is that if there is only a charge of robbery on the indictment and the jury were to find D not guilty of that charge, then the only possible alternative verdict made possible by the introduction of s 6(3A) of the Criminal Law Act 1967 is one of common assault. This observation, however, is overbroad and surely depends upon the facts of the case. The jury might not be sure that D used force in order to steal and therefore find him not guilty of robbery, but nevertheless be sure that there was an unlawful touching and find him guilty of battery or a more serious non-fatal offence against the person, depending upon the circumstances. The Court of Appeal confirmed in Ali [2016] EWCA Crim 375 that the offence of ABH is not a statutory alternative to the offence of robbery. The ABH could be seen as being separate to and independent from the robbery.

³⁴ Grant v CPS (2000) 10 Mar, unreported, QBD.

³⁵ Tennant [1976] Crim LR 133, CC.

³⁶ Donaghy and Marshall [1981] Crim LR 644 (Judge Chavasse).

19.1.2.1 Force to the person

Prior to the Theft Act, robbery was thought of as stealing accomplished by force against the person, the force being used to overpower V's resistance and not merely to seize the property.³⁷ The CLRC in drafting the 1968 Act had the same distinction in mind, stating they would 'not regard mere snatching of property, such as a handbag, from an unresisting owner as using force for the purpose of the definition'.³⁸ The requirement that the force be administered directly to a person and not the property being stolen was meant to be retained by the words in s 8: '... if he steals . . . and in order to do so, he uses force on any person or seeks to put any person in fear of being then and there subjected to force'. But, in Clouden,³⁹ the distinction was rejected and D's conviction for robbery was upheld where he wrenched a shopping basket from V's hand and ran off with it. In the view of the court, the old distinction could not stand with the words of s 8, and it was open to a jury to find on such facts that force had been used on V with intent to steal. A fortiori, it will be robbery where, for example, a struggle, even a fleeting one, takes place for possession of a handbag⁴⁰ or where an earring is snatched tearing the lobe of the ear.⁴¹ The decision in Clouden is an interesting illustration of the ambiguity over the true foundation of robbery: it is a hybrid offence protecting property and personal safety, and the courts refuse to narrow it down by defining its concepts in an unduly technical fashion.

The Administrative Court examined the meaning of 'force' in *P v DPP*⁴² in which D snatched a cigarette from the hand of V. D was convicted in the Youth Court of robbery and appealed by way of a case stated. The issue for the court was whether the snatching of a cigarette, in the absence of any physical contact between D and V, was sufficient to constitute 'force'. Mitting J observed that under the Larceny Act 1916, which used the term 'violence', the answer would be in the negative. His lordship cited with approval a passage from *Smith's Law of Theft*⁴³ and concluded that the snatching of a cigarette in these circumstances was insufficient to constitute 'force' within the meaning of s 8. Although 'force' has a broader meaning than 'violence', it was held that the facts of this case were analogous to cases of pickpocketing in which there is no physical contact between D and V. As this case involved no physical contact whatsoever, D's conviction was quashed. It was observed that the appropriate charge on these facts was theft of the cigarette.⁴⁴ His lordship did, however, accept that force could be applied indirectly, for example when D wrenches a shopping bag from V. Although this judgment has the attraction of according with common sense, it is submitted that Mitting J makes an observation that ought to be treated with caution. His lordship states that the snatching of the cigarette could not constitute force because it could not have caused any pain to D. As has already been pointed out, s 8 does not require pain to be caused to V; it simply requires the use of force on any person. For example, if D wrenches

³⁷ Gnosil (1824) 1 C & P 304; Harman's Case (1620) 2 Roll Rep 154.

³⁸ Eighth Report, para 65.

³⁹ [1987] Crim LR 56, CA. Griew believes the case to be wrongly decided: para 3.05. See also eg Symons [2009] EWCA Crim 83 where D pulled at V's bag. In Yohannes [2011] EWCA Crim 1362, the Court of Appeal noted Professor Smith's criticisms of Clouden but did not express any concluded view of them. In that case D was convicted of robbery but acquitted of being in possession of an imitation firearm with intent to commit an indictable offence. The prosecution's case was that an imitation firearm was brandished in front of V and then a box containing a valuable watch was snatched from him. The Court of Appeal accepted D's contention that the verdicts were inconsistent and substituted his conviction for robbery with one for theft.

⁴⁰ Corcoran v Anderton (1980) 71 Cr App R 104, [1980] Crim LR 385, DC.

⁴¹ cf Lapier (1784) 1 Leach 320.

⁴² [2012] EWHC 1657 (Admin), [2013] Crim LR 151.

⁴³ Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 7.08.

⁴⁴ It has been cogently argued that charging relatively trivial cases such as this as robbery undermines the distinctive harmfulness of the offence which justifies it being an offence triable only on indictment. See Horder, APOCL, 409.

a prosthetic leg from V, this, it is submitted, would be sufficient to constitute 'force' even though D might not have caused V any pain.

19.1.2.2 In order to steal

If D assaults V and, having incapacitated him without any intention of stealing from him, opportunistically takes V's wallet, there is no robbery. D commits offences against the person and theft.⁴⁵

19.1.3 On any person

In most cases of robbery, D will use or threaten force against the person in possession of the property. But the offence is not so limited. Provided the force is used or threatened in order to steal, it will be robbery.

If, for example, the only force used at the time of the [Great Train Robbery] in 1963 had been on a signalman [rather than the train driver or guard], this would under the [Act] have been sufficient.⁴⁶

It does not matter that the person against whom the force is used or threatened has no interest whatever in the property; it would be robbery to overpower a security guard in his office at X Co, because his office overlooks a factory Y Co across the road from which the thieves wish to steal, and they fear that he will notice them and raise the alarm.

It does not amount to robbery where D threatens to use force on X (who has no knowledge of the threat) in order to overcome V's reluctance to part with his money. Take the case of D a bank robber. If D hands V, a bank clerk, a note which reads 'I have a gun pointed at a customer',⁴⁷ V who is safely behind the armour-plated glass is not apprehending force to himself (not robbery). The customer, X, is unaware of what D has in mind and has written on the note. X is not apprehending violence. However, if D reads the note aloud, that is sufficient for robbery if the customer, X, then apprehends violence. There is no glaring failing in the law in these situations since all cases of this type could be treated as blackmail under s 21 of the Act.

19.1.4 Immediately before or at the time of stealing

Strictly interpreted, this expression might suggest that force used only a second after the theft is technically complete would not suffice for robbery, a view which may be said to receive further support from the requirement that the force be used 'in order to steal'. The argument was advanced in Hale.⁴⁸ D and E entered V's house and while D was upstairs stealing a jewellery box, E was downstairs tying up V. Their convictions for robbery were upheld although the appropriation of the jewellery box might have been completed before the force was used. The court regarded appropriation as a 'continuing act' and it was open to the jury on these facts to conclude that it continued while V was tied up. The matter needs to be looked at in a commonsense way; while the force must be used at the time of the theft and in order to steal,⁴⁹ the theft needs to be looked at in its entirety.

There is, arguably, an ever greater need for the courts to adopt a pragmatic approach to this issue following the extension of the concept of appropriation in Hinks. Technically, ⁴⁸ (1978) 68 Cr App R 415, [1979] Crim LR 596, CA. Confirmed post-Gomez in Lockley [1995] Crim LR 656. Cf Gregory (1981) 74 Cr App R 154, [1982] Crim LR 229, CA. Cf Atakpu, p 837.

⁴⁵ Harris (1998) The Times, 4 Mar; James [1997] Crim LR 598.

⁴⁶ Eighth Report, para 65. Cf Smith v Desmond and Hall [1965] AC 960, [1965] 1 All ER 976.

⁴⁷ Taylor [1996] 10 Arch News 2, CA. Cf Reane (1794) 2 Leach 616.

⁴⁹ Failure to direct the jury on this point renders the conviction unsafe: West (1999) 14 Sept, unreported, CA.

where D first touches V's property he has appropriated it, but it would render the offence of robbery useless if the theft was deemed complete at that time and D applied force a second later. Thus, where D has already gained access to V's car, and locked himself in, and V is only threatened by D's driving at him to escape, the theft might be said to be continuing and a robbery committed.⁵⁰ But a line has to be drawn somewhere. If, having taken the car from V without using or threatening force, D is subsequently stopped by a police officer in the street and knocks him down in order to avoid arrest, this would not amount to robbery. Force used to retain possession of property not obtained by force would not ordinarily be thought of as robbery.⁵¹ Even on a broad view, the use of force is neither at the time of, nor in order to commit, the theft.⁵² There may be merit in extending the offence by legislation to include force or the threat of force 'immediately after' a theft.⁵³ This would resonate with the existing underlying approach which is that robbery protects against the use of force in the acquisition of property.

'Immediately before' must add something to 'at the time of' the theft. The interpretation taken in some Australian decisions—that it means 'no intervening space or lapse of time or event of any significance'⁵⁴—may be too restrictive. Clearly, if a gang overpower V, the security guard at the main gate of a depot, this would be a use of force immediately before the theft, although some minutes must elapse before the gang reaches the part of the depot where the safe is housed.⁵⁵ And it can make no difference that V is not present at the depot at all; it would be robbery where some members of the gang detain V by force at his home while the other gang members open the safe in the depot miles away. It does not seem to be possible to put any specific temporal limit on 'immediately'. All the circumstances have to be considered including the time when, and the place where, the force was used or threatened in relation to the theft. Force converts theft into robbery only when its use or threat is in a real sense directly part of the theft, and is used in order to accomplish the theft.

It is not enough that D gets V to part with property by threatening to use force on a separate and/or future occasion. This may well amount to blackmail but the fact that V is intimidated or frightened is not in itself enough for robbery unless he is put in fear of being 'then and there' subject to force. But suppose a gang, by threats of force, persuade V, the depot security guard, to stay away from work the following evening, and on that evening they steal from the depot uninterrupted. At the time of the theft the threat of force still operates on V's mind; he stays at home because he is afraid of what will happen if he goes to work. But this does not seem to amount to robbery. At the time of the theft V is not put in fear of being 'then and there' subjected to force. In Khan,⁵⁶ V, at D's request, withdrew cash from his bank to hand over to D. V stated that he was in fear that D would be attacked by X, a violent man to whom D claimed to be in debt, and that he feared that if X beat up D, D would then come and beat up him, V. The Court of Appeal quashed D's robbery conviction: there was no evidence that V feared that he would be subjected then and there to force.

⁵⁰ Hayward v Norwich Union Insurance Ltd [2000] Lloyd's Rep IR 382. Whether the offence is one of theft or robbery may be of special significance for V's insurance claim: see generally M Wasik, 'Definitions of Crime in Insurance Contracts' [1986] JBL 45.

⁵¹ Harman's Case (1620) 2 Roll Rep 154.

⁵² cf Eighth Report, para 65.

⁵³ Griew, Theft, para 3.08.

⁵⁴ Stanishevski [2001] NTSC 86.

⁵⁵ It would surely be open to the jury so to find. Cf Hale (1978) 68 Cr App R 415, [1979] Crim LR 596, n 48.

⁵⁶ [2001] EWCA Crim 923.

19.1.5 Mens rea

Obviously, robbery requires at least an intention to steal, which in this context will usually be a purposive, direct intent.⁵⁷ But it seems to require more than this. What of the mens rea requirement in relation to the use or threat of force? It could be argued that liability in respect of the force is strict, and that if D intends to steal it will be robbery if in fact there is some use of force, or if in fact he puts someone in fear, whether he intends to do so or not. But in principle this would not be a desirable interpretation. It seems clear that D must use or threaten force in order to steal, and a merely accidental use of force would not be done in order to steal.⁵⁸ Moreover, it should be proved that D intended to use the force in relation to a person, and not merely to property.⁵⁹

It is enough that D seeks to put another in fear of being subjected to force. Fear here means to apprehend, and it would be no less a robbery because V was not afraid. Even if V does not apprehend that he will be subjected to force (because, perhaps, plain-clothes policemen are present and D has walked into a trap), it will be robbery if D intended to make him fear. But it would not be enough that V is in fact put in fear unless D intended to put V in fear. A timorous witness to a smash-and-grab raid might well fear that the thieves will turn on him, but if the thieves do not intend to put him in fear of being there and then subjected to force, the offence cannot amount to robbery.

⁵⁷ See p 91. ⁵⁸ cf Edwards (1843) 1 Cox CC 32.

⁵⁹ Intention here might include oblique intention, p 91.

Offences of temporary deprivation

In general it is not theft dishonestly to use the property of another unless there is an intention to deprive the other permanently of the property.¹ There may be a case for creating a general offence, which need not necessarily be termed theft, of dishonest use or unauthorized use of another's property.² Arguably, the case for such an offence is growing stronger as so much property derives its particular value to a person from its availability for immediate use.

At the time of drafting the Theft Act 1968, the CLRC decided against any such offence and its view, though subject to vigorous assault in Parliament, was accepted. The Committee was of the opinion that such a considerable extension of the criminal law was not called for at that time by any existing serious evil.³ But Parliament accepted particular cases in which temporary deprivation of property is considered to be a serious evil. The taking of vehicles (which was first made an offence by s 28 of the Road Traffic Act 1930) is one obvious instance; and the taking of vessels (which was first made an offence by s 1 of the Vessels Protection Act 1967)⁴ is another. These offences are now dealt with in s 12 of the Theft Act 1968 that extends the offence to a much wider range of 'conveyances' as the Act calls them.

In addition, the Theft Act 1968 added a further and entirely new offence of temporary deprivation; that of removing articles from places open to the public. Before the Act there had been a number of notorious 'borrowings' of famous works of art from galleries and exhibitions. For example, someone removed from the National Gallery Goya's portrait of the Duke of Wellington. The CLRC thought that the problem was 'serious enough to justify the creation of a special offence'.⁵

20.1 Removal of articles from places open to the public

Section 11 of the Theft Act 1968 provides:

- (1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3) below, where the public have access to a building in order to view the building or part of it, or a collection or part of a collection housed in it, any person

¹ See generally Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 10; Griew, Theft, Ch 5; Smith, Property Offences, Ch 8.

² See especially G Williams, 'Temporary Appropriation Should Be Theft' [1981] Crim LR 129.

³ Eighth Report, para 56.

⁴ As repealed by the Theft Act 1968.

⁵ CLRC, para 57(ii). See the allegations against D Cartrain who visited Damian Hirst's installation Pharmacy at Tate Britain and removed a few of the rare 'Faber Castell dated 1990 Mongol 482 Series' pencils. Cartrain then produced a 'wanted' poster: 'For the safe return of Damien Hirst's pencils I would like my artworks back that DACS and Hirst took off me in November. It's not a large demand . . . Hirst has until the end of this month to resolve this or on 31 of July the pencils will be sharpened. He has been warned.' The pencils were worth £500,000. See news reports for 4 Sept 2009.

who without lawful authority removes from the building or its grounds the whole or part of any article displayed or kept for display to the public in the building or that part of it or in its grounds shall be guilty of an offence. For this purpose 'collection' includes a collection got together for a temporary purpose, but references in this section to a collection do not apply to a collection made or exhibited for the purpose of effecting sales or other commercial dealings.

- (2) It is immaterial for purposes of subsection (1) above, that the public's access to a building is limited to a particular period or particular occasion; but where anything removed from a building or its grounds is there otherwise than as forming part of, or being on loan for exhibition with, a collection intended for permanent exhibition to the public, the person removing it does not thereby commit an offence under this section unless he removes it on a day when the public have access to the building as mentioned in subsection (1) above.
- (3) A person does not commit an offence under this section if he believes that he has lawful authority for the removal of the thing in question or that he would have it if the person entitled to give it knew of the removal and the circumstances of it.
- (4) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall, on conviction on indictment, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

It is questionable why special protection should be provided for the temporary deprivation of this category of items in such specific circumstances when the temporary removal of non-exhibited property of individuals or companies will commonly be a cause of much greater concern and pose the risk of much greater financial hardship to the victim.

20.1.1 Actus reus

On the face of it the offence under s 11 is one of considerable complexity; the draftsman's intention was to deal with the specific mischief discussed, and care has been taken to confine the operation of the section to that mischief. Numerous points arise for consideration.

20.1.1.1 Public access to a building

For the offence to apply, the public must have access to the building, not merely its grounds. Access must be public access; access limited for a particular section of the public will not suffice.⁶ It does not matter that members of the public are required to pay for the privilege of access, nor whether the purpose of imposing the charge is merely to cover expenses or to make a profit.⁷ But the access must be to a building or part thereof. So if D removes a statuette displayed in the open in a local authority park this would not be within the section.⁸ If, however, the park consists of a building and its grounds, and the public have access to the building in order to view, D's removal of the statuette would be within this section.

Normally, no doubt, D will have entered the building in consequence of the owner's invitation⁹ to the public to view. But as long as the public have access to view, D may commit the offence although he entered as a trespasser or although he is the owner's guest and is temporarily residing in the building.

⁶ But the exclusion of a particular class, eg the exclusion of children from an exhibition considered unsuitable for them, would not prevent access being public access.

⁷ But see p 905.

⁸ cf the discussion in relation to burglary, Ch 25.

⁹ Barr [1978] Crim LR 244 (Deputy Judge Lowry) and commentary.

20.1.1.2 In order to view

For the offence to apply, the access to the building must be in order to view the building (or part of the building) or a collection (or part of a collection) housed in it. It has been held that the question whether access is 'in order to view' is to be determined by reference to the occupiers' intention in allowing access.¹⁰ The public might have access to a building (eg a shopping precinct or arcade) where collections are from time to time exhibited in the lanes connecting the shops; but in such circumstances access exists in order to shop and access to view the collection is only incidental to that shopping purpose. If, however, the collection is housed in a cordoned off part of the precinct and access is given to that part specifically so that the collection may be viewed, it would be within the protection of s 11.

20.1.1.3 Articles displayed or kept for display

The offence prohibits the removal of any articles displayed or kept for display, and is not confined to works of art. The coronation stone in Westminster Abbey (something which the CLRC expressly considered)¹¹ is clearly for this purpose an article displayed to the public though it is not a work of art. The criterion is only whether the article, which may be price-less in either sense of the term, is displayed or kept for display to the public.

'Display' here is presumably used in the sense of 'exhibit' and not merely in the sense of able to be seen; the article must be displayed or exhibited to the public.¹² Consequently, the removal of a fire extinguisher from a building housing exhibits would not be within the section even though it can be seen by members of the public, but it would be within the section if the fire extinguisher was itself exhibited, perhaps as an example of an early type of extinguisher, or as an example of unique design, or even nowadays if it was acclaimed as a work of modern 'art'.

It is enough that the article, though not displayed, is 'kept' for display, as where a painting is kept in the gallery's storeroom.¹³

20.1.1.4 Removal

To complete the actus reus of the offence the article must be removed from the building or from its grounds. Thus, removal from the building to the grounds or vice versa will suffice. The removal, as s 11(2) makes clear, need not be during the times at which the public have access. If the collection is permanently¹⁴ exhibited (which would be the case, eg, with public galleries and museums) removal at any time, even during a holiday when the building is closed to the public, may amount to an offence. But if the exhibition is temporary only, the removal must take place on a day when the public have access to the building in order to view. This serves to illustrate how unduly complex the provision is as a result of its being tailored to meet such a particular mischief. It underlines the fact that the offence is driven in part by a desire to criminalize the abuse of trust of those given access to public exhibitions.¹⁵

20.1.1.5 Commercial exhibitions

This limitation on the scope of the offence creates considerable ambiguity. As has been seen,¹⁶ s 11 applies notwithstanding that the owner charges the public for admission. It

¹⁰ ibid. ¹¹ Eighth Report. Cf Barr [1978] Crim LR 244, CA.

¹² So linked in Barr.

¹³ cf Durkin [1973] QB 786, [1973] 2 All ER 872, CA.

¹⁴ In this context 'permanently' means for an indefinite period: Durkin [1973] QB 786, [1973] 2 All ER 872, CA.

¹⁵ See Griew, Theft, para 5.08.

¹⁶ See p 904.

applies even though he admits the public only to make profit. But the section does not apply where the owner admits the public only to view a collection,¹⁷ if the collection is ‘made or exhibited for the purpose of effecting sales or other commercial dealings’.

If it is such an exhibition, s 11 has no application whether entry is free or not. It seems odd that the law draws this distinction. The reason for this restriction upon the offence was to avoid creating an unduly wide offence, involving a very substantial exception to the general principle that temporary deprivation should not be criminal.¹⁸ It would have meant, for example, that a removal from the premises of an ordinary commercial bookseller would have been an offence even where D has no intent permanently to deprive. In addition, since the section protects things at risk because they are on display to the public, it is thought to be reasonable for that risk to be borne by the commercial exhibitor.

As it stands, only where the collection is made or exhibited for *the purpose*¹⁹ of sale or other commercial dealings does this exclusion from liability apply. If, then, a commercial bookseller, for the purpose of encouraging local art, arranges exhibitions in a room of his bookshop to which the public are admitted, the removal by D of the paintings, or of any other article displayed or kept for display in his premises, would fall within the section whether or not it was available for sale.

20.1.2 Mens rea

D must intend to remove the article from the building or its grounds. Dishonesty is not required but D would not be guilty of an offence if he removed an article in the belief (and clearly the test of D’s belief is here subjective) that he had lawful authority or that the person entitled to give consent would have done so. Strictly, it would be an offence for D to remove a statuette from the house to the garden because he thinks the setting better, provided D does not believe the person entitled to give consent would have done so.

20.2 Taking conveyances

Because of the ease of tracing intact vehicles via their identification numbers, it is often difficult to establish that D intended permanently to deprive V of his vehicle when taking it.²⁰ Theft is therefore not an appropriate charge. An example is Mitchell,²¹ in which D took V’s car from her with violence in the course of his attempt to evade capture by the police who were pursuing him. He abandoned the car, intact with hazard lights flashing. There was no

¹⁷ Note that if the owner admits the public to view the building as well as the collection, D may commit the offence by removing anything displayed (including articles forming part of the collection) although the collection is exhibited for commercial purposes. Cf Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, Ch 10.

¹⁸ The clause as originally drafted would have excluded not only the case where the public were invited to view the contents for a commercial object, but also where the public were invited to view the building for a commercial object. The latter limitation was removed; cf n 17.

¹⁹ Presumably it is the dominant one that matters.

²⁰ See S White, ‘Taking the Joy Out of Joy-Riding’ [1980] Crim LR 609; Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, Ch 10; Griew, Theft, Ch 6; Smith, Property Offences, Ch 9. For a practical analysis, see K McCormac (ed), Wilkinson’s Road Traffic Offences (27th edn, 2015) Ch 15, and 2nd supp, vol 1, ch 15, s 3; and for a more broad-ranging socio-legal review of car crime, see C Corbett, Car Crime (2003). The CPS has issued guidance on the offence—see www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/theft-act-offences.

²¹ [2008] EWCA Crim 850.

theft and no robbery.²² Since this is not theft, a specific offence criminalizing temporary deprivation of conveyances is necessary.²³ Section 12 of the Theft Act 1968 (as amended) now provides:

- (1) Subject to subsections (5) and (6) below, a person shall be guilty of an offence if, without having the consent of the owner or other lawful authority, he takes any conveyance for his own or another's use or, knowing that any conveyance has been taken without such authority, drives it or allows himself to be carried in or on it.
- (2) A person guilty of an offence under subsection (1) above shall . . . [be liable on summary conviction to [an unlimited fine], to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or to both].
- (3) [Repealed]
- (4) If on the trial of an indictment for theft the jury are not satisfied that the accused committed theft, but it is proved that the accused committed an offence under subsection (1) above, the jury may find him guilty of the offence under subsection (1) [and if he is found guilty of it, he shall be liable as he would have been liable under subsection (2) above on summary conviction].
[Subs 4A–C deal with procedural issues for commencement of prosecution]
- (5) Subsection (1) above shall not apply in relation to pedal cycles; but, subject to subsection (6) below, a person who, without having the consent of the owner or other lawful authority, takes a pedal cycle for his own or another's use, or rides a pedal cycle knowing it to have been taken without such authority, shall on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding [level 3 on the standard scale].
- (6) A person does not commit an offence under this section by anything done in the belief that he has lawful authority to do it or that he would have the owner's consent if the owner knew of his doing it and the circumstances of it.
- (7) For purposes of this section—
 - (a) 'conveyance' means any conveyance constructed or adapted for the carriage of a person or persons whether by land, water or air, except that it does not include a conveyance constructed or adapted for use only under the control of a person not carried in or on it, and 'drive' shall be construed accordingly; and
 - (b) 'owner', in relation to a conveyance which is the subject of a hiring agreement or hire-purchase agreement, means the person in possession of the conveyance under that agreement.

By s 37(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, the offence is now triable only summarily.²⁴ When a jury acquits of theft of a conveyance it may convict of an offence under s 12, in ²² cf Raphael [2008] EWCA Crim 1014, discussed at p 887, where D took V's car and attempted to sell it back to him. This was theft as D had an intention permanently to deprive V within the extended meaning of s 6 of the Act. In Vinall [2011] EWCA Crim 2652, discussed at p 891, D's conviction for robbery was quashed as the judge failed to direct the jury that in order to convict they had to be sure at the time D appropriated V's bicycle, he intended permanently to deprive him of it. The Court of Appeal held that the judge was correct to state that D's later abandonment of the bicycle was evidence from which the jury could infer an intention permanently to deprive, but when the charge is robbery the jury must be directed in unambiguous terms that if the intention only formed at the time of the abandonment D is not guilty. See also Zerei [2012] EWCA Crim 1114. This serves to emphasize the importance of charging the appropriate offence.

²³ Technically, charges of theft of the fuel might succeed.

²⁴ Punishable by an unlimited fine, or by six months' imprisonment, or by both. Although triable summarily only, a count under s 12 may be included in an indictment under s 40 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

which case the offender is punishable as he would have been on summary conviction.²⁵ Proceedings under s 12 cannot be commenced after the end of a period of three years from the date on which the offence was committed, and six months after the date on which sufficient evidence to justify the proceedings comes to the knowledge of the prosecutor.²⁶

20.2.1 Taking for own or another's use

20.2.1.1 Taking

The offence is committed where D 'takes any conveyance for his own or another's use'. D 'takes' when he (a) assumes possession or control and (b) moves the conveyance, or causes it to be moved. Where possession is assumed, abandoned and resumed there is a second taking.²⁷ It is not enough that D uses the conveyance for some purpose (say to sleep or shelter in it) since he must also take it. The offence can be completed only by some movement, however slight, of the conveyance.²⁸ The taking must be intentional.²⁹ In the case of a motor vehicle, the taking will be most frequently accomplished by driving but the taking may be accomplished in some other way, as by pushing or towing or even by removing the conveyance on a transporter. In Pearce,³⁰ D's conviction was upheld when he took an inflatable dinghy and drove off with it on his trailer; the court rejecting an argument that the offence could be committed only where D took the conveyance by moving it in its own medium (ie in this case by sailing it as a boat). The court also held that there was no need for D to have been conveyed on the boat.

Although the offence is commonly regarded as one relating to temporary deprivation of use, the requirement of a physical taking demonstrates that the offence does not protect against deprivation generally. Thus, where D intentionally hides V's car keys, depriving V of the use of the vehicle, he does not commit the offence under s 12.³¹

20.2.1.2 For his own or another's use

The essence of the offence was thought by the CLRC to be 'stealing a ride'.³² Strictly, however, D may steal a ride without committing this offence. A hitch-hiker who jumps on to the back of a passing lorry literally steals a ride but does not commit the offence since in no sense has he taken the vehicle for his own or another's use. So too if D releases the hand-brake of a car so that it runs down an incline (without his being on board), or releases a boat from its moorings so that it is carried away by the tide; such conduct would not fall within the section.³³ In neither case is the conveyance taken by D for his own or another's use.

²⁵ For the position in the magistrates' court, see R (H) v Liverpool City Youth Court [2001] Crim LR 487. On the substitution of charges under s 12 when the original allegation is attempted theft, see DPP v Hammerton [2009] EWHC 921 (Admin).

²⁶ Theft Act 1968, s 12(4A), inserted by the Vehicles (Crime) Act 2001, s 37(1).

²⁷ DPP v Spriggs [1994] RTR 1, [1993] Crim LR 622.

²⁸ Bogacki [1973] QB 832, CA. Cf Miller [1976] Crim LR 147, CA (boarding boat anticipating journey but no movement in fact), and Diggin (1980) 72 Cr App R 204, [1980] Crim LR 565, CA. Because the offence is now summary only, no attempt charge is available, but the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 9, creates a specific offence of interference with a motor vehicle with the intention that an offence under s 12(1) shall be committed.

²⁹ The offence was not committed where D accidentally put his foot on the accelerator in an automatic car: Blayney v Knight [1975] Crim LR 237.

³⁰ [1973] Crim LR 321, CA.

³¹ The actus reus of theft does not, of course, require a physical moving of the vehicle. See also the discussion in relation to criminal damage at p 1071.

³² Eighth Report, para 84.

³³ Even though the owner temporarily loses the use of his car or boat and is equally inconvenienced.

Considering these last two examples, the Court of Appeal in *Bow*³⁴ expressed the firm view that the reason why D was not guilty of an offence was that although the conveyance had been moved, it would not have been 'used' as a conveyance. In other words, the court thought 'use' means, and means only, use as a conveyance. No doubt in the vast majority of cases D's purpose in taking the conveyance is to transport himself from one place to another, but it is not entirely clear that the offence is, or ought to be, confined to takings with that purpose. It is not clear from the facts of Pearce why D took the dinghy but in *Marchant and McCallister*³⁵ the Court of Appeal assumed that the conviction was based on D's intended use of the dinghy as a conveyance and confirmed that taking a conveyance with intent to use it on some future occasion as a conveyance sufficed.³⁶ Bow suggests, and Marchant appears clearly to confirm, that if D in Pearce had some use other than as a conveyance in mind (eg to use the dinghy as a paddling pool for his children) he could not be convicted under s 12. *Stokes*³⁷ is to the same effect. There it was held that D did not commit the offence where he pushed V's car around the corner to make V think it had been stolen.³⁸

The courts have interpreted s 12(1) as though the words 'as a conveyance' had been inserted after 'use'. But on the face of the provision 'use' is capable of extending to uses other than use as a conveyance.³⁹ It should be recalled that this provision was inserted to deal with the problem of temporary deprivations. The mischief aimed at is surely that the use of the conveyance is denied to V and it should not be significant to what use D puts it when he takes it.

Even if use is restricted so that the offence applies only where D's uses it as a conveyance, any such use suffices for the offence. It is enough that D releases a boat from its moorings so that he can be carried downstream in it. So, in Bow,⁴⁰ where D released the handbrake of V's car and coasted some 200 yards down a narrow road in order to enable him to remove his own obstructed car, it was conceded that no distinction could be drawn between driving the motor and allowing it to freewheel. In that case it was argued that D had not used the car as a conveyance, merely to move it as an obstruction. The court accepted that to push an obstructing vehicle a yard or two to get it out of the way would not involve the use of the vehicle as a conveyance,⁴¹ but once it was proved that the vehicle was necessarily used as a conveyance, the taker cannot claim it was not intended for that use. In that case D did not use V's car in order to convey himself from one end of the lane to the other. It so happened that to remove it as an obstruction required its removal not for two yards but for 200. It is not easy to see why the distance involved should make all that difference if all D is doing is to remove a conveyance as an obstruction.⁴²

20.2.1.3 Taking by unauthorized use

The discussion so far has assumed that D is not in possession or control of the conveyance but it may happen that D already has lawful possession or control of the conveyance and the question arises whether D can be said to 'take' it by using it in an unauthorized way.

³⁴ (1977) 64 Cr App R 54, [1977] Crim LR 176 and commentary. ³⁵ (1985) 80 Cr App R 361.

³⁶ Equally a conditional intent (eg an intent to use should it prove suitable) will suffice.

³⁷ [1983] RTR 59, CA.

³⁸ The outcome of the case may have been different had D got into the car and steered it round the corner.

³⁹ See White [1980] Crim LR 609 at 611. ⁴⁰ (1977) 64 Cr App R 54.

⁴¹ In such circumstances D might in any case have lawful authority for the removal, see p 910.

⁴² In Bow, D was probably engaged in a poaching expedition and V's car had been deliberately placed to block D's route of exit. But if D finds a vehicle blocking the highway he is presumably entitled to remove it whether he is on his way to or from a crime. The CPS legal guidance simply states that it is 'not appropriate' to charge a defendant with a s 12 offence 'when a vehicle has been moved only a short distance because it was causing an obstruction'. Neither 'moved' nor 'short distance' are defined. See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/theft-act-offences.

Suppose, for example, that D, authorized to use V's van in the course of V's business, uses the van to take his family to the seaside. It seems clear that under this section he may commit the offence for he now 'takes [the van] for his own . . . use'. D does not have the consent of V for the taking for his, D's, own use. This was the view taken by the Court of Appeal in McGill,⁴³ a case decided under s 217 of the Road Traffic Act 1960. D, given permission to use V's car to drive E to the railway station and on condition that he returned it immediately, subsequently drove it elsewhere and did not return it for some days. D's conviction for taking the car without the consent of the owner, in relation to his use after the trip to the station, was upheld. The same result must follow under s 12 of the Theft Act even though there is no requirement for driving away and where the emphasis is squarely placed on taking 'for his own or another's use'. So, in McKnight v Davies,⁴⁴ the conviction of a lorry driver was upheld when instead of returning the lorry to the depot at the end of the working day he used it for his own purposes and did not return it until the early hours of the following morning. It would seem that an unauthorized use in terms of either the destination involved or time of taking⁴⁵ or duration will constitute the offence. Equally, it has been held that the offence is committed where D allows some third party to drive the vehicle, being aware that the owner would not have consented to that person driving.⁴⁶

McGill, McKnight v Davies and McMinn were cases where the use by D was plainly outside the scope of the terms of the authorisation so there was no difficulty in finding that D took it for his own use. It is thought, however, that not every deviation by D would constitute a taking for his own use. For the offence to be committed there must be a use that is sufficiently at variance with the terms of the contract to demonstrate that D has replaced use on behalf of another by use on his own behalf.⁴⁷ Note that there is an exception in the case of a hirer under a hire-purchase agreement. His unauthorized use cannot amount to an offence because by s 12(7) he is treated as owner for the purposes of the section.

20.2.1.4 Without owner's consent or lawful authority

The ordinary run of cases where D takes V's vehicle without reference to V presents no problem. It follows from the discussion in the previous paragraph that where D has obtained V's permission to use the vehicle for a particular purpose and for a given time, D may be convicted of the offence if he uses it beyond that time for a different purpose: McGill.⁴⁸ There is no difficulty in such a case in saying that D has taken the vehicle for his own use, and that particular use is clearly one to which V has not consented.

20.2.1.5 Consent by fraud

McGill is a clear case. Suppose, however, that D made some false representation to induce V to allow him to take the car. The falsity might relate to: (a) some attribute of D (eg his being licensed to drive); (b) some fundamental issue such as D's identity; or (c) D's purpose in taking the vehicle.⁴⁹

⁴³ [1970] RTR 209, CA. ⁴⁴ [1974] RTR 4, DC.

⁴⁵ Wibberley [1966] 2 QB 214, [1965] 3 All ER 718, CCA.

⁴⁶ McMinn v McMinn [2006] 3 All ER 87 at 93, applying McKnight.

⁴⁷ 'Not every brief, unauthorised diversion from his proper route by an employee in the course of his working day will necessarily involve a "taking" of the vehicle for his own use', McKnight v Davies [1974] RTR 4 at 8, per Lord Widgery CJ. See also Wibberley [1966] 2 QB 214, CCA; Phipps and McGill [1970] RTR 209, CA. In determining whether an employee has taken his employer's vehicle, it would seem proper to consider whether for civil purposes D is acting in the course of his employment.

⁴⁸ [1970] RTR 209, CA, n 43.

⁴⁹ The CPS legal guidance implies that any case in which the taking was obtained by fraud would not be appropriate for a charge under s 12—see www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/theft-act-offences.

Taking the first of these issues, what if D had falsely represented that he was licensed to drive in order to borrow V's car for the trip to the station? There is perhaps no compelling reason why D should not be guilty of the offence since he knows perfectly well that V has 'consented' only because he has been misled. But on a strict interpretation of the section all that is required is that V should have consented to D taking the car for the trip to the station (the taking for D's own use) and to this V may be said to have consented even though he would never have consented had he known that D was unlicensed. The point arose in Whittaker v Campbell.⁵⁰ D and E required a vehicle to transport goods but D was not licensed to drive and E had only a provisional licence. Somehow they came into possession of T's driving licence and D, representing himself as T, hired a vehicle from V. Their convictions for taking a vehicle without consent were quashed. The court thought that while there might be a taking without consent where the owner is by force compelled to part with possession,⁵¹ where he is induced to do so by fraud it could not be said 'in commonsense terms' that he had not consented to the taking. Distinguishing between agreements induced by force and fraud in this manner is at odds with the general approach of the criminal law and undermines the principle that consent necessarily involves an agreement made freely, and which is based on adequate, accurate information. On the other hand, the broad commonsense approach to consent is less problematic in this context given the mischief at which the section is aimed.

The court in Whittaker v Campbell also considered the second issue—whether the offence would be committed where the fraud is such as to induce what in contract law amounts to a 'fundamental mistake'. The court thought that it would not make sense, having regard to the mischief at which the offence was aimed, to have D's liability turn upon whether the transaction was voidable for fraud or void for mistake. That distinction is one that presents complexity in civil law. Moreover, it does not sit easily with the criminal law's approach to the concept of consent. Suppose that D telephones V and impersonates V's brother, thereby inducing V to agree the loan of his car to his brother and to leave the keys in an accessible spot while V is out of town. If D then avails himself of this trick to take possession of the car while V is away, it would be an astonishing conclusion to say that V had consented to D taking his car. It is submitted that the issue of consent by fraud under s 12 deserves reconsideration by the courts.⁵²

As for the third problem of falsity, in Whittaker v Campbell there was no suggestion of any misrepresentation as to the use to which D and E proposed to put the vehicle and their actual use was within the terms of the hire.⁵³ Suppose, however, that D obtains possession of the conveyance by describing to V a use that he knows V will consent to while secretly proposing to use the vehicle for a use to which he knows V would not consent. D might, for example, secure V's consent to the use of his vehicle for the transportation of goods from Leeds to London knowing that V would not consent had he known that the goods were stolen. The case is essentially indistinguishable from Whittaker v Campbell. V has consented to the use of his vehicle for that journey though he would not have agreed to incur criminal liability as a handler of stolen goods.

⁵⁰ [1984] QB 318, DC. ⁵¹ See Hogdan [1962] Crim LR 563.

⁵² cf Smith, Property Offences, paras 9–23.

⁵³ In Singh v Rathour (Northern Star Insurance Co Ltd, third party) [1988] 2 All ER 16, CA, a civil case where the issue was whether D was insured under his policy which covered him when driving any vehicle 'provided he had the consent of the owner', it was held that D did not have the consent of the owner where he was aware that the consent given did not extend to the use to which he put the vehicle. See J Birds, 'Consent of the Owner under a Motor Policy' [1998] JBL 421.

Suppose, though, that D's purpose is not to drive to London and back but to take the vehicle on a fortnight's holiday to the south of France. The point arose in Peart.⁵⁴ D persuaded V to lend him a van by pretending that he needed it for an urgent appointment in Alnwick and that he would return it by 7.30 pm. In fact, D wanted the van for a journey to Burnley where he was found with the van by the police at 9 pm, and he knew all along that V would not have consented to this use. It was held, quashing D's conviction, that V's consent was not vitiated by the deception since V had merely been deceived as to the purpose for which the van was to be used. Reliance was placed on this decision by the court in Whittaker v Campbell.

But there are difficulties with Peart. By reason of the direction given to the jury by the trial judge, the Court of Appeal had to consider the position at the time when the van was borrowed in the afternoon:

There was no issue left to [the jury] whether, in this particular case, there could have been a fresh taking . . . at some time after it was originally taken away at 2.30 pm. The consent which has to be considered is thus a consent at the time of taking possession of the van with licence to drive and use it.⁵⁵

It seems, then, that even if he did not commit an offence at the time of the taking he would, like the defendants in McGill and McKnight v Davies,⁵⁶ have done so as soon as he departed from the Alnwick road and set course for Burnley.

There is, however, a difference. In McGill and McKnight v Davies, there was no evidence that the defendants had the unauthorized use in mind when they obtained possession. In Peart, in contrast, that could be proved—D frankly admitted it—and it is submitted this case also ought to be reconsidered. Given the use for a journey to which V had consented, D took it for a journey for which no consent was given. As a practical matter of evidence, it will often be necessary to prove a departure from the stated use in order to prove that D intended to use the vehicle in other than the authorized way, but this cannot affect the substantive criminal law.

20.2.1.6 Lawful authority

D commits no offence where he takes a vehicle, even without the consent of the owner, when acting under 'other lawful authority'. This is appropriate to cover the growing number of cases where local authorities or the police are authorized under various statutory powers to remove vehicles. No doubt D would be acting lawfully in moving V's vehicle a few yards so that he can obtain access to the highway for his own vehicle, even though he may know that V does not consent to the removal.⁵⁷

It may fairly be assumed that general defences such as self-defence and duress are available on charges for this offence.

20.2.1.7 Conveyance

Section 12(7) provides:

For purposes of this section—

- (a) 'conveyance' means any conveyance constructed or adapted for the carriage of a person or persons whether by land, water or air, except that it does not include a conveyance constructed or adapted for use only under the control of a person not carried in or on it, and 'drive' shall be construed accordingly.

⁵⁴ [1970] 2 QB 672, CA.

⁵⁵ [1970] 2 All ER 823 at 824. It seems surprising that the proviso which was then available to the Court of Appeal was not applied.

⁵⁶ See p 910.

⁵⁷ But see Bow (1977) 64 Cr App R 54, CA, n 34.

'Conveyance' has been interpreted to mean a mechanical contrivance of some kind. While it includes conveyances such as cars and motorcycles, it does not include horses;⁵⁸ horses are clearly not constructed, though they may be suitable for the carriage of persons, and the argument that they might be 'adapted' by the use of halter and bridle was rejected. Because the essence of the offence was thought to be stealing a ride,⁵⁹ conveyance is defined, in effect, to exclude conveyances that are not meant for riding.⁶⁰ Thus, though it would be an offence to take an aircraft, hovercraft or railway engine, it is not an offence within this section to take, for example, a lawnmower which, though power-driven, is operated by a person who is not carried in or on it.⁶¹

20.2.2 Mens rea

The taking must be intentional. It is not enough that the vehicle is accidentally moved.⁶²

Section 12(6) provides that a person does not commit an offence by anything done in the belief that he has lawful authority to do it or that the owner would have consented. The test of belief appears to be subjective. If D honestly believes that V has consented to his use of V's car, it is not relevant to inquire whether V did in fact consent or whether V would have consented had he known of the circumstances—for example, that D was uninsured,⁶³ or even that D was unlicensed to drive. If D takes a vehicle 'without having the consent of the owner' and does not believe that the owner would have consented had he known of the taking, he may be convicted though the owner subsequently says that he would have consented;⁶⁴ the offence is constituted not by taking a conveyance without the owner's consent, but in taking it without having the consent of the owner.

If D takes a conveyance not caring whether the owner would or would not have consented, it would seem that he may be convicted. For in such a case he does not believe that the owner would have consented.⁶⁵

Taking a conveyance has been held to be a crime of basic intent so that evidence of intoxication is not relevant as tending to show that D lacked mens rea.⁶⁶ Arguably, where D's belief as to the consent of the owner is based on a mistake induced by voluntary intoxication he can rely on that mistake.⁶⁷

20.2.3 Driving or being carried

Section 12 creates a second version of the offence to deal with the person who allows himself to be carried or who himself drives a vehicle which has already been taken, but who might not be caught by ordinary principles of accessorial liability since he might not have been a party to the taking acting with the necessary intent.

⁵⁸ Neal v Gribble (1978) 68 Cr App R 9, [1978] RTR 409.

⁵⁹ cf Eighth Report, para 84. Earlier (para 82) the Committee seemed to have viewed the mischief of the offence as the danger, loss and inconvenience which often result from it. See HL, 12 Mar 1968, vol 290, col 141 (Lord Stonham).

⁶⁰ But on this see Ch 32.

⁶¹ Recently, concern has arisen over electric cars and whether these can be 'stolen' or taken without the owner's consent. Insurance companies have been more concerned about the theft of the very expensive batteries on which they run. See www.independent.co.uk/money/insurance/five-questions-about-insuring-electric-cars-2185008.html.

⁶² Blaney v Knight (1974) 60 Cr App R 269.

⁶³ Clotworthy [1981] RTR 477, CA.

⁶⁴ Ambler [1979] RTR 217, CA.

⁶⁵ cf the discussion of recklessness, Ch 3.

⁶⁶ MacPherson [1973] RTR 157, CA; Gannon (1988) 87 Cr App R 254, CA. G Williams is heavily critical of Gannon, 'Two Nocturnal Blunders' (1990) 140 NLJ 1564. For a contrary view, see White [1980] Crim LR 609.

⁶⁷ By analogy with the decision in Jaggard v Dickinson [1981] QB 527, DC, decided under s 5(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 which uses similar terms. See Griew, Theft, para 6.20.

If, when D allows himself to be carried, he is aiding and abetting the taking of the conveyance by E, he may be convicted of the primary offence as a secondary party. But if the 'taking' has come to an end, the primary offence has ceased and it is no longer possible to aid and abet it. In such a case, the second version of the offence is applicable being based on D 'allowing' himself to be carried. 'Allow' is probably a word of wider ambit than 'aid, abet, counsel or procure'. If D allows himself to be driven by a person who, as he knows, would drive the car whether D was there or not, it will not necessarily be proved that he assisted or encouraged, or intended to assist or encourage, the driver.⁶⁸

Where E takes a conveyance without consent or other lawful authority, it is an offence for D, knowing the conveyance has been so taken, to drive it or allow himself to be carried in or on it. A hitch-hiker would therefore not be guilty of an offence where, unknown to him, the driver is using his employer's van, contrary to the employer's instructions, to go to Blackpool for the day. If the driver tells the hitch-hiker that he is using the van in that unauthorized way then the hitch-hiker will be liable if he allows himself to be carried further.⁶⁹

20.2.3.1 Carried

D's mere presence in or on the conveyance, knowing that it has been taken without consent or authority, does not suffice unless he allows himself to be 'carried' in or on it and this requires some movement of the conveyance.⁷⁰

20.2.3.2 Driving

In DPP v Alderton,⁷¹ merely sitting in the car with the engine on, gear engaged and the wheels spinning was held to be 'driving'. In Planton v DPP,⁷² D stopped his vehicle on a causeway, awaiting an opportunity to cross at low tide. D claimed he was not 'driving' for the purposes of a drink-driving offence since his vehicle was not moving. The Divisional Court held that he was driving: a driver who had stopped at traffic lights was in a similar position but was still driving. It seems to be a question of fact and degree whether a cessation of movement has been so long that it could not reasonably be said that a person was still driving.

20.2.3.3 Mens rea

It must be proved that D knew the conveyance had been taken without authority when he drove it or allowed himself to be carried in or on it as the case may be. The vehicle must actually have been taken; one cannot know a thing to be so unless it is so.⁷³ 'Wilful blindness' may be enough, as in the case of other statutes.⁷⁴ Such a state of mind is dangerously close to that of belief that the conveyance had been so taken.⁷⁵ D would be wilfully blind where he thinks it quite possible that E might have taken the vehicle without authority but makes no inquiries to ascertain whether this is so or not. It could happen that E believes he has authority to take the conveyance but D knows that E has not. In such a case D would be guilty of an offence since he knows it was taken without authority. And no doubt D knows ⁶⁸ cf Ch 6.

⁶⁹ Boldizar v Knight [1980] Crim LR 653, DC. For more detailed analysis, see Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, paras 8–13. There are problems of proof where the prosecution seek to rely on D informing E that the vehicle has been taken: Francis [1982] Crim LR 694.

⁷⁰ Miller [1976] Crim LR 147, CA; Diggin (1980) 72 Cr App R 204, [1981] RTR 83, CA.

⁷¹ [2004] RTR 367. ⁷² [2001] EWHC 450 (Admin).

⁷³ See the discussion of the House of Lords of the concept of knowledge in Saik [2006] UKHL 18.

⁷⁴ Edwards, Mens Rea, 202–205; Williams, CLGP, 159. ⁷⁵ See s 22(1).

the conveyance has been taken without authority, and may be convicted under this provision,⁷⁶ though he knows that E has in fact stolen the conveyance.⁷⁷

20.2.4 Pedal cycles

Section 12(5) creates an offence of taking pedal cycles,⁷⁸ which has broadly similar elements to the offence under s 12(1). A small difference is that the offence under s 12(5) is not committed by one who allows himself to be carried on the cycle knowing that it has been taken without authority. The offence is summary only.⁷⁹

20.3 Aggravated vehicle-taking

The so-called 'joyrider' (or 'twocker') under s 12 is liable to relatively limited punishments. He is additionally liable for any offence involved in taking the vehicle (most obviously criminal damage caused in gaining access to the conveyance and in interfering with the locks and the electrical ignition systems in order to get it started) and the driver, whether or not he is the original taker, is liable for any offence committed whilst driving the vehicle (eg driving whilst uninsured, careless driving, dangerous driving). And, of course, a person who allows himself to be carried in or on a conveyance may be liable as a secondary party to these further offences under the principles which govern aiding and abetting or under the version of the s 12 offence discussed earlier.⁸⁰

It might be thought therefore that s 12 was entirely adequate to deal with the taker, those who subsequently drive the taken conveyance and those who allow themselves to be carried in or on it. In the normal case, the unlimited fine and/or six months' imprisonment would seem adequate. In the abnormal case where the driver drives dangerously, or kills whilst driving dangerously or carelessly, additional charges can be added for that and again the punishment (imprisonment in this case) would seem to be adequate. But in the early 1990s the taking of motor vehicles increased to an extent that it was described as epidemic. As the activity increased, so did the risks. Youngsters (usually male) used the vehicles they had taken to demonstrate their driving 'skills' or become involved in high-speed chases when pursued by the police.⁸¹ The hazards of either are obvious. Even in the face of this 'epidemic', it might be argued that s 12 and the range of driving offences and ordinary criminal charges for damage and injury inflicted were adequate in the sense that the activity would always be capable of being punished and the penalties provided seemed appropriate.⁸²

There was an additional problem. In many cases, the taking is performed by a group, and the vehicle is damaged or injury inflicted but it is difficult to prove whether it was D or E or F who damaged the vehicle or caused the injury. One or more of them is able to claim that the damage was done before he joined the criminal venture. And where, as not infrequently

⁷⁶ cf Tolley v Giddings [1964] 2 QB 354, [1964] 1 All ER 201, DC.

⁷⁷ Where E's conviction is proved by certificate under s 74 of PACE, and D was in the vehicle at the time of the taking to which E's conviction relates, that is prima facie evidence of E's guilt, but it must also be shown that D knew it was taken: DPP v Parker [2006] EWHC 1270 (Admin).

⁷⁸ It is a moot point whether this extends to electronically powered cycles or stand-on scooters.

⁷⁹ Thus there can be no attempt charge. ⁸⁰ See Ch 6.

⁸¹ See B Rix, D Walker and R Brown, A Study of Deaths and Serious Injuries Resulting from Police Vehicle Accidents (1997) HORS, noting that 27 per cent of those in police vehicle accidents were in stolen cars at the time.

⁸² It is not suggested that the answer or solution lies in the penalty, merely that the penalty is adequate in relation to the crime. The answer lies in foolproof (or is it expert-proof?) immobilizing devices.

happens, the vehicle is found burned out, all three would say that this must have been done by someone else after they had abandoned the vehicle.

It was to deal with all of these problems, and what was seen as a rapidly growing social menace, that s 12A of the Theft Act 1968 was inserted by the Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Act 1992.⁸³ It provides:

- (1) Subject to subsection (3) below, a person is guilty of aggravated taking of a vehicle if—
 - (a) he commits an offence under section 12 (1) above (in this section referred to as a ‘basic offence’) in relation to a mechanically propelled vehicle; and
 - (b) it is proved that, at any time after the vehicle was unlawfully taken (whether by him or another) and before it was recovered, the vehicle was driven, or injury or damage was caused, in one or more of the circumstances set out in paragraphs (a) to (d) of subsection (2) below.
- (2) The circumstances referred to in subsection (1)(b) above are—
 - (a) that the vehicle was driven dangerously^[84] on a road or other public place;
 - (b) that, owing to the driving of the vehicle, an accident occurred by which injury was caused to any person;
 - (c) that, owing to the driving of the vehicle, an accident occurred by which damage was caused to any property, other than the vehicle;
 - (d) that damage was caused to the vehicle.
- (3) A person is not guilty of an offence under this section if he proves that, as regards any such proven driving, injury or damage as is referred to in subsection (1)(b) above, either—
 - (a) the driving, accident or damage referred to in subsection (2) above occurred before he committed the basic offence; or
 - (b) he was neither in nor on nor in the immediate vicinity of the vehicle when that driving, accident or damage occurred.
- (4) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or, if it is proved that, in circumstances falling within subsection (2)(b) above, the accident caused the death of the person concerned, fourteen years.^[85]
- (5) If a person who is charged with an offence under this section is found not guilty of that offence but it is proved that he committed a basic offence, he may be convicted of the basic offence.

Since there is a different maximum sentence for those cases in which death results, there are technically two offences created by the section.⁸⁶

The prosecution must first prove that D has committed the basic offence under s 12(1) of the 1968 Act as described earlier in relation to a mechanically propelled vehicle—the offence does not apply to conveyances generally.

Secondly, the prosecution must prove that at any time after the vehicle was unlawfully taken (proof of the identity of the taker is not required) and before it was recovered

⁸³ See JN Spencer, ‘The Aggravated Vehicle Taking Act 1992’ [1992] Crim LR 69.

⁸⁴ In Tame [2012] EWCA Crim 573, D appealed his conviction for aggravated vehicle-taking on the ground that the judge ought to have directed the jury as to what was meant by ‘dangerously’. The Court of Appeal accepted that a direction ought to have been given, but held that the omission did not render the conviction unsafe, as there was no factual dispute about the nature of D’s driving.

⁸⁵ Criminal Justice Act 2003, s 285(1).

⁸⁶ They should therefore be charged separately: Courtie [1984] AC 463; Sherwood [1995] RTR 60.

(ie restored to the owner or other lawful custody: s 12A(8)), the vehicle was driven or injury or damage was caused in one or more of the circumstances specified in s 12A(2). Initially, the provision was interpreted as requiring no proof of fault on the part of D, or D and others involved in the enterprise—liability was strict if injury to the person or damage to property was owing to the driving,⁸⁷ or if damage was caused to the vehicle taken, whether by driving or not.⁸⁸ On that interpretation, D's driving might be impeccable, but he would not escape liability if the injury, damage or death arose.⁸⁹ Moreover, each of the participants in the enterprise commits the offence though they were not driving the vehicle. In Taylor,⁹⁰ a seven-member Supreme Court rejected that strict liability interpretation. D was charged with s 12A (having taken a work vehicle without consent) and with causing the death of a scooter rider while driving uninsured contrary to s 3ZB of the Road Traffic Act 1988. D was later found to have been over the drink-drive limit and uninsured at the time of the accident. At trial the Crown accepted that D's driving did not involve any fault. In light of the decision of the Supreme Court in Hughes,⁹¹ the judge held that fault had to be proved in relation to the accident on the aggravated vehicle-taking count. The Crown appealed relying on Marsh.⁹² The Supreme Court, following Hughes, held that no offence contrary to s 12A(1) and (2)(b) of the 1968 Act is committed when, following the basic offence and before recovery of the vehicle, the defendant drove the vehicle and, without fault in the manner of his driving, the vehicle was involved in an accident which caused injury to a person. D was not criminally responsible for the death where his own driving had been completely faultless. The approach to causation adopted in Hughes in the context of the offence of 'causing the death of another person by driving a motor vehicle on a road' (Road Traffic Act 1988, s3ZB) applied equally to the offence of aggravated vehicle-taking s 12A. D would be liable if there was:

at least some act or omission in the control of the car which involved some element of fault, whether amounting to careless/inconsiderate driving or not, and which contributed in some more than minimal way to the death.⁹³

The offence is unusually broad in the way it approaches liability of those involved in the joint venture. So if D and E commit the basic offence (s 12), each of them is liable if either one of them causes injury or damage when driving the vehicle. More remarkably, if during the enterprise D chooses to damage the vehicle by slashing the seats, E commits the offence under s 12A though he does not assist or encourage D in slashing the seats or even if E tries to dissuade D from so doing.⁹⁴ This highlights the draconian nature of the provision. Even if E is no longer in the vehicle—he may, for example, be walking away from it when D decides to set fire to it⁹⁵—E is liable provided he is still 'in the immediate vicinity' of the vehicle. The offence creates guilt by association, but also guilt by approximation.

Section 12A(3) deals with the problem of proof identified above. The prosecution may prove, or D may admit, that D committed the basic offence but D may claim that he had left ⁸⁷ The Court of Appeal in Marsh [1997] 1 Cr App R 67 held that the words 'owing to the driving of the vehicle' were plain and simple and no gloss ought to be provided by referring the jury to the manner of the driving. See [1997] Crim LR 205 and comment. If D has used the car as a weapon, he will still be caught by the section: 'accident' includes deliberate causing of injury: B [2005] 1 Cr App R 140, [2005] Crim LR 388.

⁸⁸ Dawes v DPP [1995] 1 Cr App R 65 at 72, 73.

⁸⁹ See eg Clifford [2007] EWCA Crim 2442.

⁹⁰ [2016] UKSC 5. See K Laird, 'The Decline of Criminal Law Causation Without Limits' (2016) 132 LQR 566.

⁹¹ [2013] UKSC 56. See Ch 32.

⁹² [1997] 1 Cr App R 67.

⁹³ At [32] per Lord Sumption.

⁹⁴ 'A passenger may be liable even though the passenger has protested at the driving which has caused damage to the vehicle': Dawes v DPP [1995] 1 Cr App R 65 at 72, per Kennedy LJ. See also Wiggins [2001] RTR 37 on the sentencing implications in such cases.

⁹⁵ Or allow it to roll downhill causing damage to property. See DPP v Hughes [2010] EWHC 515 (Admin).

the enterprise before the injury or damage was done or that he joined the enterprise after the injury or damage had been done. In such circumstances, it is for D to prove on the balance of probability that the dangerous driving or the accident or the damage took place before he committed the basic offence; or that, having committed the basic offence, he was no longer in, nor on, nor in the immediate vicinity of the vehicle when one of those events took place.

The activity known as 'carjacking'—where D causes V to stop his car and D then forcibly ejects V from the car and drives V's vehicle away—is more appropriately prosecuted by offences of theft, robbery, offences against the person, etc. In particular, in cases where V is caused to stop by D's minor collision with V's vehicle, aggravated vehicle-taking will not be a suitable charge because the damage will have occurred prior to the taking.

It is unclear whether an attempt to commit aggravated vehicle-taking is an offence. The s 12A offence requires proof of the basic offence under s 12 which is triable summarily only (and therefore cannot be the subject of an attempt charge), but the s 12A offence itself is triable either way. It is submitted that in an appropriate case a charge of attempt would be available, as where D is apprehended trying to break into a high-powered vehicle and admits that his intention was to take it for an evening's 'racing' against his friend's car.

Making off without payment

21.1 Making off under the Theft Act 1978

By s 3¹ of the Theft Act 1978 as amended:

- (1) Subject to subsection (3) below, a person who, knowing that payment on the spot for any goods supplied or service done is required or expected from him, dishonestly makes off without having paid as required or expected and with intent to avoid payment of the amount due shall be guilty of an offence.
- (2) For purposes of this section 'payment on the spot' includes payment at the time of collecting goods on which work has been done or in respect of which service has been provided.
- (3) Subsection (1) above shall not apply where the supply of the goods or the doing of the service is contrary to law, or where the service done is such that payment is not legally enforceable.²

By s 4 the offence, which is triable either way, is punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment and/or an unlimited fine, and on indictment by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years and/or a fine.

This offence aims to deal in a simple and straightforward way with a person who having consumed a meal in a restaurant, or filled the tank of the car with petrol, or reached their destination in a taxi, leaves without paying. Such cases were known as bilking. Although factually simple, difficulties arise in prosecuting such cases as theft.³ There are no such difficulties under s 3. Under s 3, there is no requirement that D's conduct amounts to theft or fraud or that he has practised any deception at all. There is no requirement to prove that D was dishonest when he ordered the meal or began to fill his car; it is sufficient if the dishonesty occurs at the point of making off.

The offence may have been rendered redundant in many situations by the Fraud Act 2006. Before that Act, the old deception offences applied and D could only be liable for one of those if his deception occurred before the relevant property passed to him (or the service was provided etc depending on which type of deception offence was charged). In contrast, under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006, D may be liable even if he makes a false representation after the entire proprietary interest has passed to him, provided that there is an intention to make a gain or cause a loss thereby. It follows that if, after D has transferred fuel to the tank in his vehicle and the entire proprietary interest in the fuel has passed to him, he then falsely represents to V (the cashier) that it will be paid for by D's firm, D commits fraud under s 2.⁴ A prosecution under s 3 of the 1978 Act may nevertheless be preferable because it describes precisely what D did, and it does not involve proof of a false representation. Moreover, in some cases s 3 of the 1978 Act will be the necessary charge because the fraud offence is limited to cases of intending to gain or cause loss in terms of property.⁵

¹ See generally Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 6; Griew, Theft, Ch 13; Smith, Property Offences, Ch 20; J Spencer, 'The Theft Act 1978' [1979] Crim LR 24, 35; G Syrota, 'Annotations to Theft Act 1978' in Current Law Statutes 1978 and 'The Theft Act 1978' (1979) 42 MLR 301, 304.

² Section 3(4) was repealed by the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, Sch 17, Part 2, para 1.

³ See eg DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370, [1973] 3 All ER 131, HL, p 944; Edwards v Ddin [1976] 3 All ER 705, [1976] 1 WLR 942.

The s 3 offence creates an exception to the general principle that it is not an offence dishonestly to avoid the payment of a debt.⁶ This might be thought to pose a potential problem of over-criminalizing⁷ and has predictably generated academic interest. Green suggests that there are two ways of reconciling the making off offence with the general principle that it is not an offence to avoid payment of a debt. The first is to presume that D never intended to pay for the goods or services in question. The second approach is the one adopted in DPP v Ray,⁸ namely that D at some point formed the intention never to pay for the goods or services. Green rejects these two theories as being artificial and concludes that the making off offence represents a compromise. The individual who falsely represents that he intends to pay is treated less harshly than he ought to be (had he been charged with fraud), while the individual who only formed the intention never to pay at some later point is treated more harshly than he deserves. It is the difficulty of recognizing which category a given case falls into that explains the existence of the offence.

In practical terms, the offence creates a desirable exception to the general principle. A dishonest debtor who can be traced can be coerced into payment via civil remedies without resort to criminal sanctions. In contrast, where someone makes off from the point of payment the person becomes difficult, if not impossible, to trace. Enforcement can usually only occur on the spot.⁹

21.1.1 Actus reus

21.1.1.1 Makes off

The term 'makes off' might be thought to have a pejorative connotation implying some requirement of stealth in the manner of the making off. Certainly, the offence extends to such cases (the diner who waits until the manager leaves the room or exits via the cloak-room window) but it cannot be confined to such cases. A diner who brazenly walks out of the restaurant after finishing his pudding is properly said to make off though his act is done openly and without stealth; so, too, a heavyweight boxer whose departure cannot be prevented by a timorous restaurant owner.¹⁰

'Makes off' appears to mean simply that D leaves one place (the place where the payment is required) for another place. The offence does not necessarily require that D should have 'made off' from V's premises. The spot from which D makes off is simply the place where ⁴ cf under the old law Collis-Smith [1971] Crim LR 716, CA. ⁵ See p 933.

⁶ See further GH Treitel, 'Contract and Crime' in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 89.

⁷ See Green, 13 Ways, 89–90. One could also plausibly argue that the offence is not a compromise but simply reflects the fact that English law does not recognize the moral distinction between D who never intended to pay and D who only formed the intention later on.

⁸ [1974] AC 370.

⁹ Hence originally by s 3(4) a power of arrest was conferred which was necessary since the offence carries only a maximum two-year sentence and was not, before the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, automatically arrestable.

¹⁰ See F Bennion, 'Letter to the Editor' [1980] Crim LR 670.

payment is required¹¹ and this may be a news vendor's stand or an ice-cream van on the highway. In the case of a taxi ride, it will be the agreed destination.¹² If D has not left the first place he has not made off, but if he is in the process of leaving there may be an attempt.¹³ Presumably, this element of the actus reus continues for such time as D can be said to be in the process of 'making off'.¹⁴

If D leaves with V's consent it may be more difficult to say that D has made off. Suppose that D, having determined never to pay, gives his correct name and address to V and is allowed to go. It would be a strained reading of the section to say that D had made off; D has left without paying but the offence requires something more than that. A more difficult case is that where E, who also intends never to pay, gives a false name and address to V and is allowed to go. The two cases differ in that D can be traced and coerced into payment under the civil law while E cannot be traced at all. Spencer¹⁵ argues that the difference between these cases is material. The mischief aimed at by this section, he argues, is the bilking customer who cannot be traced.¹⁶

Spencer's argument that the applicability of the offence turns on the traceability of the bilker has force, but is not easy to square with the language of s 3. It can lead to some illogical results. For example, assume that F is V's best customer of many years' standing. One day F determines not to pay and decamps from the premises via the toilet window. All the elements of the offence appear to be present unless it is to be said that F did not make off. It may puzzle us all to wonder why F should have thought that he could get away with his conduct but he seems clearly to have made off even though he is clearly traceable by the owner and he knows that at the time of leaving. A customer using a wheelchair would surely make off if he decamps without paying though he does not at all fancy his chances of outpacing the restaurateur.¹⁷ If the untraceability of D was the touchstone of the offence, it is arguable that the offence would then fail to protect the proprietor (eg the restaurant owner) who knows who D is, but is unlikely to pursue D's small debt via the civil courts.¹⁸ The CLRC¹⁹ certainly regarded the purpose of the offence as to protect legitimate business.

Section 3 does not, on a natural interpretation, mean that D does not make off if he gives a correct identification but E does make off if he gives a false one. Suppose in the latter case that V orders a taxi for E and bids him a cheery farewell from the hotel lobby. Can it really be said that E has made off?²⁰

¹¹ Payment may be legitimately required at more than one spot: Moberly v Allsop [1992] COD 190, 156 JP 514, DC. See also Aziz [1993] Crim LR 708.

¹² Although not necessarily at the moment the taxi arrives at its destination. If V, the taxi driver, permits D to leave the taxi with the purpose of getting money to pay the fare, the time at which payment is expected will be deferred. See Morris [2013] EWCA Crim, [2013] Crim LR 995. The ex turpi causa doctrine prevents the bilker recovering damages where the cab driver injures him in attempts to prevent the making off: Beaumont v Ferrer [2016] EWCA Civ 768 (those engaged in the commission of a crime should not be able to recover for the consequences of their criminal conduct).

¹³ Brooks and Brooks (1982) 76 Cr App R 66, [1983] Crim LR 188, CA; making off, said the court, 'may be an exercise accompanied by the sound of trumpets or a silent stealing away after the folding of tents'.

¹⁴ This was important for determining the lawfulness of arrests: Drameh [1983] Crim LR 322.

¹⁵ [1983] Crim LR 573.

¹⁶ He supported this argument by the fact that, as originally enacted, V had a power of arrest; it would be highly undesirable if V could arrest a customer of whose identity he is aware, that power being required for the unidentifiable bilker.

¹⁷ For further views on this difficult aspect of the offence, see Williams, TBCL, 878; F Bennion, Letter, 'The Drafting of Section 3 of the Theft Act 1978' [1980] Crim LR 670 and Letters [1983] Crim LR 205, 574; Griew, Theft, paras 13–16.

¹⁸ See Griew, paras 13–16.

¹⁹ Thirteenth Report (1977) Cmnd 6733, para 19.

²⁰ cf Hammond [1982] Crim LR 611, n 32.

If, however, V permits D to leave the spot where payment is required for a purely temporary purpose (eg to answer a telephone call or to collect his wallet from his overcoat which he has deposited in the cloakroom) expecting him to return to settle up, it is submitted that D commits the offence if he then decamps. In such cases V has not consented to D leaving without paying; quite the contrary, in the latter example he has consented to D taking steps to facilitate payment. So where V, a taxi driver, permits D to leave so that D, as he claims, may go into his house to get the fare it would appear that D, if he then runs off, has made off within the meaning of this section.²¹

21.1.1.2 Goods supplied or service done

The offence requires that the goods²² be supplied or that a service be done. Most obviously, goods are supplied where V delivers them to D but the offence cannot be limited only to cases of delivery by V. Petrol is clearly supplied to D at a self-service filling station though D supplies himself and, similarly, goods taken by D from the shelves in a supermarket are supplied.²³ 'Supplied' in this context suggests goods proffered by V and accordingly taken by D. Hence, it would not be an offence under this section, though it may be theft, for D to take goods in a shop which is not self-service; such goods are not proffered until tendered by V or his assistant. It is submitted that goods may be supplied for the purpose of s 3 even though D has a dishonest intent from the outset and therefore steals the goods. It can hardly have been intended that theft and making off should be mutually exclusive since the effect of that would create difficulties for prosecutors.

Where 'service' is concerned, the service must be 'done'. An obvious example of a service done is the provision of hotel accommodation, or a meal in a restaurant, but it will also apply to the collection of goods, such as clothes, shoes or cars, on which work (repair, etc) has been done. A service may be done (as goods may be supplied) though nothing is physically done by V other than proffering the service of which D takes advantage, as where D is permitted to park his car on V's parking lot.

There is no definition of 'service' in s 3. 'Service' is not the same as the extended meaning of 'services' which was contained in s 1 of the 1978 Act.²⁴

21.1.1.3 Unenforceable debts

The offence under s 3, unlike the repealed offence under s 1 of the 1978 Act, cannot be committed where the supply of the goods or the doing of the service is contrary to law; or where the service done is such that payment is not legally enforceable.²⁵ Thus, it is no offence for D to make off from a brothel without paying.

Whether a supply of goods or services is contrary to law or whether payment for a service is not legally enforceable involves a consideration of the general law of contract and cannot be detailed here.²⁶ But the distinction that s 3 makes may be illustrated by reference ²¹ This approach was approved in Morris [2013] EWCA Crim 436, [2013] Crim LR 995. The court may have gone further by stating that D simply failing to return is sufficient.

²² As defined in s 34 of the 1968 Act, applicable to the 1978 Act by s 5(2).

²³ Contra ATH Smith, 'Shoplifting and the Theft Acts' [1981] Crim LR 586. Cf Griew, Theft, para 13.07; Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 6.12.

²⁴ See on that Sofroniou [2003] EWCA Crim 3681, and p 773 in the 11th edition of this work. Section 1 was repealed by the Fraud Act 2006.

²⁵ The reason for the distinction is that while the aim of s 1 was to punish fraud, the aim of s 3 is to protect legitimate business.

²⁶ For a general review of the relationship and consideration of s 3, see Treitel, 'Contract and Crime' in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 81.

to transactions entered into by a minor.²⁷ As a matter of civil law, the supply of unnecessary services to a minor will not create a legally enforceable contract. It is a question of law whether the items are necessary. To be necessary they must be of a nature suitable to the child's condition in life and actually required by him at the time and he must not already be otherwise sufficiently provided with them.²⁸ So, if a landlord of a pub supplies beer to a minor, the transaction is contrary to law and the minor commits no offence in making off without payment. If the minor has a service provided to him which is not a 'necessary' one (say, flying lessons) he commits no offence in making off since payment for that service is not legally enforceable. If the minor is supplied with non-necessary goods (say, 11 fancy waistcoats) and makes off he commits the offence; while payment for the waistcoats is not legally enforceable, the supply of these goods is not contrary to law.

The courts do not seem to have been troubled by defence claims that although performance of the contract was not contrary to law, some collateral aspect of V's conduct in the supply of the goods or services was contrary to law and therefore unprotected by s 3. It was anticipated by some that this would give rise to problems in cases such as D bilking on the unlicensed taxi driver.²⁹

21.1.1.4 Without having paid as required or expected

It is implicit in the section that V requires or expects payment on the spot and that the payment is due in fact and law. If a taxi driver, in the course of a journey, commits a breach of contract entitling his passenger to rescind the contract, the passenger does not commit an offence by making off.³⁰ Where the money is due, does a person who gives a worthless cheque in 'payment' of the debt commit the offence? The question was previously of little importance because D would have been guilty of the more serious offence under s 2(1)(b) of the 1978 Act. The offence would now be one under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006 as D makes a false representation that the cheque will be honoured.³¹ In the one reported case (although only at first instance)³² in which the matter has arisen the judge ruled that the s 3 offence was not committed because a worthless cheque was not the same as counterfeit money, and that D was not making off because he departed with V's consent. The true answer may well be that D is guilty because he has not paid 'as required or expected'. V requires and expects payment in legal tender or by a good cheque. Payment by a worthless cheque no more satisfies his requirement or expectation than payment in counterfeit money. In the rare cases in which payment by cheque nowadays occurs, it will inevitably be backed by a cheque guarantee card, and depending on the conditions of its issue, D may have paid as required or expected although his authority to use the card has been withdrawn or even if it has been stolen.³³ The same is true of payment by credit card.³⁴ V has been paid if the bank or card issuer is bound to honour the cheque or card, and that is a question of civil law. The offence is not committed if the supplier consents to D's leaving without payment, even if the consent was obtained by fraud, as where D deceives V into accepting postponement of payment.³⁵

²⁷ cf P Rowlands, 'Minors: Can They Make Off Without Payment' (1981) 145 JP 410; cf Smith, Property Offences, para 20.69.

²⁸ Bainbridge v Pickering (1779) 2 Wm Bl 1325.

²⁹ See Griew, Theft, para 13.10.

³⁰ Troughton v Metropolitan Police [1987] Crim LR 138, DC.

³¹ See G Syrota, 'Are Cheque Frauds Covered by Section 3 of the Theft Act 1978?' [1980] Crim LR 413.

³² Hammond [1982] Crim LR 611 (Judge Morrison).

³³ cf First Sport Ltd v Barclays Bank plc [1993] 3 All ER 789, CA (Civ Div).

³⁴ cf Re Charge Card Services Ltd [1988] 3 All ER 702, [1988] 3 WLR 764, CA (Civ Div).

³⁵ Vincent [2001] Crim LR 488, [2001] 2 Cr App R 150, [2001] EWCA Crim 295, CA. See also Evans v Lane (1984) CO/137/84, CA.

Payment in such a case is not required or expected at that time. This may be an offence under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006.

21.1.2 Mens rea

The offence requires that D should make off: (a) dishonestly; (b) knowing that payment on the spot is required or expected from him; and (c) with intent to avoid payment.

21.1.2.1 Dishonesty

Reference may be made to the general discussion of dishonesty.³⁶ It does not matter at what stage D decides to act dishonestly as long as he is dishonest when he makes off. Dishonesty is a question for the jury. If D genuinely believed that no payment was due at that time or that none was due owing to the poor standard or deficient goods, following *Ivey*³⁷ it would be for the jury to determine whether D was dishonest in refusing to pay for goods or a service. D's perception of how reasonable people would view his conduct is no longer fundamental since the Ghosh test was rejected.

21.1.2.2 Knowing that payment on the spot is required or expected of him

The offence is concerned only with cases where payment on the spot is required. Such transactions are difficult to define in abstract terms. They are usually easy enough to identify³⁸ by reference to normal trading practices, although these may in particular instances be modified by the course of dealing between the parties.³⁹ If D believes that the transaction is on credit terms, he cannot be convicted of this offence for he does not know the transaction to be a spot transaction. Where D believes that payment is to be made by another (eg where he believes that E will pay for the meal) he does not commit the offence because he does not know that payment is to be required of him.⁴⁰ Presumably D would not be liable if, having drunk too much alcohol with his meal, he staggers out of the restaurant without paying and is so intoxicated that he does not know what he is doing.

21.1.2.3 Intention to avoid payment

Section 3 does not explicitly require an intention to make permanent default, and commentators tended to favour the view that a dishonest intention temporarily to avoid payment would suffice. However, *Allen*⁴¹ holds that the offence requires an intention to make permanent default. D had left an hotel without settling his bill and the trial judge directed the jury that all that was required was an intention to make default at the time payment was required. The Court of Appeal held, however, that an intention to make permanent default was required because s 3 required both (a) a making off without paying on the spot; and (b) an intention to avoid payment. In view of the requirement in (a), (b) made sense only if ³⁶ See p 873. ³⁷ [2017] UKSC 67, [74]. For discussion, see p 879.

³⁸ Section 3(2) provides that it includes 'payment at the time of collecting goods on which work has been done or in respect of which service has been provided'. But this seems to have been added ex abundanti cautela and adds nothing.

³⁹ It cannot be enough that V requires a payment to be made on the spot, eg seeing D who owes him £10 lent a month ago, V demands payment on the spot. The reference is to those transactions where payment customarily follows immediately upon the provision of the goods or service.

⁴⁰ Brooks and Brooks (1982) 76 Cr App R 66, [1983] Crim LR 188, CA.

⁴¹ [1985] AC 1029, [1985] 2 All ER 641, [1985] Crim LR 739.

permanent default was intended. The House of Lords endorsed this view and drew further support for it by reference to the fact that the CLRC had intended permanent default to be necessary.⁴²

The Home Office rejected a reform proposal suggested by garage owners⁴³ which would have extended the offence to include cases where D acts with intent to defer payment.

⁴² Thirteenth Report (1977) Cmnd 6733, para 18.

⁴³ Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Consultation on Proposals for Legislation (2004) para 45: <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/+/http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/documents/cons-fraud-law-reform/>. Complaining of individuals who, having filled their cars with fuel, claimed to have left their wallets at home and promised to pay at a later date. That may be an offence under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006.

The Fraud Act 2006

22.1 Background

22.1.1 Common law and legislation before the Fraud Act 2006

Fraudulent conduct has long been dealt with at common law by the offence of conspiracy to defraud. The Theft Act 1968 included deception offences,¹ each requiring that D's conduct constituted a representation, that the representation caused V to form a false belief, that belief (caused by the representation) led V to behave in a prescribed way (transfer property, a valuable security, etc) and that as a result of the behaviour D (or another) gained. Those result crimes caused problems. The requirement for an operative deception meant that the offences were restricted in application. If V knew that D's statement was false,² or if V would have acted in the same way even if he had known it,³ or if V did not rely on the false statement but arrived at the same erroneous conclusion from his own observation or some other source,⁴ or, of course, if V did not read or hear the false statement made by D, no deception offence was committed. Numerous technical issues arose⁵ including such fundamental matters as: whether a representation could be made impliedly,⁶ whether V's indifference as to the truth of a representation precluded a finding of an operative deception⁷ and whether there could be a deception of a machine.⁸ The courts were forced to adopt broad interpretations and the concept of deception was, arguably, being misconstrued.

It was thought that to offer adequate protection from the growing problem of fraud, a more structured and coherent package of offences was necessary to keep pace with technology and modern methods of property transfer.⁹ The solution to these problems was to repeal the deception offences and replace them with a 'general fraud offence'.

¹ The offences were: obtaining property: 1968, s 15; obtaining a money transfer: 1968, s 15A; obtaining a pecuniary advantage: 1968, s 16; procuring the execution of a valuable security: 1968, s 20(2); obtaining services: 1978, s 1; securing the remission of a liability: 1978, s 2(1)(a); inducing a creditor to wait for or to forgo payment: 1978, s 2(1)(b); obtaining an exemption from or abatement of liability: 1978, s 2(1)(c).

² Ady (1835) 7 C & P 140; Mills (1857) Dears & B 205; Hensler (1870) 11 Cox CC 570; Light (1915) 11 Cr App R 111.

³ Edwards [1978] Crim LR 49, CA, and commentary at 50.

⁴ Roebuck (1856) Dears & B 24.

⁵ For a detailed account see JC Smith, The Law of Theft (8th edn, 1997) Ch 4; and Ch 19 of the 11th edition of this book.

⁶ Ray [1974] AC 370.

⁷ Charles [1977] AC 177; Lambie [1982] AC 449.

⁸ A more robust stand on this has now been adopted: there cannot be deception of machines for the purposes of dishonesty offences. See Chodoreck v Poland [2017] EWHC 995 (Admin) and Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWHC 2673 (Admin) at [32].

⁹ LC 276, Fraud (2002).

One consequence of this is that there has been no attempt to provide a clear definition of what constitutes fraud.¹⁰

22.1.2 Evolution of the Fraud Act 2006

The immediate history of the Fraud Act 2006 can be traced to Law Commission Consultation Paper No 155, Legislating the Criminal Code: Fraud and Deception (1999)¹¹ followed by Law Commission Report No 276, Fraud (2002).¹² In turn, the government responded with the Home Office Consultation Paper, Fraud Law Reform (2004)¹³ which developed the Law Commission's proposals.

22.1.3 The merits of a general fraud offence

The merits of general fraud offences have been debated for decades.¹⁴ Such an offence was considered by the CLRC when preparing the Theft Act 1968¹⁵ but ultimately rejected. Several eminent commentators doubted whether a general fraud offence could ever be drafted which does not extend potential criminal liability too far.¹⁶ There were, however, numerous strong supporters of such reform.¹⁷ Most supporters argued for a model requiring not only that the prosecution prove that the defendant behaved dishonestly and with intent to gain/cause loss but also that there were economic interests actually imperilled by that conduct. The Fraud Act adopts a wider model with no requirement to prove that the conduct imperilled economic interests or caused the victim to believe the representations.

22.1.4 Law Commission proposals

As stated earlier, the immediate history of the Fraud Act 2006 can be traced to the Law Commission Consultation Paper—No 155, Legislating the Criminal Code: Fraud and Deception (1999)—followed by the Law Commission Report—No 276, Fraud (2002).¹⁸

Initially, the Commission proposed merely to amend the deception offences and declined to propose any general fraud offence. This hesitant, unambitious approach was heavily ¹⁰ The 2006 Act manages to introduce a general fraud offence, use the term fraud, in labelling offences, but fails to provide any definition of the term. Cf N Yeo, 'Bull's Eye' (2007) 157 NLJ 212 at 213, suggesting that in practical terms the government has succeeded in defining fraud.

¹¹ See www.lawcom.gov.uk/app/uploads/2015/03/cp155_Legislating_the_Criminal_Code_Fraud_and_Deception_Consultation.pdf.

¹² See www.lawcom.gov.uk/app/uploads/2015/03/lc276_Fraud.pdf. Described by Dominic Grieve MP as a 'model of its kind': Hansard, HC, 12 June 2006, col 546.

¹³ See <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/+/http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/documents/cons-fraud-law-reform/>.

¹⁴ The merits were discussed in Law Com WP 104, Conspiracy to Defraud (1987), and in LCCP 155, Parts 4 and 5. The model offered was an offence for 'Any person who dishonestly causes another to suffer [financial] prejudice, or who dishonestly makes a gain for himself or another', para 5.2.

¹⁵ Eighth Report, paras 97–100. Cl 12(3) of the CLRC Draft Bill of 1966: 'A person who dishonestly, with a view to gain for himself or another, by any deception induces a person to do or refrain from doing any act shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.'

¹⁶ JC Smith, 'Fraud and The Criminal Law' in P Birks (ed), Criminal Justice and Human Rights—Pressing Problems in the Law (1995) vol 1, 49. Similar sentiments were expressed by another great theft scholar: Griew, Theft, 141. See also the conclusions in Law Com WP 56, Criminal Law: Conspiracy to Defraud (1974) paras 65, 81–82.

¹⁷ See GR Sullivan, 'Fraud and Efficacy in the Criminal Law: A Proposal for a Wide Residual Offence' [1985] Crim LR 616 and 'Framing an Acceptable General Offence of Fraud' (1989) 53 J Crim L 92.

¹⁸ In turn, the government responded with the Home Office Consultation Paper, Fraud Law Reform (2004).

criticized.¹⁹ In its final Report the Commission made recommendations for a general fraud offence with the draft Bill describing three forms the offence should take.²⁰ The Bill was, in general, very warmly received in Parliament where the law lords approved of practically all of its terms (except the retention of the offence of conspiracy to defraud).²¹ The Bill was passed almost unchallenged. The Act received Royal Assent on 8 November 2006.

Reflecting on the Fraud Act a decade after it came into force, Virgo argues that:

Legal analysis needs to strike a balance between principle and pragmatism. The Fraud Act on its face might be criticised for infringing fundamental criminal justice principles, by virtue of its breadth and uncertainty, but if the legislation enables appropriate responses to be reached, assisted by judicial interpretation where appropriate, it can be defended. This is the case with the Fraud Act 2006. Initial concerns about the ambit and interpretation of the legislation have largely proved unfounded. It remains a model of criminal legislation which remains fit for purpose.²²

The infrequency with which the Court of Appeal has had to confront the appropriate interpretation of the Fraud Act 2006 combined with a lack of empirical data makes it difficult to assess how the legislation is operating in practice. As will become clear, the sheer breadth of the general fraud offence and the fact that liability will often turn on dishonesty might have created a strong incentive for defendants to plead guilty in order to receive the maximum discount in sentence. It is also possible, however, that reliance upon the protean concept of dishonesty encourages defendants to plead not guilty.

22.2 The general fraud offence

The principal offence is the general fraud²³ offence created by s 1 in the following terms:

- (1) A person is guilty of fraud if he is in breach of any of the sections listed in subsection (2) (which provide for different ways of committing the offence).
- (2) The sections are—
 - (a) section 2 (fraud by false representation),
 - (b) section 3 (fraud by failing to disclose information), and
 - (c) section 4 (fraud by abuse of position).

The offence of fraud can be committed in one of three ways as described by ss 2 to 4. Each is based on dishonest conduct against property interests, and carries a maximum ten-year sentence on indictment.²⁴ They are incredibly wide offences deliberately drafted to avoid technicality. The offence of fraud can be charged in one of three forms: s 1(2)(a) (fraud by false representation under s 2); s 1(2)(b) (fraud by failure to disclose under s 3); s 1(2)(c)

¹⁹ See D Ormerod, 'A Bit of a Con' [1999] Crim LR 789.

²⁰ The proposals were endorsed after further consultation in 2004, in which additional proposals were suggested. The government drew support for introducing broader, less technical offences from the deficiencies in the old law and from the need to combat the rising volume of fraud. See HC Research Paper 06/31, at 3. See also press reports of 7 Mar 2007.

²¹ See eg Hansard, HL, 22 June 2005, col 1661.

²² G Virgo, 'The Fraud Act 2006—Ten Years On' [2017] 10 Arch Rev 6.

²³ The 2006 Act introduces a general fraud offence, uses the term fraud, but fails to define it. Cf N Yeo, 'Bull's Eye' (2007) 157 NLJ 212 at 213, suggesting that in practical terms the government has succeeded in defining fraud.

²⁴ See Sentencing Council, Fraud, Bribery and Money Laundering Offences: Definitive Guideline (2014) (with application to all individual offenders and organizations sentenced on or after 1 Oct 2014).

(fraud by abuse of position under s 4). The particularity and complexity of this scheme was unnecessary. Sections 2 to 4 could have been free-standing offences in their own right.

22.2.1 General matters of interpretation

The 2006 Act²⁵ is a short statute designed to be unburdened by the technicality which bedevilled the old law. The Act is not a codifying Act. The Law Commission Bill attached to the Fraud Report No 276 serves as a useful interpretative tool,²⁶ especially given the government's refusal to define many core elements of the offence in an attempt to ensure the broadest interpretation.²⁷

As noted, the offences are extremely broadly drafted. To date, sensible prosecution decisions have avoided the most extreme possible uses of the legislation, identified throughout this chapter. It remains disappointing that Parliament created such wide and ill-defined offences, leaving to prosecutorial discretion the fair and efficient administration and application of the offences. There is no guarantee that all prosecution agencies will adopt equally rigorous prosecution policies, nor that each agency will apply such policies with internal consistency.²⁸ Even if the prosecution agencies do all manage to achieve a sensible, measured, consistent approach to the Act, that does not prevent inappropriate exploitation of the breadth of the offences by private prosecutors.

The offences, especially s 2, overlap with theft, but fraud requires no element of appropriation, no loss, no gain, no intention permanently to deprive and carries a higher sentence. The CPS reminds prosecutors of the benefits of a charge under the 2006 Act.²⁹

22.2.2 Jurisdiction

The courts continue to have jurisdiction when property is fraudulently gained/lost in England or Wales, even though the conduct causing this result has taken place in another country (or countries as where D in the United States makes false representations to V in Canada causing V's London bank account to be debited). The Criminal Justice Act 1993 provides that if any act or omission, proof of which is required for conviction of a relevant crime (a 'relevant event'), takes place here it will be capable of prosecution in England and Wales. Schedule 1 to the 2006 Act amends the 1993 Act to extend the meaning of 'relevant event' to include:

- (a) if the fraud involved an intention to make a gain and the gain occurred, that occurrence;
- (b) if the fraud involved an intention to cause a loss or to expose another to a risk of loss and the loss occurred, that occurrence.³⁰

²⁵ In force from 15 Jan 2007: Fraud Act 2006 (Commencement) Order 2006, SI 2006/3200; Fraud Act 2006, Sch 2, paras 2 and 3. See Goldsmith [2009] EWCA Crim 1840, n 35.

²⁶ In addition to the Law Commission Consultation Paper and Report, valuable insights may be gleaned from the Home Office Consultation Paper, Home Office Paper of Responses to Consultation and the House of Commons Research Paper 06/31.

²⁷ See eg the lack of definition of the term 'abuse' in s 4 noted in Pennock and Pennock [2014] EWCA Crim 598. In general, the government was reluctant to provide rigorous analysis of any terms.

²⁸ The larger scale frauds which come under scrutiny from the most senior lawyers are those to which more detailed attention is likely to be paid, and ironically it may be those to which the Act's provisions are applied most cautiously.

²⁹ The credit/debit status of any bank accounts is irrelevant to the Fraud Act offences. All that is in issue is D's right to use the account; it is not necessary to prove or demonstrate any consequences of fraud (though they will clearly be material to sentence, compensation and confiscation). 'Preddy'-type difficulties will not arise (where the property obtained had not belonged to another); Fraud Act offences do not require an intent permanently to deprive; a charge should describe what actually happened and reflect the true criminality; and the indictment should be as simple as reasonably possible. See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

³⁰ Para 25(3) (emphasis added).

Where, however, D performs one of the elements of the fraud offence abroad (eg making the false representation under s 2, or abusing the financial position under s 4), but intends to make a gain which will occur in England and Wales or cause a loss in this jurisdiction, the 1993 Act (as amended by the 2006 Act) will not apply unless there is an actual gain or loss within England and Wales. The Act could have extended the meaning of ‘relevant event’ to include the making of the false representation, etc with intent rather than the result (given that these are now conduct crimes), but ‘curiously’³¹ did not do so.

22.2.3 Commencement

Transitional provisions are provided in the Act.³² The deception offences under the Theft Acts offences continue to apply for any offences partly³³ committed before 15 January 2007, that is where a ‘relevant event’ occurs before that date.³⁴ In Goldsmith,³⁵ the Court of Appeal noted that the date in an indictment is not normally to be regarded as a material averment. The prosecution ought to be especially careful with dates in relation to transitional periods.³⁶

Where it is unclear whether a ‘relevant event’ occurred before or after commencement it will be necessary for the Crown to put alternative counts on the indictment under the 2006 Act and the previous legislation. This practice was endorsed in Bellman,³⁷ where the House of Lords held that where there is prima facie evidence that a defendant has committed either crime A or crime B then both crimes may be charged and left to the jury, even though proof of crime A will establish that D cannot have committed crime B and vice versa. Where it is clear that D has committed crime A or crime B but there is no evidence to say when the crime has been committed, then neither crime can be left to the jury.³⁸

22.2.4 Common elements of the fraud offence

22.2.4.1 Dishonesty

The principal element of mens rea for the offence of fraud in each of its three forms is that of dishonesty. The Law Commission and the Home Office intended that the Ghosh definition should apply, and this was confirmed repeatedly³⁹ in the parliamentary debates. That test, and the changes introduced by the Supreme Court’s judgment in Ivey v Genting Casinos UK Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club),⁴⁰ are examined in detail in Ch 18. No statutory definition for dishonesty was adopted in relation to this offence. Parliament presumed that the Ghosh test would apply. The test for dishonesty in this offence will no doubt now follow that ³¹ See Blackstone’s Criminal Practice (2018) B5.3, noting the difficulty with the lack of transitional provisions in respect of jurisdiction.

³² Set out in Sch 2. The transitional provisions were discussed in Kensington International Ltd v Republic of Congo (formerly People’s Republic of Congo) [2008] 1 WLR 1144.

³³ Under para 3(1) of Sch 2. Para 3(2) of Sch 2 of the Fraud Act 2006 defines an offence as being ‘partly committed’ when: a relevant event occurred before 15 Jan 2007, and another ‘relevant event’ occurred on or after 15 Jan 2007.

³⁴ Relevant event is, for these purposes, defined in para 3(3) of Sch 2 as: ‘any act, omission or other event (including any result of one or more acts or omissions) proof of which is required for conviction of the offence’.

³⁵ [2009] EWCA Crim 1840.

³⁶ This has caused problems in confiscation proceedings and in conspiracy charges where the tendency is to look to evidence of D’s first overt act and/or the date D joined a conspiracy.

³⁷ [1989] AC 836.

³⁸ See on this C [2005] EWCA Crim 3533, Ch 17, p 756.

³⁹ See Hansard, HL Debates, 19 July 2005, col 1424 (Attorney General); House of Commons Research Paper 31/06, at 14; Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 8 (Solicitor General).

⁴⁰ [2017] UKSC 67.

articulated in Ivey.⁴¹ See p 875 above. It is highly unlikely that the courts will entertain a challenge to the application of Ivey in the context of fraud on the basis that it was not the test anticipated by Parliament. Had Parliament wanted to impose a specific test it could have done so; instead it intended for the common law test to apply and in doing so must be taken implicitly to have accepted that the common law is subject to change.

Reliance on dishonesty as the key element of mens rea and as ill defined as it is, with its inherent unpredictability, increases the chances that more cases will go to trial as defendants have little to lose by 'trying their luck' with a jury. This remains the case even after the Supreme Court's reformulation of the test for dishonesty in Ivey. In terms of principle, the lack of certainty in the substantive law and inefficiency in the criminal justice system render this undesirable.

Article 7

The Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights, in its Fourteenth Report⁴² scrutinizing the Fraud Bill, and concluded that the new offence is compatible with Art 7 of the ECHR and common law requirements of certainty:

the new general offence of fraud is not a general dishonesty offence. Rather, it embeds as an element in the definition of the offence some identifiable morally dubious conduct to which the test of dishonesty may be applied, as the Law Commission correctly observed is required by the principle of legal certainty. We are therefore satisfied that, as defined in the Bill, the new general offence of fraud satisfies the common law and ECHR requirement that criminal offences be defined with sufficient clarity and precision to enable the public to predict with sufficient certainty whether or not they will be liable.⁴³

The Committee did, however, confirm that:

a general dishonesty offence would be incompatible with the common law principle of legality. In our view it would also be in breach of the requirement of legal certainty in Articles 5 and 7 ECHR for the same reasons.⁴⁴

The validity of this argument is questionable.⁴⁵ It is not strikingly obvious that in all cases there will have been 'morally dubious' conduct over and above dishonesty. In the s 2 offence, the additional morally dubious conduct seems to be little more than making a false representation—that is, lying, which might also be fairly described in many contexts at least as 'being dishonest': the 'additional' element which the Committee regards as preventing the offence being one solely of dishonesty! It is true that there is also the element of an intent to gain or cause loss, but that is extremely wide and can be morally neutral in some cases, particularly perhaps where D intends only to get that to which he is entitled (which is nevertheless an intent to gain⁴⁶).

At its widest, D could be liable under s 2 for making a statement which he knew might be misleading with intent to gain his own property temporarily—provided that he is also dishonest. Since dishonesty now has a more objective definition under Ivey, it is submitted that the risk of there being an infringement of Art 7 is greater than under Ghosh.

Claim of right

There is no equivalent to s 2 of the Theft Act 1968, so D's claims to be acting under a claim of right are no guarantee of acquittal. Dishonesty under the Act is based solely on the common ⁴¹ At [74]. See the judgment of Sir Brian Leveson P in DPP v Patterson [2017] EWHC 2820 (Admin) and Pabon [2018] EWCA Crim 420. ⁴² (2006).

⁴³ Para 2.14 (emphasis added). See also the A-G's statements in debate: Hansard, 19 July 2005, col 1424.

⁴⁴ Fourteenth Report, para 2.12.

⁴⁵ See earlier.

⁴⁶ See p 987.

law test as articulated by the Supreme Court in Ivey.⁴⁷ The Supreme Court confirmed in Ivey that the tribunal of fact must first ascertain (subjectively) the actual state of the defendant's knowledge or belief as to the facts before considering whether he was dishonest according to the standards of ordinary decent people. It is submitted therefore that if D has a claim of right to the property he should not ordinarily be at risk of criminal liability.⁴⁸ It is unlikely in practice that any defendant would be found to be dishonest in such circumstances, although that cannot be guaranteed. Equally, it is submitted that there should be no criminal liability for D who genuinely believes that he has a claim of right to the property which he seeks to gain, or indeed where D genuinely believes that he has a claim of right to cause V to lose that property. It is unlikely, though not impossible, that in practice such conduct would be found to be dishonest applying the test enunciated in Ivey. A jury might well think D is dishonest where he made a deliberately false representation even where D did so to get something to which he thought he was entitled. The fact that D can now be guilty even though he was genuinely unaware that his conduct would be considered dishonest by the standards of ordinary decent people makes the absence of an equivalent to s 2 of the Theft Act 1968 more keenly felt. To avoid increasing the scope of fraud, which is a consequence that the Supreme Court presumably did not intend in Ivey, in cases where D genuinely believes he has a claim of right, it will be crucial for the trial judge to direct the jury to consider the facts and circumstances as D believed them to be, before directing the jury to consider whether D's conduct was objectively dishonest.

It is submitted that a mistake of civil law giving rise to a belief in a claim of right ought to negate liability.⁴⁹ One argument in support of such an interpretation is the desire to maintain coherence between the offence of theft and that of fraud.⁵⁰ If D believes the property to be his, whether through a mistake of fact or a mistake of law, he has a defence if the charge is brought as theft. There are good reasons to suggest that it would be wrong that he should have no defence if the charge is brought under s 1 of the 2006 Act. If the judge has to direct the jury expressly on the theft charge that claim of right is a defence (and it is submitted that he should), then it is desirable that he should also have to do so on the fraud charge, instead of leaving the jury to deduce this from the general dishonesty direction.⁵¹

The absence of an automatic and complete defence of a claim of right may lead to liability where, for example, D makes a false statement in a company prospectus and includes a disclaimer that, for instance, 'no investment should be made on the basis of the information in this document alone'. A jury may well find such conduct dishonest when viewed in the round.

In the event of a prosecution for an alleged fraud where D has a claim of right or a belief in a claim of right, it is important that the jury is directed that dishonesty is a separate element ⁴⁷ Ivey v Genting Casinos (UK) Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club) [2017] UKSC 67, [74]. For extensive discussion, see p 879.

⁴⁸ cf the Law Commission recommending that a claim of right ought not be a defence in all cases, LC 276, para 7.66, which was a reversal of its position in LCCP 155.

⁴⁹ The CPS has issued guidance to prosecutors stating that: 'The criminal law is not a suitable vehicle to regulate such disputes [that is, arguments over ownership of property]. Before a criminal charge can proceed the ownership of any property must be absolutely clear. If that ownership is in real dispute the criminal law should not be invoked until ownership has been established in the civil courts.' See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

⁵⁰ Arguably, the moral wrong in the two offences is quite distinct: theft is designed to protect property rights and associated rights of transfer of property, etc; fraud is to protect against dishonest exploitation of others. The House of Lords' broad interpretation of theft in Hinks and Gomez (p 838) undermines such a distinction.

⁵¹ The counter-argument is that the offence under the 2006 Act is focused on the dishonesty of means: it is an offence of dishonestly making a false representation rather than making a false representation with intent to dishonestly make a gain.

of the offence. D may deliberately make a false representation, yet not act dishonestly in doing so.⁵² The jury should always be directed that they must be satisfied that the conduct alleged under ss 2 to 4 as appropriate was done dishonestly.

22.2.4.2 With intent to gain or cause loss or to expose to a risk of loss

A second common element in each of the ways fraud can be committed is that under s 5, defining the meaning of 'gain' and 'loss' for the purposes of ss 2 to 4.

- (1) The references to gain and loss in sections 2 to 4 are to be read in accordance with this section.
- (2) 'Gain' and 'loss'—
 - (a) extend only to gain or loss in money or other property;
 - (b) include any such gain or loss whether temporary or permanent;
 and 'property' means any property whether real or personal (including things in action and other intangible property).
- (3) 'Gain' includes a gain by keeping what one has, as well as a gain by getting what one does not have.
- (4) 'Loss' includes a loss by not getting what one might get, as well as a loss by parting with what one has.

The definitions are essentially the same as those in s 34(2)(a) of the Theft Act 1968.⁵³ Under these definitions, 'gain' and 'loss' are limited to gain and loss in money or other property. 'Property' is defined as in s 4(1) of the Theft Act 1968⁵⁴ and covers all forms of property; to ensure coherence with the Theft Act.⁵⁵ None of the special exceptions in s 4 of the 1968 Act apply: there can be fraud with intent to gain/cause loss of land, wild animals and flora, but they cannot be stolen.

Loss or gain

In most cases 'an intention to gain' and an 'intention to cause loss' will go hand in hand; V's loss will be D's gain. The phrase, 'intent to cause loss' is not, however, superfluous. There may be circumstances in which D intends to cause a loss to V without any corresponding gain to D, for example where D lies to V to pay X. Problems arose in some cases under the old law because the deception might cause a gain which did not correspond to a loss.⁵⁶

The consequence of making the intentions alternative⁵⁷ sufficient bases for liability is that the general fraud offence is even broader than may appear. For example, D who starts a false rumour that V is going out of business, commits the s 2 form of the offence if he does so with intent to lead customers away from V, intending by those actions that V will lose or be exposed to a risk of loss and is regarded as dishonest in doing so.⁵⁸ There is no requirement that D seeks to gain by these actions. It is debatable whether such conduct ought properly to be described as a criminal fraud.

⁵² See Wright [1960] Crim LR 366; Griffiths [1966] 1 QB 589, [1965] 2 All ER 448; Talbot [1995] Crim LR 396.

⁵³ cf in particular their use in relation to false accounting, the Theft Act 1968, s 17, p 987. They are also used in the Trade Marks Act 1994.

⁵⁴ See Ch 17, p 843.

⁵⁵ See Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 32 (Solicitor General).

⁵⁶ The Guinness case was one famous example of this. See Saunders [1996] Cr App R 463, and more generally, N Kochan and H Pym, The Guinness Affair (1987).

⁵⁷ C Withey, 'The Fraud Act 2006' (2007) 71 J Crim L 220 suggests that both an intent to gain and an intent to cause loss must be proved, but this is difficult to square with the words of the section.

⁵⁸ See LC 276, para 4.13.

Intention

Intention should bear its ordinary meaning, and should extend as elsewhere in the criminal law to include the foresight of a virtually certain consequence.⁵⁹ This may be significant in extending the scope of the offences.⁶⁰

22.2.4.3 Remoteness

Although the fraud offence is not a result-based crime, the element of intent to gain/cause loss does involve a causal link that must be established. Under s 2, for example, it is ‘by the’ false representation that D must intend to make the gain or cause the loss. This prompts the question: how remote can D’s intentions be? Suppose that D makes false representations to induce V, a wealthy banker, to marry him. Is D guilty of the s 2 offence if one intention is to enrich himself? Presumably such matters will be left to the jury to determine.⁶¹ The importance of this element of the offence has already been emphasized by the Court of Appeal. In Gilbert,⁶² G, S and H were charged with various offences including fraud contrary to s 2 for dishonestly making false representations in support of an application to open a bank account. H dishonestly informed the bank that savings and assets were also going to be used along with the loan to fund property developments. Subsequently, they defaulted on payments to a supplier and were charged with a fraud based on the false representation made to the bank to open the account. The recorder directed the jury that they could convict if the intent was to make the gain either by the false representations to the bank in opening the account or by their subsequent property business.

The Court of Appeal quashed G’s conviction, with Roderick Evans J stating that:

The jury must, therefore, be sure that the defendant intended to make a gain or cause loss or exposure to loss by making the false representation and it is a matter for the jury on the facts of each case whether the causative link between the intention and the making of the false representation, required by the section, is established.⁶³

Despite the fact that there might have been a false representation to the bank, there was no evidence that it was by that falsity that G intended to gain or cause a loss.⁶⁴

There are other circumstances where this issue could arise.⁶⁵ One obvious example is where D makes a number of representations in relation to a sale: for example, that a car is a genuine VW, that it has a specific mileage and that it has had one careful owner. Can D argue that the final representation, though false, is not one by which he intended to make a gain? This may well become subsumed within his plea of a lack of dishonesty, but it is a distinct element of the offence and deserves to be drawn to the jury’s attention. The jury will properly have regard to all the circumstances. The fact that the representation relates to a peripheral matter will not entitle the defendant to an acquittal.⁶⁶ What is in issue is ⁵⁹ See Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1414 (Attorney General). Cf the definition advanced by the House of Lords in the context of murder in Woollin [1998] AC 82.

⁶⁰ See the explanation of the concept in Ch 3.

⁶¹ The Court of Appeal seems reluctant to impose clear rules of remoteness in criminal law contexts. See eg Kennedy (No 2) [2005] EWCA Crim 785, cf the decision of the House of Lords [2008] UKHL 37. In Idress [2011] EWHC 624 (Admin), a conviction under s 2 was upheld where D had persuaded X to sit his driving test for him representing himself to be D. Presumably the property D was to gain was the driving licence.

⁶² [2012] EWCA Crim 2392. ⁶³ At [29].

⁶⁴ The false representation was to secure the opening of an account which might not constitute ‘property’ for the purposes of s 1 depending on the terms of the account.

⁶⁵ See the correspondence between Ormerod and Gardner [2007] Crim LR 661.

⁶⁶ A proposal that the misrepresentation must be a ‘material’ one was expressly rejected by the A-G during the debates: Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, cols 1419–1420. See also Lancaster [2010] EWCA Crim 370 on the element of materiality not needing to be causal in false accounting—p 985.

solely a matter of D's intent. It seems then to be a question of fact and degree in every case whether what was said was intended to be a misrepresentation by which the gain or loss would be made.

The jury would have to be sure under, for example, s 2 that: (a) D made a representation that was untrue or misleading, and in relation to that representation;⁶⁷ (b) D knew it was or might have been false; and (c) that D made the representation dishonestly; and (d) that D, by making that representation, intended to make a gain/cause loss, etc.

The problem may be dealt with more easily where D has made two or more false representations. In such a case, the Crown may incorporate all the representations in one count indicting the conduct as, for example, 'falsely representing the details of the car for sale' and rely on the two statements (original form of vehicle and previous ownership) as evidence of the dishonest intent to gain. Prosecutors will wrap up a number of representations in one count. In a long-running investment fraud this matter might be critical and inhibit the defendant's case, especially if he wants to deny causal intent. It risks a 'Brown problem':⁶⁸ six jurors might think that D is guilty because of representation A and six because of representation B.

Things are more straightforward where D uses a false representation in order to secure a contract, and intends to fulfil the terms of the contract and give value for money. To be liable in such a case, the Crown have to show that D acted in order to, or foresaw that, it was virtually certain that his conduct in making the false representation would lead him to, gain. There are numerous instances of convictions under the Act for D making a false representation as to his eligibility to work in the UK, securing employment and working to be paid⁶⁹ or even making false representations as to having a clean driving licence which was a prerequisite for the job.⁷⁰

Claims of entitlement to the gain

It is not necessarily a good defence that D believes he has a right to the gain or loss he seeks. If he has such a belief, then he might not be dishonest, given that the Supreme Court confirmed in Ivey that the tribunal of fact must first ascertain (subjectively) the actual state of the defendant's knowledge or belief as to the facts before considering whether he was dishonest according to the standards of ordinary decent people.⁷¹ The defendant still has the intention to gain (and/or to cause loss). Should it be fraud for A to lie to B to get back money owed to him? Authority on the construction of the same expression in false accounting⁷² suggests that liability will arise. The Court of Appeal has held that the element of intent to gain is also satisfied by proof of an intention to 'acquire' even that property to which D is entitled. A fortiori, there will be a relevant intention where D genuinely though mistakenly believes that he is entitled to the gain (or to cause the loss). Such cases will be rare. Greater emphasis will therefore be placed on the dishonesty element.

Arguably, the definition in s 5 is too wide since it criminalizes the situation where D intends V not to get something which V might have gained, even though V was not entitled to it. For example, under s 2, if V asks D for a loan and D denies it him by saying falsely (dishonestly?) that he has no money to spare, D has made a false representation with intent ⁶⁷ Each representation if there are many charged.

⁶⁸ See Brown (1984) 79 Cr App R 115.

⁶⁹ See Dziruni [2008] EWCA Crim 667; Haboub [2007] EWCA Crim 3327.

⁷⁰ Asif [2008] EWCA Crim 3348. ⁷¹ [2017] UKSC 67, [74].

⁷² A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] Crim LR 844.

to cause V not to gain that which he might⁷³ have obtained.⁷⁴ V has at most suffered a loss of a chance. D might avoid liability by arguing that a simple refusal, however malicious or dishonest, is not a 'representation' but an explanation for the refusal. Even if it is a representation, D might claim that the words were not intended to cause loss or damage but designed solely to ease the loss and damage caused by the refusal. D's additional, or alternative, excuse is that he is probably not going to be regarded as dishonest in those circumstances.⁷⁵

Criminal liability seems broad, including as it does making a misleading statement with intent to cause someone to be exposed to the risk of temporarily not being able to get that which he might otherwise have got. How will the prosecution prove the intention to cause loss by not getting what one might get? Is it enough in practice that D believes that there was a chance that V would make a gain?

Exposure to temporary loss

Unlike theft, there is no requirement that D acts with intent to deprive V permanently of any property. It would seem to be sufficient under s 2, for example, that D makes a false representation to V with intent to cause V to lend D property⁷⁶ which D intends to return in an unaltered form. The offence comes close to criminalizing dishonest deprivation of the value of an item's usefulness. This strains the property-based foundation of the offence. It supports the argument that the offence is one centred on the wrong of lying.⁷⁷

Intention to expose another to a risk of loss

It is sufficient that D intends that V will be exposed to the risk of loss; there is no need for the Crown to prove that D had a more specific intention that V will actually lose. D who makes a dishonest false representation on his health insurance form will be liable (under s 2). He intends the insurance company to be exposed to a risk of loss, even though he desperately hopes that he will remain healthy and the insurance company will not incur actual loss. He also intends to deny them the higher premium to which they are entitled.

D, who makes a false statement in a job reference for V, will be liable if he intends that V will thereby not be promoted and attain the higher salary appropriate to that post.

22.3 Section 2: fraud by false representation

The offence created by s 1(2)(a) of the Act is incredibly broad. This offence is described in s 2, which provides:

- (1) A person is in breach of this section if he—
 - (a) dishonestly makes a false representation, and
 - (b) intends, by making the representation—
 - (i) to make a gain for himself or another, or
 - (ii) to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss.

⁷³ The offence would have been much tighter with a requirement that D intended that loss/gain would occur.

⁷⁴ See GR Sullivan, 'Fraud and Efficiency in the Criminal Law' [1985] Crim LR 616.

⁷⁵ See Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, cols 33–35.

⁷⁶ Even that to which D is already entitled. Cf Zemmel [1985] Crim LR 213, and the Law Commission Working Paper on Conspiracy to Defraud (1988) para 4.4 rejecting this as a sufficient basis for criminal liability.

⁷⁷ See D Ormerod, 'Criminalising Lying' [2007] Crim LR 193; cf J Horder (2011) 127 LQR 37.

- (2) A representation is false if—
 - (a) it is untrue or misleading, and
 - (b) the person making it knows that it is, or might be, untrue or misleading.
- (3) ‘Representation’ means any representation as to fact or law, including a representation as to the state of mind of—
 - (a) the person making the representation, or
 - (b) any other person.
- (4) A representation may be express or implied.
- (5) For the purposes of this section a representation may be regarded as made if it (or anything implying it) is submitted in any form to any system or device designed to receive, convey or respond to communications (with or without human intervention).

Section 1 provides that the maximum sentence on indictment is ten years’ imprisonment.

The actus reus requires proof that D: made a representation, which is untrue or misleading, and the mens rea requires proof that D knew the representation was, or knew that it might be, false, and he acted dishonestly in making that representation, and with intent to gain or cause loss or expose to a risk of loss.

22.3.1 Conduct-based offence

Crucial to an understanding of the operation and scope of the offence is an appreciation of the conduct-based nature of liability.⁷⁸ Under the old law,⁷⁹ it had to be proved that D’s conduct actually deceived V and caused V to do whatever act was appropriate to the offence charged. Under s 2, there is no need to prove: a result of any kind; that the alleged victim or indeed any person believed any representation; that any person acted on a representation; or that D succeeded in making a gain or causing a loss by the representation.

This shift from a result-based to conduct-based offence has numerous other practical implications. The principal aim is to make the offence easier to prove, and there is little doubt that in most cases this objective will be achieved. The effect is that D may be liable for the false representations even where they had no bearing on V.⁸⁰

Classic problems which recurred under the old law are greatly diminished, if not eradicated. For example, in Laverty,⁸¹ a case under s 15 of the 1968 Act, D changed the number plates and chassis identification plate of a car and sold it to V. It was held that by his conduct D represented that the car was the original car to which these numbers had been assigned; but D’s conviction for obtaining the price of the car by deception from V was quashed on the ground that it was not proved that the deception operated on V’s mind. There was no direct evidence to that effect—V said he bought the car because he thought D was the owner—and ⁷⁸ It has been argued that the new fraud offence is a substantive offence drafted in the inchoate mode defined in such a way as to penalize conduct before it reaches the stage of causing harm. See A Ashworth and L Zedner, Preventive Justice (2014) 97–98. Horder suggests that the inchoate mode is common among acquisitive offences. See J Horder, ‘Harmless Wrongdoing and the Anticipatory Perspective on Criminalisation’ in GR Sullivan and I Dennis (eds), Seeking Security: Pre-Emptying the Commission of Criminal Harms (2012).

⁷⁹ Even under the pre-1968 law, it was necessary to show that the false pretences caused the loss. Cf S Farrell, N Yeo and G Ladenbury who suggest that the 2006 Act is a return to the pre-1968 position—Blackstone’s Guide to the Fraud Act 2006 (2007) para 1.09.

⁸⁰ This passage in the 14th edition of this work was cited with approval by Gross LJ in Proctor v The Chief Constable of Cleveland Police [2017] EWCA Civ 1531, [41].

⁸¹ [1970] 3 All ER 432. Cf Talbot [1995] Crim LR 396.

it was not a necessary inference.⁸² Under s 2 of the 2006 Act, the offence is committed as soon as D dishonestly changes the number plate or at the latest offered it for sale with intent to gain.

22.3.1.1 Time of commission of the offence

One of the most important consequences of the shift to a conduct-based offence is that the s 2 crime is complete before the point in time at which any person acts in response to the false representation (as would have been required for a deception offence). A s 2 offence may also be completed later in time. For example, under the s 2 offence D can be liable if he makes a false representation after the entire proprietary interest has passed to him. If, after D, a motorist, fills his tank so that the entire proprietary interest in the fuel has passed to him, he falsely represents to V, the garage cashier, that it will be paid for by D's employer, he commits the offence irrespective of the fact that the property in the petrol has passed.⁸³ He intends by the dishonest false representation about payment to cause loss to the garage.

22.3.1.2 A victimless crime?

No specific victim(s) need to be identified, because no loss needs to have been incurred and no person needs to have believed or acted on D's representation.⁸⁴ The fact that D must have acted with the intention to gain or cause loss⁸⁵ means, however, that the offence will remain focused on the potential effect a false representation might have had on the economic interests of others.

Under the old law, the normal way of proving that a deception was relied on was to call V to say that he had relied on it. Under s 2, there is clearly no need to call a victim since there need be no result. In most instances, prosecutors may still prefer to call a victim or intended victim who can give unequivocal evidence of the representation being made and the surrounding circumstances which will support the allegations that it was made dishonestly, with knowledge as to its falsity and with intent to gain or cause loss. It remains possible, as under the old law, to invite the jury to infer that the false representation was made without calling evidence of that fact from a victim.⁸⁶

22.3.2 Actus reus

22.3.2.1 'Makes a representation'

Whether a representation is made is a question of fact for the jury.

⁸² The court did not substitute a conviction for an attempt, possibly because there was also insufficient evidence that D intended to deceive V into buying the car by this representation. The purpose of changing the plates may well have been not to deceive the buyer but to deceive the police, the true owner and anyone else who might identify the vehicle. It would have been better to allege that D had made a representation by conduct that he had a right to sell the car.

⁸³ cf under the old law Collis-Smith [1971] Crim LR 716, CA. He may also be guilty of making off without payment. See Ch 21.

⁸⁴ On this concept, see H Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968) 151–152. Packer suggests that victimless crimes pose a peculiar problem for criminal justice because the State is more likely to resort to the use of covert surveillance. Unlike the paradigm examples offered by Packer, fraud is not a 'victimless crime'. Rather, by bringing forward in time the completion of the actus reus of the offence (ie completion being as soon as the relevant representation is made, the offence is committed without the requirement that anyone actually believes it, let alone acts on it), Parliament has therefore created a victimless crime that is quite unlike the traditional understanding of 'fraud'.

⁸⁵ See p 913.

⁸⁶ See eg Greig [2010] EWCA Crim 1183 in which the reason for the payments by the vulnerable V to the 'cowboy' builders were plain enough for the conviction to be safe.

By whom representation may be made

The offence can be committed by any 'person' who makes a false representation. Clearly, this can include a corporation as where a false representation is contained in a corporation's prospectus for potential investors.⁸⁷

D will be liable for his personal representations. He might also be liable for representations of third parties which he can be said unambiguously to have adopted as, for example, where a manager adopts statements made by his predecessor.

It is important also to recall the significance of the fact that it is sufficient under s 2 that D intends either to gain or to cause loss. If D offers a credit card for payment for goods in a shop, he makes a representation to the shopkeeper that payment will be made and that he has the authority to use the card.⁸⁸ If the latter representation is false but D knows that the shop will be paid by the credit card company, D still commits the offence. He is making a false representation to the retailer with intent to cause loss/expose to a risk of loss the credit card company (if they pay) or the retailer (if the credit card company will not pay because, for example, the card is outside the expiry date and the shop ought to have refused it).⁸⁹ However, only one offence is created despite the different elements of intent to gain, intent to cause loss and intent to expose to a risk of loss.

When is a representation made?

Potential difficulties with this element of timing may arise. It could be argued that the representation is made either: (a) as soon as D articulates it; (b) only if it is also addressed to something; or (c) only when it is actually perceived as such by a person, that is, when it is communicated. If D stands alone in the middle of an empty market and shouts 'Guaranteed solid gold watch for sale', if the watch is not solid gold and D knows that it is not, he is making a false statement, but is it a representation? Under the old law, where D had to cause V to believe the representation, the issue did not arise because there had to be a completed communication.

It is significant that the Act uses the term 'representation' rather than 'communication'.⁹⁰ The latter term would ordinarily imply that there was a recipient of the statement which D made, even if that recipient ignored the statement completely. However, even that restrictive interpretation of the concept of communication cannot be asserted beyond doubt. In DPP v Collins,⁹¹ the House of Lords held that the offence of making a grossly offensive communication⁹² could be committed even if no person was in receipt of the communication. It is submitted that under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006 there need not be a completed communication in the sense that a person must read or hear or see D's statement in order for it to constitute a representation. A representation would seem to be 'made' as soon as articulated, but in accordance with the ordinary use of the word, a representation must be made 'to' someone or something. A representation could include a statement being made to the whole world.⁹³

⁸⁷ Such representations were already criminalized by the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, s 397. Within that section a distinction was made between recklessly and knowingly making a false statement. See Bailey [2005] EWCA Crim 3487. Section 397 has been repealed and replaced by the Financial Services Act 2012, s 89, in similar terms.

⁸⁸ See p 947. For a case in which D was convicted based upon similar facts, see Ahmed [2016] EWCA Crim 104.

⁸⁹ See further p 947.

⁹⁰ cf C Withey, 'The Fraud Act 2006' (2007) 71 J Crim L 220, suggesting that the offence is not committed unless a communication is completed. This is difficult to square with the statutory wording and intent.

⁹¹ [2006] UKHL 40, [2006] 1 WLR 2223.

⁹² Communications Act 2003, s 127.

⁹³ See Silverlock [1894] 2 QB 766, CCCR (fraudulent advert in newspaper).

If this interpretation is correct, it will typically render the full offence complete far earlier in time than would have been possible with deception offences.

Representations to machines

The prevailing opinion under the old law was that it is not possible in law to deceive a machine.⁹⁴ 'To deceive is . . . to induce a man to believe that a thing is true which is false, and which the person practising the deceit knows or believes to be false.'⁹⁵ Where D obtained property, etc as the result of some dishonest practice on a machine, without the intervention of a human mind, he could not be guilty of an obtaining offence.⁹⁶ Under the old law the only option was an offence of, for example, making off without payment contrary to s 3(1) of the 1978 Act. Now, D might commit the s 11 offence considered later in the chapter.

The problem of how to criminalize the 'deception' of a machine became an acute one as businesses relied increasingly on automated facilities to pay by credit card via automated telephone systems and the internet.⁹⁷ Such activity is not restricted to the consumer context. In Holmes,⁹⁸ for example, D faced extradition for his conduct when, as an official in a German bank, he had dishonestly used a co-worker's password to credit an account under his control in a Dutch bank. The entirely automated banking practice, of which the court took judicial notice, was such that the transfer was not complete until the Dutch bank received confirmation from the German bank. In that case, the court observed that the old authorities including, in particular, Davies v Flackett,⁹⁹ were not strictly binding authority for the proposition that deception of a machine or computer is not a deception, but accepted that the general view is that it is not possible to deceive a machine.¹⁰⁰ The court regarded this as regrettable and urged a new offence of theft or some cognate offence to deal with the problem. Sections 1(2) and 11 of the 2006 Act do so.

To ensure that such conduct is within the scope of s 2, the government introduced an amendment to cl 2 to include any statements made to machines and computers as where D types in his PIN on a chip and PIN device.¹⁰¹ Section 2(5) now provides:

For the purposes of this section a representation may be regarded as made if it (or anything implying it) is submitted in any form to any system or device designed to receive, convey or respond to communications (with or without human intervention).

⁹⁴ Griew, Theft, paras 8–12; see also Williams, TBCL, 794 and Smith, Property Offences, para 11.02. Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, para 4.072. Some devices used to operate machines are now 'instruments' for the purposes of the law of forgery. See also I Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations (2016) paras 3.89–3.92. See, however, the first instance civil decision of HHJ Seymour QC concluding that an action for deceit can be founded on lies told to a machine: Renault UK v Fleetpro Technical Service [2007] EWHC 2541 (QB).

⁹⁵ Re London and Globe Finance Corp'n Ltd [1903] 1 Ch 728 at 732. Deceit can be practised only on a human mind: (1972) Law Soc Gaz 576 and Law Com WP 56, at 51.

⁹⁶ cf the decision of the Administrative Court in Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWHC 2673 (Admin) in which Roderick Evans J was prepared to assume that an ATM machine could not be deceived by D using his own card beyond its overdraft limit, at [32]. This did not preclude D from being guilty of theft, however. In Chodorek v Poland [2017] EWHC 995 (Admin), Sir Wyn Williams followed Ulatowski and held that D commits theft by using a debit card to withdraw cash from an ATM at a time when he knows that he has no funds in his account and no overdraft agreement to cover the amount withdrawn.

⁹⁷ Following implementation of the Fraud Act 2006, offences involving theft from an automatic machine using a plastic card are now regarded, and recorded, as false representation (cheque, plastic card and online banks).

⁹⁸ [2004] EWHC 2020 (Admin), [2005] Crim LR 229 and commentary. ⁹⁹ [1974] RTR 8.

¹⁰⁰ A passage from the 11th edition of this work, pp 754–755, which stated this proposition was cited with approval by the Administrative Court in Mikolajczak v Poland [2013] EWHC 432 (Admin).

¹⁰¹ Hansard, HL, 14 Mar 2006, col 1108 (Attorney General).

Section 2(5) is not without its difficulties. Aside from the complexity of the drafting, difficulties also stem from the breadth of the subsection. The terms used in s 2(5) were obviously intended to provide the broadest scope of liability, but they are not unambiguous. For example, is a document 'submitted' when the defendant saves the typing to his hard drive on the computer, or is it only 'submitted' when he sends it via email? There is a clear argument for suggesting that the document is submitted as soon as D saves it. However, if that is the case, how is it any different from D who writes his false representation on a piece of paper and locks it in his safe? That does not seem like a representation, but it is difficult to distinguish it from the case of saving data to a hard drive. Arguably, the individual who has submitted it to his computer is in a position in which he may more readily communicate it, but that mere possibility does not adequately justify any difference in criminality. The legislature might have intended to criminalize the conduct only when the representation was submitted to the ISP or system designed to act on it, but the subsection is not so narrowly drafted.

The criminal courts may follow the much narrower approach adopted in e-commerce. In business-to-business contracts it seems to be accepted that all contractually relevant communications only have operative effect when they are received.¹⁰² In other contexts, it has been argued that the normal 'postal rule' of contract applies in relation to email contact so that the time of acceptance is the time when the electronic message was received by the ISP's network, and the place of acceptance is therefore that 'node' of the network which received the message. The courts have permitted contracting parties to stipulate in advance where and when the relevant communications will have legal effect.¹⁰³ The implications are important. Consider D who types his false statements into a document on his computer and proposes to send that document to V later via email. If by saving it he has 'submitted' it in a form to a device designed to receive, etc he commits the offence at that point, even though it has not yet been released from D's control. For example, suppose D intends to circulate his investment brochure full of false statements by email at 8 am the following day, and he puts his false prospectus in a 'draft mail to be sent' folder.¹⁰⁴

Section 2(5) clearly extends the meaning of representation in cases involving 'submission to any system or device designed to receive, convey or respond to communications (with or without human intervention)', but what of those in which there is no 'submission' to such a system or device?¹⁰⁵ Is the concept of representation to be given an equally broad interpretation? What of the case in which D simply writes his representation on a piece of paper. Has he at that time made a representation? It is submitted that s 2(5) must be regarded as informing the general interpretation of the word representation. There is no need for completed communication to V. It suggests, implicitly, that there is no requirement that a representation should be addressed to anyone specifically, or to a human being, provided of course that it is addressed to someone or something.

There will be few instances where this element of s 2 will give rise to problems in practice. There is no doubt that if D makes a statement otherwise than to a system or device as defined in s 2(5), and it cannot be proved that it was represented to someone or something, D may nevertheless be liable for an attempted offence under s 1(2)(a) and s 2.

¹⁰² C Reed, Computer Law (2012).

¹⁰³ ibid.

¹⁰⁴ In such a case, could D also argue that he was not intending by that representation to make a gain or cause loss? This is unlikely to succeed as a plea: D does intend to gain by that representation eventually—when it is sent ¹⁰⁵ Neither term is further defined. Presumably the government was anxious not to use terminology which might become outdated or too difficult to define as, eg, with 'computer'.

Attempted representation?

Since the s 2 form of the fraud offence can be committed as soon as D has dishonestly made a false representation, there is only limited scope for a charge of attempt. Possible examples include where D, having prepared documents containing false statements, is apprehended en route to post those to V. It may be that liability for the full offence arises even earlier if D decides to make his representations via a 'system' as defined in s 2(5) discussed above.

The most important circumstances in which an attempt will be charged may well be those in which D has unwittingly made a true statement. In Deller,¹⁰⁶ D induced V to purchase his car by representing, inter alia, that it was free from encumbrances, that is, that D had ownership and was free to sell it. In fact, D had previously executed a document that purported to mortgage the car to a finance company and, no doubt, he thought he was telling a lie. He was charged with obtaining by false pretences.¹⁰⁷ However, the document by which the transaction had been effected was probably void in law for the technical reason that it was as an unregistered bill of sale. If the document was void the car was free from encumbrances: 'quite accidentally and, strange as it may sound, dishonestly, the appellant had told the truth'.¹⁰⁸ D's conviction was, therefore, quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal, for, though he had mens rea, no actus reus had been established. Under the 2006 Act, D could be convicted of an attempted fraud as soon as he made the true representation with intent.

The Court of Appeal agreed with this interpretation in Cornelius.¹⁰⁹ D was convicted of a number of counts of fraud and money laundering. It transpired, however, that the very technical representations he made were in fact true. The Court of Appeal quashed his convictions and confirmed that he could be guilty of attempting the offences.

Where the representation occurs

The actus reus requires that a representation is made, and hence the offence should be regarded as occurring in the place in which D acts in making that representation. The discussion earlier is pertinent. A representation may be articulated and received at different locations and even in different jurisdictions.

Representations by words, conduct or other means

The most obvious forms of the offence will involve D's physical action in the form of oral or written representations. D satisfies the 'making' element of the offence as much by saying to a customer: 'this is a genuine Chippendale chair I have for sale' as by describing the chair in those terms in his catalogue. The offence will catch false representations on mortgage application forms, or loan application forms,¹¹⁰ or as to the need for building work to be performed on an elderly person's home;¹¹¹ or by falsifying documents relating to a will¹¹² or by use of false identity documents to secure work.¹¹³ In Formhals, for example, D was convicted of falsely representing that various items of memorabilia were signed by Winston Churchill, when in fact the signatures were forged by him.¹¹⁴ The s 2 form of the offence is also designed to tackle 'phishing' on the internet. D who posts on the internet a website purporting to be that of a bank or financial institution, encouraging account holders to reveal

¹⁰⁶ (1952) 36 Cr App R 184. Cf Brien (1903) 3 SRNSW 410; Dyson [1908] 2 KB 454.

¹⁰⁷ Under the Larceny Act 1916, s 32. The same principles are applicable.

¹⁰⁸ (1952) 36 Cr App R 184 at 191. ¹⁰⁹ [2012] EWCA Crim 500.

¹¹⁰ See cases under the Act including: Viera [2009] EWCA Crim 528; Cleps [2009] EWCA Crim 894.

¹¹¹ See eg Cowan [2007] EWCA Crim 3402; Hamilton [2008] EWCA Crim 2518.

¹¹² Hursthouse [2011] EWCA Crim 3064.

¹¹³ See eg Kapitene [2010] EWCA Crim 2061; Haboub [2007] EWCA Crim 3320.

¹¹⁴ [2013] EWCA Crim 2624.

their passwords and confidential information, will commit the offence. It does not matter that the website is ignored by everyone; a false representation has been made.

Forms of physical conduct other than speech or writing will suffice as where D nods assent in response to the question 'Is this a genuine Chippendale chair?' Conduct was capable of providing a relevant representation for the deception offences, and some of the old authorities remain valuable. In Barnard,¹¹⁵ D went into an Oxford shop wearing a fellow-commoner's cap and gown. He induced the shopkeeper to sell him goods on credit by an express representation that he was a student; but Bolland B said, obiter, that he would have been guilty even if he had said nothing: he was making an implied representation that he was a student. In an Australian case,¹¹⁶ the wearing of a badge was held to be a 'false pretence' when it indicated that the wearer was entitled to take bets on a racecourse. This would seem to constitute a 'representation'. Similarly, wearing a false press badge to gain entry to a sporting event or a members' tie in order to gain entry to the enclosure at Lords may constitute representations. There will remain some forms of conduct which give rise to doubt—is it enough that D represents that he is authorized to be 'present' in a virtual place, by having logged on illicitly to a website or secure terminal? The representation is not, of course, the entire offence—there must be a dishonest intention to gain or cause loss in terms of property for a completed offence (see p 933).

In early versions of the Bill the definition of 'representation' expressly referred to the fact that it could be by 'words or conduct' but that term is omitted from the section as enacted. Almost all representations will be by words or conduct, but Parliament's deletion of that expression raises the question whether the offence might also be committed by silent inaction.

Representation by omission/continuing representations

A simple example of a representation by omission is provided by the CPS: where D omits 'to mention previous convictions or County Court Judgments on an application form'.¹¹⁷ It seems clear that D would be falsely representing himself as being of 'good character or financial probity'. This could, of course, be seen as a case of positive action—completing a form with false information.¹¹⁸

The interrelationship between ss 2 and 3 is important in considering representations by omission. Section 3 of the Act criminalizes failing to disclose information. However, s 3 is limited to cases in which D is under a 'legal duty' to disclose information; a broad reading of s 2 would not be so limited. Several scenarios deserve to be considered in more detail. An important distinction always to bear in mind is that if D made a representation as to a future event (eg a future payment) and he never intended to keep the promise he made, that will be a false representation under s 2.¹¹⁹ In contrast, if D breaks his promise but at the time he made that promise there was no false representation as to his state of mind (ie at the time he made it he intended to pay), he will not commit a section 2 offence.

The first scenario to examine is where D has not actively misrepresented any fact or opinion to V, but realizes that V is acting under a misconception as to the matters D has expressed. D may be liable under s 3 only if he is under a legal duty to correct V's error. In considering D's potential liability under s 2, it is important that the criminal law reflects the civil law's caveat emptor principle. Liability for the failure to remedy V's misunderstanding of non-false statements ought to be restricted to that which may arise under s 3

¹¹⁵ (1837) 7 C & P 784. ¹¹⁶ Robinson (1884) 10 VLR 131.

¹¹⁷ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

¹¹⁸ See eg D [2012] EWCA Crim 2181.

¹¹⁹ See eg Shabbir [2012] EWCA Crim 1482.

where D has a legal duty to disclose.¹²⁰ Support for this approach derives from the Attorney General in early parliamentary debates on the Bill, when the A-G accepted that there are occasions when:

something that most of us naturally might think of as a non-disclosure is transformed by a fiction of the law into an implicit misrepresentation. But it is a fiction; it is not how people think about it. People will frequently say, 'I was not misled because I understand that he was implicitly making this representation to me. He just did not disclose something; he was dishonest in not disclosing it; and the purpose of that was to make a gain or to do something else'. One can think of many other examples where that would be the true basis on which a charge would be laid.¹²¹

Under the old deception offences, in Firth,¹²² a consultant was held to have deceived a hospital by failing to inform the hospital that certain patients were private patients. D knew that the effect would be that the patients would be treated on the NHS and not have to pay. The court apparently regarded an omission in breach of D's duty as 'conduct' for the purposes of determining whether there was a deception.¹²³ Under the 2006 Act this would be an offence under s 3 as he had a legal duty to inform the employer.¹²⁴ Would the courts conclude that D was making an implied false representation, rendering him liable under s 2? For the sake of clarity and to keep the criminal law on a more certain footing, it is submitted that such cases ought not to be within the scope of s 2.

A second scenario is where D makes a representation to V which is not false within the meaning in s 2 but subsequently, to D's knowledge but not V's, circumstances change in a way that materially affects the accuracy of D's original representation. Where D is under a legal duty to disclose the change in circumstances to V (eg in a contract of insurance) he will be liable under s 3, but the question remains whether in those cases in which D is not under a legal duty, he ought to be liable under s 2. Might D be said to be impliedly making a fresh, and now false, representation? Can D's conduct be seen as amounting to a continuing representation that is false? Under the old law, in DPP v Ray,¹²⁵ it was established that D who enters a restaurant and orders a meal impliedly represents that he intends to pay for the meal before leaving,¹²⁶ and probably also represents, in the absence of an agreement for credit, that he has the money to pay.¹²⁷ In that case, D's implied representation was true when made and continued to be true until the end of the meal, but when D changed his mind and decided to leave without paying it became false. Under the 1968 Act, it was essential to prove that V acted on the false representation and that the result of V acting was that D obtained the property or the service as the case may be.¹²⁸ It was held that the waiter acted on the false statement by leaving the room thereby allowing D an opportunity to leave, when he would not have done so had he known the truth, that D intended to leave without paying. Importantly for present purposes, Lord Pearson referred to there being a continuing representation: 'By 'continuing representation' I mean in this case not a continuing effect of an initial representation, but a representation which is being made by conduct at every moment throughout that course of conduct . . .'

¹²⁰ See eg Chitty on Contracts (32nd edn, 2017) Ch 6.

¹²¹ Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, cols 1411–1412.

¹²² (1989) 91 Cr App R 217, CA, [1990] Crim LR 326, and commentary. Cf Shama [1990] 1 WLR 661, CA.

¹²³ And s 4 (if there was an expectation that D would not act contrary to the financial interests of the hospital).

¹²⁴ Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597.

¹²⁵ [1974] AC 370; Nordeng (1975) 62 Cr App R 123 at 129, CA.

¹²⁶ DPP v Ray [1974] AC 370 at 379, 382, 385, 388, 391.

¹²⁷ ibid, 379, 382.

¹²⁸ It was accepted that if D had decided only once the waiter left the room that he would not pay and then made off while the waiter was out of the room, he would not have committed the offence. On the facts, D's continued presence was essential to the prosecution's case.

The Administrative Court considered this issue with reference to s 2 in Government of the United Arab Emirates v Allen.¹²⁹ A obtained a loan from a bank in Abu Dhabi in order to buy a property. A agreed to repay the loan in monthly instalments that were to be taken from her account with the bank. A provided the bank with a post-dated check that they could cash in order to recoup the amount if she defaulted on the loan. (This was standard banking practice in the UAE.) Some months later A defaulted but when the bank presented the cheque there were, unsurprisingly, insufficient funds in her account to honour it. This constituted an offence in the UAE and the issue for the Administrative Court was whether it would also constitute an offence in England and Wales so that A could be extradited. Counsel for the UAE sought to argue that this would be a fraud under s 2 as there was a continuing representation made by A that there were sufficient funds in her account to honour the cheque. Toulson LJ rejected the analogy with Ray. A gave no undertaking to the bank that she would inform it of any changes in her financial circumstances after it had advanced the loan monies and there was no basis for construing an implied representation to this effect into the loan agreement. His lordship went on to observe that: 'Implied representations are legal constructs intended to give effect to that which honest parties involved in a transaction would reasonably read into the conduct of the other.' Although there might be cases in which there is a duty to inform the representee if there is a change of circumstances, such as in the course of contractual negotiations, this was not one of them.¹³⁰

A third scenario for potential application of s 2 and or 3 is that where D makes a false representation but at the time he makes it he believes it to be true. If D discovers that the statement is false and thereafter does not seek to rectify any misunderstanding, might he be liable?¹³¹ The resolution of this issue is not self-evident because of the manner in which s 2 is drafted. At the time of making the representation, D makes a statement which is inaccurate (untrue or misleading), but it is not false under s 2 unless at that time D also knows that it is or might be false. The falsity of the statement is dependent on proof of an element of mens rea. If D believes he is making a true statement then, for the purposes of s 2, there is no false statement actually made. To avoid this problem, the courts would have to interpret the concept of representation as being a continuing one. For the reasons expressed by Toulson LJ above, they may be reluctant to do so.

As a matter of general principle, it is submitted that considerable caution should be exercised in interpreting s 2 to prevent undesirable extension of the criminal law where D is neither responsible nor at fault in causing V to interpret the representation in an erroneous manner nor under a legal duty to disclose the fact of V's error. The criminal law ought to take its lead from the civil law. The maxim caveat emptor ought to operate to restrict the scope of liability. In commercial transactions, D, though under a duty to do nothing to confirm any misunderstanding by V, has no duty to correct it even though he is fully aware of it. '[T]he passive acquiescence of the seller in the self-deception of the buyer does not entitle the buyer to avoid the contract.'¹³² This ought not to amount to a s 2 offence and the Administrative Court seems to have accepted that it does not in Allen. It is possible for there to be liability in such circumstances if there is a continuing representation. Whether this is so depends upon the terms of the agreement between the two parties and the Administrative Court in Allen demonstrated a marked reluctance lightly to infer such a representation.¹³³ The CPS has issued important guidance on the public interest test in prosecuting frauds which states that:

¹²⁹ [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin).

¹³⁰ In Government of the United Arab Emirates v Amir [2012] EWHC 1711 (Admin), a case that was heard with Allen, the Administrative Court allowed the appeal against the District Judge's dismissal of an extradition request. It was held that there was a prima facie case of fraud against D. The different outcome between the two cases was due to differences in their facts. This demonstrates that in some circumstances there can be a continuing representation sufficient to found liability.

¹³¹ cf Rai [2000] 1 Cr App R 242 under the old law where D failed to inform the council that his mother had died and allowed them to continue their installation of disability aids to which he was not entitled. See a similar scenario in Ali [2006] All ER (D) 270 (May), where D was not in receipt of student support when applying for local authority benefit, but when he received student support he failed to disclose this change in circumstances to the local authority. The prosecution was under s 111A of the Social Security Administration Act 1992. See also R (Pearson) v Greenwich MC [2008] EWHC 300 (Admin). For an example of the nuances in its interpretation, see Croydon LBC v Shanahan [2010] EWCA Crim 98. See further Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, paras 4.053–4.054.

The borderline between criminal and civil liability is likely to be an issue in alleged Fraud Act offences particularly those under Section 1. Prosecutors should bear in mind that the principle of caveat emptor applies and should consider whether civil proceedings or the regulatory regime that applies to advertising and other commercial activities might be more appropriate. Not every advertising puff should lead to a criminal conviction but it is also the case that fraudsters prey on the vulnerable. Prosecutors should guard against the criminal law being used as a debt collection agency or to protect the commercial interests of companies and organisations. However, prosecutors should also remain alert to the fact that such organisations can become the focus of serious and organised criminal offending. The criminal law should not be used to protect private confidences.¹³⁴

A representation may be express or implied: s 2(4)

Section 2(4) was included late in the passage of the Bill through the House of Lords¹³⁵ for the avoidance of doubt. Express representations will rarely give rise to difficulty, at least where they relate to facts (as opposed to states of mind). Greater difficulty is likely to arise in interpreting 'implied' representations, judging by experiences with the old law. A person who registers as a guest in a hotel represents that he intends to pay the bill at the end of his stay.¹³⁶ A wine waiter employed at a hotel impliedly represents that the wine he offers is his employer's, not his own.¹³⁷ A car dealer who states that the mileage shown on the odometer of a second-hand car 'may not be correct' represents that he does not know it to be incorrect.¹³⁸ A bookmaker, it is submitted, represents, when he takes a bet, that he intends to pay if the horse backed wins.¹³⁹ A person who takes a taxi represents that he intends to pay, and has the means of paying, at the end of the ride.¹⁴⁰

Representations and cheques

When D offers a stolen cheque in payment for goods he is clearly making a false representation since he has no authority to draw the cheque in the first place. Where D offers a cheque on his own account in payment for goods he may also be committing a s 2 offence, but that will depend on identifying the false representation. He makes three implied representations: (a) that he has an account on which the cheque is drawn; (b) that he has authority to draw on the bank for that amount; and (c) that the state of facts existing at the time he ¹³² Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597.

¹³³ A different conclusion was reached in Government of the United Arab Emirates v Amir [2012] EWHC 1711 (Admin) due to differences in the facts and the terms of the agreement between the parties.

¹³⁴ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

¹³⁵ Hansard, HL, 14 Mar 2006, col 1107.

¹³⁶ Harris (1975) 62 Cr App R 28, CA.

¹³⁷ Doukas [1978] 1 All ER 1061, [1978] Crim LR 177, CA. The decision is to be preferred to Rashid [1977] 2 All ER 237, CA.

¹³⁸ King [1979] Crim LR 122.

¹³⁹ cf Buckmaster (1887) 20 QBD 182.

¹⁴⁰ cf Waterfall [1970] 1 QB 148 CA.

offers the cheque is that in the ordinary course of events payment will be made when it is presented by the recipient for payment.

This was the accepted orthodoxy from cases as early as Hazelton,¹⁴¹ where Pollock B stated that the representation is that 'the existing state of facts is such that in the ordinary course the cheque will be met'. In Gilmartin, the Court of Appeal thought that 'this terse but neat epitome of the representation . . . should properly be regarded as an authoritative statement of the law'.¹⁴²

Where D post-dates a cheque, his liability will depend on his state of mind at the time of offering the cheque. Toulson LJ in Government of the United Arab Emirates v Allen, stated:

To summarise, it is easy to see that a person who obtains goods or services by giving a cheque in payment which he knows that he is not going to be in a position to meet, but who does not disclose that fact to the supplier, carries out a form of deception. . . .

As a matter of common law, a representation must be capable of being expressed as a statement of the past or present. A statement which amounts only to a statement as to the future may have effect as a contractual promise, but it will not come within the legal classification of a representation. A promise may carry with it an implied statement as to the promisor's present intention and circumstances, but that is a representation of present fact.¹⁴³

If D genuinely believes that there will be funds in the account when it is presented for payment, he is not making a false representation at the time he offers the cheque. If D's state of mind at the time he offers the cheque is such that he has no belief that the cheque will be paid, he is making a false representation. As the Administrative Court made clear, when an individual presents a post-dated check as security for a loan, there is no general obligation to inform the lender if the balance in his account has dwindled such that the cheque may not be honoured. Of course, if there is a term in the loan agreement that requires disclosure of any change in circumstances, then D may be liable under s 3. Close attention needs to be paid to the terms of the agreement to ascertain whether D is liable.

Credit cards and debit cards

When a person presents his credit or debit card he makes a representation (a) that he has the authority to use that card, and (b) that payment will be made. Under the old law problems arose because the representation had to cause the obtaining. That difficulty is removed because under the 2006 Act the requirement is only that the representation that is made is false and D intends to gain/cause loss by that false representation. There are, however, two problems which do need to be considered.

The first relates to the falsity of the statements. The fact that payment will be made by the card-issuing company means that D's representation as to payment will in most cases not be false. The debit card contains an undertaking by the bank that, if the conditions on the card are satisfied, the payment will be honoured. The position with credit cards is similar.¹⁴⁴ The bank issuing the card enters into contracts with the trader, agreeing to pay the trader the sum shown on a voucher signed by the customer/confirmed by chip and PIN when making a purchase, provided that the conditions on the credit or debit card are satisfied. Conditions on both types of card may be satisfied although the holder is exceeding his authority. The trader accepting either type of card will usually do so simply because the conditions on the card are satisfied. He will not know whether the customer is exceeding his authority and using the card in breach of contract with the bank. He will get his money in any event. This is neither immoral nor unreasonable. The whole object of these cards is to avoid the trader concerning himself with the relationship between the cardholder and his bank. The trader is perfectly entitled to take advantage of the facility which the banks offer to him.

¹⁴¹ (1874) LR 2 CCR 134, the source of the proposition in Kenny, Outlines, 359, adopted in Page [1971] 2 QB 330 at 333.

¹⁴² (1983) 76 Cr App R 238 at 244. ¹⁴³ At [39] and [41].

¹⁴⁴ In the case of credit cards, the contract between the bank and the trader precedes the purchase by the customer, whereas in the case of the debit card the contract is made when the trader accepts the customer's cheque, relying on the card which is produced. See Paget's Law of Banking (14th edn, 2014) paras 2.62–2.69; First Sport Ltd v Barclays Bank plc [1993] 1 WLR 1229, CA (Civ Div), holding, Kennedy LJ dissenting, that the bank was bound even though the cheque was a forgery. Lord Roskill's opinion in Lambie (all their lordships concurring) that the customer was making a contract as agent for the credit card company is powerfully criticized by F Bennion, 'Credit or Theft: The Lambie Cases' (1981) 131 NLJ 431.

If D is unaware of the banking practice whereby the trader is guaranteed to receive payment, he will unwittingly be making a true statement that payment will be made. Since he intends to make a false representation, he would theoretically also be liable for an attempt. However, resort to such technicalities is unnecessary. The fact that D makes a true representation that payment will be made is not the end of the matter because in many of these cases D will be making a separate, false representation. When D presents the card knowing he is lacking authority to do so—for example, because it is not his own card, etc—he makes a false representation. If that representation is made (even impliedly), the element of the offence is satisfied. D will be aware that he is making that representation and that it is false.¹⁴⁵

The second problem is the requirement that it must be by the false representation that D intends to gain/cause loss or expose another to a risk of loss. If D has made a representation as to his authority to use the card, it seems clear that he has by that false representation intended to expose another (the credit card company and/or the trader) to a risk of loss. Arguably, by that false representation D also intends to gain by keeping that which he has (s 5(3)). Subject to dishonesty, all the other elements also appear to be satisfied:¹⁴⁶ it is no excuse that D also intends the trader to receive payment (ie not to make a loss).

This raises the question of representations as to authority to use the card. The trader apparently does not care that D has no authority or that D has exceeded his limit; he will receive his payment as explained earlier. Can D claim therefore that it was not by his false representation to the trader that he intended to make a gain/cause a loss? Although this is a plea that D can raise, alongside one of a lack of dishonesty in such circumstances, it is submitted that it will be unlikely to succeed. The trader's apparent disinterest in D's representations is in fact more apparent than real.¹⁴⁷ If D uses X's card because D knows X's PIN, D dishonestly makes a false representation. X might be recompensed by his bank for any loss and the trader might (probably will) be paid by the bank, but the bank will lose out. In that sense, it does appear that neither X nor the shopkeeper particularly 'care' if the card is misused—neither will lose out, but there is an argument which suggests that beneath that superficiality they do 'care'. If X or the trader became aware that D was misusing the card, and chose to endorse that misuse, then he would become party to the fraud against the bank. X and the trader 'care'—not because they may suffer financial loss, but because they might otherwise become accessories to a criminal offence and, on becoming accessories, they would lose their right to recompense.

¹⁴⁵ cf the decisions of the Administrative Court in Poland v Ulatowski [2010] EWHC 2673 (Admin) and Chodorek v Poland [2017] EWHC 995 (Admin).

¹⁴⁶ Arguably the trader will also be exposed to the risk of loss.

¹⁴⁷ For consideration of the bank's obligation where it is suspected that there was no genuine transaction with an unauthorized card, see Do-buy 925 Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2010] EWHC 2862 (QB).

Some commentators argue that there is not a false representation in such circumstances.¹⁴⁸ It is submitted that this interpretation places too much emphasis on the likely significance of the representation to V. That issue is no longer of relevance under the 2006 Act because the question is not whether V might be deceived or believe a matter, it is whether it is a representation to the trader that is false. If D has no authority to use the card, the trader would not accept his card because otherwise the trader would be an accomplice to D's fraud on the bank.

Representations as to 'fact'

Representations as to present facts will present little difficulty for the courts. If D asserts that he is selling a solid gold watch and it is, to his knowledge, made of brass, he commits the offence. Greater difficulty arises if his statements included making a representation as to future facts.¹⁴⁹ As noted previously, statements that are not representations of D's present state of mind or the present state of facts are merely promises as to the future and do not amount to representations in law. In Government of the United Arab Emirates v Allen,¹⁵⁰ the Administrative Court held that a statement that amounts only to a statement as to the future may have effect as a contractual promise, but will not fall within the definition of 'representation' in s 2(3).

Representations as to 'law'

Section 2(3) expressly provides that 'any representation' as to law will suffice. Representations of law ought to be caught as, for example, where D and V are reading a legal document and D deliberately misrepresents its legal effect. This would seem to be false representation of law since the construction of documents is a question of law. If D does so with the intent to gain or cause loss, for example by inducing V to pay money for the release of his rights, this would seem to amount to fraud contrary to s 2. Greater difficulty will arise where the state of the law contained in the representation is uncertain. For a representation to be 'false' within s 2, not only must it be untrue or misleading but D must know it is or might be untrue or misleading. Where there is some ambiguity as to the state of the law, D will only be making a false representation where it is untrue or misleading and he does not believe it to be true. The following proposition formulated by Street for the law of the tort of deceit is probably equally true of the concept of representation in this context:

If the representations refer to legal principles, as distinct from the facts on which those principles operate, and the parties are on an equal footing, those representations are expressions of belief only and of the same effect as expressions of opinion between parties on an equal footing. In other cases where the defendant professes legal knowledge beyond that of the claimant . . . , the potential arise for an action in deceit. However, liability is likely to arise in clear cases of misrepresentation of the law only, given the often contentious nature of legal rules.¹⁵¹

Representations as to 'states of mind'

Section 2(3) provides that a representation as to a state of mind of any person will suffice. A representation as to a present intention of either D or some other person will therefore be sufficient. Representations as to present intentions may be expressed or implied.

¹⁴⁸ The argument is that there can only be a representation as to authority by D if he thinks that it will matter to V, and since the trader, V, will not care whether D is authorized, there is no false representation. Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, paras 4.068–4.070.

¹⁴⁹ Section 2(3) defines a representation as meaning 'any representation as to fact . . .', but the term 'any' relates to the type of representation, not the type of fact; it is designed to encourage the most expansive reading of 'representation'.

¹⁵⁰ [2012] EWHC 1712 (Admin).

¹⁵¹ C Witting, Street on Torts (14th edn, 2015) 360.

If D states that his intention is that he will pay V tomorrow, he is making a representation as to his present state of mind. The Crown must, of course, go further and prove that the representation as to D's state of mind was false; that is, it must be proved that at the time of making the representation as to the present state of mind, D knew that it was false. If D, at the time of making the representation, intended to carry out his promise but later changed his mind he is guilty of a breach of contract. He is also guilty under s 3 of the 2006 Act if he is under a legal duty to disclose that information (ie the change of intention).

Representations as to the present intentions of a person other than D seem to be rare. Examples would include where an agent obtains property for his principal by representing that the principal intends to render services or supply goods, well knowing that the principal has no such intention, or where an estate agent says that a particular building society is willing to advance half the purchase price of a house, knowing that this is not so. Where the representation is as to the state of mind of another, it may be more common for the Crown to allege, in proving falsity, that D knew not that it was untrue but that it might be untrue or misleading.

Statements of opinion

Difficulties have arisen in determining whether a statement of opinion is sufficient to constitute a representation. D who says 'this is a Swiss-made watch' is making a representation of fact. But what of D who says 'the quality of the mechanism in this watch is as good as a Swiss made one': is this a representation of fact? Is it a representation as to D's state of mind—also capable of being treated as a representation of fact under s 2?

In the old case of Bryan,¹⁵² D obtained money from V by representing that certain spoons were of the best quality. These statements were false to D's knowledge.¹⁵³ Nevertheless, ten out of 12 judges¹⁵⁴ held that his conviction must be quashed on the ground that this was mere exaggerated praise by a seller of his goods to which the statute was not intended to apply. It is submitted that the case went too far.¹⁵⁵ D's statement that the spoons had as much silver in them as a famous brand was a statement of fact.¹⁵⁶

Difficulties will no doubt arise in distinguishing representations of fact from opinion, particularly when it comes to exaggeration as to value or excessive quotation. It has been held¹⁵⁷ that it is a misrepresentation of fact for D to state 'that they [had] effected necessary repairs to a roof [which repairs were specified] that they had done the work in a proper and workmanlike manner and that [a specified sum] was a fair and reasonable sum to charge for the work involved'. The evidence showed that nothing needed to be done to the roof, what had been done served no useful purpose and it could have been done for £5, whereas £35 was charged. It might be argued that representations as to quotations could be interpreted as including an implied representation of fact that the price quoted is one reflecting only a fair profit margin. But even this strained reading will not assist in all cases. What of the ¹⁵² (1857) Dears & B 265.

¹⁵³ D's counsel said: 'I cannot contend that the prisoner did not tell a wilful lie . . .'

¹⁵⁴ Willes J dissentiente and Bramwell B dubitante.

¹⁵⁵ It may be a significant fact that at the time Bryan was decided, it was not possible for the prisoner to give evidence in his own defence. In Ragg (1860) Bell CC 208 at 219, Erle CJ, referring to Bryan, said, 'if such statements are indictable a purchaser who wishes to get out of a bad bargain made by his own negligence, might have recourse to an indictment, on the trial of which the vendor's statement on oath would be excluded, instead of being obliged to bring an action where each party would be heard on equal terms'.

¹⁵⁶ Ardley (1871) LR 1 CCR 301.

¹⁵⁷ Jeff and Bassett (1966) 51 Cr App R 28, CA. Cf Hawkins v Smith [1978] Crim LR 578 ('Showroom condition throughout' a false trade description of a car which has interior and mechanical defects).

vendor's description of his tenant as 'a most desirable tenant' when the rent was in arrears and, in the past, had only been paid under pressure? This was held by the Court of Appeal to be a sufficient misrepresentation to found an action in deceit.¹⁵⁸

In a case where the facts are equally well known to both parties, what one of them says to the other is frequently nothing but an expression of opinion. But if the facts are not equally well known to both sides, then a statement of opinion by one who knows the facts best involves very often a statement of a material fact, for he impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion.¹⁵⁹ Deliberate misstatements of opinion will be likely to be generally condemned as dishonest, no less dishonest, indeed, than misstatements of other facts—for whether an opinion is held or not is a fact. The question now ought to be not 'Is it a matter of opinion?' but, 'If it is a matter of opinion, was it D's real opinion?' If the opinion is not honestly held there is a misrepresentation of fact, for D's present state of mind is a question of fact.

22.3.2.2 'False' representation

Whether a representation is false usually depends on the meaning intended or understood by the parties and that too is a question for the jury, even where the statement is made in a document. Where the issue is as to the legal effect of a document, it is for the judge to decide.¹⁶⁰

Section 2(2)(a) provides that a representation may be false by either being 'untrue' or 'misleading'. It is necessary for the Crown to establish as a matter of actus reus that the representation is false or misleading aside from any issue about D's knowledge as to its truth or otherwise. However, the states of mind of the parties are likely to be important. Indeed, rather oddly the Act provides that a statement is only false if D knows it is or knows it might be false. The definition of falsity turns not solely on the objectively discernible fact of its lack of accuracy, but on D's subjective awareness of that fact or its possibility.

Untrue

The word is an ordinary English word and no doubt the courts will suggest that juries should be directed to approach it as such. The only potential difficulties in application relate to those representations made by D which are not wholly untrue. It should be noted that there is no requirement that the falsity relates to a material particular. Where D's representation contains one falsity, even if it relates to a peripheral matter in his dealings with V, he may be convicted subject to the jury concluding that the use of that falsity was dishonest, and that it is *by that falsity*¹⁶¹ that he intended to gain or cause loss. This may give rise to difficulties in a range of circumstances from the street trader who exaggerates his wares to the investment fraudster who falsely embellishes certain aspects of the deal.

Where the requirement to prove that D's statement was untrue requires the prosecution to prove a negative and the affirmative fact which, if it exists, will establish the truth of the statement is within D's knowledge, there may be an onus on him not to prove anything, but at least to introduce some evidence of the affirmative fact: Mandry and Wooster.¹⁶² street traders selling scent for 25p, said, 'You can go down the road and buy it for 2 guineas in the big stores.' The police checked on certain stores but it was admitted ¹⁵⁸ Smith v Land and House Property Corp'n (1884) 28 Ch D 7. ¹⁵⁹ ibid, 15, per Bowen LJ.

¹⁶⁰ Adams [1994] RTR 220, [1993] Crim LR 525 and commentary. Cf Deller, p 942.

¹⁶¹ See p 934 and Gilbert [2012] EWCA Crim 2392.

¹⁶² [1973] 3 All ER 996; cf Silverman (1987) 86 Cr App R 213.

in cross-examination that they had not been to Selfridges. It was held that it was not improper for the judge to point out that it was impossible for the police to go to every shop in London and that 'if the defence knew of their own knowledge of anywhere it could be bought at that price . . . they were perfectly entitled to call evidence'. Even though no evidence was called to show that the perfume was on sale at Selfridges or anywhere else, the convictions were upheld.

D may often be able to argue that it was not by the particular falsity alleged that he intended to make the gain/cause the loss. This issue is discussed earlier.¹⁶³ Simply because D's representation relates to a peripheral matter will not entitle the defendant to an acquittal. It will be a question of fact and degree in every case whether what was said was intended to be a misrepresentation by which the gain or loss would be made. Ironically, the jury may be more likely to acquit a person whose lie is a whopper of such proportions that the jury accept that, although knowingly false, no one could have intended that it would be believed. In general, the defence are going to be faced with the difficult obstacle which is the juror's natural inclination to ask—'if D did not intend that his representation would lead to the gain or loss why did he make it?'

Or misleading

The inclusion of this alternative suggests that the draftsman intended that it constitute a distinct route to establishing falsity. The Home Office has suggested a very wide interpretation of the term 'misleading' proposing that it means 'less than wholly true and capable of an interpretation to the detriment of the victim'.¹⁶⁴ Being 'untrue' and being 'misleading' are, it is submitted, distinct behaviours.¹⁶⁵ An untrue statement is one which is literally false. A statement can be misleading even though it is literally true. Common examples are where D fails to provide a comprehensive answer to a question. For example, V asks D a car salesman 'Have you had many faults reported with this model?' and D replies, 'Only one this year'. That may be a literally true statement, but is highly misleading if there were 200 faults reported the previous year.¹⁶⁶ To display a cheap fake with a collection of originals by a well-known artist may amount to a misleading representation that the fake is by the famous artist.

There are, arguably, important moral distinctions between the conduct of someone who lies outright and someone who is merely economical with the truth, allowing the hearer to infer facts for which he must take some responsibility—*caveat auditor!*¹⁶⁷ These distinctions find no place in the 2006 Act.

Whether a representation is misleading can be a matter of degree. Is a 'trade puff' misleading? The main riposte by a street trader to an allegation that he made a false representation may be that there was no dishonesty. The second argument that he may rely on is that he did not intend by his exaggerated banter to cause anyone to believe him and that he did not therefore intend by that admittedly false representation to gain or cause loss. Such arguments may sometimes be difficult to sustain in a court remote in time and atmosphere from the theatre of a street market.¹⁶⁸

¹⁶³ At p 934. ¹⁶⁴ Para 19.

¹⁶⁵ Although Arlidge and Parry dispute this. See Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, para 4.089.

¹⁶⁶ There is little problem in practice in saying that the misrepresentation is by something not literally true but meant to be misunderstood: Moens v Heyworth (1842) 10 M & W 147. There are academic debates as to which conduct is more blameworthy and whether the victim of one or the other suffers greater harm. One view is that the victim who is misled feels more aggrieved since he has played a part in his own loss by inferring facts which D did not expressly represent. See generally Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing.

¹⁶⁷ See Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing, 78.

¹⁶⁸ See earlier and the correspondence between Ormerod and Gardner [2007] Crim LR 661.

Proof of falsity

Proving whether a representation is untrue will be far easier when it relates to a fact (or law) that exists at the time of the making of the representation¹⁶⁹ than when it relates to the state of mind of an individual. If the representation is untrue, there is no explicit defence that the representation was made for good reason or with lawful excuse, as where D said he made the false representation in order to recover property belonging (he believed) to him. In such a case, the defendant must rely on the claim of a lack of dishonesty,¹⁷⁰ and, as noted, the Act does not provide a special defence of belief in claim of right.

22.3.3 Mens rea

22.3.3.1 'Knowing that the representation is' or 'knowing that it might be' false

Knowledge is a strict form of mens rea; much stricter than 'belief', 'suspicion', 'having reasonable grounds to suspect' and even 'recklessness'.¹⁷¹ In this offence, knowledge is in a diluted form—the Crown need only prove knowledge that the representation either: (a) is untrue; or (b) is misleading; or (c) might be untrue; or (d) might be misleading. The Court of Appeal confirmed in *Augunas*¹⁷² that it is insufficient that the reasonable person might have known that the representation is or might be false. What matters is the defendant's knowledge: this is a subjective test.

In the context of representations as to existing facts, the proof of knowledge will be least difficult to establish. It will require proof, often by inference, that D possessed knowledge of the existence of the falsity of the representation. More difficult will be cases where the falsity relates to the representation which is about D's present state of mind. Even with the opportunity for the Crown to succeed on proof of knowledge that D knew that the representation might be misleading, difficulties may arise.

It is sufficient that D is shown to have known that his representation might be false. Is the offence rendered too wide by this alternative mens rea? D tells a customer that he has a Renoir for sale. D knows that there is a risk, as with all art, that the painting might be a fake. Does D know that the statement might be misleading? He will only be guilty if he made a false statement and he was dishonest. Many competent art dealers will acknowledge that there is always a risk that a painting might be a forgery. In short, a dealer who believes that his attribution in respect of this painting is true, acts honestly. He has an honest belief based upon provenance, history, his own expertise, reliance on the expertise of others or a combination of any of these factors. The dealer who actually thinks it might be untrue, acts, it is submitted, dishonestly. If the painting in question turns out to be a forgery, a representation has been made. The element of dishonesty once again serves as the principal determinant of guilt.¹⁷³ Interestingly, in debates in Parliament the Attorney General had no difficulty with this example,¹⁷⁴ saying that it would be for a jury to decide if the art dealer was dishonest and thus guilty of fraud.

¹⁶⁹ The A-G accepted that it is implicit in the drafting of s 2 that 'the only time at which one can make a judgment about whether the defendant thinks his representation is, or might be, untrue, is when he makes the representation. So if he believes it to be true at the time he makes it, he cannot have been dishonest', Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1420.

¹⁷⁰ See p 931.

¹⁷¹ See the House of Lords discussion of the definition of knowledge in the context of conspiracy: Saik [2006] UKHL 18.

¹⁷² [2013] EWCA Crim 2046. ¹⁷³ Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1416 (Lord Kingsland).

¹⁷⁴ Nor did the Home Office in its Response to Consultees, observing that if it caused sellers to be more careful that was a desirable result: para 18.

If an art dealer said, 'This is a painting by Renoir', knowing that that statement can have a huge impact on the value of the painting—but not knowing whether it is true and thinking that it might be untrue—it would be for a jury to decide whether he was dishonest. If he was dishonest, I see no difficulty in saying that he is guilty of fraud in those circumstances.¹⁷⁵

Is this an oversimplification? Is the Attorney General treating as sufficient D's thinking that a statement might be untrue or misleading?¹⁷⁶ But did the art dealer know it might be misleading? He might argue that acceptance or knowledge that a thing might be untrue is different from thinking that it in fact is or might in fact be untrue. In the former case, the dealer, while accepting that nothing can be certain in the art market, believes that his attribution is true, and therefore acts honestly. The issue is properly regarded as one of dishonesty and not knowledge. It is easy to see that a person who has bought an item which has been wrongly attributed by an auction house might use the criminal law in s 2 to support his civil claim for misrepresentation.

It seems inevitable then that in practice this mens rea element will blur unsatisfactorily into the element of dishonesty.

Wilful blindness

The breadth of this fault element may extend even further if the courts interpret knowledge as including 'shutting one's eyes to an obvious means of knowledge' or 'deliberately refraining from making inquiries the results of which the person does not care to have'.¹⁷⁷ The Court of Appeal in Augunas stated, obiter, that 'if an accused person wilfully shuts his eyes to the obvious doubts as to the genuineness of the misrepresentation that he is making, then he knows that it might be untrue or misleading and he would be guilty of the offence'.¹⁷⁸ The concept is discussed further in Ch 3, but it suffices to say that this aspect of the decision in Augunas has the potential to expand significantly the scope of the offence.¹⁷⁹

Not negligence

What must certainly be guarded against is any slippage into regarding as a sufficient mens rea test negligence or constructive knowledge. The courts have rejected the idea that constructive knowledge is sufficient in the context of deception offences¹⁸⁰ and this state of negligence should have no part under the Fraud Act.¹⁸¹ The government rejected as too wide mens rea alternatives which were proposed on consultation, including a test based on whether D had 'no reasonable grounds for believing' the representation to be true, and that he 'ought to have known' it to be false.

Knowledge and mistake of law

Where the alleged false representation is one relating to law, and D denies that he has knowledge as to the relevant law, if that is a denial of criminal law there is no excuse, but if D is denying a knowledge of civil law that may be a sufficient excuse.

¹⁷⁵ Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1417. The Home Office thought likewise in its Responses to Consultation, para 17.

¹⁷⁶ cf the old law in which reckless deceptions sufficed: Theft Act 1968, s 15(4).

¹⁷⁷ Roper v Taylor's Garage [1951] 2 TLR 284, per Devlin J.

¹⁷⁸ [2013] EWCA Crim 2046, [9].

¹⁷⁹ See also Manifest Shipping Co Ltd v Uni-Polaris Shipping Co Ltd and others [2003] 1 AC 469.

¹⁸⁰ Flintshire CC v Reynolds [2006] EWHC 195 (Admin).

¹⁸¹ See Augunas [2013] EWCA Crim 2046, [9].

22.3.3.2 Dishonesty

The test for dishonesty applies, as noted previously. This is potentially problematical in the s 2 form of the offence since the criminality turns almost exclusively on dishonesty, and the definition of that term is left to the jury to determine on a case-by-case basis. In addition, as noted, there is now no guarantee of acquittal where D has a claim of right or belief in a claim of right to the property he intends to gain by his false representation.

22.3.3.3 With intent to gain or cause loss

This element is discussed at p 933.

22.4 Section 3: fraud by failing to disclose information

Section 3 provides the second form of the general fraud offence introduced by s 1. It is far less heavily used. Section 3 provides:

A person is in breach of this section if he—

- (a) dishonestly fails to disclose information to another person, which he is under a legal duty to disclose, and
- (b) intends, by failing to disclose the information—
 - (i) to make a gain for himself or another, or
 - (ii) to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss.

22.4.1 General

The elements of this version of the fraud offence are, as with s 2, easy enough to describe. None of the elements is, however, defined in detail in the section. The actus reus comprises: failing to disclose information to a person; being under a legal duty to disclose. The mens rea comprises acting dishonestly, with an intention to make a gain/cause loss/expose to loss.

The important overriding principle of interpretation is that criminal liability under s 3 should not be imposed where the civil law imposes no duty on D. As has been emphasized throughout, it is desirable for the criminal law to respect the civil law foundations on which the offences are created.¹⁸² This interpretation derives explicit support from the comments of the Attorney General in the course of parliamentary debates where he stated that ‘the Government believe that it would be undesirable to create disparity between the criminal and the civil law; it should not be criminal to withhold information which you are entitled to withhold under civil law’.¹⁸³

This overriding interpretative principle is also underlined by the fact that the offence is much narrower than original formulations proposed by the Law Commission. These included breaches of ‘moral duties’ or duties arising from an expectation in the mind of the person with whom D is dealing.¹⁸⁴ The Home Office expressly rejected these proposals as creating offences which would be too ambiguous and which would trespass on the caveat emptor principle.¹⁸⁵

¹⁸² See Sullivan [1985] Crim LR 617.

¹⁸³ Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1426.

¹⁸⁴ Home Office Fraud Law Reform (2004) paras 18–22.

¹⁸⁵ See Home Office, Fraud Reform: Government Response to Consultations (2004) paras 21–25.

22.4.2 Relationship with s 2

This form of offence is much narrower than that under s 2, but their relationship warrants close attention.¹⁸⁶ Arguably, many cases in which there is a legal duty to disclose information might be regarded as involving an implied false representation within s 2.¹⁸⁷ As a matter of principle, it is preferable for the charges to be brought under s 3. This ensures an accuracy of labelling in the offence and conviction, and in practical terms it will be easier for juries to understand the wrongdoing in terms of failing to disclose.

A good example of the application of s 3 is the case of Forrest and others.¹⁸⁸ Four individuals were charged with several counts of fraud. One of the counts alleged that DD had dishonestly made a false representation on a mortgage application form. Another count alleged that DD had failed to disclose to the mortgage company what they were under a legal duty to disclose, namely that the funds for the deposit were coming not from their savings but from their limited company. DD accepted that there was a legal duty to provide the information sought by the mortgage application form truthfully, but argued that there was otherwise no legal duty to make disclosure of matters relating to the circumstances of the application. The judge acceded to this submission and the prosecution appealed. The Court of Appeal held that the failure to disclose the true source of the deposit in the mortgage application form was insufficient to fall within the scope of s 3 and that the trial judge had been correct in ruling as he did. Despite the fact they had made a false representation, DD had discharged the duty the application form imposed on them. Pitchford LJ observed that the prosecution's case was fatally undermined by its failure to assert that the representation in the mortgage application form was false. This case illustrates the importance for the Crown to choose carefully between ss 2 and 3 and serves to reinforce the point that not every false representation can give rise to possible liability for failing to disclose.

22.4.3 Actus reus

22.4.3.1 A person

There is nothing to prevent a corporation being liable for a failure to disclose information under s 3 when the obligation is imposed by law on the corporate entity.¹⁸⁹

22.4.3.2 Legal duty to disclose

For the purposes of determining when and where the offence occurs, it appears to be committed at the point at which the failure to disclose under the duty arises. D's duty must, it is submitted, be one arising under English law. It may arguably extend to some international law obligations to the extent that these are incorporated within domestic law.

Types of duty

The core element of the s 3 form of the fraud offence is the concept of 'legal duty'.¹⁹⁰ Unfortunately, this critical concept is not defined in the Act, nor even in the Home Office Explanatory Notes. It is necessary to turn to the Law Commission's Report for further ¹⁸⁶ See p 943. See also Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1411.

¹⁸⁷ Provided the failure to disclose when under such a duty can be seen as synonymous with a false representation by omission.

¹⁸⁸ [2014] EWCA Crim 308.

¹⁸⁹ For the liability of corporate officers, see s 12 of the 2006 Act.

¹⁹⁰ The requirement of a legal duty was endorsed by the 'Rose Committee' of senior judges: Hansard, HL, 12 June 2006, col 536.

guidance on which forms of legal duty were envisaged as being caught by the section. The Law Commission's Report Fraud,¹⁹¹ stated that:

Such a duty may derive from statute (such as the provisions governing company prospectuses), from the fact that the transaction in question is one of the utmost good faith (such as a contract of insurance), from the express or implied terms of a contract, from the custom of a particular trade or market, or from the existence of a fiduciary relationship between the parties (such as that of agent and principal).

For this purpose there is a legal duty to disclose information not only if D's failure to disclose it gives V a cause of action for damages, but also if the law gives V a right to set aside any change in his legal position to which he may consent as a result of the non-disclosure.¹⁹²

That opens an extremely broad vista of criminal liability. Some of the examples offered are already criminalized (eg the failure to disclose information in a company prospectus is criminalized by the Financial Services Act 2012).¹⁹³ Other categories will also be straightforward as, for example, with insurance contracts where a person fails to disclose that he has a medical condition when taking out life insurance; or with job applications where there is a failure to reveal criminal convictions.¹⁹⁴ There may be duties that arise in equity, contract and even in tort. In Razoq,¹⁹⁵ for example, D was a doctor who worked for the NHS. In addition, D also worked privately for a locum agency. When he joined the locum agency, D signed a form stating that if he was subject to any disciplinary proceedings he had to inform the locum agency. D failed to inform the locum agency that there were disciplinary proceedings pending against him. In these circumstances, the Court of Appeal had no difficulty in finding that D was under a legal duty to disclose the fact that he was subject to disciplinary proceedings. Given that the terms of the contract signed by D were express, it was a question of fact for the jury whether D had received them and was aware of their content.

Some categories will, however, be less straightforward, particularly when this involves the criminal court in an assessment of complex matters of civil law.¹⁹⁶ Difficult matters of proof will arise where the question is whether a duty arises in the trade or custom or was agreed to orally, etc.

Since liability only arises on proof of a 'legal' duty, the question must, it is submitted, be one of law for the judge, with the jury being directed to conclude that if they find certain facts, as identified by the judge, proved, they can conclude that in law there is a duty to disclose information.¹⁹⁷ Several Lords expressed doubts in Parliament as to whether judges ¹⁹¹ Paras 7.28 and 7.29.

¹⁹² eg where a person in a fiduciary position has a duty to disclose material information when contracting with a beneficiary: a failure to make such disclosure will entitle the beneficiary to rescind the contract and to reclaim any property transferred under it. This section might be applicable in acrimonious divorce settlements where D withholds disclosure of his true assets. See D Salter, 'It's Criminal Not to Disclose' (2007) 37 Fam L 432.

¹⁹³ One example is that in the case of Butt [2005] EWCA Crim 1163, where D's duty arose from his role as an 'introducer' for the company making the representations about high-yield investment.

¹⁹⁴ See Daley [2010] EWCA Crim 2193. See also Mashta [2010] EWCA Crim 2595. In D [2012] EWCA Crim 2181, D was convicted of fraud by false representation for falsely asserting that she had no criminal convictions.

¹⁹⁵ [2012] EWCA Crim 674.

¹⁹⁶ A number of cases involve some alleged failure of disclosure in the context of mortgage applications. The Court of Appeal seems to have taken a minimalist approach to whether there is a legal duty in these circumstances, in that it is reluctant to infer a duty to disclose beyond what is required by the terms of the mortgage application. Eg in White [2014] EWCA Crim 714, D was under no legal duty to disclose that he was unemployed when applying for a mortgage. Nevertheless, D did make a false representation and could have been guilty of fraud on that basis. This highlights the delicate relationship between ss 2 and 3.

¹⁹⁷ cf the A-G's view that this was a question of fact: Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1428. In Razoq [2012] EWCA Crim 674, the Court of Appeal also asserted that this was a question of fact. In that case, however, the issue was straightforward given that the terms of D's contract stated expressly that he was under a duty to disclose any disciplinary proceedings against him.

would struggle in explaining this issue to the jury.¹⁹⁸ The element was, however, endorsed by the 'Rose Committee'—a committee of the Senior Judiciary.¹⁹⁹ The Home Office rather optimistically regarded this as a 'relatively uncomplicated' requirement.²⁰⁰

The criminal courts have demonstrated a marked reluctance to become embroiled in civil law issues in their interpretation of the Theft Acts²⁰¹ despite the fact that those offences, being specifically designed to protect property and property rights, necessarily rely upon the civil law's understanding of those concepts. Under s 3, the criminal courts are statutorily obliged to have regard to the civil law.

Scope of duty

The difficulties in applying the civil law are exacerbated because the civil law will be essential not only in identifying the relevant circumstances in which a duty arises, but also in cases where D has revealed some information in assessing whether it was a sufficient disclosure to satisfy the duty imposed upon him. Clearly, where the Crown can show that D has failed completely to comply with his civil duty, he will be liable. Beyond that, where D claims that he has fulfilled the duty of disclosure it will be a matter of degree. The case of Forrest is a good example of this, as the Court of Appeal accepted that DD had fulfilled the legal duty imposed on them by the terms of the mortgage application. It was held that there was nothing extraneous to the application that imposed a more onerous duty of disclosure. As such, the judge was correct to accede to a submission of no case to answer. It is important to point out that such issues go not only to the question of the duty and its scope, but also relate to D's dishonesty.

Awareness of a duty?

It is unclear whether liability is strict as to the existence of a duty. If it is, D's denial of awareness will be subsumed within the general plea of a lack of dishonesty—once again, that is the element of the offence which is the principal determinant of liability. The court in Razog seemed to require D to know of the duty. It is interesting to note that the Law Commission in its original proposals suggested that liability as to the existence of the duty ought not to be strict. However, that recommendation was made in the context of a range of much broader proposals. Once the government restricted its scope to cases of breach of a legal duty, it is arguable that imposing strict liability as to the existence of such duties is less problematical. Arguably, D ought to be aware of his duties in civil law. The counter-argument is that his mistake as to the civil law ought not to give rise to criminal liability.

Despite the landmark decisions of the House of Lords in *DPP v B*²⁰² and K,²⁰³ holding that there is a constitutional principle of a presumption of mens rea in English criminal law, the courts are often willing to find that the presumption is rebutted by necessary implication.

Information

The duty must be one which is to disclose 'information'. That concept is not defined. It is submitted that the word is an ordinary English word and that few difficulties in interpretation should arise. It will take its meaning in part from the circumstances and terms of the duty in question.

To whom duty must be owed?

The section does not limit liability to those cases in which D is under a duty to disclose to V and fails to disclose to V. For example, D might be a company director and in breaching ¹⁹⁸ Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1427 (Lord Lyell of Markyate).

¹⁹⁹ Hansard, HL, 12 June 2006, col 536. ²⁰⁰ Home Office Responses (2004) para 21.

²⁰¹ See especially Morris [1984] AC 320 at 324. ²⁰² [2000] 2 AC 428. ²⁰³ [2002] 1 AC 462.

his duties to the company he might intend to expose to a risk of loss V, an investor. Again, the scope of criminal liability is determined by the particular civil law obligation imposed.

22.4.3.3 Failing to disclose

As noted, the question of whether there has been a sufficient degree of failure in disclosure may give rise to problems. The opportunity for the defence to claim that there has been adequate disclosure may well be exploited.²⁰⁴ If D has fulfilled his civil law duty in terms of the type/quantity of disclosure there should be no criminal liability. This may involve the courts in some complex issues of civil law. Particularly difficult examples might include those in which the allegation of a failure to comply with a duty arises from the trade or custom. Such duties are less likely to be clearly prescribed and must take their form, to some extent, from the circumstances in which they arise and from the parties' expectations. Expert evidence may need to be called.

22.4.4 Mens rea

22.4.4.1 Dishonesty

As discussed previously, the test for dishonesty will apply. The element of dishonesty will be especially important in cases where D claims that he was not aware of his duty and/or that he believed that he had satisfied that duty.²⁰⁵ Arguably, the vague nature of the dishonesty test renders the offence too wide.²⁰⁶

22.4.4.2 With intent to gain or cause loss or expose to risk of loss

This element of the mens rea is discussed earlier. There is no requirement that the intention is to cause a loss by which D gains. Nor need there be any intention for the loss to be caused to the person to whom the duty is owed.

22.5 Section 4: fraud by abuse of position

The third form of the general fraud offence is perhaps the most controversial and is provided for in s 4. Section 4 provides:

- (1) A person is in breach of this section if he—
 - (a) occupies a position in which he is expected to safeguard, or not to act against, the financial interests of another person,
 - (b) dishonestly abuses that position, and
 - (c) intends, by means of the abuse of that position—
 - (i) to make a gain for himself or another, or
 - (ii) to cause loss to another or to expose another to a risk of loss.
- (2) A person may be regarded as having abused his position even though his conduct consisted of an omission rather than an act.

²⁰⁴ See the argument in Ali [2006] All ER (D) 207 (May) where D had failed to disclose a change in benefit entitlement.

²⁰⁵ The Court of Appeal emphasized in Razooq [2012] EWCA Crim 674 that the judge did not need to give a Ghosh direction in every case. The court stated that the judge was correct in not giving a Ghosh direction, as to do so would have 'muddied the waters', as cited with approval in Jackson-Mason [2014] EWCA Crim 1993. This principle will be as equally applicable to the test enunciated by the Supreme Court in Ivey.

²⁰⁶ See comments of Brian Jenkins MP in Hansard, HC, 12 June 2006, col 554.

22.5.1 Interpretation

As with ss 2 and 3, the terms of the offence are easy to describe. The actus reus comprises abusing a position of financial trust and the mens rea comprises acting dishonestly and intending by the abuse to make a gain/cause loss. Once again, it is disappointing that none of the terms of this form of the offence are defined in the Act. The provision met with some opposition in Parliament, being described as ‘woolly’,²⁰⁷ and as a ‘catch all provision that will be a nightmare of judicial interpretation . . . and help bring the law into disrepute’.²⁰⁸

22.5.2 Actus reus

22.5.2.1 A ‘position’

Critical to understanding this offence is the concept of ‘position’. Unfortunately, despite repeated requests for clarification in the course of parliamentary debates, the government refused to define with any particularity what this element of the fraud means. The most obvious interpretation of this element would be to treat it as synonymous with a requirement that D owed a ‘fiduciary duty’ to the other. That would have involved the criminal courts in yet more close analysis of complex civil law questions, but it would have secured certainty and ensured coherence between the civil and criminal law. Unfortunately, the government rejected this logical interpretation, being persuaded by arguments that the definition of ‘fiduciary duty’ would be unduly technical and would restrict the scope of the offence.²⁰⁹ It preferred to allow s 4 to extend the criminal law into ambiguous territory, although, interestingly, few if any of the examples provided by government spokesmen or in government documents go beyond circumstances in which D does in fact owe a fiduciary duty.

The Home Office Explanatory Notes²¹⁰ provide little assistance, simply referring the reader back to the Law Commission explanation in its Report No 276. The Law Commission explained the meaning of ‘position’ at para 7.38:

The necessary relationship will be present between trustee and beneficiary, director and company, professional person and client, agent and principal, employee and employer, or between partners. It may arise otherwise, for example within a family, or in the context of voluntary work, or in any context where the parties are not at arm’s length. In nearly all cases where it arises, it will be recognised by the civil law as importing fiduciary duties, and any relationship that is so recognised will suffice. We see no reason, however, why the existence of such duties should be essential. This does not of course mean that it would be entirely a matter for the fact-finders whether the necessary relationship exists. The question whether the particular facts alleged can properly be described as giving rise to that relationship will be an issue capable of being ruled upon by the judge and, if the case goes to the jury, of being the subject of directions.²¹¹

This offers a very broad and ill-defined scope of liability. The Home Office gave examples of relevant ‘positions’ as including those where D is given access to V’s premises, equipment, records or customers.²¹² It also provided other obvious examples, including that of a software company employee who abused his employment position to clone software products with the intention of selling them, and employees in care homes who were entrusted to look after the financial affairs of the elderly or disabled person and drew money for their own purposes.²¹³

²⁰⁷ Hansard, HC, 12 June 2006, col 549.

²⁰⁸ Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 25.

²⁰⁹ See ibid, cols 24–27 (Solicitor General).

²¹⁰ Para 20.

²¹¹ Referred to in debates by the A-G (Hansard, HL, 19 July 2005, col 1431) and the Solicitor General (Hansard, HC, 12 June 2006, col 558).

²¹² Para 23.

²¹³ This would also be theft: Hopkins and Kendrick [1997] 2 Cr App R 524; Hinks [2001] 1 Cr App R 18.

These give no meaningful guidance on any limits of this serious offence.²¹⁴ The only other advice was that the offence applies wherever V has 'voluntarily' put D in such a position.²¹⁵ It would apply to cases of insider dealing and to cases where auditors have acted dishonestly in not safeguarding investors, etc.²¹⁶

Section 4 was considered in Valujevs.²¹⁷ V and others were charged with fraud by abuse of position. They were gangmasters and had made unwarranted deductions from their workers' earnings, had grossly inflated the rents workers owed to them, withheld work until a worker accrued debts to them, etc. At the close of the Crown's case the defence successfully made a submission of no case to answer. The judge ruled that since the gangmasters were providing work and accommodation on the 'open market', they could not be in a position where they were 'expected to safeguard, or not to act against, the financial interests of another' as required by s 4. The Crown appealed against this ruling.

The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The court had regard to the regulations governing the role of gangmasters and concluded that s 4 of the 2006 Act was broad enough to apply in these circumstances because the gangmasters had in this case gone beyond merely supplying workers and had taken responsibility for collecting and distributing the workers' wages. The judge was therefore wrong to hold that as a matter of law a gangmaster was not in a position where he was 'expected to safeguard, or not to act against, the financial interests of another'. More generally, it was noted that s 4 is not restricted to cases in which the fraudster owes a fiduciary duty to the victim. Fulford LJ stated that the question of whether the position held by the defendant is one which qualifies for the purpose of the offence in s 4 is an objective one that is not determined by the perception of the defendant or the victim as to the nature of D's position.²¹⁸

The court made clear that no crime under s 4 is committed by a person who charges excessive rent. Although accepting the breadth of s 4, the court concurred with the trial judge that s 4 should not apply:

in 'the general commercial area where individuals and businesses compete in markets of one kind or another, including labour markets, and are entitled to and expected to look after their own interests'. We repeat, the critical factor in this case is that there is evidence that the defendants arguably assumed control of, and responsibility for, collecting the wages of the workers, or they controlled the wages at the moment that they were paid over, and the fact that they were acting as gangmasters merely provided the vital context relied on by the prosecution in which that role was assumed.²¹⁹

As noted, the government was unwilling to accept that the scope of liability for s 4 should be restricted to circumstances of fiduciary duties, arguing that the definition of fiduciary duty was too narrow and too complex. The Solicitor General referred to the definition of that concept provided by Millet LJ in Bristol & West Building Society v Mothew,²²⁰ but misinterpreted his lordship's definition to conclude that a fiduciary duty would restrict the offence unnecessarily because it would require proof that the person under the fiduciary duty has a single loyalty.²²¹

²¹⁴ Section 4 will overlap with theft in some cases, eg Chan Man-sin v A-G for Hong Kong [1988] 1 All ER 1; cf A-G for Hong Kong v Reid [1994] AC 314. See on insider dealing generally, S Clarke, Insider Dealing: Law and Practice (2013).

²¹⁵ LC 276, para 7.37, repeated in the Home Office Consultation Paper (2004) para 23.

²¹⁶ See as an example of civil law duty, Manutzfarg v Freightliner [2007] EWCA Civ 910.

²¹⁷ [2014] EWCA Crim 2888. For further discussion, see J Collins, 'Fraud by Abuse of Position and Unlicensed Gangmasters' (2016) 79 MLR 354.

²¹⁸ At [41] per Fulford LJ. ²¹⁹ At [44] per Fulford LJ.

²²⁰ [1998] Ch 1. J Glistler and J Lee, Hanbury and Martin on Modern Equity (20th edn, 2015) Ch 22.

²²¹ HC Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 27.

Cases of fiduciary duty

In the more obvious situations in which s 4 might be relied on, the existence of the duty will present no problem: D's civil law duties will saddle him with liability. Even in these cases, there may be practical problems with the criminal courts identifying with precision the duty, and its terms. This may pose further questions as to the respective functions of judge and jury. If the scope of liability under s 4 had been restricted to cases of fiduciary duty, there would have been a strong argument for saying that the judge must determine whether D's 'position' is within s 4 and to direct the jury as to what evidence of that they must find in order to convict. However, since a fiduciary duty will be a sufficient but not a necessary basis for liability, it is more questionable who has responsibility for determining D's status. The Law Commission clearly thought that whether the particular facts alleged can properly be described as giving rise to that relationship will be 'an issue capable of being ruled upon by the judge and, if the case goes to the jury, of being the subject of directions'.²²²

One area of fiduciary duty in which the s 4 offence will be useful is that relating to secret profits. The common law had become extremely confused on this issue. In Tarling,²²³ the House of Lords held that the company directors' failure to disclose a secret profit made in breach of a fiduciary duty, even if it was dishonest, did not constitute a conspiracy to defraud. In Adams,²²⁴ the Privy Council held that the company director had been correctly convicted when making a secret profit. Adams seems to have gone further than Tarling by actively concealing the profits. The position was inconsistent and incoherent. Section 4 is wide enough to tackle both situations: it catches secret profiteers from the waiter who sells his bottle of wine passing it off as one from the restaurant,²²⁵ to the director who makes personal millions by trading company stock in breach of his fiduciary duty.

Whether there was a breach of fiduciary duty was considered by the Court of Appeal in Pennock.²²⁶ V was elderly and suffering from the early signs of Alzheimer's. He sold his house and moved in with the defendants, one of whom was his great-niece. The proceeds from the sale were placed into a joint account to which the defendants and V were signatories. DD removed £100,000 from the account and used it to buy a bungalow. DD were named as holders of the legal title to the property, but there was nothing to indicate that V held an equitable interest in it. Therefore, V's financial contribution to the purchase price was in no way recognized. Subsequently, DD transferred legal title to their daughter. The Court of Appeal quashed DD's convictions for fraud by abuse of position based on DD having abused their position by transferring ownership of the bungalow to their daughter without recognizing or protecting V's interest. The Court of Appeal accepted that although DD held the legal title to the bungalow, V would have had an equitable interest in it, given that he contributed to the purchase price. It was held that if DD made the transfer in such a way that V's equitable interest was not protected, they were in breach of their fiduciary duty towards him. If they did this dishonestly and with a view to gain, this was sufficient to constitute an offence under s 4. Despite this conclusion the Court of Appeal went on to observe that V's equitable interest in the property remained intact despite the transfer of legal title to DD's daughter. This was because she was not a bona fide purchaser for value; she had not given any value for the transfer. Since this fact was not brought to the jury's attention, the conviction was unsafe: the jury may have wrongly assumed that the transfer of legal title destroyed V's equitable interest in the bungalow. The case highlights how important the civil law is to any consideration of s 4. It was the failure to recognize important features of ²²² LC 276, para 7.38.

²²³ 1980 70 Cr App R 77, HL. The application of the offence in this context is discussed in the Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Response to Consultations, Annex B, para 14.

²²⁴ [1995] 1 WLR 52, PC.

²²⁵ Doukas [1978] 1 All ER 1071.

²²⁶ [2014] EWCA Crim 598.

the transaction, which have their origin in the law of equity, that led to DD's convictions being quashed, something that the Court of Appeal 'regretted'.

In cases involving a breach of a fiduciary duty, there may well be an overlap with s 3 where the fiduciary fails to disclose information, and/or under s 2 when there is a false representation. Note, however, that liability is potentially wider under s 4 because there is no need for the Crown to prove any positive act on D's part; an omission will do.

Liability in the absence of a fiduciary duty

The s 4 offence has the potential to criminalize acts or omissions by someone who is not under a formal legal duty of a fiduciary nature. The organization Justice criticized the offence on these grounds when it was first proposed, suggesting that it 'compromised legal certainty'.²²⁷ The Law Commission's examples, noted earlier, which list the family and other voluntary arrangements as being caught, highlight the potential reach of s 4. Will the breadth of the offence open up the possibility of civil actions becoming the subject of prosecution?²²⁸ Concerns were expressed in Parliament that the offence would, for example, catch D who breaches a confidentiality agreement with his employer.²²⁹

Employee A of X Ltd will be caught by passing up an opportunity to seal a lucrative contract so that his friend B, working for Y Ltd, can take advantage.²³⁰ D who is employed to secure three tenders for a lucrative contract and chooses instead to obtain one which turns out to be a disastrous selection may be caught. Section 4 seems to apply whether D is motivated by malice or laziness. Beyond that, the scope of the offence is astonishingly wide. Its ambit lies in the hands of those defining the qualifying 'position'. To take an extreme example, what of an employee who persistently arrives late for work? He occupies a position in which he is expected not to act against the financial interests of the employer. Arguably, he abuses that position intending thereby to make a gain. Subject to a finding of dishonesty, he may be guilty.

The offence is so wide that it also has the potential to apply to financial misgovernance by public officials. Many public officials are in a position in which they are expected to safeguard or not to act against the financial interests of another person (ie the public or the Crown). There may be overlap with a number of the offences contained in the Bribery Act 2010²³¹ and misconduct in public office.²³²

Unless kept within sensible limits, the offence has the potential to elevate all sorts of trivial contractual and familial disputes into criminal matters. The government suggested ²²⁷ Briefing Document for House of Lords (2006) para 8.

²²⁸ This will be a significant stick with which employers can beat employees: Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 15 (Mr Geoffrey Cox QC, MP).

²²⁹ Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 15.

²³⁰ The CPS has issued guidance on public policy interests of prosecuting fraud and has stated that 'The criminal law should not be used to protect private confidences'—see www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

²³¹ See eg Ross River v Cambridge FC [2007] EWHC 2115 (Ch), where the fraudulent representations involved bribery of a member of the defendant's board.

²³² See C Nicholls et al, Corruption and Misuse of Public Office (3rd edn, 2017) Ch 5. In Akpom [2013] EWCA Crim 2662, D was convicted of misconduct in a public office and fraud after it was discovered that he was issuing birth certificates for children who had never been born in order to facilitate benefit fraud. Dismissing his appeal against conviction, the Court of Appeal held that it was not inappropriate for the CPS to charge D with both a common law offence and a statutory one. The Court of Appeal accepted that it is good practice to observe the primacy of statutory offences over common law offences, but that it was appropriate to deviate from that principle in this case given the consequences of the offences for the public. D was in this case not charged with an offence contrary to s 4, but rather s 7.

that ‘something more than a breakdown of relationships’ would be needed to trigger s 4, but did not elaborate on this.²³³ For the reasons expressed previously, it is doubtful whether that ill-defined element can shoulder such a burden in an offence carrying a maximum of ten years’ imprisonment.

The CPS has listed examples of circumstances in which s 4 should be charged to guide prosecutors. These demonstrate the reach of the offence. There have been few reported cases under s 4. In Marshall, the offence was used to prosecute a care home worker who was misusing residents’ bank accounts.²³⁴ In Gale,²³⁵ G had abused his position as a shipping handler when he certified cargo as ‘approved’ for shipment to the United States when he was in fact unaware of its contents (a prohibited substance). The offence is used across a range of activities from sophisticated frauds involving kick-back payments (Knowles)²³⁶ to cases in which a person retains payments that he is obliged to distribute to others (Waqanika).²³⁷

22.5.2.2 ‘Occupies’

The section applies only in relation to the positions D ‘occupies’. It is clear that the ‘abuse’ with intent to gain or cause loss must arise while D is in occupation of that position in order for s 4 to apply. Where D has, whilst in a position of trust, obtained financial information, and then after leaving his position uses that information with intent to gain or cause loss, has the s 4 offence been committed? Arguably, the answer will turn on whether D intends at the time of the obtaining to use the information to gain or cause loss. If he obtains the information with that intention, he is abusing the position he then occupies. More difficult will be the case where D obtains such information while occupying a relevant ‘position’, and at the time of obtaining he has no intention by that obtaining to gain or cause loss then or in the future. Perhaps he has an intention to keep the information as a safeguard against any future allegation that he was involved in a dubious aspect of a particular deal that was being undertaken in the organization within which he occupied the position.²³⁸ Subsequently, having left that position, D realizes that there is the potential to use the information to make a gain or cause a loss and he decides to do so. He is not at that time abusing a position which he ‘occupies’. Such a person commits the offence under s 6 of the Act: possession of an article for use in fraud (see later) if he intends it to be used in fraud—which is, of course, much narrower than intending to use it for gain or to cause loss or expose to a risk of loss.

According to the Solicitor General in the course of debates in the Standing Committee:

A person can occupy a position where they owe a duty that goes beyond the performance of a job. A contract that is entered into that obliges a person to have duties of confidentiality, perhaps, can go well beyond the time when that employment ceases. The duty may, however, still arise. The person entered into the duty at the beginning of the employment and it exists indefinitely. Therefore a person may still occupy a position in which there is a legitimate expectation. That may well, by virtue of a contract and the agreement that the employee entered into voluntarily, go beyond redundancy or the point when he leaves the post.²³⁹

²³³ See Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Response to Consultations (2004) para 27.

²³⁴ [2009] EWCA Crim 2076.

²³⁵ [2008] EWCA Crim 1344.

²³⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 646.

²³⁷ [2014] EWCA Crim 902.

²³⁸ Is that an abuse? It is doubtful that a jury would regard it as such where the defendant is protecting himself against allegations that he was involved in criminal conduct by the organization; that does not sound like abuse, even though it is contrary to the interests of that organization.

²³⁹ Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 23.

22.5.2.3 Expectation

The scope of the concept of 'position' which D must occupy is to some extent dependent on the definition of the term 'position in which he is expected to safeguard'.²⁴⁰ The critical question, and one which Parliament spectacularly left unanswered, is: whose expectation counts?²⁴¹ If it is the potential victim's this could be a very wide scope of liability subject to D denying liability by way of a lack of dishonesty. If it is a test based on what D thinks his financial duties are, it might be very limited and difficult to prove. The courts may be wise to construe the requirement of expectation objectively.

22.5.2.4 Financial interests

The term is not defined. There is little doubt that the courts will be encouraged to adopt a very wide reading. There is no restriction that the financial interests be regarded as long-term ones.

22.5.2.5 Abuse

The term 'abuse' is not defined. The Home Office makes clear in the Explanatory Notes that it is deliberately left undefined as the term is intended to cover a wide range of conduct. Coupled with the breadth of the concept of 'positions' of responsibility this makes the offence extremely wide. If positions of financial responsibility were restricted to legal/fiduciary duty cases the issue of abuse would be resolved by asking simply whether the defendant had breached the legal/fiduciary duty he owed.

The word 'abuse' may well fall to be interpreted as an ordinary English word which, although straightforward, will do nothing to promote certainty and consistency in an offence of such seriousness. If guidance is needed, the dictionary definitions suggest that it involves acting 'wrongly' or 'improperly' or treating in a harmful or injurious way. The Court of Appeal in Pennock (discussed earlier) stated that 'uses incorrectly' or 'puts to improper use' were appropriate working meanings.²⁴²

Although not an element of the offence, jurors might be unwilling to conclude that there has been abuse unless some loss is in fact caused (or some gain accrued) or at least that someone is exposed to the risk of loss. The abuse is of the 'position', but it may be that D holds a position of financial responsibility towards B (eg the company), but acts with intent to cause loss to C (an investor) by the abuse of his position vis-à-vis B.

The original proposal contained a requirement of secrecy in D's actions of abuse,²⁴³ but the Home Office removed this element, despite its widespread approval on the grounds that it was difficult to define and created unnecessary complication.²⁴⁴

22.5.2.6 Act or omission

Section 4(2) makes clear that the offence can be committed by omission as well as by positive action. An obvious example is where D, an employee, fails to perform his duty under the contract of employment so that a rival company wins the tender at the expense of D's employer.

²⁴⁰ If the conduct is perpetrated by a public official, there may be an offence of misconduct in public office.

²⁴¹ See the discussion in the Commons Standing Committee where it was proposed that the word 'expected' be replaced by a requirement that D had a 'fiduciary duty': HC, Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 11; rejected by the Solicitor General at col 20.

²⁴² [2014] EWCA Crim 598.

²⁴³ Indeed, the CPS said: 'In the absence of an element of secrecy, it is accepted that the new offence would probably be too wide.' However, the deletion of this requirement was supported by Lord Lloyd, Hansard, HL, 22 June 2005, col 1665.

²⁴⁴ See Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Response to Consultations (2004) para 28.

22.5.3 Mens rea

There is no explicit mens rea requirement as to any awareness of the defendant as to the existence of the expectation that he must safeguard the financial interests of another. It would appear that liability is strict. D's lack of awareness that he is in such a position must be subsumed in a plea of lack of dishonesty.

22.5.3.1 Dishonesty

The elements have been discussed previously. As noted, there is a very heavy burden placed on dishonesty. It is interesting to consider the ECHR compatibility of this form of the fraud offence. In cases in which there is no legal or fiduciary duty on D, it is difficult to see what additional element of conduct which is morally dubious prevents the offence being one based solely on dishonesty. As the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights recognized, such an offence would be likely to infringe Art 7.²⁴⁵

22.5.3.2 Intent to gain/cause loss

One particular aspect of this element to note in the context of s 4 is that the definition of gain and loss includes intangible property which may well have a significant role to play in the context of abuse of a financial position.

22.6 Section 11: obtaining services dishonestly

Section 11 replaces the offence of obtaining services by deception in s 1 of the Theft Act 1978.²⁴⁶ As noted earlier, it was increasingly apparent that the Theft Acts failed to protect against the obtaining of services via wholly automated processes. The Law Commission's proposal as endorsed by the Home Office was to remove the troublesome element of deception from the offence and to place the emphasis on dishonesty.

The section provides:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he obtains services for himself or another—
 - (a) by a dishonest act, and
 - (b) in breach of subsection (2).
- (2) A person obtains services in breach of this subsection if—
 - (a) they are made available on the basis that payment has been, is being or will be made for or in respect of them,
 - (b) he obtains them without any payment having been made for or in respect of them or without payment having been made in full, and
 - (c) when he obtains them, he knows—
 - (i) that they are being made available on the basis described in paragraph (a), or
 - (ii) that they might be, but intends that payment will not be made, or will not be made in full.

²⁴⁵ See p 931.

²⁴⁶ See generally the Home Office: Fraud Law Reform (2004) paras 32–35; the Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Response to Consultations (2004) para 35; the Home Office Explanatory Notes, paras 34–36; the House of Commons Research Paper 31/06, at 17.

The offence carries a maximum six months' imprisonment and a fine in the magistrates' court and five years and a fine in the Crown Court.

22.6.1 Interpretation

This is a result crime, and is quite distinct from the three forms of fraud offence provided for in ss 1 to 4.²⁴⁷ There must be an actual obtaining of a service. The actus reus comprises: (a) an act resulting in the obtaining; (b) of services; (c) for which payment is or will become due; and (d) a failure to pay in whole or in part. The mens rea comprises (a) dishonesty; (b) knowing that the services are to be paid for or knowing that they might have to be paid for; (c) with intent to avoid payment in whole or in part.

According to the Law Commission in its Report No 276, 'This offence would be more analogous to theft than to deception, because it could be committed by "helping oneself" to the service rather than dishonestly inducing another person to provide it.'²⁴⁸

22.6.2 Actus reus

22.6.2.1 An act

Unusually, the offence is restricted to conduct in the form of a positive act. It is made explicit that it is not possible to commit the offence by omission. If an unsolicited service is offered, perhaps in the mistaken belief that a customer has paid for it, no dishonest 'act' has taken place. A rather unconvincing example provided in Parliament was of D, who sits on a boat and does not alight when he hears an announcement that anyone who has not paid for the next trip should alight. It was suggested that he commits no offence under this section.²⁴⁹ This restriction may be rather illusory in its practical impact. In this example, there is no doubt that D commits a fraud offence under s 2 by making an implied representation by conduct that he will pay for the trip. He does so with intent to cause loss in terms of property within s 5 to the travel company and/or to gain by keeping that which he has (s 5(3)). In addition, it is difficult to see why D is not obtaining a service in the form of the return trip by his positive act of sitting on the boat to take the return trip.

22.6.2.2 Obtaining

As noted, this is a result crime. D's dishonest act must be a cause of the obtaining of a service. The obtaining may be for D or another.

22.6.2.3 Service

Service is not further defined. But the offence is restricted in that it only applies to services for which payment is required. This follows the old offence under s 1 of the 1978 Act which did not apply to gratuitous services. Some of the situations in which D obtains a service for free by making a false representation will be caught by s 2 (discussed earlier). Note that ss 1 to 4 apply only in relation to property (see s 5) whereas s 11 applies in relation to dishonest obtaining of services. As under the old law, an application for a bank account or credit card will only be caught by this offence if the service is to be paid for: Sofroniou.²⁵⁰ What is not ²⁴⁷ cf Arlidge and Parry who suggest that 'A person who lies to obtain a service is guilty of the same offence as a person who lies to obtain property', para 9.003.

²⁴⁸ LC 276, para 8.8.

²⁴⁹ The government also emphasized the need to avoid criminalizing those who received unsolicited services from unscrupulous companies: Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 54.

²⁵⁰ [2003] EWCA Crim 3681.

made clear is whether the offence extends to services which are not legally enforceable. Can the offence occur, for example, in respect of prostitution or corrupt services?²⁵¹

The offence obviously extends well beyond the electronic ‘deception’-type case. It covers, for example, the case where D climbs over a wall and watches a football match without paying the entrance fee (such a person is not deceiving the provider of the service directly, but is obtaining a service which is provided on the basis that people will pay for it). But not to cases where D watches the game from the window of a property adjoining the ground.²⁵² It has been held that the section does not apply to the individual who tops up his mobile telephone with credit by charging the cost to other mobile telephone users: D is obtaining credit not services.²⁵³

As the Home Office explains, it also covers the situation where a person attaches a decoder to his television to enable viewing access to cable/satellite television channels for which he has no intention of paying.²⁵⁴ It was suggested that it would also catch illegally downloading music where the provision of the music constituted a service.²⁵⁵

22.6.2.4 Without payment

One problem with the s 11 offence which does not seem to have been foreseen was that it may be inapplicable in the commonplace situation where D obtains the relevant service by using a credit card or debit card. Even though the use of the card is unauthorized, the payment will be made by the bank/issuing company provided that the PIN is correct and the security number accurate, etc. The offence will not apply in such circumstances because the requirement as expressed in the section is not that D himself does not pay, but that payment has not been made at all, or in part. The fact that D is unaware of the banking practice and believes that no payment will be made, cannot make him liable under s 11 if payment has in fact been made. He may, of course, be liable for an attempt.

In many cases where D obtains a service by use of a credit card in such circumstances he will also obtain some element of property (eg the ticket for the travel or for entry to the theatre, etc) and will therefore commit an offence under s 2 of the Act because his false representation (that he is authorized to use the card), coupled with a dishonest intention to cause either loss to the credit card company and/or expose to a risk of loss the service provider, suffice for that offence. He might also be regarded as making a false representation with intention to gain by keeping what he has—that is, the money he would otherwise have had to spend. Alternatively, s 6 of the 2006 Act might be used with charges of possession of the article with intent to commit fraud.

22.6.3 Mens rea

22.6.3.1 Dishonesty

Dishonesty has been discussed previously. This is the principal mens rea element of the s 11 offence.

22.6.3.2 Knowing that payment is required/might be required

The additional requirement that D knows that the services are to be paid for or knows that they might have to be paid for imposes a relatively strict test. Arguably, the offence is too ²⁵¹ Linekar [1995] QB 250.

²⁵² Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, col 52.

²⁵³ Mikolajczak v Poland [2013] EWHC 432 (Admin). The court did observe that D could perhaps have been guilty of dishonestly obtaining electronic communication services, contrary to s 125 of the Communications Act 2003.

²⁵⁴ See Home Office Explanatory Notes, para 36.

²⁵⁵ ibid.

wide in including cases where D knows only that payment might have to be made. This form of the mens rea was included to deal with electronic purchasing over the internet and cases where D might have alleged that he was unsure what the obligations to pay were.²⁵⁶ Perhaps the statute is right to extend the offence this far: if D knows that payment might be due the onus is on him to make inquiries before he engages the services, and not to act dishonestly.

Other difficulties might arise where there is uncertainty over whether the knowledge is that payment will be due immediately or at some later date.

22.6.3.3 Intention that payment avoided

This requirement that D acts with intent to avoid payment in whole or in part marks a departure from the old offence under s 1 of the 1978 Act and narrows the scope of the crime.

Intends that 'payment will not be made'

As noted, there is no liability for D who obtains a service by use of a credit card, where payment is made by the card-issuing company, although D was unaware of that fact and intended that no payment would be made.

If D intends that payment will be made, whether by himself or by the card company, he will also be acquitted. The Law Commission was keen to emphasize the limits of the s 11 offence in this regard and provided an example that DD, parents of D, who lie about their religion in order to get D into a private school where they will be charged and pay the full fees, commit no offence under s 11.²⁵⁷

22.7 Section 6: possession of articles for fraud

The scope of the criminal law's proscription of acts merely preparatory to the commission of acquisitive crime is extended dramatically by s 6 which provides:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if he has in his possession or under his control any article for use in the course of or in connection with any fraud.

The offence carries a maximum six-month sentence in the magistrates' court and a maximum five years in the Crown Court.

This is a disturbingly wide offence. The Law Commission in its 2002 Report, Fraud, had proposed simply to replace that form of s 25 of the Theft Act offence of 'going equipped'²⁵⁸ which covered going equipped with implements for 'deception'²⁵⁹ with one covering going equipped for 'fraud'.²⁶⁰ The going equipped offence is limited in two significant ways: (a) the offence cannot be committed by possession of the materials at the defendant's abode, thereby respecting the unique privacy rights attaching to that space; and (b) the s 25 offence is designed to deal with the defendant who has set out to commit the specified wrong—albeit ²⁵⁶ Home Office, Fraud Law Reform (2004) para 35.

²⁵⁷ There has been considerable controversy over whether s 1 applies in relation to parents making false representations in order to enhance their chances of securing places in schools which the parents would like their children to attend. See C Monaghan, 'Fraudsters? Putting Parents in the Dock' (2010) 174 CJLW 581; C Monaghan, 'School Application Forms and the Criminal Law' [2015] Crim LR 270. It is difficult to identify what property D intends to gain. See also the Report to the Secretary of State for Children Schools and Families on Fraudulent or Misleading Applications for Admission to Schools (2009), see also <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/8334503.stm> and www.telegraph.co.uk/education/6486725/Warning-over-school-admissions-theft.html.

²⁵⁸ See Ch 25. ²⁵⁹ Confusingly termed 'cheat' in s 25 of the 1968 Act.

²⁶⁰ See Law Commission, Fraud (2002), Draft Bill.

this might be mere preparation and hence not an attempt, nevertheless it does require evidence that D has a degree of proximity to the offence although the defendant need not be on his way to commit a crime at that moment and need not have identified a target.

The Home Office in its consultation exercise in 2004 proposed much wider reform, noting in particular the need to deal with the use of home computers for fraud.²⁶¹ The Home Office went on to explain its desire for an offence of mere possession of, for example, computer software for use in 'the course of or in connection with' a fraud.²⁶² One particular concern was the widespread use of software to read credit cards, and the impact this has on the volume of fraud and, more generally, the public's fear of fraud and of 'identity theft'.²⁶³

The government's argument is not as compelling as it might at first seem. There is now the extremely wide offence in s 1 of the 2006 Act with which to prosecute frauds. The fraudster who works from home is caught by that provision just as easily as anyone else. There is also the scope for charging inchoate offences such as conspiracy to commit a s 1 offence.²⁶⁴ Similarly, the fraudster who has attempted to commit frauds from his home will be caught. Section 6 extends to those who have not yet even attempted to commit fraud. Section 6 may turn out to be a powerful weapon in prosecuting the peripheral players in major frauds. If the key players are prosecuted under ss 2 to 4 or for conspiracy to defraud, there will be many who have assisted in some way who could be more easily prosecuted under s 6 than for assisting or encouraging or conspiring.

22.7.1 Actus reus

22.7.1.1 An article

The concept of article has been given a wide reading under the s 25 offence,²⁶⁵ but the 2006 Act provides a yet broader definition of the term in s 8.

(1) For the purposes of—

(a) sections 6 and 7, and

(b) the provisions listed in subsection (2),²⁶⁶ so far as they relate to articles for use in the course of or in connection with fraud, 'article' includes any program or data held in electronic form.²⁶⁷

The Home Office Explanatory Notes state that:

Examples of cases where electronic programs or data could be used in fraud are: a computer program can generate credit card numbers; computer templates can be used for producing blank utility bills; computer files can contain lists of other peoples' credit card details or draft letters in connection with 'advance fee' frauds.²⁶⁸

There is no requirement that the program or data is designed exclusively for fraud. Any word-processing or spreadsheet program is capable of being used to produce false invoices or false utility bills. Any email software is capable of sending false representations and thus ²⁶¹ Para 39. ²⁶² Para 41.

²⁶³ The Home Office explained that the target included articles which are specifically 'made or adapted' for committing frauds at para 42.

²⁶⁴ See eg Pakiyanthur [2010] EWCA Crim 2312.

²⁶⁵ See Home Office, para 50.

²⁶⁶ Offences of having in possession and powers under PACE, etc.

²⁶⁷ Emphasis added. See on the wide interpretation of the concept of article in the Terrorism Act 2000, s 57, to include electronic data, the case of M [2007] EWCA Crim 218; cf Rowe [2007] EWCA Crim 635; Zafar [2008] EWCA Crim 184 as approved in this respect in G [2010] 1 AC 43.

²⁶⁸ Para 28.

for committing frauds under s 2, and so on. It is difficult to see any restriction on the concept of article which might limit the offence. A printer and computer, an iPhone,²⁶⁹ a memory stick,²⁷⁰ paper²⁷¹ or even a humble pen are articles and capable of being used in the course of or in connection with fraud and are capable of being possessed.

22.7.1.2 A person

The offence is designed primarily to tackle the individual but would seem also on the application of general principles of interpretation to apply to corporate defendants. The company director who is aware of the DVD-copying machine or the software for producing false bills, etc, which is loaded onto the company's computers may render the company liable.

22.7.1.3 Has in his possession

The concept of possession has given rise to problems for the courts, particularly in relation to drugs offences.²⁷² Any article in the possession of the person whether at home, in public or at work is capable of satisfying this element of the offence. Whereas the concept of possession has created few problems with the going equipped offence, it might be suggested that this is in part at least because the offence only applies where D is not at his abode. That restriction makes it more likely that the articles will be on D's person or in very close proximity to him for the offence to be triggered. With the offence under s 6, there is no such restriction. A person might be said to have in his possession many thousands of articles around his home and workplace.

Personal possession?

One ambiguity within the provision is whether it is possible for D to be in possession through an agent or intermediary. Does D have in his possession the software held on his teenage son's computer? Does the employer possess all the software loaded onto each of his employees' computers? Such cases might be thought to be cases of 'control' by D, if within the offence at all. In Montague,²⁷³ the Court of Appeal considered what 'possession' means in this context. The Court of Appeal adopted the approach that was taken towards the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 in Searle.²⁷⁴ It was held that an individual can be in possession of an article and therefore guilty as a principal offender if he can draw upon an article from a common pool. In that case D was in joint possession of various articles—false identity documents—and his conviction was therefore upheld.²⁷⁵

The question nevertheless arises: what limits on liability are there? Does D possess an article in the form of data if it is stored only on a server outside the jurisdiction and accessible ²⁶⁹ See eg Nimley [2010] EWCA Crim 2752—recording films in cinema to upload to website.

²⁷⁰ Used for downloading data from ATM machines in Ciorba [2009] EWCA Crim 1800.

²⁷¹ As in Kazi [2010] EWCA Crim 2026 where D was going to pass the paper off as bundles of used bank-notes that had been blacked out by the Bank of England. The victim would be told that these could be washed clean with a special chemical sold to them for a high price. This is commonly known as a 'wash wash' or 'black money' fraud. The victim is persuaded to buy the paper by the fraudster demonstrating the process on a real note on which an easily removable dye has been added. See also the cases on 'Lebanese loop' frauds by which the rogues trap cards in ATMs and retrieve them for illegitimate use: Munteanu [2012] EWCA Crim 2231; Giomaga [2012] EWCA Crim 2679.

²⁷² See generally R Fortson, Misuse of Drugs: Offences, Confiscation and Money Laundering (6th edn, 2012).

²⁷³ [2013] EWCA Crim 1781, [2014] Crim LR 615. ²⁷⁴ [1971] Crim LR 592.

²⁷⁵ In the earlier case of Tarley [2012] EWCA Crim 464, the trial judge similarly placed reliance on the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and observed that 'possession' as it is used in the context of the Fraud Act suggests a wider meaning than the concept of absolute possession adopted in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. While the Court of Appeal did not explicitly endorse this reasoning, it did agree with the judge that D was in joint possession and therefore upheld his conviction.

via the internet? If so, does D possess all that software or data on the internet to which he has instant access? Surely not. What about the case where D takes an annual subscription to an electronic product, which can be used in fraud, stored on a server outside the jurisdiction, which by virtue of his subscription he can access from the UK? Might he have possession of an article, through the internet, for use in connection with fraud?

Knowing possession?

As it must now be shown that D intended that the article be used in the course of fraud,²⁷⁶ this will obviously impose a natural limitation on the scope of the offence as a whole, although it will do nothing to restrict the scope of the concept of possession. On one view there should also be an element that D knew he was in possession of the article. But D who intends that the article will be used for fraud is almost inevitably likely to 'know' that it is in his possession, other than in exceptional cases.²⁷⁷

The CPS suggests in its guidance that it is 'probable' the courts are likely to draw on the case law on possession of drugs.²⁷⁸ In that context, the courts have held that D must 'know' that he is in possession of something which is, in fact, a controlled drug.²⁷⁹

If it must be proved that D 'knew' that he possessed the article that is alleged to be for use in fraud, particular difficulties may arise in the case of electronic data. Even in cases of tangible articles problems may arise: what of D who claims that he was unaware of the credit card cloning machine being stored in his son's bedroom or his office storeroom? In the drugs context, in *Lewis*²⁸⁰ it was held that the judge had not misdirected the jury by telling them that the tenant of a house might be found to be in possession of articles (drugs) found on the premises although he did not know they were there, provided he had had an opportunity to find out that they were. But this seems to go too far.²⁸¹ It is submitted that D does not possess 'articles' for use in fraud if the Crown can only establish that he had an opportunity to discover that they were on his property.

Knowledge of the fraudulent 'nature' of the article

If the courts do incorporate an element of mens rea requiring proof that D must know he has the thing which he is alleged to possess, the question arises whether there is a further element which must be established—that D must know or comprehend the nature of the article?²⁸² What if D knows of the existence of the software that he possesses, but not its function? On one view, he is still in possession, a position akin to the container cases in drugs law. It is submitted that this should not pose any great problems. As there is a requirement that D intends that the article be used for fraud, it will be very rare for D to be able to raise a plausible plea of this type. Where the Crown establishes D's intention as to fraudulent use, it will be possible but unlikely that he did not also know of the nature of the article. In contrast, if D lacks any understanding as to the nature of the article and its use, he must also lack an intention that it be used for fraud.

²⁷⁶ See Sakalauskas, n 295.

²⁷⁷ What of D who is party to a gang of would-be fraudsters and is aware of a device that the gang possesses which could be used for fraud, and he intends that it should be used for their proposed fraud, but is unaware that it has been left in his garage by the gang?

²⁷⁸ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

²⁷⁹ Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 2 AC 256; Boyesen [1982] AC 768; McNamara (1988) 87 Cr App R 246; Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545. Cf in relation to firearms Zahid [2010] EWCA Crim 2158.

²⁸⁰ (1987) 87 Cr App R 270, [1988] Crim LR 517 and commentary.

²⁸¹ 'First of all man does not have possession of something which has been put into his pocket or into his house without his knowledge': McNamara (1988) 87 Cr App R 246 at 248.

²⁸² Boyesen [1982] AC 768. (It is immaterial how minute the quantity provided only that it amounts to something and D knows he has it.)

Possession of electronic data

Where the article comprises electronic data on a computer, being perhaps one of many thousands on D's office machine, proving possession may be more difficult. The Crown's task will be even harder if the courts interpret the provision as requiring proof that D 'knew' he had possession of the article. What of a case where D claims to have deleted the relevant data or software and therefore not to have it in his possession even though an IT expert could recover the material from D's computer? This argument as a basis for denial of possession was accepted in the case of *Porter*²⁸³ in the context of possession of indecent images of children. The Court of Appeal held that 'if a person cannot retrieve or gain access to an image, in our view he no longer has custody or control of it. He has put it beyond his reach just as does a person who destroys or otherwise gets rid of a hard copy photograph.'²⁸⁴ It is questionable whether that is a faithful analogy. It is not as if D has burnt the hard copy photograph; rather, he has put the hard copy in a safe and thrown away the key. Someone with the relevant skills can allow him to access it. Similarly, someone who has deleted the data from his computer could still be said to be in control of it in the sense that he possesses the machine on which it is stored and controls access to it, even if that access must be by another (more skilled) person. It is arguable that the charge should be focused on controlling such an article in these circumstances. Again, the fact of deletion proves that D possessed the article pre-deletion and if it can be shown that he had the relevant intent at that stage he is guilty.

22.7.1.4 'Control'

Use of the words possession or control must suggest that Parliament intended them to be capable of applying differently. Possession is intended to mean merely having custody of the article and the word 'or' does not extend the meaning of possession, but signifies that 'under his control' is a discrete, alternative version of the offence. The CPS guidance suggests that the phrase is intended to suggest something 'looser' than the concept of absolute possession.²⁸⁵

How far does the concept of control extend in this context? Does D control all material that is present on any of D's premises, or in his car, etc? To what extent can D be said to be in control of an article which he cannot access instantly? In some instances D will have possession where the article is in a pool for use by all his associates.²⁸⁶ In some offences based on having control of an article, the scope of the control is defined by the nature of the article or the illegal uses to which it is to be put. Given the breadth of the definition of article, there is no such implicit restriction in this offence. The courts might follow the interpretation in relation to electronic articles at least, in the offences under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000,²⁸⁷ in which the Court of Appeal has held that a person has a right to control where he has the ability to authorize and forbid access.²⁸⁸

There is no obvious way in which 'control' will be limited by the courts to incorporate some requirement of D's physical proximity to or ease of access to the article. In the absence of any such limitation, the question arises whether any geographical limit can be placed on the concept in this context. Does D control the articles in his safety deposit box or locked in his safe many miles away? If so, does it matter that the articles are in D's safe in Liechtenstein

²⁸³ cf Porter [2006] EWCA Crim 560, [2006] Crim LR 748. See also Leonard [2012] EWCA Crim 277.

²⁸⁴ At [21]. ²⁸⁵ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

²⁸⁶ See Montague, n 273.

²⁸⁷ Section 1(6) of that Act provides: 'The circumstances in which a person makes an interception of a communication in the course of its transmission by means of a private telecommunication system are such that his conduct is excluded from criminal liability under subsection (2) if—(a) he is a person with a right to control the operation or the use of the system; or (b) he has the express or implied consent of such a person to make the interception.' Emphasis added.

²⁸⁸ Stanford [2006] EWCA Crim 258.

rather than in London? It does not seem to be an abuse of language to say that someone sitting at a computer terminal in London can be in control of data on a server in the United States which he intends to be used to send false representations to the UK with intent to cause loss to the recipients here. In Ex p Levin,²⁸⁹ an extradition case, the court thought that the fact that a computer operator was physically in Russia was of far less significance than the fact that he was looking at, and operating, on magnetic disks in the United States: he had committed theft in the United States and could be extradited to that country. That again prompts the question—can D be in control of data which is instantly accessible to him because it is posted on the internet? It is submitted that this would be going too far. The courts may be able to avoid such a broad reading by concluding that material/data, etc stored on a site to which D does not have the ability to regulate access is not within his control. If D controls the website, he can regulate access to the data and can be said to be in control of it.

Knowing control?

As with the element of possession, there is a question mark over whether the Crown must show that D knows he is in control of the article. As it must be proved that D intended the article be used for fraud, there is arguably no need to include a further element of mens rea that D knew he was in control of the article. D who intends that the article will be used for fraud is almost inevitably likely to know that it is under his control.

22.7.1.5 'For use in the course of or in connection with'

This form of words is identical to that in going equipped. The offences of fraud are so wide that the items which might be used 'in connection with' such activities are endless. It is not necessarily a defence that D did not intend to use the article while in the physical commission of the contemplated crime. If, for example, he intended to use it only in the course of covering his tracks after the commission of the offence, this would be enough, being use 'in connection with' the offence. Similarly, if he intended to use the article while doing preparatory acts, the offence would be committed.

22.7.1.6 'Any fraud'

This clearly extends to the offence under s 1 of the 2006 Act. Presumably it also extends to ss 9 and 11. Is it limited to frauds under the Act? Is conspiracy to defraud caught as well? The Act provides no guidance on whether 'fraud' is to be construed as meaning a general fraud offence under s 1 or some wider collection of offences.²⁹⁰ It is submitted that the offence does not extend to articles for use in connection with all dishonest offences. Some support for this is derived from the refusal of the Home Office in its responses to consultation to extend the proposal to include possession of articles for use in theft.²⁹¹

22.7.2 Mens rea

The section makes no reference to mens rea.²⁹² The Home Office Explanatory Notes suggest that 'A general intention to commit fraud will suffice.'²⁹³ The courts have thankfully ²⁸⁹ Governor of Brixton Prison, ex p Levin [1997] QB 65 DC.

²⁹⁰ eg what of the offences involving copyright infringement under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 where D records films at the cinema on his iPhone and uploads them to a website for general viewing: see eg Nimley [2010] EWCA Crim 2752.

²⁹¹ Para 49.

²⁹² For criticism, see Justice, Briefing for the Fraud Bill House of Lords Committee (2006) paras 18–21; and debates in Parliament: Hansard, HL Committee, 19 July 2005, col 1451; Hansard, HL, Standing Committee B, 20 June 2006, cols 38–42; D Ormerod, 'The Fraud Act 2006—Criminalising Lying' [2007] Crim LR 193.

²⁹³ At [25].

adopted that interpretation to avoid innocent people being at risk of prosecution for the possession of innocuous articles.²⁹⁴

In Sakalauskas,²⁹⁵ the Court of Appeal adopted the interpretation in *Ellames*²⁹⁶ where in construing the going equipped offence the court said that:

An intention to use must necessarily relate to use in the future . . . It seems to us impossible to interpret section 25(1) as if it read ‘has with him any article for use or which has been used in the course of or in connection with any burglary, theft or cheat’ . . . In our view, to establish an offence under section 25(1) the prosecution must prove that the defendant was in possession of the article, and intended the article to be used in the course of or in connection with some future burglary, theft or cheat. But it is not necessary to prove that he intended it to be used in the course of or in connection with any specific burglary, theft or cheat; it is enough to prove a general intention to use it for some burglary, theft or cheat; we think that this view is supported by the use of the word ‘any’ in section 25(1). Nor, in our view, is it necessary to prove that the defendant intended to use it himself; it will be enough to prove that he had it with him with the intention that it should be used by someone else.²⁹⁷

In Sakalauskas, Mitting J stated that this passage applied with equal force to s 6 of the Fraud Act 2006. His lordship observed that if a different interpretation were to be adopted then it would be easy to see how an innocent person who knew that an article had been used by somebody else for the purpose of fraud would commit an offence under s 6 if he knowingly had it in his possession. That outcome cannot have been the intention of Parliament.

22.7.3 Defences

Note that there is no defence of lawful excuse or lawful authority. The Home Office in its responses to consultation regarded this as unnecessary given the mens rea requirement—which is unfortunately not spelt out on the face of the statute. The investigative agency, which possesses such materials as a part of an undercover operation, etc, will be protected by the lack of mens rea and/or by the absence of any public interest in prosecution.²⁹⁸ The Home Office explanation for the absence of such a defence was that the ‘dishonesty test’ would protect those in undercover operations.²⁹⁹ This seems to demonstrate a fundamental misunderstanding of s 6, which contains no dishonesty element!

22.7.4 Inchoate liability

The offences are capable of extending even further when inchoate versions are considered—for example, D who seeks to purchase a device for use in fraud from a state agent in a sting operation attempts to possess.³⁰⁰ However, it is submitted that it is not necessary to fall back on the use of an attempt charge where there is a potential impossibility problem.³⁰¹ The full offence may well be committed. For example, D is proved to be in possession of an article which he thinks will be able to clone credit cards, but which is in fact a useless piece of software which will be incapable of doing so. He is in possession of an article and he intends that the article will be used for fraud. He commits the full offence, even though it would be impossible for the article to be used to commit fraud.

²⁹⁴ In its original proposal, the Home Office had implicitly envisaged a strict liability offence of pure possession, see para 43 of the consultation document.

²⁹⁵ [2013] EWCA Crim 2278. ²⁹⁶ [1974] 3 All ER 130.

²⁹⁷ ibid at 136 per Browne J, citing the 3rd edition of this book (1973) at pp 484, 485.

²⁹⁸ Paras 47–48. ²⁹⁹ Home Office, Fraud Law Reform: Response to Consultations (2004) para 48.

³⁰⁰ See also the liability for conspiracy in Pakiyanthur [2010] EWCA Crim 2312. ³⁰¹ See p 494.

22.8 Section 7: making or supplying articles for use in frauds

22.8.1 Section 7 of the Fraud Act 2006

Section 7 provides for a further broad offence:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if he makes, adapts, supplies, or offers to supply any article—
 - (a) knowing that it is designed or adapted for use in the course of or in connection with fraud, or
 - (b) intending it to be used to commit, or assist in the commission of, fraud.

In the magistrates' court the maximum penalty is six months' imprisonment and a fine and in the Crown Court the maximum is ten years' imprisonment and a fine.

22.8.1.1 The forms of the offence

There are several distinct versions of the offence contained in s 7. There are obviously differences between making, adapting, supplying and offering to supply. There are also important differences between s 7(1)(a) which requires that the article *is*³⁰² for use in connection with fraud and s 7(1)(b) where there is no requirement that the article is so designed, etc provided D intends it to be used. Section 7(1)(b) is in that respect much wider, and that difference may be important particularly where the charges allege supply/offer to supply.³⁰³ In a different respect, s 7(1)(b) seems narrower than s 7(1)(a), being restricted to articles for use in the commission of fraud, whereas s 7(1)(a) is wider—encompassing use in connection with fraud. Whether the courts will be willing to draw such a distinction remains to be seen.

22.8.1.2 Scope of offence

This is far from being the straightforward offence that the government proposed. The Home Office had suggested that the offence would extend only to cases where the article was 'specifically designed to commit fraud or where the manufacturer knows the article is to be used to commit frauds'.³⁰⁴ Clearly, the offence extends much wider than this. The only example of its operation provided in the Explanatory Notes to the Act is that where 'a person makes devices which when attached to electricity meters cause the meter to malfunction. The actual amount of electricity used is concealed from the provider, who thus makes a loss'.³⁰⁵ Such conduct was capable of being prosecuted as conspiracy to defraud where there was more than one actor involved in the agreement, as in Hollinshead,³⁰⁶ discussed in Ch 13.

Section 7 has the potential to apply to a much wider range of circumstances. It will catch the software manufacturer who produces programs that are designed solely for criminal purposes—those that clone credit card data, etc. In that respect, it is a welcome addition to the prosecution's armoury.

There seems to be no doubt that the section could apply to the corporate defendant. The companies producing blank cards for use in credit card cloning, or designing software for the production of phishing sites, etc may all be caught.

³⁰² Otherwise there could be no knowledge that it is for such use: Montila [2004] UKHL 50 and Saik [2006] UKHL 18.

³⁰³ If the allegation is that D made or adapted the article, it is likely to be caught by s 7(1)(a) in any event.

³⁰⁴ Response to Consultations (2005) para 52. ³⁰⁵ Para 27.

³⁰⁶ [1985] 1 All ER 850 at 858 and commentary at [1985] Crim LR 653 at 656.

22.8.1.3 Actus reus

Any article

The definition of article has been considered previously. By virtue of s 8, it includes electronic data. The scope of the actus reus is extremely broad. An allegation based on articles 'designed or adapted for' use in fraud will be relatively narrow but will still encompass, for example, computer software for credit card cloning, etc.³⁰⁷ In comparison, if the allegation is that the article is 'intended for use in' fraud and it was made or supplied or offered for supply, the offence extends much wider and could include articles such as mobile phones.³⁰⁸ It seems clear that the offence is committed irrespective of whether the article is capable of being used by itself or in combination with other articles.³⁰⁹

As noted earlier, where the charge is laid under s 7(1)(a), it is necessary that the Crown establishes that the article is designed or adapted for use in fraud. The article must be such in order for D to know that it is such.

'Makes'

This is an ordinary English word, and in this context is used in the sense of 'manufactures'. It seems not to give rise to difficulties in practice. Where D has made the article, it will be most likely that he also knows that it is designed for or adapted for use in fraud and the charge will be under s 7(1)(a). It is possible, however, that D has made some article which is not designed or adapted for fraud, but which he nevertheless intends to use for that purpose. This would fall under s 7(1)(b) and could extend as widely as, for example, the making of special paper which D intends to use to print false cheque forms.

Where the allegation involves electronic data, the courts might draw upon the interpretation of the word 'makes' from the offences dealing with indecent images of children. In that context, it has been held that D makes an image when he downloads it to his computer cache from the internet.³¹⁰ If such an interpretation is adopted under s 7, it will broaden the offence considerably. The individual who downloads software, even if he does not then adapt it or alter it or use it, may be liable if the Crown can establish either: (a) that it was designed or adapted for use in fraud (s 7(1)), for example credit card cloning software; or (b) even if it is entirely innocuous software such as a spreadsheet program, that D intended to use it for the commission of fraud (s 7(1)(b)).

'Adapts'

Adapts is a term which may have been chosen with the application of this offence to electronic data in mind. To describe the action of creating software or other electronic data as 'making' an article would be an unnatural use of that word (unless the courts adopt the interpretation in the previous paragraph in which case downloading constitutes making). Moreover, it will often be the case that D has not created the software from scratch but has changed a form of software which has pre-existing legitimate uses and has 'adapted' it for fraudulent use. There is no requirement that the article which D adapts must have been in his possession, ownership or control.

'Supplies'

This is a term which, like possession, has created difficulties for the courts in a number of contexts. However, given that in this context we are dealing with the supply of articles ³⁰⁷ See eg Yew [2013] EWCA Crim 809 where D was running a counterfeit bank payment card factory.

³⁰⁸ See eg Nimley [2010] EWCA Crim 2752 where D pleaded guilty to offences under ss 6 and 7 for filming screenings in a cinema on his iPhone and uploading them to a share site on the internet.

³⁰⁹ cf Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, s 9A, inserted by Drugs Trafficking Offences Act 1986, s 34(1).

³¹⁰ Atkins v DPP [2000] 1 WLR 1427.

for illegal purposes, it is unlikely that the courts will take a restrictive or unduly technical approach to the term.

The word 'supply', in its ordinary natural meaning,³¹¹ conveys the idea of furnishing or providing to another something which is wanted or required in order to meet the wants or requirements of that other. It suggests more than the mere transfer of physical control of some chattel or object from one person to another.

There is no restriction that the supply has to be for money or money's worth or that it is restricted to commercial supply.³¹² D handing over a blank credit card to his friend for free is as guilty as the commercial provider of software programs for, for example, decoding satellite television boxes.

Where D is alleged to have supplied an article, the prosecutor will have to exercise considerable care over the description of the charge. If D has supplied the article and knows that it is designed or adapted for use in fraud, the correct charge is under s 7(1)(a). That charge will only be available where the article supplied is actually designed or adapted for use in fraud. Where the articles are not designed or adapted for fraud, the charges will have to be brought under s 7(1)(b).³¹³

'Offers to supply'

This expression is also one with which the courts will be familiar from s 4(1)(b) and s 4(3)(a) of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. It seems likely that the courts will follow the interpretation developed under that Act, and an offer will therefore be capable of being made by words or conduct. Whether the words or conduct amount to an 'offer' will be a question of fact. Further, it will not be necessary for D making the offer to have in his possession or control the article he is offering to supply. The manufacturer, or someone acting as his agent, who has yet to make the articles in question may be liable for offering to supply them.³¹⁴ Whether D intends to perform the act of supplying what he is offering will be irrelevant; the offence is complete as soon as an offer to supply is made.³¹⁵ Perhaps most importantly, as an overriding principle of interpretation, the courts have held that this is not an area in which it will be helpful to refer to principles of contract law in determining whether there is an offer.

Where the article is one designed or adapted for use in fraud and D knows that his offer to supply it will be caught under s 7(1)(a), there is no need to show that D is aware/intends that the recipient intends to use it for fraud.³¹⁶ Where D merely has an intention that the articles he offers to supply will be used in the commission of fraud, he commits the s 7(1)(b) form of the offence, irrespective of whether the articles are in fact designed or adapted for fraud. Again, there is no need for the Crown to prove that D has any intent or knowledge of the offeree's mens rea. In this respect, the offence is stricter than assisting and encouraging where D's liability turns in part on his mens rea as to the incitee's likely criminality.

³¹¹ As the House of Lords adopted in relation to supply of drugs—Maginnis [1987] AC 303.

³¹² cf s 1(4) of the Video Recordings Act 1984 now re-enacted as the Video Recordings Act 2010 where an extended definition makes this clear.

³¹³ Or as attempts.

³¹⁴ Mitchell [1992] Crim LR 723; Haggard v Mason [1976] 1 WLR 187.

³¹⁵ Gill (1993) 97 Cr App R 215.

³¹⁶ cf eg the offence under s 126(2) of the Communications Act 2003 in which it is an offence to possess or supply apparatus knowing or believing that the intentions of the person to whom it is supplied are dishonestly to obtain, etc communication services. See, similarly, the requirement of mens rea in s 2(3)(b) of the Mobile Telephones (Re-programming) Act 2002.

In the course of or connection with any fraud

This expression suggests a very broad scope of application. It would seem to include articles not only for use in performance of the actual elements of the fraud offence, but also articles for use in preparation and/or concealment of the offence.

To commit or assist in the commission of

In contrast to the expression 'in the course of or connection with', this expression seems to be more restricted. A reasonable argument can be advanced that the expression denotes the elements of the fraud offence, and does not extend to the acts preparatory or ancillary to that offence whether before or after its commission.

For use in 'any fraud'

As with the s 6 offence, it is unclear whether the offence can be committed where the 'fraud' offence is one which is proscribed by common law (conspiracy to defraud) or by legislation other than the Fraud Act 2006. Are articles for use in a conspiracy to defraud caught? The Home Office's use of the example based on Hollinshead suggests that the s 7 offence does apply to conspiracy to defraud. Whether the s 7 offence extends further and applies, for example, to supply of articles for use in the commission of other dishonesty offences generally and in specific fraud-based offences such as those under the Taxes Management Act and the Value Added Taxes Act remains to be seen.

22.8.1.4 Mens rea

Section 7(1)(a)

'Knowing' that it is designed or adapted for such use

This is a relatively strict mens rea requirement. Knowledge involves a state of mind of true belief as the House of Lords acknowledged in Montila.³¹⁷ It is difficult to see how the doctrine of wilful blindness has any application in the context of design, although it is possible in the context of adaptation.

The Crown must establish that the article which D has made, adapted, supplied or offered to supply is designed or adapted for use in the course of or in connection with fraud. In addition, the Crown must prove that D knew that the article was designed or adapted for such use. There is no requirement that D intends or believes or knows that the person to whom the article is supplied or offered will commit any fraud offence. The CPS suggests, with some optimism, that the 'use to which the article can be put is likely to provide sufficient evidence of the defendant's state of mind'.³¹⁸

Section 7(1)(b)

Intending it to be used to commit or assist in committing

The s 7(1)(b) form of the offence applies where D makes, adapts, supplies or offers to supply any article, whether it is designed or adapted for use in fraud or not, with the intention that the article will be used in the commission of fraud or to assist in the commission of fraud. Intention here will presumably include not only direct intention in the sense of purpose, but also an oblique intention where D sees the use of the article for fraud as virtually certain.

It is submitted that it is not necessary that D intends that the person to whom he supplies or offers to supply the article will act with mens rea.

³¹⁷ [2004] UKHL 50.

³¹⁸ See www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/fraud-act-2006.

Other offences involving fraud

23.1 False accounting

Section 17 of the Theft Act 1968 provides:

- (1) Where a person dishonestly, with a view to gain for himself or another or with intent to cause loss to another,—
 - (a) destroys, defaces, conceals or falsifies any account or any record or document made or required for any accounting purpose; or
 - (b) in furnishing information for any purpose produces or makes use of any account, or any such record or document as aforesaid, which to his knowledge is or may be misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular;
 he shall, on conviction on indictment, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years.

It has been suggested that the section creates six forms of the offence, although the courts acknowledge that ‘false accounting’ is the appropriate way to refer to the offence however committed.¹ False accounting can be a useful charge to reflect accurately the scale of dishonest wrongdoing without the need to deal with the complex issues of when and where property transfers or is acquired (whether as bank credits or otherwise). False accounting is also often the most suitable charge where the conduct did not involve a scheme which was fraudulent from the outset but became so when, for example, a legitimate business got into financial difficulties. The offence overlaps with others, especially forgery and fraud. The offence under s 17 is wider than forgery; not every false statement renders the document a forgery.² False accounting is narrower than the general Fraud Act offence because it is restricted to falsity, etc in relation to accounts. The Fraud Act applies under s 2 to any false representation and under ss 3 and 4 where D is under a legal duty to reveal information or where he is in a position in which he is expected to safeguard V’s financial interests as, for example, where he is the auditor or accountant.

¹ Bow Street Magistrates, ex p Hill (1999) 29 Nov, unreported, DC.

² See Ch 29 and Dodge [1972] 1 QB 416, CA.

23.1.1 Section 17(1)(a)

23.1.1.1 Actus reus

The offence may be committed by any person who falsifies, etc any document ‘made or required’ for an accounting purpose. It is not necessary to prove that anyone accepted or acted on the falsified document; this is a conduct offence, not an offence of deception requiring a result caused by D’s conduct. The falsification, etc is a sufficient manifestation of criminal intent to warrant criminalization irrespective of whether it causes loss or results in gain.

The account or record

‘Account’ is an ordinary English word. ‘Any account or any record’ encompasses a set of written financial accounts but is interpreted widely to include a mechanical or electronic or digital accounting device such as a computer or a taximeter. It has even been held to include³ a turnstile which records the number of paying customers⁴ as the admission of two people through one movement of the turnstile amounts to falsification by the omission of a material particular. A completely false set of accounts is also ‘an account’ for the purposes of the section.⁵

‘Made or required for’

It is enough that the document was either made or required for an accounting purpose.⁶ This restriction means that s 17 does not apply to all documents or records.

Unfortunately, the courts have failed to adopt a consistent approach to identifying whether particular documents were made or required for accounting purposes. Two issues arise: (a) whether a document is made or required for an accounting purpose; and (b) on what evidence the jury is to be satisfied of that fact.

In relation to the first issue, neither ‘made for’ or ‘required for’ is to be read restrictively. Each term should be given its ordinary meaning having regard to the context⁷ and potential purpose for which the document was required. They should not be treated as technical terms of ‘forensic accounting’.⁸ It has been persuasively suggested that ‘made for’ refers to the purposes of the maker of the document and ‘required for’ to the purposes of the recipient.⁹ A set of financial accounts is prima facie made for an accounting purpose. Any other record or document is ‘made for’ an accounting purpose where that is its primary purpose. It has also been held that it is enough that one of the purposes of the document or record is for an accounting purpose.¹⁰ This is a controversial extension of the offence.¹¹

In relation to the second issue, the question of what evidence is needed for the jury to be satisfied of the accounting purpose, the courts have distinguished between: (a) those types of documents which a jury, with such experience and knowledge of the world as jurors may be expected to have, could by examining the document, be satisfied that it was required for an accounting purpose; and (b) those from which no such inference could safely be drawn. In the second category, the prosecution must adduce evidence of the purpose of the document. The court or jury may infer from the circumstances that the document is so required¹² but only if sufficient evidence exists for this conclusion to be drawn. One of ³ cf Solomons [1909] 2 KB 980.

⁴ Edwards v Toombs [1983] Crim LR 43, DC.

⁵ Scot-Simonds [1994] Crim LR 933.

⁶ Baxter v Governor of HM Prison Brixton [2002] EWHC 300 (Admin).

⁷ See Neil [2008] EWCA Crim 476.

⁸ ibid, Auld LJ at [22].

⁹ Some support for this view is implicit in Auld LJ’s judgment in Baxter.

¹⁰ A-G’s Reference (No 1 of 1980) [1981] 1 All ER 366, [1981] 1 WLR 34, CA (personal loan proposal forms addressed to finance company).

¹¹ See Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, Ch 12.

¹² Osinuga v DPP [1998] Crim LR 216, DC; Baxter, n 6.

the difficulties with the offence is that jurors cannot be assumed to know about accounting practices,¹³ and the types of document that might be required for accounting purposes are extremely wide-ranging.

In *O and H*¹⁴ (a prosecution appeal against a terminatory ruling), the court sought to clarify the position of the evidence that may be required, at least in relation to the commonly occurring problem of false information on a commercial mortgage or loan application form. The Court of Appeal held that an application made by a person for a mortgage was a document required for an accounting purpose because, if successful, it would lead to the lender providing funds and thus the opening of a mortgage account in favour of D in the books of the lender. That account would inevitably include the name and address of D as set out on the form and any bank details supplied by D. It would be inevitable (so the jury could find) that the account formed part of the accounting records of the lender. No direct evidence was required to prove that. A jury was entitled to conclude that an application for a mortgage or a loan made to a commercial institution was a document required for an accounting purpose.

The court conducted a comprehensive review of all the earlier authorities. It was accepted that not all of the decisions were reconcilable. In some earlier authorities, the court had taken a wide view of the likely uses the recipient would make of such documents. For example, a 'Report on Title' was required by a building society for an accounting purpose,¹⁵ namely to decide whether to grant a mortgage advance. Similarly, in *Osinuga v DPP*¹⁶ a form claiming entitlement to housing benefit was held to be a 'document made or required for' an accounting purpose. In Manning,¹⁷ it was held that it would be open to a jury to conclude that an insurer's cover note was 'required' in the terms of this section simply by looking at the document because it set out what the client owed—but it was a borderline case. On other occasions the court had taken a narrower view. For example, in *Okanta*¹⁸ the court was not satisfied that a falsified letter which induced a mortgage advance was required for an accounting purpose. Similarly, in Sundhers the court had held that claim forms for an insurance company had not been demonstrated to be required for an accounting purpose.¹⁹ The cases adopting this narrower view would be decided differently applying O because the focus would be on whether the forms would have led to the opening of an account or the making of an account transfer. This is, with respect, one of the difficulties with the decision in O. Although it makes the prosecution's obligation on proof clear, caution must be exercised in applying the decision. The court is not saying, it is submitted, that an accounting purpose in s 17 can only arise where an account will be created or transfers into or from an account will be caused. That would render the offence far too narrow and would be irreconcilable with many earlier decisions. What the court is saying, it is submitted, is that because in cases of commercial mortgage or loan applications an account will be created, the application document is necessarily one that is required for an accounting purpose.

¹³ Sundhers [1998] Crim LR 497.

¹⁴ [2010] EWCA Crim 2233, [2011] Crim LR 401 and commentary.

¹⁵ Cummings-John [1997] Crim LR 660.

¹⁶ [1998] Crim LR 216. Cf at first instance HH Judge Jackson in S [1997] 4 Arch News 1, which must be regarded as wrongly decided. Note: the offence under s 111A was amended by the Social Security Fraud Act 2001, s 16, but only in respect of the offence(s) of failing to notify the authorities of a change of circumstances relating to benefits. The specific offence relating to producing a document which is false in a material particular with a view to gaining social security benefits (s 111A(1)(b)) is still in force unaltered.

¹⁷ [1998] 2 Cr App R 461, [1999] Crim LR 151.

¹⁸ [1997] Crim LR 451. Distinguished in Doncaster [2008] EWCA Crim 5, [2008] Crim LR 709.

¹⁹ Sundhers [1998] Crim LR 497.

Mallett is clear that it is the document that must be made or required for an accounting purpose. A further reason for caution when applying this reasoning is that the focus on the fact that the application document leads to an account being created must not be allowed to cloud the very clear law holding that there is no requirement under s 17 to prove that D's false statement, etc caused any result. False accounting is a conduct offence.

Given the inconsistent authorities on this element of the offence, prosecutors may well prefer, where possible, to rely on the general fraud offence under s 1 of the 2006 Act in which no such restriction as to the document applies.²⁰

Particular difficulty arises where the document is one that is not a set of formal accounts and is being sent to a private individual rather than a lending company or equivalent. For example, in alleged high-yield investment frauds and pyramid frauds, application forms sent to a potential investor which include false statements as to the rate of return on investments may constitute documents made or required for any accounting purpose since they would be retained by the investor: 'it was the sort of document he would put in a wall safe not a waste paper basket'.²¹

'Any accounting purpose'

The section further extends its reach to any document, so long as it is made or required for any accounting purpose, though the document itself is not in the nature of an account and though the falsification does not relate to figures. So, if in a hire-purchase proposal form D enters false particulars relating to a company director, the case falls within the plain words of s 17(1)(a).²²

Destruction, defacement, etc

For the s 17 offence, some account or record must be destroyed, defaced, concealed or falsified by D or as a result of information provided by D. It is not enough that D is cheating V, for example by selling his own property as V's, if that transaction is not recorded in any account.²³

The courts do not seem to have provided any detailed consideration of the terms 'destruction', 'defacement' or 'concealment'. Destruction and defacement should present few, if any, problems. Some cases of defacement might also constitute forgery under the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981. 'Concealment' raises the interesting question of whether it is necessary for D to be hiding some record, etc being aware that he is under a duty to disclose it, or whether it is sufficient simply that D conceals it. Arguably, concealment requires some 'act' and cannot be committed by a mere omission. The issue will commonly be rolled up with that of dishonesty since knowing concealment commonly implies a lack of honesty. Secrecy and dishonesty are, however, not coextensive, nor are transparency and honesty.

Falsification

The more important issues arise in relation to falsification. Under s 17(1)(a) the offence is committed by falsification of the account, etc whereas under s 17(1)(b) it is committed by ²⁰ The likelihood that the Fraud Act would be relied on was noted by the Court of Appeal in O.

²¹ Baxter v Governor of HM Prison Brixton [2002] EWHC 300 (Admin).

²² A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] EWCA Crim 1768, [2002] Crim LR 844. The charge is available in relation to alleged fraud of parliamentary expenses and is not ousted by art 9 of the Bill of Rights 1688: Chaytor [2010] UKSC 52. For discussion, see J Saunders, 'Parliamentary Privilege and the Criminal Law' [2017] Crim LR 521.

²³ Cooke [1986] AC 909, [1986] 2 All ER 985, HL.

use of a falsified account, etc. Section 17(2) provides an extended though non-exhaustive definition of falsity:

For the purposes of this section a person who makes or concurs in making in an account or other document an entry which is or may be misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular, or who omits or concurs in omitting a material particular from an account or other document, is to be treated as falsifying the account or document.

The extended meaning attaches only to documents and accounts, not records. Falsification may be by omission, as where D omits to include information relating to his true income on an application form for housing benefit.²⁴ The case law has extended the scope of the actus reus far beyond that simple proposition. In Shama,²⁵ D, an international telephone operator, was required for each call to fill in a 'charge ticket' which was then used for an accounting purpose. He connected certain favoured subscribers without filling in a charge ticket, so they were not charged. The prosecution were unable to produce any falsified document. Upholding D's conviction, the court said that 'failure to complete a charge ticket by omitting material particulars from a document required for an accounting purpose' constituted the offence. But how can the omission to make a document at all be the omission of material particulars from it? The omission of material particulars seems necessarily to imply the existence of a document from which those particulars are omitted.²⁶

The offence applies irrespective of whether D is under a formal duty to account, but if D is acting under such a duty that will prescribe the scope of his obligation to include material in the documents.²⁷

Material particular

Where the allegation is of falsification, that must relate to a material particular.²⁸ This aspect of the offence has also been interpreted broadly. Information is 'material' if it is something that matters to V in making up his mind about action to be taken on the document.²⁹ It need not be material to the accounting purpose directly. In Mallett, the Court of Appeal approved the trial judge's description of a material particular as 'an important matter; a thing that mattered'. It was not specified to whom it must be shown to have been important. The particulars may be material precisely for the purpose of auditing and detecting fraud. Thus, omitting the name of an account holder to whom bank payments were to be made is a material particular since the name would have revealed instantly that the payment was unauthorized.³⁰ The particular can be material for the purposes of the section even if it would not have been the direct cause of the gain being made or the loss caused. That applies whether the allegation is one of positive falsification or omission. For example, if D, when completing an application form for a mortgage, omits to mention that he is married, ²⁴ See Lancaster [2010] EWCA Crim 370, [2010] Crim LR 776 and commentary.

²⁵ [1990] 2 All ER 602, [1990] Crim LR 411, CA.

²⁶ Presumably, D, at the end of his shift returned a bundle of charge tickets to his employers. Effectively it was his work record for the shift and was required for an accounting purpose. The 'record' might be regarded as a single document though it records each transaction on a separate page; on this view the document would be false by omitting to record some of the transactions. The best course now might be to charge under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006: when the operator handed in the forms there was presumably an implied, if not an express, representation that there was a form for each call, it must still be shown that D intended to gain/cause loss.

²⁷ Keatley [1980] Crim LR 505 (Judge Mendl).

²⁸ If it is of destruction, etc, it is the whole document or record or, presumably, a relevant part.

²⁹ Mallett [1978] 1 WLR 820, CA.

³⁰ Taylor [2003] EWCA Crim 1509, D dishonestly authorizing £73,000 payments from his employer to his parents.

although that information had it been revealed might not have caused the mortgage to be refused, it can be regarded as a material particular for the purposes of s 17.³¹

In cases of omission, it will only be possible to evaluate the materiality of the omitted particular in the context of the account as a whole. Whether the omission was significant would depend on the nature of the document and the context. The test is objective, although it is doubtful whether it would be helpful to the jury to have it described in that way. Evidence may be admissible to explain significance. There is no hard-and-fast rule that any omission to supply information required by an application form must necessarily amount to the omission of a material particular.

There does not appear to be a clear mens rea requirement as to materiality: it is not clear that D must know or believe that the 'particular' he has omitted (or falsified) is or may be material.

23.1.1.2 Mens rea

The mens rea of the s 17(1)(a) offence requires that D:

- (1) intentionally destroys, defaces, conceals or falsifies the document; and
- (2) does so dishonestly; and
- (3) acts with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another.

Given the breadth of the actus reus (in the previous section) it is desirable in principle for specificity and clarity in each element of mens rea. However, the courts have relied heavily on the dishonesty as the gravamen, avoiding unduly technical separation of the issues of knowledge and falsity.³²

Intentionally making the statement in the account or record

Proving mens rea may be difficult if D is completing large numbers of similar records containing routine information. In Atkinson,³³ a pharmacist completed forms to secure repayment of prescription costs. She admitted to filling in the forms while watching TV and playing with her children. Some forms were false in a material particular. The trial judge directed the jury to concentrate on her dishonesty, commenting that it was sufficient if the jury were sure that she knew it was likely that some of the forms were false in a material particular. The Court of Appeal regarded this as a dilution of the element of intention, coming close to mere recklessness. There must be a view to gain or intent to cause loss (see later), which would not be satisfied by proof that D saw the falsity of a statement as 'likely'.³⁴ There is a distinct requirement that D 'deliberately and intentionally' makes the statement in the account or document. It is important to keep this element separate from the question of intention to gain since there are cases in which D will act with knowledge of falsity but with no ulterior intent to gain or cause loss.³⁵ This is an important element of the offence because the exercise of completing standard records and accounts is such that there is often great ³¹ See Lancaster [2010] EWCA Crim 370. Toulson LJ did express doubt whether all incomplete or incorrect answers would be material (eg ethnic monitoring in government forms, or profiling questions in commercial forms).

³² In Atkinson [2003] EWCA Crim 3031, [2004] Crim LR 226, the court's suggestion that 'only lawyers would think of breaking [the mens rea] into component parts' is, with respect, an odd one. Is this not one element of the art of statutory construction one would expect of lawyers?

³³ [2004] Crim LR 226.

³⁴ It is acceptable to say that D intends result A (causing loss/making gain) if he does an act B (making false statement) which is likely to bring about the result A, provided D also has an intention to perform act B.

³⁵ See further Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 4 and cases cited therein.

potential for recklessness or negligence in the recording of data. Such failings should not give rise to liability under this offence.

Knowledge as to falsity

Since s 17(2) extends the offence to cover cases in which the statement ‘is or may be’ misleading, false or deceptive, it is arguable that D is guilty if he intentionally makes statements in the account or record, knowing that they may be false and acts with a view to gain or intent to cause loss. The learned authors of *Arlidge and Parry*³⁶ suggest that it can hardly be intended that the subsection should apply where it is uncertain whether the proposition in question is true or false. The conclusion is that the expression ‘or may be’ must relate only to the s 17(1)(b) offence which includes the terms ‘deception’ and ‘misleading’.³⁷

‘Dishonesty’

The term should be interpreted, as far as possible, consistently with its application in other sections of the 1968 Act. No statutory definition for dishonesty was adopted in relation to this offence. The Ghosh definition had been consistently applied. That test, and the changes introduced by the Supreme Court’s judgment in Ivey v Genting Casinos UK Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club),³⁸ are examined in detail in Ch 18.

The test for dishonesty in this offence will no doubt now follow that described in Ivey.³⁹ The impact of Ivey may be felt more keenly in serious frauds which is where the second limb of the Ghosh test was more commonly used. It rarely featured in theft cases.

Section 2 of the Act does not apply. It is unclear whether the concept of a claim of right has any relevance here, as it does in s 1.⁴⁰ Does s 17 apply to D who falsifies accounts to get property to which he believes he has a claim of right? One argument is that this should not excuse false accounting: the legitimacy of the end, or the belief in the legitimacy of the end, should not justify an illegality in the means of securing that end. D should not falsify documents. A further argument is that the essence of this offence is to recognize the separate obligation of honesty in the creation of documents that will serve as a means by which D can acquire property. If D has a genuine belief in the claim of right to the money to which he acts with a view to gain, there is no reason why he should use false means (evidencing his dishonesty) to acquire that money.

In A-G’s Reference (No 1 of 2001),⁴¹ X had been charged with an offence in the United States, which attracted high-profile media coverage. A fund was established with payments from well-wishers. An appeal committee placed donations received in the fund account, irrespective of whether the donors expressly stated whether the payment was for X and her parents (G and S) or for the fund. G and S submitted false invoices in respect of expenses incurred in attending their daughter’s trial. That was alleged to amount to false accounting. The judge accepted the submission that because some of the money transferred to the fund was money originally donated to G and S to use as they chose, the prosecution could not prove that the amount of money obtained on the false invoice was not the money of G and S. No claim of a belief in a claim of legal entitlement was made. It is easy to see how even though G and S had a ‘view to gain’ in the sense of acquiring the property, a jury might have found, applying the Ghosh test, that they were not dishonest in submitting the false invoices if they believed they had a legal right to acquire the property. Applying Ivey, there is ³⁶ Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, para 12.022.

³⁷ See Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, para 12.022. Would this have been a better charge for Atkinson, n 33?

³⁸ [2017] UKSC 67.

³⁹ At [74]. See p 879 above. See the judgment of Sir Brian Leveson P in DPP v Patterson [2017] EWHC 2820 (Admin), [16], see also Gross LJ in Pabon [2018] EWCA Crim 420.

⁴⁰ Wood [1999] Crim LR 564. Williams, TBCL, 890.

⁴¹ [2002] Crim LR 844.

no explicit opportunity for the jury to examine whether D realized that the reasonable and honest person would see the conduct as dishonest.

In Gohill v DPP,⁴² D1 and D2 were charged with offences of theft and false accounting arising from their management of a plant hire shop. They had accepted 'tips' for allowing others to use the plant for a short time without payment. On these occasions, D1 and D2 recorded each such short use as if the plant had not been hired at all. They claimed that these actions were not dishonest but were promoting customer relations. The justices acquitted, not being satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants' actions had been dishonest by the ordinary standards of reasonable and honest people. The prosecution's appeal was allowed, Leveson LJ concluding that it was impossible to find that it was not dishonest by the ordinary standards of reasonable and honest people to falsify a record in this way, particularly since company policy, of which the defendants had been aware, did not permit an alteration of those records. The same would be true applying Ivey. The decision rests on what was the first limb of Ghosh—the objective test—which is preserved by Ivey.

Gain and loss

'Gain' and 'loss' are defined in s 34(2)(a) which is discussed elsewhere.⁴³ There might be a view to gain or an intention to cause loss in falsifying the account although the gain or loss has already taken place.

'Gain' includes a gain by keeping what one has. This has created some difficulties in interpretation. D commits an offence under s 17 where, having already appropriated property of V, he destroys, defaces, conceals or falsifies an account so that he will not be found out, or to put off the evil day when he will be called to account: Eden.⁴⁴ *Golechha*⁴⁵ appears to decide that D acts with a view to gain or an intention to cause loss where D is in debt to V and D falsifies, etc an account with intent to cause V not to enforce the debt. It is submitted that in such circumstances D's act involves both an intent to gain and cause loss. It is not easy to reconcile this decision with Eden. Putting off the evil day when D will have to repay his debt would seem clearly to constitute a 'gain' to D. Golechha has been described as a case turning very much on its own facts.⁴⁶ A 'deed of postponement', postponing the priority of a registered charge in favour of another obligation, does 'cause loss'.⁴⁷

Where D falsifies accounts to exaggerate the profit which his department is making in order to induce his employer to continue his employment, it seems he has both a view to gain (he does this to keep his job and his salary) and an intent to cause loss (insofar as it causes him to continue to operate an uneconomic department).⁴⁸ It may be that there is no appropriation, or intended appropriation, of any money or goods belonging to the employer and therefore no theft; but, clearly, D is acting dishonestly. In Masterson,⁴⁹ D's falsification of invoices in an attempt to 'improve relations with his co-directors' who were unhappy with the acquisitions he had recently made was not sufficient to constitute the necessary view to 'gain'. D knew that there was no question of losing his position and could not therefore be said even to be falsifying them with a view to retaining that 'which he had'.

'With a view to gain' was construed, in a different context, in *Dooley*⁵⁰ as requiring more than foresight or awareness of a likelihood of the prohibited consequence. It is sufficient that D has the consequence (in this case 'gain') as 'one of' the reasons for acting in that fashion.

⁴² [2007] EWHC 239 (Admin).

⁴³ See p 933. Cf Lee Cheung Wing v R, n 52.

⁴⁴ [1971] Crim LR 416, CA.

⁴⁵ [1989] 3 All ER 908, [1990] Crim LR 865 (sub nom Choraria and Golechha), CA.

⁴⁶ Masterson (1996) 30 Apr, unreported, CA.

⁴⁷ Cummings (John) [1997] Crim LR 660.

⁴⁸ cf Wines [1953] 2 All ER 1497, CCA.

⁴⁹ (1996) CA 94/2221/X5.

⁵⁰ [2005] EWCA Crim 3093, [2006] Crim LR 544.

There can be a view to gain even if D has a (belief in a) claim of right to that which he is acquiring. In A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001),⁵¹ discussed in the previous section, G and S accepted that there was evidence that their expenses invoice was false, but argued that some of the money the committee had transferred to the trust was in fact money originally donated to G and S to use as they chose. On this basis, they argued that the prosecution could not prove that the amount G and S sought to obtain via the false invoice was not theirs. They argued that they had not 'gained' anything within the meaning of s 34(2)(a) because the trustees had incorporated into the trust some money which in fact belonged to G and S. The judge accepted that submission and ruled that G and S should be acquitted. The Court of Appeal held that this was wrong. Where D has provided false information with a view to obtaining money or other property it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that D had no legal entitlement to the money or other property in question.

In Lee Cheung Wing,⁵² D was an employee of a company offering facilities for dealing in futures. Employees were not allowed to use these facilities. D, in breach of his employment contract, opened an account in the name of a friend, X. The transactions were profitable and D signed withdrawal slips in X's name. The question was whether the slips were made 'with a view to gain'. D said he was withdrawing money to which he was entitled. Since a person has a view to gain even if he is entitled to the property demanded,⁵³ Lee's conviction might perhaps have been upheld on that ground. The Privy Council, however, held that D was not entitled to the money because he would have been bound to account to his employer for a profit made by improper use of his position as an employee.⁵⁴ The Board added that, in any event, action by D to recover the profits would probably have been met by a plea of ex turpi causa non oritur actio. *Lee Cheung Wing*⁵⁵ is not a sufficiently clear and weighty authority to cast doubt on the reasoning in the A-G's Reference because in Lee Cheung Wing it was not actually necessary to decide whether D would have been guilty had he been entitled to keep the money.

As for the intention to cause loss, it is unclear whether the intent must be direct or whether an oblique intention (where D sees a loss as virtually certain barring some unforeseen intervention) will suffice. The motives for intending to cause the loss are irrelevant. Thus, in Leedham,⁵⁶ D, a policeman, so disliked the government ban on handguns (imposed after the Dunblane shootings) that he completed compensation forms falsely and dishonestly to cause loss to the Home Office by allowing claims for ineligible items owned by others.

Strict liability as to accounting purpose

The actus reus requires proof that the document is made or required for an accounting purpose. As a matter of principle, this ought to involve proof of corresponding mens rea. It has been held,⁵⁷ however, that there is no requirement to prove D's intent or awareness of the purpose for which the document is required. A person may be guilty of false accounting although he has no idea, perhaps reasonably so, that this is what he is doing—as, for example, where the document is one which subsequently requires expert evidence to show that it is required for an accounting purpose. This imposition of strict liability as to an essential element of a serious offence seems objectionable.

⁵¹ [2002] EWCA Crim 1768, [2002] Crim LR 844.

⁵² (1991) 94 Cr App R 355, [1992] Crim LR 440, PC.

⁵³ A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] EWCA Crim 1768, [2002] Crim LR 844.

⁵⁴ Reading v A-G [1951] AC 507 at 516, 517. ⁵⁵ (1991) 94 Cr App R 355, PC, [1992] Crim LR 440.

⁵⁶ No 200200135/Y3.

⁵⁷ Graham [1997] 1 Cr App R 302 at 314.

Awareness of materiality?

Where the allegation is one of falsifying the document, etc a further element of actus reus is involved—the falsity must relate to a material particular. There has been no detailed judicial scrutiny of whether D must know or be aware of the materiality of the particular. In Bowie and McVicar,⁵⁸ HH Judge Atherton ruled that it was necessary for the prosecution to establish that additional element of mens rea.⁵⁹

In most cases, this issue will be subsumed within the question of dishonesty. If, for example, D makes an application for insurance and in doing so he makes a false statement—perhaps out of embarrassment—as to his marital status, he knows that it is false, but is arguably unaware of the materiality of that status in affecting the insurance rate he will be offered. Arguably, the lack of awareness or recklessness as to the materiality can be adequately addressed within the broader questions of whether D is dishonest and is acting with a view to gain. The overlap is so substantial that it is difficult to envisage circumstances in which D will be able to plead simultaneously that he accepts that he was dishonest, but that he lacked mens rea as to the materiality and should therefore be acquitted.⁶⁰ All such cases can, it is submitted, be prosecuted under s 1(2)(a) and s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006, where it is sufficient that D has made a false representation with intent to gain/cause loss irrespective of the materiality of the falsity.

23.1.2 Section 17(1)(b)

23.1.2.1 Actus reus

The offence under s 17(1)(b) involves ‘using’ rather than destroying, falsifying, etc the account. This is an extremely broad offence since it applies where D uses the document, etc for any purpose. A document may be misleading or false within the subsection by its failure to include material particulars, even though it is accurate in the sense that each statement which is contained is true.⁶¹ It is notable that the prosecution need to show only that information in the account may be (not is) misleading or deceptive. Difficulties may arise in establishing the misleading, false or deceptive particular, and expert accounting evidence may be necessary. The elements relating to accounts and records or documents made or required for any accounting purpose are interpreted as in relation to s 17(1)(a), as are the requirements relating to falsity.

23.1.2.2 Mens rea

The mens rea for the s 17(1)(b) offence comprises: (a) intentionally using a document; (b) knowing it is or may be false; (c) dishonestly; and (d) with a view to gain for himself or another, or with intent to cause loss to another. It is important to note that the mens rea differs here in one important respect from the elements as discussed in relation to s 17(1)(a). D may commit the offence in furnishing information not only where he knows that the material particular is false, but also where he knows that the document may be false or misleading in a material particular; evidently wilful blindness suffices.

⁵⁸ Manchester Crown Court, 19 Feb 2003.

⁵⁹ The charges arose from the sale of the defendants’ portfolio of properties, which had been let to various tenants. The details of the properties were, in some cases, inaccurate in recording that the rents were paid from housing benefit rather than privately by the tenants. These were false statements, and arguably material since they would affect the security of future payments. The defendants denied that they had acted ‘intentionally’ or ‘recklessly’ either as to the falsehood or the materiality of that falsehood, but were convicted.

⁶⁰ cf Smith, Property Offences, para 24.07a.

⁶¹ See Kylsant [1932] 1 KB 442.

23.2 Corporations and their officers

As far as offences under the Theft Acts generally are concerned, the liability of corporations for them falls to be determined in accordance with the general principles applicable to the liability of corporations for crime.⁶² Where a corporation commits a crime it must be the case that the crime has been committed by a person, or persons, in control of the corporation's affairs.⁶³ Such persons are, of course, liable in accordance with the ordinary principles governing liability for crime. Section 18 contains a special provision relating to false accounting. The section provides:

- (1) Where an offence committed by a body corporate under section 17 of this Act is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of any director, manager, secretary or other similar officer^[64] of the body corporate, or any person who was purporting to act in any such capacity, he as well as the body corporate shall be guilty of that offence, and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.
- (2) Where the affairs of a body corporate are managed by its members, this section shall apply in relation to the acts and defaults of a member in connection with his functions of management as if he were a director of the body corporate.

This provision was explained by the Criminal Law Revision Committee as follows:⁶⁵

The [section] follows a form of provision commonly included in statutes,^[66] where an offence is of a kind to be committed by bodies corporate and where it is desired to put the management^[67] under a positive obligation to prevent irregularities, if aware of them. Passive acquiescence does not, under the general law, make a person liable as a party to the offence, but there are clearly cases (of which we think this is one) where the director's responsibilities for his company require him to intervene to prevent fraud and where consent or connivance amount to guilt.

The Committee was suggesting that, without such a provision, in some circumstances the director might not be liable under the general principles governing liability for crime. The circumstances in which the director does not incur liability as a joint perpetrator or accessory will be relatively few. Suppose, for example, that D, a director, learns that E, a fellow director, proposes to falsify accounts but D does nothing about it. The effect of s 18 appears to be that D incurs criminal liability in respect of the false accounting because the offence has been committed with his consent. There would be no need to show that D communicated to E his approval of the falsification. Possibly, however, D would be liable under general principles for he has a clear duty to control the actions of E in this situation and his deliberate failure to perform his duty, coupled with his guilty knowledge, may make him an accessory.⁶⁸

There are many provisions based on s 18 applying to very different areas of criminal law.⁶⁹ The Court of Appeal⁷⁰ has considered a similar provision and, it is submitted correctly, ⁶² See Ch 8.

⁶³ A corporation may, of course, be vicariously liable for crimes even though the crime is not committed by a person in control of its affairs: see p 266. But vicarious liability would not apply in connection with offences under the Theft Act 1968.

⁶⁴ See Boal [1992] 3 All ER 177, limiting this to those in positions of real power.

⁶⁵ Eighth Report, para 104. ⁶⁶ See further p 256.

⁶⁷ Note that s 18 imposes criminal liability only on the management; this may include (s 18(2)) any member who is in fact in control even though he may not formally hold a managerial post.

⁶⁸ See p 192; Tamm [1973] Crim LR 115, CA.

⁶⁹ These include s 12 of the Fraud Act 2006; s 18(1) of the Terrorism Act 2006; s 18(1) of the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Act 2006 and s 14 of the Bribery Act 2010.

⁷⁰ Wilson [2013] EWCA Crim 1780, [2014] Crim LR 368, p 27 above.

confirmed that these provisions do not create discrete offences for the director, but rather they make the director liable as a secondary party to the company's principal offence.

23.3 False statements by company directors

Section 19 of the Act provides:

- (1) Where an officer of a body corporate or unincorporated association (or person purporting to act as such), with intent to deceive members or creditors of the body corporate or association about its affairs, publishes or concurs in publishing a written statement or account which to his knowledge is or may be misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular, he shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years.
- (2) For purposes of this section a person who has entered into a security for the benefit of a body corporate or association is to be treated as a creditor of it.
- (3) Where the affairs of a body corporate or association are managed by its members, this section shall apply to any statement which a member publishes or concurs in publishing in connection with his functions of management as if he were an officer of the body corporate or association.

The offence is designed to deal with cases where directors publish false prospectuses to members. It is one of a range of legislative provisions seeking to protect investors.⁷¹

In two senses the offence is a narrow one. First, it may be committed only by an officer⁷² of a body corporate or unincorporated association. 'Officer' in relation to a body corporate includes a director, manager or secretary.⁷³ Secondly, it may be committed only where the intention is to deceive⁷⁴ members or creditors of the corporation or association, and not the public at large, about its affairs. This is much narrower than the scope of liability under s 2 of the Fraud Act 2006 which is not restricted to company officers nor does it require an intent to deceive.

In another sense, the offence is a wide one for it extends to the publication of any written statement of account that may be misleading in a material particular. Recklessness suffices. It is not necessary to show that there is any view to gain or intention to cause loss in publishing the statement or account, though no doubt either or both will often be present. There is no requirement that D acted dishonestly, although it has been suggested that there is no practical difference between defining the mens rea as an intent to deceive or dishonesty.⁷⁵ The prosecution will depend in many cases on the expert accountancy evidence as to whether the accounts were misleading. The offence might be committed where an officer, in order to inspire confidence in the company, falsely publishes that a well-known person has been appointed to the board. It might also include a false statement, 'made in order to appeal to persons interested in a particular area, that a company had arranged to build a factory in that area'.⁷⁶

⁷¹ See generally J Fisher, J Bewsey, M Waters and E Ovey, The Law of Investor Protection (2nd edn, 2003); Arlidge and Parry on Fraud, paras 12.030–12.034; M Gale, 'Fraud and the Sale of Shares' (2001) 22 Company Lawyer 98. Investor protection has taken on a greater significance as increasing numbers of the general public have personal investment portfolios.

⁷² The officers of a body corporate are frequently defined in the articles or by-laws of a corporation. See Companies Act 2006, Part 3, Ch 2. An auditor may be an officer: Shacter [1960] 2 QB 252.

⁷³ Companies Act 2006, s 1173(1).

⁷⁴ As to intent to deceive, see Welham v DPP [1961] AC 103, HL.

⁷⁵ See Shuck [1992] Crim LR 209.

⁷⁶ Eighth Report, para 105.

In view of the breadth of the general fraud offence under the Fraud Act 2006, it is surprising that s 19 was not considered for repeal in the Fraud Act 2006.

Note also the specific offence to protect investors, found in s 89 of the Financial Services Act 2012.⁷⁷ This section creates an offence when D does one of the following: (a) makes a statement which he knows to be false or misleading in a material respect; (b) makes a statement which is false or misleading in a material respect, being reckless as to whether it is; or (c) dishonestly conceals any material facts whether in connection with a statement made by D or otherwise. D must make the statement or conceal facts with the intention of inducing, or be reckless as to whether making it will induce, another person (whether or not the statement is made to that person) to (a) enter into or offer to enter into a relevant agreement or (b) to exercise, or refrain for exercising, any rights conferred by a relevant investment. In addition to s 89, Part 7 of the Act creates two other offences of giving misleading impressions and making misleading statements, etc in relation to benchmarks.

23.4 Suppression of documents

By s 20 of the Theft Act 1968:

- (1) A person who dishonestly, with a view to gain for himself or another or with intent to cause loss to another, destroys, defaces or conceals any valuable security, any will or other testamentary document or any original document of or belonging to, or filed or deposited in, any court of justice or any government department shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years.⁷⁸

This provision is not likely to be of great practical importance; it was included because:

It seemed to us that it might provide the only way of dealing with a person who, for example, suppressed a public document as a first step towards committing a fraud but did not get so far as attempting to commit the fraud. In accordance with the scheme of the [Act] the offence is limited to something done dishonestly and with a view to gain or with intent to cause loss to another.⁷⁹

Section 20(3) provides that:

For purposes of this section . . . [80] ‘valuable security’ means any document creating, transferring, surrendering or releasing any right to in or over property, or authorising the payment of money or delivery of any property, or evidencing the creation, transfer, surrender or release of any such right, or the payment of money or delivery of any property or the satisfaction of any obligation.

The wide definition of valuable security renders this offence available in a diverse range of circumstances and it is rather surprising that it is not often prosecuted.⁸¹ Presumably, the evidential difficulties in establishing the destruction, etc of the document lie behind this.⁸²

⁷⁷ See V Callaghan and Z Ullah, ‘The LIBOR Scandal—The UK’s Legislative Response’ (2013) 28 J Int’l Business & Law 160. The offence has been amended by, inter alia, SI 2016/1680.

⁷⁸ Section 20(2) of the Theft Act 1968 created a very important offence of ‘procuring the execution of a valuable security’. This was repealed by the Fraud Act 2006.

⁷⁹ Eighth Report, para 106.

⁸⁰ Words repealed by the Fraud Act 2006.

⁸¹ See, in the extradition context, Cholewinski v Poland [2013] EWHC 3648 (Admin), where Bean J reviewed the authorities. CHAPS orders, cheques, bills of exchange and other negotiable instruments are ‘valuable securities’, but insurance policies are not.

⁸² Smith states that criminal damage will ‘almost certainly’ be committed by a person who falls within the terms of the offence. See Smith, Property Offences, 780. This would not, however, be true if D merely concealed the relevant document. For further discussion, see J Jaconelli, ‘Wills as Public Documents—Privacy and Property Rights’ (2012) 71 CLJ 147 at 154–157.

Note also that the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 creates offences including that under s 327: concealing, disguising, converting or transferring criminal property or removing it from the jurisdiction.⁸³ In addition there are offences of making false statements in statutory documents.⁸⁴

23.5 Cheating the public revenue

Cheating was a misdemeanour at common law and was developed most vigorously during the eighteenth century. The authorities suggest an incredibly broad definition. Hawkins⁸⁵ defined cheating as ‘deceitful practices, in defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his own right by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty’.

The common law offence of cheating still retains significant importance because, though s 32(1) of the Theft Act abolished cheating (along with common law offences against property), it did so only ‘except as regards offences relating to the public revenue’.⁸⁶ The punishment is imprisonment and/or a fine without limit.

As a practical matter, the offence of cheating has been used, on any scale at all, only in connection with frauds against the public revenue. Given the available sentence and the breadth of the offence, it is not surprising that it is popular with prosecutors and is frequently prosecuted in preference to specific offences under the Theft Acts, Taxes Management Act and VAT Act.⁸⁷

In Hudson,⁸⁸ the Court of Criminal Appeal upheld D’s conviction on a charge of making false statements to the prejudice of the Crown and the public revenue with intent to defraud where it appeared that D had falsely stated to the Inland Revenue the profits of his business. It was argued that the indictment disclosed no offence known to the law, but the court, relying on dicta of Lord Mansfield CJ in Bembridge,⁸⁹ and statements by Hawkins⁹⁰ and East,⁹¹ held that it was an offence for a private individual, as well as a public officer, to defraud the Crown and public. The argument that there was no such offence was raised again in *Mulligan*⁹² and was just as forthrightly rejected by the Court of Appeal.

The CLRC was minded to abolish the offence, and its retention was the result of special pleading by the revenue authorities who wished to retain it for serious revenue frauds where penalties under other provisions were seen by them as inadequate. Perhaps, too, the Revenue was attracted by the expansive terminology of Hawkins’ definition. At all events, the Revenue’s fondest hopes for cheating must have been realized by Mavji.⁹³ D had dishonestly evaded value added tax to the tune of over £1m. Charged, as he might have been, under what was then s 38(1) of the Finance Act 1972 with the fraudulent evasion of tax, he would have been liable to a maximum of two years’ imprisonment and/or a fine of £1,000 or three times the tax, whichever was the greater. Convicted, as he was, of cheating he was sentenced

⁸³ See p 1057. ⁸⁴ Perjury Act 1911, s 5. ⁸⁵ 1 PC, 318.

⁸⁶ D’Ormerod, ‘Cheating the Public Revenue’ [1998] Crim LR 627 and ‘Summary Evasion of Income Tax’ [2002] Crim LR 3.

⁸⁷ On sentencing, see recently the Sentencing Council guideline and Carr [2016] EWCA Crim 2259. Available at www.sentencingcouncil.org.uk/offences/item/revenue-fraud/.

⁸⁸ [1956] 2 QB 252, discussed by ‘Watchful’ [1956] BTR 119.

⁸⁹ (1783) 22 State Tr 1 at 156. ⁹⁰ 1 PC, 322. ⁹¹ 11 PC, 821. ⁹² [1990] Crim LR 427, CA.

⁹³ [1987] 1 WLR 1388, CA, [1987] Crim LR 39. Mavji was followed in Redford (1988) 89 Cr App R 1, CA. The proposition in Mavji that the statutory offences coexist with the common law offence of cheating the public revenue was confirmed by the House of Lords in Revenue & Customs Commissioners v Total Network SL [2008] UKHL 19, [136].

to six years' imprisonment and made criminally bankrupt in the sum of £690,000. The Court of Appeal, affirming D's conviction and sentence, rejected counsel's submission that cheating required a positive act such as a deception, and not merely an omission to make a VAT return. The court held that D was under a duty to make such a return and his failure to do so with intent to cheat the Revenue of money to which it was entitled constituted the offence.⁹⁴ This conclusion was, with respect, a novel extension of the offence. Hudson,⁹⁵ which was treated in Mavji as the leading case, appears to assume that cheating requires the use of a false representation or false device. Even the expansive language of Hawkins is conditioned by the requirement 'by means of some artful device'. What artful device was employed by D in Mavji?

Mavji was considered more recently in Dosanjh,⁹⁶ in which D and a number of others were convicted of conspiring to cheat the Revenue after setting up a complex scheme involving the non-payment of VAT. It was estimated that the total loss to the Revenue caused by the scheme was £39m. D was sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment and appealed against his sentence on the basis that it was contrary to the principle declared by the House of Lords in Rimmington.⁹⁷ Counsel for D contended that it was contrary to the intention of Parliament for the courts to permit prosecutors to avoid the constraints, such as maximum sentence, which Parliament had imposed upon one of the statutory offences he could have been charged with, for example fraud, by charging him with a common law offence. It was conceded on behalf of D that the decision in Mavji was inconsistent with this line of reasoning, but it was argued that that decision was no longer valid in light of the House of Lords' comments in Rimmington. In rejecting this argument, the Court of Appeal held that by not abolishing the common law offence of cheating the Revenue, despite the proliferation of statutory offences that could be charged in the alternative, it could be inferred that Parliament had made a conscious decision to retain the offence for those exceptional revenue frauds where none of the statutory offences would accurately reflect D's criminality. Lord Bingham's judgment in Rimmington was distinguished on the basis that his lordship had accepted that his general approach would not apply when there was 'good reason' to deviate from it. This was a case in which there was such a 'good reason' for charging the common law offence, despite the existence of a statutory offence with which D could have been charged.

The actus reus of the offence has become so wide that the definition is almost best stated in negative terms. There need not be a dishonest act; an omission will suffice.⁹⁸ The act or omission must be intended to prejudice HMRC⁹⁹ or the Department for Work and Pensions. The offence cannot be committed in respect of a local authority¹⁰⁰ nor, it is submitted, against the EU.¹⁰¹ There is no requirement of an operative deception¹⁰² nor of a need ⁹⁴ Cheating is a 'conduct offence' and it is not necessary to prove that D caused any loss: Hunt (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 87, [1994] Crim LR 747.

⁹⁵ See earlier.

⁹⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 2366.

⁹⁷ [2005] UKHL 63. See p 470.

⁹⁸ Steed [2011] EWCA Crim 75 was an appeal against a confiscation order made following a plea of guilty to cheating the public revenue by failing to submit accounts for tax. At [11], Moses LJ restated the basic principle that the offence can be committed by omission. 'Cheating consists of any form of fraudulent conduct, whether by making positive false representations, as in Hudson, or by concealing or omitting to disclose liability or income with the result that money is diverted from the Revenue and the Revenue is deprived of money to which it is entitled.'

⁹⁹ Blake (1844) 6 QB 126; R v Tonner [1985] 1 WLR 344, [1984] Crim LR 618.

¹⁰⁰ Lush v Coles [1967] 1 WLR 685.

¹⁰¹ On fraud in the EU, see L Kuhl, 'The Criminal Law Protection of the Communities' Financial Interests Against Fraud' [1998] Crim LR 259 and 323, especially at 264–266 and 330.

¹⁰² Mavji [1987] 1 WLR 1388.

to prove actual loss to the Revenue,¹⁰³ or to any other. It is not necessary to prove that the accused's conduct resulted in any gain to himself¹⁰⁴ nor for the defendant to be a government official.¹⁰⁵ The types of behaviour caught include: failing to account for VAT,¹⁰⁶ withholding PAYE and National Insurance,¹⁰⁷ failing to register for VAT¹⁰⁸ or simply failing to disclose income.¹⁰⁹ It is a particularly useful offence in cases of carousel frauds where there is no duty to pay VAT arising. It is unclear precisely when the offence commences. Is D cheating the Revenue when he has determined not to declare his profits but has yet to make a false declaration in his tax return?¹¹⁰ Does it matter whether he has done some act—such as keeping a false set of books?¹¹¹

It is difficult to see how the offence could be stated in more expansive terms. The offence is, of course, even broader when charged as a statutory conspiracy to cheat, as it often is. The breadth of the offence means that often the only live issue at trial will be dishonesty.

The jury's difficulty in applying the dishonesty test in commercial settings has been considered in Ch 18. In relation to carefully planned tax schemes, the problems appear obvious: it seems ludicrous to ask jurors to apply the test of whether a reasonable and honest person would see it as dishonest when they (probably) have little or no understanding of the very complex civil law tax position or commercial background.¹¹² Some have suggested it is tantamount to retrospective criminalization and may well offend the protection in Art 7 of the ECHR.¹¹³ That argument surely gains force under the more objective test in Ivey.

Care needs to be taken in charging the offence when the wrongdoing alleged spans a period of time and involves numerous transactions.¹¹⁴

Notwithstanding the criticism of the cheating offence, the government introduced a statutory version of the offence which is triable either way. Section 144 of the Finance Act 2000 criminalized 'being knowingly concerned in the evasion of income tax'.¹¹⁵ The offence is now found in s 106A of the Taxes Management Act 1970, which was inserted into the 1970 Act by the Taxation (International and Other Provisions) Act 2010. This is an ill-defined and extremely broad offence, but for numerous reasons has proved less successful than the Revenue anticipated.

¹⁰³ Hunt [1994] STC 819 at 827, per Stuart-Smith LJ. Hence its use in VAT carousel frauds. See also Matthews [2008] EWCA Crim 423.

¹⁰⁴ Hunt [1994] STC 819, [1994] Crim LR 747.

¹⁰⁵ Mulligan [1990] STC 220, [1990] Crim LR 427.

¹⁰⁶ Ryan [1994] STC 446, [1994] Crim LR 858.

¹⁰⁷ Less (1993) The Times, 30 Mar.

¹⁰⁸ Redford [1988] STC 845, [1989] Crim LR 152.

¹⁰⁹ Anderson (1992) 13 Cr App R (S) 564.

¹¹⁰ This may be important in determining whether the property in the form of the tax not yet paid is already criminal property for the purposes of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, s 340. In Williams [2013] EWCA Crim 1262, the Court of Appeal held that the effect of ss 327 and 340(6) of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 is that D who cheats the Revenue by failing to pay the tax due is taken to have obtained a benefit which is the same as the amount of tax unpaid. In cases where D misrepresents the turnover, the benefit is the tax due on the undeclared income. Importantly, Elias LJ held that the criminal property as defined by s 340 is the entirety of the undeclared turnover and not merely the tax due. The reason for so holding is that the benefit is represented in part by that sum.

¹¹¹ cf Doncaster [2008] EWCA Crim 5; IK [2007] EWCA Crim 491, [2007] Crim LR 645.

¹¹² eg the difficulty in cases where D is alleged to have created sham transactions and avoided tax: Kumar [2005] EWCA Crim 1979, [2006] Crim LR 271.

¹¹³ cf Pattni [2000] Crim LR 570 at first instance. See LCCP 155, Legislating the Criminal Code: Fraud and Deception (1999) para 3.23.

¹¹⁴ See Lunn [2017] EWCA Crim 34.

¹¹⁵ See D Ormerod, 'Summary Evasion of Income Tax' [2002] Crim LR 3. Section 144 was repealed on 1 Apr 2010 by the Taxation (International and Other Provisions) Act 2010, Sch 10, Part 12, para 1.

Blackmail and related offences

24.1 Blackmail

Originally the word 'blackmail' was used to describe the tribute paid to Scottish chieftains by landowners in the border counties in order to secure immunity from raids on their lands.¹ In the early stages of its development the crime of blackmail seems to have been coextensive with robbery and attempted robbery,² but over the years the definition has been extended to embrace more subtle methods of extortion. The law is now set out in s 21 of the Theft Act 1968:³

- (1) A person is guilty of blackmail if, with a view to gain for himself or another or with intent to cause loss to another, he makes any unwarranted demand with menaces; and for this purpose a demand with menaces is unwarranted unless the person making it does so in the belief—
 - (a) that he has reasonable grounds for making the demand; and
 - (b) that the use of the menaces is a proper means of reinforcing the demand.
- (2) The nature of the act or omission demanded is immaterial, and it is also immaterial whether the menaces do or do not relate to action to be taken by the person making the demand.
- (3) A person guilty of blackmail shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

When unravelled, this rather complicated provision comprises an actus reus of a demand with menaces, and mens rea requirements of an intention to make the demand with menaces, with a view to gain or intention to cause loss, in the absence of a belief that there are reasonable grounds for making the demand and that the menacing is a proper means of enforcing the demand. The offence is complete upon the demand being made, irrespective of whether any property is transferred.

Blackmail is triable only on indictment. There are relatively few reported appellate court decisions on the substance of the offence; those that are reported relate mostly to sentencing, and it should be noted in that regard that the offence is one of the most serious in the criminal calendar

¹ Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, Ch 12; Griew, Theft, Ch 14; CLRC, Eighth Report, paras 108–125.

² W Winder, 'The Development of Blackmail' (1941) 5 MLR 21; G Williams, 'Blackmail' [1954] Crim LR 7; J Lindgren, 'The Theory, History, and Practice of the Bribery-Extortion Distinction' (1993) 141(5) U Pa L Rev 1695; M Hepworth, 'The British Conception of Blackmail' (1975) 3 Int'l J of Criminology and Penology 1.

³ B MacKenna, 'Blackmail' [1966] Crim LR 467; B Hogan, 'Blackmail' [1966] Crim LR 474; CR Williams, 'Demanding with Menaces: A Survey of the Australian Law of Blackmail' (1975) 10 Melb LR 118, especially at 136–144.

attracting long-term imprisonment.⁴ Mobile telecommunications, advances in information technology, the internet and social media have created new opportunities for blackmail.⁵

Although the offence appears in the Theft Act 1968, and its requirement of an act with a view to loss or gain demonstrates that it serves to protect property, in many cases blackmail is more appropriately viewed as an offence against privacy.⁶ Correctly identifying the harm or interest being protected by the offence has generated a wealth of academic literature.⁷ It has been suggested that the wrong of blackmail is done even if the demand is nothing to do with payment⁸ but that seems to be over-inclusive: the offence as defined in English law is restricted to cases in which the demand is for property.

24.1.1 The demand

A demand may take any form, and may be implicit as well as explicit. It extends well beyond the obvious '£1,000 or I will publish the photographs exposing your adultery'. The demand could be oral, in writing, by gestures or by D's demeanour provided that, objectively viewed, it is a demand. The essence of this offence is that D's communication conveys the message to V that a menace will materialize unless V complies with the demand. D may be guilty of blackmail where, for example, he apprehends V in the act of stealing and, without any formal demand, makes it clear to V that if he pays D money he will hear no more of the matter.⁹ D's humblest form of request may be a demand.¹⁰ But, whether express or implied, there must actually be a demand. If, having caught V in the act of stealing, D receives and ⁴ See eg Hadjou [1989] Crim LR 390; Ablewhite [2007] EWCA Crim 832 (12 years for conspiracy to blackmail animal breeders); and the strange case of Wedell [2007] EWCA Crim 2878 where D blackmailed V, who had sexually abused him as a child, leading V to kill himself. See also Aziz [2009] EWCA Crim 2337, describing blackmail as 'ugly and cruel' at [17]. In Asare [2008] EWCA Crim 2516, it was noted that, 'the standard case of blackmail falls somewhere between an offence of robbery and an offence of theft', at [3]. More recently, Hughes LJ in DS [2012] EWCA Crim 1470 stated that, 'face-to-face robbery is not an exact analogy to the evil of blackmail', at [12].

⁵ See the case of Breakwell [2009] EWCA Crim 2298, where D sent digitally altered images of Vs' faces on nude bodies with demands that they send him real photos of them nude on threat of him publishing the fakes online. See also the increasingly common practice of hackers threatening to corrupt or to disable a company's website unless payment is made. See M Griffiths, 'Internet Corporate Blackmail: A Growing Problem' (2004) 168 JP 632. See also S Morris, The Future of Netcrime (2004) HORS 62/04, at 15. Greater difficulties of proof might arise in electronic cases: Robinson [2006] Crim LR 427. Blackmailers also plant viruses on people's computers and identify embarrassing material which they use to make demands: the CPS discuss such a case—Ringland (2006) 9 Nov, CCC.

⁶ See P Allridge, 'Attempted Murder of the Soul: Blackmail, Privacy and Secrets' (1993) 13 OJLS 368 and Relocating Criminal Law (2000) Ch 4. See also the suggestion that blackmail is a 'serious offence against the person, even where the threat is one of exposure rather than violence': A Simester and GR Sullivan, 'The Nature and Rationale of Property Offences' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 188. For a sociological view of the activity, see M Hepworth, Blackmail, Publicity and Secrecy in Everyday Life (1975); for an historical account of its expansion in the last century, see A McLaren, Sexual Blackmail (2002).

⁷ See, inter alia, 'Blackmail—A Symposium' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev and L Katz, Ill-Gotten Gains: Evasion, Blackmail, Fraud, and Kindred Puzzles of the Law (1996). For English material, see W Block, 'The Logic of the Argument of Legalising Blackmail' [2001] Bracton LJ 61; W Block and R McGee, 'Blackmail as a Victimless Crime' [1999] Bracton LJ 24.

⁸ See Simester and Sullivan in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 188.

⁹ cf Collister and Warhurst (1955) 39 Cr App R 100, CCA: 'the demeanour of the accused' was sufficient. See also Lambert [2009] EWCA Crim 2860.

¹⁰ cf Robinson (1796) East, II PC, 1110, where the words 'Remember, Sir, I am now only making an appeal to your benevolence' were held in the circumstances capable of importing a demand. In Miah [2003] 1 Cr App R (S) 379, D sent videos of child pornography to Vs with a return address and when they returned them D contacted Vs informing them that their fingerprints were on the videos and 'urging' them or 'inviting' them to call a telephone number. D pleaded guilty and no issue arose as to whether these 'invitations' to call the number were a 'demand'.

accepts an unsolicited offer to buy his silence, D would not be guilty of blackmail (but might commit the offence of withholding for gain information relating to an offence).

A demand may be made through an intermediary.¹¹ It may be complete though it has not been communicated to V because, say, V is deaf. A demand by letter is made where and when it is posted.¹² This issue was addressed recently with reference to communications by email. The Court of Appeal in *Pogmore*¹³ considered whether the English courts had jurisdiction to try D for blackmail where the communication, containing an unwarranted demand with menaces, was sent from abroad to V, who was in this country. Simon LJ held that resolution of this issue was governed by the Criminal Justice Act 1993. By virtue of s 2 of the 1993 Act, the key to establishing jurisdiction is the occurrence of a 'relevant event' within the jurisdiction. If such an event occurs, it is immaterial whether the defendant was at any material time in England and Wales. A 'relevant event' is defined for most purposes as any event which is an essential (or definitional) element of the offence. His lordship held that so far as blackmail is concerned, the communication of a demand was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction if it was sent either (a) from a place in England and Wales to a place elsewhere, or (b) from a place elsewhere to a place in England and Wales.

In these cases, D has done the final act necessary to communicate the demand. The offence is complete irrespective of V's compliance with the demand. It has been argued that the wide interpretation of 'demand' means that there is little or no room for a crime of attempted blackmail,¹⁴ although there are hypothetical scenarios of D being intercepted on his way to the post, or where the email is not sent, etc. Treating the full offence as committed before the demand has been communicated emphasizes that the gravamen of the offence is the making of unwarranted demands per se.

Normally D will demand money or other property but s 21(2) provides that 'the nature of the act or omission demanded is immaterial'. At first sight, this seems to undermine the foundation of the offence being one of protecting property. However, it does not go that far because the offence can be committed only if D also has a view to gain or an intention to cause loss in money or other property.¹⁵ The purpose of s 21(2) seems to have been to forestall a possible argument that D cannot be guilty unless his demand is for some specific item of property.¹⁶ If D demands with menaces that he be given paid employment or demands that V sign a promissory note provided by D,¹⁷ he may be guilty of blackmail if he acts with a view to gain. Demands for sexual intercourse or other acts of a sexual nature are not within the scope of the offence and are dealt with under the Sexual Offences Act 2003.¹⁸

24.1.2 Menaces

The word 'menace' is an ordinary English word which in most cases will be understood by a jury without the need for elaboration.¹⁹ On one view, it might suggest only threats

¹¹ Thumber (1999) No 199900691, 29 Nov, CA.

¹² Treacy v DPP [1971] AC 537, [1971] 1 All ER 110, HL. See PJ Pace, 'Demanding with Menaces' (1971) 121 NLJ 242.

¹³ [2017] EWCA Crim 925.

¹⁴ See Moran (1952) 36 Cr App R 10 at 12; cf JL Edwards, 'Criminal Attempts' (1952) 15 MLR 345.

¹⁵ Theft Act 1968, s 34; and see p 933. ¹⁶ cf Eighth Report, Annex 2.

¹⁷ cf Phipoe (1795) 2 Leach 673, where Mrs Phipoe, armed with a carving knife, 'in the French language threatened, amidst the most opprobrious expressions, to take away [V's] life' unless he signed a promissory note on paper and with materials provided by her.

¹⁸ See Ch 17. Note that the offence of procuring a woman to have sexual intercourse by threats contrary to s 2 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 has not been replicated in the 2003 Act. There are reported convictions for blackmail in these circumstances (eg Downer (2000) 17 Oct, CA), but these must be erroneous.

¹⁹ Lawrence and Pomroy (1971) 57 Cr App R 64, CA.

of violence to persons or property, but under the former law²⁰ ‘menace’ was given a much wider meaning. The CLRC intended to retain this extended meaning in its suggestions for reform. The Committee was well aware of the meaning ‘menace’ had acquired and deliberately chose to use this word when they might have chosen another.²¹ It extends to threats to damage property and to make damaging allegations whether truthful or not. In Thorne v Motor Trade Association,²² Lord Wright said²³ that a menace was a threat of ‘any action detrimental to or unpleasant to the person addressed’. This is a very wide definition.²⁴ The CLRC chose ‘menaces’ in preference to ‘threats’ because, ‘notwithstanding the wide meaning given to “menaces” in Thorne’s case . . . we regard that word as stronger than “threats,” and the consequent slight restriction on the scope of the offence seems to us right’. In view of Lord Wright’s definition of menaces, it might be thought that any theoretical distinction between menaces and threats is wholly illusory in practice,²⁵ but it does perhaps serve to emphasize that there is a limit below which conduct will not be regarded as a menace.

Three situations need to be distinguished:

- (1) Where D has made a demand with a ‘menace’ that would cause a person of ordinary firmness to succumb, V’s subsequent refusal to accede to the demand cannot relieve D of liability. There can be a menace even if V is not intimidated. Thus, D may be guilty of blackmail where he threatens to assault V unless V pays him money, even though V is in no way frightened and squares up to D with the result that D runs away.²⁶
- (2) The law will not treat as a menace words or conduct which would not intimidate or influence anyone to respond to the demand. So, in Harry,²⁷ where the organizers of a student charity ‘Rag’ event had written to shopkeepers offering them immunity from any ‘inconvenience’ resulting from Rag activities in return for donations, the trial judge ruled that there was not sufficient evidence of a menace. Some shopkeepers had complained of the veiled threat in the letter but this menace was not, to use the words of Sellers LJ in Clear,²⁸ ‘of such a nature and extent that the mind of an ordinary person of normal stability and courage might be influenced or made apprehensive so as to accede unwillingly to the demand’.
- (3) However, D’s conduct may amount to a menace even though a person of ordinary firmness would not accede to the demand where, to D’s knowledge, the particular victim, owing to such factors as infirmity, youth, timidity or even plain cowardice, will accede to the demand.²⁹ Indeed, the blackmailer will often select his victim precisely because he is aware of the victim’s vulnerability.³⁰ If D intends that his menace should operate on the mind of V and knows of circumstances that will make V unwillingly accede to the demand, D may properly be convicted of blackmail. Since the offence is completed irrespective of the demand being successfully communicated to V, it is somewhat illogical for this aspect of the offence to be interpreted by reference to the victim’s susceptibilities.³¹

²⁰ Although not called blackmail, see ss 29–31 of the Larceny Act 1916.

²¹ Eighth Report, para 123. ²² [1937] AC 797, HL. ²³ ibid, 817.

²⁴ For an argument that the offence ought to be limited to threats to do unlawful acts, see Green, Lying, Cheating and Stealing, Ch 17. See also Green, 13 Ways, 120–122. For an argument that the definition is so wide that drug dealers might be guilty of blackmailing addicted customers by ‘selling protection from withdrawal symptoms’, see P Alldridge, Relocating Criminal Law, 205–206.

²⁵ See n 22 and L Katz, Ill-Gotten Gains: Evasion, Blackmail, Fraud and Kindred Puzzles of the Law (1996) 157.

²⁶ cf Moran [1952] 1 All ER 803n, CCA. See also Garwood [1987] 1 WLR 319, and Southward [2012] EWCA Crim 2779.

²⁷ [1974] Crim LR 32 (Judge Petre). ²⁸ [1968] 1 All ER 74 at 80, CA.

²⁹ ibid; Garwood [1987] 1 WLR 319, CA. ³⁰ cf Tomlinson [1895] 1 QB 706, CCR.

³¹ See Smith, Property Offences, 15–18.

The case of *Lambert*³² emphasized that blackmail is committed if D threatens V that something will happen to V even if D could not carry out that threat. D in that case claimed to have X held hostage when he did not. D demanded money from V on threat of injuring X. It was not within D's power to carry out the threat to injure X there and then. At trial D argued that s 21 is limited to situations where the person making the demand is proposing to carry out the menace or had it in his power to do so. That would certainly be the typical circumstances of many blackmail charges. The trial judge and Court of Appeal rejected the argument, referring to s 21(2) which states that it is 'immaterial whether the menaces relate to action to be taken by the person making the demand'. That provision was expressly inserted to confirm that there is no need for the demander to be the one who will carry out the menace.³³ However, it seems that s 21 does not quite meet Lambert's argument head-on. His argument was that the person issuing the menaces must be capable of controlling the carrying out of the threat, even if it is performed by another. Read literally there is nothing in the statute to justify such a restriction as a matter of law. Of course, the fact that the demander might not be in a position to carry out the action he threatens is something which might affect whether his conduct constitutes a menace in the particular case. A chain letter in which D asserts that some unpleasantness will befall X unless V pays Y may therefore satisfy the offence subject to the sufficiency of the menace. Nor is there any restriction that the menace will involve actions directly against the person to whom the menace/demand is issued. Such a limitation would render the offence very narrow indeed: it would be an offence to demand property backed by a threat to harm V, but where the threat is to harm V's child. That cannot be right.³⁴

24.1.3 Unwarranted demand

Not every demand accompanied by a menace will amount to blackmail. Clearly, it ought not to be blackmail to demand payment of a debt from V and threaten civil proceedings in the event of his failure to comply. There is a menace (a threat of action detrimental to or unpleasant to the person addressed) but it is in the circumstances a perfectly lawful demand accompanied by a justifiable threat. At the other extreme, a demand by D for property to which he is not legally entitled accompanied by a threat to kill V would be an obvious instance of blackmail.

24.1.3.1 The paradox of blackmail

Between these two extremes in the previous paragraph, less clear-cut cases emerge: D may threaten to expose V's immoral relationship with D unless V pays money which he had promised D;³⁵ D may threaten to publicize V as a defaulter unless he pays a gaming debt;³⁶ D may threaten to publish memoirs which expose V's discreditable conduct unless V 'buys' them from D.³⁷ It is arguable whether the conduct in these cases ought to be blackmail. Indeed, there is an apparent paradox in that while it is lawful for D to make a demand for payment of a debt owed by V, and it is lawful for D to expose or threaten to expose V's immorality, it is blackmail to perform the two in combination.³⁸ This paradox ³² [2009] EWCA Crim 2860.

³³ Eighth Report, Annex 2, 131.

³⁴ See Cesay [2013] 1 Cr App R (S) 529 (101), CA where D faked his own kidnap and sent demands to his pregnant partner.

³⁵ cf Bernhard [1938] 2 KB 264, CCA.

³⁶ cf Norreys v Zeffert [1939] 2 All ER 187, KBD.

³⁷ cf the case discussed in Lord Denning's Report (1963) Cmnd 2152, paras 31–36.

³⁸ Even odder, perhaps, is the acceptance that even if a person is committing blackmail this does not of itself mean that that person has no right to freedom of expression. Lord Atkin pointed out in Thorne that the blackmailer may even be under a duty to disclose the information. Cf AMH v HXW [2010] EWHC 2457 (QB) in which Tugendhat J stated that the fact D is a blackmailer 'is a factor in deciding whether that person has any Art 10 rights . . .', at [38].

has given rise to an extensive academic literature, and a diverse range of theories has been employed in an attempt to justify criminalizing that paradox and indeed the inclusion of the offence of blackmail in a coherent and principled code of criminal law.³⁹ These theories include: analyses of the offence in terms of its economic efficiency;⁴⁰ claims that blackmail is outlawed as a means of prohibiting private law enforcement,⁴¹ and the growth of an industry trading on confidential material which generates fear and inhibits normal lifestyles;⁴² and assertions that the offence prevents D being unjustly enriched through the use of another's interests (V's confidential information and/or the public's 'right to know' about that information).⁴³ Some of the most cogent theoretical explanations for the offence are focused on the coercion and exploitation it involves, even in the paradox cases.⁴⁴ Far from seeing the paradox as creating an anomaly, some eminent American academics have treated blackmail as a paradigmatic crime with its core involving D placing V in a subordinate position.⁴⁵ There are those who argue that the optimal method of solving the paradox of blackmail is to align the law with the lay-person's view of what ought to constitute blackmail.⁴⁶

Given the accumulation of academic commentary, perhaps the following assessment is the most accurate: 'Only one proposition is common to all modern academic writing on blackmail, and that is the proposition that all accounts other than that proposed by the instant author have failed to persuade.'⁴⁷

24.1.3.2 Subjective approach

The Theft Act's pragmatic solution to defining the type of demand that will be unwarranted is provided in s 21. It renders the element something akin to a mens rea element. D's demand will be unwarranted unless made in the belief (a) that there are reasonable grounds for making it, and (b) that the use of the menaces is a proper means of enforcing the demand. The test is subjective: did D believe in the reasonableness of the grounds for making the demand and the propriety of using a menace to enforce the demand? D's belief in the reasonableness of the demand may derive from the fact that V owes him money, or from D's presumption ³⁹ For an interesting review of many of the theories, see J Isenbergh, 'Blackmail from A to C' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1905. There are those who argue that the paradox of blackmail has been overstated: see P Westen, 'Why the Paradox of Blackmail Is So Hard To Resolve' (2012) 9 Ohio State J Crim L 585. Westen argues that the paradox only arises in a narrow range of factual scenarios.

⁴⁰ See further DH Ginsburg and P Shechtman, 'Blackmail: An Economic Analysis of the Law' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1849; R Posner, 'Blackmail, Privacy and Freedom of Contract' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1817.

⁴¹ JG Brown, 'Blackmail as Private Justice' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1935.

⁴² R Epstein, 'Blackmail Inc' (1983) 50 U Chi LR 553.

⁴³ See further J Lindgren, 'Unravelling the Paradox of Blackmail' (1984) 84 Col L Rev 670.

⁴⁴ See further S Altmann, 'A Patchwork Theory of Blackmail' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1639; G Lamond, 'Coercion, Threats and the Puzzle of Blackmail' in A Simester and ATH Smith (eds), Harm and Culpability (1996). More recently, see S Galoob, 'Coercion, Fraud, and What is Wrong with Blackmail' (2016) 22 Legal Theory 22.

⁴⁵ See G Fletcher, 'Blackmail: The Paradigmatic Crime' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1617 and L Katz, 'Blackmail and Other Forms of Arm-Twisting' (1993) 141 U Pa L Rev 1567. The offence continues to excite public and academic interest. See eg SE Sachs, 'Saving Toby: Extortion, Blackmail and the Right to Destroy' (2006) 24 Yale Law & Policy Rev 251 discussing the case of a website where the owner of a rabbit (which was pictured) demanded money from readers to spare it from being killed and eaten.

⁴⁶ PH Robinson, MT Cahill and DM Bartels, 'Competing Theories of Blackmail: An Empirical Research Critique of Criminal Law Theory' (2010) 89 Texas L Rev 291. For criticism, see SP Green, 'Taking It to the Streets' (2010) Texas L Rev 61.

⁴⁷ DA Dripps, 'The Priority of Politics and Procedure over Perfectionism in Penal Law, or, Blackmail in Perspective' (2009) 3 Crim L & Phil 247, 248.

that he has a legal claim against V, or from some other source.⁴⁸ D's belief that the use of menaces is a proper way of enforcing that demand may stem from such factors as his upbringing, and his relationship and past dealings with V.⁴⁹

Suppose that V promises that he will pay D £100 for the sexual favours which he has received from her; V fails to keep his promise whereupon D threatens to expose the relationship to V's regular sexual partner unless he pays.⁵⁰ D's liability would turn upon whether she believed that she had reasonable grounds for demanding the £100, and that her threat to expose V was a proper way of enforcing the demand. All the circumstances have to be taken into account insofar as they are relevant as tending to show or negative the authenticity of D's beliefs. D might have believed (wrongly) that she was legally entitled to the £100 (reasonable grounds) and that it was lawful for her to threaten to expose V to get it (proper means of enforcement). Alternatively, D might have believed that she was morally entitled to enforce payment in this way; this would be enough provided she believed in fact that this was reasonable and proper. One person (eg a lawyer) might feel that she was morally entitled to something and yet recognize that her moral claim would not afford her reasonable grounds for making the demand. Another person might genuinely think that her moral right affords her reasonable grounds. In practice, D may not think precisely in terms of the legality or morality of her conduct, but more in terms of whether or not it is, in a broad way, reasonable.

In Harvey, Ulyett and Plummer,⁵¹ D and his associates paid V £20,000 for what V claimed was a consignment of cannabis but which turned out to be 'a load of rubbish'. Incensed by this swindle, the defendants kidnapped V's wife and child and made threats of serious bodily harm to them and to V unless the money was returned. No doubt a lawyer (or even a reasonably well-informed layman) would have appreciated that in these circumstances the money was not recoverable since it was paid in pursuance of an illegal contract. Such a person might have difficulty in forming a belief that there were reasonable grounds for the demand. But in Harvey the particular defendants felt that they had been swindled ('ripped off to the tune of £20,000' as the trial judge put it) and it was for the jury to determine whether as a matter of fact they believed that their demand was reasonable.⁵²

It has been argued⁵³ that this goes too far: that it is not right that D's own moral standards should determine the rightness or wrongness of his conduct.⁵⁴ The criticism is that the ⁴⁸ cf Kewell [2000] 2 Cr App R (S) 38, where V owed a debt to D but there was little difficulty in establishing that D knew it was improper to threaten to reveal embarrassing but consensually taken photos of V from their period of cohabitation. See now the revenge porn offence in the Criminal Justice and Courts Act 2015, s 33. See also Walker [2010] EWCA Crim 2184 where D threatened that unless paid he would kill V's dog which he had found.

⁴⁹ Several cases of car clamping have given rise to blackmail charges. In Williams [2012] EWCA Crim 1483, the Court of Appeal dismissed DDs' appeals against sentence for conspiracy to blackmail. In so doing, it was observed that: 'The criminality lay in the method of charging. Once a vehicle had been clamped, a release fee was chargeable. Cash was then demanded; but the motorist was never given the opportunity to pay the release fee. Before they could do so, the fees escalated. It was asserted by the appellants that a removal vehicle had been dispatched and a further fee had therefore become payable which, if not paid immediately, could be added to daily storage charges before the vehicle would be released. In some cases the fee demanded ran into hundreds of pounds.' At [10]. Note the offence in the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012, s 54.

⁵⁰ cf Bernhard [1938] 2 KB 264.

⁵¹ (1981) 72 Cr App R 139, CA.

⁵² See also Lambert [2009] EWCA Crim 2860 where D's argument that the threat to injure was to recover a debt was also rejected.

⁵³ By Sir Brian MacKenna, 'Blackmail' [1966] Crim LR 467 at 469.

⁵⁴ See Lambert [1972] Crim LR 422 (Newcastle Crown Court), where Judge John Arnold appears to have accepted that the effect of the section is that the law should give 'efficacy to the defendant's moral judgments whatever they may be'.

mens rea turns not merely on D's subjective beliefs about the circumstances in which he is acting (as in recklessness, etc), but also on D's beliefs about appropriate moral standards. There are a number of responses to this. First, as a practical matter most people do act according to generally accepted legal and moral standards, and the cases must be rare where D can genuinely rely on his own moral standards where these are seriously at odds with accepted norms. Secondly, it is important to note that it is not enough that D feels that his conduct is justified or that it is in some way right for him; 'proper' in this context involves a consideration of what D believes would be generally thought of as proper. While the test of D's belief is subjective, that belief refers to an external standard—that of propriety; D cannot, therefore, take refuge in his own standards when he knows that these are not thought proper by members of society in general.⁵⁵ In this respect, the test reflects that found in the now discredited *Ghosh*⁵⁶ formula of dishonesty. Thirdly, there is a further limitation on the opportunity for D to claim that his own standards apply in evaluating what is a proper means of enforcing a demand. It has been held that if D knows that he is threatening to commit a crime, he cannot maintain that he believes such a threat to be proper.⁵⁷ This is a questionable limitation. The focus must surely remain on the question of D's belief as to the propriety of his use of menaces. The fact that D is aware that his menace would be a crime may be strong evidence that he did not believe it to be a proper means of enforcing the demand, but it is not conclusive.

One consequence of this subjective approach is that D may, in theory, be guilty of blackmail where he believes that he has no reasonable grounds for his demand or that the use of the menaces is improper, even though, viewed objectively, his demand is perfectly reasonable and his threat perfectly proper. Concentrating to this extent on D's state of mind as the criterion of criminality represents something of an innovation in English criminal law, but cases where the matter arises must inevitably be rare.⁵⁸

This element of the offence can also generate problems in evidential terms. In Ashiq,⁵⁹ the Court of Appeal confirmed that following Harvey (above n 51) D had to raise the issue of his belief, and that once it was raised it was for the prosecution to negate it before the jury could be sure the demand was unwarranted. It was only necessary to give the jury a direction on the issue if there was a live issue raised before them in evidence, as to whether a defendant did believe that he had reasonable grounds for making the demand and did believe that the use of menaces was the proper means for reinforcing it.

It should be noted that s 21(2) provides that it is immaterial whether or not the menaces relate to action to be taken by the person making the demand. Consequently, it may amount to blackmail if D makes a demand of V and threatens that E will assault V if he does not comply. The provision was included to prevent any possible argument on this matter.⁶⁰

⁵⁵ cf Griew, Theft, para 14.30. In Harrison [2001] EWCA Crim 1314, where D had been demanding money to which he believed himself to be entitled as compensation for being sacked by V, the judge directed the jury that "proper" was a word of wide meaning—wider than lawful, but no act which was not believed to be lawful could be believed to be proper within the subsection. The test is not what the defendant regarded as justified but what he believed to be proper . . . The Court of Appeal commented that the directions contain a rogue sentence 'proper in that sense . . . meant a suitable and apt way, not threats of unlawful or criminal actions'.

⁵⁶ [1982] QB 1053, p 876 prior to the decision of the Supreme Court in Ivey v Genting Casinos UK Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club) [2017] UKSC 67 to overrule the second limb of that test. See above p 879.

⁵⁷ Harvey, Ulyett and Plummer (1980) 72 Cr App R 139, CA.

⁵⁸ This subjectivism goes even further than that which prevails in the law of attempts. In the context of legally impossible attempts, just because D believes he is doing something that constitutes an offence, D cannot be guilty if no such offence exists as a matter of law. See Taaffe, p 337.

⁵⁹ [2015] EWCA Crim 1617.

⁶⁰ Eighth Report, Annex 2. See also Lambert, n 32.

24.1.4 View to gain or intent to cause loss

It has been noted earlier⁶¹ that the requirement of a view to gain or intent to cause loss operates as a limiting factor on the offence of blackmail. It anchors it, albeit rather precariously, in the scheme of offences protecting property interests.⁶² A threat by D to prosecute V for a theft she has committed unless she has sexual intercourse with D would not amount to blackmail under s 21(1) of the Act, though it might constitute some other offence.⁶³ The Theft Act 1968 is concerned with invasions of economic interests, and gain and loss are defined accordingly in s 34(2)(a):

‘gain’ and ‘loss’ are to be construed as extending only to gain or loss in money or other property, but as extending to any such gain or loss whether temporary or permanent; and—

- (i) ‘gain’ includes a gain by keeping what one has, as well as a gain by getting what one has not; and
- (ii) ‘loss’ includes a loss by not getting what one might get, as well as a loss by parting with what one has.

In the ordinary case of blackmail, D will have both a view to gain (for himself) and an intention to cause loss (to V), but either suffices. D may commit the offence where he intends to cause loss to V without making a gain for himself, as where he demands by threats that Z destroy property belonging to V. In such a case, D clearly intends to cause loss to ‘another’ even though the person threatened is not the person to whom the loss is caused. Conversely, D may act with a view to gain although there is no intention to cause loss. D might demand that V appoint him as a paid director in V’s company: here D has a view to gain for himself but it may well be that, far from intending to cause V loss, he intends to bring him increased profits.

Most often D’s view to gain will be obvious: a blackmailer’s prime objective is normally to get money or other property from V, intending to deprive V permanently of property. Section 34(2)(a) makes it clear, however, that there is no need for the intended gain or loss to be permanent. D might be guilty of blackmail, for example, where by menaces he demands that V make a loan of property. This, again, reflects the fact that the gravamen of the offence is that an unwarranted demand has been made. But will any view to gain—no matter how remote—suffice?⁶⁴ Clearly, there may be a view to gain although the gain is not to materialize for a period of time, or even though the gain may never materialize. D might, by threats, cause his sister to destroy their grandmother’s will on the assumption that this shall be to D’s financial advantage; it can make no difference that granny is on her death bed or is in the best of health, or that she has made another will revoking the one destroyed.⁶⁵ The essence of blackmail is the demand with menaces and the offence is complete whether D succeeds in making a gain thereafter or not.⁶⁶ The interpretation of the concept of ‘view to gain’ has not been fully explored in the case law under s 21, although the courts have acknowledged that the expression does not connote motive.⁶⁷ The academic approach has been to interpret the ⁶¹ At p 997.

⁶² There is a view to gain where D at gunpoint demands that a doctor give him an injection of morphine (morphine is property) to relieve pain: Bevans (1987) 87 Cr App R 64, [1988] Crim LR 236, CA. It is not uncommon for blackmail charges to be laid where one drug gang has demanded drugs from another, backed by threats of violence, eg Hart and Bullen [1999] 2 Cr App R (S) 233.

⁶³ See Ch 17.

⁶⁴ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, paras 12.20–12.21.

⁶⁵ See Custance [2007] EWCA Crim 520.

⁶⁶ cf Moran [1952] 1 All ER 803n, CCA.

⁶⁷ Per Chitty LJ in J Lyons and Sons v Wilkins [1899] 1 Ch 255 at 269–270, considering the offence under s 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875. See also Bevans (1988) 87 Cr App R 64: D’s unwarranted demand with menaces for painkillers was sufficient for blackmail as he did so with a view to gain even though his motive was to alleviate pain.

expression as simply a form of intention.⁶⁸ What is important is that D should have the view to gain in his mind at the time of making the demand; the fact that it has crossed his mind at some stage that there may be a gain involved might not be enough. While it is probably not necessary to show that D's primary purpose in making the demand was to make a gain for himself or another, it must be one of his objectives.⁶⁹ Equally, where it has to be shown that D intended to cause loss to another, the mere foresight that another might suffer some likelihood of loss would be insufficient. Arguably, it should be sufficient that D demands something and in doing so realizes that it is virtually certain to result in his causing loss to V. In Dooley,⁷⁰ the Court of Appeal expressly left open that question.⁷¹

Subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of s 34(2)(a) were introduced to meet a possible argument that D would not be acting with a view to gain, or with intent to cause loss, where the gain or loss had already taken place. An example might be where D owes V £10 and demands by threats that V forgo his claim to the debt; it is quite clear⁷² that D would be acting with a view to gain.

A further difficulty under this section is whether D can be said to have a view to gain or intent to cause loss where he acts under a supposed legal claim of right to the property demanded (the paradox position earlier). Suppose that D, who is owed £100 by V, threatens to expose to V's employers the fact that V is a paedophile unless V pays the debt. D can satisfy the requirement that he believes he has reasonable grounds for making the demand, but it can be assumed (almost invariably) that D does not believe that the use of the menace is a proper means of reinforcing the demand. It was clearly intended by the CLRC that D might be guilty of blackmail if he failed to meet either of the criteria in paras (a) and (b) of s 21(1), irrespective of whether or not D acted under a legal claim of right to the property demanded:

The essential feature of the offence will be that the accused demands something with menaces when he knows either that he has no right to make the demand or that the use of the menaces is improper. This, we believe, will limit the offence to what would ordinarily be thought should be included in blackmail. The true blackmailer will know that he has no reasonable grounds for demanding money as the price of keeping his victim's secret: *the person with a genuine claim will be guilty unless he believes that it is proper to use the menaces to enforce his claim.*⁷³

The offence of blackmail is, however, governed in all cases by the requirement of D having a view to gain or intent to cause loss. It might be argued⁷⁴ that where D demands property to which he is legally entitled (or believes himself to be legally entitled), he has no view to make a gain for himself or to cause loss to another: D makes no gain in getting what he is legally entitled to, and V sustains no loss in paying his lawful debts. In other statutory contexts, gain is sometimes treated as economic gain or profit. However, it has also been held to mean 'acquisition' and this is not necessarily to be equated with the narrower concept of 'profit'.⁷⁵ To construe

⁶⁸ See eg Williams, TBCL, 830.

⁶⁹ This sentence in the 11th edition was approved by the Court of Appeal in Dooley [2005] EWCA Crim 3093, [14].

⁷⁰ [2005] EWCA Crim 3093.

⁷¹ See further the commentary at [2006] Crim LR 544. In that case, it was held that D possesses child pornography 'with a view to' it being shown to others if he intends to do so; and it is not enough that he knew that others could access it from his computer if he did not actually 'want' this.

⁷² Or is it? See Golechha [1989] 3 All ER 908, [1990] Crim LR 865, CA, p 987.

⁷³ Eighth Report, para 121 (emphasis added).

⁷⁴ B Hogan, 'Blackmail' [1966] Crim LR 474, 476. Cf Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 12.28. Cf Griew, Theft, paras 14.25–14.28.

⁷⁵ cf Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 12.28; and authorities there cited.

it as meaning acquisition would certainly be consistent with the CLRC's intentions.⁷⁶ In Lawrence and Pomroy,⁷⁷ where D and E were convicted of blackmail in making threats to recover a debt, it appears to have been assumed by the Court of Appeal, though the point was not directly argued,⁷⁸ that D and E had a view to gain. This accords with s 21(2) which emphasizes that the 'nature of the act or omission demanded is immaterial'. A literal interpretation should mean that a demand for a debt legally owed will suffice for the offence.⁷⁹

By the same token, D intends V to lose a particular item even if D is prepared to replace it with one of identical value.⁸⁰

24.2 Unlawful harassment of debtors

Section 40 of the Administration of Justice Act 1970 which creates an offence of unlawful harassment of debtors is worth noting. The offence was created to curb the growing practice of enforcing the payment of debts in a fashion that is unreasonable, unfair or improper; such as where a creditor calls at the debtor's house to make a demand and is accompanied by large, fierce and hungry-looking Rottweilers. The offence is wider than blackmail in that it may cover conduct that the creditor believes to be proper as a means of enforcing the debt.

24.3 Other offences based on threats

There are numerous other offences based on threats, including: threats to kill,⁸¹ assaults,⁸² robbery,⁸³ threats to damage property,⁸⁴ threats of food terrorism,⁸⁵ threats of violence for the purpose of securing entry to premises,⁸⁶ sending malicious communications⁸⁷ and demanding payment for unsolicited goods with threats.⁸⁸ There is disappointingly little coherence in English law's approach to threat offences.⁸⁹ The Law Commission has recommended the creation of an offence of threat to rape.⁹⁰

⁷⁶ As expressed in the passage cited at n 73. But the Committee also characterized blackmail as an offence of dishonesty (cf paras 118 and 122) and one who demands that to which he believes he is legally entitled is not acting dishonestly: cf Skivington [1968] 1 QB 166 CA, and Robinson [1977] Crim LR 173, p 896.

⁷⁷ (1971) 57 Cr App R 64, CA.

⁷⁸ The point was argued in Parkes [1973] Crim LR 358 (Judge Dean), where it was ruled that a person demanding money undoubtedly owed to him did have a view to gain and approved in A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] EWCA Crim 1768, [2003] 1 Cr App R 131.

⁷⁹ Considered in A-G's Reference (No 1 of 2001) [2002] EWCA Crim 1768, [2003] 1 Cr App R 131 in the context of false accounting. Cf Houston [2011] EWCA Crim 3030 in which the Court of Appeal observed that 'blackmail in order to collect a debt is always a serious matter', at [14].

⁸⁰ See Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 12.31.

⁸¹ OAPA 1861, s 16.

⁸² Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 39.

⁸³ Theft Act 1968, s 8.

⁸⁴ Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 2.

⁸⁵ Public Order Act 1986, s 38.

⁸⁶ Criminal Law Act 1977, s 6(1).

⁸⁷ Malicious Communications Act 1988, s 1, as extended by the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, s 43.

⁸⁸ Unsolicited Goods and Services Act 1971, s 2(2).

⁸⁹ This passage in the 13th edition was cited with approval by Lord Judge CJ in Chambers v DPP [2012] EWHC 2157 (Admin), [27]. See P Alldridge, 'Threats Offences: A Case for Reform' [1994] Crim LR 176.

⁹⁰ See LC 361 (2015).

Burglary and related offences

Burglary is an offence under the Theft Act 1968 and is much broader than the common (mis)understanding of a ‘breaking and entering’ in order to steal.

25.1 Burglary

Section 9 of the Theft Act 1968 provides:¹

- (1) A person^[2] is guilty of burglary if—
 - (a) he enters any building or part of a building as a trespasser and with intent to commit any such offence as is mentioned in subsection (2) below; or
 - (b) having entered any building or part of a building as a trespasser he steals or attempts to steal anything in the building or that part of it or inflicts or attempts to inflict on any person therein any grievous bodily harm.
- (2) The offences referred to in subsection (1)(a) above are offences of stealing anything in the building or part of a building in question, of inflicting on any person therein any grievous bodily harm [...] ^[3] therein, and of doing unlawful damage to the building or anything therein.
- (3) A person guilty of burglary shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding—
 - (a) where the offence was committed in respect of a building or part of a building which is a dwelling, fourteen years;
 - (b) in any other case, ten years.^[4]
- (4) References in subsections (1) and (2) above to a building, and the reference in subsection (3) above to a building which is a dwelling, shall apply also to an inhabited vehicle or vessel, and shall apply to any such vehicle or vessel at times when the person having a habitation in it is not there as well as at times when he is.⁵

¹ For further analysis see Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, Ch 8; Griew, Theft, Ch 4; Smith, Property Offences, Ch 28.

² In Deutsche Genossenschaftsbank v Burnhope [1996] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 113, 123, the majority of the House of Lords found on the facts of that case that the company in question had not committed a burglary. However, Lord Steyn, dissenting, had no doubt that a company could commit burglary where, eg, a company chairman dishonestly instructs an innocent employee to enter V’s warehouse and remove valuables.

³ The offence of entering a building with intent to commit rape was repealed by the SOA 2003, Sch 7, para 1. Section 63 of that Act creates a much broader offence: see p 819.

⁴ For current sentencing practice, see Sentencing Council, Burglary Offences: Definitive Guideline (2011). Sentencing for burglary is controversial, arousing strong public emotion and common misunderstanding; see M Davies, ‘Filling in the Gaps’ [2003] Crim LR 243.

⁵ Section 9(3) and (4) as substituted by the Criminal Justice Act 1991, amended by the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 (PCC(S)A 2000), s 111.

Section 9(1)(a) describes three separate ways the offence can be committed (entering with intent to steal, commit grievous bodily harm or unlawful damage), each of which can be committed by entry into either a dwelling (a 'domestic burglary')⁶ or other building. Because there are separate sentencing provisions depending on whether the building in question is a dwelling, s 9(1)(a) effectively creates six separate offences. All these offences are committed once D has entered as a trespasser with the necessary intent,⁷ irrespective of whether or not he succeeds in the intended theft, grievous bodily harm, etc.⁸

Section 9(1)(b) creates four separate forms of burglary (attempting to steal, stealing, attempting to inflict grievous bodily harm and inflicting grievous bodily harm). Again, each of these forms can be committed as either a domestic burglary or otherwise, with separate sentencing regimes applying for domestic burglaries.

A person charged with an offence under s 9(1)(b) may be convicted of an offence under s 9(1)(a) because (however contrary to the facts it may seem) the allegation of an offence under s 9(1)(b) is held to include an allegation of an offence under s 9(1)(a).⁹

The law seems to be unduly technical, and is very different from the layman's conception of burglary. More importantly, the offence definition does not reveal the principal harms and wrongs against which it offers protection—possibilities are the invasion of private space, the risk of violent confrontation or aggravated forms of theft.¹⁰ There are powerful arguments that the offence encompasses so many qualitatively different types of wrongdoing under one label that it deserves reformulation.¹¹ It is qualitatively different from a mere attempt to commit theft or damage or cause injury.¹²

25.1.1 Actus reus

25.1.1.1 Enters

At common law, it was sufficient that any part of the body, however small, was inserted into the building or structure. Where D pushed in a windowpane and the forepart of his finger was observed inside the building that was enough.¹³ The 1968 Act gives no express guidance on this issue and Parliament seems to have assumed that the common law rules would apply.¹⁴ In the famous case of Collins,¹⁵ D, naked but for his socks, had climbed up a ladder to a bedroom window with intent to rape the woman inside the bedroom. The woman, believing him to be her boyfriend and seeing him on the windowsill silhouetted with an erect penis invited him in. It was not clear whether he was on the sill outside the window or on the inner sill at the moment when she made her invitation and he ceased to be a trespasser. Generations of law students have pondered whether any part of D might have been inside the building at that point in time. Edmund Davies LJ in Collins held that ⁶ Under s 111 of the PCC(S)A 2000. Burglary comprising the commission of, or an intention to commit, an offence triable only on indictment and burglary in a dwelling where any person in the dwelling was subjected to violence or the threat of violence are triable on indictment only: Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, Sch 1, para 28; McGrath [2003] EWCA Crim 2062, [2004] Crim LR 142.

⁷ Watson [1989] Crim LR 733; Toothill [1998] Crim LR 876.

⁸ D can, if successful, still be charged under s 9(1)(a): Taylor [1979] Crim LR 649.

⁹ Whiting (1987) 85 Cr App R 78, applying Wilson and Jenkins [1984] AC 242, HL. Whiting is criticized at [1987] Crim LR 473. See also the CLRC Eighth Report, para 76. See Chevannes [2009] EWCA Crim 2725, n 111.

¹⁰ See Horder, APOCL, 411.

¹¹ B Mitchell, 'Multiple Wrongdoing and Offence Structure' (2001) 64 MLR 393.

¹² GR Sullivan and AP Simester, 'On the Nature and Rationale of Property Offences' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 168 at 192; Duff, Answering for Crime, 127–128. See also G Yaffe, Attempts (2010) Ch 12; J Gardner, Offences and Defences (2010); Green, 13 Ways.

¹³ Davis (1823) Russ & Ry 499.

¹⁴ HL Deb, 11 Mar 1968, vol 290, cols 85–86.

¹⁵ [1973] QB 100 at 106. This was at a time when burglary included trespassing with intent to rape.

to constitute burglary there must be 'an effective and substantial entry' as a trespasser. Later cases, however, do not support this opinion. In Brown,¹⁶ there was a sufficient entry where D's feet were on the ground outside a shop and the top half of his body was inside the broken shop window, as if he was rummaging for goods. The court said that the word 'substantial' did not materially assist but the entry must be 'effective' and here it was: D was presumably in a position to steal. In Ryan,¹⁷ D became trapped by the neck with only his head and right arm inside the window, but the court rejected the argument that because D could not have stolen anything this was not capable of constituting an entry. But strictly, Ryan decided only that there was evidence on which a jury could find that D had entered.

It is submitted that it cannot be required that D must have got so far into the building as to be able to accomplish his unlawful purpose. D who intends to inflict grievous bodily harm is guilty of burglary when he enters through the ground-floor window even though V is on the fourth floor. The act of entry need not, therefore, be either an 'effective' or a 'substantial' entry. It is unsatisfactory that such a crucial actus reus element of a serious offence should be left for a jury to determine; the best course would be to accept the continued existence of the common law rule: any entry no matter how slight should suffice.

At common law, if D inserted an instrument into the building for the purpose of committing the ulterior offence (theft, etc), there was an entry even though no part of the body was introduced into the building. It was enough that hooks were inserted into the premises to drag out the carpets (theft), or that the barrel of a gun was introduced with a view to shooting someone inside (GBH). However, the insertion of an instrument merely for the purpose of gaining entry and not for the purpose of committing the ulterior offence was not an entry if no part of the body entered.¹⁸ If D bored a hole in a door with a drill for the purpose of gaining entry, the emergence of the point of the drill bit on the inside of the door was not an entry. Under the 1968 Act, even if the courts are willing to follow the common law in holding that the intrusion of any part of the body is an entry, they may be more reluctant to preserve these technical rules regarding instruments. The rules do seem to produce outlandish results—there would be an entry if a stick of dynamite is thrown into the building, or if a bullet is fired from outside the building into it, or if a bomb is sent by post (assuming that such acts are not done merely to gain access to the building). The 1968 Act was said to be written in 'simple language as used and understood by ordinary literate men and women', but these examples are not what an ordinary person would describe as an 'entry'. Perhaps D must at least be present at the scene, or 'on the job'. Arguably, a distinction should be drawn between cases where D causes an instrument to enter V's building (eg by throwing it), and those where the instrument entering V's building represents an extension of D's body (as where he uses a telescopic pole).¹⁹ These issues do not seem to have given rise to difficulty under the Act, perhaps due to the sensible use of more suitable charges such as theft or GBH or attempting such.

If it is conceded that inserting an inanimate instrument is not an entry, are we to distinguish between inanimate and animate instruments? Suppose that instead of an instrument, D sends in a monkey. Is that an entry? At common law, burglary could be committed by an innocent agent as, for example, if D sent a child under the age of ten into the building to steal.²⁰

¹⁶ [1985] Crim LR 212, CA. ¹⁷ [1996] Crim LR 320, (1996) 160 JP 610, CA.

¹⁸ eg Horncastle [2006] EWCA Crim 1736 (pole through letterbox to hook door keys from shelf).

¹⁹ cf Griew, Theft, para 4.21. The offence has been used successfully where, eg, D has used a mechanical digger to steal a cash dispenser by ripping it from the wall of a bank: Richardson and Brown [1998] 2 Cr App R (S) 87; cf Sang [2003] EWCA Crim 2411 (going equipped for burglary with fishing rod bound with Sellotape to extract car keys through letterboxes).

²⁰ Hale, I PC, 555.

25.1.1.2 As a trespasser

In all cases of burglary it must be shown that D entered the building as a trespasser.²¹ Trespass is a legal concept and it is necessary to look to the law of tort to understand its meaning.²² It would appear that as a matter of civil law any intentional, reckless or (possibly) negligent entry into a building is a trespass if the building is in fact in the possession of another who does not consent to the entry. In burglary there must be a trespass in fact and the prosecution must show that D knew or was reckless as to whether or not he was a trespasser. Trespass can be proved without evidence from the occupier in person.²³

What if D's entry is involuntary? So if, having been dragged against his will into V's house and left there by drunken companions, he steals V's vase and leaves, this is not burglary at the time of the entry. That offence is committed not at that point, but when the ulterior crime is committed; at that time D knew that he had entered as a trespasser.²⁴

In tort, a mistake as to the building being entered is no defence: if D on a very dark night entered his neighbour's house by mistake he would be regarded as having intentionally entered and trespassed. It would be a tortious trespass even if D's mistake was a reasonable one, and even more so if it were negligent as, for example, if D made the mistake because he was drunk. In criminal law, for D to be guilty of burglary it is necessary to show he was a trespasser (as defined in the civil law) but that is not sufficient: the criminal law also requires mens rea. If D is charged under s 9(1)(a), it need not be proved that D knew that as a matter of law that he was a trespasser. It must, however, be proved that, when he entered, he knew the facts which caused him to be a trespasser, or at least that he was reckless as to whether or not those facts existed.²⁵ A merely negligent entry, as where D enters another's house honestly but unreasonably believing it to be his own, is not enough to constitute burglary. D would also lack the mens rea for burglary if he believed he had a right to enter. Imagine that D, being separated from his wife, wrongly supposes that he has a right to enter the matrimonial home of which she is the owner-occupier and D enters with intent to inflict grievous bodily harm upon her. Even if he is a trespasser in law, D is not a burglar.²⁶

Problems can arise when D has been invited to enter for a particular purpose or by a person in the household who is not the owner. In Collins,²⁷ D was invited in to have sex by the daughter of the householder. It was held that, whatever the position in the law of tort, the daughter's invitation, even without the knowledge or consent of the occupier (parent), meant that D was not a trespasser for the purpose of burglary.

Where the invitation to enter is issued by a member of the household, it is submitted that the crucial question will often be that of D's mens rea: did D know, or was he reckless as to whether or not, the invitation from that person was issued without the relevant authority? If in Collins she had invited her lover, D, into her parent's house to steal her parent's property that ought to be burglary if D realized that she had no right to invite him in for this purpose.

²¹ In McEneff [2014] EWCA Crim 1633, the Crown conceded that the judge had misdirected the jury by seeming to introduce into the law of burglary the concept of trespass ab initio. This concept has no place here. If D enters a building otherwise than as a trespasser, he is not guilty of burglary.

²² See E Peel and J Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) Ch 14.

²³ Maccuish [1999] 6 Arch News 2, CA.

²⁴ The common law doctrine of trespass ab initio was held not to apply to burglary under the Theft Act: Collins [1973] QB 100 at 107. See JC Smith, The Law of Theft (2nd edn, 1972) paras 377–378 and (4th edn, 1979) paras 338–339.

²⁵ Collins [1973] QB 100 at 104–105. 'Reckless' is used in the subjective sense: Cunningham [1957] 2 QB 396 and G [2003] UKHL 50. See p 101. D need not know the civil law of trespass. The jury may need an express direction on recklessness: Phillips [2012] EWCA Crim 2149.

²⁶ There are of course other offences, particularly those of violence, with which he could be charged.

²⁷ [1973] QB 100 at 107. Cf Robson v Hallett [1967] 2 QB 939 (invitation by occupier's son effective until withdrawn by occupier).

This issue highlights the problem that burglary protects against a number of harms—the trespass, and the ulterior harms—and the interests being protected may be those of different individuals.²⁸

In Jones and Smith,²⁹ the occupier's son, D, had a general permission to enter his father's house. He entered the house with E for the purpose of stealing. This constituted burglary. D had knowingly exceeded the permission granted to him by his father. It is perhaps noteworthy that this was a case 'where [D and E] took elaborate precautions, going there at dead of night'; and that, even if D's entry was covered by his father's general permission, this would scarcely extend to the entry of his accomplice. If E's entry was unlawful, D abetted it. Glanville Williams³⁰ argued that Jones and Smith is wrongly decided, being inconsistent with Collins,³¹ because Collins exceeded permission since he entered intending to rape if necessary; that is, if the woman in the bedroom had not consented. But as the girl saw him to be 'a naked male with an erect penis' it seems that she invited him in expressly for the purpose of sexual intercourse, that he knew he was so invited and that any intention to rape must have lapsed by the time of the trespass when he entered the building.

Mistake as to identity, where identity is material, generally vitiates consent. So where V's invitation to enter is based on a mistake as to the identity of D who is being invited in, there will be a trespass if D knew the mistake was being made. If Collins had known of the woman's mistake as to his identity he would have intentionally entered as a trespasser.

Where D gains entry by deception he enters as a trespasser.³² For example, D is a trespasser if he gains admission to V's house by falsely pretending that he has been sent by the utility company to check the meter. The cases have taken a broad reading of trespass and this has serious consequences for the offence of burglary.

A person with limited authority to enter for a particular purpose enters as a trespasser, though he practises no deception, if he has an unlawful purpose outside the scope of that limited authority. Thus, in Taylor v Jackson,³³ D, who had express permission to go on V's land and hunt for rabbits, went there instead to hunt for hares. The Divisional Court held that this was evidence of trespass in pursuit of game, contrary to s 30 of the Game Act 1831. In Hillen and Pettigrew v ICI (Alkali) Ltd,³⁴ members of a stevedore's gang who had permission to enter a barge for the limited purpose of unloading it were held to be trespassers when they placed kegs on the hatch covers, knowing that this was a wrong and dangerous thing to do.³⁵ Lord Atkin stated:

As Scrutton LJ has pointedly said: 'When you invite a person into your house to use the staircase you do not invite him to slide down the banisters.'^[36] So far as he sets foot on so much of the premises as lie outside the invitation or uses them for purposes which are alien to the invitation he is not an invitee but a trespasser . . .

In Farrington v Thomson and Bridgland,³⁷ an Australian court held that a police officer was a trespasser when he entered a hotel for the purpose of committing a tort. The implied invitation to the public to enter the hotel did not extend to persons entering for the purpose ²⁸ Burglary does not require that the ulterior offence should concern the occupier. If D and E enter V's house without V's consent, technically it would amount to burglary were D to steal E's wallet or inflict on E grievous bodily harm.

²⁹ [1976] 3 All ER 54, CA. ³⁰ TBCL, 846–850.

³¹ cf Mason J in Barker v R (1983) 7 ALJR 426 at 429: 'The foundation for [Williams'] conclusion is too frail.'

³² There is no need to distinguish between entry under a licence that is void and one that is merely voidable; entry under either is a trespass.

³³ (1898) 78 LT 555. ³⁴ [1936] AC 65.

³⁵ They were not therefore entitled to damages for injury when the covers collapsed.

³⁶ The Carlgarth [1927] P 93 at 110.

³⁷ [1959] VR 286 (Smith J). See also Gross v Wright [1923] 2 DLR 171.

of committing torts or crimes. In Barker v R,³⁸ V asked his neighbour, D, to keep an eye on his house while he was away on holiday. Having been told the whereabouts of a concealed key in case he needed to enter, D entered in order to steal. The High Court of Australia held that D had committed burglary: 'If a person enters for a purpose outside the scope of his authority then he stands in no better position than a person who enters with no authority at all.'³⁹ One decision goes against this view. In Byrne v Kinematograph Renters Society Ltd,⁴⁰ Harman J held that it was not trespass to gain entry to a cinema by buying tickets with the purpose, not of seeing the film, but of counting the patrons. This decision is against the weight of authority and, it is submitted, should not be followed.

It seems, therefore, that a person who enters a shop for the sole purpose of shoplifting is a burglar, though two of the majority in Barker thought otherwise. In their view, where the permission to enter is not limited by reference to purpose, a person with permission to enter is not a trespasser merely because he enters with a secret unlawful intent. It was argued that the shopkeeper's invitation to the public is not limited by reference to a specific purpose: 'the mere presence of the prospective customer upon the premises is itself likely to be an object of the invitation and a person will be within the invitation if he enters for no particular purpose at all'.⁴¹ It is doubtful, however, if the shopkeeper's invitation can be said to extend to those who enter for the sole purpose of shoplifting. It is only in the exceptional case that it will be possible to prove this particular intent at the time of entry—as where there is evidence of a previous conspiracy, or system, or preparatory acts such as the wearing of a jacket with special pockets. Such an entry may be no more than a merely preparatory act to stealing (and so not amount to attempted theft); but it ought to be possible, where there is clear evidence, to secure a conviction for burglary. Few would object to the conviction of burglary of bank robbers who enter the bank flourishing firearms, for they are clearly outside the invitation extended by the bank to the public. A person who enters a shop for the sole purpose of murdering the manager is surely a trespasser; the case of the intending thief is no different in principle.

This extension of the law beyond what was intended by the CLRC⁴² is significant in terms of the number of people potentially at risk of prosecution for burglary. This wider interpretation echoes the view expressed by Fletcher that the emphasis in burglary has shifted from an act of manifest illegality—'breaking' and entering—to an illicit entry where the principal element of blameworthiness lies in the criminal intent.⁴³ The cumulative effect of the extension in Jones and Smith with that of the major House of Lords decisions in theft cases must also be considered.⁴⁴ Consider D, an antiques dealer who calls on gullible old people with the intention of tricking them into selling him their priceless heirlooms for a gross undervalue. This is clearly fraud, but following Hinks seemingly also theft with the result that D could be guilty of burglary.

The decision in Jones and Smith does, however, have the advantage of emphasizing the importance of mens rea and reducing the reliance within the criminal law on the intricacies ³⁸ (1983) 7 ALJR 426 (Murphy J dissenting).

³⁹ Per Mason J at 429.

⁴⁰ [1958] 2 All ER 579 at 593; distinguished in Jones, p 1011, and by Mason J in Barker v R (1983) 7 ALJR 426 at 429 on the ground that 'the invitation by the lessee of the cinema to the public to enter the cinema was in very general terms and could on no view be said to be limited in the way in which was contended'. See more also Taylor [2004] VSCA 189 and Lambourn [2007] VSCA 187.

⁴¹ Brennan and Deane JJ (1983) 7 ALJR at 436. See also Williams, TBCL, 'a person who has a licence in fact to enter does not become a trespasser by reason of his criminal intent', at 846, see further 846–849; PJ Pace, 'Burglarious Trespass' [1985] Crim LR 716; ATH Smith, 'Shoplifting and the Theft Acts' [1981] Crim LR 586. A burglarious shoplifter should be sentenced in accordance with shoplifting guidelines rather than burglary guidelines: Creed [2005] EWCA Crim 215.

⁴² See Eighth Report, para 35.

⁴³ See G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1977) 128.

⁴⁴ See p 828.

of the civil law of trespass.⁴⁵ It has been suggested that to keep the Jones and Smith extension within desirable limits, a distinction might be drawn between buildings that are open to the public and others that are not,⁴⁶ but such a distinction might create an unnecessary layer of technicality. Buildings are increasingly commonly quasi-public⁴⁷ (consider, eg, large shopping centres) and this distinction might cast further doubts on the ability of the tort of trespass to provide a sufficiently clear foundation for the offence in this context.

25.1.1.3 The victim of the burglary

Trespass is an interference with possession. Burglary is therefore committed against the person in possession of the building entered. Thus, where the premises are rented, burglary is committed against the tenant and not against the landlord. The landlord could commit burglary of the premises, the tenant could not.⁴⁸ Historically, it was held that where an employee occupies premises belonging to his employer for the more convenient performance of his duties (eg a caretaker living on site), the employer is not a trespasser if he enters the premises.⁴⁹ In such a case it is, of course, necessary to look at the precise terms of the arrangement between the parties. If the employee has been given exclusive possession, he would be the victim of a trespass. In cases where the employee is not the victim of a trespass by his employer, that does not mean that the employee cannot be the victim of trespass by a third party.⁵⁰ The position of a lodger also depends on the precise terms of his contract. If he has exclusive possession so that he can refuse entry to the landlord, then he may maintain trespass. Many lodgers, however, do not have such possession and in such cases an unauthorized entry by a third party is a trespass against the landlord.

It seems to follow that burglary is not committed where an hotelier enters the room of a guest, even though the entry is with intent to steal and is without the guest's consent. Depending on the terms of the contract, the same may be true in the case of an employer entering premises occupied by his employee for the purposes of his employment or a landlord entering the rooms of his lodger. There is no glaring deficiency in the law since charges of attempted or actual theft will lie in either case.

It is possible to charge burglary even though the indictment does not allege that the building was the property of anyone.⁵¹ There must be a trespass, so evidence must be offered that someone other than the accused was in possession.

25.1.1.4 Any building or part of a building

The meaning of 'building' has frequently been considered by the courts in interpreting numerous statutes.⁵² The meaning of the term varies according to context,⁵³ and many ⁴⁵ Horder, APOCL, 412.

⁴⁶ Smith, Property Offences, paras 28–14, referring to the American Model Penal Code, § 221.1.

⁴⁷ See K Gray and S Gray, 'Civil Rights, Civil Wrongs and Quasi-Public Space' [1999] 1 EHRLR 46, discussed in the breach of the peace case, Porter v MPC (1999) 20 Oct, unreported, CA (Civ Div).

⁴⁸ In contrast, a guest in a hotel will not ordinarily have sufficient possession of his room in law to enable him to sue in trespass. A burglary of a hotel room will be against the hotelier. Sentencing in such cases is as if the burglary was a domestic one: Cook [2007] EWCA Crim 7.

⁴⁹ Mayhew v Suttle (1854) 4 E & B 347; White v Bayley (1861) 10 CBNS 227.

⁵⁰ Though in White v Bayley (n 49) Byles J thought, obiter, that an action could not have been maintained by the servant against a stranger (10 CBNS at 235).

⁵¹ cf the Larceny Act 1916 which required that the breaking and entering be of the dwelling-house of another. See JN Adams, 'Trespass under the Theft and Firearms Act' (1969) 119 NLJ 655.

⁵² An early example is Manning and Rogers (1871) LR 1 CCR 338.

⁵³ See the explicit statement to this effect from Lord Neuberger MR in R (Ghai) v Newcastle City Council [2010] EWCA Civ 59, [22].

things have been held to be buildings for other purposes. According to Lord Esher MR, its 'ordinary and usual meaning is, a block of brick or stone work, covered in by a roof'.⁵⁴ It seems clear, however, that for the purposes of the offence of burglary, it is not necessary that the structure be of brick or stone to be a building. All dwellings are protected, regardless of their material of construction, and the Act expressly includes 'an inhabited vehicle or vessel'.

To constitute a building, the structure must have some degree of permanence.⁵⁵ Moveable structures which are intended for use as offices, workshops and stores ('portakabins') may fairly be regarded as buildings though their intended use on a given site is only temporary. It has been generally assumed that a tent cannot be a building,⁵⁶ notwithstanding that it is occupied on a particular site indefinitely. A structure may be a building even though its construction is flimsy.

The structure does not need to be one occupied by people. Farm outbuildings (eg stables, barns or silos) used to house animals or products are buildings for the purposes of burglary, as are factory buildings and stores. The detached garage, shed or greenhouse in the grounds of a dwelling are similarly protected.

Potential problems also arise regarding at which point in the process of erection a structure becomes a building. In Manning and Rogers,⁵⁷ Lush J said: 'it is sufficient that it should be a connected and entire structure. I do not think four walls erected a foot high would be a building.' In that case all the walls were built and the roof was on, so it was obvious that the structure was a building. It is possible that a structure with a roof and no walls, such as a bandstand, is a building. So too, a structure which is intended to have a roof—a house where the walls are complete but not yet roofed or a house which has lost its roof in a hurricane. It has been held in a different context that 'a mere structure or superstructure composed of a steel and concrete frame [as yet] having no roof' could constitute a building.⁵⁸

Lines must be drawn and it will not always be easy to do so.⁵⁹ The courts would probably hold, following Brutus v Cozens,⁶⁰ that 'building' is an ordinary word the meaning of which is 'a matter of fact and degree' to be determined by the trier of fact. The judge must at least rule whether or not there is evidence on which a reasonable jury could find the structure to be a building. As with the concept of entry, it is unfortunate that one of the essential elements of the offence is left to be determined by the trier of fact.

⁵⁴ Moir v Williams [1892] 1 QB 264. Cf Byles J in Stevens v Gourley (1859) 7 CBNS 99 at 112: 'a structure of considerable size and intended to be permanent or at least to endure for a considerable time'. This statement was put into context in the Ghai case where it was suggested that 'building in normal parlance is naturally used to describe a significantly wider range of structures than would be included in Lord Esher's inclusion of brick or stonework covered by a roof', at [24].

⁵⁵ There is authority that a structure is capable of being a 'building' notwithstanding that it is 'implanted within another building': Royal Exchange Theatre Trust v The Commissioners [1978] VATTR 139.

⁵⁶ See CLRC, Eighth Report, para 78. This is certainly questionable in the case of, eg, a substantial marquee housing many facilities. Cf Storn (1865) 5 SCR (NSW) 26.

⁵⁷ (1871) LR 1 CCR 338.

⁵⁸ Ealing London Borough Council, ex p Zainuddin [1994] 2 PLR 1 at 4, per Tucker LJ.

⁵⁹ Contrast B and S v Leathley [1979] Crim LR 314 (Carlisle CC) and Norfolk Constabulary v Seekings and Gould [1986] Crim LR 167 (Norfolk CC). In the former, it was held that a freezer container detached from its chassis, resting on railway sleepers and used to store frozen food, was a building; in the latter it was held that two similar containers, still on their wheeled chassis, remained vehicles though they were, as in the first case, being used by a supermarket to provide temporary storage space. Cf King [1978] 19 SASR 118 (walk-in freezer could be a building).

⁶⁰ [1973] AC 854, HL.

The extent of a 'building'

Under the very complex pre-1968 law, the entry had to be into a particular dwelling-house, office, shop, garage, etc. A single structure might contain many dwelling-houses (eg a block of flats) or many offices, shops or garages. If D entered through the window of Flat 1 with intent to pass through it, to go to the communal staircase and steal in Flat 45, the breaking and entering of Flat 1 was neither burglary nor housebreaking because D did not intend to commit a crime therein.⁶¹

Under the Theft Act, everything depends on the extent of a 'building'.⁶² In its ordinary natural meaning, this term could certainly include a block of flats. Adopting that meaning, D's entry through the window of Flat 1 as a trespasser with intent to pass through, go to the communal stairs and steal in Flat 45 is an entry of a building as a trespasser with intent to steal therein—it is burglary. The effect is to criminalize as burglary what was previously, at most, an attempt, and probably only an act of preparation. There are good reasons why the law should be extended in this way: it enables the police to intervene at the earliest possible moment to prevent such offences, and forestalls the unmeritorious plea by D: 'I had no intention to steal in the flat—I was only using it as a passage to steal in another flat which I never reached'. It is submitted, therefore, that the word 'building' should be given its natural meaning.

Part of a building

It is sufficient if the trespass takes place in part of a building. So, for example, one lodger may commit burglary by entering the room of another lodger within the same house, or by entering the part of the house occupied by the landlord. Similarly, a guest in a hotel may commit burglary by entering the room of another guest. A customer in a shop who goes behind the counter and takes money from the till would be guilty of burglary. He enters that part of the building as a trespasser, even though he entered the shop (the building) with the shopkeeper's permission. The permission did not extend to his going behind the counter.⁶³

What is 'a part' of the building may be a difficult and important question. Take a case put by the CLRC:⁶⁴ D enters a shop lawfully⁶⁵ but conceals himself on the premises until closing time and then emerges with intent to steal. When concealing himself D may or may not have entered a part of the building to which customers are not permitted to go. Even if he did commit a trespass at this stage because the area was off limits to customers, D may not have done so with intent to commit an offence in that part of the building. For example, D hides in the cleaning cupboard of a supermarket, intending to emerge and steal goods. The cupboard is not an area that customers are permitted to enter. D's entry of that room, even during opening hours, is a trespass. It is a trespass committed with intent to steal, but is not burglary, for D has no intent to steal in the part of the building (cupboard) that he has entered as a trespasser. When he emerges from the cupboard after the shop has closed, ⁶¹ cf Wrigley [1957] Crim LR 57. It was probably not even an attempt, not being sufficiently proximate to the intended crime.

⁶² In Hedley v Webb [1901] 2 Ch 126, Cozens-Hardy J held that two semi-detached houses were a single building for the purpose of determining whether there was a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875, s 4. In Birch v Wigan Corp'n [1953] 1 QB 136, the Court of Appeal (Denning LJ dissenting) held that one house in a terrace of six was a 'house' within the meaning of s 11(1) and (4) of the Housing Act 1936 and not 'part of a building' within s 12 of that Act. Since the sections were mutually exclusive, the house could not be both a 'house' and 'part of a building' for the purpose of the Act; otherwise Denning LJ would have been disposed to say that the house was both. Romer LJ also thought that 'for some purposes and in other contexts two "houses" may constitute one building'. Cf Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, paras 8.31–8.36.

⁶³ Walkington [1979] 2 All ER 716, [1979] 1 WLR 1169, CA.

⁶⁴ Eighth Report, para 75.

⁶⁵ ie without intent to steal; p 1012.

he is a trespasser. He is just as much a trespasser as if he had been told in express terms to leave the shop, for he knows perfectly well that his permission to remain on the premises terminated when the shop closed.⁶⁶ He has, then, entered a part of the building—the main floor of the shop—with intent to steal. Suppose, however, having entered lawfully, D merely remained concealed until after closing time behind a stack of boxes in the main hall of the supermarket. This was not a trespass because he had a right to be there. When he emerged and proceeded to steal, still in the main hall of the supermarket, was he entering another part of the building? It is submitted that every step he took was ‘as a trespasser’, but it is difficult to see that he entered any part of the building as a trespasser; the whole transaction took place in a single part of the building which he had lawfully entered.⁶⁷ It is illogical to treat these two cases differently.

The word ‘part’ has no precise meaning in relation to buildings. Its significance for the purpose of the section is that a person may lawfully enter one part of a building, yet be a trespasser on setting foot in another. This was the view taken in Walkington.⁶⁸ D, having entered a department store, went into an area bounded by a moveable three-sided counter where he opened a cash till. It was held that there was evidence on which the jury could find that the counter area was a ‘part’ of the building from which the public were excluded and that if D knew that, he entered it as a trespasser. For the purposes of burglary, it seems that buildings fall into two parts: those parts where D is entitled to be, and those where he is not.

If D is lawfully in Flat 1 and, without leaving the building, he enters Flat 2 as a trespasser with intent to pass through it into Flat 3 and steal therein, his entry into Flat 2 does not constitute burglary if each flat is regarded as a separate part. He has not entered Flat 2 with intent to steal therein. Yet, as we have seen, if he had entered Flat 2 from outside the building as a trespasser, there would have been no problem; he would have entered the building as a trespasser with intent to steal therein.⁶⁹ Perhaps it may fairly be said, however, that the building is in two parts: one part comprising the flat, where D is lawfully present, and the other part comprising all the remaining flats, where D may not lawfully go. On this view, D would commit burglary by entering that part (ie the remainder of the building) as a trespasser with the appropriate intent.

Inhabited vehicle or vessel

Whilst all ‘buildings’ are protected by the law of burglary, vehicles and vessels are protected only where they are ‘inhabited’.⁷⁰ The obvious cases which are brought within the protection of burglary by this provision are a caravan or houseboat which is someone’s home. There seems to be no reason whatever why a home should lack the ordinary protection of the law because it is mobile.⁷¹ The limits of the extended definition should be noted. ‘Inhabited’ implies not that there is someone present inside the vehicle at the moment of the entry as a trespasser, but that someone lives there. My sports car is not an inhabited vehicle because I happen to be sitting in it when D enters against my will. The caravan or houseboat that is a person’s home is expressly protected, whether or not the occupier is there at the time of the burglary.

⁶⁶ The CLRC thought: ‘The case is not important, because the offender is likely to go into a part of the building where he has no right to be, and this will be a trespassory entry into that part.’ But he has no right to be in any part of the building after closing time and the only question, it is submitted, is whether he went into another part.

⁶⁷ cf Laing [1995] Crim LR 395. ⁶⁸ [1979] 1 WLR 1169, CA.

⁶⁹ cf S White, Lurkers, Draggers and Kidnappers (1986) 150 JP 37 at 56.

⁷⁰ Section 9(3).

⁷¹ Arguably, on this rationale, the offence should also extend to protect tent dwellers.

Owners of camper vans might use them for the ordinary purposes of a car during most of the year but live in them while on holiday. While the vehicle is being lived in, it is undoubtedly an inhabited vehicle.⁷² When being used for the ordinary purposes of a car it is submitted that it is not. The exact moment at which the camper van becomes an inhabited vehicle may be difficult to ascertain.⁷³

Applying ordinary principles of construction of criminal offences, to be guilty of burglary D must know of the facts which would make him, in law, a trespasser in a building. Just as *Collins*⁷⁴ shows that D must know (or be reckless as to) the facts which render him a trespasser, so too D should not be convicted of burglary unless he knew of the facts which make the thing entered 'a building' in law. Suppose D enters a camper van parked by the side of the road. If he knew that V was living in the vehicle, there is no problem. But what if he did not know? It would seem that he must be acquitted of burglary unless it can be shown that he was at least reckless as to whether anyone was living there or not; this involves showing that the possibility was present in his mind.

'Dwelling'

Since the Criminal Justice Act 1991, it has become crucial to identify whether the building entered is a dwelling, rendering the offence a 'domestic burglary' for sentencing purposes. This issue is discussed later.

25.1.2 Mens rea

25.1.2.1 Intention to enter as a trespasser

As discussed, burglary requires proof that D knew (or was reckless as to) the facts that, in law, make his entry trespassory: Collins.⁷⁵ It would follow that if D sets up an honest belief in a right to enter, it would be for the Crown to prove that D's belief was not held.

25.1.2.2 The ulterior offence

It must be proved that D either:

- (1) entered with intent⁷⁶ to commit one of the following offences:
 - (a) stealing,
 - (b) inflicting grievous bodily harm,
 - (c) unlawful damage to the building or anything therein;⁷⁷ or
- (2) entered and committed or attempted to commit one of the following offences:
 - (a) stealing,
 - (b) inflicting grievous bodily harm.

Where the charge is one of entering with intent, it must be proved that at the time of entry D held an intention to cause the harm in question. In many such cases, D's intent may be conditional at the time of entry, in the sense that he intends to steal if there is anything worth stealing, or intends to cause grievous bodily harm if V, his enemy, happens to be in the building. It is no bar to D's conviction that there is nothing in the building worth stealing ⁷² Quaere whether the unoccupied boat or caravan, which is visited and lived in only during holidays is protected. See Smith, Property Offences, paras 28–39 (no); Williams, TBCL, 841 (yes); Griew, Theft, paras 4–27 (no).

⁷³ Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, paras 8.43–8.46. Cf Bundy [1977] 1 WLR 914, CA, p 1028.

⁷⁴ [1973] QB 100, p 1008. ⁷⁵ [1973] QB 100.

⁷⁶ The crime is one of specific intent: Durante [1972] 1 WLR 1612, p 321.

⁷⁷ The further alternative of rape was repealed by the SOA 2003. See later.

or that V is out of town.⁷⁸ If D intends to steal a specific item only (should it be present), it seems that the s 9(1)(a) offence is not committed.⁷⁹

Intention must be proved; it is not sufficient that D is shown to have been reckless at the time of entry as to whether or not the ulterior offence would be committed.⁸⁰ Although intention in this context will usually be direct or purposive, it is possible that D will have an oblique intention: as where he intends to remove from V's premises an item of property that is D's, but foresees that in doing so he is virtually certain to cause criminal damage to V's property.

The offences in s 9(1)(a) may be accurately described as inchoate versions of the three ulterior offences. Since the trespassory intrusion represents a free-standing harm to V's interests, it is generally accepted that it is appropriate in principle to criminalize these actions by a specific offence—burglary.

Stealing

This clearly means theft, contrary to s 1 of the Theft Act 1968.⁸¹ Following Gomez this has an especially broad meaning.⁸²

Grievous bodily harm

The intention to inflict grievous bodily harm in s 9(1)(a) must be an intention to commit an offence, that is, to inflict that harm unlawfully. The offence in question would be causing grievous bodily harm with intent to do so, contrary to s 18 of the OAPA 1861. It is arguable that s 23 of that Act may also be a qualifying offence since it involves administering or causing to be administered poisons or noxious substances so as thereby to endanger life or inflict grievous bodily harm.

If there is no evidence of the intent at the time of entry, the charge under s 9(1)(a) should not be left to the jury, even if the occupiers have been assaulted.⁸³

Section 9(1)(b) does not use the word 'offence', but simply requires that D inflicts or attempts to inflict on any person in the building any grievous bodily harm. The omission of the word 'offence' is in fact a legislative accident,⁸⁴ but in *Jenkins*⁸⁵ the Court of Appeal held that the infliction need not amount to an offence of any kind. The court gave this example:

An intruder gains access to the house without breaking in (where there is an open window for instance).^[86] He is on the premises as a trespasser and his intrusion is observed by someone in the house of whom he may not even be aware, and as a result that person suffers a severe shock, with a resulting stroke... Should such an event fall outside the provisions of s 9 when causing some damage to property falls fairly within it?

The court posed this question plainly expecting the answer, 'no'. It is submitted that the right answer is an emphatic 'yes'. Otherwise, a person may become guilty of burglary in ⁷⁸ A-G's References (Nos 1 and 2 of 1979) [1979] 3 All ER 143, CA. See the discussion at p 892. This interpretation of intention illustrates the flexibility of that concept: A Ashworth, 'The Elasticity of Mens Rea' in Crime, Proof and Punishment, 45, 49.

⁷⁹ Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 8.51.

⁸⁰ A v DPP [2003] All ER (D) 393 (Jun).

⁸¹ Electricity is not property for the purposes of theft and cannot therefore found a burglary charge, as where D enters property and makes a telephone call: Low v Bleasde [1975] Crim LR 513.

⁸² Dobson v General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp'n plc [1990] 1 QB 274, CA, p 830.

⁸³ O'Neill, McMullen and Kelly (1986) The Times, 17 Oct.

⁸⁴ See JC Smith, 'Burglary under the Theft Bill' [1968] Crim LR 367 and commentary on Jenkins [1983] 1 All ER 1000, [1983] Crim LR 386, CA.

⁸⁵ [1983] 1 All ER 1000 at 1002. Cf Watson (1989) 89 Cr App R 211 (death caused after entry is caused in the course of committing an offence under s 9(1)(a)).

⁸⁶ It is not clear why the court thought this was relevant.

consequence of a wholly unforeseen and unforeseeable event. The analogy with damage to property is misplaced: causing damage to property does not fall within the provisions of s 9(1)(b). There must be an actual intention to cause damage at the time of the trespassory entry to constitute the offence under s 9(1)(a). This requires a mens rea which is wholly absent in the example put by the court. The House of Lords allowed the appeal in *Jenkins*⁸⁷ but on a different point and no allusion was made to the interpretation by the Court of Appeal of s 9(1)(b). The case, therefore, stands as an authority—but, it is submitted, a bad one. When para (b) is read in the context of s 9(1) and (2), it is reasonably clear that the infliction of bodily harm required must be an offence—in effect, under s 18, or possibly s 23, of the OAPA 1861.

What if D enters with intent to murder? It would be very strange if an entry with intent to inflict grievous bodily harm amounted to burglary, and an entry with intent to murder did not. It is submitted that the greater includes the lesser and that an intention to kill is enough.

Unlawful damage to the building or anything therein

The damage intended must be such that to cause it would amount to an offence. It might be any of the offences of causing damage created by the Criminal Damage Act 1971. In the case of every one of the offences which is likely to be invoked under this provision, the elements of the actus reus must be committed intentionally or recklessly.

Is it necessary that the object of the ulterior crime be in the building before the trespassory entry? In other words, is it burglary if D drags V into a barn with intent to rob, or inflict grievous bodily harm on him?⁸⁸ Similarly, what of D who enters with the aim of removing a piece of property to damage it outside? Must it be proved only that the property was in the building or part thereof, or that the damage would occur in the building or part thereof? The words of the section do not supply a clear answer, but the purpose of the offence—the protection of persons and things in a building—suggests that the crime does not extend to these cases.

It might be questioned why the offence of burglary is limited to the ulterior intent to commit such a limited number of specified offences, and to the commission of an even smaller number. There have been suggestions to criminalize trespass with intent to commit any indictable offence; that would create considerable overlap with offences of inchoate liability, and would not appear to be necessary.⁸⁹

25.2 Burglary in respect of a dwelling

Since the Criminal Justice Act 1991, burglary in respect of a dwelling is a separate offence⁹⁰—a new aggravated form of burglary. In Miller,⁹¹ the Court of Appeal recognized that where it is alleged that a burglary has been committed in relation to a dwelling, it is necessary to specify as much in the particulars of the offence.⁹² Arguably, this represents a return to the ⁸⁷ [1983] 3 All ER 448, [1984] Crim LR 36 and commentary.

⁸⁸ See S White, 'Lurkers, Draggers and Kidnappers' (1986) 150 JP 37 at 56.

⁸⁹ See LCCP 183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para 16.61.

⁹⁰ See p 1017. See Courtie, p 31. For a more extended discussion see K Laird, 'Conceptualising the Interpretation of "Dwelling" in Section 9 of the Theft Act 1968' [2013] Crim LR 656.

⁹¹ [2010] EWCA Crim 809.

⁹² In Love [2013] EWCA Crim 257, the Court of Appeal upheld the judge's decision to allow an application by the prosecution to amend the indictment by substituting 'dwelling' for 'building'. It was held that the power to amend the indictment existed notwithstanding that the defendants had already entered pleas of guilty to the original indictment.

origins of the offence being a crime against ‘habitation’,⁹³ and has significance in labelling the conduct appropriately. The only constituent of the offence that requires consideration is ‘dwelling’, but it must be looked at in respect of both actus reus and mens rea.

25.2.1 Actus reus

‘Dwelling’ is not defined but it is submitted that it ought to mean substantially the same as ‘dwelling-house’ in the former offence of burglary at common law and under the Larceny Acts.⁹⁴ ‘House’ would be too narrow a definition and the word ‘dwelling’ better describes many forms of accommodation that should be protected. Problematically, the term ‘dwelling’ has been subject to differing interpretations in the context of dwelling burglary. For example, it has sometimes been interpreted to include those buildings that are within the boundary of a person’s home but which are not physically attached to it, such as a shed.⁹⁵ In other instances, this interpretation has been rejected in favour of a narrower one.⁹⁶ Such inconsistency is unwelcome given the frequency with which burglary is charged and the fact that it attracts a higher sentence than non-dwelling burglary. A more satisfactory interpretation would be to accept that a person dwells in that building where he sleeps rather than where he spends his waking hours where those places are different, and that the definition does not extend to those buildings within the boundary of a home, but not physically attached to it. A building, such as a block of flats, may contain many dwellings. Entering the ‘public’ parts of the block may be burglary but perhaps not burglary in ‘a dwelling’. In Le Vine v DPP,⁹⁷ the laundry room within the sheltered housing block was not a dwelling for the purposes of the Public Order Act 1986.

Premises that qualify as a dwelling will not cease to be such because of the temporary absence of the inhabitants, provided that at least one of them intends to return. A person may have more than one dwelling, as where he has a flat in London and a house in the country, sleeping sometimes in one and sometimes in the other. The camper van considered previously will probably be a dwelling while the owners are living in it, but will cease to be a dwelling when they stop doing so.⁹⁸ The Court of Appeal in *Flack*⁹⁹ declined to give guidance as to how ‘dwelling’ ought to be interpreted, as it was held to be largely a question of fact.

The Divisional Court affirmed the validity of this approach in Hudson v CPS.¹⁰⁰ The defendant was convicted of committing dwelling burglary after he burgled a house that was uninhabited but was ready for new tenants to move in, although none had yet been identified. The defendant appealed by way of case stated. The Crown argued that as a matter of ordinary language, the word ‘dwelling’ is capable of including not only a building dwelt in, but also a building designed to be dwelt in, although at the relevant time it might have ⁹³ Blackstone, Commentaries, iv, 220.

⁹⁴ See the 1st edition of this book (1965) 399; Russell on Crime (12th edn, 1964) 826. Cf Public Order Act 1986, s 8: “‘dwelling’ means any structure or part of a structure occupied as a person’s home or as other living accommodation (whether the occupation is separate or shared with others) but does not include any part not so occupied, and for this purpose “structure” includes a tent, caravan, vehicle, vessel or other temporary or movable structure’. Cf Terrorism Act 2000, s 121: “‘dwelling’ means a building or part of a building used as a dwelling, and a vehicle which is habitually stationary and which is used as a dwelling . . .”

⁹⁵ Alexander [2008] EWCA Crim 2834.

⁹⁶ Miles [2003] EWCA Crim 2892.

⁹⁷ [2010] EWHC 1128 (Admin).

⁹⁸ In Coleman [2013] EWCA Crim 544, [2013] Crim LR 694, the Court of Appeal, in interpreting s 111(5) of the PCC(S)A 2000 which defines a ‘domestic burglary’ as one committed ‘in respect of a building or part of a building which is a dwelling’, held that it encompassed a houseboat.

⁹⁹ [2013] EWCA Crim 115, [2013] Crim LR 521.

¹⁰⁰ [2017] EWHC 841 (Admin), [2017] Crim LR 703.

been vacant or not ready for occupation. Delivering the judgment of the Divisional Court, Gross LJ stated that ‘dwelling’ is an ordinary English word and that its meaning is a question of fact for the jury, magistrates or District Judge. His lordship held that a building that would otherwise be a dwelling if it were lived in does not cease to be a dwelling the moment it becomes unoccupied. Where a dwelling has become unoccupied, it is a question of fact and degree—not law—as to whether it is no longer a dwelling.¹⁰¹ It was held that the more habitable a building as a matter of fact, then the more, other things being equal, it is likely to be a ‘dwelling’ for the purposes of s 9(3)(a) of the Act. The Divisional Court’s conclusion was heavily influenced by the desire to avoid fine distinctions and the introduction into standard burglary cases of disputes about the tenancy status of the property in question. The court was also keen to ensure the law deters the burglary of both residential and apparently residential buildings.

It is respectfully submitted that there is a tension between the court’s conclusion that apparently residential properties can constitute dwellings for the purposes of s 9(3)(a) and the justification for treating dwelling burglary as a more serious offence than non-dwelling burglary. If there is no one residing¹⁰² in the building who can feel a sense of ‘violation and insecurity’¹⁰³ by its being burgled, then why should the defendant be subject to a harsher penalty than if he had burgled a commercial building? The court was confident that its conclusion would not lead to unfairness on the basis that the fact the property was temporarily vacant can be reflected in arguments as to mitigation. If, however, it is the defendant’s third dwelling burglary, then the court has no choice but to sentence him to a minimum sentence of three years’ imprisonment. It would have been preferable for the court to have laid down a bright-line rule to the effect that non-inhabited buildings cannot be dwellings for the purposes of the offence. This would have the benefit of not only ensuring greater consistency, but would also be in keeping with the justification for treating dwelling burglary as a more serious offence than non-dwelling burglary.¹⁰⁴

25.2.2 Mens rea

As ‘dwelling’ is an aggravating element in the offence warranting a higher maximum sentence of imprisonment, it should, in principle, import a requirement of mens rea. A person who commits burglary in a dwelling should be convicted only of simple burglary unless he had awareness that it was a dwelling. Given the potentially counterintuitive interpretation of ‘dwelling’ endorsed in Hudson v CPS, proving such awareness could be made more difficult. In principle and by analogy to the construction of ‘as a trespasser’ in Collins,¹⁰⁵ recklessness should be enough. If D entered being aware that someone might be living there, and someone was, he should be guilty of burglary in respect of a dwelling.

¹⁰¹ The court distinguished the earlier case of Sticklen [2013] EWCA Crim 615, in which the Court of Appeal held that the burglary of an unoccupied house was not a dwelling burglary and so D ought to have been sentenced on the basis that he had committed simple burglary. Gross LJ distinguished the case on the basis that it was an appeal against sentence; the Crown did not appear and was not represented; the defendant had pleaded guilty to burglary of a non-dwelling; the judge declined to follow the guidelines and treated the difference between a dwelling and other buildings as a technicality.

¹⁰² There is no need for the building to be resided in on a permanent basis. As has already been pointed out, a person may have more than one dwelling.

¹⁰³ Brewster [1998] 1 Cr App R (S) 181 at 185.

¹⁰⁴ In the subsequent case of Distill [2017] EWHC 2244 (Admin), the Divisional Court held that the definition of ‘dwelling’ in s 8 of the Public Order Act 1986 did not include a private garden. For comment, see Laird [2018] Crim LR 170.

¹⁰⁵ At p 1008.

25.3 Aggravated burglary

By s 10 of the Theft Act 1968:

- (1) A person is guilty of aggravated burglary if he commits any burglary and at the time has with him any firearm or imitation firearm, any weapon of offence, or any explosive; and for this purpose—
 - (a) ‘firearm’ includes an airgun or air pistol, and ‘imitation firearm’ means anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether capable of being discharged or not; and
 - (b) ‘weapon of offence’ means any article made or adapted for use for causing injury to or incapacitating a person, or intended by the person having it with him for such use; and
 - (c) ‘explosive’ means any article manufactured for the purpose of producing a practical effect by explosion, or intended by the person having it with him for that purpose.
- (2) A person guilty of aggravated burglary shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.

The reason given by the CLRC for the creation of this additional offence is that ‘burglary when in possession of the articles mentioned . . . is so serious that it should in our opinion be punishable with imprisonment for life. The offence is comparable with robbery (which will be so punishable). It must be extremely frightening to those in the building, and it might well lead to loss of life.’¹⁰⁶ The offence can be committed in dwellings or other buildings.

25.3.1 The articles of aggravation

‘Firearm’ is not defined in the Act, except to the extent that it includes an airgun or air pistol. The term is given a very wide meaning by the Firearms Act 1968,¹⁰⁷ but since that statutory definition has not been incorporated in the Theft Act it is submitted that the word should not be given a meaning any wider than that which it naturally bears; and that the term ‘imitation firearm’ be similarly limited.¹⁰⁸

The definition of ‘weapon of offence’ is marginally wider than that of ‘offensive weapon’ in s 1(4) of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953.¹⁰⁹ It includes: (a) articles made for causing injury to a person; (b) articles adapted for causing injury to a person; (c) articles which D has with him for that purpose; (d) any article made for incapacitating a person; (e) any article adapted for incapacitating a person; and (f) any article which D has with him for that purpose. Articles made for incapacitating a person might include a pair of handcuffs; articles adapted for incapacitating a person might include a pair of socks made into a gag; articles intended for incapacitating a person might include sleeping pills to put in the security guard’s tea, a rope to tie him up, a sack to put over his head, pepper to throw in his face, and so on.

The definition of ‘explosive’ closely follows that which was used in s 3(1) of the Explosives Act 1875 which, after enumerating various explosives, adds: ‘and every other substance, whether similar to those above mentioned or not, used or manufactured with a view to produce a practical effect by explosion or by a pyrotechnic effect . . .’

¹⁰⁶ Eighth Report, para 80.

¹⁰⁷ See s 57 and Bewley [2012] EWCA Crim 1457 and note s 125 of the Policing and Crime Act 2017. Note that the possession of a firearm with intent to commit an indictable offence (including burglary) is an offence carrying a maximum life imprisonment: Firearms Act 1968, s 18.

¹⁰⁸ The term has been widely construed under the Firearms Act 1968, but a jury cannot conclude that D pointing a finger inside his coat at V is sufficient: Bentham [2005] UKHL 18.

¹⁰⁹ See p 747. Note that defences of lawful authority or reasonable excuse available under the 1953 Act do not apply here.

It will be observed that the definition in the Theft Act is narrower. The Explosives Act, if read literally, is wide enough to include a box of matches—these produce a ‘pyrotechnic effect’—but it seems clear that a box of matches would not be an ‘explosive’ under the Theft Act. The main difficulty about the definition (this is unlikely to be important in practice) lies in determining the meaning of ‘practical effect’. Perhaps it serves to exclude fireworks which, so it has been said in connection with another Act, are ‘things that are made for amusement’.¹¹⁰

25.3.2 ‘At the time’ of commission of burglary

It must be proved that D had the article of aggravation with him at the time of committing the burglary. Where the charge is one of entry with intent (s 9(1)(a)) this is clearly at the time of entry. Where the charge is one of committing a specified offence, having entered (s 9(1)(b)), it is at the time of commission of the specified offence. Care must be taken to identify precisely whether the charge is under s 9(1)(a) or (b) and what articles were present at the time of entry and afterwards¹¹¹ and under whose control.¹¹²

Burglary is not aggravated merely because a weapon is used against the occupier outside the building or is held by an accomplice in a getaway car.¹¹³ Nor is it enough to prove an armed entry by D as a trespasser unless that entry is accompanied by one of the specified intents. If D, having no such intent at the time of entry, discards his weapon and thereafter commits one of the specified offences, he is not guilty of aggravated burglary¹¹⁴ though he would be so guilty if he rearmed himself for this purpose.¹¹⁵ It is debatable whether or not D who arms himself only to escape, having already completed the burglary (eg by stealing), is guilty of the aggravated offence.¹¹⁶ By analogy with the court’s approach in Watson,¹¹⁷ and the courts’ willingness to treat Theft Act offences as continuing,¹¹⁸ it is likely that the offence would be held to have been committed.

25.3.3 ‘Has with him’

The expression ‘has with him’ appears in the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 and reference should be made to the discussion of that Act,¹¹⁹ particularly as regards the controversial issue of D claiming to have forgotten that he has with him the forbidden article.¹²⁰ The Court of Appeal has reiterated that what matters for the purpose of s 10 is whether the weapon was within D’s control so that it could be taken up and used if necessary (not whether he was holding it).¹²¹ In Henderson,¹²² which was a case concerning s 139(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, the Court of Appeal held that the following are relevant considerations when determining whether a person has a weapon ‘with him’: possession of a weapon by D is a ¹¹⁰ Bliss v Lilley (1862) 32 LJMC 3, per Cockburn CJ and Blackburn J, but Wightman J thought that a fog-signal was a ‘firework’. Cf Bouch [1982] 3 All ER 918, CA; Howard [1993] Crim LR 213, CA. See also the definition in s 1(1) of the Fireworks Act 2003.

¹¹¹ Chevannes [2009] EWCA Crim 2725.

¹¹² See Downer [2009] EWCA Crim 1361.

¹¹³ Klass [1998] 1 Cr App R 453, CA; followed in Wiggins [2012] EWCA Crim 885.

¹¹⁴ Francis [1982] Crim LR 363, CA.

¹¹⁵ O’Leary (1986) 82 Cr App R 34, CA.

¹¹⁶ See Smith, Property Offences, para 28.61.

¹¹⁷ Watson (1989) 89 Cr App R 211, CA.

¹¹⁸ Atakpu (1994) 98 Cr App R 254, CA.

¹¹⁹ See p 747. See also Pawlicki and Swindell (1992) 95 Cr App R 246, [1992] Crim LR 584 (‘have with him’ under Firearms Act 1968, s 18(1)), and North [2001] EWCA Crim 544. In respect of the Firearms Act offence, it has been held that the question of ‘propinquity’ is to be approached in a commonsense way. A person could not, therefore, be said to ‘have with him’ a firearm stored two or three miles away: Bradish (2004) 148 SJ 474, CA.

¹²⁰ See especially Jolie, p 754.

¹²¹ See Chevannes, n 111.

¹²² [2016] EWCA Crim 965, [2017] Crim LR 233.

wider concept than D having it 'with him'; D having a weapon 'with him' is a wider concept than D carrying it; the 'propinquity' between D and the weapon; whether the weapon is immediately available to D; the accessibility of the weapon; the context of any criminal enterprise embarked upon; the purposes of the applicable statute. In this case, the weapon in question was found by police in a bag in the boot of D's car. The court quashed D's conviction on the basis that there was no close geographical, temporal or purposive link between the knife, which was in a public place, and D who was in a private flat. Furthermore, the court did not consider that it could be said that the knife was immediately available or readily accessible to D. The outcome of this case is unsurprising, given that the recorder seems to have conflated the concepts of 'possession' and 'having with one'. The case is a useful reminder that the two concepts are distinct.

When the prosecution have proved that the article was made or adapted for causing injury or incapacitating, they need not prove that D intended to use the weapon in the course of the burglary. Where the article was not made or adapted for causing injury or incapacitating, but the prosecution prove D had it with him for such use, it is not necessary to show that he intended so to use it in the course of the burglary. D's conviction was accordingly upheld in Stones,¹²³ where at the time of the burglary he had with him an ordinary kitchen knife that, he claimed, he was carrying to use in self-defence in case he was attacked by a gang. The court held that the mischief at which the section is aimed is that if a burglar has a weapon which he intends to use to injure some person unconnected with the premises burgled, he might nevertheless be tempted so to use it if challenged during the course of the burglary. Clearly, a conditional intent to use a weapon suffices for the offence.

Under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, it has been decided that a person carrying an inoffensive article for an innocent purpose does not become guilty of having an offensive weapon with him merely because he uses that article for an offensive purpose. The 1953 Act is directed against the carrying of articles intended to be used as weapons, not against the use of an article as a weapon. It was to be expected that the same construction would be put upon the similar words of s 10 of the Theft Act but, in Kelly,¹²⁴ it was held that D, who had used a screwdriver to gain entry to premises, became guilty of aggravated burglary when he used it to prod V in the stomach. The court purported to apply the ordinary meaning of the words of the subsection, but they seem indistinguishable in this respect from the words of the Prevention of Crime Act (and the same considerations of policy seem applicable to the two provisions). Kelly seems a dubious decision.

It has also been held under the 1953 Act that no offence is committed where a person arms himself with a weapon for instant attack on his victim;¹²⁵ if Kelly is right, it seems that such a decision can hardly apply to s 10. So, if D, being interrupted in the course of stealing after a trespassory entry, picks up a paperweight (or any object) and throws it with intent to cause injury, he will thereby become guilty of aggravated burglary. He could be adequately dealt with by a charge of simple burglary and a second count charging whatever offence against the person he has committed; it is submitted that this is the proper course. On the other hand, if D picks up a stone outside the building to use as a weapon should he be disturbed after entry, the subsequent burglary would properly be held to be aggravated: D has armed himself before an occasion to use violence has arisen; and the stone is a weapon of ¹²³ [1989] 1 WLR 156, (1989) 89 Cr App R 26, CA. See NJ Reville, 'Mischief of Aggravated Burglary' (1989) 139 NLJ 835.

¹²⁴ (1993) 97 Cr App R 245, [1993] Crim LR 763 and commentary. See Eletu [2018] EWCA Crim 599 for recent discussion and vivid illustration of the issues that can arise in directing juries.

¹²⁵ Ohlson v Hylton [1975] 2 All ER 490; Giles [1976] Crim LR 253; Bates v Bulman (1979) 68 Cr App R 21; Byrne [2004] Crim LR 582.

offence. In O'Leary,¹²⁶ D, having entered V's house as a trespasser, took up a kitchen knife and proceeded upstairs where by use of the knife he forced V to hand over property. It was held that he was rightly convicted of aggravated burglary. Burglary is committed under s 9(1)(b) at the time when the ulterior offence is committed; before its commission, D had armed himself for use in connection with it.

25.4 Trespass with intent to commit a sexual offence

Section 63 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 introduced a new offence to replace burglary with intent to rape.¹²⁷

(1) A person commits an offence if—

- (a) he is a trespasser on any premises,
- (b) he intends to commit a relevant sexual offence on the premises, and
- (c) he knows that, or is reckless as to whether, he is a trespasser.

(2) In this section—

'premises' includes a structure or part of a structure;

'relevant sexual offence' [is all those in that Part of the Act];

'structure' includes a tent, vehicle or vessel or other temporary or movable structure.

The offence, carrying a maximum sentence of ten years on indictment, is significantly wider in a number of respects than the old law where it was burglary to enter a building as a trespasser with intent to rape. Under s 63 any trespass is sufficient and there is no need to prove a trespassory entry. The trespass may arise as a result of D exceeding permission for the purposes for which entry was granted; or exceeding permission in terms of the areas or parts of premises entered. Secondly, the trespass relates to 'premises', which is wider than the concept of a building or part of a building. It is a term used in many statutes, including criminal ones, and is usually widely construed.¹²⁸ Technically, it could extend to all areas of land which could be the subject of a lease and will include open spaces (fields and parks). Thirdly, the concept of 'structure' is given a wide definition and will, unlike in burglary, include a car or other vehicle.¹²⁹ Fourthly, as with s 9(1)(a) there is no need for the ulterior (sexual) offence to occur. Indeed, there is no need for any intended victim to be on the premises. Finally, the list of ulterior offences to which this section applies is much wider than under the old law which applied only to rape; it extends to all those in Part 1 of the ¹²⁹ 'Structure' is a term used in numerous statutes, but its interpretation is heavily dependent on context. One example is the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, where s 66 provides (as amended) "'premises" includes any vehicle, stall or moveable structure (including an offshore installation [or other marine installation]) and any other place whatever, whether or not occupied as land'. Section 48 of the RIPA 2000 similarly provides that 'premises' includes any vehicle or moveable structure and any other place whatever, whether or not occupied as land. This suggests that 'structure' is wider than 'building'. For proposals to extend the law, see LCCP 183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para 16.61(3).

¹²⁶ (1986) 82 Cr App R 341, CA.

¹²⁷ See generally P Rook and R Ward, Sexual Offences: Law and Practice (5th edn, 2016) paras 14.51 et seq.

¹²⁸ eg in the Criminal Law Act 1977, s 12(1)(a): 'premises' means any building, any part of a building under separate occupation, any land ancillary to a building, the site comprising any building or buildings together with any land ancillary thereto.

2003 Act.¹³⁰ By s 72 of the 2003 Act the offence is committed if D, who is a British national, does an act abroad against an under-18-year-old which would, if committed in the UK, constitute an offence under s 63.

The mens rea of the offence requires proof that D intended to perform the relevant sexual offence, and knowledge or subjective recklessness as to the facts that render him a trespasser.

In Pacurar,¹³¹ the Court of Appeal observed that there will be many cases where the evidence points to a specific sexual offence D intended and the prosecution will be in a position to make clear what is alleged, by identifying the sexual offence in the particulars of the offence. The court also noted that there will be other cases where the prosecution allege it is obvious from all the circumstances that D intended to commit a sexual offence, but it is impossible to specify which one and upon whom. The court had no doubt that Parliament intended s 63 to cover both situations. Therefore, there is no need for the prosecution to specify any particular sexual offence it is alleged the defendant intended to commit, nor for the trial judge to direct the jury that they had to agree on the sexual offence intended. It suffices for the jury to be directed that they have to agree that D intended to commit a sexual offence contained in Part 1 of the 2003 Act.

25.5 Going equipped

Many of the offences in the Theft Acts (and Fraud Act) have been criticized for their considerable breadth, particularly in view of the generally wide interpretations adopted by the courts. It is possible for D to be convicted of theft from the moment that he touches an item or acts in a way that assumes any single right of an owner, provided he has the proscribed state of mind.¹³² Similarly, it is possible for D to be convicted of burglary where he has only got as far as entering as a trespasser with a proscribed intent.¹³³ With charges also available for attempted theft where D has gone beyond any act of mere preparation, the reach of the criminal law in this area is vast. The offence under s 25 (like those under ss 6 and 7 of the Fraud Act) goes further still, criminalizing conduct of a more preliminary nature than even attempt.

By s 25(1) and (2) of the Theft Act 1968:

- (1) A person shall be guilty of an offence if, when not at his place of abode, he has with him any article for use in the course of or in connection with any burglary or theft.¹³⁴
- (2) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years.¹³⁵

This useful inchoate offence is expressed to be directed against acts preparatory to: (a) burglary contrary to s 9; (b) theft contrary to s 1;¹³⁶ (c) taking and driving away a conveyance, contrary to s 12.¹³⁷

¹³⁰ See eg Fulton [2006] EWCA Crim 960 (D had forced his way into the house of a 60-year-old woman and forced her to watch him masturbate). See also C [2006] EWCA Crim 1024 and Ralston [2005] EWCA Crim 3279 (sexual touching); and H [2007] EWCA Crim 2622.

¹³¹ [2016] EWCA Crim 569.

¹³² See the discussion of Gomez [1993] AC 442 and Hinks [2001] 2 AC 241, p 831.

¹³³ See s 9(1)(a), p 1010.

¹³⁴ The form of the offence in terms of going equipped to cheat was abolished by the Fraud Act 2006.

¹³⁵ See generally JK Bentil (1979) 143 JP 47; Williams, TBCL, 853–857; Griew, Theft, Ch 16; Smith, Property Offences, para 31.1.

¹³⁶ References to deception under s 15 of the Act were repealed by the Fraud Act 2006.

¹³⁷ By s 25(5), 'theft' in this section includes an offence under s 12(1).

25.5.1 Actus reus

The cross-heading in the statute, 'Possession of house-breaking implements, etc', and the side-note, 'Going equipped for stealing, etc', indicate that the offence¹³⁸ is aimed primarily at someone setting out on an expedition equipped with a jemmy, skeleton keys and such like. However, in Re McAngus,¹³⁹ an extradition case, it was held that there was evidence of the offence when undercover agents said that D had agreed to sell them counterfeit clothing and had shown them shirts, wrongly bearing an American brand name, in a bonded warehouse.

D was certainly 'equipped' for criminal deception and, when visiting the warehouse, was not at his place of abode. If he had been hawking the shirts from door to door it would have been a straightforward case, but D did not 'go' anywhere with the articles. The side-note is not part of the section but might now be considered as a legitimate aid to statutory construction;¹⁴⁰ it might be taken to show that 'going' is the essence of the offence.¹⁴¹ Presumably, it would have made no difference if the shirts had been kept in D's own warehouse (which does not seem substantially different from keeping them at home).

D must have with him 'any article'; the article need not be made or adapted for use in committing one of the specified offences. It is sufficient that D intended to use it in the course of, or in connection with, one of the specified offences. The article may therefore be as innocuous as a tin of treacle (intended for use in removing a pane of glass), a diving suit (to allow D to steal balls from a lake on a golf course),¹⁴² a pair of gloves (to be worn to avoid leaving fingerprints) or a charity collecting tin (which D is not authorized to use).¹⁴³ It was implicit in numerous decisions that the offence of going equipped to cheat caught such conduct as possession of a sliced loaf and a bag of tomatoes¹⁴⁴ or bottles of wine¹⁴⁵ which D intended to pass off as the property of his employer and sell to customers.¹⁴⁶

D can hardly be committing an offence by wearing his shoes or any other item of everyday clothing, yet it was argued above that possession of gloves for the avoidance of leaving fingerprints would amount to this offence.¹⁴⁷ This suggests that one way of restricting the scope of the offence is to limit it to articles D would not be carrying with him 'but for' the contemplated offence. So there might be a difference between a pair of latex gloves and a pair of woollen gloves that D was wearing to keep his hands warm on a freezing night, even though he did intend to keep them on so as to avoid leaving fingerprints. The latter pair of gloves is hardly distinguishable, for this purpose, from D's overcoat, which seems to fall into the same category as his shoes. Arguably, this 'but for' analysis is too simplistic. What of D who picks up his gloves with a view to avoiding leaving fingerprints at a burglary that he is about to commit, but on opening his front door sees that it is snowing and would ordinarily have picked up his gloves on seeing snow outside? There is no difference between wearing ¹³⁸ Like its predecessor, s 28 of the Larceny Act 1916.

¹³⁹ [1994] Crim LR 602, DC, and commentary.

¹⁴⁰ M [2004] UKHL 50, [2005] Crim LR 479; cf R Munday, 'Bad Character Rules and Riddles: "Explanatory Notes" and True Meanings of s 103(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 2003' [2005] Crim LR 337.

¹⁴¹ As the long title showed that 'carrying' was the essence of the offence under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, p 747.

¹⁴² Rostron [2003] EWCA Crim 2206. ¹⁴³ Armson [2005] EWCA Crim 2528.

¹⁴⁴ Rashid (1977) 64 Cr App R 201, CA; cf Cooke [1986] AC 909, applied in relation to s 25 in Whiteside [1989] Crim LR 436.

¹⁴⁵ Doukas [1978] 1 WLR 372, CA.

¹⁴⁶ This series of cases place unwarranted emphasis on the question of whether the intended victim would be deceived, when the true issue is, it is submitted, whether D intends to obtain property by deception. See Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 3.96; Griew, Theft, paras 16.11–16.13.

¹⁴⁷ cf Ellames [1974] 3 All ER 130, CA; p 975, where gloves were included in the charge.

the woolly gloves, for a dual purpose, and wearing latex gloves, for a sole purpose. In both cases, D wears the gloves in order to avoid detection.

The offence is extremely wide, and in some instances the actus reus might be regarded as negligible. The emphasis is on the proof of mens rea; for that reason, care must be taken to avoid overly broad application.

The expression ‘has with him’¹⁴⁸ is the same as that found in s 10(1)(b) of the Act as discussed earlier. Questions as to D’s knowledge of the nature of the thing can hardly arise here, since it must be proved that he intended to use it in the course of, or (more broadly) in connection with, one of the specified offences. If a number of defendants are charged jointly with going equipped it must be proved that all the members of the enterprise knew of the existence of the articles and had the common purpose to use those articles in the specified offence.¹⁴⁹

No doubt D has an article with him if it is in his immediate possession or control; he will be guilty if the article is only a short distance away and he can take it up as he needs it, as where a ladder has been left in a garden by an accomplice and D enters the garden intending to use the ladder to make an entry to the house. If the article is found in D’s car some distance from the scene of the crime this will be evidence that D was in possession of the article when driving the car. The tenor of decisions on the interpretation of ‘has with him’ indicates that mere momentary possession will not suffice,¹⁵⁰ as where D is apprehended on picking up a stone which he intends to use to break a window in order to commit burglary. But, in Minor v DPP,¹⁵¹ it seems to have been decided that D may be convicted of going equipped (in this case, to steal petrol from cars) though he did not take the equipment (petrol cans and a hose) with him but somehow came across it while he was removing the cap from the petrol tank of a car. It appears to have been regarded as enough that the theft ‘was to be posterior to the acquisition of the articles’. On this view, the burglar who picks up a nearby stone to break a window to gain entry would commit the offence of going equipped; it is respectfully submitted that ‘has with him’ requires more than that the acquisition of the article should precede the theft.

‘Place of abode’ is a term that suggests a place, that is a site, where D lives.¹⁵² Clearly, this offence is not committed when D has articles for housebreaking, etc, in his own home,¹⁵³ but place of abode is apt to cover the whole of the premises where D lives so that D does not commit the offence by having the articles in his garage or even in his car while that is on his premises. Once D steps into the street with the articles, or drives off with them in his car, the offence may be committed. The ambit of the exemption is presumably based on a respect for D’s privacy. Though a car or a caravan may constitute a place of abode while stationary at some site, they can never constitute a place of abode while D is in transit; if he then has the articles with him, he may commit the offence.¹⁵⁴

25.5.2 Mens rea

The mens rea for the offence would appear to consist in D’s:

- (1) knowledge that he possesses the article; and
- (2) intention to use the article in the course of or in connection with any of the specified crimes.

¹⁴⁸ See p 1023.

¹⁴⁹ Reader, Connor and Hart (1998) 7 Apr, CA.

¹⁵⁰ See p 1023.

¹⁵¹ (1987) 152 JP 30, DC.

¹⁵² Bundy [1977] 2 All ER 382, CA; Kelt [1977] 3 All ER 1099, [1977] Crim LR 556 and commentary.

¹⁵³ It may be an offence under the Fraud Act 2006, s 6.

¹⁵⁴ Bundy [1977] 2 All ER 382, CA.

It was held in *Ellames*¹⁵⁵ that the 'intent to use' must necessarily relate to use in the future so that D was not guilty of this offence where the evidence showed only that he was in possession of certain articles (masks, guns, gloves, etc) after a robbery and was trying to get rid of them. Given an intent to use the article in the future, the expression 'in the course of or in connection with' any burglary, theft is wide enough to cover not only articles intended for use in the perpetration of the crime, but also articles intended for use before or after its commission. A car intended for use to make an escape after the commission of a robbery falls within the offence. But the article must be intended for some direct use in connection with the crime; it has been held that D's possession of a stolen driving licence so that he could obtain a job which would give him an opportunity to steal is not within the offence.¹⁵⁶

In Ellames,¹⁵⁷ it was said that D could commit the offence where he possessed the articles for future use by another, so that D would have been guilty in that case had he been hiding away the guns, etc, for their future use by others. The court also thought that it was not necessary to show that D intended the article to be used in connection with a particular theft; the section requires only intended use in connection with any burglary or theft. No doubt a conditional intent (eg possessing a jemmy to use if necessary) suffices, but D must have made up his mind, even if only contingently, to use the article. If D had not so determined he does not commit the offence.¹⁵⁸ Section 25(3)¹⁵⁹ provides:

Where a person is charged with an offence under this section, proof that he had with him any article made or adapted for use in committing a burglary or theft . . . shall be evidence that he had it with him for such use.

This is probably no more than enactment of the general rules regarding proof of intent.¹⁶⁰ It puts upon D an evidential burden. If he offers no explanation then the jury may be told that there is evidence upon which they may find that he had the necessary intent, but they must be satisfied so they are sure that he in fact had that intent.¹⁶¹ If D does offer an explanation then the jury should be told to acquit if they think it may reasonably be true, and to convict only if satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the explanation is untrue. The provision does not reverse the burden of proof and poses no difficulty under Art 6(2) of the ECHR.¹⁶²

Where the article in question is not made or adapted for use in any specified offence, mere proof of possession without more will not amount to prima facie evidence—that is, the case will have to be withdrawn from the jury.¹⁶³ It is a question of law for the judge at what point proof of other incriminating circumstances amounts to a case fit for submission to the jury.

The Fraud Act 2006 introduced offences of possession of articles for use in fraud (s 6) and making, adapting, supplying or offering to supply articles for fraud (s 7).¹⁶⁴ The Law Commission made provisional proposals for a wider general offence of possession of an article away from one's home with intent to use it in a specified offence.¹⁶⁵

¹⁵⁵ [1974] 3 All ER 130, CA.

¹⁵⁶ Mansfield [1975] Crim LR 101, CA.

¹⁵⁷ [1974] 1 WLR 1391, CA.

¹⁵⁸ So in Hargreaves [1985] Crim LR 243, CA, the jury were misdirected when told they could convict if satisfied that D might have used the article.

¹⁵⁹ As amended by the Fraud Act 2006, Sch 1, para 8.

¹⁶⁰ cf Criminal Justice Act 1967, s 8; p 131.

¹⁶¹ cf the case where the alleged receiver is proved to have been in possession of recently stolen property and offers no explanation: Abramovitch (1914) 11 Cr App R 45, CCA.

¹⁶² Whiteside [1989] Crim LR 436. See also A Ashworth and M Blake, 'The Presumption of Innocence in English Criminal Law' [1996] Crim LR 306.

¹⁶³ cf Harrison [1970] Crim LR 415, CA.

¹⁶⁴ See p 969.

¹⁶⁵ See LCCP 183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para 16.6i(4). These were not taken forward by government.

25.6 Other trespass offences

English law criminalizes numerous other types of trespass.¹⁶⁶ These include trespassing on various types of property (railways,¹⁶⁷ aerodromes,¹⁶⁸ etc) and areas protected for their significance in national security.¹⁶⁹ In addition, there are offences of trespass with weapons.¹⁷⁰ Further, there are old offences of being found in specified places for unlawful purposes, for example ‘being found in or upon any dwelling house, warehouse, coach house, stable or outhouse, or in any enclosed yard garden or area for any unlawful purpose’.¹⁷¹

¹⁶⁶ See generally P Thornton et al, The Law of Public Order and Protest (2010) Ch 5.

¹⁶⁷ British Transport Commission Act 1949, s 55. CPS Legal Guidance on Transport Offences sets out the offences dealing with railway trespass and includes s 55. The others are s 16 of the Railway Regulation Act 1840 and s 23 of the Regulation of the Railways Act 1868: www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/transport-offences.

¹⁶⁸ Civil Aviation Act 1982, s 39.

¹⁶⁹ Official Secrets Act 1911. The Act does not use the word ‘trespass’ but s 1(1) makes it an offence to approach, inspect or pass over, or be in the neighbourhood of, or enter any ‘prohibited place’ (defined in s 3).

¹⁷⁰ Criminal Law Act 1977, s 8.

¹⁷¹ Vagrancy Act 1824, s 4 and see L v CPS [2008] 1 Cr App R 8 and Akhurst v DPP [2009] EWHC 806 (Admin).

Handling and related offences

26.1 Handling stolen goods

By s 22 of the Theft Act 1968:¹

- (1) A person handles stolen goods if (otherwise than in the course of the stealing) knowing or believing them to be stolen goods he dishonestly receives the goods, or dishonestly undertakes or assists in their retention, removal, disposal or realisation by or for the benefit of another person, or if he arranges to do so.
- (2) A person guilty of handling stolen goods shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

English law has, since the nineteenth century, provided a specific offence of handling, treating this conduct as an independent crime rather than one of being a secondary party to theft.² The diversity of the activities it is sought to criminalize results in a broad and complex offence—Glanville Williams memorably described s 22 as a ‘draftsman’s omelette’.³

Note that the maximum sentence is twice that available for theft,⁴ reflecting Parliament’s desire to deter the professional ‘fence’ so that the market for stolen goods will diminish and the incidence of theft will decrease.⁵ The particular moral wrong involved lies in dealing in stolen goods—with the idea being that stolen goods ‘are a form of contraband, like drugs or counterfeit currency, which law-abiding persons should not, knowingly, acquire’.⁶

¹ See generally Ormerod and Williams, Smith’s Law of Theft, Ch 13; Griew, Theft, Ch 15; Smith, Property Offences, Ch 30; CLRC, Eighth Report (1966) paras 127–132. The law is cogently criticized by DW Elliott, ‘Theft and Related Problems—England, Australia and the USA Compared’ (1977) 26 ICLQ 110, 135–144.

² J Hall, Theft, Law and Society (2nd edn, 1952) 55–58; cf Hale, 1 PC, 618. G Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law (1978) 645–646, regards this as an illustration of the gradual replacement of the offence of being an accessory after the fact.

³ Williams, TBCL, 858.

⁴ Sentencing guidelines have been provided by the Sentencing Council, Theft Offences: Definitive Guideline which applies to adult offenders sentenced on or after 1 Feb 2016. For the magistrates’ court, see Magistrates’ Court Sentencing Guidelines (2017).

⁵ Shelton (1986) 83 Cr App R 379; Tokeley-Parry [1999] Crim LR 578 (detering removal of antiquities from Egypt). See also M Sutton, K Johnston and H Lockwood, Handling Stolen Goods and Theft: A Market Reduction Approach (1998); M Sutton, ‘Supply by Theft: Does the Market for Second-Hand Goods Play a Role in Keeping Crime Figures High?’ (1995) 35 Brit J Crim 400; JL Schneider, ‘Stolen Goods Markets’ (2005) 45 Brit J Crim 129.

⁶ A Simester and GR Sullivan, ‘The Nature and Rationale of Property Offences’ in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes, 190. It is this same philosophy that lies behind the far-reaching and draconian offences in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, criminalizing dealing not just with stolen goods but the proceeds of criminal activity.

It has been argued that the offence is aimed at two distinct yet complementary aspects of the handler's conduct.⁷ Green terms these backward-looking and forward-looking. The former focuses upon the fact that the handler perpetuates the wrongful interference with the victim's property rights, while the latter's focus is upon the handler's encouragement of the commission of future thefts. It is argued that the law as it is currently formulated focuses only upon the backward-looking basis, as the handler can be guilty in the absence of evidence that the thief will commit theft again. Green's thesis is that to perpetuate an owner's loss of property is less culpable than to cause that loss in the first place, so the handler ought to be punished less severely than the thief. Given that in English law the sentence for handling is twice that for theft, Green argues that handling is over-criminalized.

In practical terms, the substantial differences between the sentencing of large-scale professional handlers and, for example, those receiving low-value stolen goods for personal use⁸ prompts suggestions that the offence ought to be subdivided to reflect more accurately the criminality involved.⁹

There are similar offences contained in other statutes. For example, s 17(1) of the Cultural Property (Armed Conflicts) Act 2017 adds a new offence of dealing in 'unlawfully exported cultural property' (as defined in s 16 of that Act), knowing or having reason to suspect that it has been unlawfully exported. It does not extend to property imported into the UK before commencement.

26.1.1 Actus reus

The actus reus is drafted in extremely broad terms, creating an offence that can be committed in many different ways.¹⁰ It is obvious from s 22 that there is no requirement that the handler ever comes into physical possession of the stolen goods, and that the concept of stolen goods itself carries an extended meaning.

The questions that require detailed consideration are: what are 'goods', when are they 'stolen' and what is 'handling'?

26.1.1.1 Stolen goods

By s 34(2)(b), "goods," except in so far as the context otherwise requires, includes money and every other description of property except land, and includes things severed from the land by stealing'. This definition differs from that of 'property' for the purposes of theft. Clearly, it is such a wide definition that problems will rarely arise other than in relation to land and choses in action which we discuss in more detail.

Land

Since land generally is excluded from theft by s 4(2), the effect is that, subject to the small exceptions discussed below, property which can be stolen can be the subject of a handling charge.

A 'thing', attached to or forming part of the land, can be stolen (s 4(2)(b)¹¹) and can therefore always be the subject of handling since the stealing necessarily involves severance of the thing in question. Under s 4(2)(c), on the other hand, a fixture or structure can be stolen whether severed from the land or not. Only if it is severed can it be the subject of ⁷ Green, 13 Ways, 180–194.

⁸ Low monetary value goods received for a handler's own use will attract a modest fine or conditional discharge. For analysis of the activities of the professional handler, see CB Klockars, The Professional Fence (1975).

⁹ See DA Thomas, 'Form and Function in Criminal Law' in Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law, 23–24.

¹⁰ Nicklin [1977] 1 WLR 403. ¹¹ See p 848.

handling. So, if E, an outgoing tenant, dishonestly sells to D, the incoming tenant, a fixture which actually belongs to V, the landlord, D cannot be guilty of handling if the fixture is not severed.¹² If after D's tenancy the incoming tenant is F who knows all of the facts about how D came to have the fixture, F is not guilty of handling even though F has knowingly taken possession of a stolen fixture.

Land which is stolen contrary to s 4(2)(a) (by trustees or personal representatives) will rarely be capable of being handled since the kind of conduct contemplated by s 4(2)(a) will not normally involve severance.

Land may be the subject of both fraud and blackmail, both of which create 'stolen' goods for the purposes of handling.¹³ Again, severance of the land may or may not take place and handling is possible only if it does so.

Things in action

Things in action (an item of property comprising a right to sue another) are expressly mentioned in s 4(1) of the 1968 Act as capable of being the subject of theft but are not mentioned in s 34(2)(b). They must, however, be included in the all-encompassing words 'every other description of property except land' within that section. Things in action may then constitute stolen goods, but a further question is whether they can be handled. Some forms of the actus reus in s 22—for example, 'realisation' and 'disposal'—would, on a natural interpretation, extend to D's dealings with things in action. This is uncontroversial. Whether things in action can be the subject of a charge of 'receiving' is less clear. Under pre-Theft Act law, it referred to taking control of a physical thing and would not be apt to apply to things in action. But there would seem to be no good reason for fettering the interpretation of s 22 in this way. If 'receiving' is given its ordinary meaning there is no reason why D cannot receive a thing in action. So, if D opens a bank account into which he pays stolen money and subsequently assigns the balance in that bank account to E, on a natural use of the language E 'receives' that balance.¹⁴ The Court of Appeal took this broad view in *A-G's Reference (No 4 of 1979)*¹⁵ concluding:

it is clear that a balance in a bank account, being a debt, is itself a thing in action which falls within the definition of goods and may therefore be goods which directly or indirectly represent stolen goods for the purposes of s 24(2)(a).

In Forsyth,¹⁶ the court had no doubt that there could be an offence of handling of a thing in action. It is submitted that this view makes good sense.

Meaning of 'stolen'

By s 24(4):

For purposes of the provisions of this Act relating to goods which have been stolen (including subsections (1) to (3) above) goods obtained in England or Wales or elsewhere either by blackmail or ¹² This is true whether or not his act is in the course of stealing. ¹³ See p 933.

¹⁴ This forestalls any argument that because only some forms of the conduct (realization, disposal, etc) specified in s 22 (but not receiving) are applicable to things in action, they can never be handled.

¹⁵ [1981] 1 All ER 1193 at 1198, [1981] Crim LR 51 and commentary. But see now Preddey [1996] AC 815 and discussion at p 845. If part of the balance in the thief's account is transferred to the credit of the receiver's, it cannot 'represent the goods originally stolen with s 24(2)(a)' because, following Preddey, a new thing in action is created which belongs to the receiver and has never been in the hands of a thief or handler and so is not stolen. Section 24A must be relied on in such cases.

¹⁶ [1997] 2 Cr App R 299, [1997] Crim LR 581, p 1039. The conviction was quashed on other grounds.

[, subject to subsection (5) below by fraud (within the meaning of the Fraud Act 2006)]¹⁷ shall be regarded as stolen; and 'steal', 'theft' and 'thief' shall be construed accordingly.¹⁸

By s 24A(8):

References to stolen goods include money which is withdrawn from an account to which a wrongful credit¹⁹ has been made, but only to the extent that the money derives from the credit.

And by s 24(1):

The provisions of this Act relating to goods which have been stolen shall apply whether the stealing occurred in England or Wales or elsewhere, and whether it occurred before or after the commencement of this Act, provided that the stealing (if not an offence under this Act) amounted to an offence where and at the time when the goods were stolen; and references to stolen goods shall be construed accordingly.

The effect of these provisions is that goods are 'stolen' for the purposes of the Act if they:

- (1) have been stolen contrary to s 1;²⁰
- (2) have been obtained by blackmail contrary to s 21;
- (3) have been obtained by fraud contrary to s 1 of the Fraud Act 2006;
- (4) consist of money dishonestly withdrawn from a wrongful bank credit; or
- (5) have been the subject of an act done in a foreign country which was:
 - (a) a crime by the law of that country, and which
 - (b) had it been done in England, would have been theft, blackmail or fraud contrary to s 1 or s 21 of the Theft Act 1968 or s 1 of the Fraud Act 2006.²¹ The jurisdictional scope means that if T steals property in, for example, Greece by performing an act that is theft under Greek law and would be theft if performed in England, and D, in England, handles that property with mens rea, D can be convicted of handling under s 22.²²

If the information or indictment specifies that the goods were stolen from a specific entity (person or corporation), the prosecution are obliged to prove that issue, if the ownership by the entity is integral to the case.²³

The 'thief' must be guilty

Though s 22 does not say so expressly, the goods must have been stolen in fact.²⁴ To take a simple example, magistrates had erred when they concluded that a credit card was stolen

¹⁷ Words substituted by the Fraud Act 2006, Sch 1, para 6, in force from 15 Jan 2007.

¹⁸ By s 24(5): 'Subsection (1) above applies in relation to goods obtained by fraud as if—(a) the reference to the commencement of this Act were a reference to the commencement of the Fraud Act 2006, and (b) the reference to an offence under this Act were a reference to an offence under section 1 of that Act.'

¹⁹ See s 24A (dishonestly retaining a wrongful credit), p 1053.

²⁰ This will include goods obtained by offences of robbery and burglary which involve theft. See eg Pitham and Hehl (1976) 65 Cr App R 45.

²¹ Handling is a Group A offence for the purposes of the Criminal Justice Act 1993. See generally M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) 180 et seq.

²² The question whether D commits theft in England if he performs acts in, eg, Greece amounting to theft under Greek law and transports the goods to England, is considered at p 842; Atakpu [1994] QB 69; and GR Sullivan and C Warbrick, 'Territoriality, Theft and Atakpu' [1994] Crim LR 650. D who commits theft abroad and returns to England with the criminal property might commit a money laundering offence contrary to s 329 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

²³ Iqbal v DPP (2004) All ER (D) 314 (Oct).

²⁴ Haughton v Smith [1975] AC 476, [1973] 3 All ER 1109 at 1112, 1119 and 1124.

when it was found in D's house three weeks after its owner had realized it was missing. D could, as he had claimed, have found it in the street but forgotten to hand it in to the police. There was insufficient evidence that the card had been stolen at the time it came into D's possession.²⁵

It is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove that D believed the goods to be 'stolen' if they were not. If, because of a mistake of fact (or of civil law) D wrongly believed the goods to be stolen, he might be guilty of theft or an attempt to handle under the Criminal Attempts Act 1981. If D says he knew the goods were stolen because T told him so, this is evidence of D's mens rea but it is not evidence that the goods were stolen in fact.²⁶ T's admission based on D's hearsay²⁷ is of no more value than the hearsay itself. It is a misdirection to tell the jury that they are entitled to take such an admission into account, except as evidence of mens rea.²⁸ In contrast, D's admission of facts that he himself perceived (by, eg, seeing T steal the goods) is evidence of those facts from which a jury could infer that the goods were stolen. In a more likely scenario, D's admission that he bought goods in a pub at a ridiculously low price is prima facie evidence that those goods were stolen; similarly, where a television is bought in a betting shop or where a publican buys cases of whisky from an HGV driver.²⁹ The conduct of a person, T, who offers a bag of jewellery to a stranger, D, for £2,000 and then accepts £100 for it, suggests strongly, as a matter of common sense, that the jewellery is stolen.³⁰

If the alleged thief, T, is not guilty, the handler, D, cannot be convicted for there are no stolen goods for him to handle. So, for example, if the alleged thief turns out to have been under the age of ten at the time of the alleged theft, then the goods appropriated cannot be stolen goods and there can be no conviction for handling them.³¹ If D believed the 'thief' was ten or above, he might be convicted of an attempt to handle.³² Whatever his belief as to the 'thief's' age, the more appropriate charge would be theft of the goods. In considering the liability of the handler and the question of whether there has been a theft, the courts have not drawn any distinctions between cases in which the alleged thief is acquitted on the basis of a justification—for example, necessity—or an excuse—for example, duress.

If the appropriator of the goods is guilty of theft (or the fraudster or blackmailer guilty of those offences), it is submitted that the goods acquired may be the subject of handling although the appropriator is immune from prosecution by reason, for example, of diplomatic immunity.³³

It must be proved, as against an alleged handler, that another person was guilty of stealing the goods. If the thief, T, and handler, D, are tried together, the verdict acquitting T is not necessarily inconsistent with one convicting D; evidence admissible against D may have been inadmissible against T. In separate trials, the fact that T has been acquitted of stealing the goods is no bar to the prosecution of the handler and is, indeed, inadmissible in evidence. But ²⁵ Defazio v DPP [2007] All ER (D) 262 (Jul).

²⁶ Porter [1976] Crim LR 58; Marshall [1977] Crim LR 106; Lang v Evans (Inspector of Police) [1977] Crim LR 286; Hack [1978] Crim LR 359; Overington [1978] Crim LR 692, CA.

²⁷ An out of court assertion relied on for the truth of its content; see now the impenetrable Criminal Justice Act 2003, s 115. See Riat [2012] EWCA Crim 1509. Under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, such conduct will only be hearsay if (one of) T's purpose(s) was to cause D to believe that fact or to act upon the basis that the goods were stolen.

²⁸ Hulbert (1979) 69 Cr App R 243, CA.

²⁹ An example put by Lawton LJ in McDonald (1980) 70 Cr App R 288, CA. See also Barnes [1991] Crim LR 132.

³⁰ Korniak (1983) 76 Cr App R 145, CA.

³¹ Walters v Lunt [1951] 2 All ER 645 therefore remains good law.

³² See Toye [1984] Crim LR 555.

³³ cf Dickinson v Del Solar [1930] 1 KB 376; AB [1941] 1 KB 454; Madan (1961) 45 Cr App R 80.

the fact that T has been convicted of stealing the goods is admissible at D's trial for handling and, when it is admitted, T must be taken to have committed the theft unless the contrary is proved.³⁴ Under this evidential provision, if D claims that T did not steal the goods—that T was wrongly convicted—it is for D to prove it on a balance of probabilities.

26.1.1.2 When goods cease to be stolen

It is obvious that goods that have once been stolen cannot continue to be regarded as 'stolen' so long as they continue to exist thereafter. A line must be drawn somewhere, and the Act draws it in the same place as the common law did. By s 24(3) of the Act:

But no goods shall be regarded as having continued to be stolen goods after they have been restored to the person from whom they were stolen or to other lawful possession or custody, or after that person and any other person claiming through him have otherwise ceased as regards those goods to have any right to restitution in respect of the theft.

So if T steals goods, but the stolen goods are taken back by the owner or someone acting on his behalf, or by the police,³⁵ but then in a police sting operation returned to the thief so that he may hand them over to a receiver, D, that person will not be guilty of handling because the goods he receives are no longer stolen goods.³⁶ A charge of attempted handling is available, and it may also be theft. D might also be convicted of handling if his acts of 'arranging' occurred after the theft but before the goods had been 'restored'.

Difficult questions arise over whether goods have in fact been 'restored to the person from whom they were stolen or to other lawful possession or custody'. It cannot be enough to constitute restoration that V (the owner or his agent) knows that T has stolen the goods and follows T to his destination so that the handler can be caught red-handed;³⁷ nor that V marks the goods after the theft so that they can be identified in the hands of the handler.³⁸ A more difficult case in this context is King.³⁹ A parcel containing a stolen fur coat was handed by T, the thief, to a policeman who was in the act of examining the parcel when the telephone rang. The caller was D, the proposed receiver. The policeman stopped his examination, and D was told to come along as arranged. He did so, and received the coat. It was held that D was guilty of receiving stolen goods because the coat had not been reduced into the possession of the police—though it was admitted that in a few minutes it would have been, had the telephone not rung. The case has, however, been criticized. It is easy to accept that if the police are examining a parcel to see whether it contains stolen goods, they do not take possession of the contents until they decide that this is what they are looking for.⁴⁰ In King, however, T had admitted to the policeman the theft of the coat and produced the parcel. One might have expected, therefore, that the policeman had made up his mind to take charge of it before the telephone rang. The court presumably made the decision on the assumption that the police officer had not done so. On that assumption the decision would now be the same under the Theft Act.⁴¹

³⁴ See s 74 of PACE 1984, O'Connor (1986) 85 Cr App R 298 at 302, and Cross and Tapper on Evidence (12th edn, 2010).

³⁵ A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1974) [1974] QB 744, CA.

³⁶ cf Dolan (1855) Dears CC 436; Schmidt (1866) LR 1 CCR 15; Villensky [1892] 2 QB 597.

³⁷ In Haughton v Smith [1975] AC 476, the police accompanied the driver of a van containing stolen goods to its destination to trap the handler. Lords Hailsham and Dilhorne questioned whether the prosecution was right to concede that the goods had been 'restored' to lawful custody.

³⁸ Greater London Metropolitan Police Comr v Streeter (1980) 71 Cr App R 113, DC.

³⁹ [1938] 2 All ER 662, CCA.

⁴⁰ cf Warner v Metropolitan Police Comr [1969] 2 AC 256, HL.

⁴¹ In A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1974) [1974] 2 All ER 899 at 904, Lord Widgery CJ said that King 'might be thought to be a rather bold decision'.

This view is supported by the decision in *A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1974)*⁴² that whether the police officer has taken possession depends primarily on his intentions. In that case an officer, correctly suspecting that goods in the back of a car were stolen, immobilized the car and kept watch until T returned to it. He questioned T and in view of T's unsatisfactory response arrested him. It was held that the jury ought to have been directed to consider whether the officer had decided, before T's appearance, to take possession of the goods or whether he was of an entirely open mind, intending to decide after he had questioned T. Possession⁴³ requires both an intention to possess and some act of possession. To immobilize a car does not necessarily involve an intention to possess the car or its contents but, along with other circumstances, it may be evidence of such an intention. The approach adopted by the courts is hardly conducive to certainty and consistency in the law in deciding whether goods cease to be stolen.

It is clear that the goods cease to be stolen in the case where the police take control acting without the authority of the owner, for they are clearly in 'other lawful possession or custody of the goods'. Indeed, it would seem to be enough that the goods fall into the possession of any person provided that person intends to restore them to the person from whom they were stolen.

Section 24(3) also provides that the goods lose their character of being 'stolen goods' if the person from whom they were stolen has ceased to have any right to restitution in respect of them. Whether a 'right to restitution' exists is a complex question of civil law. A person whose goods have been wrongfully converted (under the Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977) does not have a right to have those goods restored to him. He has a right to damages to compensate him for the conversion, but it is in the discretion of the court whether to order the goods to be delivered to him.⁴⁴ Section 24(3) is not intended to be limited to only those cases in which a court would exercise its discretion to order the goods to be returned to V. In the criminal proceedings, it would be impossible to identify such cases and it is submitted that the subsection is applicable to all cases in which V could succeed in a civil action based on his proprietary interest in the thing, whether in conversion or for the protection of an equitable interest.⁴⁵

As drafted, the provision seems to have been intended to bear a still wider meaning. The CLRC explained it as follows:⁴⁶

if the person who owned the goods when they were stolen no longer has any title to them, there will be no reason why the goods should continue to have the taint of being stolen goods. For example, the offence of handling stolen goods will . . . apply also to goods obtained by criminal deception under [s 15⁴⁷]. If the owner of the goods who has been deceived chooses on discovering the deception to ratify his disposal of the goods he will cease to have any title to them.

It is clear that 'title' is here used in a broad sense to include a right to rescind. The Committee clearly had in mind a case where property passes from V to D at the moment when the goods are obtained by fraud.⁴⁸ In such a case, V, strictly, has no 'title' and his right to recover the goods (or much more likely, their value) will only arise on his rescinding the contract.⁴⁹ Such a potential right is, it is submitted, clearly a 'right to restitution' within the Act.

⁴² ibid.

⁴³ For the purposes of s 24(3), possession or control suffices. Arguably in both the above cases the police officer had at least control of the goods but control, like possession, must involve an intention to take charge.

⁴⁴ Torts (Interference with Goods) Act 1977, s 3. See generally E Peel and J Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) para 18.034.

⁴⁵ In view of the recent expansion of the opportunities to claim for restitution or unjust enrichment, this might be enlarged, particularly in cases where there has been a transfer of property under a mistake. See Ch 18, p 863.

⁴⁶ Eighth Report, para 139.

⁴⁷ Now repealed.

⁴⁸ As discussed in Ch 22.

⁴⁹ cf Ch 22, p 957.

26.1.1.3 Goods representing those originally stolen may be stolen goods

By s 24(2) of the Act:

For the purposes of those provisions references to stolen goods shall include, in addition to the goods originally stolen and parts of them (whether in their original state or not),—

- (a) any other goods which directly or indirectly represent or have at any time represented the stolen goods in the hands of the thief as being the proceeds of any disposal or realisation of the whole or part of the goods stolen or of goods so representing the stolen goods; and
- (b) any other goods which directly or indirectly represent or have at any time represented the stolen goods in the hands of a handler of the stolen goods or any part of them as being the proceeds of any disposal or realisation of the whole or part of the stolen goods handled by him or of goods so representing them.

The CLRC⁵⁰ accepted that this provision:

may seem technical; but the effect will be that the goods which the accused is charged with handling must, at the time of the handling or at some previous time, (i) have been in the hands of the thief or of a handler, and (ii) have represented the original stolen goods in the sense of being the proceeds, direct or indirect, of a sale or other realisation of the original goods.

The effect is best explained by an example. Suppose D steals an Audi car from V and subsequently that car passes, by way of sale, exchange or otherwise, through the hands of E, F and G. The Audi remains stolen until such time as it ceases to be stolen by virtue of s 24(3) (ie until the Audi is restored to the owner or other lawful custody or until the owner ceases to have a right to restitution in respect of it). It follows that until such time any person acquiring the Audi may be convicted of handling it, if he acquires it knowing or believing it to be stolen. It is not necessary for every person in the chain to have been a handler for the Audi to remain stolen. So, where the person acquiring the Audi, say G, acquires it from F, knowing or believing it to be stolen, G handles it even though F's earlier acquisition of the car did not constitute handling by F because F acquired it innocently.

The position with regard to the proceeds of stolen goods rather than the goods themselves is different. Assume that D steals the Audi from V and D then swaps the stolen Audi with E for a BMW. The BMW is now notionally stolen for the purposes of the offence because it directly represents the proceeds of the stolen Audi in the hands of the thief, D. Assume that E was aware that the Audi was stolen and he exchanges it with F for a Citroën. The Citroën is now notionally stolen because it represents the proceeds of the stolen Audi in the hands of the handler, E. Assume, then, that D sells the BMW to H who buys in good faith for £5,000. The BMW now ceases to be stolen goods as V has no right to restitution and (unlike with actual stolen goods in the example of the Audi with G and F above) once notionally stolen goods cease to be stolen goods; they cannot revert to being notionally stolen because they are subsequently acquired by someone who is aware of their provenance.

The £5,000 now in D's hands, however, is notionally stolen because it indirectly represents the proceeds of the stolen Audi in the hands of the thief and a recipient of all or part of that £5,000 would, if aware of its provenance, be guilty of handling. The position may be a little more complex where D banks the £5,000. If the £5,000 represents all that D has in the account, money which D draws from the account is stolen goods and a receiver of it, having the requisite knowledge, would be guilty of handling. Where, however, D has other innocently acquired money in his account, say a further £5,000, it may be difficult to prove that a cheque drawn for £2,000 that is cashed by E represents the proceeds of the stolen £5,000. It is not enough to establish that the recipient believed that the cheque for £2,000 represented proceeds of the stolen £5,000—that it represented his share of the ill-gotten £5,000.⁵¹ This will establish the recipient's mens rea, which would be enough to convict him of an attempt but, to establish the full offence, it must additionally be proved that D intended the £2,000 to represent the proceeds of the stolen money.

⁵⁰ Eighth Report, 66.

In the difficult case of Forsyth,⁵² T stole funds in a company's bank account and transferred them to a series of other banks in which T had accounts. It was held that 'in the hands of' means 'in the possession or control of' and therefore that the new credit balances remained under T's control. This renders the handling offence even wider. The balances were new property, distinct from that stolen,⁵³ but they 'represented' that stolen money and, 'being in the hands of' the thief, were accordingly stolen goods. More difficult to follow is the court's assumption that the actual banknotes withdrawn, on T's instructions, by D from one of the accounts were also stolen, so that D was guilty of handling them when she took physical possession of them. The notes belonged exclusively to the bank and had never been in the hands of a thief or handler until D received them and therefore could not have been stolen goods under s 24(2). If A pays stolen money into a bank account and, in payment of a debt he owes to B, gives B a cheque drawn on that account, B, if he cashes the cheque, does not receive stolen money. The actual cash in the form of pound coins in the hands of the bank is not stolen goods. B is not the thief, nor is he receiving stolen goods. He is not guilty of handling. Nor is it permissible to argue that B is a handler and therefore that the goods are stolen because they are in his hands. That is a circular argument.

In that example, however, B is acting on his own behalf. In Forsyth, D was acting as an agent for T, the original thief. For the reason given above, D (it is submitted) was not receiving stolen goods. But because D, unlike B in the example, was acting as agent for the thief, the cash, though physically in D's hands, was in law 'in the hands of' T—that is, it 'indirectly represented the stolen goods in the hands of the thief' (s 24(2)(a))—and was therefore stolen goods. D was not a receiver of stolen goods—the cash became stolen only when she received it. She then had stolen goods in her hands. That is not an offence; but she then went on to assist in the retention, etc, of the stolen goods for the benefit of T; and that is the offence of handling.

26.1.1.4 Forms of handling

Section 22 of the 1968 Act creates a broad offence⁵⁴ capable of being committed in any one of several (as many as 18) ways. These are:

- (1) Receiving the goods.
- (2) Undertaking the retention, removal, disposal or realization of the goods by or for the benefit of another person.
- (3) Assisting in the retention, removal, disposal or realization of the goods by or for the benefit of another person.
- (4) Arranging to do (1), (2), (3).

Although in the leading case of *Bloxham*⁵⁵ Lord Bridge said, 'It is, I think, well settled that this subsection creates two distinct offences but no more than two', this must be wrong. It is ⁵¹ A-G's Reference (No 4 of 1979) [1981] 1 WLR 667, CA.

⁵² [1997] 2 Cr App R 299, [1997] Crim LR 589 and additional commentary.

⁵³ Preddy [1996] AC 815.

⁵⁴ Under the old law in s 33(1) of the Larceny Act 1916, the only way of committing the offence was by 'receiving' the stolen goods.

⁵⁵ [1983] 1 AC 109 on which see L Blake, 'The Erstwhile Innocent Purchaser of Stolen Goods' (1982) 46 J Crim L 220.

generally accepted that s 22 creates only one offence⁵⁶ which may be committed in a variety of ways. What was well settled before Bloxham (and remains so) was that where the evidence justified it, the proper practice was to have one count for receiving (or perhaps arranging to receive) and a second count for all the other forms of handling.⁵⁷ In law, however, the subsection creates only one offence.⁵⁸

If D is charged specifically with receiving only, he may not be convicted on that indictment of some other form of handling;⁵⁹ and vice versa. Since receiving is 'a single finite act', each receipt of stolen goods is a separate offence. Therefore, a single count for receiving a whole quantity of goods found in D's possession may be defective because it alleges more than one offence in the single charge (it is 'bad for duplicity') if the receipt of various portions of that whole took place on more than one occasion.⁶⁰ It may be that the Crown prefer to use a multiple offending count relying on rule 10(2) of the Criminal Procedure Rules to avoid that problem. The forms of handling other than receiving include 'an activity which may be continuing'; so that it is legitimate to charge D in a single count with handling a quantity of goods, parts of which have been received on different occasions. The word 'retention', in particular, would be apt to apply where a large quantity of goods is found in D's possession and has been received by him in portions over a long period of time. In order to obtain a conviction under the single count it would, of course, be necessary to prove not merely that D received the goods, but that he was retaining them for the benefit of another person, or that he was assisting another person in retaining them.

Receiving

All forms of handling other than receiving or arranging to receive are subject to the qualification that it must be proved that D was acting 'for the benefit of another person'. If, as will frequently be the case, there is no evidence of this then it must be proved that D received or arranged to receive the goods and evidence of no other form of handling will suffice.⁶¹

So, to establish receiving, it must be proved that either:

- (1) D took possession or joined with others to share possession (whether actual or constructive), intending to possess the goods; or
- (2) D took control of the stolen property or joined with others to share control of it with intent to do so.

'Receiving' the thief by welcoming him as a person who has the goods in his possession does not necessarily amount to receiving the goods. If the thief, T, retains exclusive control, there is no receiving by D.⁶² There may, however, be a joint possession by the thief and receiver, so it is unnecessary to prove that the thief ever parted with possession—it is sufficient that he shared it with the alleged receiver.

⁵⁶ Griffiths v Freeman [1970] 1 All ER 1117.

⁵⁷ Willis and Syme [1972] 3 All ER 797, CA; Deakin [1972] 3 All ER 803, CA.

⁵⁸ Thus in Nicklin [1977] 2 All ER 444, CA, [1977] Crim LR 221 it was held that an indictment alleging unparticularized handling was not bad for duplicity as it charges only one offence. Particulars should be given so as to enable the accused to understand the ingredients of the charge he has to meet: Sloggett [1972] 1 QB 430, [1971] 3 All ER 264. The maximum number of counts for a single instance of handling in the ordinary case is two: Ikpong [1972] Crim LR 432, CA.

⁵⁹ Nicklin, n 58.

⁶⁰ Smythe (1980) 72 Cr App Rep 8, CA. But note the flexibility offered by r 10(2) of the Criminal Procedure Rules 2015.

⁶¹ The Theft Act does not further define receiving and it must be assumed that old authorities all remain valid.

⁶² Wiley (1850) 2 Den 37.

The question is what joint possession means in these circumstances. In Smith,⁶³ it was held that a jury had been correctly directed that they could convict D of handling if they believed that the stolen watch was in the custody of the thief, that D was aware of that and that D had absolute control over the thief to the extent that if D demanded it, the thief would hand it to him. Lord Campbell CJ said that if the thief had been employed by D to commit theft, so that the watch was in D's control, D was guilty of receiving. This situation is slightly odd because usually handling occurs because a previous theft has been committed. In this situation, however, there has been no previous theft so D may become a handler by some act done only after the theft. It is, of course, important to identify the point at which D receives the stolen goods since it is at that point that he must have the relevant mens rea.⁶⁴ D would be guilty of theft and receiving but, since virtually all handling is now theft, it is the general rule that the two offences are committed simultaneously.⁶⁵

As is clear from Smith, it is not necessary to prove personal physical possession or control by D. It is enough if the goods are received by his agent with D's authority.⁶⁶ There are few other limits on what constitutes receiving: D might receive them for a merely temporary purpose such as concealment from the police;⁶⁷ and it is unnecessary that the receiver should receive any profit or advantage from the possession of the goods.⁶⁸ However, it is not enough that D took possession by 'finding' goods that were stolen; there must be a receipt from another.⁶⁹ If D took possession of goods from the thief without his consent, this appears to be capable of being both theft and handling, since it is clear that the two offences can be committed by one and the same act.⁷⁰

In all cases of receiving, it continues to be essential for the judge to give a careful direction as to possession or control.⁷¹ If the only evidence against D is that he ran away on being found by the police in a house where stolen property had been left, there would appear to be no case to leave to a jury. Likewise, where the evidence is consistent with the view that D went to premises where stolen goods were stored with the intention of assuming possession but had not actually done so,⁷² or where the only evidence of receiving, for example, a stolen car is that D's fingerprint was found on the rear-view mirror.⁷³ The mere fact that the stolen goods were found on D's premises is not sufficient evidence to establish receiving. It must be shown that the goods had come either by invitation or arrangement with him or that he had exercised some control over them.⁷⁴ It has even been held that D is not necessarily in possession of a stolen safe simply because he assists others in trying to open it.⁷⁵

Arranging to receive

Where it is impossible to prove an actual receipt by D, the evidence may nevertheless show that D has arranged to receive the goods. Where D has merely made preparations to receive and has not yet reached the stage of attempting to do so, the preparations may constitute ⁶³ (1855) Dears CC 494. See also Gleed (1916) 12 Cr App R 32, CCA.

⁶⁴ Brook [1993] Crim LR 455. ⁶⁵ Sainthouse [1980] Crim LR 506.

⁶⁶ Miller (1854) 6 Cox CC 353. In several areas of law (eg drugs offences and fraud offences) the courts have been prepared to accept that D is in possession of an article if he can draw upon it from a common pool of articles shared with his associates. See Montague [2013] EWCA Crim 1781, [2014] Crim LR 327.

⁶⁷ Richardson (1834) 6 C & P 335. ⁶⁸ Davis (1833) 6 C & P 177.

⁶⁹ Haider (1985) unreported, discussed in Griew, Theft, para 13.

⁷⁰ This was formerly only larceny (from the thief) and not receiving: Wade (1844) 1 Car & Kir 739.

⁷¹ Frost and Hale (1964) 48 Cr App R 284, CCA.

⁷² Freedman (1930) 22 Cr App R 133, CCA. But this might be sufficient evidence of an arrangement to receive.

⁷³ Court (1960) 44 Cr App R 242, CCA.

⁷⁴ Cavendish [1961] 2 All ER 856, CCA; Lloyd [1992] Crim LR 361.

⁷⁵ Tomblin [1964] Crim LR 780, CCA.

a sufficient arrangement. The difficulties in a case like *King*⁷⁶ (the fur coat case discussed earlier) will be overcome if it appears that the arrangement to receive was concluded before there was a possibility of the goods ceasing to be stolen. Presumably it is enough if the proposed receipt is by an agent of D. The arrangement must be made after the theft, since D must know or believe the goods to be stolen when he makes the arrangement.⁷⁷

It is difficult to envisage an arrangement that does not involve an agreement with another, although there is no such express requirement in the Act. Such an agreement will therefore almost always amount to a conspiracy to receive so the breadth of the crime created by this provision is less concerning than might appear. Clearly, an arrangement made by D with an innocent person is enough (provided D has the relevant mens rea), as is an arrangement that does not involve another party at all, if that can be envisaged.

This form of the offence is complete as soon as the proposed receipt is arranged. It is immaterial (except as to sentence) that D repents or does nothing in pursuance of the arrangement. In this respect, it is clear that the substantive offence of arranging to receive has developed as a form of inchoate offence, rather than a form of secondary participation.

Undertaking and assisting

Handling under the 1968 Act extends to acts of 'undertaking and assisting' in the retention, removal, disposal or realization of stolen goods. Before 1968, such conduct was not criminal at all, not even by way of an attempt. Section 22 created far-reaching and overlapping forms of the offence. 'Undertaking' presumably covers the case where D sets out to retain, etc the stolen goods, on his own initiative. It appears more apt to describe the activity of the seller of stolen goods rather than that of the buyer. 'Assisting' seems more apt to cover the case where D joins the thief or another handler in doing so.⁷⁸

Retention

In Pitchley,⁷⁹ the court suggested that retention means 'keep possession of, not lose, continue to have'. It is a continuing activity. The obvious cases of retaining will be where D stores stolen goods for the thief. An example of assisting in retention would be where D's 10-year-old son, T, brings home a cycle which he has stolen: D assists in its retention if: (a) he agrees that T may keep the cycle in the house; or (b) he tells the police there is no cycle in the house; or (c) he gives T a tin of paint so that he may disguise it.

Merely to use goods knowing them to be stolen does not in itself amount to assisting in their retention. D did not commit the offence by using a stolen heater and battery charger in his father's garage,⁸⁰ nor by erecting stolen scaffolding in the course of a building operation.⁸¹ Nothing was done with the purpose, or with the effect, of assisting in retention.

It must be proved that D assisted in retention by concealing the goods or making them more difficult to identify or some other such conduct. It has been held that it is sufficient that D's passive conduct may constitute such assistance.⁸² But, according to Kanwar,⁸³ 'something must be done by the offender, and done intentionally and dishonestly, for the purpose of enabling the goods to be retained'. In that case, it was sufficient that D told lies to protect her husband who had dishonestly brought the stolen goods into the house. She knew that, if the deception succeeded, the effect would be that her husband would be enabled to retain the goods.

⁷⁶ See p 1036. And similarly the difficulties of Haughton v Smith [1975] AC 476, HL, n 24.

⁷⁷ Park (1987) 87 Cr App R 164, CA. ⁷⁸ But cf Deakin [1972] 3 All ER 803, CA.

⁷⁹ (1972) 57 Cr App R 30, CA. ⁸⁰ Sanders (1982) 75 Cr App R 84.

⁸¹ Thornhill (unreported); discussed in Sanders (1982) 75 Cr App R 84).

⁸² Burroughes (2000) 29 Nov, unreported, CA. ⁸³ [1982] 2 All ER 528, 75 Cr App R 87.

Disposal

This would most obviously cover cases of D destroying the stolen goods, or using stolen money to pay for goods or services.⁸⁴ It extends beyond that to cases where D negotiates with E to sell him goods which D knows to have been stolen by T. Although D is never in possession or control of the goods,⁸⁵ he would appear to have undertaken or assisted in the disposal of stolen goods.

A person does not 'assist' in the disposal of stolen property merely by accepting any benefit deriving from that disposition. There must be proof that D gave help or encouragement; an omission to act will not generally ground liability. In Coleman,⁸⁶ D knew that his wife was using stolen money to pay solicitors' fees relating to the purchase of a flat in the couple's joint names. That did not in itself amount to assisting though it was evidence from which a jury might infer that he had assisted by telling his wife to use the stolen money or agreeing that she should do so.

Removal

This would occur where, for example, D assists T to lift from a van a barrel of gin which he knows to have been stolen by T or another. Even if D never has possession or control,⁸⁷ he has assisted or undertaken the removal of the stolen goods. D who lights the way for T to carry stolen goods from a house to a barn so that he may negotiate for the purchase of them,⁸⁸ has assisted in the removal of the goods and even if that were the full extent of his intended dealing with the goods he would still be liable to conviction (though his sentence might be lighter).

Realization

According to the House of Lords in Bloxham, this means 'exchanging goods for money or other property'. This form of the offence overlaps with disposal.

Assistance

The undertaking or assisting must relate to the retention, etc of the goods. The assistance can be by words or conduct. It was said in Kanwar that, 'The requisite assistance need not be successful in its object'. But is it true to say that one who attempts to assist and fails nevertheless 'assists'? This seems to involve reading the section as if it read, 'does an act with the purpose of assisting'. The would-be assister who fails to assist in any way would surely be more properly convicted of an attempt.

In all cases of undertaking it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that D was acting by or for the benefit of another, and in cases of 'assisting in' D must be assisting another.

Arranging to undertake or assist

The extension of the law to undertaking and assisting is far-reaching, but the Act goes further still. The mere arrangement to do any of the acts amounting to undertaking or assisting amounts to the complete offence of handling. The goods must, of course, be stolen by the time of such an arrangement. It is, presumably, enough that D agreed to negotiate the sale of the stolen goods, for example to lift down the barrel of stolen gin or to do any act for the purpose of enabling T to retain, remove or dispose of the stolen goods.

⁸⁴ cf Williams, TBCL, 867, interpreting disposal as being limited to alienation.

⁸⁵ cf Watson [1916] 2 KB 385. ⁸⁶ [1986] Crim LR 56, CA.

⁸⁷ Gleed (1916) 12 Cr App R 32, CCA; Hobson v Impett (1957) 41 Cr App R 138, CCA.

⁸⁸ Wiley (1850) 2 Den 37.

26.1.1.5 Handling by omission

'Receiving', 'undertaking' and 'arranging' all suggest that some positive conduct is required, though as little as a nod or a wink might suffice in particular circumstances. 'Assisting', however, may be constituted by inactivity provided it is in circumstances where that inactivity does in fact provide assistance.⁸⁹ Take a simple case. D, a wife, could hardly be liable as a handler because T, her husband, each dawn returns to his house with the fruits of the night's burglaries. As has been shown earlier, D would not become a handler even if she used the goods, provided such use did not involve assistance in their retention, etc.

Knowledge of the whereabouts of stolen goods cannot suffice to make D a handler; nor does D become a handler simply by refusing to answer police questions as to the whereabouts of the goods⁹⁰ since there is no obligation to help the police with their inquiries.⁹¹ So, in Brown,⁹² where T secreted stolen goods in D's flat and told D he had done so, it was a misdirection to tell the jury that assisting in the retention of the goods could be inferred from D's refusal to reveal the presence of the stolen goods when questioned about them by the police. The conviction in Brown was, however, upheld by applying the proviso then available to the Court of Appeal. D had tacitly, if not expressly, permitted T to hide the goods on his premises and had thereby assisted in their retention. This is not to say that knowledge of the presence of stolen goods on his premises always renders the occupier a handler. Obviously, D does not assist in the retention of stolen goods where D knows that T is wearing a stolen coat and invites T into his premises, even if D puts it in the cloakroom for the duration of T's stay. But if D's premises are used, as they were used in Brown, to house the goods and D allows them to remain there he can properly be said to be assisting in their retention just as plainly as if he had initially given permission. What is important here is that D has control of premises and has chosen to allow their use for the storage of stolen goods.⁹³

*Pitchley*⁹⁴ is similar. T, D's son, gave D stolen money telling him that he had won it gambling and D paid it into his bank account. Two days later D became aware that the money was stolen but he did nothing about it until questioned by the police four days later. D's conviction for handling by assisting in the retention of the stolen money⁹⁵ was upheld because he had continued to retain possession after he became aware that the money was stolen. D had assumed control of the money and had, with guilty knowledge, retained control for the benefit of T. But the stolen money had in fact ceased to exist and it appears that the thing in action which replaced it was not 'stolen' because D was neither a thief nor a handler at the time of the 'realisation'.⁹⁶ It is thus very doubtful whether Pitchley was rightly convicted. A better charge

⁸⁹ See n 82.

⁹⁰ Though D may become a handler (assist in the retention of the goods) if lies are told to put the police off the scent: Kanwar [1982] 1 WLR 845, n 83.

⁹¹ See p 710. Although cf Sekfali v DPP [2006] EWHC 894 (Admin).

⁹² [1970] 1 QB 105, CA.

⁹³ cf the case of Kousar [2009] EWCA Crim 139 decided under the Trade Marks Act 1994 in which K's conviction for unauthorized use of a trademark was quashed. K's home was searched after her husband's market stall was found to be selling counterfeit goods. Counterfeit goods were in the loft and in a van parked outside. The van was not the family transport and K did not use it. K was prosecuted on the basis that she was in possession, control or custody of the goods as a principal offender, not as an aider and abettor of her husband. The Court of Appeal held that in terms of possession, proof of K's knowledge or acquiescence of the presence of the goods was not enough. There was no evidence that K was in possession of the goods in the loft, and a fortiori, she did not have possession of the goods in the van outside. As far as control was concerned, actual control of the goods was needed. It was not enough that she had the ability to control the storage of the goods.

⁹⁴ (1972) 57 Cr App R 30, CA. Cf Tamm [1973] Crim LR 115.

⁹⁵ The decision overlooks the fact that when D acquired his knowledge there was no longer any 'stolen' money to handle (see Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, para 13.70 fn 3) but this does not affect the point at issue.

⁹⁶ See Griew, Theft, paras 15–23 fn 62; Williams, TBCL, 873.

would have been theft. The thing in action, being the proceeds of the stolen money, probably continued to belong to V; and D, by keeping it as owner, appropriated it: s 3(2).

26.1.1.6 Otherwise than in the course of the stealing

The offence is committed only if the conduct that amounts to handling occurs otherwise than in the course of the original stealing; that is, causing the goods to be stolen goods in the first place before the alleged handling arose.⁹⁷ (Almost every handling is also a second theft—the handler dishonestly appropriates property belonging to another with the intention permanently to deprive the other of it—but that is not significant for this issue.)

If D was a party to the original theft, his participation in that theft cannot also render him liable for the offence of handling stolen goods. This limitation is necessary to keep handling within proper bounds. Without it, virtually every instance of theft by two or more persons would also be handling by one or the other or, more likely, both of them. This restriction assists in separating these two distinct forms of conduct that carry vastly different sentences and particular labels to which different stigmas attach.

The courts have emphasized that charging and jury directions should be kept simple where these issues arise.⁹⁸ It is often a sensible course for alternative counts of theft and handling to be left to the jury.⁹⁹

The duration of the course of stealing

Identifying when the stealing stops and the handling begins is important. The duration of ‘the course of the stealing’ depends on the extent to which appropriation is a continuing act.¹⁰⁰ The issue has become even more complex following Gomez, and the extension of the concept of appropriation, rendering what were previously mere preparatory acts to completed thefts. As noted, one case involving handling, Pitham and Hehl,¹⁰¹ suggested that appropriation is an instantaneous act, concluded at the moment the goods are stolen. If this were right, the words ‘in the course of the stealing’ would be rendered nugatory. It is submitted that, in the light of *Hale*¹⁰² and Atakpu,¹⁰³ cases concerned with robbery and theft respectively, Pitham must be wrongly decided in this respect.

Atakpu adopts the transaction test—was D still ‘on the job’? Although providing a pragmatic guideline, this does not, of course, solve all the problems. A thief is likely to be held to be on the job while he is in a building that he has entered for the purpose of stealing and from which he intends to remove the stolen goods. But is he still in the course of theft as he walks down the garden path with the goods? As he drives home? As he shows them to his wife at home? Griew¹⁰⁴ suggests that the scope of theft is determined by looking at ‘the total process of the effective appropriation, including the getaway’, but it is doubtful that this is any improvement on the test of the thief being ‘on the job’.

It does not necessarily follow that the theft is still in the course of being committed because the stolen property has not yet been removed from the premises on which it was stolen. If D and T agree to steal from their employer V and in pursuance of the plan D steals

⁹⁷ See generally ATH Smith, ‘Theft and/or Handling’ [1977] Crim LR 517 and Property Offences, paras 30.71–30.82.

⁹⁸ See Bosson [1999] Crim LR 596.

⁹⁹ The Court of Appeal confirmed in Read [2014] EWCA Crim 687 that it is also permissible to leave alternate counts of robbery and handling to the jury.

¹⁰⁰ See p 841. See also G Williams, ‘Appropriation: A Single or Continuous Act?’ [1978] Crim LR 69.

¹⁰¹ (1976) 65 Cr App R 45, p 841.

¹⁰² (1978) 68 Cr App R 415, p 900. The offence of robbery under s 8 requires theft ‘at the time of’ whereas s 22 focuses on ‘the course of’.

¹⁰³ [1994] QB 69, p 837.

¹⁰⁴ Paras 15–46.

goods which he places in T's locker so that T may remove them from the premises, T is a thief and not a handler even though some time elapses between D's appropriation of the goods and T's removal of them. It is one enterprise for the theft of V's goods. If, however, D steals V's goods and secretes them on the premises, a subsequent arrangement with T for T to remove them from the premises constitutes T being a handler.¹⁰⁵ T is not a party to the original theft.

Proof of handling or theft

It has been held that in an ordinary case, the words, 'otherwise than in the course of the stealing', have little importance and the jury should not even be told about them. But where the evidence is such that a reasonable jury might think it reasonably possible that the alleged handler was a participant in the theft, they should surely be told that, if this was so, the law says that he is not guilty of handling.

There have been some odd applications of this principle in various cases. In Cash,¹⁰⁶ it was held that the words 'otherwise than in the course of stealing' do not constitute an element in the offence that has to be proved in order to establish a prima facie case of handling. In Cash, stolen goods were found in D's possession on 25 February. The property was stolen (by a burglar) not later than 16 February. It was held that it was not open to the jury to infer that D was the burglar rather than a receiver. Perhaps the evidence was insufficient to satisfy the jury beyond reasonable doubt that D was the burglar but might they not, given the opportunity, have thought that it was reasonably possible, if not probable, that he was the burglar? Is it unheard of for burglars to retain possession of the stolen property for nine days? In Greaves,¹⁰⁷ it was held that the judge had properly left it open to the jury to convict of burglary where the time lapse was 17 days. In Wells,¹⁰⁸ Cash was described as a decision which makes 'entirely good sense'¹⁰⁹ and held to apply in any case in which there is no evidence to be left to the jury suggesting that D was a burglar/thief.

There are at least four possible incriminating explanations for D's recent possession in these types of case: (a) that he is the thief; (b) that he took part in the theft and received the goods in the course of it; (c) that he was implicated in the theft and only received his proceeds later; (d) that he was not involved in the theft and received the stolen goods at a later date.¹¹⁰ If all that can be proved by the prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt is that D was in possession with a dishonest state of mind, how can handling be satisfactorily established?

¹⁰⁵ cf Atwell and O'Donnell (1801) East, II PC, 768. D1 and D2 bent on stealing some of their employer's property moved it nearer the warehouse door during the course of the morning. Later that day E1 and E2 arranged to buy the goods from them and all returned later that evening to take away the goods from the warehouse. It was held that E1 and E2 were thieves and not receivers; the theft was a continuing transaction as to those (E1 and E2) who joined the plot before the goods were finally removed from the warehouse. Assuming this case was correctly decided under the former law of larceny, it is arguable that if these facts were to recur E1 and E2 would be handlers and not thieves. The theft (the appropriation) may have been complete before E1 and E2 became aware of it.

¹⁰⁶ [1985] QB 801, [1985] Crim LR 311 and commentary.

¹⁰⁷ (1987) The Times, 11 July. Cash was also distinguished in Bruce [1988] VR 579. Failure to add alternative theft counts can be fatal to the indictment: Suter [1997] CLY 1339 (Judge Bull, Guildford CC).

¹⁰⁸ [2004] EWCA Crim 79.

¹⁰⁹ Para 1. On inferences from possession, see M v DPP [2009] EWHC 525 (Admin) (inference) from M's claim to have bought a mobile phone from X very cheaply without packaging or charger, but with a SIM card. On the difficulty of proving continuity of the evidence—ie that the goods allegedly stolen are those allegedly handled, etc, see Lamb v DPP [2009] EWHC 238 (Admin).

¹¹⁰ See M Hirst, 'Guilty but of What' (2000) 4 E & P 31.

26.1.1.7 For the benefit of another person

Each of the nouns 'retention', 'removal', 'disposal' and 'realization' is governed by the words 'by or for the benefit of another person'.¹¹¹ It must therefore be proved that:

- (1) D undertook or arranged the retention, removal, disposal or realization for the benefit of another person; or
- (2) D assisted or arranged the retention, removal, disposal or realization by another person.¹¹²

Every thief either retains, removes, disposes of or realizes the stolen goods, so this requirement of conduct being 'for the benefit of another' prevents all thieves from also being handlers. The italicized words are an essential part of the offence and the indictment must allege that the handling was 'by or for the benefit of another person'.¹¹³ The thief may himself be guilty of handling (by undertaking) if he himself retains, removes, etc the goods for the benefit of another person. It would seem to be immaterial that the other person is guilty of no offence and even unaware of what is going on.

However, an important limitation was imposed in Bloxham.¹¹⁴ It was held that when deciding whether the handling was by or for the benefit of another person, a purchaser of stolen goods is not 'another person' within the section. So, where D sells stolen goods to E, D's act is not for the benefit of the buyer, E; it is for D's own benefit. Sellers usually sell for their own benefit, not the benefit of the purchaser; that much is uncontroversial. However, in the opinion of Lord Bridge even if the sale could be described as for the purchaser's benefit, it would not be within the ambit of the section. This gives a special, though obscure, meaning to the term 'another person'. Griev lucidly summarizes the interpretation—something will be for the benefit of another when it is 'an act done on behalf of another person; it is an act that the other might do himself'.¹¹⁵

In Bloxham, D, acting in good faith, purchased a stolen car for £1,300. Eleven months later, suspecting the truth, he sold it for £200 to a person unknown who was prepared to buy it without official documents. D was charged with handling by undertaking or assisting in the realization of the car for the benefit of the buyer. A submission of no case to answer was rejected, whereupon he pleaded guilty. His conviction was upheld by the Court of Appeal who thought that the buyer's use of the car, for which he had paid less than its true value, was a benefit to him. Maybe it was; but it seems a travesty to say that the sale was for his benefit. The House of Lords quashed the conviction, holding that the buyer was not 'another person'. In fact, of course, he was 'another person'; but the sale was certainly not effected 'on his behalf'.

Bloxham was distinguished in *Tokeley-Parry*¹¹⁶ where D was charged with undertaking or assisting in removal by E, whom he had procured to smuggle stolen antiquities from Egypt. An argument that D and E were one person was firmly rejected. E was 'another person' in fact and in law. Further, *Roberts*¹¹⁷ decides that if A and B are jointly charged in one count with an act of handling 'by or for the benefit of another', the other must be some ¹¹¹ Sloggett [1971] 3 All ER 264 at 267.

¹¹² cf L Blake, 'The Innocent Purchaser and Section 22 of the Theft Act' [1972] Crim LR 494, arguing that there is no need that the third party benefits if he retains, removes, realizes or disposes.

¹¹³ Sloggett [1972] 1 QB 430, [1971] 3 All ER 264.

¹¹⁴ See n 55.

¹¹⁵ Paras 15–22. See also Spencer's suggestion 'the requirement that the act be "for the benefit of another" serves no intelligible purpose unless it limits the offence to those who act on another's behalf': 'The Mishandling of Handling' [1981] Crim LR 682 at 685, commenting on the Court of Appeal decision in Bloxham.

¹¹⁶ [1999] Crim LR 578. It is questionable how this was for the benefit of anyone other than D.

¹¹⁷ No 93/0075/Z2, 9 July 1993, unreported, see [1996] Crim LR 495 and see Gingell [2000] 1 Cr App R 88.

person other than A or B. This seems logical if, indeed, only one act, jointly done by A and B, is alleged.¹¹⁸ A might, however, arrange the disposition of the goods by B; and B might undertake the disposition for the benefit of A. In that case, both have committed an offence under s 22 and there is no need to show that any third person was involved.

Conspiracy to handle

Notwithstanding Roberts, an agreement by A and B that B would, for example, dispose of the goods for the benefit of A is a conspiracy to handle. A and B have agreed that B will commit the offence of handling, and that is enough. If B does dispose of the goods as agreed, he commits the offence under s 22; and obviously A has counselled or procured him to do so. They are both guilty of the same offence. There seems to be every reason, pace the court in Roberts, why A and B should be jointly charged with committing it.¹¹⁹

26.1.1.8 Innocent receipt and subsequent retention with mens rea

If D receives the stolen goods innocently (ie either believing them not to be stolen or knowing them to be stolen but intending to return them to the true owner), he commits no offence.¹²⁰ Suppose he subsequently discovers the goods to be stolen or decides not to return them to the true owner or disposes of them. He has dishonestly undertaken the retention of, or has disposed of, stolen goods knowing them to be stolen. Whether he is guilty of an offence depends on a number of factors.

- (1) Where D does not get ownership of the goods (the normal situation where goods are the product of theft):
 - (a) D gives value for the goods.
 - (i) D retains or disposes of the goods for his own benefit. This is not theft because of s 3(2);¹²¹ nor is it handling by undertaking, assisting or arranging since it is not for the benefit of another.¹²² D might be guilty of handling by aiding and abetting the receiving by the person to whom he disposes of the goods, if that person has mens rea.
 - (ii) D retains or disposes of the goods for the benefit of another. This is not theft (s 3(2)) but is handling.
 - (b) D does not give value.
 - (i) D retains or disposes of the goods for his own benefit. This is theft but not handling unless it amounts to aiding and abetting receipt by another.
 - (ii) D retains or disposes of the goods for the benefit of another. This is theft and handling.

- (2) Where D gets ownership of the goods:

- (a) D gives value for the goods.

Retention or disposal of the goods cannot be theft since V has no property in the goods. It is not handling since V has lost his right to restitution,¹²³ his right to rescind being destroyed on the goods coming into the hands of D who was a bona fide purchaser for value.

- (b) D does not give value.

¹¹⁸ Why this should only apply if they are jointly charged is less logical, see R Harrison, 'Handling Stolen Goods for the Benefit of Another' (2000) 64 J Crim L 156.

¹¹⁹ See Slater and Suddens [1996] Crim LR 300.

¹²⁰ Alt [1972] Crim LR 552, CA.

¹²¹ See p 842.

¹²² Bloxham [1983] 1 AC 109, HL.

¹²³ See p 1037.

Again this cannot be theft, since V has no property in the goods, but it may be handling since V's right to rescind and secure restitution of his property is not extinguished by the goods coming into the hands of one who does not give value. It will be handling if this is so and D either aids and abets a guilty receipt by another or disposes of the goods for the benefit of another.

26.1.1.9 Handling by the thief

Any thief may be convicted of handling goods stolen by him by receiving them—if the evidence warrants this conclusion.¹²⁴ In the majority of cases the thief can only be guilty of handling by receiving where he is assisting or encouraging the receipt by another because he is already in possession or control and therefore cannot receive as the principal offender. In some circumstances, however, a thief might be convicted of handling the stolen goods by receiving them as the principal offender. For example, D steals goods and, in the course of the theft, delivers them to E. Two days later E returns the goods to D.

26.1.2 Mens rea of handling

D's mens rea as described later must coincide in time with the conduct constituting the actus reus. In the case of receiving, this is when D first receives the goods or makes the arrangement to receive.¹²⁵ In the case of other forms of handling, which may be continuing in nature, it is sufficient that the mens rea exists at some point in that continuum, for example where D has taken possession innocently but has subsequently become aware of the provenance of the goods and then acts for the benefit of another.¹²⁶

26.1.2.1 Knowledge or belief

It must be proved that the goods were stolen and that D handled them 'knowing or believing them to be stolen goods'.¹²⁷ It is vital that the belief or knowledge is D's, not merely that of the reasonable person, since this is a subjective mens rea requirement.¹²⁸

The CLRC apparently intended to include the concept of 'wilful blindness', which is often held by the courts to be included in the word 'knowing':¹²⁹

It is a serious defect of the [pre-1968] law that actual knowledge that the property was stolen must be proved. Often the prosecution cannot prove this. In many cases indeed guilty knowledge does not exist, although the circumstances of the transaction are such that the receiver ought to be guilty of an offence. The man who buys goods at a ridiculously low price from an unknown seller whom he meets in a public house may not know that the goods were stolen, and he may take the precaution of asking no questions. Yet it may be clear on the evidence that he believes that the goods were stolen. In such cases the prosecution may fail (rightly, as the law now stands) for want of proof of guilty knowledge.¹³⁰

¹²⁴ Dolan (1975) 62 Cr App R 36, CA; Stapylton v O'Callaghan [1973] 2 All ER 782, DC. See ATH Smith [1977] Crim LR 517.

¹²⁵ Alt (1972) 56 Cr App R 45.

¹²⁶ See V Tunkel (1983) 133 NLJ 844.

¹²⁷ See in particular E Griew, 'Consistency, Communication and Codification—Reflections on Two Mens Rea Words' in Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law, 57; S Shute, 'Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory, 171; GR Sullivan, 'Knowledge, Belief and Culpability', ibid., 207; AR White, Misleading Cases (1991) 133; Tadros, Criminal Responsibility, Ch 9 and The Ends of Harm (2011), 144.

¹²⁸ Bellenie [1980] Crim LR 43; Brook [1993] Crim LR 455.

¹²⁹ See p 115.

¹³⁰ Eighth Report, 64. Cf Woods [1969] 1 QB 447, CA. See also G Williams, 'Handling, Theft and the Purchaser Who Takes a Chance' [1985] Crim LR 432.

If this was the Committee's intention, it has not been achieved. Liability based on wilful blindness involves D having a strong suspicion that something is so (in this case goods are stolen) and consciously decides not to take steps that he could take to confirm or deny that fact. But the courts have repeatedly said that, for the purposes of s 22, suspicion, however strong, is not to be equated with belief that the goods are stolen.¹³¹ It is a misdirection to tell the jury that it is enough that D, 'suspecting that the goods were stolen deliberately shut his eyes to the consequences'.¹³²

Proof of either knowledge or belief will suffice. What, if anything, does 'believing' add to 'knowing'? According to Hall.¹³³

A man may be said to know that goods are stolen when he is told by someone with first-hand knowledge (someone such as the thief or the burglar) that such is the case. Belief, of course, is something short of knowledge. It may be said to be the state of mind of a person who says to himself: 'I cannot say I know for certain that these goods are stolen but there can be no other reasonable conclusion in the light of all the circumstances, in the light of all that I have heard and seen.'

This seems to be merely a distinction between two sources of D's state of mind. But s 22 suggests a distinction between two states of mind that might be held, not two modes of arriving at the same state of mind. The case suggests that if D had direct evidence, he knows; if he has mere circumstantial evidence, he believes; but it would surely be more accurate to describe knowledge in terms of the accuracy of the belief, not the directness of the evidence leading to the belief. As Shute has suggested, the distinctions between the concepts are twofold: knowledge constitutes a true belief, and belief includes acceptance of the proposition in question whereas knowledge does not.¹³⁴ In Forsyth,¹³⁵ the court said that the judgment in Hall is 'potentially confusing'.¹³⁶ In Moys,¹³⁷ the court suggested simply that the question whether D knew or believed that the goods were stolen is a subjective one and that suspicion, even coupled with the fact that D shut his eyes to the circumstances, is not enough.

In practical terms, D may be left in varying degrees of certainty as to the provenance of the goods whether or not he has been told by the thief or deduced the fact from his own observation. What matters is that D is caused to be certain that the goods are stolen; there is no significance for these purposes in the source of information. Although what seems to be implied in Hall is that the person with direct information is certain and the person with circumstantial evidence is nearly certain, it would be dangerous in such terms to direct a jury because 'near certainty' is strong suspicion and that is not enough. It is unclear whether it is sufficient that D considers the likelihood that the goods are stolen to be 'virtually certain'; presumably not. It is clearly not enough for D to believe that the goods are 'probably' stolen.¹³⁸

¹³¹ Forsyth [1997] Crim LR 581, CA; Grainge [1974] 1 All ER 928, CA; Saik [2006] UKHL 18. Cf Woods [1969] 1 QB 447, CCA; Ismail [1977] Crim LR 557 and commentary. Cf Griew, Theft, paras 15.30–15.33; Spencer [1985] Crim LR 101. See S Shute, 'Knowledge and Belief in the Criminal Law' in Shute and Simester, Criminal Law Theory.

¹³² Griffiths (1974) 60 Cr App R 14, CA. Atwal v Massey [1971] 3 All ER 881, DC, is definitely misleading on this point and seems to have misled the judge in Pethick [1980] Crim LR 242, where it was said that suspicion, 'however strong', does not amount to knowledge.

¹³³ (1985) 81 Cr App R 260 at 264, [1985] Crim LR 377. ¹³⁴ At n 131.

¹³⁵ See n 131. A Hall direction is not necessary in every case—Toor (1987) 85 Cr App R 116.

¹³⁶ It is the second part of Hall that presents a problem: Adinga [2003] EWCA Crim 3201.

¹³⁷ (1984) 79 Cr App R 72, CA.

¹³⁸ Reader (1977) 66 Cr App R 33 at 36, CA. For consideration of whether this ought to be a sufficient mens rea, see J Spencer, 'Handling, Theft and the Mala Fide Purchaser' [1985] Crim LR 92 at 95–96; Williams [1985] Crim LR 432 at 435; J Spencer, 'Handling and Taking Risks: A Reply to Professor Williams' [1985] Crim LR 440.

In general, it seems that a judge cannot go wrong by simply directing the jury in accordance with the words of the section and offering no elaboration or explanation of 'believing'.¹³⁹ Of course, it may be that the jury will then apply the word as if it included wilful blindness, but no one will ever know. This is another example of the appellate refusal to interpret elements of crimes definitively, which is unsatisfactory but which remains uncorrected because the cloak of jury secrecy avoids the true shortcomings of the interpretation being exposed.

Some have called for a further extension of the offence to include reckless handling.¹⁴⁰ There are, of course, competing policy arguments: on the one hand, there is the need to avoid stifling trade of honest dealers and, on the other, the recognition that in most cases dishonest defendants could escape liability by not confirming mere suspicions.¹⁴¹ If there were a high incidence of low-value handling by individuals (dealing through eBay and car boot sales, etc) such arguments might have greater force. The argument would become greater still if different offences distinguished professional fences from individuals trading in low-value items.

Knowledge or belief of what?

It is sufficient that D knows or believes that the goods, whatever they are, are stolen. His knowledge or belief need not extend to the identity of the thief, or the owner,¹⁴² or the nature of the stolen goods.¹⁴³ If D knows he is in possession of a box containing stolen goods, it is no defence that he does not know what the contents are and is shocked to discover that the box contains guns; nor would it be a defence that he believed the box contained stolen watches. Equally, it is enough for D to know or believe that the goods are stolen in the extended meaning that term has under s 24. So, it does not matter that D believed the goods to be the product of blackmail when they were in fact the product of a theft. In line with general principle, it is not necessary for D to know the criminal law: it is sufficient that D has knowledge or belief as to the facts and circumstances that render it criminal.

26.1.2.2 Dishonesty

'Dishonestly'¹⁴⁴ shares the same meaning as elsewhere in the Theft Acts. D may receive goods knowing or believing them to be stolen and yet not be guilty if, for example, he intends to return them to the true owner or turn them in to the police.¹⁴⁵ Section 2 of the Act does not apply, so D's claim of a belief in right is not necessarily going to negate dishonesty. The question will be a matter for the jury and they are unlikely to regard such conduct as honest where D knows or believes the goods to be stolen, except where they believe D's claim that he intends to return the goods to the owner.

26.1.2.3 Proof of mens rea

The general principles of evidence in criminal cases apply to the proof of offences of theft and handling as they apply to other crimes. This is not the place to examine those rules in full.

¹³⁹ Reader (1977) 66 Cr App R 33; Harris (1986) 84 Cr App R 75; Toor (1986) 85 Cr App R 116, [1987] Crim LR 122, CA.

¹⁴⁰ See J Spencer [1985] Crim LR 92.

¹⁴¹ Some argue that there would be a significant setback to economic efficiency if there was an obligation to investigate whether suspicious-looking goods were stolen. See Tadros, The Ends of Harm, 144.

¹⁴² Fuschillo [1940] 2 All ER 489; but it may be necessary to name the owner where the property is of a common and indistinctive type: Gregory [1972] 2 All ER 861. See Webster [2002] EWCA Crim 1346.

¹⁴³ McCullum (1973) 57 Cr App R 645.

¹⁴⁴ cf Ivey v Genting Casinos UK Ltd (t/a Crockfords Club) [2017] UKSC 67; p 875.

¹⁴⁵ cf Matthews [1950] 1 All ER 137, CCA.

The 'doctrine' of recent possession

Where D is found in possession of, or dealing with, property which has recently been stolen, a jury may properly infer that he is guilty of an offence if he offers no explanation or if they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that any explanation he has offered is untrue. They are not bound so to infer and must not do so unless they are sure that D was in fact guilty of the particular offence. The onus of proof remains on the Crown throughout. Whether D offers an explanation or not, the jury must not convict unless they are sure that he committed the offence in question.¹⁴⁶

These principles are frequently misleadingly referred to as 'the doctrine of recent possession'. The 'doctrine' is nothing more than the application of the ordinary principles of circumstantial evidence to this commonly recurring situation.

The difficulty which arises is that a jury may be quite certain that D was either the thief or a receiver but not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that he was one rather than the other. A solution which has been adopted in some jurisdictions, following Langmead,¹⁴⁷ is to direct the jury that if they are satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that D was either the thief or a receiver, they may convict of the offence which they think more probable—that is, it is enough that they are satisfied on a balance of probabilities that D was the thief, or that he was the receiver. As the jury is unlikely to find that the evidence is exactly evenly balanced, this is a practical solution, and one that should be Art 6(2) compliant.¹⁴⁸ It was, however, rejected by the Privy Council in A-G of Hong Kong v Yip Kai-foon.¹⁴⁹ D was charged with robbery and with handling the goods that were stolen. The Privy Council held that the jury had been rightly directed to consider the robbery charge first. Once they had decided that they were not sure that D was guilty of robbery, he was to be presumed to be innocent of the theft of the goods and it followed that any handling that occurred took place 'otherwise than in the course of the stealing' so there was no need for more than a passing reference to those words. This is a novel use of the presumption of innocence against a defendant. Because the jury are not satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that D was guilty of theft it is apparently to be conclusively presumed that he was not guilty of that offence. If the jury are satisfied that he was guilty of one offence or the other, it follows inevitably that he was guilty of handling. But this is arbitrary. The outcome depends on which offence the jury consider first, and it becomes critical for the jury to be directed carefully as to the order in which they approach the verdicts.¹⁵⁰ A more fundamental objection is that the approach treats the acquittal as proof of guilt and may offend Art 6(2) of the ECHR.¹⁵¹

Because of the difficulty of proving guilty knowledge, the Theft Act provides for the admission of certain evidence on a receiving charge that would not (at least at the time of enactment) be admissible in criminal cases generally. By s 27(3):

Where a person is being proceeded against for handling stolen goods (but not for any offence other than handling stolen goods),^[152] then at any stage of the proceedings, if evidence has been given of his having or arranging to have in his possession the goods the subject of the charge, or of his undertaking or assisting in, or arranging to undertake or assist in, their retention, removal, ¹⁴⁶ Abramovitch (1914) 11 Cr App R 45; Aves (1950) 34 Cr App R 159; Hepworth [1955] 2 QB 600.

¹⁴⁷ (1864) Le & Ca 427.

¹⁴⁸ If the approach was applied more widely it would pose problems particularly where more than two alternatives are left, leading to possible conviction of an offence of which the jury are not even sure D is probably guilty. See further M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of Criminal Law (2003).

¹⁴⁹ [1988] AC 642, followed in Foreman [1991] Crim LR 702; but see commentary at 704.

¹⁵⁰ Fernandez [1997] 1 Cr App R 123. ¹⁵¹ See Hirst (2000) 4 E & P 31.

¹⁵² cf Anderson [1978] Crim LR 223 (Judge Stroyan).

disposal or realisation, the following evidence shall be admissible for the purpose of proving that he knew or believed the goods to be stolen goods:

- (a) evidence that he has had in his possession, or has undertaken or assisted in the retention, removal, disposal or realisation of, stolen goods from any theft taking place not earlier than twelve months before the offence charged;¹⁵³ and
- (b) (provided that seven days' notice in writing has been given to him of the intention to prove the conviction) evidence that he has within the five years preceding the date of the offence charged been convicted of theft or of handling stolen goods.¹⁵⁴

The Law Commission called for the abolition of the provisions.¹⁵⁵ The provisions are now merely supplementary to the wide reaching statutory rules permitting admissibility of previous misconduct¹⁵⁶ under s 101 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.¹⁵⁷

26.2 Dishonestly retaining a wrongful credit

Section 24A of the Theft Act 1968 (inserted by s 2 of the Theft (Amendment) Act 1996) provides:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if—
 - (a) a wrongful credit has been made to an account kept by him or in respect of which he has any right or interest,
 - (b) he knows or believes that the credit is wrongful; and
 - (c) he dishonestly fails to take such steps as are reasonable in the circumstances to secure that the credit is cancelled.
- (2) References to a credit are to a credit of an amount of money.¹⁵⁸

The offence is punishable on indictment with imprisonment for ten years.

The effect is that D1, a thief or fraudster, who has credited to his account¹⁵⁹ a wrongful credit commits an offence if he does not take steps within a reasonable time to divest himself of his ill-gotten gains. The provision is not, of course, aimed at him but at D2, where D1 has procured the crediting, not of his own, but of D2's account. If this was done with D2's connivance, D2 would be guilty as a secondary party to D1's original offence which generated the proceeds which were credited to D1's account. There would be no need to invoke s 24A.

¹⁵³ There is no requirement for D to have been convicted on this earlier occasion. As to what detail may be admitted, see Bradley (1979) 70 Cr App R 200, [1980] Crim LR 173, CA, and commentary.

¹⁵⁴ These provisions have attracted both judicial and academic criticism: see Hacker [1995] 1 Cr App R 332, HL, overruling Fowler (1987) 86 Cr App R 219, [1987] Crim LR 769, CA; R Munday, 'Handling the Evidential Exception' [1988] Crim LR 345. See Ormerod and Williams, Smith's Law of Theft, paras 13.102–13.120 for more detailed treatment.

¹⁵⁵ See LC 273, Evidence of Bad Character in Criminal Proceedings (2001) Cm 5257, paras 4.13–4.23, 11.53–11.55. On such prejudice generally, see S Lloyd-Bostock, 'The Effects on Juries of Hearing About the Defendant's Previous Criminal Record: A Simulation Study' [2000] Crim LR 734.

¹⁵⁶ See ss 98–112 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003.

¹⁵⁷ Or in some odd cases at common law if s 98(a) applies. C Tapper, Cross and Tapper on Evidence (12th edn, 2010) Ch VIII; Blackstone's Criminal Practice, F12.39.

¹⁵⁸ As amended by the Fraud Act 2006, Sch 1, para 7.

¹⁵⁹ By Sch 1, para 7 to the Fraud Act 2006: '(9) "Account" means an account kept with—(a) a bank; (b) a person carrying on a business which falls within subsection (10) below; or (c) an issuer of electronic money (as defined for the purposes of Part 2 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000).'

Suppose, however, that the credit was made without D2's connivance. One day D2 finds that an unexpected credit has been made to his account by D1. As soon as he knows or believes that the credit has been made in such circumstances as to amount to an offence, he comes under a duty to divest himself of this unforeseen windfall. If he fails to do so within a reasonable time he commits the offence. It is an offence of omission,¹⁶⁰ rather like theft where s 5(4) applies. Whereas, however, s 5(4) requires D to intend to 'make restoration' of the property, s 24A(1)(c) merely requires him to cancel the credit. Does he do this merely by withdrawing the money to spend on riotous living? It seems not. In Lee,¹⁶¹ L relied on a passage in previous editions of this work to the effect that if D withdraws the money to spend for his own benefit, he cancels the credit and might escape liability under s 24A—'if the draftsmen meant "make restoration" he should have said so—but, by section 24A(8), the money withdrawn is stolen goods so he will be guilty of receiving stolen goods'. The Court of Appeal rejected this submission noting that if it were correct it would lead to a 'surprising conclusion, since it is clear from the terms of the section itself that the offence consists in retaining the credit rather than taking reasonable steps to cancel it'. The conclusion was that 'the word "cancelled" as used in section 24A(1)(c) means cancelling the original credit so as to achieve the same effect as if it had not been made in the first place. In many cases that will be achieved by a corresponding debit reversing the original entry in the account'.¹⁶²

The section extends to other conduct which was not an offence even before the decision of the House of Lords in Preddy. Section 24A(2A)¹⁶³ provides:

- (2A) A credit to an account is wrongful to the extent that it derives from
- (a) theft;
 - (b) blackmail;
 - (c) fraud (contrary to section 1 of the Fraud Act 2006); or
 - (d) stolen goods.

So D2 may be guilty of the offence if:

- (1) D1 steals money and pays it into D2's account;
- (2) D1 obtains money by blackmail and pays that money into D2's account;
- (3) D1 obtains money by fraud and pays that into D2's account;
- (4) D1 receives stolen money and pays it into D2's account.

In each of these cases the credit in D2's account is a new item of property—a thing in action belonging to D2—which has never been 'in the hands' of a thief or handler and so is not 'stolen goods' within s 24(2). D2 is not guilty of handling by retaining it. Now, however, he commits an offence under s 24A(1) if he dishonestly fails to cancel 'the wrongful credit' within a reasonable time. Cancelling, according to Lee, means cancelling it as if it had never been made and not simply withdrawing that amount. In any event, s 24A(8) provides that any money which is withdrawn from a wrongful credit will be stolen goods and subject to the general law of handling so D2 may commit an offence under s 22. An incidental effect is that the thief, blackmailer or handler who pays the proceeds of his offence into his own account commits another offence when he fails to take reasonable steps to cancel the credit. This is so because the Law Commission thought: 'It would be difficult, if not impossible, to devise a simple way of excluding the case where A ¹⁶⁰ The argument of the Law Commission that this is necessary is found in LC 243, Offences of Dishonesty: Money Transfers (1996) 39.

¹⁶¹ [2006] EWCA Crim 156.

¹⁶² At [22].

¹⁶³ As inserted by the Fraud Act 2006.

dishonestly secures a credit to his own account, while including the case where A dishonestly secures a credit to B's.¹⁶⁴

Section 24A(5) provides that it is immaterial whether an account is overdrawn before or after a credit is made. So if D2's account is overdrawn to the tune of £100 when a wrongful credit of £50 arrives, he is under a duty, somehow, to get his overdraft restored to its former level. There is no provision corresponding to s 24(3).¹⁶⁵ Nor is there any exemption for the bona fide purchaser such as is to be found in s 3(2).¹⁶⁶ Suppose that D sells his car in good faith to A who pays him with stolen money. After learning that the money was stolen, D spends it. He did not commit any offence before the enactment of s 24A. He still commits no offence if A paid him in cash and he spends the cash. But if D paid the cash into his own bank account, or if he was paid by a cheque which he has paid into that account, he has received a wrongful credit and it appears that he will (subject to proof of dishonesty) commit an offence under s 24A when he spends the money, because he has failed to take reasonable steps to disgorge.

That would create not only an unsatisfactory anomaly but also a conflict with the civil law.¹⁶⁷ The money, whether in cash or in the bank, is surely his to dispose of as he chooses. How then can he be guilty of a crime by doing so? It may be that a court will think it necessary to read into s 24A(1)(c) some such qualification as 'except where no person has any right to restitution of the credit', on the ground that Parliament could not have intended to change, or create a conflict with, such a fundamental rule of the civil law. This would introduce a limitation to the same effect as that relating to stolen goods generally in s 24(4).

26.3 Advertising for the return of stolen goods

The existence of this offence might come as a surprise given the number of such advertisements that are commonly seen.¹⁶⁸ By s 23 of the Theft Act 1968 it is an offence publicly to advertise for the return of stolen goods indicating that no questions will be asked about how the person returning the goods came by them. An offence of this type has existed since 1828¹⁶⁹ and it was retained, after some hesitation, in the Theft Act because it was thought that advertisements of this kind might encourage dishonesty.¹⁷⁰ Though such advertisements may encourage dishonesty in other people, dishonesty is not required of the perpetrator. It operates harshly in preventing the advertiser offering to pay the (innocent) bona fide purchaser of the advertiser's stolen goods.

Indeed, the offence has been held to be one of strict liability so that the advertising manager of a newspaper in which such an advertisement appeared committed the offence, though he was unaware that it had appeared in the paper.¹⁷¹ In the light of the House of Lords' reiteration of the presumption of mens rea a court may be persuaded that strict liability is inappropriate.¹⁷² However, when analysing the offence, Goff LJ in Denham

¹⁶⁴ LC 243, paras 6.16–6.17. The Commission comforted itself with the consideration that there was already an enormous degree of overlap in the existing offences under the Theft Acts.

¹⁶⁵ Stolen goods cease to be 'stolen' when they are restored to lawful custody or when the owner and any others claiming through him have ceased to have any right to restitution of the goods, p 1036.

¹⁶⁶ See p 842.

¹⁶⁷ A transferee of stolen currency for value and without notice gets a good title: Miller v Race (1758) 1 Burr 452.

¹⁶⁸ See JC Smith, 'Rewards for the Return of Lost or Stolen Property' in N Palmer (ed), The Recovery of Stolen Art (1998).

¹⁶⁹ See Hall (1985) 81 Cr App R 260, [1985] Crim LR 377 on its history. See also Smith, Property Offences, Ch 31B.

¹⁷⁰ Eighth Report, para 144.

¹⁷¹ Withers [1975] Crim LR 647; Denham v Scott (1983) 77 Cr App R 210, DC.

¹⁷² See DPP v B [2000] 2 AC 428; R v K [2002] 1 AC 462. See p 151.

regarded the section as creating a ‘quasi criminal’ offence, and that is a factor pointing towards strict liability.

26.4 Money laundering

In a series of complex and draconian statutes over the last two decades successive governments have sought to combat serious crime by targeting not just the offenders (who may commit a money laundering offence in relation to their own criminal conduct), but all those who assist in the disposal of criminal proceeds.¹⁷³ Accordingly, Parliament has enacted a raft of measures providing for confiscation, asset recovery, civil recovery, restraint proceedings and prevention orders. In some respects, the offences of money laundering share a similar rationale to handling: to target the individuals who render criminal activity profitable rather than those committing the substantive crime itself.¹⁷⁴

However, the money laundering offences are concerned not just with stolen goods but with criminal proceeds more generally. The legislation has been driven by international treaty obligations, and these are relied upon by the courts as an aid to interpretation.¹⁷⁵

The offences under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (CJA 1988) and the Drug Trafficking Act 1994 (DTA 1994) provided a series of offences which criminalized entering into or being concerned in an arrangement involving the retention, acquisition, use, possession, etc of criminal proceeds (CJA 1988) or the proceeds of drug crime (DTA 1994).¹⁷⁶ This strict division between laundering ‘drug’ money and ‘other criminal proceeds’ (eg those from theft or any crimes other than drugs) created significant practical problems. Even greater complexity arose in prosecutions for conspiracies of these offences.¹⁷⁷

The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (POCA) remedies some of these problems but creates its own problems with offences of a no less draconian nature. These often contain mens rea of mere suspicion or even objective tests of fault. The legislation is extremely technical and cannot be dealt with in detail in this work. That is not to deny its importance in practice. The Act also creates important offences for those in the ‘regulated-sector’¹⁷⁸ to fail to disclose suspected money laundering and an offence of ‘tipping off’ another person that suspected money laundering has been reported. These offences are not dealt with in this work. This chapter offers only an overview of the three principal money laundering offences to serve as a contrast to the offence of handling.¹⁷⁹

¹⁷³ See generally HHJ M Sutherland Williams, HHJ M Hopmeier and R Jones, Millington and Sutherland Williams on The Proceeds of Crime (2018); P Dyer and M Hopmeier, ‘Confiscation: An Update: Part 1—Benefit, Realisable Amount and Proportionality’ [2017] 5 Arch Rev 5; P Dyer and M Hopmeier, ‘Confiscation: An Update: Part 2—Procedure & Practicalities’ [2017] 7 Arch Rev 6; A Mitchell, S Taylor and K Talbot, On Confiscation and the Proceeds of Crime (3rd edn, 2014, looseleaf) Ch 9; Blackstone’s Criminal Practice, B.22; for an accessible account see also R Fortson, ‘Money Laundering Offences Under POCA 2002’ in W Blair and W Brent (eds), Banks and Financial Crime: The International Law of Tainted Money (2nd edn, 2017) and for a more theoretical account see P Alldridge, Money Laundering Law (2003) Ch 9.

¹⁷⁴ On whether these should be seen as true crimes, see D Husak, Overcriminalization (2008) 104–107.

¹⁷⁵ See Montila [2004] UKHL 50, [2005] Crim LR 479. Note also the EU influence: Council Framework Decision 2001/500/JHA of 26 June 2001 on which see D Atkinson (ed), EU Law in Criminal Practice (2012) para 6.29; V Mitsilegas, EU Criminal Law (2009) 66–67.

¹⁷⁶ For an excellent review of some of the problems under the old law, see J Fisher and J Bewsey, ‘Laundering the Proceeds of Fiscal Crime’ [2000] JIBL 11.

¹⁷⁷ See El Kurd [2001] Crim LR 234; Hussain [2002] Crim LR 407.

¹⁷⁸ Catalogued in Sch 9 to the Act (as amended).

¹⁷⁹ The offences are supplemented by the important provisions in the Money Laundering, Terrorist Financing and Transfer of Funds (Information on the Payer) Regulations 2017, SI 2017/692. The Office for Professional Body Anti-Money Laundering Supervision (OPBAS) will help improve the overall standards of supervision and ensure supervisors and law enforcement work together more effectively.

26.4.1 The Proceeds of Crime Act 2002

Part 7 of the Act introduces three sections—ss 327, 328, 329—replacing the separate categories of offence relating to drug and non-drug crime.¹⁸⁰ These are the ‘money laundering’ offences. Technically, by s 340(11), ‘money laundering’ is much wider and includes not only: (a) the substantive offences under ss 327, 328 and 329; but also (b) inchoate forms of those offences; (c) secondary participation in those offences; and (d) any act which would constitute (a), (b) or (c) if it were done in the UK.

26.4.1.1 Criminal property

Sections 327 to 329 of POCA criminalize D’s dealings (concealing, disguising, converting, transferring, acquiring, using, possessing, etc) with ‘criminal property’. Section 340 defines what constitutes criminal property and is therefore central to their operation. It is a complex provision.¹⁸¹

Take a case where D runs a bureau de change and takes receipt of bags full of used £20 notes which he converts into Swiss francs. Leaving aside for the moment the requirements of the money laundering activity (probably ‘converting’ under s 327 in this case) and what that entails, it is worth beginning by looking at what the Crown must prove in order to show that the property (the bags of cash) was criminal property under s 340.

It is first essential for the prosecution to establish that the property that D is alleged to have laundered (by converting, etc) is the product of ‘criminal conduct’. This criminal conduct is often called the ‘predicate offence’ to distinguish it from the money laundering offence (in our example D converting criminal property) which is being alleged. Criminal conduct includes the launderer’s own criminal conduct.¹⁸² It also includes conduct abroad that is not an offence under the laws of the State where the conduct occurred, but which would be such an offence if committed somewhere in the UK. Perhaps the used £20 notes are the product of drug trafficking, prostitution, tax fraud,¹⁸³ burglary, etc. Secondly, the property must be ‘criminal property’. That concept comprises not just money which is the product of criminality, but a much wider range of property,¹⁸⁴ and by s 340(3) property is ‘criminal’ if:

- (a) it constitutes a person’s benefit^[185] from criminal conduct or it represents such a benefit (in whole or part and whether directly or indirectly), and
- (b) the alleged offender knows or suspects that it constitutes or represents such a benefit.

¹⁸⁰ See on the history Bowman v Fels [2005] 1 WLR 3083. See also E Rees, R Fisher and R Thomas, Blackstone’s Guide to the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 (5th edn, 2015); R Fortson, Misuse of Drugs: Offences Confiscation and Money Laundering (6th edn, 2012); Mitchell, Taylor and Talbot on Confiscation and Proceeds of Crime (2014) Ch VIII; C Montgomery and D Ormerod (eds), Fraud: Criminal Law and Practice (2008) Ch D9.

¹⁸¹ See eg the detailed yet controversial analysis in Ogden [2016] EWCA Crim 6 where the Court of Appeal held that deals of ‘illegal drugs’ amounted to money laundering offences because they involve criminal property being transferred.

¹⁸² Greaves [2010] EWCA Crim 709.

¹⁸³ cf P Alldridge and A Mumford, ‘Tax Evasion and the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002’ (2005) 25 LS 353.

¹⁸⁴ By s 340(9), ‘property is all property wherever situated and includes—(a) money; (b) all forms of property, real or personal, heritable or moveable; (c) things in action and other intangible or incorporeal property’. See Ogden [2016] EWCA Crim 6, n 181.

¹⁸⁵ A person ‘benefits’ from conduct if he obtains property as a result of or in connection with the conduct. By s 340(8), ‘if a person benefits from conduct his benefit is the property obtained as a result of or in connection with the conduct’. By s 340(6) ‘If a person obtains a pecuniary advantage as a result of or in connection with conduct, he is to be taken to obtain as a result of or in connection with the conduct a sum of money equal to the value of the pecuniary advantage.’ And s 340(7): ‘References to property or a pecuniary advantage obtained in connection with conduct include references to property or a pecuniary advantage obtained in both that connection and some other.’

Notice that the property only becomes criminal property if D knows or suspects it to be criminally tainted. It is not enough to show merely that the property constitutes someone's benefit from crime, for example that the £20 notes were from drug trafficking. There is an element of mens rea to be proved. In our example, D running the bureau de change must know or suspect that the £20 notes derive from criminal conduct. Equally, it seems now to be accepted that it is not enough that D suspects that the property he is dealing with is the proceeds (benefit) from criminal conduct¹⁸⁶ if it is not in fact (perhaps D suspects that a bag of used £20 notes is criminal, but in fact the person wanting to exchange them is just an eccentric who does not trust banks);¹⁸⁷ there must be criminal property in fact.¹⁸⁸ In Shah v HSBC,¹⁸⁹ the High Court held that 'If the property in question is not in fact "criminal property" then no offence is committed.'

The reach of the money laundering offences is greater still because criminal property is extended by s 340(4): it does not matter who carried out the 'criminal conduct', who benefited or even whether the conduct occurred before or after the passing of the Act. Clearly, there is considerable overlap with the offences of handling stolen goods and dishonestly retaining a wrongful credit.

Determining whether property constitutes 'criminal property' and which of a defendant's property might be criminal, can prove difficult. As an example, in *William*¹⁹⁰ the defendants were convicted of converting and transferring criminal property contrary to s 327. They had operated a security company and failed to supply VAT and tax returns to the Revenue. By the time the defendants' activities came to the attention of the Revenue, the company had an annual turnover of over £1m. On appeal, the defendants argued that the sums derived from the security business only became criminal property at a time when there were insufficient funds to pay the tax due. In rejecting this submission, relying upon the earlier case of IK,¹⁹¹ the Court of Appeal held that there is a difference between the sum constituting the pecuniary advantage and the monies falling within the definition of criminal property. In this case, the defendants had obtained a pecuniary advantage within the meaning of s 340(6) by failing to pay the tax they owed and were taken to have obtained a benefit within the meaning of subs (3) equal to that pecuniary advantage. The value of the benefit was the amount of tax unpaid. However, the criminal property was held to be the entirety of the undeclared turnover and not merely the tax due because the benefit is in part derived from that sum. William demonstrates the potential breadth of the definition in s 340.¹⁹² As another example, where D runs an unlicensed activity and it is a crime to do so, the turnover of the business is criminal.

¹⁸⁶ See Montila [2005] 1 WLR 3141, [41].

¹⁸⁷ Although the case law might not all seem to be consistent, on closer inspection it is. Some of the pronouncements are on the s 330 offence which criminalizes D's failure to report a suspicion that property is 'criminal property', and under s 330 it is immaterial whether the property is actually criminal property or not. Accordingly, in the High Court of Justiciary in Ahmad v HM Advocate [2009] HCJAC 60, it was held that the s 330 offence (based on reasonable grounds to suspect) may be committed even where D's suspicion that the property in question is 'criminal property' proves to be wrong. This was based in part on the decision in Squirrell v National Westminster Bank plc [2006] 1 WLR 637.

¹⁸⁸ See Montila [2005] 1 WLR 3141. A person cannot commit an offence of attempting to deal with criminal property if he merely suspects that the property in question is criminal property: Pace [2014] EWCA Crim 186, see p 415. In Re Assets Recovery Agency (Jamaica) [2015] UKPC 1, the Privy Council accepted that the Crown must prove that the predicate offence was committed by somebody, but not necessarily who (nor need there be a conviction already secured): 'What has to be proved is that an antecedent offence was committed, not that a conviction followed.' At [9].

¹⁸⁹ [2009] EWHC 79 (QB) at [39], per Hamblen J; a decision reversed on its merits in the Court of Appeal (Civ Div) [2010] EWCA Civ 31.

¹⁹⁰ [2013] EWCA Crim 1262.

¹⁹¹ [2007] 1 WLR 2262.

¹⁹² See also Mo [2013] NICA 49.

The predicate offence

As noted, the prosecution must prove that there is criminal property under s 340.¹⁹³ Controversy has arisen over how much detail it is necessary for the Crown to establish about the criminal conduct which generated this criminal property. What must the prosecution prove about this 'predicate offence'? In our example with the bureau de change, is it necessary for the Crown to prove precisely what earlier offence generated the money?

The criminal courts have struggled with this question of the degree of specificity with which the Crown must identify the predicate offence. Early cases¹⁹⁴ declined to impose any requirement for the Crown formally to prove that the property emanated from a specified crime or any specific type of criminal conduct.¹⁹⁵ In NW,¹⁹⁶ Laws LJ took a different view, imposing an obligation on the Crown to identify the predicate offending in 'type' at least.

That view was applied with a slightly different emphasis in Anwoir:

there are two ways in which the Crown can prove the property derives from crime, a) by showing that it derives from conduct of a specific kind or kinds and that conduct of that kind or those kinds is unlawful, or b) by evidence of the circumstances in which the property is handled which are such as to give rise to the irresistible inference that it can only be derived from crime.¹⁹⁷

Most recently in Kuchhadia,¹⁹⁸ upholding D's conviction for converting criminal property Macur LJ said:

It seems to us that the decisions in NW and Anwoir as to the necessity to identify the criminal conduct are reconciled by the clear adjudication in each that criminal conduct, specific or generic, must be evidenced and proved to the criminal standard. We do not accept [counsel's] argument, that a specific crime or criminal conduct must be specified and proved by the prosecution and a direction given so as to ensure that the jury are not divided about the nature of the criminal conduct which entitles them to convict. The statute does not support such a narrow construction.... There is no reason why the prosecution could not rely upon alternative or several allegations of different criminal conduct provided that they can prove at least one to the criminal standard to the satisfaction of the jury.

Problems of inferences

In F,¹⁹⁹ it was made clear that the Crown can succeed in a prosecution without identifying even the type of offence from which the criminal proceeds were generated.²⁰⁰ Similarly, in *IK*²⁰¹ the Court of Appeal held that it was open to a jury to infer that very large sums which were being concealed in D's money transfer business represented criminal property even though 'the prosecution could not identify the provenance of the money'.

¹⁹³ See commentary on NW [2008] Crim LR 900 and V Walters, 'Prosecuting Money Launderers: Does the Prosecution Have to Prove the Predicate Offence?' [2009] Crim LR 571 and Ahmad (Mohammad) v HM Advocate [2009] HCJAC 60 (HCF); D McCluskey, 'Money Laundering: The Disappearing Predicate' [2009] Crim LR 719.

¹⁹⁴ eg Craig [2007] EWCA Crim 2913. ¹⁹⁵ ibid, [29].

¹⁹⁶ Laws LJ in NW tried to avoid an 'anomalous' or 'bizarre' position where the Crown had a less onerous obligation in proving the source of criminal property in a prosecution than they would have under civil recovery. In civil proceedings for recovery under Part 5 of POCA, a specified 'kind' of unlawful conduct must be proved to have occurred: R (Director of the Assets Recovery Agency) v Green [2005] EWHC 3168 (Admin); Director of the Assets Recovery Agency v Olupitan [2008] EWCA Civ 104.

¹⁹⁷ Anwoir [2008] EWCA Crim 1354, [21]. ¹⁹⁸ [2015] EWCA Crim 1252.

¹⁹⁹ [2008] EWCA Crim 1868, following Anwoir [2008] EWCA Crim 1354.

²⁰⁰ In that case, the inference that the property was criminal may not have been too difficult to draw as the two defendants had £1,184,670 in cash in their luggage on a plane to Iran.

²⁰¹ [2007] 1 WLR 2262.

Difficulties can arise, particularly where the property in question is something as innocuous as an LCD TV or a car. If the Crown alleges that these are criminal property that D is converting (perhaps D has them advertised on eBay), how easy will it be to infer that they are criminal property from the circumstances (D's low income, the circumstances in which he came to possess them, etc)? In Gabriel,²⁰² the Court of Appeal provided further clarification of the Crown's responsibilities in proving that the property was property derived from criminal conduct:

In our judgment it is a sensible practice for the prosecution, either by giving particulars, or at least in opening, to set out the facts upon which it relies and the inferences which it will invite the jury to draw as proof that the property was criminal property.²⁰³

The courts have also emphasized the need for judges to prevent unfairness arising from the Crown proceeding on such broad offences without identifying with sufficient specificity what the allegation against the accused really entails. D, the launderer, need not be shown to know precisely what crime is involved. It is enough to show that he knew or suspected it was criminally tainted property.²⁰⁴

Further guidance was given on this issue in DPP of Mauritius v Bholah in which Lord Kerr, delivering the opinion of the Board, stated as follows:

In England and Wales proof of a specific predicate offence is not required, although there has been debate in some of the authorities in this area as to whether it is necessary to adduce evidence of the class or type of criminal conduct that is alleged to have generated the property dealt with by the accused.²⁰⁵

His lordship then reviewed the authorities discussed above and stated that it was not necessary to resolve the issue of whether identification and proof of the species of criminal activity is invariably required for the money laundering offences. His lordship went on to state that: 'The principal significance of these decisions for the present appeal is that common to all of them is the determination that proof of a specific offence is not required.' Importantly, however, his lordship held as follows:

The decisions in the English cases are informative beyond their firm conclusion that proof of a specific predicate offence is not required, however. They are unanimous, in the Board's view, in suggesting that where it is possible to give particulars of the nature of the criminal activity that has generated the illicit proceeds, this should be done. Some of the cases appear to suggest that this is an indispensable requirement; others that it is merely required where it is feasible. All are agreed, however, that where it is possible to give the accused notice of the type of criminal activity that produced the illegal proceeds, fairness demands that this information should be supplied.²⁰⁶

This is a welcome decision in that it offers guidance as to what the prosecution have to specify when relying upon the offences in ss 327 to 329. Although a decision of the Privy Council, Bholah was relied upon by the Court of Appeal in the subsequent case of Anwar.²⁰⁷ In this case, the prosecution did not allege any particular kind of criminal conduct on the indictment. Its case was that the circumstances were such that it was an irresistible inference that the cash represented, and the acquisition of the BMW cars in question derived from, the proceeds of unspecified crime. After they retired, the jury ²⁰² [2006] EWCA Crim 229. ²⁰³ At [29].

²⁰⁴ For a case in which the Court of Appeal held that the inference was strong enough such that the judge was correct to reject a submission of no case, see Saleh [2012] EWCA Crim 484. The court reviewed the law on the drawing of inferences.

²⁰⁵ [2011] UKPC 44, [23].

²⁰⁶ At [34].

²⁰⁷ [2013] EWCA Crim 1865.

asked the judge whether tax evasion in the UK could constitute criminal conduct for the purposes of the case. The judge reiterated that the prosecution case was that they did not know the sources of the funds in question but that tax evasion could constitute a criminal offence. In quashing the defendant's conviction, the Court of Appeal held that the judge had two choices. The most appropriate one was to direct the jury that tax evasion had never been part of the prosecution case and that they could not speculate upon the matter further. The second option was to give the jury some legal instruction as to the elements of 'tax evasion'.²⁰⁸ However, the Court of Appeal observed that this approach was not ideal as there had been no evidence relating to the issue of tax evasion. It is submitted that this case demonstrates the difficulty inherent in not specifying the predicate offence on the indictment, or at least the type of criminal activity it is alleged the defendant was involved in. In the absence of such information, jurors may look for it anyway. Although there is no explicit requirement to do so, it is submitted that the best approach is to give notice of the criminal conduct that it is alleged produced the property in question. A failure to do so invites the jury to speculate about matters that potentially were not in evidence and could unfairly prejudice the defendant.

The predicate offence must precede the money laundering

A money laundering offence by D can be proved in the absence of a conviction by D or another for the predicate offence.²⁰⁹ However, the prosecution must prove that the criminal conduct in s 340, which generates the proceeds of crime, coupled with D's knowledge or suspicion of that fact (and which thus constitutes 'criminal property') occurred before the alleged money laundering conduct took place, and not as part of it.²¹⁰

Putting this another way, the criminal property has to exist before the alleged laundering offence occurs, as the Supreme Court held in GH.²¹¹ As the Court of Appeal stated succinctly in Ogden:²¹² 'Property has to be criminal property . . . before it can be converted.' In Loizou,²¹³ the trial judge ruled that the Crown would be entitled to put its case under s 327, on the basis that property transferred for a criminal purpose would thereby become 'criminal property' within the meaning of s 340. This is clearly not what the statute intended. The Court of Appeal allowed the prosecution's appeal. The offence (under s 327) involves, inter alia, transferring criminal property. It is not an offence of criminally transferring property. The prosecution must prove that the property is criminal property within s 340 at the time of, or immediately before, the acts alleged to constitute the transfer, etc.

Identifying when the predicate occurred (and in particular when it commenced) may be difficult, particularly in allegations of tax evasion. In the case of IK,²¹⁴ it was accepted that the Crown can rely on allegations of non-declaration of income as the predicate offence for s 327 provided D has, at the time of the conduct alleged to constitute money laundering, already made a false tax declaration to the Revenue or has committed some other cheat upon the Revenue.²¹⁵ More recently, William demonstrates that although the predicate offence must precede the money laundering, profits generated by the predicate can constitute criminal property even if they accrue after the predicate offence occurred.

²⁰⁸ See also Smith (Augustus) [2015] EWCA Crim 333 where the predicate involved tax evasion.

²⁰⁹ Sabaharwal [2001] 2 Cr App R (S) 81. Re Assets Recovery Agency (Jamaica) [2015] UKPC 1: the Crown must prove that the predicate offence was committed by somebody, but need not prove that that other was convicted.

²¹⁰ Geary [2010] EWCA Crim 1925. ²¹¹ [2015] UKSC 24, [2015] Crim LR 637.

²¹² [2016] EWCA Crim 6, [2016] Crim LR 573. ²¹³ [2005] EWCA 1579, [2005] 2 Cr App R 37.

²¹⁴ [2007] 1 WLR 2262. ²¹⁵ cf Allridge and Mumford (2005) 25 LS 353. See also William, n 190.

26.4.1.2 The s 327 offence

Section 327 creates an offence where D conceals, disguises, converts,²¹⁶ transfers or removes criminal property from the UK. On one construction, the section appears to create five different offences and therefore the indictment should specify the relevant act to avoid the count being bad for duplicity. However, it is submitted that the better view is that s 327 creates a single offence that can be committed in a number of ways.²¹⁷

Actus reus

Section 327(3) defines concealing or disguising criminal property as including ‘concealing or disguising its nature, source, location, disposition, movement or ownership or any rights with respect to it’. The offence is broadly drawn and has the scope to apply in cases that would usually be thought of as classic instances of handling stolen goods (eg *Thompson*²¹⁸—selling a stolen train set to a specialist shop for £180 when its true value was £3,500), or drugs offences (Ogden—possessing and intending wholesale supply of drugs).²¹⁹ As noted, the property must be criminal property at the moment that it is concealed/disguised/converted/transferred, etc.²²⁰

The scope of the s 327 offence is demonstrated by the case of Fazal.²²¹ F was convicted on seven counts of converting criminal property contrary to s 327. F gave his bank details, debit card and PIN to a friend, P, who had said he needed an account to pay in his wages. F claimed that he did not use the account in question. Deposits were made into the account by people duped by P into paying for non-existent goods. The Crown alleged that F had facilitated the ‘conversion’, not that he had deposited or withdrawn monies himself. The question was whether, even assuming mens rea, F’s conduct could amount to converting criminal property within the meaning of s 327. F was charged as a principal offender, not as an accessory to P. The Court of Appeal upheld his conviction: if someone lodged, received, retained or withdrew money from his account, each act would amount to a conversion for the purposes of s 327. A person with a bank account could be said to be converting the money through that account merely by allowing some third party to use the account. Once there was a credit in F’s account representing the fraudulently obtained sums, it is easy to see how that can be treated as property constituting or representing a person’s benefit from criminal conduct (fraud/deception) under s 340. It is also easy to see how F has obtained an interest in it and how withdrawals from F’s account constitute conversions. However, the court is equally clear that even mere ‘receipt’ of a deposit to F’s account can amount to ‘conversion’. (In automated bank transfers there is strictly no ‘receipt’ or ‘transfer’ of property; there is a transfer of value.) There are difficulties with such a broad interpretation.²²² F’s conduct in this case might more naturally be thought of as an offence under s 328 (see later).

²¹⁶ In Ogden, the Court of Appeal endorsed the trial judge’s direction on the definition of converting: ‘Property has to be criminal property . . . before it can be converted. Any dealings in criminal property are potentially capable of being classed as “converting” . . . conduct that changes the state of the thing—for want of a better word—is capable of being classed as “converting”. Examples of conversion include selling, transferring, lending, dividing up, giving, creating a debt, passing money (or promise of money), earnings, favours in some other form are all capable of being called “converting”.’

²¹⁷ cf Griffiths v Freeman [1970] 1 All ER 1117.

²¹⁸ [2010] EWCA Crim 1216.

²¹⁹ ‘Illegal drugs (sic) by their nature always represent “criminal property”. The reason is that the process of manufacturing, trafficking, importing, distributing, supplying and selling Class A, B and C drugs always necessarily involves a benefit for one or more of the individuals involved.’ Ibid.

²²⁰ Louizou [2005] 2 Cr App R 37, [30]; Ogden [2016] EWCA Crim 6. See also Kensington International Ltd v Republic of Congo (formerly People’s Republic of Congo) (Vitol Services Ltd and others, third parties) [2008] 1 WLR 1144.

²²¹ [2009] EWCA Crim 1697.

²²² In the language of s 340, before the credit appearing in F’s account, what was the property which constituted or represented P or F’s conduct and in which either of them had obtained an ‘interest’? When did they acquire that interest?

Mens rea

There is no requirement to prove dishonesty. Nor is there any requirement that D is aware of the precise criminality which created the property. It is sufficient that he does one of the acts—concealing, disguising, etc—and knows or suspects the property is the proceeds of criminal conduct.

The mens rea requirement is very wide. Suspicion is an ordinary English word. In Da Silva,²²³ the judge directed the jury that ‘to suspect something, you have a state of mind that is well short of knowing that the matter that you suspect is true. It is an ordinary English word... the dictionary definition of “suspicion” [is] an act of suspecting, the imagining of something without evidence or on slender evidence, inkling, mistrust.’²²⁴ The Court of Appeal held that the effect of the word ‘suspect’ and its affiliates was that the defendant had to think that there was a possibility, which was more than fanciful, that the relevant facts existed. A vague feeling of unease would not suffice; however, the statute did not require that the suspicion had to be ‘clear’ or ‘firmly grounded and targeted on specific facts’, or based upon ‘reasonable grounds’.²²⁵ Where a judge feels it appropriate to assist the jury with the word ‘suspecting’, a direction along those lines would be adequate and accurate. Expressions such as ‘inkling’ and ‘fleeting thought’ are liable to mislead and their use is best avoided. The only possible qualification was whether, in an appropriate case, a jury should also be directed that the suspicion had to be of a settled nature; a case might, for example, arise in which a defendant had entertained a suspicion in the above sense but, on further thought, had honestly dismissed it from his or her mind as being unworthy or as contrary to such evidence as existed or as being outweighed by other considerations. In such a case, a careful direction to the jury might be required; however, before such a direction was necessary there would have to be some reason to suppose that the defendant had gone through some such thought process. This interpretation is consistent with earlier pronouncements including, notably, that of Lord Devlin in Hussein v Chong Fook Kam:²²⁶

Suspicion in its ordinary meaning is a state of conjecture or surmise where proof is lacking: ‘I suspect but I cannot prove’. Suspicion arises at or near the starting point of an investigation of which the obtaining of prima facie proof is the end.²²⁷

The court’s interpretation of suspicion has been held to apply in the civil law relating to this offence: K Ltd v National Westminster Bank Plc.²²⁸

26.4.1.3 The s 328 offence

Section 328 creates only one offence of entering into or becoming concerned in an arrangement which D ‘knows or suspects facilitates (by whatever means) the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property by or on behalf of another person’. It has been held that this extraordinarily broad offence does not cover the normal conduct of litigation by professions.²²⁹ It is a complex offence which can involve technical issues of civil law.²³⁰

²²³ [2006] EWCA Crim 1654. On suspicion, see Rudi Fortson, n 173, paras 7.46–7.49.

²²⁴ [2006] EWCA Crim 1654. See [16]–[19] for the correct approach.

²²⁵ At [16]. ²²⁶ [1970] AC 942 at 948.

²²⁷ See also the Joint Money Laundering Steering Group, Prevention of Money Laundering/Combating Terrorist Financing (2017 Consultation Version) Part I at paras 6.11–6.12: ‘Suspicion is more subjective [than knowledge] and falls short of proof based on firm evidence. Suspicion has been defined by the courts as being beyond mere speculation and based on some foundation.’

²²⁸ [2006] EWCA Civ 1039. Cf Shah v HSBC [2011] EWCA Crim 1154.

²²⁹ Bowman v Fels [2005] EWCA Civ 328. See also Squirrell Ltd v National Westminster Bank plc [2006] 1 WLR 637, [16].

²³⁰ See eg GH [2015] UKSC 24, [2015] Crim LR 637.

Actus reus

The concept of ‘arrangement’ is a vague one. It has long been clear that the commission of an offence under s 328 requires the property to constitute criminal property prior to the arrangement coming into operation; it is not enough that the accused dealt with the property in question for the purpose of committing a criminal offence.²³¹

In the previous edition, we noted that the Court of Appeal in *Geary*²³² referred to the requirement that property was ‘criminal property at the time when the arrangement begins to operate on it’ and that implied that the offence may apply where D and E arrange to deal with property which although not yet tainted by criminality will be by the time their agreement takes effect on it.

The Supreme Court has now confirmed that the property does not have to exist at the time when the defendant enters into or becomes concerned in the arrangement provided the property would be criminal at a time when the arrangement operates on it.²³³ In this case, a fraudster, B, established four ‘ghost’ websites falsely pretending to offer cut-price motor insurance. In order to carry out this plan, he recruited associates to open bank accounts for channelling the proceeds. H was one such associate. At the time B and H made the arrangement to receive and retain money in bank accounts, the monies that were to be paid in were not yet criminal property: by the time they were paid by the victims of an online fraud, they were criminal. This was alleged to be a money laundering arrangement, contrary to s 328(1). The Supreme Court, agreeing with the Court of Appeal, held that it did not matter that no relevant criminal property existed (no victims having yet been defrauded) when B and the defendant first entered into this arrangement, as long as it related to property which was criminal property at the time when the arrangement began to operate on it. However, the Supreme Court disagreed with the Court of Appeal’s conclusion:²³⁴ that the latter part of that test was not satisfied on the facts because the payments made into the accounts by the victims were not payments of criminal property. The Supreme Court held that the character of the ‘money’ (as it is referred to) changed on being paid into the defendant’s accounts. It was lawful property in the hands of the victims at the moment when they paid it into the defendant’s accounts. It became criminal property in the hands of B, not by reason of the arrangement made between B and the defendant but by reason of the fact that it was obtained through fraud perpetrated on the victims.

The Court of Appeal was wrong in holding that there was no criminal property at the time the arrangement began to operate.

Lord Toulson noted:

There may be cases properly founded on the laundering of property in the form of a chose in action, but it is not a subject with which jurors . . . are likely to be readily familiar. If the prosecution is going to advance a case on that basis, it has not only to consider whether the case is capable of being presented in a readily comprehensible way (or whether there might be a different and simpler method of approach) but also to ensure that its tackle is properly in order. Abstract references to a chose in action, without the basis being clearly and properly identified and articulated, are a recipe for confusion.²³⁵

Section 328 has a wide reach, but is limited in that it requires a settled arrangement which D knows or suspects facilitates (not ‘will or may facilitate’) the acquisition of criminal property by or on behalf of another person. *Dare v CPS*²³⁶ illustrates the point. D had been ²³¹ See also Akhtar [2011] EWCA Crim 146 and Gillies [2011] EWCA Crim 2140.

²³² [2010] EWCA Crim 1925, [2011] Crim LR 321 and commentary.

²³³ GH [2015] UKSC 24, [2015] Crim LR 637.

²³⁴ [2013] EWCA Crim 2237.

²³⁵ At [42].

²³⁶ [2012] EWHC 2074 (Admin), [2013] Crim LR 413.

approached by someone he knew to be a car trader but who, as D knew, had been involved with stolen cars. D had been offered a car and arranged to meet the trader to negotiate. The sale to D never took place, but the magistrates found that D had agreed to meet the trader for a second time in order to buy the car, albeit at a reduced price, and in doing so had entered into an arrangement within the meaning of s 328(1). The Divisional Court quashed the conviction. Under s 328, the 'arrangement' had to be one that 'facilitates' not one that 'will facilitate'. In this case, the agreement was to meet with a view to arranging a price; it was not even a contract of sale. If the price had been negotiated and the car was handed over, that would have facilitated the future acquisition of the car by another. The court suggested that s 328(1) applies if in the snapshot of time at the moment of the arrangement one could say it 'facilitates' the acquisition of criminal property by or on behalf of another person, and therefore that other person had to be identified or identifiable. The court was clearly concerned that on the Crown's construction every case of handling stolen goods with a view to resale would constitute an offence under s 328(1), but would be criminal at a much earlier point in time. The court gave the example of a man who bought a stolen watch with a view to selling it on at a profit: such a person was undoubtedly guilty of handling stolen goods if he knew or suspected that the watch was stolen and, if the watch was stolen, on those facts the purchaser had entered into an arrangement which he knew or suspected would facilitate, in the future, the acquisition of criminal property by or on behalf of another. On the Crown's submission, both individuals would have committed a s 328 offence at the moment that those individuals arranged to meet with a view to the watch being sold.

Mens rea

There is no requirement of dishonesty, etc. D must know or suspect that the property is criminal property (as it in fact must be). The concept of 'suspicion' was considered earlier.

26.4.1.4 The s 329 offence

Section 329 creates one offence that can be committed in a number of ways. Subsection (1) provides that for the purposes of this section:

- (1) A person commits an offence if he—
 - (a) acquires criminal property;
 - (b) uses criminal property;
 - (c) has possession of criminal property.

Actus reus

The offence has a wide reach. The thief who retains possession of property that he has stolen commits an offence under s 329(1)(b) or (c). In this respect, it is easier to prove than handling since there is no issue as to whether the money laundering occurred otherwise than in the course of theft. It has, however, been argued that the thief never obtains an interest (in the sense of a legal interest) in the stolen goods and that there is no criminal property to be laundered under s 329. The counter, and, it is submitted, stronger argument is that the thief would acquire possession of the property, and that is treated, in the law of theft at least, as a proprietary interest. The ease with which these offences can be proved by comparison with the offences under the Theft Act 1968 has led to some controversial convictions.²³⁷

In Whitwam,²³⁸ the Court of Appeal accepted the force of the counter-argument in the previous paragraph. D was charged with acquiring criminal property, contrary to s 329(1) of the 2002 Act, when he was found in possession of a child's motorcycle that had been stolen in the course of a burglary. The issue arose as to whether this was criminal property as required under s 340 and, particularly, whether it could be criminal property if D had no 'interest' in the motorcycle. On appeal against conviction, D conceded that a thief obtained an 'interest' within the meaning of s 340(10) of the Act in the property he stole because he obtained a right to possession of that property. Given the fact that the motorcycle had been obtained as a result of criminal conduct and constituted his benefit from that conduct, it was criminal property.

²³⁷ See eg Hogan v DPP [2007] 1 WLR 2944 and Wilkinson v DPP [2006] EWHC 3012 (Admin).

²³⁸ [2008] EWCA Crim 239.

As in ss 327 and 328 the predicate offence must precede the possession. In Amir,²³⁹ the Court of Appeal emphasized that 'The definition does not embrace property which the accused intends to acquire by criminal conduct and the language of the statute is not capable of construing the definition in that way. Property is not criminal property because the wrongdoing intends that it should be so.'²⁴⁰

Mens rea

Dishonesty is not required under s 329. D must know or suspect that the property in question is criminal property. Suspicion is considered earlier.

A specific defence to s 329

Section 329(2)(c) provides a defence if D has acquired the property for adequate consideration. By s 329(3):

- (a) a person acquires property for inadequate consideration if the value of the consideration is significantly less than the value of the property;
- (b) a person uses or has possession of property for inadequate consideration if the value of the consideration is significantly less than the value of the use or possession;
- (c) the provision by a person of goods or services which he knows or suspects may help another to carry out criminal conduct is not consideration.

The defendant bears the evidential burden of raising the 'defence': Hogan v DPP.²⁴¹

26.4.1.5 Defences to ss 327 to 329 offences

There are two defences common to ss 327 to 329. The first is where a person makes an authorized disclosure to the authorities under s 338 or was intending to do so and had a reasonable excuse for failing to do. It was accepted in *Bowman v Fels*²⁴² that 'the issue or pursuit of ordinary legal proceedings with a view to obtaining the court's adjudication upon the parties' rights and duties is not to be regarded as an arrangement or a prohibited act within ss 327–9'. It follows that lawyers conducting litigation are not required to make disclosure to the National Crime Agency (NCA) and obtain NCA consent merely because of a suspicion that the proceedings might in some way facilitate the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property by one or more of the parties.²⁴³

Secondly, by the amendments made in Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005²⁴⁴ D has a defence if he knows, or believes on reasonable grounds, that the relevant 'criminal'

²³⁹ [2010] EWCA Crim 2361.

²⁴⁰ At [20] per Elias LJ.

²⁴¹ [2007] 1 WLR 2944.

²⁴² [2005] 1 WLR 3083.

²⁴³ The defence applies if: '(a) [D] makes an authorized disclosure under s 338 and (if the disclosure is made before he does the act mentioned in subsection (1)) he has the appropriate consent; (b) he intended to make such a disclosure but had a reasonable excuse for not doing so; (c) the act he does is done in carrying out a function he has relating to the enforcement of any provision of this Act or of any other enactment relating to criminal conduct or benefit from criminal conduct.'

²⁴⁴ Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, s 102.

conduct occurred (or is occurring) in a country outside the UK, and is not (or was not at that time) criminal in that country. In O'Mahony,²⁴⁵ the judge declined to leave to the jury the issue of whether D believed on reasonable grounds that the relevant criminal conduct, in this instance the selling of Premiership football tickets, occurred in Spain where it was not criminal conduct. In fact, such conduct was criminal in Spain. The Court of Appeal stated that this was an issue of law for the judge and that:

It is one thing to know something, it is another to believe, but, at the risk of stating the obvious, to believe something on reasonable grounds requires the existence of reasonable grounds for the belief. Here there were no such grounds. The belief was based on an error of law. That is not a reasonable ground for that belief.²⁴⁶

26.4.2 Charging money laundering or handling?

The overlap between the offences in POCA and the offence of handling seems obvious. They are both regimes designed to deter the predicate criminal conduct, or at least to ensure that those who perform such conduct will have a more difficult time in disposing of their ill-gotten gains, and to deter those who engage in disposing of such gains. Questions have been raised about the extent to which the money laundering offences have rendered the handling offence obsolete.²⁴⁷ There are certainly advantages for the prosecutor in charging money laundering. There is no need to prove that D was dishonest, nor that he 'knew or believed' that the property in question was stolen goods. Mere suspicion is sufficient mens rea for money laundering. Money laundering also has the advantage of capturing the conduct of the thief himself, who under s 22 and following Bloxham, cannot be convicted of handling unless he does so 'for the benefit of another'. Moreover, there are no difficulties in money laundering charges if the goods were allegedly stolen abroad.²⁴⁸ Indeed, the Court of Appeal has read the offences as extraterritorial. In Rogers,²⁴⁹ D's conviction for a money laundering offence under s 327(1)(c) of POCA was upheld for his conduct in Spain converting criminal property which was derived from frauds against victims in England and Wales, but which was already in Spain by the time he came to launder it.

However, some take the view that it is wrong to view the offences as overlapping, arguing that the purposes of the legislative regimes are different, with money laundering being intended to deal with those who operate with a veneer of respectability, under cover of which they clean up (launder) the proceeds of the activities of the front line criminals.

In R (on the application of Wilkinson v DPP),²⁵⁰ the court recommended that POCA charges (in that case s 329) should be resorted to only in serious cases, in accordance with CPS guidance, but the court accepted that if POCA was charged inappropriately where the facts suggest a simple handling offence, the court could do no more than encourage the prosecution to charge handling stolen goods.

In Whitwam, discussed earlier, the court also addressed the appropriateness of charging a money laundering offence under Part 7 of the Act in respect of conduct which had the hallmarks of ordinary burglary, theft or handling. The Court of Appeal considered the CPS Code and prosecution guidance acknowledging that money laundering charges should

²⁴⁵ [2012] EWCA Crim 2180.

²⁴⁶ At [20].

²⁴⁷ cf the CPS guidance (available at www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/proceeds-crime and at www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/theft-act-offences), and Criminal Law Week (2007) 19 Feb and see P Rule, 'An Alternative Handler' (2006) 170 JP 884.

²⁴⁸ If handling is charged it is necessary to prove the foreign law, see Ofori (1994) 99 Cr App R 223.

²⁴⁹ [2014] 2 Cr App R 515, [32].

²⁵⁰ [2006] EWHC 3012 (Admin).

normally be considered where a defendant had actively tried to conceal or transfer criminal proceeds. The Court of Appeal expressed concern at the use of POCA in such circumstances (although accepting that charging decisions were for the CPS rather than the courts).

The Supreme Court has cautioned that the courts 'should be willing to use their powers to discourage inappropriate use of the provisions of POCA to prosecute conduct which is sufficiently covered by substantive offences, as they have done in relation to handling stolen property'.²⁵¹

As Lord Toulson noted:

A thief is not guilty of acquiring criminal property by his act of stealing it from its lawful owner, but that does not prevent him from being guilty thereafter of an offence under one or other, or both, of those sections by possessing, using, concealing, transferring it and so on. The ambit of those sections is wide. However, it would be bad practice for the prosecution to add additional counts of that kind unless there is a proper public purpose in doing so, for example, because there may be doubt whether the prosecution can prove that the defendant was the thief but it can prove that he concealed what he must have known or suspected was stolen property, or because the thief's conduct involved some added criminality not just as a matter of legal definition but sufficiently distinct from the offence that the public interest would merit it being charged separately. Brink's-Mat Ltd v Noye [1991] 1 Bank LR 68 provides a notorious example of the laundering of the proceeds of the theft of gold bars from a warehouse, but the conduct of thieves in laundering property stolen by them would not have to be on such a grand scale to merit them being prosecuted for it.²⁵²

²⁵¹ GH [2015] UKSC 24, [2015] Crim LR 637.

²⁵² At [48].

Offences of damage to property

The principal offences of damage to property are governed by the Criminal Damage Act 1971 which replaced the complicated provisions of the Malicious Damage Act 1861. Like the Theft Act, the Criminal Damage Act is a code, and it must be approached and interpreted in the same fashion.¹ The Criminal Damage Act is largely the product of a Law Commission Report, and reference to that helps in understanding the underlying policies and in elucidating the provisions of the Act.²

The Law Commission sought to align the law governing damage to property with that governing appropriating property as found in the Theft Act 1968. Complete parity for theft and criminal damage is neither practicable nor desirable, but it is important that there should be no conflict of principle if the whole range of criminal offences is to be consistent and harmonious. Differences are obvious: while land cannot in general be stolen, there is no reason why criminal damage to land should go unpunished. On the other hand, it is clearly desirable that if it is not generally an offence to pick another's wild mushrooms, it should not be an offence to destroy or damage them and the Criminal Damage Act makes that clear.

27.1 Destroying or damaging property of another

By s 1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971:

A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property belonging to another intending to destroy or damage any such property or being reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged shall be guilty of an offence.

And by s 4 the offence is punishable by imprisonment for ten years on indictment.³

27.1.1 Destroy or damage

The expression 'destroy or damage' was commonly used in the Malicious Damage Act 1861 and previous decisions on the meaning of these words, though no longer binding, retain a persuasive value.

¹ See p 826.

² See LC 29, Criminal Law: Report on Offences of Damage to Property (1970). See also Law Com Working Paper No 23, Malicious Damage (1969) and generally DW Elliott, 'Criminal Damage' [1988] Crim LR 403.

³ Although originally the same as theft, this is now more severe than theft (maximum seven years). Penalty notices are often imposed: criminal damage contrary to s 1(1) attracts a fixed penalty—the Penalties for Disorderly Behaviour (Amount of Penalty) Order 2002, SI 2002/1837 (as amended).

'What constitutes criminal damage is a matter of fact and degree and it is for the [jury or magistrates], applying their common sense, to decide whether what occurred was damage or not'.⁴ In Samuels v Stubbs,⁵ Walters J said:

It seems to me that it is difficult to lay down any very general and, at the same time, precise and absolute rule as to what constitutes 'damage'. One must be guided in a great degree by the circumstances of each case, the nature of the article and the mode in which it is affected or treated . . . It is my view, however, that the word . . . is sufficiently wide in its meaning to embrace injury, mischief or harm done to property, and that in order to constitute 'damage' it is unnecessary to establish such definite or actual damage as renders the property useless, or prevents it from serving its normal function . . .

Under the usual principles, a court or jury must not be allowed to find that the result constitutes damage when no reasonable tribunal could so find. A magistrates' court may be corrected, as a magistrate was in Samuels v Stubbs,⁶ if it finds that the result was not damage when, in law, it was. The lack of firm definition does nothing to promote consistency in the law.

What is contemplated by 'destroy or damage' is actual destruction or damage; that is, some physical alteration, harm, impairment or deterioration. This will usually be capable of being perceived by human senses,⁷ but it is the property that must be tangible for the purposes of this offence, not the damage.⁸ The damage can be caused by act or omission.⁹ It is not enough to show that what has been done amounts to a civil wrong as, for example, a trespass to land or goods for neither requires proof of actual damage. So, in *Eley v Lytle*¹⁰ D was not guilty when, during a game of football, he ran over V's land and committed trespass without actual damage. The same result would follow under the 1971 Act. Actual damage, however, need only be slight. It has been held that grass can be damaged by trampling it down,¹¹ and is easily and rapidly damaged by football, cricket or even bowls.¹²

Damage by impairing usefulness? Should rendering property unfit for use constitute 'damage'? This poses difficulty in numerous situations. A thing may be damaged in the sense of being physically impaired though nothing is actually broken or deformed. A car is damaged just as much by uncoupling the brake cable as by cutting it with a pair of pliers. So a machine may be damaged by removing some integral part,¹³ or by running it in an improper fashion so that physical impairment will result,¹⁴ or tampering with some part so that it will not work although no part is removed or broken.¹⁵

⁴ Roe v Kingerlee [1986] Crim LR 735.

⁵ [1972] 4 SASR 200 at 203. Following this, in Previsic [2008] VSCA 112 Ashley JA stated that absence of cost of repair is a circumstance that a jury might take into account in deciding whether it was satisfied to the criminal standard that the accused had damaged property.

⁶ [1972] 4 SASR 200 at 201.

⁷ But no doubt a non-rechargeable battery is damaged by exhausting the charge. The damage cannot be perceived by the eye but it has been rendered useless. Similarly with the erasure of recordings from audio, video and storage media: it was held that a card containing a computer program is damaged by erasure of the program: Cox v Riley (1986) 83 Cr App R 54, DC. But as to the modification of computers and computer material, see now the Computer Misuse Act 1990, Ch 28, and s 10(5) of the Act (as inserted) discussed later. On these cases see also I Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations (2nd edn, 2016).

⁸ See p 1110.

⁹ Miller [1983] 2 AC 161, p 54.

¹⁰ (1885) 50 JP 308, DC.

¹¹ Gayford v Chouler [1898] 1 QB 316, DC.

¹² cf Laws v Eltringham (1881) 8 QBD 283, DC, n 38.

¹³ cf Tacey (1821) Russ & Ry 452. Charges of criminal damage were brought against the person who sabotaged floodlights at a premiership football game intending to fix bets: The Times, 13 Feb 1999.

¹⁴ cf Norris (1840) 9 C & P 241.

¹⁵ cf Fisher (1865) LR 1 CCR 7, DC, and see Getty v Antrim County Council [1950] NI 114 (dismantling). Though a machine or a structure may be damaged by the removal of a part or by dismantling, it does not necessarily follow that the parts are damaged by the removal or dismantling; if the parts are undamaged, D can be charged only with damaging the whole machine: Woolcock [1977] Crim LR 104 and 161; Morphitis v Salmon [1990] Crim LR 48, DC. Care must be taken in drafting the charge accurately.

In Lloyd v DPP,¹⁶ it was argued that clamping a car was, by itself, damage to the car, but the court rejected that and the decision was followed in *Drake v DPP*¹⁷ where it was held that clamping involved no intrusion into the physical integrity of the vehicle. The clamp renders the vehicle useless for its purpose for the time being, just as the removal of an essential working part does, but it does not harm any integral part. In Lloyd, a large yellow sticker was also affixed firmly to the windscreen, rendering it impossible to drive the car until considerable effort had been put into removing it. Brian Hogan contended strenuously, and reasonably, that this must be criminal damage. But applying the court's test, did it intrude into the 'integrity' of the vehicle any more than the clamp? Affixing with glue can hardly be more intrusive than affixing with steel bolts.

The courts' inconsistency of approach is demonstrated by other examples. The courts have accepted that damage was caused to a blanket and police cell where D stuffed the blanket in the toilet in his cell and repeatedly flushed the toilet causing flooding. The water was clean and the floor was waterproof, but the suggestion that this was not damage was 'incomprehensible'. The floor and blanket were rendered temporarily unusable.¹⁸ The property was rendered inoperative and imperfect. On this basis the question of damaging by impairing 'usefulness' could arise where the owner is deprived of access to a house or car by the theft or borrowing of keys to the front door or ignition keys. It would not be a natural use of language to describe these actions as damaging the house or car (even though the owner may be put to expense before he can put the house or car to their intended uses).¹⁹ The physical integrity of the house or car is unaltered.

Damage by reduction in value? Should rendering property less valuable constitute 'damage'? It has been held that property may be damaged though there is no interference with its performance if it is rendered less valuable.²⁰ A car is damaged if the paintwork is scratched and food is damaged by spoiling, as is milk when diluted with water.²¹ In each of those cases there is a physical interference. Smith²² argues that focusing on the impact of D's conduct on the value of V's property is an erroneous approach under the 1971 Act since it could lead to prosecution for criminal damage in wholly unsuitable circumstances.²³ This serves to remind us that the offence requires that property must be physically altered.

The courts have occasionally been guided by the potential for expense to be incurred by the owner in rectifying the apparent harm as a way of avoiding difficult decisions of whether ¹⁶ [1992] 1 All ER 982, DC.

¹⁷ [1994] RTR 411, DC, [1994] Crim LR 855. Cf the position in Scotland discussed by A Phillips, 'Criminal and Civil Aspects of Wheel Clamping on Private Property' (1993) 38 J of the Law Soc of Scotland 187. Section 54 of the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 makes it an offence to immobilize a vehicle on private land without lawful authority with a view to preventing its removal by the owner. Before Parliament the minister stated that the rationale for the offence was to abolish the 'menace of intimidation and extortion' that is associated with private clampers. Hansard, HC, 1 Mar 2011, vol 524, col 209.

¹⁸ Fiak [2005] EWCA Crim 2381.

¹⁹ Henderson and Battley (1984) unreported, CA, but extensively cited in Cox v Riley (1986) 83 Cr App R 54, [1986] Crim LR 460, DC. See the rejection of the removal of keys as damage in DPP v Fraser [2008] NSWSC 244. Hammond v R [2013] NSWCCA 93 cast doubt on Fraser. After conducting a survey of the case law, Slattery J stated, obiter, that English and Australian authorities established that interference with functionality is sufficient to constitute 'damage', even in the absence of physical harm.

²⁰ cf Foster (1852) 6 Cox CC 25. Cf King v Lees (1948) 65 TLR 21, DC (passenger urinating in taxi held to have caused injury for purposes of London Hackney Carriage Act 1831, s 41).

²¹ cf Roper v Knott [1898] 1 QB 868, DC.

²² Smith, Property Offences, para 27.16.

²³ The example given is that of the taking of the examination paper in Oxford v Moss (1978) 68 Cr App R 183, but the offence would surely not be made out in that case because the harm done (whether damage or not) is to the interest in confidentiality which does not constitute property for criminal damage (nor for theft).

damage is de minimis.²⁴ In Samuels v Stubbs,²⁵ D had jumped on a policeman's hat resulting in 'temporary functional derangement'. This was held to constitute damage though there was no evidence that the cap might not have been restored to its original state without any real cost or trouble to the owner. By contrast, in Hardman v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary,²⁶ it was held that pavement drawings in water-soluble paint constituted damage to the pavement where the local authority incurred expense in removing them with high-pressure water jets. This seems entirely right. No one would maintain that property which has been daubed by slogans or drawings was not damaged simply because the rain would eventually remove all trace of them²⁷ or because the householder could remove them more quickly with soap and water. Samuels v Stubbs is, perhaps, a less clear case. If an article is accidentally trodden upon (and for the purpose of determining whether there has been damage it can make no difference that it is intentionally trodden upon) and the owner finds that it takes a matter of moments to press it back into shape, surely he would say that no damage had been done? In A (A Juvenile) v R,²⁸ it was held that spitting on a policeman's raincoat did not damage the raincoat where the spittle could be removed by a wipe with a damp cloth. No doubt it would have been otherwise had the raincoat material been capable of being stained by the spittle.²⁹

The defendant's opinion that what he did was not damage is irrelevant if damage is caused in law and fact. V's wall is damaged by D's graffiti irrespective of whether D regards it as an improvement.³⁰

The principles used in interpreting 'destroy' or 'damage' apply equally when the question is whether D has damaged land or the use to which it can be put. To dump rubbish on another's land, even though there is no tangible hurt to the land beneath the rubbish, may amount to damage of the land if the owner is put to expense in removing the rubbish before the land can be put to his uses.³¹

The Police and Justice Act 2006 inserted a new s 10(5) which provides that for the purposes of the Criminal Damage Act 'a modification of the contents of a computer shall not be regarded as damaging any computer or computer storage medium unless its effect on that computer or computer storage medium impairs its physical condition'.³²

²⁴ The problem arises disproportionately frequently with criminal damage because the activities of protestors commonly involve a symbolic act of relatively minor damage—daubing slogans, decapitating statues of former prime ministers, snipping perimeter fencing of air force bases, etc.

²⁵ [1972] 4 SASR 200 at 203.

²⁶ [1986] Crim LR 330 (Judge Llewellyn Jones and Justices).

²⁷ For a call for criminal damage prosecutions of dog owners who allow their dogs to foul pavements, see P Alldridge, 'Incontinent Dogs and the Law' (1990) 140 NLJ 1067.

²⁸ [1978] Crim LR 689 (Judge Streeter and Justices).

²⁹ But would it not be reasonable for the policeman to insist that even rain-proofed material should be dry-cleaned after it had been spat upon?

³⁰ Nor is D's motive (eg painting fig leaves over parts he considers indecent) relevant. Cf Fancy [1980] Crim LR 171, CC (whiting out National Front slogans). This passage in the 13th edition was cited with approval by the Administrative Court in Seray-Wurie v DPP [2012] EWHC 208 (Admin). See also M Watson, 'Graffiti—Popular Art, Anti-Social Behaviour or Criminal Damage' (2004) 168 JP 668 and see the valuable discussion in J Edwards, 'Banksy's Graffiti: A Not So Simple Case' (2009) 73 J Crim L 345, considering whether there is damage, whether D needs to be aware it is damage and whether there is a lawful excuse.

³¹ One might question the consistency of this with the decision in Lloyd [1991] Crim LR 904, DC, where as noted, the court took the view that a car was not damaged by placing a wheel clamp on it. Criminal damage charges had also proved ineffective in combating the menace of prostitutes' cards being stuck on public telephone boxes, hence the offence under the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, s 46 (see Home Office, New Measures to Control Prostitutes' Cards in Phone Boxes (1999)).

³² Police and Justice Act 2006, Sch 14, para 2.

‘Destroy’ clearly goes beyond damage and does not contemplate half measures. The word is a useful addition. It more accurately describes certain forms of conduct; for example: to ‘destroy’ structures by pulling them down or demolishing them, or to destroy crops or other growing things by laying them to waste, or to break machines, or to kill animals.³³

27.1.2 Property

Section 10(1) of the Criminal Damage Act provides:

In this Act ‘property’ means property of a tangible nature, whether real or personal, including money and—

- (a) including wild creatures which have been tamed or are ordinarily kept in captivity, and any other wild creatures or their carcasses if, but only if, they have been reduced into possession which has not been lost or abandoned or are in the course of being reduced into possession; but
- (b) not including mushrooms growing wild on any land or flowers, fruit or foliage of a plant growing wild on any land.

For the purposes of this subsection ‘mushroom’ includes any fungus and ‘plant’ includes any shrub or tree.

The clarifications in para (a) and the exceptions in para (b) are, of course, to keep the law of damage to property closely in line with the law of theft,³⁴ but there are three significant differences.

First, land, which in general cannot be stolen, may be the subject of criminal damage. The policies against applying theft to appropriating land³⁵ do not apply when the conduct is damaging land. While D cannot steal his neighbour’s beautifully tended lawn by annexing it,³⁶ he may commit criminal damage by turning it over to grow vegetables.

Secondly, while it is now possible to steal intangible property, it is not possible to commit criminal damage to it. ‘Offences of criminal damage to property’, said the Law Commission, ‘in the context of the present law connote physical damage in their commission, and for that reason we have not included intangible things in the class of property, damage to which should constitute an offence’.³⁷ Consequently, such intangible property as easements and profits, patents and copyrights, are excluded for the purposes of criminal damage.³⁸

Thirdly, whereas it is theft to pick wild mushrooms, fruit and foliage, etc for commercial purposes, this would not result in a criminal damage charge irrespective of whether the picker had commercial motives.³⁹ It is important to note that the limitation extends only to ³³ cf Barnet London Borough Council v Eastern Electricity Board [1973] 2 All ER 319, DC.

³⁴ But note that the destruction of, or damage to, wild animals and plants may be an offence under other legislation; see eg the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the Protection of Badgers Act 1992. For an analysis of the 1992 Act, see Foster v CPS [2013] EWHC 3885 (Admin).

³⁵ See p 847.

³⁶ He might steal from the land by removing the turf. The warden of a university hall of residence was once surprised to discover that, in his absence, his lawn had been carried away (though not ‘dishonestly’) by the Vice-Chancellor to make a bowling green.

³⁷ LC 29, para 34.

³⁸ cf Laws v Eltringham (1881) 8 QBD 283, DC. D and others had been charged with damaging Newcastle Town Moor by playing bowls upon it. It was held that the property could not be laid in the freeman who had merely the (incorporeal) right of herbage; the property ought to have been laid in Newcastle Corporation as the freeholder.

³⁹ On the relationship of the provisions with the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, see M Welstead, ‘Seasons of Mists and Mellow Fruitfulness’ (1995) 145 NLJ 1499.

fruit or foliage of plants growing on the land. The land itself may be damaged by, for example, environmental protest against GM crops.⁴⁰

Turning to animals, in Cresswell v DPP,⁴¹ the Divisional Court considered whether badgers which had been enticed into traps set by officials from DEFRA had become 'property' for the purposes of s 10. The defendants sought to argue that the badgers were no longer wild, but property under s 10 and that they had a defence to destroying the traps because they were protecting other property—the badgers. Keene LJ, rejecting the argument, stated that 'merely to entice a wild animal, whether it be a badger or a game bird or a deer, to a particular spot from time to time by providing food there, even with the objective ultimately of killing it in due course, does not form part of the normal course of reducing it into possession. If the creature were thereby to become the property, say, of the landowner providing the food, it would mean that it could not then be lawfully shot by the adjoining landowner on or over whose land it passed.'⁴² Walker J was more hesitant, declining to express a concluded view on what constitutes property.⁴³

A person does not constitute property for the purposes of this offence.⁴⁴

27.1.3 Belonging to another

The offence under s 1(1) may be committed only where D destroys or damages property 'belonging to another'. Here, again, the policy of the law of criminal damage, which must be to protect interests in addition to ownership, is very much the same as that for the law of theft. Section 10 of the Criminal Damage Act therefore provides:⁴⁵

- (2) Property shall be treated for the purposes of this Act as belonging to any person—
 - (a) having the custody or control of it;
 - (b) having in it any proprietary right or interest (not being an equitable interest arising only from an agreement to transfer or grant an interest); or
 - (c) having a charge on it.
- (3) Where property is subject to a trust, the person to whom it belongs shall be so treated as including any person having a right to enforce the trust.
- (4) Property of a corporation sole shall be so treated as belonging to the corporation notwithstanding a vacancy in the corporation.

It is, then, enough that V has some proprietary interest in the property which D damages, and it does not have to be shown that V is the owner of the property. D may, for example, ⁴⁰ See M Stallworthy, 'Damage to Crops' (2000) 150 NLJ 728 at 801.

⁴¹ [2006] EWHC 3379 (Admin). ⁴² At [11].

⁴³ His lordship did express some more general views on the concept of wild animals: 'In broad terms, (a) it is a question of law whether an animal is wild or domestic... (b) Once a wild animal is killed or dies, absolute property in the dead animal vests in the owner of the land or, in a case where relevant shooting or sporting rights have been granted, in the owner of those rights. (c) While a wild animal is alive there is no absolute property in that animal. There may, however, be what is known as a qualified property in them in three circumstances. The first is described as a qualified property per industriam. Wild animals become the property of a person who takes or tames or reclaims them until they regain their natural liberty and have not the intention to return. Examples of that kind of property include animals such as deer, swans and doves. A second qualified property is described as ratione impotentiae et loci. The owner of land has a qualified property in the young of animals born on the land until they can fly or run away. A third type of qualified property is described as ratione soli and ratione privilegii. An owner of land who has retained the exclusive right to hunt, take and kill wild animals on his land has a qualified property in them for the time being while they are there but if he grants to another the right to hunt, take or kill them then the grantee has a qualified property.' At [38].

⁴⁴ Baker [1997] Crim LR 497.

⁴⁵ See for comparison s 5 of the Theft Act 1968, p 859.

damage property which V has borrowed or rented. Further, D may commit an offence where the property belongs to him provided that V also has a proprietary interest in the property. So, where D owns a car and loans it to V, but then D damages the car during the loan period, he damages property 'belonging to another'. In such cases, it may be difficult to prove that D acted with mens rea or without lawful excuse,⁴⁶ but, given that, D may commit criminal damage though he both owns and has custody and control of the property. Just as a co-owner of property may steal it by appropriating the other's share,⁴⁷ a co-owner may commit criminal damage by destroying or damaging the property.

V must have some proprietary right or interest in the property.⁴⁸ Where property is insured the insurer acquires an interest in the property, but the interest is not a proprietary one.⁴⁹ If D destroys his own property which he has insured with V, he does not destroy property belonging to another even though he may have destroyed it with a view to making a dishonest claim against V.⁵⁰ In Appleyard,⁵¹ where D, the managing director of a company, set fire to the company's premises, it was argued that he could not be convicted of arson since he was 'in effect' the owner of the premises. D's conviction for arson was nevertheless upheld apparently on the basis that he was not the owner of the premises and knew he was not.

Property is also treated as belonging to a person who has a 'charge' on it because the Law Commission thought that this was an interest worthy of protection.⁵² This expression does not expressly appear in s 5 of the Theft Act 1968 and is probably unnecessary in either Act, since a charge is almost certainly a 'proprietary interest'.

It will be noted that the definition of property belonging to another in s 10 of the Criminal Damage Act contains no provision equivalent to s 5(4) of the Theft Act—property got by another's mistake. This distinction can be of no practical importance: if someone obtains property by another's mistake he may be tempted to keep it but will be unlikely to decide to damage it. There do not seem to have been difficulties over allegations of damaging abandoned property.⁵³ In Cresswell, it was accepted that there may well be some items of property which do not belong to another (eg because they are abandoned) and some which are not capable of so belonging (eg with wild animals in a state of being reduced into possession).⁵⁴

Where D is the owner of property in which no other person has any proprietary right or interest, his destroying or damaging it cannot amount to an offence under s 1(1).⁵⁵ Nor generally is it an offence to damage one's own property apart from the special case dealt with in s 1(2).⁵⁶ It is not an offence for D to destroy a work of art which he owns or to lay waste to his plentiful stocks of food at a time of acute shortage. Such acts may be properly described as wanton but they are not criminal because there is no compelling policy reason for making them criminal. But where such a reason does exist, and cruelty to animals one owns provides an illustration, particular offences can be created which deal with harm by an owner to his own property.⁵⁷

⁴⁶ See p 1079. ⁴⁷ Bonner [1970] 1 WLR 838, CA, p 853. ⁴⁸ See p 1074.

⁴⁹ An insurer has an interest in the safety of the insured property but, without more, this does not constitute a proprietary interest. Cf Lucena v Craufurd (1806) 2 Bos & PNR 269, HL, per Lawrence J at 302.

⁵⁰ cf Denton [1981] 1 WLR 1446, CA, p 1080. Such offences were included in the Malicious Damage Act 1861, ss 3 and 59.

⁵¹ (1985) 81 Cr App R 319, [1985] Crim LR 723, CA., ⁵² LC 29, para 39.

⁵³ cf theft of 'abandoned' property: p 869. ⁵⁴ Walker J at [41].

⁵⁵ If, in a case like Hinks, p 831, the donee is given a chattel, he may steal it, but he can then damage or destroy it with impunity. Where the donee's title is voidable, it may be arguable that it is different.

⁵⁶ See p 1089.

⁵⁷ Examples would include protection of listed buildings.

27.1.4 Mens rea

Section 1(1) requires that the destruction or damaging of the property should be intentional or reckless, and without lawful excuse.

27.1.4.1 Intention and recklessness

The mens rea requirement in the Malicious Damage Act offences was intention or malice.⁵⁸ The Law Commission expressly stated its intention that the offences under the Criminal Damage Act 1971 should require the same mens rea. The only difference was to be a change of language from malice to 'recklessness', reflecting the Commission's aim for greater simplicity and clarity. The term 'maliciously'⁵⁹ was avoided because:

it gives the impression that the mental element differs from that which is imposed in other offences requiring traditional mens rea. It is evident from such cases as Cunningham^[60] and Mowatt^[61] that the word can give rise to difficulties of interpretation. Furthermore, the word 'maliciously' conveys the impression that some ill-will is required against the person whose property is damaged.⁶²

The Law Commission recommended proof that D's conduct was intended by D to cause the damage in question or was foreseen by D as creating a risk of causing that damage which risk he then went on unjustifiably to take. In other words, recklessness was to be interpreted in its subjective sense.

27.1.4.2 Mens rea as to circumstances and consequences

There must be mens rea proved as to the damage (consequences) and that the property damaged belongs to another (circumstances). It is not enough that D intends to do the act which causes the damage unless he intends to cause the damage itself; proof that D intended to throw a stone is not proof that he intended to break a window.⁶³ Nor is it enough that D intends to damage property if he does not intend to damage property of another. Since D commits no offence under s 1(1) of the Act in damaging or destroying his own property, it follows in principle that he ought not to be guilty where he destroys V's property under the mistaken impression that it is his own. Whether D's mistake is one of fact or law, he commits no crime for he lacks mens rea, and this view was firmly endorsed by the Court of Appeal in Smith.⁶⁴ Upon the termination of his tenancy of a flat, D had caused £130 worth of damage in removing wiring which he had himself installed and boarded over. As a matter of property law, the landlord became the owner of the wiring and boarding as fixtures, and the trial judge directed the jury that D could have no lawful excuse since he had in law no right to do as he did. D's appeal against conviction was allowed. James LJ said on behalf of the court:⁶⁵

Applying the ordinary principles of mens rea, the intention and recklessness and the absence of lawful excuse required to constitute the offence have reference to property belonging to another. It follows that in our judgment no offence is committed under this section if a person destroys or causes damage to property belonging to another if he does so in the honest though mistaken belief that the property is his own, and provided that the belief is honestly held it is irrelevant to consider whether or not it is a justifiable belief.

⁵⁸ cf the general discussion of intention and recklessness, Ch 3.

⁵⁹ 'Maliciously' was the expression most commonly used in the Malicious Damage Act 1861 to describe mens rea.

⁶⁰ [1957] 2 QB 396, CCA, p 102.

⁶¹ [1968] 1 QB 421, CCA, p 105.

⁶² LC 29, para 44.

⁶³ cf Pembliton (1874) LR 2 CCR 119.

⁶⁴ [1974] QB 354, CA. See also Seray-Wurie v DPP [2012] EWHC 208 (Admin).

⁶⁵ [1974] 1 All ER 632 at 636.

The mistake in Smith was a mistake as to the civil law; D knew all the facts and drew the wrong conclusion of law from them. The result is the same as far as criminal liability is concerned whether the mistake is one of fact or law as long as the mistake negatives mens rea.⁶⁶ As such, D commits no offence in pulling down a house if he honestly believes the house is his whether his mistake is one of fact or civil law and however egregious his error may have been.⁶⁷ It makes no difference that D's conduct might be described as wanton (as where he destroys a work of art) or that his purpose is a crime of fraud (eg to defraud insurers). If D does not intend to destroy or damage property of another, nothing can render him liable to a charge under s 1(1). In Appleyard,⁶⁸ discussed earlier, if D had believed that he owned the company's premises then he could not have been convicted of this offence whatever his motive (to defraud insurers or creditors, to inflict loss on the shareholders) may have been.

27.1.4.3 Mens rea as to consequences (damage)

The Act extends liability not merely to damage which is caused intentionally but also damage which is caused recklessly. The Law Commission recommended subjective recklessness as to consequences as noted earlier.⁶⁹ As Lord Edmund Davies pointed out,⁷⁰ that was surely in the draftsman's mind when he drafted the Criminal Damage Act. This was not the view taken in Caldwell,⁷¹ where the criminal law was plunged into unnecessary confusion and complexity,⁷² and the breadth of the offence posed risks of serious unfairness.⁷³ Fortunately, the House of Lords subsequently acknowledged that the decision of the majority in Caldwell constituted a misinterpretation of the 1971 Act, and for that reason and for sound reasons of policy and principle as discussed in Ch 3, in *G*⁷⁴ the orthodox subjective interpretation of recklessness which the Law Commission intended has been re-established. Caldwell is overruled.

In G,⁷⁵ the two defendants aged 11 and 12, when on a camping expedition, entered the yard of a shop and set fire to bundles of newspapers leaving some lit newspaper under a large plastic wheelie bin. The newspapers set fire to the wheelie bin and the fire spread causing £1m worth of damage. The boys had expected the fires to extinguish themselves on the concrete floor; neither had appreciated that there was any risk of the fire spreading in the way that it did.⁷⁶ They were convicted of arson contrary to ss 1(1) and 1(3) of the Criminal Damage Act applying the Caldwell formula of recklessness, although the jury acknowledged some difficulty in applying fairly an objective standard to children whose capacity to see risk was limited by their immaturity.⁷⁷ In overruling Caldwell, Lord Bingham observed that:

section 1 as enacted followed, subject to an immaterial addition, the draft proposed by the Law Commission. It cannot be supposed that by 'reckless' Parliament meant anything different from the Law Commission. The Law Commission's meaning was made plain both in its Report (Law ⁶⁶ See generally p 332. ⁶⁷ cf Langford (1842) Car & M 602.

⁶⁸ (1985) 81 Cr App R 319, [1985] Crim LR 723, CA.

⁶⁹ 'A person is reckless if, (a) knowing that there is a risk that an event may result from his conduct or that circumstances may exist, he takes that risk, and (b) it is unreasonable for him to take it, having regard to the degree and nature of the risk he knows to be present': Working Paper No 31, The Mental Element in Crime (1970). See also LC 89, Criminal Law: Report on the Mental Element in Crime (1978).

⁷⁰ Caldwell [1982] AC 341.

⁷¹ [1982] AC 341.

⁷² See Lord Steyn in G [2004] AC 1034, at [57].

⁷³ See per Lord Bingham in G at [33]: 'It is neither moral nor just to convict a defendant (least of all a child) on the strength of what someone else would have apprehended if the defendant himself had no such apprehension. Nor, the defendant having been convicted is the problem cured by imposition of a nominal penalty.'

⁷⁴ [2004] AC 1034.

⁷⁵ ibid.

⁷⁶ Lord Bingham noted that they would have had little defence to a charge in relation to the wheelie bin, at [33].

⁷⁷ See the interesting article by H Keating, 'Reckless Children' [2007] Crim LR 546 on whether the children were likely to have foreseen damage and public attitudes to punishing such acts by children.

Com No 29) and in Working Paper No 23 which preceded it. These materials (not, it would seem, placed before the House in R v Caldwell) reveal a very plain intention to replace the old-fashioned and misleading expression 'maliciously' by the more familiar expression 'reckless' but to give the latter expression the meaning which R v Cunningham . . . and Professor Kenny had given to the former. In treating this authority as irrelevant to the construction of 'reckless' the majority fell into understandable but clearly demonstrable error. No relevant change in the mens rea necessary for proof of the offence was intended, and in holding otherwise the majority misconstrued section 1 of the Act.⁷⁸

As Lord Bingham made clear, the definition of recklessness to be applied in criminal damage is now that found in cl 18(c) of the Draft Criminal Code:

A person acts recklessly within the meaning of section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 with respect to—

- (i) a circumstance when he is aware of a risk that it exists or will exist;
- (ii) a result when he is aware of a risk that it will occur; and it is, in the circumstances known to him, unreasonable to take the risk.

The courts have applied the new test unhesitatingly.⁷⁹

The doctrine of transferred malice⁸⁰ applies to the offence, so that if D intends, or is reckless as to, damage to property of A, he may be liable where he in fact causes damage, neither intentionally nor recklessly, to property of B.

The intention or the recklessness need not be related to the particular property damaged, provided that it is related to another's property. If, for example, D throws a stone at a passing car intending to damage it, but misses and breaks a shop window, he will have the necessary intention in respect of the damage to the window as he intended to damage the property of another. But if in a fit of anger he throws a stone at his own car he will not have the requisite intention if it misses and damages V's. In this case the question of whether he has committed an offence will depend upon whether in throwing the stone at his own car he was reckless as to whether any property belonging to another would be destroyed or damaged.⁸¹

D would not commit an offence of criminal damage where he throws a stone at V but misses him and breaks a window, unless of course D was subjectively reckless as to the risk of breaking the window.⁸²

Arson, as we will see later, is a separate offence carrying a higher punishment than damage caused by other means and its mens rea requires not merely the intentional or reckless damaging of property but the intentional or reckless damaging of property by fire. Williams rightly suggests⁸³ that transferred malice would not apply where D, intent on damaging property other than by fire, accidentally starts a fire in circumstances where he had no foresight of a risk of fire.

Obviously, mens rea cannot be supplied by an afterthought. If D inadvertently breaks V's window he cannot become liable when, having learned that V is his sworn enemy or a hated tax inspector, he rejoices in the harm caused. On the other hand, if D inadvertently ⁷⁸ G at [29]. See also Lord Steyn at [45]; and Lord Rodger at [64].

⁷⁹ See p 109.

⁸⁰ See p 122.

⁸¹ LC 29, para 45.

⁸² cf Pembliton (1874) LR 2 CCR 119.

⁸³ (1983) 42 CLJ 85 at 86. Cf A Ashworth, 'Transferred Malice and Punishment for Unforeseen Consequences' in Glazebrook, Reshaping the Criminal Law, 77, 92. The issue is discussed in detail in J Horder, 'A Critique of the Correspondence Principle in Criminal Law' [1995] Crim LR 759 at 769–770. Horder argues that what really matters is 'the representative label: is it right to label D as an arsonist if he did not intend to start a fire . . .' Cf B Mitchell, 'In Defence of a Principle of Correspondence' [1999] Crim LR 195.

sets fire to V's property and subsequently becomes aware⁸⁴ that he has done so, he may be criminally liable if, intending or being reckless that further damage ensue to V's property, he lets the fire take its course when it lies within his power to prevent or minimize that further damage.⁸⁵

Judges may have to provide careful directions on the issues of intention and recklessness if both are alleged.⁸⁶

27.1.5 Lawful excuse

The Law Commission took the view that in most cases:

there is a clear distinction between the mental element and the element of unlawfulness, and in the absence of one or other element no offence will be committed, notwithstanding that damage may have been done to another's property. For example, a police officer who, in order to execute a warrant of arrest, has to force open a door of a house is acting with lawful excuse although he intends to damage the door or the lock. On the other hand a person playing tennis on a properly fenced court who inadvertently hits a ball on to a greenhouse roof, breaking a pane of glass, acts without lawful excuse, but will escape liability because he has not the requisite intention.⁸⁷

This distinction drawn by the Law Commission between the 'mental element' and the element of 'unlawfulness' may be a distinction of convenience but it is also a distinction generally adopted in this book. It is thought convenient to consider separately, as far as the situation permits, the issue of intention or recklessness as to the damaging of the property and the various grounds of exculpation or justification that may exist for damage deliberately done.

Section 5 of the Act provides a partial definition of 'lawful excuse'. The section in part provides:

- (2) A person charged with an offence to which this section applies^[88] shall, whether or not he would be treated for the purposes of this Act as having a lawful excuse apart from this subsection, be treated for those purposes as having a lawful excuse—
 - (a) if at the time of the act or acts alleged to constitute the offence he believed that the person or persons whom he believed to be entitled to consent to the destruction of or damage to the property in question had so consented, or would have consented to it if he or they had known of the destruction or damage and its circumstances; or
 - (b) if he destroyed or damaged or threatened to destroy or damage the property in question . . . in order to protect property belonging to himself or another or a right or interest in property which was or which he believed to be vested in himself or another, and at the time of the act or acts alleged to constitute the offence he believed—
 - (i) that the property, right or interest was in immediate need of protection; and
 - (ii) that the means of protection adopted or proposed to be adopted were or would be reasonable having regard to all the circumstances.
- (3) For the purpose of this section it is immaterial whether a belief is justified or not if it is honestly held.

⁸⁴ It is not enough that D ought to have been aware, or was not aware because he gave no thought to it: Miller, n 85.

⁸⁵ Miller [1983] 2 AC 161 HL. See p 54.

⁸⁶ Mason [2005] All ER (D) 04 (Feb).

⁸⁷ LC 29, para 49.

⁸⁸ The section applies to an offence under s 1(1); as to other offences, see later.

- (4) For the purposes of subsection (2) above a right or interest in property includes any right or privilege in or over land, whether created by grant, licence or otherwise.

The Court of Appeal confirmed in *Cairns*⁸⁹ that the offence is not one of destroying or damaging property without the consent of the owner. It is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that D had no lawful excuse for what he did only if D can adduce sufficient evidence to raise this issue.

27.1.5.1 Belief in consent

D's belief is judged by the single criterion that it be honestly held; a point which, if it is not clear enough from the wording of s 5(2)(a), is put beyond doubt by s 5(3). Section 5(2)(a) closely follows the pattern of s 2(1)(b) of the Theft Act 1968,⁹⁰ and it is right that it should since the parallel between theft and criminal damage is at this point exact.

The provision covers a number of mistaken beliefs. First, and most obviously, this provision covers the case where D believes that the owner has consented to the destruction or damage. So, in Denton,⁹¹ it was held that D was not guilty of arson in setting fire to his employer's mill when D believed that his employer had encouraged him to do so (even though this was in order to make a fraudulent claim against the insurers). Secondly, the provision covers the case where D believes the owner would have consented as, for example, where D comes across an injured animal and, believing that the owner would have consented had he been able to contact him, D kills the animal to put it out of its misery.⁹² Thirdly, the provision covers the case where D rightly believes that X is a person entitled to consent to the destruction or damage and wrongly believes that he has consented. Thus, for example, an employee destroying or damaging property belonging to the firm would commit no offence where he believed that some person in authority (say, a foreman) was entitled to consent, and had consented.⁹³ Fourthly, the provision applies where D honestly but wrongly believes that X is the person entitled to consent and also wrongly believes that he would have consented to the damage if asked. Mistakes as to the identity of the person entitled to consent, the status of the person, the presence of consent and the likelihood of conditional consent are therefore all accommodated in this extremely wide defence.

One controversial example of the breadth of the defence is that in *Jaggard v Dickinson*⁹⁴ where D had permission to treat the house of a friend, X, as her own. One night when D was heavily intoxicated she took a taxi to the street where X lived. D then attempted to enter what she mistakenly believed to be X's house, smashing a window in the process. The magistrates had rejected the s 5(2)(a) defence since D's belief in consent was brought about by self-induced intoxication. The Divisional Court quashed the conviction because of the explicitly subjective focus of s 5(3): 'a belief can be just as much honestly held if it is induced by

⁸⁹ [2013] EWCA Crim 172.

⁹⁰ See p 873.

⁹¹ [1981] 1 WLR 1446, CA.

⁹² There is also a specific defence under the Wild Mammals (Protection) Act 1996, to the offence under that Act of inflicting unnecessary suffering on a wild animal, where D attempts to kill a wild mammal as an act of mercy if D shows that the mammal had been so seriously disabled otherwise than by his unlawful act that there was no reasonable chance of its recovering (s 2). Note also the Animal Welfare Act 2006, ss 4–8 (as amended), which create offences of harm to protected animals. For analysis of these provisions, see R (Gray) v Crown Court at Aylesbury [2013] EWHC 500 (Admin).

⁹³ cf James (1837) 8 C & P 131.

⁹⁴ [1981] 3 All ER 716. Note that in Magee v CPS [2014] EWHC 4089 (Admin), the Divisional Court went as far as to say 'there is considerable doubt whether Jaggard is still good law in the light of such cases as O'Connor [1991] CLR 135 and R v Hatton [2005] EWCA Crim 2951 . . . , in any event I am satisfied that Jaggard could, and should, be narrowly rather than widely construed. Jaggard turned on the construction of the specific defence in section 5 of the 1971 Act', at [32]–[34] per Elias LJ.

intoxication, as if it stems from stupidity, forgetfulness or inattention'.⁹⁵ Williams exposes the breadth of the decision by posing the case of D, intoxicated by LSD, who believes that the owner of a Rolls Royce has instructed him to roll it over a cliff.

Based on subjective beliefs though the defence is, it seems that a belief that God is entitled to, and does, consent to the damage is no answer.⁹⁶

27.1.5.2 Defence of property

D has a lawful excuse within s 5(2)(b) if:

- (1) he destroyed or damaged the property in question in order to protect property which he believed to be vested in himself or another.⁹⁷ Some decisions have interpreted this as importing an objective element into the defence. It is submitted that this element ought, on a natural interpretation of the language, to be construed entirely subjectively;
- (2) he believed the property to be in immediate need of protection. The courts have construed this as a hybrid test by importing an objective element, that is, is there a reasonable belief;
- (3) he believed that the means of protection adopted were reasonable having regard to all the circumstances. This is interpreted as an entirely subjective question.⁹⁸

Origin and type of threat

A person is entitled to take measures to protect his own property, real or personal, from harm caused by, or by the use of, property belonging to another. The origin of the threat to D's property might be animate (eg trespassing cattle) or inanimate (eg a caravan). If, for example, a dog is attacking sheep it may be shot if D believes that he needs to do so in order to protect the sheep.⁹⁹ A right of way over land belonging to another, being a 'right or privilege in or over land', is 'property' and may be defended, in appropriate circumstances, by the demolition of a wall obstructing it.¹⁰⁰ The owner clearly has this right where the risk to his property exists in fact, but the Act goes further in providing defences.

In Jones,¹⁰¹ the Court of Appeal concluded that there is no requirement that the threat to the item of property D believed to be in need of protection is a threat of unlawful damage.

⁹⁵ Per Mustill J at 532. See G Williams, 'Two Nocturnal Blunders' (1990) 140 NLJ 1564.

⁹⁶ Blake v DPP [1993] Crim LR 586, DC, p 398 and commentary suggesting difficulties also because God is not a 'person'.

⁹⁷ In Cresswell, the argument that these words were superfluous was rejected. They may be necessary to deal with abandoned property.

⁹⁸ cf the Northern Irish case of McCann in which the Court of Appeal summarized the position as follows: 'there are three elements to the defence . . . firstly, that the defendant acted in order to protect property; secondly that he honestly believed that that property was in immediate need of protection; and, thirdly, that he honestly believed that his actions were reasonable having regard to all the circumstances. It is clear that the second and third elements of the defence involve the application of a subjective test, ie did the defendant honestly believe that the conditions therein arose in the particular case. Different considerations arise in relation to the first element of the defence, however.' That interpretation was also the one of the Divisional Court in DPP v Unsworth [2010] EWHC 3037 (Admin).

⁹⁹ Where there is no such justification, injuring the animal may constitute an offence under the Animal Welfare Act 2006, s 4 (as amended). Cf Isted v CPS (1997) 162 JP 513, DC, decided under the old law.

¹⁰⁰ Chamberlain v Lindon [1998] 2 All ER 538, DC. It was accepted in Unsworth [2010] EWHC 3037 (Admin), without any consideration being given to the question, that the right to light is 'property' and that the applicant's property was therefore being threatened by her neighbour's 12ft-high conifer trees. As the Law Commission notes, however, the right to light is different from other rights over land. See LCCP 210, Rights to Light (2013) and LC 356, Rights to Light (2014).

¹⁰¹ [2005] QB 259.

Certainly that restriction does not appear in the terms of the section. In Cresswell (the badgers case), however, the Divisional Court, in rejecting D's argument that he had believed the badgers to be in immediate need of protection, suggested that the s 5(2) defence was not available. It is not the purpose of the section to prevent an owner destroying or damaging his property.¹⁰² There would be no unlawful act perpetrated against the badgers by the people D believed to be the owners (DEFRA) if those people killed badgers. Keene LJ suggested that if there was an unlawful act another defence would arise.¹⁰³

Threat to 'property'

The property which D believes he is acting in order to protect must exist.¹⁰⁴ It is, of course, for the prosecution to disprove D's claim as long as D meets the evidential burden by laying a foundation for his claim to lawful excuse. The obligation is interpreted strictly: it is not for the judge to raise the defence and it has even been suggested that D must raise the defence by testifying.¹⁰⁵

'In order to'

This aspect of the s 5(2)(b) provision has caused most difficulty. In a series of cases, the courts have said that the words 'in order to protect property' have an objective meaning. The insistence that the test is objective is difficult to reconcile with the wording of the statute which suggests a purely subjective test.

In Hunt,¹⁰⁶ D, who assisted his wife in her job as warden of a block of old people's flats, set fire to some bedding. He said he did so in order to demonstrate that the fire alarm was not working and so to protect the flats from immediate danger by getting it put right. The court asserted that while this act was done in order to draw attention to the defective state of the fire alarm, it was not done in order to protect property. Roskill LJ was clear that the question whether or not a particular act of destruction or damage or threat of destruction or damage was done or made 'in order to' protect property belonging to another must be an objective test.

In *Ashford and Smith*¹⁰⁷ and Hill and Hall,¹⁰⁸ the defendants were convicted of possessing articles with intent to damage property, namely the perimeter fences surrounding military bases. They claimed to have a lawful excuse because the bases, being an obvious target for enemy attack, constituted an immediate danger to property in the neighbourhood, and they acted in order to have the bases, and with them, the danger, removed. In both cases, the court said that the defence had rightly been withdrawn from the jury: objectively, the defendants did not act in order to protect property.¹⁰⁹

In Johnson v DPP,¹¹⁰ D, a squatter, damaged the door frame of a house in order to replace the locks with one of his own. He said that he did so in order to protect his property which he believed to be in immediate need of protection. The court purporting to apply an objective ¹⁰² Per Keene LJ at [16].

¹⁰³ If D peers through my window and sees me about to destroy my original Picasso in my living room, can he rely on s 5(2)(b) as a defence to breaking down my door? I would be committing no crime, but should D have a defence?

¹⁰⁴ Per Keene LJ in Cresswell, n 41, at [10].

¹⁰⁵ And not through defence statements or counsel: Jones [2003] EWCA Crim 894, Buxton LJ at [14].

¹⁰⁶ (1977) 66 Cr App R 105, CA. Cf Phillips v Pringle [1973] 1 NSWLR 275 (CCA of New South Wales, action pursuant to a UN resolution against racialism not a lawful excuse for damaging goalposts).

¹⁰⁷ [1988] Crim LR 682, CA.

¹⁰⁸ (1988) 89 Cr App R 74, CA.

¹⁰⁹ In Hill and Hall, it was added that there was no evidence on which it could be found that D believed the property was in immediate need of protection.

¹¹⁰ [1994] Crim LR 673, DC.

test (but in fact, it seems, simply disbelieving D) said that his purpose was not to protect property but to enable him to use the door; and, in applying a subjective test, that he did not believe his property was in immediate need of protection and that the means of protection were reasonable. It should be noted that a person may act with more than one purpose, and it is sufficient that one of those purposes was to protect property.¹¹¹

As the court in Hill and Hall accepts, there are two distinct matters to be addressed. The first matter to be decided is D's actual state of mind. If D is asked, 'Why did you do this act?' and answers 'In order to protect the flats from fire', or 'To save the houses from damage by enemy attack' or 'To protect my property from thieves', he may be disbelieved but, if his answer is or may be true, if this was, or may have been, his reason for acting, it is impossible to say, rationally, that he did not act 'in order to' protect property. A purpose can exist only in the mind; it need not have an objective existence. If A sticks pins into a wax model of Buckingham Palace in order to destroy it, all reasonable people will agree that the act does not imperil the Palace. 'Objectively' the act is quite harmless; but no amount of objectivity can alter the fact that A acts 'in order to' destroy property if that is why he is acting. Similarly, if he acts in order to protect property. This issue should be assessed on D's subjective belief.

It may be that all three cases above can be justified without the need to interpret 'in order to' as having an objective meaning. The more acceptable basis for the decisions is that in each case the need, even as asserted by the defendants, was not an immediate need.¹¹²

'In immediate need of protection'

The courts' importation of an objective element into this question of D's alleged belief that the property was 'in immediate need of protection' is also difficult to reconcile with the statutory language but is, in policy terms, easier to justify.

Under s 5(2)(b)(i) and (ii) it is irrelevant that the belief was wholly unreasonable if it was, or may have been, actually held. Unreasonableness is only evidence which assists the trier of fact in determining the ultimate question: whether the belief was honestly held or not. But, once D's belief is ascertained, however unreasonable the existence of the belief, the question whether it is a belief of the kind specified in the section is an objective question—a question of law or, perhaps, mixed fact and law. Whether the need for protection, as seen by D, is an 'immediate' need is a question for the court or jury. For example, if Johnson had said that he believed his goods would be in need of protection when he moved them into the premises in a week's time, the court may believe him but not accept that this belief is a belief in an 'immediate' need for protection.

The courts followed the approach in Hill and Hall to deny the defence where protestors had caused criminal damage as a symbolic gesture of protest where there was no 'direct and proximate' threat to their property.¹¹³ In Jones, D was convicted of causing £65,000-worth of damage to council premises in a protest over planning permission. Buxton LJ¹¹⁴ accepted that the objective evaluation of beliefs in the defence was no different from the court deciding whether a defendant's claim that his intent was to break the victim's nose amounted in ¹¹¹ In Chamberlain v Lindon [1998] 1 WLR 1252, n 100, it was held that it was immaterial that D may have had a second purpose of avoiding civil litigation. This attitude has not been reflected in other cases, including Mitchell [2004] Crim LR 139 where the court rejected the common law defence of recaption where D had removed wheel clamps. Self-help is a last resort, but see Unsworth v DPP [2010] EWHC 3037 (Admin).

¹¹² In Chamberlain v Lindon, n 111, it was held that D, within the meaning of the Act, believed the right of way was in immediate need of protection because the wall across it was an existing obstruction and delay would be evidence of acquiescence in it.

¹¹³ Jones [2003] EWCA Crim 894.

¹¹⁴ Citing this part of the 10th edition of this book with approval.

law to grievous bodily harm.¹¹⁵ The absence of any 'immediate' need for protection has also been used by the courts to prevent defendants relying on s 5(2)(b) when they have damaged wheel clamps attached to their vehicles.¹¹⁶

Belief in the reasonableness of the action

Once again the subjective terms of s 5(2)(b) need to be emphasized. There is no requirement that D's belief be reasonable, still less that D's conduct must meet some objective standard of reasonableness. The section does require that D must believe that it was reasonable for him to do as he did. In theory, D might justify destroying an oil refinery because he believes its effluent is damaging his geraniums. However, a jury is unlikely to believe he did think, or could possibly have thought, that this was reasonable.¹¹⁷ This example was discussed in *DPP v Unsworth*¹¹⁸ where the court quashed D's conviction for criminal damage to her neighbour's trees which D claimed to have cut down to protect the right to light that D believed she had. The defence had been misapplied at trial. Munby LJ pointed out that:

The protection, the safeguard, against such extravagant attempts to rely upon the defence is of course, . . . that a jury is unlikely in the circumstances postulated to believe that the defendant did think or could possibly have thought that what he was doing was reasonable.¹¹⁹

The problem is that in practice, because of the theoretical availability of such a defence, protestors are able to advance the plea at trial, and maintain maximum publicity for their cause throughout the trial.

Relationship with other defences

Section 5(2)(b) is in line with general principles of defences insofar as it relates to beliefs in facts or circumstances. However, it goes well beyond the norm by providing that D's belief that the means employed were reasonable will excuse him. This must be contrasted with the position in self-defence/prevention of crime where D may use such force as is found by a jury to be reasonable in the circumstances which D believed to exist.¹²⁰ In self-defence, D's belief in the trigger for the defence is assessed on a subjective basis but the response to it is assessed objectively. The disparity between the 1971 Act and the common law was acknowledged in DPP v Bayer,¹²¹ where Brooke LJ noted that the degree of incoherence provided a further illustration of the urgent need for codification.

The breadth of the defence in s 5(2) may be thought to carry subjectivity to excessive lengths. It departs from the general principle of criminal law that standards are set by the law, in practice by the jury or magistrates, not by every person for himself. The effect may be that D's right under s 5 to use force to defend his dog, which is property, may be more fully protected by the law than his right relying on private defence to use force to defend his child, who is not property.¹²²

¹¹⁵ Jones [2003] ECWA Crim 894, [19].

¹¹⁶ See Lloyd v DPP [1992] 1 All ER 982; Mitchell [2004] Crim LR 139.

¹¹⁷ Hunt might be different. There was some evidence that efforts had been made to get the council to repair the fire alarm but these had proved unavailing. D may thus have reached the end of his tether and his claim that he believed the action reasonable might carry some credibility.

¹¹⁸ [2010] EWHC 3037 (Admin). ¹¹⁹ At [42].

¹²⁰ See p 380. Note that an apparent attempt in Scarlett [1993] 4 All ER 629 to introduce a similar subjective standard into the law of self-defence and prevention of crime has been resoundingly rejected. See now the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008, s 76.

¹²¹ [2004] 1 Cr App R 38, [2004] Crim LR 663. Some of the broader statements in Bayer regarding defences were doubted in Cresswell, n 41.

¹²² Section 5(2)(b) does not apply to damage to property in order to protect a person: Baker and Wilkins [1997] Crim LR 497.

Prophylactic measures in defence of property

D may not destroy or damage property of another merely because he honestly believes that harm may occur to D's property at some time in the future. On the other hand, it is not unlawful for D to take defensive measures in relation to his own property. It is an offence under s 31 of the OAPA 1861 to set traps so as to endanger life,¹²³ and it is an offence under s 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 to destroy or damage property intending or being reckless as to the endangerment of life,¹²⁴ but it is not otherwise an offence merely to take defensive measures (to set broken glass on walls, erect spiked fences, etc) for the purpose of discouraging or preventing incursions by persons on their property.¹²⁵ In such cases, the question of criminal liability can arise only where some harm is caused to the person or property of another.

So far as harm to another's property is concerned, D will ordinarily have taken his defensive or protective measures at some stage before his property was in 'immediate need of protection', and when the harm occurs D may be absent and unaware of it. It is submitted that where what D has done is a normal method of protecting property, say a barbed wire fence erected by D, a farmer, he would not be liable though a trespasser tears his best suit in climbing through the fence, notwithstanding that D himself could not have justified ripping open the trespasser's suit as a use of reasonable force to eject him.¹²⁶ But where D adopts unusual defensive measures, say traps calculated to maim animals, it would normally not be difficult to show that he did not honestly believe this was a reasonable way to protect his property. In determining whether D thought the protective measure was reasonable, regard would be had to D's knowledge of the risk of accidental as opposed to deliberate trespass, of the risk to children not capable of looking properly to their own protection, of the propensities of the particular dog and other similar factors.

What of D who leaves an unchained dog loose on his premises overnight? That would be an offence under the Guard Dogs Act,¹²⁷ but would he be liable under the Criminal Damage Act if property is damaged by the dog attacking a trespasser? The question would be whether the owner believed that the keeping of an uncontrolled guard dog was reasonable having regard to all the circumstances.¹²⁸

Another common case calling for the protection of property is where a dog is worrying livestock. In such a case, s 5(2)(b) will ordinarily provide a lawful excuse for the killing of the dog. The civil law provides further protection.¹²⁹ The law in such circumstances is ¹²³ See Cockburn [2008] EWCA Crim 316.

¹²⁴ See p 1089.

¹²⁵ cf potential civil liability under the Occupiers' Liability Act 1984, on which see E Peel and J Goudkamp, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (19th edn, 2014) Ch 9.

¹²⁶ Note the specific powers to remove trespassers under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s 69.

¹²⁷ The Guard Dogs Act 1975 makes it a summary offence, punishable by a fine, to use or permit the use of a guard dog (ie a dog kept for the purpose of protecting persons or property or a person guarding the same) unless a person capable of controlling the dog, the handler, is present and controlling it, except where the dog is secured and not at liberty to go about the premises: see ss 1, 5 and Hobson v Gledhill [1978] 1 WLR 215, DC. The Act shall not be construed as conferring any civil right of action, or as derogating from any remedy (whether civil or criminal) in proceedings instituted otherwise than by virtue of the Act: s 5(2).

¹²⁸ In Cummings v Granger, the Court of Appeal held that keeping an uncontrolled guard dog was not, in the circumstances of that case, unreasonable; and conduct is not necessarily unreasonable even though it involves a breach of the criminal law. Cf Buckoke v Greater London Council [1971] 1 Ch 655, CA, p 370.

¹²⁹ Under the Animals Act 1971, s 9, D has a defence to a civil claim in this situation provided that D is a person entitled to act for the protection of the livestock and that he gives notice within 48 hours to the officer in charge of a police station of the killing or injury. That is true even if the dog has been worrying livestock—so there is no current threat to D's sheep: s 9(3)(b). It is submitted that in these circumstances D would commit no criminal offence. See the discussion of Workman v Cowper [1961] 1 All ER 683.

further complicated by the availability of charges under the Animal Welfare Act 2006, but no offence is committed if an animal is destroyed in an appropriate and humane manner.¹³⁰

Protecting interests that D believes he has

In most cases no doubt D will be the owner of the property which he seeks to protect, but even if D is not the owner he will not incur criminal liability if he honestly believes himself to be the owner and the other circumstances set out in the section exist.

The scope of the defence under s 5(2)(b) is again rather surprising. By s 5(4), property is expressly defined to include any right or privilege in or over land. Consequently, D commits no crime where, honestly but mistakenly believing he has a right of way across V's land, he tears down a hut erected by V which, as D thinks, obstructs his imagined right of way. Moreover, D is in the same position where he believes that he has a right or interest in property which he protects, but that imagined right is not a right or interest which is recognized by law. D has a defence in such a case because by s 5(3) it is immaterial whether a belief is justified or not so long as it is honestly held. Suppose, for example, that D has a right to kill and take game on O's land, and D kills V's dog which he sees chasing and destroying game. In such a case, D has in law no right or interest in property to protect; until D himself reduces the game into his possession (ie shoots it) he has no proprietary interest in it whatever.¹³¹ But if D believes he has a right or interest in the game, he would incur no criminal liability in killing V's dog provided the other circumstances required for the defence exist.¹³² In such a case as this, D's belief that he has a right in property to protect is understandable, but even if D's belief is absurd it suffices to provide him with the defence if honestly held.

Protecting interests of others

The position is essentially the same where D claims to act to protect the property of another. An employee who caused damage to V's property in defending property belonging to his employer would commit no offence given his belief that the measures were reasonable and were immediately needed. But there need be no nexus whatever between the person intervening to protect the property and the owner of it. An officious bystander who chooses to intervene to protect the property of another will be free from criminal liability if he acts honestly on the same terms.

D must have at least a belief that there is some property interest that he is protecting. Thus, the defence was correctly held to be unavailable where D decapitated a statue of Baroness Thatcher. He explained his motive as being that he held her responsible for developments in world politics with which he disagreed and that he genuinely feared for the future of his son growing up in this world.¹³³ D had no belief that he was protecting property.

27.1.5.3 Cases not falling within the Act

By its terms, s 5(2) recognizes that there may be other circumstances which would constitute lawful excuse on a charge of criminal damage, and s 5(5) further provides:

¹³⁰ Section 4(4). ¹³¹ A point echoed in Cresswell at [41].

¹³² On the facts of Gott v Measures [1948] 1 KB 234, DC, D would now be acquitted.

¹³³ Kelleher [2003] EWCA Crim 2486. Bizarrely, at his first trial the prosecution conceded the defence of 'lawful excuse' under s 5(2)(b) was available to D. As an indication of the difficulty if these defences are allowed to go to the jury in cases of protest, it should be noted that in that first trial the jury failed to reach a verdict. The Court of Appeal has confirmed that Kelleher is one of those exceptional cases in which the judge was correct to rule that the explanation advanced by D was incapable in law of amounting to a lawful excuse. The fact that a defence might be considered by the judge to be hopeless on its merits is not, however, a sufficient reason for it to be withdrawn from the jury. Withdrawing a defence from being considered by the jury is only appropriate if it would be contrary to the 'essential nature and purpose of the offence' for D to advance it successfully. See Asmeron [2013] EWCA Crim 435, [2013] 2 Cr App R 19.

This section shall not be construed as casting any doubt on any defence recognized by law as a defence to criminal charges.

It is clear that certain general defences (eg insanity and duress) are available on a charge of criminal damage and these are discussed elsewhere in this book.¹³⁴ But some particular matters call for further discussion here.

Self-defence, necessity and duress of circumstance

So far as necessity is concerned, the law relating to defence of property is a particular, and well-defined, instance where necessity is recognized as a defence. Are there cases in which it is permissible to destroy or damage property on the grounds of necessity in circumstances which, because there is no defence of property or belief in such a defence on the facts, would not amount to a defence under s 5 of the 1971 Act? As a starting point, it must be obvious that just as harm to the person may be justified on the grounds of self-defence of the person, so too the destruction of or damage to property may be justified in defence of the person.¹³⁵

Where D damages property because he faces (or believes he faces) an attack involving the commission of a crime recognized by English law,¹³⁶ as will be commonly the case, the situation would be covered by s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967.¹³⁷ That section provides D with a defence if he uses such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in the prevention of crime. For example, if V sets his dog to attack D, and D kills the dog, D would not commit an offence of criminal damage if using reasonable force to defend himself. Section 3 in the 1967 Act is narrower than the defence under s 5 of the 1971 Act because s 3 has been interpreted to include an objective requirement of reasonableness.¹³⁸ D could not rely upon this section where the force used is unreasonable even though D himself honestly believed it was reasonable. Thus, there appears to be the odd situation that if D is defending his property it is enough (under s 5) that he honestly believed that the force used was reasonable, but if he is defending his person his honest belief will not save him unless the force used was in fact reasonable in the circumstances.¹³⁹

It may also be noted that s 5(2)(b) of the Criminal Damage Act provides a wider defence in connection with offences of damage to property than is afforded by the common law defence of duress of circumstances. Duress of circumstances is available only where D faces a threat of death or serious bodily harm.¹⁴⁰ But s 5(2)(b), where it applies, permits a purely utilitarian calculation. Suppose there is a flood affecting the properties of X and Y and the fire service is called. Their assessment is that while X's house is not in danger there will be serious damage to Y's house by flooding unless X's fence is knocked down to allow the floodwaters to recede. A few pounds worth of damage needs to be done to the fence in order to prevent damage of several thousand pounds to the house. The firemen ask X for permission to knock down the fence, which he refuses, but the firemen nonetheless knock down the fence.¹⁴¹ The firemen would have a lawful excuse to a charge of criminal damage if damaging the fence is reasonable in the circumstances. But if, additionally, the firemen have to restrain X because he resists their efforts to knock down ¹³⁴ Chs 9 and 10. As to intoxication, see pp 311 et seq.

¹³⁵ So if D lawfully repelling an attack by E causes E to fall through F's window, D cannot be convicted of criminal damage to F's window: Sears v Broome [1986] Crim LR 461, DC.

¹³⁶ Jones [2006] UKHL 16. For more recent discussion, see R (Al Rabbat) v Westminster Magistrates' Court [2017] EWHC 1969 (Admin).

¹³⁷ See p 380. ¹³⁸ See p 397.

¹³⁹ Perhaps, then, if D kills V's dog that has been set upon him, D should say that he feared for the safety of his trousers rather than his ankles! Section 5 would then be available as a defence.

¹⁴⁰ See p 347. ¹⁴¹ The illustration is based on fact except that X readily gave his permission.

the fence they would not be able to avail themselves of the common law defence of duress of circumstances since there is no threat of any harm to the person, let alone death or serious injury. They could rely only on the uncertain common law defence of necessity. If their action were regarded as not merely excused but justified, it may be that X would have no right to use force to defend his property.

Claim of right

It is clear that D cannot commit an offence under s 1(1) of the Act by destroying or damaging property which is, or which he believes to be, his own. The position would appear to be the same where D, though he does not believe he is the owner of the property which he destroys or damages, nevertheless acts under a claim of legal right. In Twose,¹⁴² a case decided under the Malicious Damage Act, where it appeared that persons living near a common had occasionally burnt the furze in order to improve the growth of grass, it was accepted that D's belief in a right to burn the furze would be a good defence though there was no such right. Here D's belief was at least understandable, but in Day,¹⁴³ again under the old law, it was held that D was not guilty of an offence in maiming sheep belonging to V which he had distrained,¹⁴⁴ where he did so in the honest belief that he was entitled to do so upon V's refusal to pay compensation for damage done by the sheep. It would seem clear that cases such as these would be decided in the same way under the Criminal Damage Act where the clear emphasis is upon honest belief in right without any objective qualification.

In similar vein, it is thought that a person who destroys or damages property found by him in circumstances where he believes the owner cannot be traced by taking reasonable steps can no more be convicted of criminal damage than he can be of theft by appropriating the property.

Protest defences

While the foregoing discussion deals with the more obvious categories of lawful excuse for damage to property, there are certainly other cases. Moreover 'lawful excuse', like 'lawful authority or reasonable excuse',¹⁴⁵ may have an inbuilt elasticity which enables courts to stretch it to cover new situations so that it is never possible to close the categories that might constitute lawful excuse.

Criminal damage is commonly committed in the course of political protest, as in the cases of Hill and Hall, Jones and Kelleher. The courts have also dealt with two different claims of defence to charges under the Act. First, although accepting that an act of criminal damage (eg the snipping of wire fence at a nuclear weapons base) could be regarded as an act of expression for the purposes of Art 10 of the ECHR,¹⁴⁶ the courts have held that the criminalization of such activity is a proportionate response to the legitimate aims within Art 10(2).¹⁴⁷

Secondly, the courts have rejected attempts to argue that the commission of criminal damage is lawfully excused when done in response to actions of the State which D believes to be contrary to international law.¹⁴⁸ In Pritchard and others,¹⁴⁹ the conduct involved possession of articles to cause damage on an RAF base. The defendants pleaded that the action

¹⁴² (1879) 14 Cox CC 327. ¹⁴³ (1844) 8 JP 186.

¹⁴⁴ Taken out of V's possession pending compensation.

¹⁴⁵ See p 751.

¹⁴⁶ See Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

¹⁴⁷ Hutchinson v Newbury Magistrates' Court (2000) The Independent, 20 Nov.

¹⁴⁸ Early cases on this included Hutchinson v Newbury Magistrates' Court (2000) The Independent, 20 Nov; Pritchard and others [2004] EWCA Crim 1981.

¹⁴⁹ [2004] EWCA Crim 1981.

was necessary and lawful to attempt to prevent what they believed was the UK's unlawful act of war against Iraq. At first instance, Grigson J held that the non-justiciability of the legality of the war did not preclude reliance on s 5 defences. On an interlocutory appeal, the Court of Appeal held that the s 5 defence would be available to D irrespective of the determination as to the legality of the war. D is entitled to defend his property against threats of a non-criminal and even of a lawful nature. The only objective element in the defence in s 5(2)(b) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 was whether it could be said that, on the facts as the defendant believed them to be, the criminal damage alleged could amount to something done to protect another's property; subject to that, the court and the jury were concerned simply with the question of a defendant's honestly held beliefs. The judge was therefore right to rule that no issue arose in relation to this defence which involved consideration of the legality of the war in Iraq. The House of Lords in the conjoined appeals of Jones and Ayliffe,¹⁵⁰ subsequently dealt with the appeals in these and related cases on the basis of pleas of necessity and self-defence (rather than under s 5) concluding that a belief in a need to protect property from action which D believes constitutes a crime in international law could not found a defence in English law.¹⁵¹

27.2 Destroying or damaging property with intent to endanger life

Section 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 provides:

A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property, whether belonging to himself or another—

- (a) intending to destroy or damage any property or being reckless as to whether any property would be destroyed or damaged; and
- (b) intending by the destruction or damage to endanger the life of another or being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered;

shall be guilty of an offence.¹⁵²

By s 4, the offence is punishable by imprisonment for life. The section creates aggravated offences of criminal damage and arson.¹⁵³

This subsection incorporates what is essentially an offence against the person into the Criminal Damage Act. The Law Commission was aware of this and expected that the matter would be reviewed when offences against the person were reformed.¹⁵⁴ That has not occurred.

The actus reus is the destruction of or damage to property. The destruction or damage which occurs in fact may be quite different from that envisaged by D. Where there is such a difference, it is the destruction or damage which D intended, or as to which he was reckless, to which we must look in order to determine whether he intended to endanger, or ¹⁵⁰ [2006] UKHL 16, [2007] AC 136.

¹⁵¹ On the Court of Appeal's decision, see R Cryer, 'War and Armed Conflict: Aggression at the Court of Appeal' (2005) 10 J of Conflict and Security Law 209.

¹⁵² See DW Elliott, 'Endangering Life by Destroying or Damaging Property' [1997] Crim LR 382.

¹⁵³ The trial of a person accused of arson being reckless as to whether life would be endangered must be heard by a full-time judge: Jones (Stephen) (1999) The Times, 20 May, CA.

¹⁵⁴ LC 29, para 27.

was reckless whether he endangered, the life of another.¹⁵⁵ Thus, if D aimed to throw his petrol bomb through the window of an occupied house, but the bomb hits the outer wall causing only trivial damage to the target, it is D's intended damage to the interior which is relevant. The question is as to D's state of mind when he did the act and we cannot, at that point, know for certain what, if any, destruction or damage will be caused. The offence is not committed unless D's act caused some destruction or damage—there must be an actus reus—but whether the terms of s 1(2)(b) are satisfied has been predetermined. The nature of the destruction or damage actually caused may be very good evidence of what D intended, or of his recklessness, but that is all.

The actus reus does not require that any life is in fact endangered. Thus, in Parker,¹⁵⁶ D was convicted under s 1(2) of criminal damage, being reckless as to the endangerment of his neighbours' lives when he started a fire in his semi-detached house. The fact that the neighbours were absent and therefore never at risk did not preclude conviction.

The life that D must intend or be reckless about endangering by the damage he intends or is reckless about causing must be the life of another.¹⁵⁷ So, D's conviction was quashed where, in order to commit suicide following the break-up of his marriage, he set fire to his own car when he was in it or close to it, but parked 7–8 metres away from his wife's house. There was no evidence of an intent to endanger any life but his own by the damage that he intended to his own car in that position.¹⁵⁸

The most controversial aspect of the offence is that it requires 'a dismal distinction'.¹⁵⁹ In Steer,¹⁶⁰ it was held that the offence requires intention or recklessness as to the endangering of life by the damaging or destruction of property, not merely by D's act. D fired rifle shots at the windows of a house occupied by V, against whom he had a grudge. The House of Lords held that the charge under s 1(2) was misconceived. Danger to life was caused by the bullets, not by any damage to the windows or property in the bedroom. The question, as we have seen, is not whether or how life was endangered in fact, but what D intended, or as to what result he was reckless.¹⁶¹ While there was certainly cogent evidence that D was reckless as to danger to life from the bullets, he did not commit the offence unless he foresaw danger to life from, say, flying broken glass and there was no evidence of that. The contrary interpretation would also produce potential anomalies. Lord Bridge gave an example of A and B firing bullets into the air, being reckless whether life was endangered. It would be absurd if A alone was liable because only his bullet damaged property.

In Webster, D pushed a heavy stone from a bridge onto a passenger train passing below. Only a corner of the stone penetrated the roof but the passengers were showered with glass fibre and other material. The judge failed to direct the jury that D was guilty only if his mens rea was as to the endangerment of life from the damage to the carriage, not merely from the stone, so the conviction had to be quashed. In Warwick,¹⁶² D drove a stolen car from which E threw bricks at a pursuing police car, smashing a window and showering officers with glass. It was held that there was evidence from which a jury could infer recklessness whether the police driver might lose control through being so showered, thus endangering ¹⁵⁵ Dudley [1989] Crim LR 57 and commentary as cited with approval by the Court of Appeal in Webster and Warwick. The requirement is to be at least reckless as to the endangerment of the life of another. Suicide attempts with explosions and fire, etc may suffice if D is reckless as to nearby residents, etc.

¹⁵⁶ [1993] Crim LR 856.

¹⁵⁷ Thakar [2010] EWCA Crim 2136.

¹⁵⁸ T was drunk and it would have been open to T to argue that his consumption of a bottle and a half of vodka prevented him forming mens rea: reckless aggravated criminal damage being a specific intent offence according to Heard [2008] QB 43. See Ch 9.

¹⁵⁹ Webster and Warwick [1995] 2 All ER 168 at 173.

¹⁶⁰ [1988] AC 111, HL.

¹⁶¹ Dudley [1989] Crim LR 57.

¹⁶² [1995] 1 Cr App R 492. Similar incidents are not uncommon—see eg Ratcliffe [2008] EWCA Crim 471.

life. Recklessness whether he might lose control through being hit by the brick would not be enough. The distinction applied in each of these cases is indeed 'dismal' but inevitable on the proper construction of the Act.

The fact that the damage may be to D's own property adds to the anomalous nature of the offence.¹⁶³ Suppose that D, the owner of a house, removing unwanted electrical equipment belonging to him, cuts a cable also belonging to him and exposes the live wire in such a way that he foresees a risk to the life of another. The actus reus is the 'damage' to the cable. It is no answer that the cable belongs to D and that he is entitled to cut the cable if he wants to. It seems extraordinary that this should be an offence of damage to property, but that seems to be the implication of Merrick.¹⁶⁴ O, a householder, employed D to remove old television cable. D did so, leaving the live cable exposed for six minutes. His conviction was upheld. It would appear that the result would have been the same if O had done the act himself instead of through an agent. It would be understandable if the offence were simply the endangering of life; but the gravamen of the conduct in a case like Merrick has nothing to do with damage to property. Why should it be different if the danger arose not from cutting old cable but from the installation of new? The implications of the result are 'absurd and alarming'.¹⁶⁵

The offence has features both of an offence against property and an offence against the person. In some circumstances (as where D severs the brake cable of V's car intending V to drive to his death), the offence will overlap with the offence of attempted murder, but it is wider than attempted murder in two respects. One is that it does not require the intent to kill which is necessary on a charge of attempted murder;¹⁶⁶ intention or recklessness as to the endangering of life will suffice. On facts such as those occurring in Cunningham,¹⁶⁷ for example, it could be that when D severed the gas pipe he did not intend to asphyxiate V but was reckless whether her life would be endangered; he would not be guilty of attempted murder but he would be guilty of the s 1(2) offence under the Criminal Damage Act.¹⁶⁸ The other is that the offence under s 1(2) may be committed where the acts done by D are too remote to constitute an attempt¹⁶⁹ to murder. If, for example, D were to sever the brake cable of O's car intending thereafter to induce V to drive the car to his death, D's act of damaging the car might be too preparatory to support a charge of attempting to murder V but it would support a charge under the 1971 Act.

Certain general features of the offence under s 1(2) (eg destruction or damage, property, intention and recklessness) are the same as for the offence under s 1(1) which has already been discussed. The following additional matters need to be discussed in relation to the offence under s 1(2).

27.2.1 Intention and recklessness

Intention and recklessness in relation to destroying or damaging property have been discussed previously.¹⁷⁰ That discussion applies to intention and recklessness in relation to ¹⁶³ There have been a number of cases in which D has set fire to his own property intent on committing suicide, and has been reckless as to the endangerment of neighbours' lives: eg Brewis [2004] EWCA Crim 1919. Cf Harris [2013] EWCA Crim 223 and Ch 9, p 313.

¹⁶⁴ [1996] 1 Cr App R 130, [1995] Crim LR 802.

¹⁶⁵ Elliott [1997] Crim LR 382 at 389. Note that the mens rea at that time was Caldwell recklessness.

¹⁶⁶ See p 412. ¹⁶⁷ [1957] 2 QB 396, p 102.

¹⁶⁸ And also, of course, of the offence under s 23 of the OAPA 1861. It might be noted in passing that the toxic elements are now removed from gas used for domestic purposes and natural gas does not contain them; hence domestic gas can cause death only by asphyxiation, and even this risk is almost nil. But there remains a very high risk of explosion which is a serious danger to life.

¹⁶⁹ See p 412. ¹⁷⁰ At p 1076.

endangering the life of another,¹⁷¹ and reference may also be made to the general discussion of intention and recklessness elsewhere in this book.¹⁷² It need not be shown that life was in fact endangered by the damage nor that the damage in fact done created any risk to life so long as D, by damaging the property, intended or was reckless as to the endangering of life.¹⁷³ Where D starts a fire in an unoccupied building with no one present, he might be reckless whether he endangers the lives of firemen, if he foresees a risk of a life being endangered by the damage.

Recklessness, following G, is subjective. In Cooper,¹⁷⁴ the Court of Appeal suggested that the risk be one that was 'obvious and significant' to D. Thus, where D has realized that there is a risk but has dismissed it as negligible, it could not be said that he was taking an obvious and significant risk. This is an unusual interpretation of the subjective form of recklessness. It is submitted that the correct test is whether D has foreseen a risk of life being endangered by the damage that he intends or about which he is reckless and that he takes that risk unjustifiably. In Castle,¹⁷⁵ D had burgled an empty office and started a fire. That spread to the unoccupied residential flats above. D pleaded guilty to burglary but denied reckless endangerment as he claimed to have been unaware that there were residential flats above the office. The Court of Appeal confirmed that the question should have been whether D had acted recklessly with respect to: a circumstance when he was aware of a risk that had or would have existed; or a result when he was aware of a risk that it would occur, and it was in the circumstances known to him, unreasonable to take the risk.

Following the Court of Appeal's decision in Heard,¹⁷⁶ the element of intention or recklessness as to endangering life is an ulterior mens rea which means that it is not a basic intent but is a specific intent crime. Voluntary intoxication is available as a plea by D where his intoxication was such that he did not appreciate the risk of endangering life.

There must be a causal connection between the destroying or damaging of the property and the intended or reckless endangerment of life. If, to extend an example used earlier, D were to damage the lock in the process of entering V's garage in order to sever the brake cable of V's car, there would be no offence under s 1(2). D intends to damage the lock and he further intends to endanger V's life, but he does not intend 'by the destruction or damage to endanger the life of' V. It is only when D damages the brake cable that he would commit the offence under s 1(2). So, in Steer,¹⁷⁷ it was held that the offence was not committed where D fired off some shots at the bedroom window where V and his wife were standing. While D must have foreseen that the shooting would cause damage by smashing the bedroom window and also endanger the lives of V and his wife, D would not have foreseen that their lives would be endangered by the damage to the window, because it was not by that damage that they were, or were likely to be, endangered. In Wenton,¹⁷⁸ D smashed a window in V's house in which V was present with children. D then threw through the window a petrol can and a burning piece of paper. The paper did not ignite the petrol canister. No fire ensued. He was convicted of an offence under s 1(2) of the 1971 Act, namely reckless aggravated criminal damage. D appealed arguing that the damage that he caused and about which he was reckless was the broken window; there was no life endangered by that nor did he intend or was he reckless whether life would be endangered ¹⁷¹ Hardie [1985] 1 WLR 64, CA. ¹⁷² See Ch 3.

¹⁷³ Sangha [1988] 2 All ER 385, CA; Dudley [1989] Crim LR 57, CA. The definition of recklessness applied was that under Caldwell.

¹⁷⁴ [2004] EWCA Crim 1382. ¹⁷⁵ [2004] All ER (D) 289 (Oct).

¹⁷⁶ [2007] EWCA Crim 125, [2007] Crim LR 654. ¹⁷⁷ [1988] AC 111, HL.

¹⁷⁸ [2010] EWCA Crim 2361.

by that damage to the window. The Court of Appeal accepted this ground of appeal and quashed the conviction.¹⁷⁹

On the other hand, it may be that if, having destroyed or damaged property belonging to V (eg having set fire to V's premises), D subsequently realizes that V's life is in danger, D would commit the offence under s 1(2), if, provided it lies within D's power to prevent or minimize the further harm, he then omits to do so, intending that or being reckless whether, V's life should be endangered.¹⁸⁰

In A-G's Reference (No 3 of 1992),¹⁸¹ it was said that the property which D intends to damage need not be the same as the property which endangers life, instancing the case of a man who cuts the rope (the first property) of a crane, causing its load to crush the roof of a car (the second property) which kills the driver. But this seems to make far too heavy weather of the problem. Cutting the rope damages the crane, of which the rope is part, and the question then is whether D foresaw that the damaged crane might endanger life. It makes no difference whether the danger arises from the falling object or the car roof—it is caused by the damage to the crane.

27.2.2 Lawful excuse

Since the gist of the offence under s 1(2) lies in intending or being reckless as to the endangering of life by destroying or damaging property, it is understandable that D may commit the offence whether he destroys or damages the property of another or himself. The risk is just the same whether D severs the brake cable on V's car, or severs the brake cable on his own car before lending it to V to drive.

It is equally understandable that the partial definition of lawful excuse in s 5(2) should not be applicable here, and s 5 does not apply to offences under s 1(2). It ought not to be a defence to an offence of this nature that, say, D, with the assent of E, severed the brake cable on E's car before lending it to V to drive. Equally, D ought to have no lawful excuse in damaging property, although done for the purpose of protecting other property, where in so doing he knowingly creates a risk to life.

Clearly, then, the intention in framing the offence under s 1(2) was that certain matters (eg destruction by D of his own property, destruction with owner's consent, destruction in defence of property) which constitute lawful excuse where D is charged with an offence under s 1(1) do not constitute lawful excuse where D is charged under s 1(2). This does not mean that there can never be a lawful excuse where D is charged under s 1(2), because s 1(2) expressly states that the offence may be committed only by one 'who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property'. It follows that there may be circumstances, presumably of an exceptional character, where D would have lawful excuse for destroying or damaging property even though he does it realizing that he may endanger life. An exceptional case of this character would be where D damages property in self-defence; when it is legitimate for D to kill in order to prevent himself being killed, D would not commit an offence under s 1(2) because he happened to use, and damage, property belonging to another in killing his ¹⁷⁹ Is it impossible to argue that: (a) the canister and petrol were property; (b) D intended to damage that property by fire; (c) he did cause some damage to that property; (d) he intended by the damage to the canister and the petrol that a life would be endangered? Equally can it be argued: (a) the canister and petrol were property; (b) D was reckless whether the petrol and canister would be damaged; (c) he damaged the property; and (d) he was reckless whether a life would be endangered by the damage about which he was reckless? Or was it an attempt?

¹⁸⁰ Miller [1983] 1 All ER 978, HL, p 54.

¹⁸¹ (1993) 98 Cr App R 383, [1994] Crim LR 348. The case was primarily concerned with the law of attempt, p 412.

attacker.¹⁸² Similarly, the police might have lawful excuse for damaging property where this was done to prevent the commission of a serious crime against the person, even though what was done might endanger the life of the criminal. And if necessity is a defence where D chooses to put one life at risk in order to save many others,¹⁸³ it would extend to damaging property to do so.

27.2.3 Endangerment offences

The problems of the s 1(2) offence stem in part from the confusion between its objective in penalizing endangerment, and the requirement for that endangerment to be founded on damage to property.¹⁸⁴ This has called some to question why English law does not adopt a general offence of life endangerment, and this is certainly an issue which deserves further consideration by the Law Commission.¹⁸⁵ To date, English law has created endangerment offences only in relation to specific activities, for example causing explosions¹⁸⁶ or specific circumstances such as behaviour on an aircraft.¹⁸⁷ There is no general property endangerment offence.¹⁸⁸

27.3 Arson

There is a separate offence of arson—that is, of destroying or damaging property by fire¹⁸⁹—in the Act despite the Law Commission's view that this was unnecessary.¹⁹⁰ Parliament preferred a specific offence.¹⁹¹

Section 1(3) of the Act provides:

An offence committed under this section by destroying or damaging property by fire shall be charged as arson.

And by s 4 it is punishable by imprisonment for life. Arguably, the retention of a separate offence was desirable to provide a more appropriate label and reflect public anxiety about ¹⁸² cf Sears v Broome [1986] Crim LR 461, DC.

¹⁸³ See p 367.

¹⁸⁴ Despite its name, it is debatable whether it is properly regarded as an endangerment offence in every case in which it can apply. See further RA Duff, 'Criminalising Endangerment' in Duff and Green, Defining Crimes. Duff distinguishes between crimes of attack where the intention is to harm some value of interest (and which be un consummated as in an attempt) and endangerment offences proper which arise where D creates a significant risk that another will suffer harm. See also RA Duff, 'Criminalising Endangerment' (2005) 65 La L Rev 941.

¹⁸⁵ This was an issue considered by the Law Commission in its most recent work on reforming offences against the person. See LCCP 217, Reform of Offences Against the Person: A Scoping Consultation Paper (2014) and LC 361, Reform of Offences Against the Person (2015). See generally KJM Smith, 'Liability for Endangerment: English Ad Hoc Pragmatism and American Innovation' [1983] Crim LR 127; D Lanham, 'Danger Down Under' [1999] Crim LR 960. The dangers are that such offences over-criminalize and render the law too vague. See generally D Husak, Overcriminalization (2008) 162–163.

¹⁸⁶ Explosive Substances Act 1883, s 2.

¹⁸⁷ Aviation Security Act 1982, ss 2–3. See R (Hilali) v Governor of Whitemoor Prison [2008] 1 AC 805.

¹⁸⁸ cf the Scottish Draft Criminal Code, cl 82 which provides for causing a risk of unlawful damage to property.

¹⁸⁹ LC 29, paras 28–33.

¹⁹⁰ The Commission proposed that such conduct would be punishable on indictment by imprisonment for life. This seemed a sensible way to meet the case and avoided complication of the substantive law.

¹⁹¹ See HC, 19 May 1971, vol 817, cols 1433 et seq. The reasons given for singling out damage by fire would be equally applicable to singling out damage by explosives; that 'arson' is such a splendidly evocative term cannot have been unimportant in securing its retention.

the offence. Arson remains disturbingly prevalent, particularly in certain types of property such as schools.

The provision is a mandatory one—‘shall be charged as arson’. Where D destroys or damages property by fire the proper course would appear to be to charge him with an offence under s 1(3).¹⁹² Where there is also an allegation of endangerment, there should be separate counts of arson with intent to endanger life and of arson being reckless that life is endangered.¹⁹³

The general features of arson are the same as for the offences under s 1(1) and s 1(2) except that the destruction or damage is to be by fire. For the offence to be complete some property must be destroyed or damaged by fire. The damage may, of course, be quite insignificant (eg it would be enough that wood is charred)¹⁹⁴ but there must be some damage by fire; it would not be enough that property is merely blackened by smoke though there might well be an attempt in such a case. D must intend, or be reckless as to, destruction or damage by fire. So if D, aided by E, throws a bottle which, unknown to E, D filled with petrol in order to set fire to V’s house, D may be convicted of arson but E may not.¹⁹⁵ E, however, may be convicted of simple criminal damage in respect of any damage caused by the throwing of the bottle.

27.4 Racially or religiously aggravated criminal damage

Section 30 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (as amended)¹⁹⁶ provides:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he commits an offence under section 1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 (destroying or damaging property belonging to another) which is racially or religiously aggravated for the purposes of this section.

Definitions of ‘racially aggravated’ and ‘religiously aggravated’ and a discussion of the racial and religious aggravation offences in general are set out in Ch 16. The offence is punishable on summary conviction by imprisonment for six months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both, and, on conviction on indictment, by imprisonment for 14 years or a fine or both. The racial or religious hostility must be roughly contemporaneous with the damage being caused.¹⁹⁷

27.5 Threats to destroy or damage property

Section 2 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 provides:

¹⁹² Booth [1999] Crim LR 144. Booth was distinguished in Drayton [2005] EWCA Crim 2013. D was charged under s 1(1) and (3) of the 1971 Act, but the word ‘arson’ did not appear in the information. The Court of Appeal held that the charge was in that context in the magistrates’ court a valid charge. The use of the word ‘arson’ was described as desirable. The information alleged ‘damage by fire’ and that was synonymous with arson. It complied with the requirements of the Criminal Procedure Rules 2005, r 7.2 (now reproduced in the Criminal Procedure Rules 2015).

¹⁹³ In sentencing, the court has the more specific verdict of the jury: Hoof (1980) 72 Cr App R 126, CA. But cf Flitter [2001] Crim LR 328.

¹⁹⁴ cf Parker (1839) 9 C & P 45. No visible flame is necessary: Stallion (1833) 1 Mood CC 398.

¹⁹⁵ Cooper (G) and Cooper (Y) [1991] Crim LR 524, CA.

¹⁹⁶ By the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, s 39(5)(b) and (6)(b).

¹⁹⁷ Parry v DPP [2004] EWHC 3112 (Admin) (20-minute delay between throwing nail varnish on V’s door and calling him an Irish so-and-so). See also Babbs [2007] All ER (D) 383 (Oct), where D’s hostility although not contemporaneous, was evinced over a continuing period. See LC 348, Hate Crime: Should the Current Offences be Extended? (2014).

A person who without lawful excuse makes to another a threat, intending that that other would fear it would be carried out—

- (a) to destroy or damage any property belonging to that other or a third person;^[198] or
- (b) to destroy or damage his own property in a way which he knows is likely to endanger the life of that other or a third person;

shall be guilty of an offence.

The offence is punishable by a maximum ten years' imprisonment: s 4(2).

27.5.1 The conduct threatened

In order to constitute an offence under this section the conduct threatened must be conduct that would be an offence under s 1. D would commit the offence where, without lawful excuse, he threatened to destroy or damage the property of another (whether property of the person threatened or of a third party), or where he threatened to destroy or damage his own property in a way which he knows is likely to endanger the life of another (whether the life of a person threatened or the life of a third party).

If D is charged under s 2(a), 'lawful excuse' has the meaning ascribed to it by s 5 so that D would not commit an offence where, for example, he threatens to shoot V's dog should he find it attacking his sheep.¹⁹⁹ But by s 5(1) the partial definition of lawful excuse in the section does not apply to an offence 'involving a threat by the person charged to destroy or damage property in a way which he knows is likely to endanger the life of another . . .'. This does not mean that there cannot be a lawful excuse for an offence under s 2(b), merely that the partial definition of lawful excuse in s 5 cannot apply.²⁰⁰ Where D threatens to destroy property of another with intent to endanger life he would have to be charged under s 2(a), and cannot be charged under s 2(b). Curiously, it would seem that if in such a case D is charged under s 2(a) there would be a lawful excuse if it appeared that he believed the owner would have consented to the threatened destruction or damage (s 5(2)(a)), but if he is charged under s 2(b) it would not be a lawful excuse that he was threatening to destroy his own property. But the distinction can be of small practical importance: if D threatens to destroy V's property in order to endanger the life of X then it would be difficult to show that D honestly believed that V would have consented to the threatened destruction 'had [V] known of the destruction or damage and its circumstances', that is, the endangerment of X's life.²⁰¹

27.5.2 The threat

The threat may take any form. The Law Commission said:

There seems to be no good ground for limiting threats to written threats, for a telephonic threat, particularly if repeated, can cause more alarm in the recipient than any written threat. If the law is to be extended to cover telephonic threats, then logically there is no reason why it should not ¹⁹⁸ The Court of Appeal has confirmed that the offence in s 2(1)(a) is an offence solely concerned with damage to property and does not involve an assault on, or injury, or threat to, a third party within the meaning of s 80(2A)(b) of PACE 1984. For this reason, if the threat is directed at D's spouse or civil partner he is not a compellable witness. This is not so if D is charged with an offence contrary to s 2(1)(b). See A (B) [2012] EWCA Crim 1529, [2013] Crim LR 169.

¹⁹⁹ See generally p 1081.

²⁰⁰ As to what may therefore constitute a lawful excuse, see p 1093.

²⁰¹ Section 5(2)(a), emphasis added.

be extended to all threats, however made. The only limitation that needs to be imposed is that the threats should be intended to create a fear that what is threatened will be carried out.²⁰²

This last limitation needs to be imposed because the gist of the offence is the threat and, given that D intends that V should believe that the threat will be carried out, there ought to be no requirement that D himself should have intended to carry his threat into effect.

In Cakmak,²⁰³ the accused had threatened to set fire to herself as a protest when on the London Eye. The charges were laid under s 2(a), even though the threat was to set fire to herself. The Court of Appeal held that despite this the jury were entitled to find a threat of damage to property of another, because there was an implied threat to damage such property. Whether there is an implied threat is an objective question: would a reasonable person in the particular circumstances regard the words used as a threat to damage the London Eye?

If D intends that V would fear the threat would be carried out, D commits the offence only if, judged objectively, the nature of the threat would have caused V to believe that the threat would be carried out. The actual thoughts and fears of the person threatened are irrelevant according to the court in Cakmak. It would seem that the threat need not be a threat to do the damage immediately, but immediacy may be a relevant factor, along with other circumstances, in determining whether there is something that can be called a threat.

27.5.3 Mens rea

In Cakmak, the court held that whether an offence under s 2(a) or (b) is charged, the jury must be satisfied that D made a threat to another with the intention (recklessness not being a sufficient mens rea) that the other would fear that it would be carried out. In Ankersen,²⁰⁴ D went to social services offices and, according to the officials there, threatened to burn down the family home irrespective of who was in it before committing suicide. D denied threatening anything more than suicide: he claimed not to have threatened to burn the house down and he did not intend that the officials should fear that such a threat would be carried out. It was clear that under s 2 there must be (a) words or actions which objectively speaking constitute a threat; (b) the threat must be one which, again objectively considered, amounts to a threat to damage any property though it is not relevant that the particular listener perceived it to be a threat if objectively it would not have been so construed; (c) D must intend that the person hearing the threat would fear that the threat would be carried out.

The Court of Appeal held that the judge had not directed adequately on the third limb. Although in some parts of the summing up the judge repeated the statutory formula that D must have intended that the social worker would fear that the threat would be carried out, in other places he said the test was whether D intended her to fear that he might carry out the threat. Nevertheless, the conviction was safe. In this case:

there is no material difference between a defendant who intends that the listener should fear that the threat will be carried out and one who intends that the listener should fear that it might be carried out. It seems to us that the critical word is 'fear'. To fear that something will happen is not to be equated with a belief that it will happen. It is to be anxious about the possibility it will happen. That anxiety or fear arises where there is a risk that it might happen. So in our view it is enough if the intention is to create in the mind an objective listener the genuine fear that the threat might be carried out. The listener can have that fear even where he or she is not certain that the threat will be carried out. It is in circumstances where the threat is understood to be serious that the authorities will likely be alerted with all the adverse consequences flowing from that. It will not be enough if the risk, objectively viewed, is merely fanciful because then there would not be a real and genuine fear that the threat would be carried out.

²⁰² LC 29, para 55.

²⁰³ [2002] 2 Cr App R 10, CA, [2002] Crim LR 581.

²⁰⁴ [2015] EWCA Crim 432.

As the court recognized, the purpose of the offence is to ensure that the defendant does not make threats that he may or may not intend to carry out but that he intends V to worry just might be carried out. Some of the language of the decision may go too far, however, in suggesting that fear that it 'might' happen is sufficient; the Act requires fear that it will.

Section 2(a) deals exclusively with the property of a person other than the defendant. It is only in relation to s 2(b) that the prosecution must prove that D knew that the damage or destruction threatened was likely, if carried out, to endanger the life of a person other than the defendant.

27.6 Possession offences

By s 3 of the Act:

A person who has anything in his custody or under his control intending without lawful excuse to use it or cause or permit another to use it—

- (a) to destroy or damage any property belonging to some other person; or
- (b) to destroy or damage his own or the user's property in a way which he knows is likely to endanger the life of some other person;

shall be guilty of an offence.

The offence is punishable by imprisonment for a maximum ten years: s 4(2).

In line with the offence of threatening under s 2, the possession of the thing must be for the purpose of committing an offence under s 1 of the Act. There is, of course, no need for the commission of an offence of destruction or damage, but there must be an intention to use the thing, or allow another to use it, for the purpose of committing what would be an offence under s 1.²⁰⁵ Accordingly, the same provisions apply in relation to lawful excuse as apply to charges under s 2.²⁰⁶

27.6.1 Custody or control

Although it is convenient to talk of this offence as one of possession, the section speaks only of custody or control which the Law Commission preferred so as to avoid the complexities often associated with the word possession.²⁰⁷ It may well have been a wise decision to avoid the term 'possession', but what really helps to simplify the situation is the clear requirement for mens rea.

As the Law Commission observed:

Problems which may arise where a substance, such as a stick of gelignite, is slipped into a person's pocket without his knowledge will be wholly academic, because if that person has no knowledge of its presence he cannot have an intention to use it or permit or cause another to use it. If he has no intention to use it or permit or cause it to be used, he does not commit an offence . . .²⁰⁸

²⁰⁵ Fancy [1980] Crim LR 171, CC. For reform proposals, see LCCP 183, Conspiracy and Attempts (2007) para 16.61.

²⁰⁶ See p 1093.

²⁰⁷ LC 29, para 59.

²⁰⁸ ibid.

But there must be custody or control; a mere intention to use something to commit an offence of criminal damage will not suffice. D may be about to pick up stones from the road to throw through a shop window, but since at this stage he does not have custody or control of the stones he commits no offence under this provision. D need not, of course, be the owner of the thing in order to have custody or control of it, but he must have the charge of it. Where D is charged with permitting E to use the thing, D must be in a position where, as against E, he might properly have prevented E from using it.

27.6.2 The things used

There is no limitation on the things which may be possessed with intent to commit criminal damage—‘anything’ may do for the purpose.

The essential feature of the proposed offence is to be found not so much in the nature of the thing—for almost any everyday article, from a box of matches to a hammer or nail, can be used to destroy or damage property—as in the intention with which it is held.²⁰⁹

By way of example, in Akhtar the Court of Appeal held that a petrol bomb is an offensive weapon per se, it being impossible to see an innocent purpose to which a petrol bomb could be put.²¹⁰ Clearly, the nature of the thing may have significance in proving that D possessed the thing with intent to commit criminal damage (the possession of a box of matches may be one thing and the possession of a ton of dynamite quite another) but given that the intent can be proved, the nature of the thing is immaterial.

27.6.3 Mens rea

The offence may be committed only where D intends to use, or cause or permit another to use, the thing to destroy or damage property. It is not enough that D realizes that the thing may be so used: he must intend or permit such use. But it is not necessary that D should intend an immediate use of the thing; the offence is aimed at proscribing what is essentially a preparatory act and it is therefore enough that D possesses the thing with the necessary intent even though he contemplates its actual use of the thing at some time in the future. It would also seem to be clear that a conditional intent (an intention to use the thing to cause damage should it prove necessary) will suffice.²¹¹

27.7 Kindred offences

In keeping with the aim of codification,²¹² the Criminal Damage Act 1971 contains, as near as may be, the whole of the law relating to damage to property. The Act abolished the common law offence of arson, repealed most of the provisions of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 and repealed the Dockyards Protection Act 1772 and a large number of statutory provisions containing miscellaneous offences of damage to property.

But the Criminal Damage Act leaves untouched the Explosive Substances Act 1883.²¹³ The Law Commission had at first planned to repeal s 2 (causing an explosion likely to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property) and s 3 (possessing explosives with intent to endanger life or cause serious injury to property, and doing an act to cause an explosion likely to endanger life or cause serious injury to property) since these might easily have been brought within the scheme of the Criminal Damage Act. But in the end the Law Commission did not do this because it was felt that the Explosive Substances Act belonged to the area of public order offences, and its replacement should be considered in the context of a review of offences relating to public order. This means that on given facts there may be an offence both under the Criminal Damage Act and the Explosive Substances Act, and it should be noted that there are differences in relation to the mens rea that has to be established.

²⁰⁹ LC 29, para 60. ²¹⁰ [2015] EWCA Crim 176.

²¹¹ Buckingham (1976) 63 Cr App R 159, CA; cf Bentham [1973] QB 357, CA. ²¹² See Ch 1.

²¹³ Proceedings for a crime under this Act shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the A-G: Explosive Substances Act 1883, s 7(1).

The Criminal Damage Act did not repeal the following provisions of the Malicious Damage Act 1861: s 35 (placing wood etc on rail lines or obstructing signals with intent to obstruct or overturn any engine);²¹⁴ s 36 (obstructing railway engines);²¹⁵ and the retention of these offences made necessary the further retention of general provisions of the Malicious Damage Act relating to malice (s 58) and jurisdiction (s 72). It will be seen that none of these offences would necessarily (or even ordinarily) involve damage to property, though the ultimate aim may be to cause damage to property. Frequently such acts might amount to an attempt to commit criminal damage, but insofar as the acts might be merely preparatory these provisions render the preparatory acts criminal. These offences have been used to prosecute environmental protestors who obstruct freight trains carrying coal to power stations.

Nor does the Act repeal offences of damage arising under other legislation where the liability for the damage may be grounded in negligence or where there is strict liability for the damage. In particular cases, there may be thought valid policy reasons for imposing criminal liability for damage to property caused negligently, or even for imposing strict liability for offences of damage to property.²¹⁶ These offences are perhaps best considered in relation to a review of criminal liability for negligence and a review of strict liability.

²¹⁴ See Buxton [2010] EWCA Crim 2923 for a rare application of s 35.

²¹⁵ See Mirahessari [2016] EWCA Crim 1733 and Bard [2014] EWCA Crim 463 for recent applications of s 36.

²¹⁶ eg s 85(1) of the Postal Services Act 2000 creates an offence of sending by post a postal packet which encloses any creature, article or thing of any kind which is likely to injure other postal packets in the course of their transmission by post or any person engaged in the business of a postal operator.

Computer misuse offences

28.1 Introduction

The impact of computer technology on society has been profound.¹ From simple beginnings in arithmetical calculations it has spawned immense data retrieval systems; systems controlling traffic by land, sea and air; systems indispensable to the functioning of industry, health care, education, banking and commerce. All this is to the common good or nearly all to the common good because, inevitably, some will use the technology for anti-social purposes. These may range from simple ‘snooping’, as where the hacker gains access to computer systems just for the fun of it (perhaps to demonstrate his computing ability), or for industrial or State espionage, or to perpetrate frauds, or disrupt systems with viruses, worms or Trojan horses² with serious commercial and possibly life-threatening consequences.

The law before the Computer Misuse Act 1990 could deal with some of these problems.³ Appropriating property belonging to another is just as much theft⁴ when it is done by picking a pocket as by causing a computer to debit one account and to credit another. Should someone cause death or injury not with a blunt instrument but by interfering with a traffic control system, he would be equally liable to conviction for an offence against the person.

But there were gaps in the protection offered by the criminal law. The Law Commission addressed itself to these in a Working Paper published in 1988.⁵ At that stage the Law Commission was primarily concerned with unauthorized access to computing systems (hacking) though it noted other problems such as the inapplicability of deception offences to computers.⁶ The problem with hacking was that ‘snooping’ (gaining unauthorized access to the correspondence, personal details, business records of another) is not generally an ¹ See E Brynjolfsson and A McAfee, The Second Machine Age: Work, Progress, and Prosperity in a Time of Brilliant Technologies (Norton & Co 2014); I Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations (2nd edn, 2016) Ch 3.D; M Wasik, Crime and the Computer (1991) and ‘The Computer Misuse Act 1990’ [1990] Crim LR 767; Smith, Property Offences, Ch 11; I Lloyd, Information Technology Law (8th edn, 2017) 189–254. See also N MacEwan, ‘The Computer Misuse Act 1990: Lessons from its Past and Predictions for its Future’ [2008] Crim LR 955. See also www.cps.gov.uk/legal-guidance/computer-misuse-act-1990.

² For a comparative analysis of legal regulation of viruses, see M Klang, ‘A Critical Look at the Regulation of Computer Viruses’ (2003) 11 Int’l J L & IT 162.

³ See C Tapper, ‘Computer Crime: Scotch Mist?’ [1987] Crim LR 4.

⁴ cf the problem of deceiving a machine, discussed at p 940.

⁵ Working Paper No 110, Computer Misuse (1988). See M Wasik, ‘Law Reform Proposals on Computer Misuse’ [1989] Crim LR 257.

⁶ cf the similar problems in relation to forgery, Ch 29, and the discussion in the Fraud Act, Ch 22. On hacking see A Nehaluddin, ‘Hackers’ Criminal Behaviour and Laws Related to Hacking’ (2009) 15 Computer and Telecommunications L Rev 135.

offence;⁷ invasion of privacy and industrial espionage⁸ are not, as such, offences. Could a special case be made for criminalizing snooping by way of hacking into a computer system? The Law Commission thought that it could and it was overwhelmingly supported by commentators on the Working Paper.

The proposal in the Law Commission's Working Paper to criminalize unauthorized access was thus generally applauded. But before the publication of its final Report,⁹ the Commission conducted further discussions with computer and software manufacturers and with computer users in banking and commerce. These groups convinced the Commission of the need not only for an offence of unauthorized access (hacking) but also for two further offences of: (a) unauthorized access with intent to commit or facilitate the commission of further offences and (b) of unauthorized modification of computer material. These were enacted in the 1990 Act and have been a source of many problems.¹⁰

The first problem was that they were not flexible enough to deal with technological developments. Within a decade of enactment, commentators began to suggest that the 1990 Act had become rather dated, being drafted at a time when computers were relatively unsophisticated and the internet was in its infancy.¹¹ The pressure to extend the scope of the Act increased and¹² the Parliamentary All Party Internet Group reviewed the Act and made recommendations for reform.¹³ The group concluded that many of the perceived problems with the Act actually stemmed from 'widespread ignorance of the current law'.¹⁴ One concern that many expressed was that the Act should be capable of dealing with 'denial of service attacks'¹⁵ which lead to commercial websites being rendered unavailable to legitimate users.¹⁶ The courts had in fact interpreted the offences in the 1990 Act as capable of applying to a denial of service attack,¹⁷ but it was widely recognized that a more specific offence designed to tackle that mischief was desirable. Further pressure for reform also derived from international treaty obligations.¹⁸ In 2006, the Police and Justice Act made ⁷ Subject to the specific offences under the Data Protection Act 1998.

⁸ See LCCP 150, Legislating the Criminal Code: Misuse of Trade Secrets (1997) and see J Hull, 'Stealing Secrets: A Review of the Law Commission's Consultation Paper on the Misuse of Trade Secrets' [1998] Crim LR 246.

⁹ LC 186, Computer Misuse (1989) Cmnd 819.

¹⁰ See MacEwan, n 1.

¹¹ See eg S Fafinski, 'Access Denied: Computer Misuse on an Era of Technological Change' (2006) 70 J Crim L 424.

¹² Though not all were in favour of reform, cf C Holder, 'Staying One Step Ahead of the Criminals' (2002) 10(3) IT Law 17.

¹³ Discussed by G Fearon, 'All Party Internet (APIG) Report on the Computer Misuse Act' (2004) 15 Comps and Law 36.

¹⁴ Para 23.

¹⁵ A denial of service (DoS) attack occurs 'when a deliberate attempt is made to stop a machine from performing its usual activities by having another computer create large amounts of specious traffic. The traffic may be valid requests made in an overwhelming volume or specially crafted protocol fragments that cause the serving machine to tie up significant resources to no useful purpose. In a Distributed Denial-of-Service (DDoS) attack a large number of remote computers are orchestrated into attacking a target at the same time' (APIG, para 56). These are extremely common at over 4,000 reported instances a week. See further Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations (2nd edn, 2016) paras 3.284 et seq.

¹⁶ A Private Members' Bill—the Computer Misuse (Amendment) Bill 2000—sought to introduce a new offence of causing or intending to cause a degradation, failure or other impairment of function of a computerized system. The offence was aimed at protecting computer systems from denial of service attacks.

¹⁷ In DPP v Lennon [2006] EWHC 1201 (Admin) discussed later.

¹⁸ See especially the Convention on Cybercrime, CETS No 185 (2001) discussed by S Room, 'Criminalising Cybercrime' (2004) 154 NLJ 950. See also I Walden, 'Harmonising Computer Crime Laws in Europe' (2004) 12 European J of Crime Criminal Law and Criminal Justice 321; Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations, Ch5 on the broader issues of international harmonization.

amendments to the 1990 Act offences and introduced additional offences related to computer misuse. These were further amended by those in the Serious Crime Act 2007 and the Serious Crime Act 2015.¹⁹

This chapter will focus on the offences created by the Computer Misuse Act 1990 as amended.²⁰ Analysis of the problem of what has become known as ‘cybercrime’—offences against the person or property or of cyberobscenity—lies beyond the scope of this work.²¹ Also out of scope for this chapter are the offences under the Data Protection Act 1998 such as that of knowingly or recklessly obtaining or disclosing personal data or procuring its obtaining without the consent of the data controller.²² As are the offences of making, possessing, distributing, etc indecent images of children.²³

It seems safe to predict that the criminal law will continue to face difficulties in dealing with those individuals who choose to exploit the opportunities which computers, and more specifically the internet, provide for causing a wide range of harmful, or indeed illegal, activity: fraud, obscenity, paedophilia, espionage, piracy, money laundering, market abuse, etc.²⁴ It is already an enormous topic and one which will grow exponentially as emerging technology develops—the internet of things, artificial intelligence and ever more automation of all aspects of life will offer all manner of opportunities for criminal activity. In many cases, the existing law will be easily applied to the conduct involved (eg where the unauthorized access is to some innovative use of a computer (with an autonomous vehicle being hacked)) but in others the law may have to develop rapidly to meet the new challenges.

It is difficult to assess the number of computer misuse offences committed. Businesses are reluctant to report offences against them as it reveals weakness in their security and might deter customers. It has been suggested that prosecutions are declining because the legislation is so complex.²⁵ However, when prosecuted, sentences are often substantial. Custodial sentences for committing offences contained in the Computer Misuse Act 1990 have become increasingly common. After reviewing the most recent authorities, the Court of Appeal in *Martin*²⁶ stated that: ‘These offences are comparatively easy to commit by those with the relevant expertise, they are increasingly prevalent, and the public is entitled to be protected from them. In our view, it is appropriate for sentences for offences such as these to ¹⁹ Section 61 of the 2007 Act. The Serious Crime Act 2015, ss 41–44 in force from 3 May 2015.

²⁰ See MacEwan [2008] Crim LR 955.

²¹ See in particular Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations, Ch 2; the special edition of the Criminal Law Review [1998], edited by DS Wall; R Essen, ‘Cybercrime: A Growing Problem’ (2002) 66 J Crim L 269; O Ward, ‘Information Technology Watch Out, There’s a Hacker About’ (2000) 150 NLJ 1812; D Thomas and BD Loader, Cybercrime (2000); Y Akdeniz, ‘Cybercrime’ in E-Commerce Law & Regulation Encyclopaedia (2003); M Wong, ‘Cybertrespass and Unauthorized Access’ (2007) 15 Int J L & IT 90. See also A Guinchard, ‘Crime in Virtual Worlds: The Limits of Criminal Law’ (2010) 24 Int’l Rev of Law, Computers & Technology 175 considering ‘crimes’ committed in virtual worlds, including: (a) the ‘theft’ of virtual property; (b) the ‘murder’, ‘assault’ or ‘rape’ of an avatar; (c) harassment by means of virtual world technology; and (d) extreme or child pornography using avatars.

²² See s 55(2) of the Data Protection Act 1998 as amended by s 70(2) of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 but note s 55 has not yet been amended to include the new defence for the purposes of journalism and other ‘special purposes’. At the time of writing, a new Data Protection Bill is making its way through Parliament. The Bill is intended to give effect to the EU General Data Protection Regulation. It contains a number of offences and defences that are not found in the Data Protection Act 1998.

²³ See generally P Rook and R Ward, Sexual Offences Law and Practice (5th edn, 2016) Ch 8.

²⁴ See for discussion S Morris, The Future of Netcrime Now: Part 1—Threats and Challenges (2004) Home Office Online Report 62/04. On fraud, see A Doig, Fraud (2006) 62–63.

²⁵ See www.computing.co.uk/ctg/news/1835833/computer-misuse-act-prosecution-falling.

²⁶ [2013] EWCA Crim 1420. See eg Coles-Day [2015] EWCA Crim 2444 (hacking into and changing someone’s Facebook account).

involve a real element of deterrence. Those who commit them must expect to be punished accordingly.'

28.2 Unauthorized access to computer material

By s 1 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990 as amended:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if—
 - (a) he causes a computer to perform any function with intent to secure access to any program or data held in any computer;^[27]
 - (b) the access he intends to secure is unauthorised; and
 - (c) he knows at the time when he causes the computer to perform the function that that is the case.
- (2) The intent a person has to have to commit an offence under this section need not be directed at—
 - (a) any particular program or data;
 - (b) a program or data of any particular kind; or
 - (c) a program or data held in any particular computer.

The offence carries a maximum sentence of two years' imprisonment on indictment.²⁸

The idea behind this offence, in effect, is to close the door in the hacker's face. The offence is committed even if the hacker has no sinister purpose and is no more than a snooper.²⁹ The essence of the offence under s 1 is causing a computer to perform a function with intent to secure unauthorized access. No particular computer needs to be targeted by D.

The scope of the offence prompts the question why it should be an offence merely to access files held in the office computer but not an offence to access paper files held in the filing cabinet.³⁰ The Law Commission thought it best to criminalize the hacker's conduct generally in order to deter those who might be contemplating fraud, or who might go on to commit some further offence or who might, because of their skills, be recruited by others with more sinister motives. With respect, these are not convincing reasons; conduct is not properly penalized because it might lead to the commission of an offence.³¹

One reason for criminalizing such conduct is that the proprietor of the system which is accessed by an unauthorized user may be put to considerable expense to repair his ²⁷ The Police and Justice Act 2006, s 35 would, if implemented, have extended the offence to include cases where D enabled another to gain access. It was designed to ensure compliance with the European Union Framework Decision on Attacks Against Information Systems, adopted by the European Union and Justice and Home Affairs Council of Ministers on 24 Feb 2005 (<http://eur-lex.europa.eu/legal-content/EN/TXT/PDF/?uri=CELEX:32005F0222&from=EN>).

²⁸ There are very few convictions under the Act. Between 1990 and 2006 there were 161: see MacEwan, n 1. The offence is underreported as organizations do not want to publicize failings in their security.

²⁹ The offence was to be extended by the Police and Justice Act 2006 to include those whose intention is to enable someone else to secure unauthorized access to a computer or to enable secure unauthorized access to a computer at some later time. Those provisions were prospectively repealed by the Serious Crime Act 2007.

³⁰ Some regard the Act as overbroad and suggest that s 1 ought to be limited to conduct which breaches a 'security measure': S Room, 'Criminalising Cybercrime' (2004) 154 NLJ 950.

³¹ For a contrary view that such specific offences of ulterior intent or endangerment are preferable to the government's likely alternative of creating general inchoate offences, see W Wilson, 'Participating in Crime: Some Thoughts on the Retribution/Prevention Dichotomy in Preparation for Crime and How to Deal With It' in A Reed and M Bohlander (eds), Participating in Crime (2013) 128.

defences.³² Of course, the proprietor of paper files incurs expense repairing his defences if an intruder breaks into his office to look through the files. There are, however, other important differences between the computer and the paper files: the person intruding into the filing cabinet must break into the office; he cannot access the files, as he can in the case of computer-held material, from a distant part of the country or, as is frequently the case, from the other side of the world.³³ The comparative ease of more extensive hacking makes this a more likely form of snooping with potentially more damaging consequences.

In addition, extensive sensitive personal information is now commonly stored on computers or online. As the Court of Appeal has recognized, someone accessing that information without authority causes distress to the victim and others.³⁴ Of course, the same could be said of letters secreted in a filing cabinet; however, it is often the further dissemination of this sensitive information that is the source of the distress and this is something that is especially easy to achieve if the information is stored digitally. Computer systems are always vulnerable to the determined hacker. In a world that is increasingly dependent on computers, and the integrity of computer systems, it appears entirely right that the criminal law should be employed to discourage the hacker.

28.2.1 Actus reus

The actus reus consists of causing a computer to perform any function.

28.2.1.1 Computer

The Act does not define 'computer'. The Law Commission took the view that to have done so would be 'foolish'. Perhaps so, but a court, though it might be foolish to attempt a comprehensive definition, may be required to decide whether a particular article is a computer. Most obviously, a computer is something that computes, but computers have long since done more than merely mathematical calculations and may be used to store other information which can be processed for a wide variety of purposes, ranging from legal research (eg Lexis and Westlaw), traffic control or manufacturing purposes. It is tentatively suggested that the defining characteristics of a computer are the abilities of the appliance: (a) to store information; (b) to retrieve the information so stored; and perhaps most importantly (c) to process that information. Hence, the abacus and the slide-rule are not computers;³⁵ they can be used to make calculations but they have no 'memory' and they cannot themselves process information.³⁶

³² The Law Commission instanced a case where the restoration of a system following unauthorized access required 10,000 hours of the time of skilled staff. See Baker [2011] EWCA Crim 928 (£300,000 cost to employer); and see Mangham [2013] 1 Cr App R (S) 62 hacking into Facebook cost company $200,000 to investigate and repair.

³³ On jurisdictional issues see M Hirst, Jurisdiction and the Ambit of the Criminal Law (2003) 193–196. There is a growing concern about the adequacy of the criminal law's response to jurisdictional challenges posed by online and digital crime.

³⁴ See Crosskey [2012] EWCA Crim 1645. See also Khan [2012] EWCA Crim 2032 (accessing social care records).

³⁵ But not because these are mechanical; computers are now electronic but Babbage's computer was no less a computer because it was mechanical. See for detailed arguments about definition I Walden, Computer Crimes and Digital Investigations, paras 3.224–3.234.

³⁶ The Convention on Cybercrime uses the term 'computer system'. It defines a computer as a device that runs a 'program' to process 'data' but does not define these other terms. APIG concluded that there had been no difficulties with the (lack of) definition of any of the words in the Act. The Home Office reported that they had 'never come across a case' where the courts had failed to use a 'broad definition' (para 15). It recommended retaining the current approach.

It is submitted that it is insufficient to make it a computer that a machine is programmed to perform a function or number of functions. A washing machine may be programmed to perform several varieties of wash but is not, on this view, a computer; it can only obey instructions and not process them. With the advent of 'smart' devices, the courts are likely to have to address the interpretation of the Act in relation to alleged hacking of a wider range of devices. A computer can select a course of action on the basis of instructions given or information received. A machine which merely ensures that traffic lights will show red or green at stated intervals is not a computer; a machine which varies the intervals in response to information about traffic density is.

A computer may be thought of as any machine which responds to signals (now usually electronic) to perform programmed functions. On this view, the unauthorized user of the washing machine or microwave oven would commit the offence under s 1. But such machines were not, until very recently, sold as computers. The appropriate charge for the unauthorized user of a dishwasher or microwave oven would appear to be the dishonest abstraction of electricity contrary to s 13 of the Theft Act 1968³⁷ rather than unauthorized access to computer material under s 1 of the Computer Misuse Act. With smart versions of such devices that can be controlled remotely and even those that are part of the developing internet of things, it seems more likely that they will be treated as computers.

The offence is committed where D causes any computer to perform a function. Although the offence is often committed remotely via another computer, D also commits the offence by causing the target computer to perform a function directly.³⁸

28.2.1.2 Performing a function

Once the machine in question is proved to be a computer, the actus reus is complete if it is caused to perform 'any' function. It is accordingly enough to switch on the computer though it may be difficult to prove mens rea if this is all that D has done. The strict requirements of proof are, anecdotally, reported to present difficulties in prosecution under the Act. It is not enough for D merely to view data that is already displayed on the monitor, but it is sufficient that D has, for example, accessed the internet by hitting the back key or return key when a computer has been left logged on to a network by the previous user.³⁹ Expert evidence will not always be necessary to establish that a computer performed a function.⁴⁰

28.2.2 Mens rea

D must cause a computer to perform a function (a) with intent to secure access to any program or data held in any computer, and (b) knowing that the access he intends to secure is unauthorized.

28.2.2.1 Intent to secure access

Intention should, it is submitted, be interpreted consistently with other offences as discussed earlier.⁴¹ Recklessness is insufficient.

By s 17, 'access' is widely defined and includes any 'use' of a computer, copying or moving of a file and altering or erasing data. There is no need to prove an intention in relation to any particular program. In practice, it will be common to establish that D has in fact secured access as so defined in order to establish mens rea but this is not a necessary element of the ³⁷ See Ch 18. ³⁸ A-G's Reference (No 1 of 1991) [1993] QB 94.

³⁹ See Ellis v DPP [2001] EWHC 362 (Admin), where D argued unsuccessfully that such conduct was akin to reading a discarded newspaper.

⁴⁰ ibid. ⁴¹ Ch 3.

offence: it is complete on causing a computer to perform any function (eg switching it on) with intent to secure access.

28.2.2.2 Knowing it is unauthorized access

D must 'know'⁴² that the access he intends to secure is unauthorized. By s 17(5), D's access is unauthorized if:

- (1) he is not himself entitled to control access of the kind in question to the program or data; and
- (2) he does not have consent to access of the kind in question to the program or data from any person who is so entitled.⁴³

If D believes, even unreasonably, that he is entitled to control access or that his access is authorized by someone entitled to secure access, he cannot know that his access is unauthorized. Control in this context presumably means D has the power to 'authorise and forbid'.⁴⁴ More difficult is the case where D is unsure whether he is entitled to control access or, much more likely, he is unsure of the extent of his authorization to access a computer, but decides nonetheless to access the computer without checking the nature and extent of his authorization.⁴⁵ If, as will usually be the case, D could readily ascertain the nature and extent of his authority but chooses not to do so and decides to take the risk that his access is authorized, and his access is in fact unauthorized, it may be that he does not know his access is unauthorized but this is only because he does not want to know. It is submitted that wilful blindness of this kind is enough to constitute knowledge.⁴⁶ At the other extreme, the fact that it crosses D's mind that he might possibly be exceeding his authority would not suffice for knowledge.

The offence may be committed where D has authority to use a computer, but not a particular program.⁴⁷ It may be committed where D is authorized to access one computer, computer X, but he does so to access another, computer Y, to which he does not have authorized access. The offence is complete when D has accessed computer X with intent to access computer Y. It was held in Bignell that police computer operators who extracted from the Police National Computer details of the registration and ownership of cars for their private purposes were not guilty of this offence,⁴⁸ though they may have been guilty of an offence under the Data Protection Act 1984.⁴⁹ Subsequently, in *Bow Street Magistrate, ex p Government of USA*⁵⁰ Lord Hobhouse cast doubt on Bignell. The House held that the offence may be committed when D has limited authority to access the computer and he exceeds his authorization,⁵¹ so, an employee of American Express committed the offence when, having authority to access only specified accounts, she accessed other accounts.⁵²

⁴² See generally, Ch 3. ⁴³ Program includes part of a program: s 17(10).

⁴⁴ Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Government of the USA [2000] 2 AC 216 at 224; cf Stanford [2006] EWCA Crim 258, [2006] 2 Cr App R 5 (considering the term 'control' in the offence of unlawful interception under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000).

⁴⁵ This gave rise to difficulty in some early high-profile prosecutions: see P Davies, 'Computer Misuse' (1995) 145 NLJ 1776.

⁴⁶ See p 115. ⁴⁷ See Ellis v DPP [2001] EWHC 362 (Admin).

⁴⁸ DPP v Bignell [1998] 1 Cr App R 1, [1998] Crim LR 53, DC. Criticized in P Spink, 'Misuse of Police Computers' (1997) 42 Juridical Review 219.

⁴⁹ See now the Data Protection Act 1998. ⁵⁰ [2000] 1 Cr App R 61.

⁵¹ This interpretation of s 17(5) was followed in R (Begley) v Chief Constable of West Midlands Police [2001] EWCA Civ 1571 and Stanford [2006] EWCA Crim 258. We are grateful to David Cook for discussions on this section.

⁵² Bow Street Magistrate, ex p Government of the USA [2000] 2 AC 216, [2000] 1 Cr App R 61, HL, disapproving the dictum in Bignell, n 48, see commentary at [1999] Crim LR 971.

The offence requires both (a) that the access intended by D is in fact unauthorized; and (b) that D knows that his access is unauthorized. If D believes his access is unauthorized when it is in fact authorized he does not commit the offence. Since the offence is now triable either way, he can be convicted of an attempt.

28.3 Unauthorized access with intent to commit or facilitate further offences

By s 2 of the Act:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence under this section if he commits an offence under section 1 above ('the unauthorized access offence') with intent—
 - (a) to commit an offence to which this section applies; or
 - (b) to facilitate the commission of such an offence (whether by himself or by any other person); and the offence he intends to commit or facilitate is referred to below in this section as the further offence.

The 'further offences' to which the section applies are those for which the sentence is fixed by law; or for which a person over 21 with no previous convictions may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of five years.⁵³ The offence requires proof of the s 1 offence together with an intent to commit the further offence or to facilitate the commission of such an offence by another. By s 2(3) it is immaterial whether the further offence is to be committed at the time of access or on some future occasion. For example, D gains unauthorized access to a computer in order to copy V's bank details so that he can subsequently perpetrate a fraud if the opportunity arises.

There is no requirement that the intended further offences will involve the use of a computer. The further offence need not be committed; it is enough that D intends one. In practical terms, the offences most likely to be intended or facilitated by D will be offences against property involving dishonesty but s 2 is not restricted to those offences.⁵⁴ Arguably, at the time the 1990 Act was enacted, the Theft Acts (with an extra offence to deal with deception of machines⁵⁵) would probably have been adequate to deal with this problem where the further offences were ones of dishonesty.⁵⁶ This was how the Law Commission initially viewed the matter when drafting the 1990 Act but it had second thoughts and concluded that it would be preferable to extend the criminal law to the hacker before he had committed a substantive offence under the Theft Acts or had reached the stage of an attempt. Like s 1, s 2 of the 1990 Act is accordingly aimed at preparatory conduct. Thus, to take examples given by the Law Commission, the hacker who, with intent to steal, is searching for the password to enter an account might not be guilty of an attempt to steal, and the hacker who seeks confidential information in order to blackmail would clearly not be guilty of an attempt to ⁵³ Or might be so sentenced but for the restrictions imposed by s 33 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980.

⁵⁴ A traffic or air traffic control system might be entered with intent to injure or even kill. Hacking with intent to commit treason is, perhaps, somewhat fanciful.

⁵⁵ As now in the Fraud Act 2006.

⁵⁶ See the recognition of the availability of the charge in the case of Holmes [2005] Crim LR 229. The APiG endorsed the need for a new fraud offence to deal with this problem (para 35) and recommended further reform on the misuse of trade secrets so as to develop a suitable framework to adequately criminalize the unlawful 'theft of data'.

blackmail.⁵⁷ Both, however, would commit the substantive offence under s 2. It is not just the hacker in the usual sense who is caught by this offence; the employee who accesses bank data and discloses those to accomplices to enable them to commit frauds also commits the offence.⁵⁸

The Law Commission thought that the s 2 offence bore 'some relation to an attempt'⁵⁹ in that the ulterior offence needs only to be intended and not completed and accordingly s 2(4) provides that the offence may be committed even though commission of the ulterior offence is impossible. It is submitted that this provision is unnecessary but it may save argument. It will apply if D accesses V's computer to obtain his bank details, but unknown to D, that bank account was already closed by V.

Since the offence under s 2 is a substantive offence, there may, in turn, be a liability for conspiracy, attempt or assisting and encouraging the offence. These would represent extremely broad offences. D could agree with E that they would in the future access V's computer to gain information that they would, yet further in the future, use to perpetrate a crime. Given the preparatory nature of the offence, however, there is little scope for the operation of attempt in practice.⁶⁰

The offence is triable either way and on conviction on indictment the offence carries a maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment.

28.4 Unauthorized acts with intent to impair or recklessness as to impairment of a computer

Section 3 of the Act, as substituted by s 36 of the Police and Justice Act 2006 provides:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if—
 - (a) he does any unauthorised act in relation to a computer;
 - (b) at the time when he does the act he knows that it is unauthorised; and
 - (c) either subsection (2) or subsection (3) below applies.
- (2) This subsection applies if the person intends by doing the act—
 - (a) to impair the operation of any computer;
 - (b) to prevent or hinder access to any program or data held in any computer; [or⁶¹
 - (c) to impair the operation of any such program or the reliability of any such data; . . .[⁶²
- (3) This subsection applies if the person is reckless as to whether the act will do any of the things mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (c) of subsection (2) above.
- (4) The intention referred to in subsection (2) above, or the recklessness referred to in subsection (3) above, need not relate to—
 - (a) any particular computer;
 - (b) any particular program or data; or
 - (c) a program or data of any particular kind.

⁵⁷ As in Zezev [2002] Crim LR 648.

⁵⁸ Delamare [2003] All ER (D) 127 (Feb).

⁵⁹ LC 186, para 3.58.

⁶⁰ Would D be liable under s 2 by reaching for the computer power switch?

⁶¹ As inserted by the Serious Crime Act 2007, s 61(3)(a)(i).

⁶² The Serious Crime Act repealed s 3(2)(d) (which applied if D intended 'to enable any of the things mentioned in paragraphs (a) to (c) above to be done'), as such conduct will be covered by the offences under that Act of encouraging or assisting the commission of an offence or offences, see Ch 9.

(5) In this section—

- (a) a reference to doing an act includes a reference to causing an act to be done;
- (b) ‘act’ includes a series of acts;
- (c) a reference to impairing, preventing or hindering something includes a reference to doing so temporarily.

On conviction on indictment the maximum sentence is ten years’ imprisonment or a fine or both; on summary conviction six months or a fine up to the statutory maximum or both: s 3(6). This is a significant increase in the sentencing powers from the original s 3.

28.4.1 Background to the s 3 offence

It is, and remains, an offence under the Criminal Damage Act 1971 to destroy or damage a computer or its software as by, for example, taking a hammer and causing damage by breaking them.⁶³ Where there is physical damage to tangible property there is no problem in using the 1971 Act. What, though, of the case where there is damage to tangible property, but that damage cannot be perceived by the senses? Say D interferes with programs so as to render the computer incapable, or less capable, of carrying out the functions the programs are designed to perform. This may be done without causing any physical damage that can be perceived by the senses.

In Cox v Riley,⁶⁴ it was held that D was guilty of criminal damage where he erased the program from a plastic circuit card which operated a saw to cut wood to programmed designs. D argued that the program was not ‘property of a tangible nature’ within the Criminal Damage Act. In this he was no doubt right but, in the view of the court, it failed to take account of the fact that D was charged not with damaging the program but with damaging the plastic card. And in Whitely,⁶⁵ it was held that D was properly convicted of criminal damage to computer disks where he gained unauthorized access to an academic computer system and by altering their magnetic particles caused them to delete and add files. His argument that only intangible information on the disks had been damaged was rejected; the disks had been damaged because their usefulness had been impaired.

These decisions might be viewed as bringing computer misuse, because of its obvious potential for harm, within the Criminal Damage Act by procrustean means,⁶⁶ but it is submitted that both decisions were defensible under the 1971 Act. The plastic circuit card in Cox v Riley, though it may not have been rendered useless and could have been reprogrammed to perform its original function, was temporarily unable to perform the function it was designed to perform. Though the disk was not damaged, it was rendered incapable of performing one of its programs and the case seems indistinguishable from Fisher.⁶⁷ Similarly, in Whitely,⁶⁸ the computer, though not itself damaged, had been rendered inoperable by tampering with its control mechanisms, namely the programs on the disks. That the disks could be restored is irrelevant since temporary impairment suffices for damage under the 1971 Act.

The Law Commission, however, took the view that the problem of computer misuse should be tackled more directly. It might have been possible to deal with the problem by ⁶³ See generally on the old offence, Y Akdeniz, ‘Section 3 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990—An Antidote for Computer Viruses’ [1996] Web JCLI.

⁶⁴ (1986) 83 Cr App R 54, DC. ⁶⁵ [1991] Crim LR 436, CA.

⁶⁶ See Wasik, Crime and the Computer, 137–145. ⁶⁷ (1865) LR 1 CCR 7, p 1070.

⁶⁸ [1991] Crim LR 436, CA.

amending the Criminal Damage Act to include interference with data and programs,⁶⁹ but the Commission decided on the creation of a new offence for two reasons. One was that 'the theoretical difficulties posed by applying the concept of damage to intangible property such as data or programs'⁷⁰ would render the law unacceptably uncertain. The other was that criminal damage may be committed recklessly⁷¹ and the Commission did not think that the new offence should extend to a person who recklessly modified computer material.⁷² In addition, as will appear, the Commission sought to clarify the relationship between the modification offence under s 3 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990 and the offence of criminal damage under the Criminal Damage Act.

The s 3 offence under the 1990 Act, in its narrower form before it was recently amended, was restricted to modifications of the computer. That form of the offence was nevertheless construed very broadly by the courts. In Zevez,⁷³ it was held that if a computer is caused to record information (an email) which shows that it comes from one person, when it in fact comes from someone else, that manifestly affects its reliability.⁷⁴ This was seen as a significant extension of the offence. The email clearly tells a lie about itself, but it is submitted that it does not affect the reliability of other data on the computer or the functioning of the computer. The court further extended the ambit of the offence by holding that denial of service attacks were also caught. In DPP v Lennon,⁷⁵ D used a 'mail-bombing' program to send five million emails to his former employer. The Divisional Court, disagreeing with the District Judge, held that D had 'caused an unauthorised modification' by adding data. The owner of a computer able to receive emails would ordinarily be taken to have consented to the sending of emails to his computer. However, such implied consent was not without limits, and the consent did not cover emails that had been sent not for the purpose of communication with the owner but instead to interrupt his computer system. The court suggested that this could be tested by asking whether if D had rung his employer she would have consented to the receipt of five million emails. The new substituted s 3, as above, ensures that denial of service attacks are caught by the section,⁷⁶ and puts beyond doubt some of the concerns raised in the Lennon case.⁷⁷

28.4.2 The new s 3 offence

There must be an unauthorized act in relation to a computer. The extended meaning of 'authorized' is set out in s 17(8). The impairment of the computer, program, data, etc need not actually occur. The offence is complete on the carrying out of the unauthorized act with intent or recklessness to achieve that impairment, etc.

Essentially, s 3 is concerned with the sabotaging or impairing of computer systems by any act or series of acts specified in s 3(2). The most obvious instances will be by transferring ⁶⁹ Following the amendment by the Police and Justice Act 2006, s 10(5) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 was amended to exclude 'modification of the contents of a computer' from the definition of damage unless the effect is to impair its physical condition.

⁷⁰ LC 186, para 3.62.

⁷¹ The new s 3 does extend to recklessness.

⁷² See p 1110.

⁷³ [2002] Crim LR 648.

⁷⁴ D had placed in the files of a computer a bogus email purporting to come from a person which it had not. This was held to have caused a modification of the computer within what was s 17(7): 'A modification of the contents of any computer takes place if . . . any . . . data is added to its contents . . .'

⁷⁵ [2006] EWHC 1201 (Admin). See also the comment by S Fafinski (2006) 72 J Crim L 474.

⁷⁶ The amendment ensures that English law complies with Art 3 of the EU Framework Decision on Attacks Against Information Systems.

⁷⁷ It does not deal with challenges based on consent.

viruses,⁷⁸ Trojan horses or worms to computer systems or by corrupting websites.⁷⁹ It is sufficient that the conduct would prevent or hinder the access of others—as, for example, by a denial of service attack or mail bomb attack which incapacitates a server.⁸⁰ There is no longer a requirement of erasure of data or modification of anything and in that respect the offence is made much wider than as originally enacted. The concept of impairment might prove difficult to apply in some cases—how much slower must D intend the program to operate before it is properly said to be impaired? Unauthorized use may be sufficient if, for example, D intends or is reckless as to causing impairment to the reliability of the data. Causing a computer to debit V's bank account and credit D's⁸¹ is sufficient because the data concerning V's account is now unreliable. The impairment intended or about which D is reckless need only be temporary. Again, this is a significant extension of the offence.⁸²

The offence requires:

- (1) that D intends by the unauthorized act to bring about one of the consequences listed in s 3(2) (impairment, etc) or is reckless as to whether such consequences would occur; and
- (2) knowledge that the act by which he intends or is reckless about bringing about the impairment etc is unauthorized. The knowledge must relate to the unauthorized nature of the act from which impairment is intended. It is not necessary to prove knowledge of the unauthorized nature of the impairment (as was the case with the old form of s 3 which required knowledge as to the unauthorized modification).

Intention should bear its ordinary meaning.⁸³ Recklessness should be understood in its subjective sense as defined in G.⁸⁴ The ability to commit the offence recklessly represents a significant extension by the 2006 Act. In its original form, recklessness was insufficient because the Law Commission⁸⁵ endorsed a strict mens rea requirement, expressing concern that people could inadvertently modify the contents of a computer.

D's intent or recklessness need not be directed at the proscribed impairment etc of a particular computer or program. There is concern that this offence will criminalize legitimate activities by IT security consultants.

28.5 Impairing a computer such as to cause serious damage

Section 41 of the Serious Crime Act 2015 inserted a new s 3ZA into the 1990 Act creating an offence of impairing a computer such as to cause serious damage. It is an offence of considerable breadth, in terms of elements, jurisdictional reach and sentence. Its potential application to a broad range of criminal activities does not seem to have been appreciated.

D commits the offence if he undertakes an unauthorized act in relation to a computer and that act causes, or creates a significant risk of causing, serious damage of a 'material kind'

⁷⁸ See eg Vallor [2004] 1 Cr App R (S) 54, spreading the third most virulent virus in the world.

⁷⁹ See eg Lindesay [2002] 1 Cr App R (S) 370, disgruntled sacked employee corrupting firm's website.

⁸⁰ cf Martin [2013] EWCA Crim 1420.

⁸¹ cf Thompson [1984] 3 All ER 565, [1984] 1 WLR 962, CA.

⁸² See MacEwan, n 1, and S Fafinski, 'Computer Misuse: The Implications of the Police and Justice Act 2006' (2006) 72 J Crim L 53.

⁸³ See p 89.

⁸⁴ [2004] AC 1034. See p 101.

⁸⁵ LC 186, para 3.62.

and D knows that it is an unauthorized act and intends the act to cause serious damage of a material kind or is reckless as to whether such damage is caused. It is a jury question whether damage is 'material' but the section makes clear that damage includes 'damage to human welfare, the environment, the economy or national security'. The offence is triable on indictment and carries a maximum sentence of life for threat to life, loss of life or damage to national security or 14 years for damage to the economy or the environment.

Section 3ZA provides:

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if—
 - (a) the person does any unauthorised act in relation to a computer;
 - (b) at the time of doing the act the person knows that it is unauthorised;
 - (c) the act causes, or creates a significant risk of, serious damage of a material kind; and
 - (d) the person intends by doing the act to cause serious damage of a material kind or is reckless as to whether such damage is caused.
- (2) Damage is of a 'material kind' for the purposes of this section if it is—
 - (a) damage to human welfare in any place;
 - (b) damage to the environment of any place;
 - (c) damage to the economy of any country; or
 - (d) damage to the national security of any country.
- (3) For the purposes of subsection (2)(a) an act causes damage to human welfare only if it causes—
 - (a) loss to human life;
 - (b) human illness or injury;
 - (c) disruption of a supply of money, food, water, energy or fuel;
 - (d) disruption of a system of communication;
 - (e) disruption of facilities for transport, or
 - (f) disruption of services relating to health.
- (4) It is immaterial for the purposes of subsection (2) whether or not an act causing damage—
 - (a) does so directly;
 - (b) is the only or main cause of the damage.
- (5) In this section—
 - (a) a reference to doing an act includes a reference to causing an act to be done;
 - (b) 'act' includes a series of acts;
 - (c) a reference to a country includes a reference to a territory, and to any place in, or part or region of, a country or territory.⁸⁶

The offence has the potential to tackle organized crime groups or others seeking to ransom state organisations such as the NHS, private organizations such as rail or air service providers, and financial institutions. It also has the potential to apply in an espionage context where, eg, D in North Korea gains unauthorized access to a computer in the UK with intent to damage national security. The jurisdictional reach is extremely wide, subject to proof that there was a 'significant link' with England and Wales. For example, D who was abroad in country X and was targeting a computer in country Y is triable in England.

⁸⁶ The Serious Crime Act 2015, s 41(2), inserted s 3ZA. The section came into effect on 3 May 2015 (SI 2015/820). The section is designed to ensure compliance with Directive 2013/40/EU on attacks against information systems.

28.6 Making, supplying or obtaining articles for use in offences under s 1 or s 3: s 3ZA

Section 37 of the Police and Justice Act 2006 introduced three new forms of offence. The maximum sentence on conviction on indictment is two years' imprisonment or a fine or both; on summary conviction six months' imprisonment or a fine up to the statutory maximum or both.

By s 3A(1) a person is guilty of an offence if he 'makes, adapts, supplies or offers to supply any article intending it to be used to commit, or to assist in the commission of, an offence under section 1 or 3'. This form of the offence mirrors closely that in s 7 of the Fraud Act 2006.⁸⁷ 'Intention' should be construed in the normal manner.

By s 3A(2), it is an offence to supply or offer to supply any article believing that it is likely to be used to commit, or to assist in the commission of, an offence under s 1, s 3 or s 3ZA. 'Belief' should be construed as elsewhere in the criminal law, to mean a state of mind greater than one of mere suspicion but without constituting knowledge.⁸⁸ The question whether the article is 'likely to be' used for an offence under ss 1 to 3 may give rise to some difficulty in application. According to the Explanatory Notes, if D is charged in relation to a quantity of articles, the prosecution must prove their case 'in relation to any particular one or more of those articles; it would not be enough to prove that the person believed that a certain proportion of the articles was likely to be used in connection with an offence under section 1 or 3' (and presumably now s 3ZA).

Section 3A(3) provides an offence where a person obtains any article 'with a view to' its being supplied for use to commit, or to assist in the commission of, an offence under s 1, 3 or 3za. It is submitted that the mens rea element may be read restrictively to mean purposive intent, as the Court of Appeal held in a different context.⁸⁹ This is a relatively unusual form of offence, criminalizing a 'middle man'. It is not sufficient that D merely obtains; nor is it sufficient if he possesses. This offence requires an obtaining with an ulterior purpose. It extends further than s 3A(1) by capturing D's conduct before he has got as far as to offer to supply or in fact supply the article.

For all three forms of the offence, 'article' includes any program or data held in electronic form: s 3A(4). The mens rea is crucial in each of these offences since the articles which could possibly be used in the commission of computer misuse offences are incredibly wide-ranging—from a screwdriver to complex software, or a computer password.

The new forms of offence were explained by the government as being necessary to combat the market in 'hacker tools' for hacking into computer systems. The provisions also ensure UK compliance with Council of Europe obligations.⁹⁰ Concerns have been raised about the possible criminalization of those engaged in legitimate research into computer security systems.⁹¹

⁸⁷ At p 976. ⁸⁸ See p 115. ⁸⁹ See Dooley [2005] EWCA Crim 3093, p 987.

⁹⁰ Art 6(1)(a) of the 2001 Council of Europe Cybercrime Convention.

⁹¹ See House of Lords Science and Technology Report, Personal Internet Security (2007). See, however, the government's subsequent response which was heavily criticized: T Wright and D Hodgkinson, 'Government Response to House of Lords Science and Technology Committee Report on Personal Internet Security' (2008) 14 Computer and Telecommunications L Rev 65.

By s 42 of the Serious Crime Act 2015, s 3A was amended so that it extends subs (3) to include obtaining a tool for use to commit a s 1 or 3 or 3ZA offence. There is no need to prove that D has intention to supply that tool.⁹²

- (1) A person is guilty of an offence if he obtains any article—
 - (a) intending to use it to commit, or to assist in the commission of, an offence under section 1, 3 or 3ZA, or
 - (b) with a view to its being supplied for use to commit, or to assist in the commission of, an offence under section 1, 3 or 3ZA.

⁹² This ensures compliance with European Parliament and European Council Directive 2013/40/EU on attacks against information systems.

Forgery

Forgery and counterfeiting are now regulated by the Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981.¹ This Act is largely based upon the recommendations of the Law Commission.²

Forgery overlaps with many other offences. It is usually done as a preparatory step to the commission of some other crime, most often a crime involving fraud. Despite the many available dishonesty offences, forgery is retained as a separate offence because it has long been regarded as a serious offence, and the conduct is regarded as distinctive enough to warrant a particular label within the criminal law.

The offences of forgery may be paraphrased as follows:

- (1) making a false instrument (s 1);
- (2) copying a false instrument (s 2);
- (3) using a false instrument (s 3);
- (4) using a copy of a false instrument (s 4);
- (5) having custody or control of specified kinds of false instrument (s 5(1)); and
- (6) making or having custody or control of machines, paper, etc for making false instruments of that kind (s 5(3)).

All of the forgery offences require proof that D intended to induce somebody to accept a false instrument as genuine, which as a result causes V to do or not to do some act to his own or any other person's prejudice. Forgery does not require proof of dishonesty.³

Forgery is triable either way.⁴ The maximum sentence is ten years' imprisonment on indictment, six months' imprisonment or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or both summarily.

A FULL DISCUSSION OF THE OFFENCE IS CONTAINED IN THE CHAPTER, AVAILABLE FREE ONLINE—www.oup.com/uk/sho/

¹ Smith, Property Offences, Ch 23, Arlidge and Parry on Fraud (5th edn, 2016) Ch 11.

² LC 55, Report on Forgery and Counterfeit Currency (1973). See also Law Com Working Paper No 26, Forgery (1970). The history is considered by JWC Turner, 'Documents in the Law of Forgery' (1946) 32 Virg LR 939.

³ Campbell (1984) 80 Cr App R 47; Winston [1999] 1 Cr App R 337.

⁴ Forgery and Counterfeiting Act 1981, s 6.

Obscene communication and publication offences

The criminal law has used a range of offences to deal with obscene communications conveyed through various media. Such criminal regulation clearly engages important issues relating to freedom of expression and the appropriate limits on restricting communication.

The Obscene Publications Act 1959 deals with publishing 'obscene' articles. The Act has distinctive features which render it worthy of study by law students. It contains presumptions, reverse burdens and, unusually, a defence that publication was justified as being in the public good. Challenging questions have been raised about its application in a modern digital world in which images are shared instantaneously across continents.

More modern statutes have criminalized various other types of publication. For example, the Communications Act 2003 makes it an offence to send, by means of a public electronic communications network, a message or other matter that is grossly offensive or of an indecent, obscene or menacing character. Section 63 of the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act 2008 (as amended in 2015) criminalizes the possession of extreme pornographic images. These offences have also raised interesting questions of definition, jurisdiction and as to their application to social media.

The Protection of Children Act 1978 and the Criminal Justice Act 1988 create offences to deal specifically with the making and possession of indecent images of children (we do not examine those offences in detail in this chapter).

A FULL DISCUSSION OF THE OFFENCES IS CONTAINED IN THE CHAPTER, AVAILABLE FREE ONLINE—www.oxfordtextbooks.co.uk/orc/sho/

Offences against public order

Public order offences are commonly prosecuted. Many of the prosecutions are, simply, forms of violence or threatening behaviour against individuals. However, some cases will involve human rights arguments (Arts 10 and 11 of the ECHR) or take on a constitutional dimension about the legitimate limits that the State can place on protest and collective disobedience.

The offences are largely found in the Public Order Act 1986 which replaced the ancient common law offences.¹ The offences examined in the chapter are, in descending order of gravity:

- (1) riot (s 1);
- (2) violent disorder (s 2)
- (3) affray (s 3).
- (4) threatening, abusive or insulting conduct intended, or likely, to provoke violence or cause fear of violence (s 4);
- (5) threatening or abusive conduct likely to cause harassment, alarm or distress (s 5); and
- (6) threatening, abusive or insulting conduct intentionally causing harassment, alarm or distress (s 4A).

The less serious offences (4–6 above) have become heavily used. Note that some 1986 Act offences can be committed in ‘private’ although they remain ‘public order’ offences. As the courts have repeatedly emphasized, it is important to keep sight of the public order foundations of these offences and not treat them as merely additional offences against the person. With the lower level offences under ss 4, 4A and 5, one might question whether they are protecting against a general endangering of public safety and security.

A FULL DISCUSSION IS CONTAINED IN THE CHAPTER, AVAILABLE FREE ONLINE—www.oup.com/uk/sho/

¹ For the law before the 1986 Act, see the 5th edition of this book, Ch 20; for the background to the 1986 Act, see the Home Office, Review of the Public Order Act and Related Legislation (1980) Cmnd 7891 and Law Com Working Paper No 82, Offences Against Public Order (1982) and LC 123, Offences Relating to Public Disorder (1983).

Selected road traffic offences

Road traffic legislation is voluminous, technical and complex and it is neither possible nor appropriate in a work of this kind to deal in a comprehensive way with the plethora of offences created. Nevertheless, there are some road traffic offences that illustrate important principles of criminal law in operation. For example, there are many of the offences that involve strict liability, the road traffic offences which relate to causing death generate interesting issues involving causation, and careless and dangerous driving are rare examples of English law providing endangerment offences.

Our aim is not to offer comprehensive coverage, but to focus attention on the following, most serious, offences which offer insights into general principles of criminal law:

- (1) causing death by dangerous driving (s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1988);
- (2) dangerous driving (s 2 of the Road Traffic Act 1988);
- (3) careless driving (s 3 of the Road Traffic Act 1988); and
- (4) some of the related offences contained in the Road Traffic Acts, such as causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving when under the influence of drink or drugs.

The additions to the legislative scheme in the Road Safety Act 2006 (as subsequently amended in 2015) included some controversial offences in which it was sought to impose liability for a death arising while unlawfully on the roads irrespective of whether the death is due to some defect in the manner of the driving. These provoked considerable concern and led to a powerful Supreme Court decision in Hughes (2013). These offences are also considered in this chapter.

A FULL DISCUSSION OF THE OFFENCES IS CONTAINED IN THE CHAPTER, AVAILABLE FREE ONLINE—www.oup.com/uk/sho/

Bibliography

A comprehensive bibliography, including all references used throughout the book, is now available free online. Readers can quickly and easily locate specific references by using the online, alphabetized bibliography, or alternatively can download and print the entire listing free.

In addition to this, all references are available in the footnotes throughout the text.
www.oup.com/uk/sho/

Bibliography

The following list contains all the references from the book. You can also view the list in printable or PDF format.

A - B - C - D - E - F - G - H - I - J - K - L - M - N - O - P - Q - R - S - T - U - V - W - X - Y - Z

Abbott, C, Enforcing Pollution Control Regulation (2009).

Abortion Law Reform Association, A Guide to the Abortion Act 1967 (1971).

Adam, S, N Cosette-Basecqz and M Nihoul (eds), Corporate Criminal Liability in Europe (2008).

Adams, JN, 'Trespass under the Theft and Firearms Act' (1969) 119 NLJ 655.

Addison, N, Religious Discrimination and Hatred Law (2007).

Addison, N and T Lawson-Cruttenden, Harassment Law and Practice (1998).

Akdeniz, Y, 'Section 3 of the Computer Misuse Act 1990 – An Antidote for Computer Viruses' [1996] 3 Web Jnl CLI.

Akdeniz, Y, 'Cybercrime', in E-Commerce Law & Regulation Encyclopaedia (2003).

Alexander, L, 'Criminal Liability for Omissions: An Inventory of Issues' in S Shute and A Simester (eds), Criminal Law Theory: Doctrines of the General Part (2002).

Alexander, L, 'Lesser Evils: A Closer Look at the Paradigmatic Justification' (2005) 24 Law and Phil 611.

Alexander, L, K Ferzan and S Morse, Crime and Culpability (2009).

Index

Abduction

see also Kidnapping

children 729–30, 730–3

Abortion

Abortion Act 1967 648–55

child destruction,

interrelationship

with 643–5

common law 645–7, 653–5

conscientious objections 653–5

medical practitioners

good faith 652

refusal to perform 654–5 termination by 652–553

multiple pregnancies 651

necessity 653–5

poison or noxious thing, supplying or procuring 647–8

risks, determination of 651

Abroad, offences see Jurisdiction

Absolute liability

strict liability

distinguished 146–7,

166–7

Abuse of position

abuse 965

actus reus 960–5

dishonesty 966

fiduciary duty 962–3

financial interests 965

fraud 959–66

absence of fiduciary duty 963–4

abuse 965

act or omission 965

actus reus 960–5

dishonesty 966

expectation 965

fiduciary duty 962–3

financial interests 965

intent to cause gain or loss 966

interpretation 960

mens rea 966

‘occupies’ 964

offence 959

position 960–1

mens rea 933

sexual offences 813

Accessories see Accomplices

Accomplices

abetting

actus reus 188–9

actus reus

abetting 188–9

aiding 186–8

secondary party 185–6

aiding

actus reus 186–8

concept 187–8

bases of liability 177–9 counselling

meaning 186, 187, 190

innocent agents doctrine 182–3

principals 182

Jogee 176–7, 185–9

joint principal offenders 183

liability 175–9

mens rea 196–212

principal offender 179–82

procuring, meaning of 190–1

secondary party

acquittal of principal offender 222–5

actus reus 185–6

agent provocateur, secondary

liability 231–2

cancellation of assistance 227–8

conditional intent 203–5 conviction

principal acquitted 222–5 secondary party guilty of greater offence than principal 220–2

where principal is not guilty 222

defences 222–3

entrapment, for purpose

of 231–2

essential elements 205–12

foresight 205–6

guilty of greater offence than the principal 220–1 intention thereby to assist 197

intention to aid 197–8

joint enterprise 212–18

knowledge of circumstances 208–12

knowledge of type of crime 208–12

lack of mens rea 224–5

mens rea 196–212

modes 191

no actus reus by principal 224–5

oblique intention to assist 198

omission as sufficient actus

reus 191–3

presence at crime 193–5 preventing or attempting to prevent the crime 226 proof in actus reus 196

reform of law 232–4

Serious Crime Act

2007 233–5

spontaneous violence 228–9 timing 191

type of crime 208–12 variation from proposed course of conduct 210–12

victims

parties to crime,

as 229–30

wilful blindness 205–6

will or might assist 198 withdrawal 225–9

summary 212

transferred malice 212

Accounting, false see False accounting

Actual bodily harm,

occasioning 686–8

Actus reus

abuse of position 960–5

accomplices 175, 185–6

aiding 186–8

secondary party 185–6

actual bodily harm,

occasioning 686–8

analysis 35–6

assault 661–2

actual bodily harm,

occasioning 686–8

penetration, assault by 795

sexual assault 796

assault by penetration 795

attempt 422–30

automatism 39–42

battery 662–3

burglary 1008–17, 1020–1

‘going equipped’ 1027–8

causation 63

causing or inciting child under

13 to engage in sexual activity 803–4

cheating the public revenue 993–5

circumstance, includes 30–1

Actus reus (Cont.)

coincidence with mens rea 26, 35
 compounding an offence 241–3 computer misuse 1105–6, 1110
 conduct crimes 29–30 conduct must be willed 36–7
Dadson case 34–5
 Draft Criminal Code 32
 elements of the offence 26–7 encouragement and assistance acts 478
 believing offence will be committed 486–7
 intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime 478
 one or more offences
 that believes will be committed 490
 excuse 32
 false accounting 989
 false imprisonment 719–23
 fraud
 abuse of position 959–66
 failing to disclose
 information 956–9
 false representations 938–51 making or supplying articles for use in frauds 977–9 obtaining services
 dishonestly 967–8
 possession of articles for
 fraud 970–4
 going equipped 1027–8
 handling stolen goods 1032–49
 identifying elements 27–8 impair computer, intent or recklessness to 1111–12 impeding apprehension or prosecution 235–6 intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 797
 intoxication 37–8
 involuntary acts 37–8, 40–1 physical 40–1 justification 32
 making off without payment 920–4
 mens rea, coincidence
 with 125–9
 nature 28–9
 no conviction without actus
 reus 33
 obtaining services
 dishonestly 967–8
 omissions act distinguished 54–6
 causation 47, 57
 ‘continuous act’ theory 54–6

contractual duties 53–4
 control 62
 creating dangerous situation 54–6 criminal liability, basis for 45–6
 distinguishing between acts and omissions 57–9
 duty to act
 contractual duties 53–4 family 51–2 parents 52
 person under 51–6 voluntary undertakings 52–3 homicide 49
 human rights provisions 60–1 mere, offences 46–7 offences against the person 49–50
 property, offences against 50–1 rescuers 61–2
 result, causing 47 statutory offences 48
 terminating life 59–61
 parties to crime 175 penalty provisions, effect in determining 31–2 penetration, assault by 795
 poisoning 713–16
 possession of articles for
 fraud 970–4
 proof 26–7, 33, 34–5
 inconsistencies 34–5 justification and excuse 34–5
 rape 787–9
 rape of child under 13 801
 result crimes 29
 secondary party 185–6
 self-induced involuntarism 37–8
 sexual assault 796
 sexual offences
 arranging or facilitating commission of child sex
 offence 808
 causing child aged 13–15
 to engage in sexual activity 806
 causing child to watch sexual act 807
 children aged 13–15,
 against 806
 engaging in sexual activity in presence of child 807 intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 797

sexual grooming of children 811–12
 state of affairs as 42–5 temporary deprivation 904–6
 theft 828–70
 victim's conduct 31
 voluntariness 38–9

Aggravated assault arrest, resisting 703–4
 assault 702–3
 constables, on 704–12
 constructive crime 703
 meaning 702–3
 offences 702
 police, by 707–8
 prevention of breach of peace 707–8
 racially or religiously motivated 698–702

Aggravated burglary articles of aggravation 1022–3 explosives 1022–3
 firearms 1022–3
 ‘has with him’,
 interpretation 1023–5
 statutory provisions 1022
 time of commission of the burglary 1023
 weapons 1022–3

Aggravated vehicle taking
 definition 915–18
 liability for offence involved in 915–18
 statutory provisions 915–18

Appropriation 828–43
see also Theft
 assumption of right 828 bona fide purchasers 842–3
 civil law 837–8
 dealing 839
 dishonest 874
Gomez 829–30
 indefeasible title to
 property 831–4 interpretation in case law 834–8 keeping 839
Morris 829
 offers to sell 840–1
 place 842
 requirements 839–40
 scope 834–5
 theft
 consent 829–30
 time 842

Arrest

see also False imprisonment
 aggravated assault 703–4 assault with intention to resist 703–4

- breach of the peace 723
- civilian powers of arrest 723
- false imprisonment 722–4
 - breach of the peace 723
 - civilian powers of arrest 723
 - mens rea 723–4
 - powers of detention 722–3
 - valid warrant, under 722–3
- intention to resist 703–4
- resisting 708–9
- use of force in effecting 395, 396
- Arson
 - destroying or damaging property 1094–5
 - offence 1094
- Articles possessed for fraud see Possession of articles for fraud
- Assault
 - see also* Battery
 - actual bodily harm,
 - occasioning 686–8
 - actus reus 686–8
 - mens rea 688
 - actus reus 661–2
 - actual bodily harm,
 - occasioning 686–8
 - penetration, assault by 795
 - sexual assault 796
 - aggravated
 - arrest, intention to resist 703–4
 - constables, on 704–12
 - prevention of breach of peace 707–8
 - racially or religiously motivated
 - assault 698–702
 - attempt 662
 - battery
 - element of assault 658–9
 - relationship with assault 659–60
 - 'bodily harm', definition of 687–8
 - body modification 680–1
 - child under 13 by penetration, assault of 802
 - common law 657
 - consent 665–83
 - bodily harm, level of 675–6
 - body modification 680–1
 - effective 668–75
 - capacity 669
 - duress, procured under 674–5
 - fraudulently procured 672–4
 - informed consent 669–72
 - foresight 676–8
 - horseplay 680
 - human rights provisions 683
 - implied 667–8
 - informed 669–72
 - intention 676–8
 - legal limits on
 - validity 675–83
 - religious flagellation 683
 - sadomasochism 681–2
 - sexually transmitted disease, risk of 683
 - sports 679–80
 - type of activity
 - involved 678–9
 - corporal punishment 685
 - defences 665–83
 - lawful chastisement 683–5
 - necessity 685
 - self-help 685
 - definition 658–9
 - fraudulently procured
 - consent 672–4
 - hostility 658
 - immediacy 661–2
 - intoxicated person, assault by 665
 - mens rea 664–5, 708–9
 - actual bodily harm,
 - occasioning 688
 - penetration, by 795
 - sexual assault 796–7
 - necessity 685
 - penetration, by 795
 - actus reus 795
 - mens rea 795
 - racially aggravated 698–702
 - contemporaneous
 - demonstration of hostility 700–2
 - recklessness 664–5
 - religiously motivated 698–702
 - self-help 685
 - sexual
 - actus reus 796
 - child under 13 by
 - penetration, assault of 802
 - indecent assault, formerly 795
 - mens rea 796–7
 - sexual, child under 13, of 798–800
 - statutory offence 660–1
 - subjective recklessness 664–5
 - threats to 1006
 - words alone, assault by 662
- Assistance to commit crime see Encouragement and assistance
- Assisted suicide see Suicide
- Assumption of right
 - appropriation 829
- Attempt 412–34
 - see also* Encouragement and assistance
 - abandonment 434
 - actus reus 422–30
 - assault 662
 - beyond mere
 - preparation 424–9
 - categories of offence which may be subject to 431–3
 - conspiracy 432–3
 - summary only offences 431
 - common law 423–4
 - complete crimes 432
 - conditional intention 420–2
 - conspiracy 431–2, 495–9
 - exceptional cases where no liability for 432–3
 - false representations, fraud by 942
 - intention
 - conditional 420–2
 - consequences 413–14
 - intentional conduct 414–20
 - interpretation beyond mere preparation 424–9
 - interpretation, judicial 426–9
 - involuntary manslaughter 432
 - judicial interpretation 426–9
 - jurisdiction 433–4
 - England 433–4
 - France 434
 - limits on liability 431–2
 - mens rea 412–31
 - miscarriage, procuring 645–7
 - murder, duress and 364
 - omission, by 429–30
 - purposive or oblique intention as to consequences 413–14
 - statutory conspiracy
 - and 495–9
 - successful 430–1
 - summary offences 431
 - treason 432
- Automatism
 - actus reus 39–42
 - drunkenness 329–30
 - generally 307
 - insanity
 - causation 329
 - concurrent operation 330
 - intoxication 329–30
 - Law Commission's reform proposals 311
 - physical involuntariness 40–1
 - reform proposals 42
 - self-induced 310–11
 - types 307–9

Basic intent dangerous drugs 315, 323–4 drugs 315, 323–4

 intoxication 313–14

Battery

see also Assault

actual bodily harm,
 occasioning 686–8
actus reus 662–3
 assault, as element of 659–60
 bodily harm, level of 675–6
 body modification 680–1
 common law 657
 consent 665–83
 bodily harm, level of 675–6
 body modification 680–1
 effective 668–75
 capacity 669
 duress, procured
 under 674–5
 fraud procured 672–4
 informed consent 669–72
 foresight 676–8
 horseplay 680
 human rights provisions 683
 implied 667–8
 intention 676–8
 legal limits on validity 675–83
 religious flagellation 683
 sodomasochism 681–2
 sexually transmitted disease,
 risk of 683
 sports 679–80
 type of activity
 involved 678–9
 corporal punishment 685
 defences
 lawful chastisement 683–5
 necessity 685
 self-help 685
 definition 658–9
 foresight 676–8
 horseplay 680
 human rights 683
 instrument, with or via 663–4
 intention 676–8
 intoxicated person, by 665
 lawful chastisement 683–5
 mens rea 664–5
 necessity 685
 recklessness 664–5
 religious flagellation 683
 sodomasochism 681–2
 sexually transmitted disease,
 risk of 683
 sports 679–80
 statutory offence 660–1 subjective recklessness 664–5

Bayonet

offensive weapon, as 748

Bigamy

mistake 334

Blackmail

analysis of offence 999 demand 997–8 unwarranted 1000–3 gain or loss view to, need for 1004–6 impossible threats 1000
 menaces 998–1000
 definition 998–9
 type 999
 origin of word 996
 statutory provisions 996
 subjective approach 1001–3
 unwarranted demand 1000–3

Blades or points, articles with offensive weapons 754–5

Bodily harm actual 686–8

 assault 686–8
 battery 686–8
 burglary 1018
 consent 675–6
 definition 687–8
 grievous see Grievous bodily harm; Wounding

Body modification

assault 680–1
 battery 680–1

Bona fide purchasers

appropriation 842–3
 theft 842–3

Breach of duty

corporate manslaughter 608–9
 involuntary manslaughter 589

Breach of peace

police officer preventing 707–8

Bribery

corporations 248–9

Building, burglary of extent 1015 meaning of building 1013–14 part of building 1015–16

Burden of proof

conspiracy 444–5
 duress 345–6
 handling stolen goods 1046, 1051
 human rights provisions 23–5
 insanity 288, 302–3
 loss of self-control 529
 mistake 333
 offensive weapons 749

Burglary

actus reus 1008–17, 1020–1, 1027–8
 aggravated articles of aggravation 1022–3 explosives 1022–3

 firearms 1022–3
 ‘has with him’,
 interpretation 1023–5
 statutory provisions 1022
 time of commission of the burglary 1023
 weapons 1022–3 building extent 1015
 meaning 1013–14
 part 1015–16
 dwelling
 actus reus 1020–1
 meaning 1017
 mens rea 1021
 in respect of 1019–21
 entry, meaning of 1008–9
 ‘going equipped’
 actus reus 1027–8
 interpretation 1026
 mens rea 1028–9
 grievous bodily harm, intent to 1018–19
 housebreaking equipment,
 going equipped
 with 1027–8
 intention to enter as trespasser 1017
 mens rea 1017–19
 statutory provisions 1007 trespass with intent to commit a sexual offence 1025–6
 trespasser
 entry as 1008–13 exceeding permission 1011–12
 ulterior offence 1017–18
 unlawful damage, causing 1019 vehicles, inhabited 1016–17 vessels 1016–17
 victim 1013
 wounding, with intent to inflict 1018

Burial

preventing decent and lawful
 burial 656

But for principle 64Caldwell recklessness 105–7*Capacity combined causes of loss of

 capacity 329–32
 concurrent causes of loss of capacity 330–2
 consent 669
 intoxication 329–30

- loss of due to
 - intoxication 329–30
 - negligence 142
- Causation
 - actus reus as part of 63
 - 'but for' principle 64
 - contributory causes 65–6
 - fault and result, connection
 - between 66–7
 - intended consequences 83
 - intervening acts or events 68–9
 - naturally occurring 69–70
 - subsequent conduct of
 - defendant 69
 - third party
 - interventions 70–5
 - involuntary
 - manslaughter 581–2
 - Law Commission
 - proposals 84–5
 - law or fact 63–4
 - medical interventions 75–9
 - mens rea 126–7
 - negligible causes 67–8
 - omissions 47, 57
 - reform proposals 84–5
 - self-neglect by victim 80
 - subsequent acts of victim 80–2
 - third party interventions 70–5
 - victim's conduct breaking chain
 - of causation 79–82
- Cheating the public revenue
 - actus reus 993–5
 - common law offence 993–5
 - Criminal Law Review
 - Committee
 - proposals 993
- Cheques
 - false representations 946–7
 - fraud 946–7
 - theft 845–6
- Child destruction
 - abortion, interrelationship
 - with 643–5
 - definition 641–2
 - foetal condition 642
 - human rights 643
 - preserving life of mother 644
 - statutory provisions 641–3
- Child protection
 - corporate manslaughter 612
- Children
 - abduction 730–3
 - causing or allowing a child to
 - die 138
 - criminal responsibility
 - aged 10 and above 342–4
 - under 10 years old 341–2
 - false statements in relation to
 - birth of a child 656
 - indecent photographs 817
 - lawful chastisement 683–5
 - registration of births or death of
 - a child 656
 - sexual grooming 811–12
 - sexual offences 802–3
 - aged 13–15 804–12
 - indecent photographs 817
 - under 13, against 798–800
- Circumcision, male
 - lawfulness 681
- Circumstances, duress of 364–7
- Civil partners
 - theft, liability for 957
- Civil proceedings
 - criminal proceedings
 - distinguished 13–14
- Coercion see Duress: Marital Coercion
- Common law
 - abortion 645–7, 653–5
 - assault 657
 - attempt 423–4
 - battery 657
 - burial, preventing decent and
 - lawful 656
 - cheating the public
 - revenue 993–5
 - conspiracy
 - corrupt public morals,
 - to 472–3
 - defraud, to 461–2
 - Fraud Act 2006 471
 - public duty, agreement to
 - deceive to act 464–5
 - scope of offence 462–3
 - dishonesty 468–9
 - human rights 470–1
 - imperilling economic
 - interests, by 463–4
 - impossibility 495
 - intention to defraud 461–71
 - outrage public decency,
 - to 473
 - perpetrators 469
 - prejudice
 - putting at risk 467
 - constructive malice 514–15
 - fraud 926–7
 - murder 514–15
 - provocation 521–2, 522
 - rape 786
 - source of law 15–17
 - strict liability 147–8
 - theft 885
 - unlawful act
 - manslaughter 568–70
- Companies see Corporations
- Compounding an offence
 - actus reus 241–3
 - offence 241
 - reform proposals 244
- Compulsion see Duress
- Computer misuse
 - actus reus 1105–6, 1110
 - background 1101–4
 - computer
 - access, intent to
 - secure 1106–7
 - function, performing 1106
 - lack of definition 1105–6
 - serious damage 1112–14
 - unauthorized access
 - to 1108–9
 - intent to commit or
 - facilitate further
 - offences 1108–9
 - impair, intent or recklessness to
 - actus reus 1110
 - background to
 - offence 1110–11
 - mens rea 1112
 - impair, intent or recklessness
 - to 1109–12
 - knowledge of unauthorized
 - access 1106–7
 - Law Commission 1101–4
 - making or supplying articles for
 - use in offences 1114–15
 - mens rea 1106–7, 1112
 - serious damage to a
 - computer 1112–14
 - unauthorized access
 - to computer
 - material 1104–8
- Concealment of birth 655
- Conduct crimes
 - actus reus 29–30
- Confidential information
 - theft 852–3
- Conjoined twins case 375–6
- Conscientious objections
 - abortion 653–5
- Consent
 - appropriation 829–31
 - assault
 - bodily harm, level of 675–6
 - effective 668–75
 - capacity 669
 - duress, procured
 - under 674–5
 - fraudulently
 - procured 672–4
 - informed consent 669–72
 - foresight 676–8
 - horseplay 680
 - human rights provisions 683
 - implied 667–8
 - informed 669–72
 - intention 676–8

Consent (Cont.)

legal limits on validity 675–83
 religious flagellation 683
 sadomasochism 681–2
 sexually transmitted disease,
 risk of 683
 sports 679–80
 type of activity
 involved 678–9
 battery 665–83
 bodily harm, level
 of 675–6
 body modification 680–1
 effective
 capacity 669
 duress, procured
 under 674–5
 fraudulently procured 672–4
 informed consent 669–72
 effective consent 668–75
 foresight 676–8
 horseplay 680
 human rights provisions 683
 implied 667–8
 intention 676–8
 legal limits on validity 675–83
 religious flagellation 683
 sadomasochism 681–2
 sexually transmitted disease,
 risk of 683
 sports 679–80
 surgery 680
 type of activity
 involved 678–9
 capacity 669
 conveyances, temporary deprivation of 910–12
 destroying or damaging
 property 1080–1
 drug assisted rape 774–5
 duress, procured under 674–5
 foresight 676–8
 fraudulently procured 672–4
 horseplay 680
 human rights 683
 implied 667–8
 intention 676–8
 intoxication 764–7
 kidnapping 728
 legal limits on validity 675–83
 rape absence of consent 789–94
 belief in consent 790–1
 mens rea 789–94
 reasonable belief 791–3
 religious flagellation 683
 sadomasochism 681–2

sexual acts and fraud 775–82
 sexual offences
 capacity 762–3 choice 761–2 concept 757–8 conclusive
 presumptions 775–82
 deception 767–9
 definition 758–9
 drug assisted rape 775
 evidential
 presumptions 769–72
 fraud, obtained by 775–82
 free agreement 759–64
 identity fraud, obtained
 by 782
 inability to communicate owing to physical disability 774
 inability to refuse through
 intoxication 764–7
 intoxication 764–7
 submission 759–61
 substances taken causing stupification or overpowering of complainant 774–5
 threats of violence 772–3
 unconsciousness 773–4
 unlawful detention 773
 sexually transmitted disease, risk 683
 sports 679–80
 surgery 680
 theft belief in consent 873
 unlawful act
 manslaughter 572–3

Conspiracy

see also Encouragement and assistance
 attempt 431–2, 495–9
 burden of proof 444–5
 common law 436
 corrupt public morals,
 to 472–3
 defraud, to 461–2
 Fraud Act 2006 471
 public duty, agreement to deceive to act 464–5
 scope of offence 462–3
 human rights 470–1
 imperilling economic interests, by 463–4
 impossibility 495
 intention to defraud 461–71
 outrage public decency,
 to 473
 perpetrators 469
 prejudice 467

company may be convicted of 440
 definition 435–6
 defraud, to 461–2
 Fraud Act 2006 471
 public duty, agreement to deceive to act 464–5
 scope of offence 462–3
 handling stolen goods 1048
 intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime, relationship with 485
 mentally disordered persons 443 multiple conspiracies 443–4 parties acquittal of other 460
 civil partners 441
 infants 441
 mentally disordered persons 443
 sole conspirators 442–3 spouses 441
 statutory exceptions 440–2 victims 441–2
 public mischief 435
 receiving, innocent and subsequent retention 1048–9
 reform 473–4
 relationship between common law and statutory 436–7
 sole conspirators 443 statutory 436, 437–59 acquittal of other alleged conspirators 460 agreement 440–5
 more than offence, commission of 444
 proof 444–5
 timing 444
 wheel and chain
 conspiracies 438–40
 attempts and 495–9
 conditional agreements 447–50
 course of conduct circumstances as part
 of 446–7
 meaning 445–6
 drugs, importing 458
 jurisdiction 460–1
 mens rea 452–9
 facts or circumstances which must be known 457–8
 ignorance of criminal law no defence 459 intention to agree 452
 intention to carry out agreement 452–4

- knowledge as to
 - circumstances 456–9
 - one party only having 459
 - play some part in carrying out agreement, intention to 455–6
 - scope of application 456–7
 - unforeseen but inevitable consequences 455–6
 - object 450–2
 - procedural issues 459–61
 - voluntary manslaughter 452
 - summary of present law 436
 - Constables see Police
 - Constructive crime 120–1
 - Constructive malice
 - abolition 515
 - common law 514–15
 - Control
 - Crown, degree of control 13
 - destroying or damaging property 1098–9
 - possession of articles for fraud 973–4
 - theft 855
 - Controlling officers
 - Draft Criminal Code 249
 - identification doctrine 249–56, 600–1
 - Convictions
 - impossibility of conviction without actus reus 33
 - Corporal punishment 685
 - Corporate manslaughter
 - aggregation 601
 - breach of duty as result of management or organization 607–8
 - causing death 609
 - child protection 612
 - Corporate Manslaughter and Homicide Act 2007
 - background 599–600
 - breach of duty as result of management or organization 607–8
 - causing death 609
 - elements of offence 605–9
 - excluded duties 609–12
 - gross breach of duty 608–9
 - identification doctrine 255–6
 - offence 602
 - organizations 604
 - rationale for reform of old law 600–2
 - relationship to other offences 603
 - relevant duty 605–7
 - senior management 607–8
 - elements of offence 605–9
 - excluded duties 609–12
 - child protection 612
 - emergency services 611–12
 - military activities 610–11
 - police 611
 - probation 612
 - public policy 609–10
 - gross breach of duty 608–9
 - jurisdiction 613
 - military activities 610–11
 - police 611
 - probation 612
 - problems with old law 600–2
 - procedure 612–14
 - public policy 609–10
 - publicity order 614
 - relationship to other offences 603
 - relevant duty 605–7
 - senior management 607–8
 - sentencing 613
 - Corporations
 - see also* Corporate manslaughter
 - aggregation of mens rea 262–3
 - bases of criminal liability
 - identification doctrine 249–56
 - personal liability of directors 247–8
 - statutory duties 248–9
 - statutory liability of officers 256–7
 - strict liability 248
 - vicarious liability 249
 - bribery 248–9
 - conspiracy 440
 - culpable corporate culture 263–4
 - false statement by company directors 990–1
 - identification doctrine 249–56
 - acting within the scope of corporate duty 253
 - acting as and yet against the corporation 253
 - aggregation of several controlling individuals' culpability 255–6, 601
 - controlling officer 250–1
 - Corporate Manslaughter and Homicide Act 2007 255–6
 - Meridian* case 251–3
 - problems with 600–1
 - state of mind 254
 - liability 245–7
 - limits on liability 258
 - mens rea 263
 - officers, false statements by 990–1
 - officers' liability 990–1
 - personal liability of directors 247–8
 - rationale of law 261–2
 - reactive corporate fault 264
 - reform of law 261–2
 - sentencing 258–9
 - statutory duties 248–9
 - statutory liability of officers 256–7
 - strict liability 248
 - tax evasion 249
 - theft 893
 - theft of property 866–7
 - unlikely offences 259
 - vicarious liability 249, 266–75
- Corpses
 - theft 868–89
- Correspondence principle 120
- Cosh
 - offensive weapon, as 748
- Counselling
 - see also* Accomplices
 - meaning 190
- Counterfeiting 1116
- Credit cards
 - false representations 947–8
 - fraud 947–8
- Crime
 - basis of criminalization 12
 - characteristics generally 5
 - characteristics moral
 - wrong 8–12
 - characteristics public
 - wrong 5–8
 - classification 12–14
 - criminal quality of act 12
 - definition 3–4
 - criminal proceedings and civil proceedings distinguished 13–14
 - Crown, degree of control 13
 - human rights
 - provisions 21–2
 - involuntary manslaughter 568
 - Kenny 13
 - Parliament or courts, endorsement by 3
 - practical test 14–15
 - public wrong 3
 - use of force 396
 - elements actus reus and mens rea see actus reus; mens rea
 - harm 10–12
 - human rights provisions 19–25
 - punishment and 12–14

Crime prevention

use of force in 395, 396

Criminal code

Draft Code see Draft Criminal Code

Criminal damage see Destroying or damaging property*Criminal law aims 4–5

human rights provisions 19–25

burden of proof 23–5

Convention rights 22–3

definition of crime 21–2

Human Rights Act

1998 19–21

Criminal Law RevisionCommittee

cheating the public revenue 993

definition of temporary deprivation 903

dishonesty clarified by 872

Criminal proceedings

civil proceedings

distinguished 13

Criminal responsibility

children aged 10 and above 342–4

children under 10 years 341–2

Cunningham

recklessness 104–5

Dagger

offensive weapon, as 748

Damage to property see

Destroying or damaging property

Dangerous driving

negligence 138

Dangerous drugs

see also Drugs; Intoxication

basic intent crimes 323–4

being concerned in the management of premises 164–5

intoxication by 315

basic intent crime 315

possession 161–4

strict liability offences 161–4

Death

see also Manslaughter; Murder

accelerating 509–12

corporate manslaughter 609

false statements in relation to death 656

involuntary

manslaughter 589–92

murder 507–8

Queen's peace, under 508

time of death 508–9

unlawful act

manslaughter 581–2

year and a day rule 508–9

Debit cards

fraud 947–8

Debtor

unlawful harassment 1006

Deception

definition 926–7

suppression of documents 992–3

Defences

see also Diminished

responsibility; Loss of self-control;

Provocation

assault 665–83

battery 665–83

due diligence 142

duress 344–67

effect of successful defence 279

encouragement and assistance

believing offence will be committed 488

intentionally assisting

or encouraging a

crime 483–5

one or more offences

that believes will be committed 492

reasonable conduct 483–4

victim assists 484–5 exemption from criminal responsibility 341

impossibility 409

infancy 341–4

infanticide as partial defence to

murder 632

insanity 280–306, 303–4

intoxication 311–29

justification and excuse 278–80

marital coercion, abolition of defence of 379

mistake 332–40

murder, infanticide as partial defence to 632

necessity 367–79, 685, 1087–9

non-insane automatism 310–11

possession of articles for

fraud 975

public and private 380–408

reform proposals of

insanity 305–7

relationship between

defences 280

self-induced

automatism 310–11

superior orders 379–80

theories 277–8

unfitness to be tried 281–90

Destroying or damagingproperty

arson 1094–5

authorized damage 1088–9

claim of right 1088

consent, belief in 1080–1

control 1098–9

damage

foresight of

consequences 1077–9

defence of property 1081–6

believe in existence of interest 1086

'immediate need',

interpretation 1083–4

'in order to',

interpretation 1082–3

origins of threat 1081–2

other defences, relationship

with 1084

prophylactic measures

in 1085–6

reasonableness,

belief 1084

threat to property 1082

type of threat 1081–2 destroy or damage, meaning of 1069–73

duress of circumstances 1087–9

endangerment of life

intention 1089–94

lawful excuse 1093–4

offences 1094

recklessness 1091–3

intention 1076–7

kindred offences 1099–100

lawful excuse 1079–80

mens rea 1076–9

necessity 1087–9

possession offences 1098–9

control 1098–9

custody 1098–9

mens rea 1099

things used 1099

property

belonging to another 1074–5

meaning 1073–4

protecting interests of others 1086

protests 1088

racially aggravated criminal damage 1095

self-defence 1087–9

necessity 1087–9

sentencing 1098

statutory provisions 1069

threats 1095–8

conduct threatened 1096

mens rea 1099

Diminished responsibility

- abnormality of mental functioning 551–2
- background 548–9
- cause of killing 550–60
- elements of defence 550–64
- expert, role of 564–6
- explanation of the killing 560–1
- insanity and 566–7
- intoxication 561–3
- jury, role of 564–6
- new law 549–50, 550–64
- old Law 549
- recognized medical condition 552–6
- sentencing 567
- statutory provisions 549–50
- substantial impairment of mental ability 556–60

Dishonesty

- abuse of position 966
- appropriation 874
- Criminal Law Revision Committee clarification 872
- definition 871–2
- false accounting 986–7
- false representations 955
- fraud 959
 - abuse of position 966
 - failing to disclose information 959
 - obtaining services dishonestly 968
- general fraud offence 930–3
- Ivey v Genting Casinos* 879–84
- making off without payment 924
- obtaining services dishonestly 968
- theft
 - criticism 881–4
 - definition of fraud 874–5
 - determination of dishonesty 875–6
 - element of offence 874–85
 - reform 884–5

Doctors see MedicalpractitionersDoli incapax 343, 344Domestic violence

- Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004 634–41

Draft Criminal Code

- actus reus 32
- controlling officers 249
- fault 86, 154
- intention 98
- recklessness 101, 109
- vicarious Liability 276

Drugs

- administering 817–18
- basic intent offences 315, 323–4
- being concerned in the management of premises 164–5
- dangerous 315, 323–4
 - basic intent crimes 323–4
 - being concerned in the management of premises 164–5
 - possession 161–4
 - strict liability offences 161–4
- intervening acts 73–5
- manslaughter, supply of drugs and 581–2
- rape, drug assisted 774–5
- strict liability offences 161–4
- supply 581–2
- unlawful act
 - manslaughter 581–2

Drunkenness*see also* Intoxication

- assault 665
- automatism and 329, 330
- battery 665
- belief in circumstances 324–5
- caused by automatism 330
- defence 311–29, 327, 553
- defences 327, 553
- Heard* case 319–21
- induced with intention of committing crime 327–8
- insanity and 329–30
- involuntary 314–15
- Majewski* case 315–17, 328
- mens rea, denial 312–13
- recklessness 315–17, 322
- reform of law 328–9
- self-defence 325–7
- specific and basic intent crimes 315–17
- voluntary 315–22

Due diligence

- negligence 142
- strict liability and 170–4

Duress

- attempted murder 364
- circumstances, of 344, 364–7
- consent procured under 674–5
- defence not available 360–4
- murder 361–4
- necessity
 - exclusion of defence 370–1
- onus of proof 345–6
- police, opportunity to inform 355–7
- threats 344
 - against whom made 350

- concurrent cause of crime 354
- evaluation of response to threat 350–2
- evasive action not possible 355–7
- extraneous 349
- factual existence 349
- nature 346–7, 369–70
- no need to exist in fact 349
- person of reasonable steadfastness 352–4
- protection against threat 355–7
- qualifying threat or danger 347–9
- response to threat 350–2
- treason 361
- voluntarily laying self open to threats 357–60
- voluntariness 344–5

Dwelling

- burglary
 - actus reus 1020–1
 - meaning 1017
 - mens rea 1021
 - in respect of 1019–21
- meaning 1017

Ear piercing

- lawfulness 681

Electricity

- theft 850–2

Electronic data

- possession of articles for fraud 973

Employer

- vicarious liability 275

Encouragement and assistance

- actus reus
 - believing offence will be committed 486–7
 - intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime 479–81
 - one or more offences that believes will be committed 490
- background to offences 475–6
- believing offence will be committed 487–9
 - actus reus 487
 - belief acts will assist or encourage 488
 - belief that offence will be committed 488
- defences 488–9
- example 487
- exemptions 489
- mens rea 487–8

Encouragement and assistance

(Cont.)

- one or more offences 489–90
- procedure 487
- scope of offence 489
- defences
 - believing offence will be committed 492
 - intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime 483–5
- one or more offences
 - that believes will be committed 492
- reasonable conduct 483–4
- victim assisters 484–5
- forms of liability 476–7
- generally 474–5
- impossibility 499–500
- intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime
 - acts 478
 - actus reus 479–81
 - assisting 481
 - conspiracy, relationship with 485
 - defences 483–5
 - encouraging 480–1
 - intention to assist or encourage 481–2
 - intention to do acts
 - capable of assisting or encouraging 481–2
 - interrelationship with other provisions 477
 - mens rea 420–2
 - multiple offences 481
 - offences 478
 - principal, relationship
 - between liability as a 485
 - reasonable conduct 483–4
 - secondary liability, relationship with 485
 - sentencing 478
 - victim assisters 484–5
- jurisdiction 493–4
- mens rea
 - believing offence will be committed 487–8
 - intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime 481–3
- one or more offences
 - that believes will be committed 491–2
- multiple offences
 - intentionally assisting or encouraging a crime 481–3

- one or more offences that
 - believes will be committed 489–93
- actus reus 490
- defences 492
- example 490
- mens rea 491–2
- offences capable of
 - being assisted or encouraged 492–3
- scope of offence 489–90
- procedure 493
- reasonable conduct 483–4
- scope of liability 476–7
- victim assisters 484–5

Endangerment of life

- intention 1089–94
- lawful excuse 1093–4
- offences 1094
- recklessness 1091–3

Entering

- burglary 1008–9

Entrapment 231–2Entry

- meaning 1008–13
- trespasser, as 1010–13

Epilepsy 296European Union

- source of criminal law 18–19

Excuse

- actus reus 32
- destroying or damaging property 1079–80
- endangerment of life 1093–4
- intervening acts 70–1
- justification
 - distinguished 278–80
- kidnapping 729
- murder, threat to 618
- offensive weapons 751–3

Failing to disclose information*see FraudFalse accounting

- account, definition of 980
- actus reus 981–5
- awareness of materiality 989
- destruction of records 983
- dishonesty, interpretation
 - of 986–7
- falsification 983–4
- gain and loss 987–8
- knowledge as to falsity 986
- made or required for 981–3
- material particular 984–5
- mens rea 986–9
- purpose 983
- s 17(1)(b) offences
 - actus reus 989
 - mens rea 989

- statement in accounts or records 985–6
- statutory provisions 980
- strict liability as to accounting purpose 988

False imprisonment 717–24

- actus reus 719–23
- arrest
 - breach of the peace 723
 - civilian powers of arrest 723
 - constable, by 722–3
 - mens rea 723–4
 - powers of detention 722–3
 - valid warrant, under 722–3
- imprisonment, definition
 - of 719–22
- kidnapping 724–30
- mens rea 723–4
- reform of law 724
- tort and 721–2
- unlawful restraint 722–4

False representations, fraud*by* 936–55

- actus reus 938–51
- attempts 942
- by whom representation
 - made 939
- cheques 946–7
- conduct-based offence 937–8
- credit cards 947–8
- debit cards 947–8
- dishonesty 955
- express representation 946
- fact, representations as to 949
- failing to disclose information, relationship with 956
- falsity 951–3
- implied representation 946
- knowledge 953–5
- law, representations as to 949
- machines, representations
 - to 940–1
- makes a representation 938–51
- mens rea 953–5
- misleading representations 952
- mistake of law 954
- negligence 954
- occurrence of
 - representation 942
- offence 936–7
- omissions 943–6
- opinion, statements 950–1
- proof of falsity 953
- states of mind, representations
 - as to 949–50
- time of commission of
 - offence 938
- timing of
 - representation 939–40
- untrue representations 951–2

- victimless crime 938
- wilful blindness 954
- words, conduct or other means 942–3
- Fault
 - culpable 139
 - degrees of fault 86
 - Draft Criminal Code 86, 154
 - negligence 139–40
 - objective 87–8
 - reactive corporate fault 264
 - result, connection with 66–7
 - strict liability 87
 - subjective 87–8
- Fiduciary duty
 - abuse of position 962–3
 - fraud 962–3
- Firearms
 - aggravated burglary 1022–3
- Flick knife
 - offensive weapon, as 748
- Food terrorism, threats of 1006
- Force, use of
 - arresting offenders, in 396
 - belief of defendant 382–3, 384–7
 - defence of property 404–5
 - definition of crime in
 - considering use of 396
 - excessive
 - known circumstances 407–8
 - householder cases 387–91
 - human rights legislation, effect of 392–4
 - lawful force, defence
 - against 402–3
 - loss of self control 398–9
 - offences to which an answer 405–7
 - pre-emptive strike 400–1
 - preventing crime 396
 - provoked attack, defence
 - against 401–2
 - public and private defence, in
 - general principle 381–2
 - provoked attack 401–2
 - right of 398–9
 - self-defence 401–2
 - reasonableness 382–3, 397–8
 - reform proposals 408–9
 - requirement for use of force 398
 - retreat, duty to 399–400
 - robbery, in 897–8
 - unknown circumstances of justification 403–4
- Foresight
 - accomplices 205–6
 - assault 676–8
 - battery 676–8
 - consent 676–8
 - recklessness as to risk 94
- Forgery 1116
- Fraud
 - see also* Blackmail; Deception; False accounting; Theft
 - abuse of position 959–66
 - absence of fiduciary duty 963–4
 - abuse 965
 - act or omission 965
 - actus reus 960–5
 - dishonesty 966
 - expectation 965
 - fiduciary duty 962–3
 - financial interests 965
 - intent to cause gain or loss 966
 - interpretation 960
 - mens rea 966
 - 'occupies' 964
 - offence 959
 - position 960–1
 - actus reus
 - abuse of position 960–5
 - failing to disclose
 - information 955–9
 - false representations 938–51
 - making or supplying articles for use in frauds 977–9
 - obtaining services
 - dishonestly 967–8
 - possession of articles for fraud 970–4
 - assault 672–4
 - awareness of duty 958
 - battery 672–4
 - cheques 946–7
 - claim of right 931–3
 - claims of entitlement to the gain 935–6
 - commencement 930
 - common law 926–7
 - consent to sexual act obtained by 775–82
 - conspiracy to commit 461–71
 - credit cards 947–8
 - debit cards 947–8
 - definition 926–7
 - dishonesty 959
 - abuse of position 966
 - failing to disclose
 - information 959
 - obtaining services
 - dishonestly 968
 - exposure to temporary loss 936
 - failing to disclose information
 - actus reus 956–9
 - dishonesty 959
 - elements of offence 955
 - failing to disclose 959
 - false representation offence, relationship with 956
 - intent to gain or cause loss or expose to risk of loss 959
 - interpretation 956
 - legal duty to disclose 956–9
 - mens rea 959
 - offence 955
 - person 958–9
 - scope of duty 958
 - types of duty 956–8
 - false representations 936–55
 - actus reus 938–51
 - attempts 942
 - by whom representation made 939
 - cheques 946–7
 - conduct-based offence 937–8
 - credit cards 947–8
 - debit cards 947–8
 - dishonesty 955
 - express representation 946
 - fact, representations as to 949
 - failing to disclose
 - information, relationship with 956
 - falsity 951–3
 - implied representation 946
 - knowledge 953–5
 - law, representations as to 949
 - machines, representations to 940–1
 - makes a representation 938–51
 - mens rea 953–5
 - misleading
 - representations 952
 - mistake of law 954
 - negligence 954
 - occurrence of representation 942
 - offence 936–7
 - omissions 943–6
 - opinion, statements of 950–1
 - proof of falsity 953
 - states of mind, representations as to 949–50
 - time of commission of offence 938
 - timing of representation 939–40
 - untrue
 - representations 951–2
 - victimless crime 938
 - wilful blindness 954

Fraud (Cont.)

words, conduct or other means 942-3

fiduciary duty 962-3

Fraud Act 2006 926-7

general fraud offence

- common elements 930-6
- dishonesty 930-3
- interpretation 929
- merits 927
- offence 928-9
- sentencing 929

human rights 931

intent to gain or cause loss or to expose risk of loss 933

intention 934

jurisdiction 929-30

Law Commission

- proposals 927-8

loss or gain 933-4

making or supplying articles for use in frauds

- actus reus 977-9
- adapts 977
- any article 977
- in the course of or in connection with any fraud 979
- forms of offence 976
- Fraud Act 2006, s 7 976-9
- makes 977
- mens rea 979
- offers to supply 978
- scope of offence 976
- supplies 977-8
- to commit or assist in the commission of 979
- for use in any fraud 979

mens rea

- abuse of position 966
- failing to disclose information 959
- false representations 953-5
- making or supplying articles for use in frauds 979
- obtaining services dishonestly 968-9
- possession of articles for fraud 974-5 merits of general fraud offence 927 obtaining services dishonestly 966-9

- act 967
- actus reus 967-8
- dishonesty 968
- intention 969
- knowing that payment required or might be required 968-9

- mens rea 968-9
- obtaining 967
- offence 966-7
- service 967-8
- without payment 968

possession of articles for fraud 969-75

- actus reus 970-4
- any fraud 974
- article 970-1
- control 973-4
- defences 975
- electronic data 973
- has in his possession 971-3
- inchoate liability 975
- knowing possession 972
- knowledge of fraudulent nature of article 972

Law Commission

- proposals 969

mens rea 974-5

person 971

personal possession 971-2

scope of offence 969-70

for use in course of or in connection with 974

remoteness 934-6

risks 933-4, 959

temporary loss 936

Theft Acts, provisions under 926

Fright

unlawful act

- manslaughter 580-1

GBH see Grievous bodily harmGoing equipped

actus reus 1027-8

housebreaking

- equipment 1027-8

interpretation 1026

mens rea 1028-9

Grievous bodily harm

alternative verdicts 696-7

burglary with intent to inflict 1018-19

infliction 688-94

Law Commission's reform proposals 697-8

malice 695-6

maliciously inflicting 688-94

mens rea 694-6

ulterior intent 694-5

Gross negligence manslaughter

reform 598

Handling stolen goods

actus reus 1032-49

advertising for return of goods 1055-6

arranging to receive 1041-2

arranging to undertake or assist 1043

assisting 1042, 1043

benefit of another person, for 1047-8

burden of proof 1046, 1051

ceasing to be stolen, when 1036-7

conspiracy 1048

dishonestly retaining wrongful credit 1053-5

dishonesty 1051

disposal 1043

duration of stealing 1045-6 forms 1039-40

goods

- meaning 1032
- original stolen goods, representing 1038-9 knowledge or belief 1049-50

land 1032-3

mens rea 1049-53

omissions 1044-5

realization 1043

receiving 1040-1

recent possession, doctrine of 1052-3

removal 1043

retention 1042, 1048-9

sentencing 1031-2

statutory provisions 1031

stealing, otherwise than in the course of 1045 stolen, meaning 1033-6

thief

- guilt 1034-6

things in action 1033

undertaking 1042

wrongful credit, dishonestly retaining 1053-5

Harassment

background 733-5

course of conduct 735-42

debtor, of 1006

defences 1088

definition 735

home, in 745

justification 740-2

limitation period 742

mens rea 739-40

numbers involved 737

possession of same information, in 740

Protection from Harassment Act 1997 735-44

proximity 738-9

racially aggravated 744-5 religiously aggravated 744-5 victim, same 737-8

- violence, causing fear of 743–4
- when begins 739
- Harm
 - classification as crime 10–12
 - crime 10–12
 - unlawful act
 - manslaughter 580–1
 - use of formula 10–11
- Hijacked aircraft, shooting down 376
- Home, harassment in the 745
- Homicide see Abortion;
 - Child destruction;
 - Infanticide;
 - Manslaughter; Murder;
 - Suicide
- Horseplay
 - battery 680
 - consent 680
- Hostility
 - assault 658
 - racially aggravated
 - crime 698–702
- Housebreaking equipment, going equipped with 1027–8
- Human rights 19–23
 - assault 683
 - battery 683
 - burden of proof 23–5
 - child destruction 643
 - consent 683
 - conspiracy to defraud 470–1
 - Convention rights 22–3
 - criminal charge 21
 - fraud 931
 - Human Rights Act 1998 19–21
 - involuntary
 - manslaughter 595–6
 - sexual offences 825
 - strict liability 167
 - substantive criminal law 21
- Identification doctrine 249–56
 - acting as and yet against the
 - corporation 253
 - acting within the scope of
 - corporate duty 253
 - aggregation of several
 - controlling individuals'
 - culpability 255–6
 - controlling officer 250–1
 - Corporate Manslaughter
 - and Homicide Act
 - 2007 255–6
 - Meridian* case 251–3
 - state of mind 254
- Identity fraud
 - consent to sexual act obtained
 - by 782
- Ill-treatment
 - offence 712–13
- Impeding apprehension or prosecution
 - actus reus 236–8
 - assistance, act of 237–8
 - escape, relationship to 238
 - intent, requirement of 239–40
 - knowledge and belief 239
 - lawful authority 240
 - mens rea 238–40
 - offence 235–6
 - proof of relevant offence 236–7
 - sentencing 240
 - some other relevant offence 239
 - subject matter of knowledge or
 - belief 239
- Impossibility
 - common law conspiracy 495
 - defence 409
 - encouragement and
 - assistance 499–500
 - fact, in 494–5
 - inchoate crime and 494–500
 - non-existent crimes and 494
 - reform proposals 500
- Imprisonment
 - definition 719–22
 - false see False imprisonment
- Inchoate crime
 - impossibility and 494–500
- Inchoate offences 410–500
 - actus reus 410
 - meaning 410
 - possession of articles for
 - fraud 975
- Incitement
 - see also* Encouragement and assistance
- Indecent photographs
 - children 817
- Infancy
 - see also* Children
 - children over 10 342–4
 - children under 10 341–2
 - defence 341–4
 - doli incapax* 343, 344
- Infanticide
 - background to law 631–2
 - partial defence to murder 632
 - reform proposals 632–4
- Insanity
 - automatism
 - caused by 330
 - concurrent operation 331–2
 - burden of proof 302–3
 - caused by automatism 331–2
 - caused by intoxication 330
 - defect of reason 298
 - defence 280–306
- diminished responsibility
 - and 566–7
- disease of the mind 296–300
- epilepsy 296
- external and internal factors
 - distinguished 295–6
- fitness to plead
 - burden of proof 288
 - criteria 282–3
 - magistrates' courts 288–9
 - raising issue 284–5
 - time of trial 284–5
 - trial of facts 285–7
 - unfit person, disposal powers
 - relating to 288
 - youth courts 288–9
- insane delusions 301
- irresistible impulse 301–2
- jury to determine 305
- knowledge of wrongness of
 - act 299–300
- Law Commission's reform
 - proposals 306–7
- mental condition rendering
 - trial impracticable 281
- M'Naghten Rules 291–2, 302,
 - 566–7
- nature and quality of act 298–9
- operation of defence 290–1
- plea 291–302
- psychological blow 297
- raising issue of at trial 290
- range of conditions treated
 - as disease of the
 - mind 296–7
- reform 289–90
- reform proposals 42, 305–7
- right of appeal against
 - verdict 304–5
- scope of defence 303–4
- sleepwalking 296
- special verdict 304–5
- test 291–302
- unfitness to be tried 281–90
- Instruments
 - false 1116
- Intention
 - assisting or aid secondary
 - party 198–205
 - attempt
 - conditional 420–2
 - consequences 412–13
 - attempts 98
 - avoid payment, to 924–5
 - battery 676–8
 - burglary 1017
 - circumstances, as to 98, 111–12
 - consent 676–8
 - crimes other than murder 98
 - defraud, to 461–71

Intention (Cont.)

- destroying or damaging property 1077-9
- Draft Criminal Code 98
- endangerment of life 1089-94
- fraud 934
- intoxication 327-8
- making off without payment 924-5
- mens rea* 89-90
 - achievement of purpose 90-1
 - blurring of evidence and substantive law 91-2
 - circumstances, as to 111-12
 - conditions or achievement of purpose 94-6
 - criticisms of present law 90-1
 - current legal position 90-1
 - definition 89-90
 - Draft Criminal Code 98
 - evidence 91-2
 - finding 92-4
 - motive 100-1
 - oblique intention 90-1
 - virtually certain consequences or results 90-7, 96-7
 - wilfulness 112
- obtaining services dishonestly 969
- proof 131-2
- rape 789-94
- resisting arrest 703-4
- sexual activity, causing someone to engage in 797-8
- specific intent, crimes of 98
- statutory conspiracy agreement 452-4
 - play some part in carrying out agreement, intention to 455-6
- to carry out agreement 452-4
- theft 885-93

International law

- source of law 19

Intervening acts

- causation 68-9
- drug administration 73-5
- Empress Cars* case 72-3
- innocent agent 70
- involuntariness 70
- justified and excused responses 70-1
- medical interventions 75-9
- naturally occurring acts 69-93
- self-neglect by victim 80

- subsequent conduct of defendant 69
- voluntary actors 72-3

Intoxication

- see also* Drunkenness
- actus reus 37-8
- assault 665
- automatism and 330-1
- automatism caused by 330
- battery 665
- belief in circumstances 324-5
- caused by automatism 330
- consent 764-7
- current position 321-2
- dangerous drugs see Dangerous drugs; Drugs
- defence 311-29
- defences 327, 553
- diminished responsibility 561-3
- Heard* case 319-21
- induced with intention of committing crime 327-8
- insanity 330
- involuntary 314-15
- loss of capacity due to 330
- Majewski* case 315-17, 328
- mens rea*, denial of 312-13
- recklessness 315-17, 322
- reform of law 328-9
- sexual offences consent 764-7
- specific and basic intent crimes 315-17
- unlawful act manslaughter 573
- voluntary 315-22

Involuntary acts

- actus reus 38-9
- manslaughter see

Manslaughter

- not arising from automatism 40-1

Irresistible impulse see InsanityJoint enterprise liability 212-18

- Jogee* 214-18
- no actus reus by principal 224-5
- principal not guilty 222-4

Joint principal offenders

- accomplices 183

Jurisdiction

- encouragement and assistance 493-4
- foreign in relation to necessity 377-8
- fraud 929-30
- murder 504
- solicitation to murder 617

Justification

- actus reus 32
- excuse distinguished 274-80
- force, for use of 380-408

Kidnapping

see also Abduction

- aggravated form of false imprisonment 723-4
- consent, absence of 728
- definition of offence 724
- deprivation of liberty 725-6
- 'force or fraud' 727-9
- Law Commission reform proposals 730
- reform proposals 730
- taking and carrying away 726-30
- who may be kidnapped 729-30
- without lawful excuse 729

Knowledge

- accepted judicial definition 114
- definition 114
- false representations, fraud by 953-5
- importance 114
- terminology 114
- wilful blindness 115-17

Knuckle-duster

- offensive weapon, as 748

Land

- handling stolen goods 1032-3
- theft 847-8

Larceny see TheftLavatory, sexual activity in public 822*Law Commission

- considerations on law of theft 826
- kidnapping 730
- murder
 - Consultation Paper 177 518
 - Report No 304 518-19
- reform proposals
 - automatism 311
 - causation 84-5
 - false imprisonment 724
 - fraud 927-8
 - grievous bodily harm 697-8
 - gross negligence manslaughter 598
 - infanticide 632-4
 - insanity 306-7
 - intoxication 328-9
 - kidnapping 730
 - manslaughter 597-9
 - recklessness 113
 - suicide 630-1
 - use of force 408-9

Lawful chastisement

battery 683–5

Liability

negligence as basis of 138–9 whether negligence justifiable as basis of 140–2

Licensee

vicarious liability 274–5

Life, endangerment of see

Endangerment of life

Limitations

unlawful act manslaughter 576–7

Living body tissue

theft 868–9

Loss of self-control

burden of proof 529 circumstances of an extremely grave character 537–8 combined qualifying triggers 542–3 commencement 524
considered desire for revenge 525–7 criticism of new law 530 degree of tolerance 543–8
evidence 524–5
fear of serious violence 532–5
insanity 529
instinctive actions 527–8 introduction of defence 523 justifiable sense of being seriously wronged 538
loss of control 527–30 murder, application only to 524
procedure 524–5
qualifying triggers 530–43
requirements 527–30
scope of defence 523, 524–5 self-restraint, degree of 543–8
sexual infidelity 538–42
statutory provisions 523–4 things said or done 535–7

Making off without

payment 919–25

actus reus 920–4
definition 919–20
dishonesty 924
goods supplied 922 intention to avoid payment 924–5
knowing payment was required 924
makes off 920–2
mens rea 924–5
service done 922
statutory provisions 919
unenforceable debts 922–3
without having paid as required 923–4

Malice

aforethought 512–14 constructive 514–15
definition 689–90
grievous bodily harm 689–90
transferred 122–4

Manslaughter

see also Corporate

manslaughter;

Murder; Unlawful act
manslaughter

Corporate Manslaughter and Homicide Act 2007
background 599–600
generally 599
rationale for reform of old law 600–2 divisions 520
drugs, supply of 581–2 gross negligence, reform of 598
involuntary
causation 581–2, 596
consent 572–3
definition 568
gross negligence 583–96
Adomako 583–5
breach of duty 589
circularity of test 594
duty of care 585–9
gross negligence 593
Holloway 584
Law Commission's reform
proposals 598
Prentice 584
recklessness, relationship
with 593
risk of death 589–92
state of mind 593–4
test 593
intoxication and 573
involuntary
human rights provisions 595–6
jury directions 594–5
limitations on categories of unlawfulness 576–7
mens rea 573–5
omissions 575–6
reform 597–9
unlawful act, by 570–7
causing death 581–2
dangerousness 577–81
unlawfulness 570–7
Law Commission's reform
proposals 597–9
mental suffering, killing by 84 murder, relationship
with 514–15
omission 49
recklessness 596–7

reform proposals 516–18
scope 520
shock, killing by 84
suicide 582–3 varieties 520 voluntary provocation 521–2

Marital coercion

abolition of defence 379

Medical interventions

causation 75–9

Medical practitioners abortion performed by 652–3 good faith 652

necessity as defence 377

Menaces

blackmail 99–1000
definition 998–9
type 999

Mens rea

see also Actus reus

abuse of position 966
accomplices 196–212
actual bodily harm,
occasioning 688
actus reus, coincidence
with 125–9
arranging or facilitating commission of child sex
offence 810
assault 664–5, 708–9
actual bodily harm,
occasioning 688
by penetration 795
penetration, by 795
sexual assault 796–7
attempt 412–31
battery 664–5
burglary
going equipped 1028–9
burglary in respect of dwelling 1021
causation principle 126–7 coincidence with actus reus 26, 35
compounding an offence 241–3
computer misuse 1106–7, 1112 conditional in attempt 420–2
constructive crime 120–1 corporations and aggregation of
mens rea 262–3
correspondence principle 120
definition 88–9 defraud, intention to 465–6
destroying or damaging
property 1076–9
possession offences 1099
threats to damage 1096–7
encouragement and assistance

Mens rea (Cont.)

- believing offence will be committed 487–8
- intentionally assisting
 - or encouraging a crime 481–3
- one or more offences
 - that believes will be committed 491–2
- false accounting 989
- false imprisonment 723–4
- fault
 - objective 87–8
 - subjective 87–8
- fraud
 - abuse of position 966
 - failing to disclose information 959
 - false representations 953–5
 - making or supplying articles for use in frauds 979
 - obtaining services dishonestly 968–9
 - possession of articles for fraud 974–5
- going equipped 1028–9
- grievous bodily harm 694–6
- handling stolen goods 1049–53
- harassment 739–40
- identifying elements 27–8
- identifying to which mistakes relate 334
- ignorance of law, moral responsibility and 127–9
- impair computer, intent or recklessness to 1112
- impeding apprehension or prosecution 238–40
- intention
 - achievement of purpose 90–1
 - blurring of evidence and substantive law 91–2
 - circumstances, as to 111–12
 - conditions or achievement of purpose 94–6
 - criticisms of present law 90–1
 - current legal position 90–1
 - definition 89–90
 - Draft Criminal Code 98
 - evidence 91–2
 - finding 92–4
 - motive 100–1
 - oblique intention 90–1
 - virtually certain consequences or results 90–7
- intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 798

- intoxication as denial of 312–13
- involuntary manslaughter 573–5
- knowledge
 - accepted judicial definition 114
 - belief 115
 - definition 114
 - importance 114
 - terminology 114
 - wilful blindness 115–17
- legal guilt 88–9
- literal meaning 88–9
- making off without payment 924–5
- meaning 87, 88–9, 120
- mistake
 - absence of claim of right 130
 - defence 130
 - denial of mens rea 333
 - proof 130
- moral guilt, not 88–9
- murder 512–14
- negligence 113, 134–5
- obstruction 711–12
- obtaining services
 - dishonestly 968–9
- offensive weapons 750
- penetration, assault by 795
- poisoning 716
- possession of articles for fraud 974–5
- presumption in strict liability cases 150–4
- rape
 - child under 13 years 801–2
 - consent 789–94
- recklessness
 - Caldwell test 105–7
 - circumstances, as to 113
 - Cunningham test 104–5
 - current law 101
 - definition 101–2
 - Draft Criminal Code 109, 113
 - foresight of a risk 104–5
 - indifference 110–11
 - justified risks 101
 - malice 104–5
 - meaning 101–2
 - objective 105–10, 110
 - R v G* 107–9
 - reform proposals 113
 - risk-taking 101
 - subjective 101–3, 110
 - test 101
 - unjustified risk 103–4
- reform proposals 98, 98–100
- resisting arrest 708–9
- robbery 902

- sexual assault 796–7
- sexual offences
 - arranging or facilitating commission of child sex offence 810
 - causing child aged 13–15 to engage in sexual activity 806
 - causing child to watch sexual act 808–9
 - children aged 13–15, against 807–8
 - engaging in sexual activity in presence of child 807–8
 - intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 798
 - sexual grooming of children 812
- solicitation to murder 617
- statutory conspiracy
 - drugs, importing 458
 - facts or circumstances which must be known 457–8
 - ignorance of criminal law no defence 459
 - intention to agree 452–4
 - intention to carry out agreement 452–4
 - knowledge as to circumstances 456–9
 - one party only having mens rea 459
 - play some part in carrying out agreement, intention 455–6
 - scope of application 748
 - unforeseen but inevitable consequences 455–6
- strict liability and 145–6, 158
- suspicion
 - generally 115
 - meaning 118–19
 - reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting 119
- temporary deprivation 906
- conveyances 913, 914–15
- theft 870–93
- transaction principle 126
- transferred malice 122–4
- ulterior intent 121–2
- unlawful act
 - manslaughter 573–5
- Mental disorder
 - sexual offences involving those with 815–16
- Mental suffering
 - killing by 84
- Mercy killing 627–8

Military activities

- corporate
- manslaughter 610–11

Military law 379–80Miscarriage, attempting to

- procure 645–7

Mistake

- bigamy 334
- burden of proof 333
- defence 130, 332–40
- defences 335–6
- elements of defence relating to 337–8
- erroneous advice 339
- evidence 333
- fact, of 340
- identifying mens rea relating to 333
- irrelevant 336–7
- law, of 337–40
- mens rea, denial of 332
- negligence 139
- negligence, crimes of 333–4
- proof 131–2
- strict liability, crimes of 334
- subjective mens rea 333

M’Naghten rules 292, 302, 566Money laundering

- see also* Proceeds of crime
- conceals, disguises, converts, transfers or removes criminal property from UK 1062–3
- entering or becoming concerned in an arrangement 1063–5
- offences 1056–7

Moral wrong

- crime as 8–12
- harm to others 10–12

Morality

- Devlin and 9

Murder

- see also* Diminished responsibility; Loss of self-control; Manslaughter
- accelerating death 509–12
- causing death 509–12
- common law 514–15
- constructive malice abolition 515
- common law 514–15
- death 507–8
- definition 503
- degrees 518–19
- duress 361–4
- infanticide as partial defence to 632
- infants 631–4

jurisdiction 504

Law Commission

- Consultation Paper 177 518
- Report No 304 518–19

lawful excuse for making threat to 618

malice aforethought 512–14

manslaughter, relationship with 514–15

mens rea 512–15

mental suffering and shock 84

necessity 372–4

- conjoined twins 375–6

offences ancillary to 615–18

omission 49

perjury, killing by 84

Queen’s peace, under 508

reform proposals 516–18

sentencing 515–16

solicitation to murder 615–17

threats to 1006

threats to kill 617–18

time of death 508–9 unborn child

- pre-natal injury 506–7

separation from

- mother 505–6

in womb 506–7

unlawful killing 509

victim, who can be 504–8

who can commit 503

year and a day, death

- within 508–9

Necessity*see also* Duress

abortion 653–5

assault 685

battery 685

conjoined twins case 375–6

defence 367–79, 685, 1087–9

destroying or damaging

- property 1087–9

doctor’s defence 377

duress distinguished 379–80

duty to act 377

exclusion of as defence 370–1 foreign jurisdictions 377–8

hijacked aircraft, shooting

- down 376

jurisdiction 377–8

murder 372–4

- conjoined twins 375–6

negligence 371–2

responses to non-criminal

- threats and 371

strict liability offences 372

Necrophilia 822Neglect

- offence 712–13

Negligence

capacity 142

causing or allowing a child to die 138

circumstances, as to 113

culpable fault 140–2

dangerous driving 138

degrees 139–40

driving offences 140

due diligence 142

gross negligence 138

inability to appreciate relevant risk 136–8 liability, as basis of

- causing or allowing a child to die 138

dangerous driving 138

defence 138–9

few crimes where 138–9 justifiable, whether 140–2 public nuisance 138

manslaughter 138

mens rea 113, 134–5

mistake 139

mistake in crimes 333–4

necessity 371–2

objective standard 135

- failure to comply with 133–4

sexual offences 138

special knowledge 135

Non-existent crimes

impossibility 494

Obscene publications 1117Obstruction

constables 704–12

- lawful acts 711

wilful 709–10

meaning of

- obstruction 709–10

mens rea 711–12

Obtaining by false pretences *seeDeception*Obtaining services dishonestly

act 967

actus reus 967–8

dishonesty 968

intention 969

interpretation 967

knowing that payment

- required or might be required 968–9

mens rea 968–9

obtaining 967

offence 966–7

service 967–8

without payment 968

Offences against the person person, meaning of 658

Offensive weapons

articles adapted for use as 748

articles carried as 749

bayonet as 748

blades or points, articles

with 754–5

carrying lawful authority 751–3

offence 750–1

'public place', definition

of 753–4

reasonable excuse 751–3 categories 748–9

cosh as 748

dagger as 748

definition 748

duration of offence 751

flick knife as 748

knuckle-duster as 748

mens rea 750

revolver as 748

service rifle as 748

statutory provisions 747

swordstick as 748

truncheon as 748

unlawful possession 750–1

mens rea 753–4

Omissions

causation 47, 57

control 62

distinguishing between acts and omission 57–9 false representations, fraud

by 943–6

handling stolen goods 1044–5

rescuers 61–2

unlawful act

manslaughter 575–6

Parasitic accessory see Joint enterprise liability

Parties to crime

see also Accomplices

actus reus 175

summary 176

Partnerships

liability 259

Pedal cycles, taking 915Penetration, assault by

actus reus 795

mens rea 795

Perjury

killing by 84

Poison abortion, to procure 647–8 administration

actus reus 713–16

definition 713–16

mens rea 716

sexual offences 717

noxious, interpretation 714–15 offences relating to 716–17 terrorist related offences 717

'thereby', use of term 716

Police

assault by 707–8

prevention of breach of peace 707–8

assault on 704–12

constables

refusal to aid 243–4

corporate manslaughter 611

trivial touchings by officers 707–8

wilful obstruction 709–10

by not assisting 710–11

lawful acts 711

meaning of obstruction 709–10

Pollution

strict liability offences 165–6

Pornography

see also Obscene publications

sexual offences 817

Possession

articles for fraud see Possession of articles for fraud

criminal property 1065–6

dangerous drugs 161–4

destroying or damaging

property 1099

drugs 161–4

theft 855

Possession of articles for

fraud 969–75

actus reus 970–4

any fraud 974

article 970–1

control 973–4

defences 975

electronic data 973

has in his possession 971–3

inchoate liability 975

knowing possession 972

knowledge of fraudulent nature of article 972

Law Commission

proposals 969

mens rea 974–5

person 971

personal possession 971–2

scope of offence 969–70

for use in course of or in connection with 974

Presumption of innocence

strict liability 148–50

Probation

corporate manslaughter 612

Proceeds of crime

see also Money laundering acquisition of criminal

property 1065–6

common elements 1057

criminal property 1057–8

defences 975

overlapping offences 1067–8 possession of criminal

property 1065–6

predicate offence 1059–61

use of criminal property 1065–6

Property

see also Destroying or damaging property

arson 1094–5

corporations, belonging

to 866–7

defence of, use of force

for 404–5

force used to defend 404–5

indefeasible title to 831–4

theft

abandonment 869–70, 890–1

articles returned for price 891–2

belonging to another person 853–70

borrowing 888–9

civil law 856

conditional intention 892–3

corporations, of 866–7

deceased, of 869

disposal of property as one's own 887–8

equitable interests 858

general rule 853–4

intangible 847

lending 888–9

mistake, obtained by 863–5

identification 865

obtaining by

deception 835–6

ownerless 867

proprietary interests 856–7

proprietary rights 856–7

received from or on account of another 859–60

received for particular

purpose 859–63

return, condition of 889–90

right to deprive 872–3

steps taken to discover owner 873–4

things in action 844–5

types which may be stolen 843–4

unlawfully possessed

property 867–8

threats to damage 1006

- Prostitution
 - sexual offences 817
- Provocation
 - see also* Loss of self-control
 - background 521–2
 - common law 521, 522
 - controversy 522
 - new law 523–48
 - statutory basis 522
- Public decency, conspiracy to outrage 473
- Public lavatory, sexual activity in 822
- Public morals, conspiracy to corrupt 472–3
- Public order
 - offences 1118
- Public and private
 - defences 380–408
 - lawful force, defence against 447–8
 - pre-emptive strike 400–1
 - principles 381–2
 - provoked attack, defence against 401–2
 - unknown justifying circumstances, reliance on 403–4
- Public wrong
 - crime as 5–8
- Publicity order
 - corporate manslaughter 614
- Queen's peace, death under 508
- Racially aggravated crime
 - assault 698–702
 - contemporaneous demonstration of hostility 700–2
- Racially aggravated harassment
 - statutory provisions 744–5
- Rape
 - actus reus 787–9
 - anal 789
 - burglary with intent to 1025–6
 - child under 13, of 801–2
 - actus reus 801
 - mens rea 801–2
 - common law 786
 - consent
 - absence of consent 789–94
 - belief 790–1
 - mens rea 789–94
 - reasonable belief 791–3
 - definition 786–7
 - drug assisted 774–5
 - mistaken identity 794
 - oral 789
 - penetration
 - degree of penetration 788–9
 - intentional 789–90
 - penile 787–8
 - recklessness 790
 - statutory provisions 786–7
 - vaginal 789
- Reasonableness
 - destroying or damaging property 1084
 - encouragement and assistance 483–4
 - force, use of 384, 397–8
 - rape, belief in consent and 791–4
 - suspicion 119
- Receiving see Handling stolen goods
- Recklessness
 - assault 664–5
 - attempt 417–18
 - battery 664–5
 - Caldwell 105–7, 109–10
 - Cunningham 104–5
 - current law 101–2
 - Draft Criminal Code 109, 113
 - drunkenness 315–17, 322
 - endangerment of life 1091–3
 - foresight 104–5
 - indifference 110–11
 - intoxication 315–17, 322
 - involuntary manslaughter 593
 - justified risks 101, 103–4
 - manslaughter 596–7
 - mens rea
 - Caldwell test 105–7, 109–10
 - circumstances, as to 113
 - Cunningham test 104–5
 - definition 101
 - Draft Criminal Code 109, 113
 - foresight of a risk 104–5
 - indifference 110–11
 - malice 104–5
 - meaning 101–2
 - justified risks 101, 103–4
 - objective 105–10, 110
 - R v G* 107–9
 - reform proposals 113
 - risk-taking 101
 - subjective 101–3, 110
 - test 101
 - unjustified risk 103–4
 - rape 790
 - reform proposals 113
 - subjective 101–3, 110
 - wilfulness 112
- Religious flagellation
 - battery 683
 - consent 683
- Religiously aggravated harassment 744–5
- Religiously motivated crime
 - assault 698–702
- Remoteness
 - fraud 934–6
- Representations, fraud by false see False representations, fraud by
- Rescue, failure to 61–2
- Resisting arrest
 - mens rea 708–9
- Restraint
 - assault, as 667–8
- Result crimes
 - actus reus 29
- Revenge porn
 - meaning 4
 - offence 4
- Revolver
 - offensive weapon, as 748
- Risks
 - abortion 654
 - conspiracy 468
 - fraud 933–4, 959
 - manslaughter 589–92
 - negligence and inability to appreciate 136–8
 - recklessness
 - foresight of risk 104–5
 - justified risks 101, 103–4
 - taking risks 101
 - sexually transmitted disease 683
- Road traffic offences 1119
- Robbery
 - on any person 900
 - definition 895–6
 - force, use of in 897–8
 - immediately before or at the time of stealing 900–1
 - mens rea 902
 - in order to steal 900
 - person, force to the 899–900
 - theft, requirement for 896–7
- Sadomasochism
 - battery 681–2
 - consent 681–2
- Secondary liability
 - actus reus 185–6
 - inchoate liability
 - distinguished 178–9
 - liability 185–6
 - summary 176
- Self-control, loss of see Loss of self-control
- Self-defence 401–2
- Self-induced automatism 310–11
- Self-intoxication 325–7

Sentencing

- corporate manslaughter 613
- corporations 258–9
- crime, interrelationship with 13
- destroying or damaging property 1098
- handling stolen goods 1031–2
- impeding apprehension or prosecution 240
- murder 515–16
 - reform proposals 516–18
- severity of in case of strict liability 166

Service rifle

- offensive weapon, as 748

Services

- obtaining dishonestly see

Obtaining services dishonestly

- theft 853

Sexual assault

- actus reus 796
- child under 13, of 798–800
- children 802–3
- indecent assault, formerly 795
- mens rea* 796–7

Sexual grooming

- children 811–12

Sexual offences

- abuse of position of trust 813
- actus reus
 - arranging or facilitating commission of child sex offence 809–10
 - causing child aged 13–15 to engage in sexual activity 806
 - children aged 13–15, against 805
 - engaging in sexual activity in presence of child 807
 - intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 797
 - sexual grooming of children 811–12
- arranging or facilitating commission of child sex offence 809–10
 - actus reus 809–10
 - mens rea* 810
- bestiality 821
- burglary with intent to commit 1025–6
- causing child aged 13–15 to engage in sexual activity
 - actus reus 806
 - mens rea* 807
- causing child to engage in sexual activity 806–7

- causing child to watch sexual act
 - actus reus 808
 - mens rea* 808–9
- child under 13 798–800
 - causing to engage in sexual activity 803–4
 - actus reus 803–4
 - inciting to engage in sexual activity 803–4
 - actus reus 803–4
- children aged 13–15, against 804–12
 - actus reus 805–6
 - mens rea* 807
- children, indecent photographs of 817
- codification 756
- consent
 - capacity 762–3
 - choice 761–2
 - concept 757–8
 - conclusive
 - presumptions 775–82
 - deception 767–9
 - definition 758–9
 - drug assisted rape 774–5
 - evidential
 - presumptions 769–72
 - fraud, obtained by 775–82
 - free agreement 759–64
 - identity fraud, obtained by 755
 - inability to communicate owing to physical disability 774
 - inability to refuse through intoxication 764–7
 - intoxication 764–7
 - submission 759–61
 - substances taken causing stupification or overpowering of complainant 774–5
 - threats of violence 772–3
 - unconsciousness 773–4
 - unlawful detention 773
- deception 767–9
- defences
 - children aged 13–15, against 806
- effectiveness of
 - legislation 756–7
- engaging in sexual activity in presence of child 807–8
 - actus reus 807
 - mens rea* 807–8
- exposure 819
- family, within relating to children 813–15
- fetishes 783

- indecent photographs of children 817
- intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 797–8
 - actus reus 797
 - mens rea* 798
- mens rea*
 - arranging or facilitating commission of child sex offence 810
 - causing child aged 13–15 to engage in sexual activity 807
 - causing child to watch sexual act 808–9
 - children aged 13–15, against 807–8
 - engaging in sexual activity in presence of child 807–8
 - intentionally causing someone to engage in sexual activity 797–8
 - sexual grooming of children 812
- mental disorder, involving 815–16
- necrophilia 822
- negligence 138
- non-consensual 786–98
- poison, administering 717
- pornography 817
- position of trust, abuse of 813
- preliminary
 - administering drugs 817–18
 - committing offence with intent to commit 818
 - trespass with intent to commit 819
- preliminary offences 817–19
- proof of sexual activity required 782–5
- prostitution 817
- public lavatory, sexual activity in 822
- secondary liability 802
- sexual communication with a child 812
- sexual grooming of children 811–12
 - actus reus 811–12
 - mens rea* 812
- Sexual Offences Act 2003
 - complexity 822–3
 - human rights 825
 - overcriminalization 823–4
 - problems with legislation 822–5
- touching 785–6
- voyeurism 819–21

- Sexually transmitted disease
 - battery and risk of disease 683
 - consent to risk 683
- Shock
 - killing by 84
 - unlawful act
 - manslaughter 580–1
- Sleepwalking 296
- Social dangers
 - strict liability offences 161–4
- Solicitation to murder 615–17
 - audience 616
 - jurisdiction 617
 - mens rea* 617
 - offence solicited 617
 - person, a 615–16
 - solicitation 616–17
 - victim 616
- Sources of law
 - common law 15–17
 - European Union 18–19
 - generally 15
 - international law 19
 - statute 17–18
- Specific intent
 - basic intent distinguished 318–21
- Sports
 - battery 679–80
 - consent 679–80
- Spouses
 - theft, liability for 893–4
- Stalking
 - offence 745–7
- State of affairs
 - actus reus, as 42–5
- Statute
 - source of law 17–18
- Stolen goods
 - advertising reward for 243
- Strict liability
 - see also Mens rea*
 - absolute liability
 - distinguished 146–7, 166–7
 - adverbs indicating whether
 - ‘knowingly’ 156–7
 - ‘wilfully’ 157
 - application of
 - principles 143–50
 - arguments for and
 - against 168–70
 - common law 147–8
 - compliance, possibility of 161
 - corporations 248
 - courts, approach adopted by 167
 - dangerous drugs offences 161–4
 - defences available 170–4
 - due diligence 170–4
 - fault 87
 - general prohibition, whether 160
 - human rights provisions 167
 - irrelevance of mens rea 145–6
 - ‘knowingly’ 156–7
 - mens rea* and 145–6
 - mistake 334
 - nature 143–5
 - necessity 372
 - pollution 165–6
 - presumption of
 - innocence 148–50
 - presumption of mens rea 150–4
 - punishment, severity of 166
 - ‘real’ or ‘quasi’ crime 159–60
 - recognition of offences 154–67
 - courts, policy of 158
 - reform 174
 - regulatory offences 145
 - social context of offence 158
 - social dangers, cases
 - involving 161–4
 - special prohibition,
 - whether 160
 - statute law 147–8
 - statutory context of
 - offence 154–5
 - statutory defences 170–4
 - vicarious liability
 - distinguished 267
 - ‘wilfully’ 157
- Suicide
 - assisted suicide 622–6
 - common law 619
 - complicity in another’s 619–21
 - decriminalization 619
 - introduction of offence 4
 - jurisdiction 627
 - mercy killing 627–8
 - pacts 629–30
 - prosecutorial policies 621–2
 - reform of law 628–9
 - Suicide Act 1961 619
 - unlawful act
 - manslaughter 582–3
- Summary offences
 - attempt 431
- Superior orders
 - defence 379–80
 - international 379–80
 - military law 379–80
 - war crimes 379–80
- Surgery, consent to 680
- Suspicion
 - generally 115
 - meaning 118–19
 - reasonable grounds
 - for knowing or suspecting 119
- Swordstick
 - offensive weapon, as 748
- Tattooing, lawfulness of 681
- Temporary deprivation
 - actus reus 904–6
 - articles displayed 905
 - commercial exhibitions 905–6
 - conveyances
 - consent by fraud 910–12
 - driving 913–14
 - lawful authority 912
 - meaning 912–13
 - mens rea* 913, 914–15
 - taking for own or another’s use 908–9
 - unauthorized use 909–10
 - without consent 910–12
 - without lawful authority 910
 - definition 903
 - mens rea* 906
 - order to view 905
 - pedal cycles 915
 - public access to building 904
 - removal of articles from places
 - open to public 903–6
 - vehicles 903, 906–15
 - vessels 903
- Terrorism
 - food terrorism 1006
 - poisoning 717
- Theft
 - actus reus 828–70
 - appropriation
 - assumption of right 829
 - bona fide* purchasers 842–3
 - civil law 837–8
 - consent 829–30
 - continuing 841–2
 - dealing 839
 - definition 828–9
 - dishonest 875–6
 - Gomez* 829–30
 - indefeasible title to
 - property 831–4
 - interpretation in case
 - law 834–8
 - keeping 839
 - offers to sell 840–1
 - place 842
 - requirements 839–40
 - time 842
 - wide scope 834–5
 - bona fide* purchasers 842–3
 - cheques 845–6
 - civil partners, liability of 893–4
 - common law 885
 - confidential information 852–3
 - consent 873
 - control 855
 - corporations 893
 - corpses 868–9
 - definition 827–8

Theft (Cont.)

dishonesty
 criticism 881-4
 definition 871-2, 875-6
 determination 874-85
 as element of offence 874-85
 reform 884-5
 electricity 850-2
 gain, relevance of 871 intention to deprive 885-93
 common law 885
 limited interests, persons with 886
 interpretation of legislation 826-7
 land 847-8
 Law Commission's considerations 826
 living body tissue 868-9
 mens rea 870-93
 obligation, legal 860
 advance payments 860 agency 862-3
 charity sponsorship 862
 deposits 860-1 imposed by statute 862 requirement 865-6 possession 855
 property
 abandonment 869-70, 890-1
 articles returned for price 891-2
 belonging to another person 853-70
 borrowing 888-9
 civil law 856
 corporations, of 866-7
 deceased, of 869
 disposal of property as one's own 887-8
 equitable interests 858
 general rule 853-4
 intangible 847
 lending 888-9
 mistake, obtained by 863-5 identification 865
 obtaining by deception 835-6
 ownerless 867
 proprietary interests 856-7 proprietary rights 856-7 received from or on account
 of another 859-60
 received for particular purpose 859-63
 return, condition 889-90
 steps taken to discover owner 873-4
 things in action 844-5

types which may be stolen 843-4

reform 894
 right to deprive 873
 scope of offence 834-5
 services 853
 spouses, liability of 893-4 treasure trove 856-7
 trust property 858-9
 unlawfully possessed
 property 867-8 wild animals 849-50
 wild fruits 849
 without loss 838-9

Things in action

handling stolen goods 1033

Third party

interventions 70-5

Threats

see also Blackmail; Duress
 against whom made 350
 concurrent cause of crime 354
 evaluation of response to threat 350-2 evasive action not possible 355-7
 extraneous 349
 factual existence 349
 generally 344
 kill, to 617-18
 nature 346-7, 369-70
 no need to exist in fact 349 offences based on 1006 person of reasonable steadfastness 352-4 protection against threat 355-7 qualifying threat or danger 347-9
 response to threat 350-2 voluntarily laying self open to 357-60

Tort

false imprisonment 721-2
 vicarious liability, in 267-8

Trade unions

liability 259

Transferred malice

secondary liability 212

Treason

attempts 432
 duress 361

Treasure trove 856-7Trespass

burglary
 exceeding permission 1011-12
 intention to enter as 1010-13
 intent to commit a sexual
 offence 1025-6
 offences 1030

Truncheon

offensive weapon, as 748

Trust property

theft 858-9

Unfitness to be tried

insanity 281-90

Unincorporated bodies

liability 259-61

Unlawful act manslaughter

base crime, proof of 571-2 causing death 581-2 civil wrongs 574
 common law 569
 consent 572-3
 crime 570-2
 dangerousness 577-81
 directed at victim, act 577
 drugs, supply of 581-2 fight and flight cases 581 fright 580-1
 harm 580-1
 intoxication 573
 limitations 576-7
 mens rea 573-5
 minor harm 569
 multiple accused 579
 omissions 575-6
 reform 597-8
 shock 580-1
 suicide 582-3
 unlawfulness 570-7

Unsolicited goods demanding payment with threats 1006

Vicarious liability

aiding and abetting 275-6 application of principles 269-75 attributed act principle 272-5 limits 273-4 basis 266
 corporations 249, 266-75 delegation effective 271
 legitimacy of principle 272 none in strict liability
 offences 271
 principle 269-75
 sub-delegation 270
 doctrine 266
 Draft Criminal Code 276
 employer, liability of 275
 identification 268-9 licensee, sale by 274-5
 nature of doctrine 266 personal duty distinguished 266
 reform 276
 sale by licensee 274-5
 scope of doctrine 266

- strict liability distinguished 267
- tort in 267–8
- Violence
 - domestic 634–41
 - harassment 743–4
 - sexual offences 772–3
 - threats 1006
- Voyeurism 819–21
- War crimes 379–80
 - superior orders 379–80
- Weapons
 - aggravated burglary 1022–3
 - offensive see Offensive weapons
- Wild animals
 - theft 849–50
- Wild fruits
 - theft 849
- Wolfenden Committee
 - homosexuality 9
- Words, assault by 662
- Wounding
 - definition 689
 - grievous bodily harm
 - alternative verdicts 696–7
 - burglary with intent to inflict 1018–19
 - infliction of harm 688–94
- Law Commission's reform
 - proposals 697–8
- malice 695–6
- malicious
 - inflicting 688–94
- mens rea 694–6
- ulterior intent 694–5
- malicious 689–90
- Wrongful credit, dishonestly retaining 1053–5
- Wrongs to others
 - classification as crime 10–12
- Year and a day rule 508–9

Professor Ormerod has again managed to combine in one text a student's exposition of the principles of criminal law with the practical yet enquiring approach required by practitioners. He has unrivalled expertise in the analysis of the criminal law and its exposition to lawyers at all levels, from students via advocates and the Law Commission to judges. For many of us, Smith & Hogan has been and will remain an indispensable standard source at each of these stages of our lives.

Lord Hughes of Ombersley, Justice of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom

Is invaluable for both teaching and research and can always be relied on to provide a clear, authoritative, detailed and thorough explanation of even the most specific points of criminal law.

Professor Rebecca Williams, Fellow and Tutor in Law, Pembroke College, Oxford

Professor Ormerod and Karl Laird have produced another outstanding edition of this classic work. Admirably clear, erudite and comprehensive, it is essential reading for anyone seeking to gain an accurate and deep understanding of the criminal law and its many subtleties.

Mr David Perry QC, 6KBW College Hill

David Ormerod QC is Law Commissioner for England and Wales, Professor of Criminal Justice, University College London, Barrister, Benchers of Middle Temple, Door Tenant at 18 Red Lion Chambers.

Karl Laird is a fixed-term Fellow and Tutor in Law at St Hilda's College, Oxford.

The latest edition of this classic textbook will be very welcome. Noted for its clarity and accessibility, Smith & Hogan provides a profound analysis of the complexities of the criminal law and the issues of principle which judges frequently encounter.

Lord Lloyd-Jones, Justice of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom

Anyone looking for an authoritative, clear and stimulating discussion of criminal law, need not look any further . . . There is, to my mind, no other text which is so comprehensive.

Student Law Journal

David Ormerod has raised Smith & Hogan's Criminal Law to a new level. He has expanded (and made more accessible) the authoritative, detailed explanations of statutes and doctrines that characterized previous editions, but he has also added theoretical depth and sophistication to the book by engaging more closely with some of the flourishing contemporary academic writing in criminal law theory.

Professor R A Duff, University of Stirling & University of Minnesota online resources

www.oup.com/uk/sho/

For more information on the open access website which accompanies this book, please turn to page i.

Cover image: Old Bailey Courthouse in London ©iStock.com/AndrewAvitt

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

www.oup.com

ISBN 978-0-19-880709-7

9 780198 807094

KQ-443-006